I note that the permissible amount of government expenditure is to be raised from $350 million to $400 million, and I regret very much that at least a portion of the additional $50 million will have to be spent for the completion of the federal government's share of the trans-Canada highway, namely that portion running through our national parks. Much as we regret that some provinces are being very slow in completing their share of the work, we regret even more having to make the observation that the federal government has also been unduly slow. It should have completed its share of the highway, the mileage through the national parks, long before any of the provinces should have been expected to complete their share of the work.

I also regret that in the bill before us there is no amendment to enable the government to undertake the building of an alternative western route as a second trans-Canada highway. It is obvious that the decision of the government is rather confirmed by now, and that the building of an additional national highway will have to wait until the slowest of the provinces has completed its portion of the first trans-Canada highway. In my opinion the lack of any such authority in the bill now before us constitutes discrimination against the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta which, if they have not already done so, have about completed their share of the first highway. The lack of a suitable amendment in the bill indicates that they will have to continue to wait indefinitely before they can proceed with other major highway building unless, of course, they are willing to pay the whole cost themselves.

The official spokeman for the Liberal party introduced a rather novel idea as to how the poorer provinces of Canada might be aided and encouraged in building their portions of the trans-Canada highway a little more rapidly. I have great reservations as to the remedy he proposed. He referred to my attitude with regard to the national hospital insurance plan, and attempted to compare the arrangements arrived at in that regard with the arrangements that exist under the Trans-Canada Highway Act.

I believe there are reasons that obtain in the hospital insurance field for the formula that was adopted there that do not apply in this particular case. I am very concerned about the remedy that was offered, because I am not too sure that this is the way in which the Atlantic provinces can be helped to meet their responsibilities. Is the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate advocating that this policy which he suggested might be made applicable in many fields of federal legislation? If so, perhaps he would be quite happy to see varying rates of old age pensions being paid in different parts of Canada.

I believe that when this parliament legislates it must legislate under rules and conditions that are applicable to all parts of Canada without discrimination. I am not saying that cognizance should not be taken of the ability of the provinces to meet their responsibilities, but I feel that the federal government should see it is not in the form of discriminatory legislation. This situation should be met by changes in the financial arrangements between the two levels of government. If aid is needed in this field by these eastern governments, that is the time and place where financial resources must be made available to these governments in such a way that they can take their proper place and receive the benefits of specific legislation offered by the parliament of Canada.

I am saying this, Mr. Speaker, with a particular complaint in mind. I regret that in the amendment now before us the government has not seen fit to enact into law a policy decision that was announced in this house by the previous Liberal government. This policy was that if federal money were being used in the building of any portion of the trans-Canada highway, tolls could not be imposed. We in B.C. had serious complaints and differences of opinion in years gone by, I will admit, with the government that is no longer in office. We wanted a federal contribution, for instance, toward the construction of the Oak street bridge, and we wanted to recover part of our contribution by the imposition of tolls. The former minister of public works, Hon. Robert Winters, made it very clear in this house that the government was not prepared to make a contribution to the building of a bridge within a province, or any part of the trans-Canada highway, if tolls were to be imposed and the provincial government enabled to recover its share of the cost thereby.

We heard the same argument again at the time of the building of the new Port Mann bridge. The policy of the federal government was reiterated, and we had to abide by the decision of the federal government in this regard. The reason I would have loved to have that policy announcement included in the amendment now before us is that I notice this policy is not being followed in the province of Nova Scotia. I have received this information since the resolution stage. In a return tabled on April 4 last the Minister of Transport admitted that up to March 1, 1960 the federal government had expended $20,157,201 on the building of the Canso causeway, but the Nova Scotia government is not committed, under any conditions, to the spending of more than $5.5 million. However, the Nova Scotia government are allowed to recover whatever expenditures they may have made by imposing a toll of 75 cents—and that is a high toll—on people using the Canso causeway.

I believe the federal government owes a responsibility to the other areas of Canada that have not been granted this right. It is right to insist that whatever agreement may have been made with the government of Nova Scotia, that agreement be so amended that it forbids Nova Scotia to do this, or that there be written into the legislation a clause whereby any provincial government shall have the right to recover any of its contribution by the collection of tolls on any public undertaking to which the federal government has made a contribution.

I believe that if the people of British Columbia are going to be denied the right to collect tolls, and I agree they ought to be denied that right, we should ask that the same rule of law be made applicable to the people of Nova Scotia using the Canso causeway, which is part of the trans-Canada highway. At one time the Pattullo bridge was not part of the trans-Canada highway, but immediately upon it being made a part of the highway we had to desist from the collection of tolls. We did so, and the bridge has been toll-free ever since. The Port Mann bridge, similarly, should be a toll-free bridge.

Let me say again that I am sure we are aware of the fact that the government of Nova Scotia may need these revenues. They may need them in the worst possible way, just as the hon. member was able to outline the needs of the government of Newfoundland for vast sums of additional revenue if it is going to be able to play its proper role in the development of its economy. However, we feel that the proper method of helping these Atlantic provinces is by substantial increases in their revenues at a time when the federal tax-sharing agreements are up for revision.

We regret that the amendment before us, in the light of the need for national development, in the light of the need for national unity and the part that highways have played in that regard, in the light of supplying employment and reducing unemployment in Canada, has not made more allowance for the development of the Canadian economy.

Mr. Lawrence E. Kindt (McLeod): I have great pleasure in rising to speak on the amendment which is before the house. Before doing so I should like to make one comment. I take a vastly different position from that of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. In my opinion if this country is to be developed, and particularly west of the great lakes, we must have highways. We cannot wait forever to have these highways. Therefore, instead of adopting the thought emanating from the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate this afternoon, I think we must have a policy which will provide federal assistance for the building of additional trans-Canada highways.

Mr. Pickersgill: Since the hon. gentleman has brought my name into it, would he permit a question?

Mr. Kindt: I did not mention your name.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, my constituency. He identified me so would he permit a question?

Mr. Kindt: I shall be happy to answer it now or at the end of my speech.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. gentleman would not mind answering now, my question is this. The hon. gentleman, if I understood him aright, said that west of the great lakes they could not wait forever for highway development. Does the hon. gentleman think that we east of the great lakes and east of the St. Lawrence do have to wait forever? That is what I was complaining about.

Mr. Kindt: I did not bring the eastern part of Canada into my remarks.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, I did.

Mr. Kindt: I took the hon. member at what he said, which was in effect that he was not in favour of the development of a further trans-Canada highway because it would not benefit the area he represents.

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not say that.

Mr. Kindt: But you inferred it.

Mr. Speaker, turning now to the question of trans-Canada highways, I live in that part of western Canada known as southwestern Alberta, about which I wish to speak briefly at this time because it has a very direct bearing on the route which I believe the next trans-Canada highway should take. I refer particularly to that area in southwestern Alberta around Lethbridge, the Crowsnest pass, Cranbrook, Nelson, Okanagan and through there—the area known as the southern route. In my remarks I shall refer to this route as the southern route.

When plans for trans-Canada highway No. 1 were being developed a decision had to be made as to whether it would go from Medicine Hat, Calgary, Banff, Lake Louise, Cranbrook and on west, or whether it would take the southern route and go through Medicine Hat, Lethbridge, Fort Macleod, Crowsnest pass, Cranbrook, Nelson and on west.

One only has to look at a map to see which is the best route and the most economical route, and which, if physical conditions and economic development were to be considered, should have been the route. But there was a lot of discussion at that time about which route it should take. Since Calgary was the largest city and Banff had the tourist attractions developing at that time, the pressure was to put it in through that way, and the southern route was left as a by-passed route.

It is about that route which I wish to speak today. I do so because the southern route is now one of the fastest developing areas in western Canada. It is the most direct route from Medicine Hat to the west coast. Not only that, but if it were developed we would have in that area tourist trade coming up from the south in greater numbers because often people on vacation have not the time to go further north. In other words, if the tourist had four or five days he could come up into Canada visit Waterton lakes, go through the Crowsnest pass and visit the scenic points in that area and we would get that tourist's dollar. At the present time we are missing that tourist's dollar.

That is only one argument in favour of having a four-lane highway through that area. However, while talking about scenery and the tourist trade I should like to emphasize one or two points. I said before that we lost out when it came to the location of highway No. 1, and we certainly should have priority for consideration of any additional trans-Canada highway to be built. Any new highway should follow the southern route through southern Alberta and the Crowsnest pass and then through sourthern British Columbia. Let me say that along that route there are such fast growing industrial cities as Lethbridge, Nelson, Cranbrook, et cetera. Then there are areas of amusement such as Waterton lakes national park, one of the finest summer and pleasure resorts not only in western Canada but, people have said, in the world. It is a place where the tourist can go and rest and be quiet, and that is of course often the feature the tourist puts first.

Then there is the Frank slide at the eastern end, of the Crowsnest pass which is one of the most scenic spots existing in western Canada. It is the place where a mountain fell across the valley covering the town of Frank and the railroad and the highway, and it is a scenic spot which I am sure any tourist once having seen it will never forget. The tourist could go on through the Crowsnest pass, Fernie, the beautiful Okanagan lakes, and so on. I need not recite to this house why the southern route should not be chosen from the point of scenery.

Let me now turn to the industrial side. At the British-American plant at Pincher Creek a large proportion, I should say, of the natural gas coming into Ontario originates in that field. Then there are the scrubbing plants, industrial development, and more industrial development is in the making. Then going through the Crowsnest pass will be the 36-inch pipe line exporting gas to the United States. There are other lines criss-crossing to join up with the trans-Canada pipe line. In other words, we have in that area an industry now in existence and a great deal more development in the offing. Step across the line from Alberta into British Columbia and you have there the development of the Columbia basin. What need is there for me to give any more reasons for asking and pressing for first consideration of this southern route, the shortest route, as the next trans-Canada highway?

Before leaving the question of the tourist trade, I might say that there has recently been set up the Crowsnest pass historic sites and development board. That board, or it may be called a society, is doing everything possible to develop the beauties of the Crowsnest pass area and when it is fully developed it will be a tourist's paradise. With regard to accommodation we have plenty of excellent accommodation and more will be built as time goes on. Therefore as the route where a second trans-Canada highway should be put to accommodate the tourist traffic and industry, the southern route has everything in its favour and the area is losing millions of dollars waiting for this development.

Let me say in conclusion that we have been by-passed by those who planned the No. 1 highway 15 or 20 years ago. I do not think the Minister of Public Works or the government should be left to find this out for themselves. I feel it is my duty, since I represent the Fort Macleod, and Crowsnest pass areas to bring this to the attention of the government. It is a matter which would be given serious and first consideration, and I urge the government when it is studying the construction of a future trans-Canada highway to give full weight to representations in favour of developing this southern route. I go one step further and suggest that in view of the fact that this route was by-passed in the planning stage of the present No. 1 highway it is appropriate that we on the southern route should press for construction of this route first and foremost, and the people of southern Alberta will look with disfavour on any other choice, unless the southern route is developed either first or simultaneously.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before I recognize another speaker, now that we have heard speakers from all the parties represented in this house I think I should express my concern about the relevancy of some of the speeches we have heard up to now. I should like to have the help of the house if it is felt I am in error, but I should point out that this bill is merely to extend the present act until 1963 in respect of the works, and 1964 in respect of the expenses. I have some doubt as to whether a discussion of a second trans-Canada highway, for instance, would be relevant. I do not by that statement refer to the comments made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate because, if I remember correctly, he discussed that matter in the light of the possibility of the unconstitutionality of the act. But to discuss a second trans-Canada highway as such, or the choice of the route, or even tolls here and there, does not seem to me to be relevant and I think I must ask the co-operation of all hon. members in bringing the debate within the rules of order.

Mr. Winch: The very reason I rose before you did, Your Honour, was to raise this matter. Until you yourself spoke, no one had raised any question about the relevancy of what was being said. I wish to point out that 80 per cent of the remarks of the previous speaker concerned a possible second trans-Canada highway, and it was with regard to a second trans-Canada highway that I myself wish to make some very pertinent remarks.

In view of the fact that Your Honour has now raised this question, and since it has not been raised before, I wish to say that there is only one matter on which I want to speak, and that is the subject of a second trans-Canada highway.

Mr. Pickersgill: If I may say a word on the point of order which has just been raised, I did not wish to interrupt the speech made by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Kindt), who does not speak very often in the house, but I thought the speech he made would have been perfectly in order on the resolution stage when we are discussing whether or not there should be such a bill as is proposed. I think there should then be the widest latitude to discuss the wisdom of spending the money for one purpose, as opposed to another. However, I would agree with Your Honour that on second reading we have to stay within the broad ambit of the bill itself. I think we could argue that we should not go ahead with the measure because something else would be a better thing to do, but just to use it as a vehicle for a general debate on roads or highways would, I agree, be out of order. On the other hand, I was happy that Your Honour recognized that any questions about the constitutionality of the bill or any questions about the participation of all the provinces, or some of the provinces, are certainly relevant to legislation which applies to the whole of Canada.

Mr. Winch: May I, then, just add this? I cannot understand why neither Your Honour nor anyone else raised any objection to what was said by the previous speaker. We did not do so, because we believe in freedom of speech even if it goes outside the bounds of order. The fact that you did not interfere indicated that hon. members who were to follow could speak on the same lines. However, in view of Your Honour's feeling that the hon. member was completely out of order—which, without doubt, he was—I hope it may be agreed through yourself and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker) that when the first vote in the departmental estimates comes up for discussion the question of a second trans-Canada highway can be fully raised. If it cannot, then I want the same privilege as was accorded to the hon. member who has just resumed his seat. In fact, I believe that on the first vote of the estimates of the Minister of Public Works we can discuss this question of a second trans-Canada highway.

Mr. Pickersgill: There can be no doubt about that.

Mr. Winch: I am still on my feet—

Mr. Walker: The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is assisting the hon. member for Vancouver East.

Mr. Winch: I am asking if this matter can definitely be discussed during consideration of the estimates of the department.

Mr. Walker: As the old veteran who has just taken his seat has said, there can be no question about that.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Winch: In that case we shall not seek to discuss this particular subject further at the present time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I say that I did not interrupt the hon. member for Macleod when he was speaking about this alternative route because I had given some latitude to the previous speaker. However, I do not wish to give in advance any interpretation concerning what is likely to be relevant, and I do not want my silence to mean agreement with the interpretation given to my ruling by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. G. R. McWilliam (Northumberland-Miramichi): Having listened to the remarks about what is, and what is not in order during discussion of this bill on second reading, may I say that I did not have the opportunity to speak during the resolution stage.

I had intended, today, to make some comments with regard to a second trans-Canada highway but since you have ruled, sir, that that would be out of order, I shall have to refrain from doing so and try to keep within your direction. However, what I wished most particularly to say on behalf of the part of New Brunswick that I represent would deal, more or less, with a subject which would probably be not strictly in order on second reading. It has been intimated that we can discuss this matter on the first item of the minister's estimates when they are before the committee.

The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker) gave a résumé of what transpired in connection with the Trans-Canada Highway Act, when he spoke on the resolution stage. He was brief at that time and he was also brief today because I think he felt that the background of the Trans-Canada Highway Act had been well covered on previous occasions. This amendment before us today is one to extend until May 31, 1964 the period during which payments may be made to the provinces and to prolong until December 31, 1963 the period in respect of which construction costs may be incurred under this act and to provide also that the aggregate of all expenditures under the act may be increased to a maximum of $400 million.

For reasons I just mentioned when I rose to speak, I shall be brief today. But at the outset I want to assure the minister of my support of this bill. I am sure that all other members of the house will also support the bill, particularly those of the Liberal party, realizing that this is Liberal legislation.

The Trans-Canada Highway Act in its present form as amended in 1956 provided that no contributions or payments were to be made to a province after May, 1961 or in respect of any construction costs incurred after December 31, 1960. The first purpose of the bill is to extend the time limit a further period of three years. The second purpose of this bill is to increase the present limit from $350 million to $400 million. As I said, I am not going to give the background of this act which was born on December 10, 1949. From time to time it has been necessary to increase the total amount of federal contributions. Hon. members are in a general sense familiar with what has taken place since this act first came into force. The extension of the time limit to March 31, 1964 was not looked for based on the statement made by the former minister of public works when, as found in Hansard of February 24, 1959, a year ago, at page 1345, he said:

> The actual problem dealt with by the legislation, amendment of which is sought, is the completion of a trans-Canada highway to join the ten provinces of this nation by a first-class road. That is our main objective. That is the objective we aim to reach by the end of 1960.

We now have an amendment seeking an extension of three years beyond 1961. It is obvious that the present Minister of Public Works did not have very much faith in his predecessor's estimates of the time of completion of the trans-Canada highway; and it is apparent that the former minister of public works was not very well advised on the progress and approximate time of completion. The present minister is planning to avoid getting into a similar situation. He is allowing himself three years for completion, perhaps on the advice of some of the provinces that money is going to be hard to find and that it will be too expensive, with the resulting slowdown of trans-Canada highway construction.

When the time limit for completion was first set out by the Liberal government, the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Green), then in opposition, and who later became minister of public works in charge of the trans-Canada highway construction, said this back in the opposition days and I quote from Hansard of 1956, page 3094:

> The minister—

He was referring to Hon. Mr. Winters.

> —should take far more aggressive action to see that this particular gap is closed.

I think it is very difficult for us to understand why such further delay is to be granted. The gap that was referred to by the former minister of public works was a gap in the province of Ontario. The previous minister of public works questioned in 1956 the reason for the further extension. We now find the government in which he is a cabinet minister and until recently responsible for the public works portfolio asking for a three-year term of extension to 1964.

The other change is to increase the present limit of $350 million to $400 million. Here again the previous minister of public works stated at the resolution stage of last year's amendment to this act, as found in Hansard of February 20, 1959, page 1246:

> From estimates furnished by the provinces it is now considered that the total federal contributions required by the termination date of the act will be in the order of $350 million.

In fairness to the former minister and I should probably say in fairness to his staff, a more realistic figure of $371 million was tabled on the second reading of the bill. It is difficult to understand now why the public works minister of that day tabled an estimate of $371 million and on second reading of the 1959 amendment he only adds $350 million to the authority to spend.

This question also rises. Does the increase to $400 million cover expenditures in the province of Quebec up to 1964? If this province joins in the trans-Canada highway agreement I would think that this amount is not sufficient and that it would probably be necessary to seek another amendment to the act in order to cover construction of the trans-Canada highway.

It is interesting to read what the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) said as an opposition member representing the constituency of Broadview, as found at pages 2954 and 2955 of Hansard of 1956. Let me quote only part of his remarks of that day:

> In short, if this highway is going to be built in the foreseeable future, the federal government must assume financial responsibility and get on with the job.

I wonder what he thinks now and I wonder what has been his thinking over the past three years as Minister of Transport, with the trans-Canada highway far from completed and the government insisting that the provinces contribute to the cost.

I recall the words of the Minister of Justice, speaking in 1956 when he was an opposition member. I was interested in his remarks because I felt they had considerable merit and offered a plan for an extended system of connecting highways. I hope you will bear with me, if I make a short quotation. I do not want to be out of order in this regard. In the 1956 debate the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) moved an amendment which reads in part as follows:

> And therefore the government should take into immediate consideration with the governments of the various provinces the advisability of enlarging the scope of the existing trans-Canada highway agreements so as to develop a system of national highways, both east-west and north-south, financed and maintained jointly by the dominion and the provinces on an acceptable and realistic basis.

I do not want to pursue that matter having regard to the ruling just made by the Chair. However, I am looking forward to a further opportunity when the public works estimates are before this house to make certain suggestions that I feel are necessary for the economy, not only of the province of New Brunswick but of the Atlantic provinces. I have in mind something which I really think would help the economy of that area and which may have to do not only with the trans-Canada highway but also with connecting highways.

Mr. D. R. Gundlock (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, in view of the ruling that was made a short time ago, I am rather hesitant to take the time of the house at the moment. I do not wish to speak on a second trans-Canada highway but I wished to say a few words about what might be called an alternative or a detour through or by a particularly bad section, particularly in the province of British Columbia. I would appreciate very much, Mr. Speaker, if I could have your views on the matter.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): I am sure the hon. member heard the ruling which was made previously to my taking the chair. Of course, that ruling must be abided by.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I be permitted to say a word on the point of order? If the hon. gentleman was merely going to talk about an alternative route for that part of the trans-Canada highway he would certainly not be transgressing the ruling that was previously made; therefore, there would be no objection from this side if he proceeded.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): The Chair will be very happy to hear what he has to say.

Mr. Gundlock: Thank you, sir, and I should like to thank hon. members opposite.

The point I have in mind is this. I have lived in southern Alberta and close to south-eastern British Columbia, actually right on what is known as the Alaska highway. All my life I have watched the people of Alberta and eastern Saskatchewan and probably right up to the middle and north of Saskatchewan and Alberta traversing the Alaska highway down to the United States through Montana, Idaho and Washington on their way to Vancouver and eastern parts of British Columbia. I am quite familiar with the route in question. I have no criticism whatsoever of negotiations that have been made, but as I look at the map and recall the history of the past, particularly the wintertime and the snowfall, shall we say, at Revelstoke, which is the western terminus of the Rogers pass portion of the present trans-Canada highway, I can tell hon. members that the snowfall there is terrific. Some people say that a snowfall of as much as 40 feet occurs in this area at times, and a long time average of 480 inches across the whole section. On some dangerous portions of the Fraser canyon, the million dollar miles, if we had what might be called a small rock slide the trans-Canada highway would be blocked.

This is what I wanted to say a few words about, Mr. Speaker. I have watched the Canadian people doing their travelling to British Columbia through the United States both in the summer and winter. Admittedly, I am very anxious to see the completion of this portion of the highway through British Columbia, which will alleviate the summer travel, but still in the winter there needs to be some planning particularly, I think, on behalf of the province of British Columbia because the road is there in Alberta. There needs to be some planning to get by those particularly bad spots of the present proposed trans-Canada highway No. 1 by a southern alternate route.

I do appreciate the opportunity of saying this, and I would conclude without taking any more time, but I look forward to discussing it later when the estimates are before the committee.

Mr. H. M. Batten (Humber-St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to make any extended remarks at this time on the trans-Canada highway since I expressed my opinion on this matter at the resolution stage. If I am not out of order in saying so, Mr. Speaker, I was rather interested in what was said by the hon. member who has just taken his seat and also by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Kindt). I think many of us in this house would be very happy at some time to hear expressions of what they consider should be done as far as a main network of roads across this country is concerned, rather than just one trans-Canada highway. Perhaps when the estimates of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker) are before the committee it might indeed be a very good time to discuss such matters as that. I would like to have the opportunity of discussing roads in my province of Newfoundland other than the trans-Canada highway which provides the present prescribed course. But in view of the ruling that has been made, Mr. Speaker, I will try to keep to the right lane and see if I can stay in order.

First of all, I wish to say I am going to support the principle of this bill. However, I have always had the private view—I said so when I was on the other side of the house, I say so now—and it has always been my opinion that the federal government should have built, paid for and maintained a road across this country. I still believe that; but if the government of 1949 and the present government were not able to see it that way, well, then, of course, I am quite prepared to vote for the principle of this bill which at least gives part of what I should like to see; but I repeat, it is my private opinion that the federal government should have built, paid for and maintained a trans-Canada highway from St. John's to Vancouver.

I had hoped that when the amendment to the Trans-Canada Highway Act was discussed in the house we might have had some change from the original act. We remember that when the act came before parliament in 1949 it was named a 50-50 deal. I have already passed my opinion on 50-50 deals and I do not propose to do so now, but it was a 50-50 deal in 1949. In 1956, when the act was first amended, there was the addition of 90 per cent of the cost of 10 per cent of the mileage. If the mileage under that 10 per cent had had an average cost with the other miles across the country, then of course the federal government would have been paying 54 per cent of the total cost rather than 50 per cent.

Under the new amendment, which was brought in in 1956, the federal government paid 90 per cent of 10 per cent of the total mileage, as I said. When the bill was amended the third time in 1959 I could understand the present government going along with the program as it existed; but, in view of the many comments that were made during the discussion of the amendment of the bill in 1956, and again in 1959, I had hoped that when the present government brought in its second amendment to the Trans-Canada Highway Act some amendment other than what had been suggested would have been contained in the bill.

What changes could have been made? I think some plan could have been devised which would have been of greater assistance to those provinces which are finding the burden rather heavy under the present plan. I made some suggestions in my speech at the resolution stage as to what could be done. We, too, have the suggestions contained in the platform of the Liberal party. Again I had hoped that this amendment would have contained some reference to the maintenance of this road. In some provinces I do not think we are too far from the time when the maintenance bill is going to be one that will have to be considered. I do not know how long the pavement of the trans-Canada highway will last in all the provinces. It may be possible that in some provinces it will last for 10 years; in some other provinces it may last for 15 years and in still others it may last for 20 years. But, at any rate, the time is going to come shortly—and 20 years is not a long time in the life of a province—when a repaving job on top of annual maintenance will have to be carried out. I would hope that at some time, when this act is further amended, some consideration will be given to the maintenance of the trans-Canada highway.

I have said before that the trans-Canada highway is of particular importance to Newfoundland. For example, we have in Newfoundland a narrow gauge railway. It was a very good railway at the time it was built. During the first and second world wars it gave yeoman service to the people of Newfoundland. In the second world war particularly, when a large number of troops from the United States were stationed in the province, this railway was able to carry on very well and served the needs of that time. But I think it is apparent to most people that a narrow gauge railway is not able to provide the people of Newfoundland with the service that a wider gauge could. However, I think it is pretty evident now that we are not going to get a wide gauge railway in Newfoundland within the immediate future. When I was on the other side of the house I suggested that this railway should be widened.

If the railway is not going to be widened, then obviously there is going to be a greater burden placed on any trans-island road from Port aux Basques to St. John's. I speak of this because it gives added importance to the necessity of getting this road built and built as quickly as possible. We all know that there is going to be a federal-provincial conference in June. I hope that at that conference the trans-Canada highway will be discussed by the representatives of the federal government and of the 10 provinces. It is my hope that in that discussion of the trans-Canada highway there will be some reference to further trans-Canada highways but certainly some reference to the maintenance of the first trans-Canada highway in the years that lie immediately ahead. Otherwise the provinces are going to find themselves under the same burden in maintaining the road as they are now experiencing in building it. I have concluded the remarks I wish to make at this time, and again I say that I am going to support the principle of the bill.

(Translation):

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-57 is an act to amend sections 4 and 7 of the Trans-Canada Highway Act, first by extending for three years the period during which payments or contributions may be made to the provinces and, second, by adding $50 million to the expenditures authorized under sections 4, 5 and 6.

If my memory serves me well, the Trans-Canada Highway Act was passed in 1949 by the Liberal government under Mr. St. Laurent, and its purpose was to enable all the provinces to share the benefits of a trans-Canada highway scheme, in the national interest.

Unfortunately, since 1949, when the act was passed, the province of Quebec has remained aloof, refusing to take advantage of this legislation, for reasons which have never been made clear. The money thus lost by the province of Quebec, to the detriment of its citizens, can now be assessed at close to $30 million.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote from a few newspaper reports which indicate quite clearly that, since 1949, the attitude of Quebec authorities with respect to the Trans-Canada Highway Act has been not only confused, but inconsistent.

Here is an article which appeared in La Presse for February 25, 1959, and in which the minister of highways of the province of Quebec is quoted as saying:

—provided that the set standards are met; however, those standards are not acceptable to the province of Quebec. In the prairie provinces, things are different: there are no expropriations—

(Text):

Mr. Chambers: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the Chair has ruled earlier on questions of relevancy. The bill we are discussing extends a date and I do not believe that the remarks currently being made by the hon. member concerning the attitude of one particular province are in order at this time.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, on this very point the Deputy Speaker, who was in the chair when the ruling was made, referred to some observations I had made precisely on this point and said that they were in order. What the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont was discussing was the question of whether all the provinces were going to participate in this legislation which is applicable to all the provinces. It does not seem to me that there is any possible subject that could be more completely in order.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Speaker, I shall resume my remarks. While—

[Mr. Batten.]

(Text):

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): I think we should try to clear up the point of order raised by the hon. member. The hon. member certainly can refer to the province of Quebec with regard to this matter but I do not think that he should discuss the attitude of the government of Quebec toward it. He can discuss what he would like to see done in his province but I think that to discuss the attitude of the provincial government might not be relevant to the bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: You have raised a more fundamental point of order than the one raised by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George. It is surely not going to be a new restriction upon our freedom of speech in this house to say that we cannot discuss the attitude of a provincial government with respect to legislation we are dealing with in this house in which the provincial government is to participate. I would quite agree that if we were to discuss the attitude of the provincial government to family allowances, let us say, which are paid exclusively out of the federal treasury, that might be out of order, but to say we cannot discuss the attitude of the provincial government to legislation when the legislation provides for the partnership of that provincial government in the legislation would, I think, be a very dangerous restriction indeed. I wonder whether Your Honour has considered the full implication of that point.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): What the Chair means is that the member cannot urge the pros and cons of it. Certainly he can refer to their attitude. I did not mean that he could not, but we cannot get into a discussion of the pros and cons and whys and wherefores of it. That is what I was trying to explain to the hon. member.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Speaker, on February 25, 1959, precisely in regard to this Trans-Canada Highway Act, the minister of highways said this, and I am reading from the article I started to quote earlier:

In the province of Quebec, part of our towns and cities would have to be bought. In the end, this might well constitute a gift from the Greeks.

The minister observed that it would be possible to build a new road, according to federal standards, where there are no dwellings; on the other hand, in order to build the road through built up areas, practically all villages would have to disappear.

According to another article published in the Montreal Star of March 9, 1960, the provincial minister of highways added this:

(Text):

Mr. Talbot added that Quebec already has fine highways crossing the province and serving as a trans-Canada link. "In addition Ottawa doesn't help in the cost of putting up new fences, gates for existing fences, or cost of moving or adding sewers, public utilities and traffic signs," the minister said.

(Translation):

Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to an article dated March 18, 1959, when the government of the province of Quebec received a brief from the highway transport association urging the provinces to parley with Ottawa so that the province of Quebec might share in the funds made available to the province for the trans-Canada highway. I quote:

Included in the brief were the resolutions passed at the convention held in Montreal last February. One of the resolutions expressed the hope that an agreement be reached, so that the federal government might pay to the province of Quebec the amounts "to which it is entitled" for the trans-Canada highway. It added that other provinces had already received $157,494,650 for the same purpose.

In explaining his disagreement with this request, Mr. Rivard stated that Quebec did not need any money from Ottawa for a trans-Canada highway, because we already have four up-to-date highways servicing the province and linking it up with other provinces.

Mr. Speaker, I should also mention that on March 9, 1960, the present premier of Quebec indicated in the legislature that an agreement with the federal government was possible, but not under present terms. We all know that, in the fall of 1959, when the premier of Quebec, hon. Mr. Sauve, attended the conference of provincial premiers here in Ottawa, he stated that, as far as he was concerned, he saw no constitutional obstacle to Quebec sharing in the benefits of this scheme, but that it was rather a business proposition to be considered on its merits by every provincial government.

In other words, the former premier of Quebec, Mr. Sauve, was definitely of the view that nothing in this act was inconsistent with provincial autonomy.

Again, on this matter of autonomy, I should like to quote from an article which appeared in Le Devoir for October 29, 1954, over the signature of Pierre Vigeant:

The tax agreements are not the only federal-provincial agreements to which the province of Quebec has refused to subscribe. There are several others, including the agreements on construction of the trans-Canada highway. Was the refusal as justified in the second case as it was in the first? Would it not be in order for the provincial government to reconsider the matter?

It seems that the answer is yes.

Perhaps the time has come for the province of Quebec to join in this co-operative effort.

It is hard to see how participation in this project could endanger provincial autonomy.

Mr. Speaker, I wanted to put those various articles and statements on record in order to establish quite clearly that no one has ever been able to prove that this act encroached upon provincial autonomy. I also wanted to remind the house that it is urgent that the province of Quebec take advantage of it.

Then, there is another problem. I said earlier that so far the province of Quebec, because of its unjustified non-participation, has lost more than $30 million. Therefore, should not or could not the province of Quebec, with the co-operation of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker), enter into negotiations in order to recover at least a substantial part of the amounts so lost?

On this matter, I would like to read an article concerning a brief the chamber of commerce of the province submitted to the present premier of the province of Quebec and which explicitly states that:

Quebec, as we know, has always refrained from entering into agreements with the central power for the construction of its portion of the said highway. Under Mr. Duplessis, the refusal of the province has always been categorical. Under Mr. Sauve, apparently the matter was not taken up in a direct way, but he had implied that he would take it up once the problem of grants to universities had been settled.

All provinces, except Quebec, have taken advantage of the financial co-operation of Ottawa for the construction of the sections of the trans-Canada highway in their respective territories.

In its present brief, the chamber of commerce also expressed the view that representations could be made to the federal government to recover the Quebec share of the amounts which would have been voted by the central government for the development of access roads. This is another case where Quebec never accepted to enter into agreements with Ottawa.

Mr. Speaker, as a representative from a constituency of the island of Montreal, I would now like to suggest, as did other hon. members, that Montreal and the province of Quebec should join with the other provinces in taking advantage of this act. Montreal is especially interested inasmuch as its population might benefit from two large projects that could be incorporated in the trans-Canada highway program.

One of the projects is the east-west super-highway already planned by the Montreal planning commission. As I have said, that super-highway along the Montreal waterfront could come under this act.

As already mentioned, the route is laid out and the federal government could contribute substantial amounts that could speed up the completion of the project and help the city of Montreal and the Quebec provincial government.

I think that east-west highway across Montreal can be likened to the local "Queensway" which was built under an agreement between the province of Ontario and the federal government under this act.

Second, the construction of the Metropolitan boulevard, also running from east to west in northern Montreal, is finished or nearly finished. That boulevard cost about $25 million. I understand that 65 per cent of that amount will be paid by the city of Montreal, and the balance by the neighbouring municipalities. In my opinion, that section could also come under the Trans-Canada Highway Act. If negotiations along these lines were undertaken by the Quebec authorities, as it is their duty to do, this would be a relief for surrounding municipalities and to all Montreal property owners whose real estate tax has never been higher than it is now.

I find it extraordinary—to say the least—that the authorities of the province of Quebec, on a problem which should not involve any difficulties in the matter of provincial autonomy, should not at least have seen fit to get in touch with this government to inquire about the possibility of coming to an agreement on that matter.

I should like to refer here to an article which appeared in La Presse on January 14, 1960, reporting a question put in this house by the hon. member for Levis (Mr. Bourget) to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker):

> Has the government of the province of Quebec got in touch with the federal government about the trans-Canada highway since the present minister has been in office, that is since last fall?

The Minister of Public Works replied that he had never received any communication from the authorities of the province of Quebec about the matter.

Mr. Speaker, I repeat that this Trans-Canada Highway Act provides for the expenditure of money for a national project which benefits all provinces. It is particularly unfair that the citizens of the province of Quebec should be paying taxes for the sole benefit of other provinces.

I also submit that the Minister of Public Works is partly responsible for that breakdown in federal-provincial relations, with regard to the trans-Canada highway. I do not think the present Minister of Public Works ever tried to undertake any negotiations with the province of Quebec. If the project is national in scope, although we know that Quebec authorities have shied away from it, I think the Minister of Public Works should have found out why the province of Quebec did not see fit to take advantage of it. Furthermore, I would ask him to enter at once into discussion, in order to put an end to that absurdity which causes the province of Quebec to lose money, and adds to the tax burden of Montreal property owners and of the province in general, who should benefit from a greater share of their tax outlays.

At this stage, Mr. Speaker, I have nothing else to add, although I may, a little later in the debate, or before the adoption of this bill, have other questions to ask.

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Levis): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to speak at great length on second reading of this bill this afternoon, because I had an opportunity of expressing my views on this bill at the resolution stage.

However, since it has become fashionable, particularly in the last few weeks, to go into the constitutional aspect of some of the bills submitted to the house, I think it might be interesting for all hon. members to know exactly if this bill is consonant with the constitution.

In the past, and more particularly this year, we had the opportunity of hearing government members and especially a minister of the crown express their views on the constitutional character of this legislation. I shall therefore refer to a statement of the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Tremblay) when he aired his views on the trans-Canada highway bill on March 4, 1959. This is what he said, as can be seen on page 1600 (page 1 of the Appendix) of last year's Hansard:

> The province of Quebec has on several occasions expressed her opinion on the subject through the provincial authorities, and more particularly last week, when the provincial minister of highways said what he had in mind, stating that provincial autonomy is involved in the building of that highway and that the government of the province of Quebec cannot, at this time, accept to take any part in this project because, he said, the conditions set by the Ottawa government are not in accordance with the sovereign policy of the province.

And, a little farther down, on the same page, he stated:

> Mr. Speaker, I believe it would be proper to consider the problem, to approach it in the only way it should be approached, from the angle of provincial political sovereignty. In this connection, Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that the government consider the problem from the angle of provincial autonomy and consider the possibility of entering into arrangements which would not impose such conditions as are now being refused by the Quebec provincial government.

Thus spoke a member sitting on the government benches. Moreover on March 31, 1960, the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Dorion) made the following statement, and I quote from page 2666 (page 2 of the Appendix):

> The sole object of this legislation is, after all, to increase to $400 million the contributions required to complete the trans-Canada highway and to extend to December 31, 1963, the period required for its completion. The resolution says no more and no less. It does not at all raise the matter of principle;

And a little later on, he said:

I might perhaps let it go at that. However, having long since learned to face my responsibilities, I shall go even further and say that, in view of the wording of the 1949 act, I doubt that its provisions are contrary to section 92 of the 1867 constitutional act. Though the act does not expressly refer to the exceptions provided in paragraph 10 of section 92, it is fully in accord with the spirit of that paragraph.

I believe it would be worth while to recall that, quite recently, the former premier of Quebec, Hon. Paul Sauve, said in a press conference on T.V. that the construction of this highway was a business matter rather than a matter of autonomy.

Now, I want to refer to the statement the Solicitor General (Mr. Balcer) made in this house on April 26, 1960. I quote from Hansard:

Mr. Speaker, any legislation which finds its place in only nine provinces out of ten and is not acceptable to the tenth province leaves a very great doubt as to its constitutionality.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that after having quoted the views of four government members, one of them a minister of the crown, it seems clear that, in the minds of many members in this house, and of many Canadians, and more particularly in the minds of the citizens of the province of Quebec, there is still some doubt about the constitutionality of this act.

Therefore—and this was my only purpose in joining in the discussion this afternoon—I would ask the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker) to indicate whether, in his opinion, the Trans-Canada Highway Act is constitutional, either in the terms of the act itself or with regard to the conditions set under the act.

I would therefore ask him to answer this question, when he rises to end the debate on the second reading of the bill. The matter must be clarified for all concerned, and there must be no doubt that the Liberal party, in introducing this act in 1949, in no way encroached upon provincial autonomy. I would therefore ask him to indicate whether this act is constitutional or not.

(Text):

Mr. W. H. Payne (Coast-Capilano): In joining the discussion on the subject before the house this afternoon there are a few matters I wish to bring to the attention of hon. members. In doing so I should like to extend my congratulations to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker) and to his predecessor on the fact that for the first time in all the years the trans-Canada program has been operated, it has become a truly trans-Canada highway.

Speaking earlier on this subject, hon. members of this house have stated that the trans-Canada highway ends at Vancouver. I think it is most important to point out that the trans-Canada highway has an extensive connection on Vancouver island from Victoria up to Campbell River. But even more important than the island, a link was necessary along the north shore to connect the highway to the port of Horseshoe Bay where ferries transport vehicles from the lower mainland to the highway on Vancouver island itself. This extensive gap was not recognized for many years until the present and immediately previous minister of public works determined that this section running from the Second Narrows on Burrard inlet through to Horseshoe Bay should be considered part of the trans-Canada highway.

In making these remarks I must admit it is not with any surprise that British Columbia members realize that hon. members from the rest of Canada do not recognize what the trans-Canada highway program consists of in British Columbia, for in our province we have an odd situation. Our roads, both the trans-Canada highway and the others, are not built by joint co-operation between governments; they are not even built by the province, but by a strange, garrulous and bombastic individual by the name of Gaglardi, according to his publicity. I say this to bring to the attention of the house the fact that this essential link from the Second Narrows to Horseshoe Bay is not recognized by the public as a part of the trans-Canada highway system. Again I want to pay my compliments to the minister for including this vital link in this program. I would ask again that during the meetings to take place in June with the provinces he should review the policies of co-operation with regard to the Second Narrows bridge itself, an essential link between the north shore and the south shore on Burrard inlet. I trust that in such negotiations he may be able, as I realize he would wish, to ensure that this great structure should be toll-free to the motorists and a proper part of the trans-Canada highway system.

On the subject of the trans-Canada highway routing I think it might be proper to state that while those who have not visited our beautiful west coast do not recognize it, extensive population centres exist up the coast on the mainland, the chief community of which is the city of Powell River, home of the world's largest pulp and paper industry. Here again I would hope the minister might enter some discussion to see if it might be possible to extend the trans-Canada highway, in co-operation with the province of British Columbia, from Horseshoe Bay to Squamish, thence making the connecting link of road from Squamish to Port Mellon, thus avoiding the current necessity of a most unsatisfactory ferry service from Horseshoe Bay to Granthams Landing. Then extending the road from Port Mellon up to the Sunshine coast to join with Powell River across Jarvis inlet. I think this extension of the trans-Canada route would be of great value not only to those living in these up-coast towns but to people everywhere throughout this dominion.

In closing I again reiterate my congratulations to the minister and to his predecessor for recognizing, at long last, this very essential link in the trans-Canada highway project, that is, from the Second Narrows bridge on Burrard inlet through to Horseshoe Bay.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): The bill before the house is disappointing, I think, in that it is so limited in its application. We had hoped, from statements made in a similar discussion last year by the former minister of public works, that the government would have brought forth an over-all highway policy for this country.

There is no doubt that there is a need to extend the provisions of the Trans-Canada Highway Act in order to allow the provinces which have been slow in construction the opportunity to continue their construction so that we may at some time in the future have an adequate trans-Canada highway system. But this bill, being the government's major highway program for this year, apart from the roads to resources program, is a disappointment in the light of the promises made to the Canadian people that the government would not be satisfied with merely a continuation of the very narrow program which had been instigated by the previous administration. The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) made this very clear during the election campaign. He said, for example, in Toronto on February 4, 1957:

> I am one of those who believe that a national highway policy should be launched to provide highways for peace, and defence highways should war come.

We are still looking for this highway policy for peace, these roads designed to provide Canada with adequate highway and road facilities. It is certainly not contained in this present bill and it is not contained in any indication which the government has given to the house during the course of this session. As a matter of fact, when we asked whether the government was considering any extension of the trans-Canada highway program all we received was the nebulous answer: this is still under consideration, it is a question of government policy to be announced in due course. The government has no policy. Certainly no indication of any has been given so far. All we are being asked to pass is an amendment to the Trans-Canada Highway Act to provide for an aggregate expenditure of $400 million, an increase in the aggregate of $50 million.

I think there are good reasons why Canada should have a comprehensive highway program, and good reasons why the federal government should bear part of the cost of such a program. The bill before the house indicates that the government, like the former government, has accepted the principle that at least as far as one main highway in the country is concerned the dominion government should bear some financial responsibility and assume responsibility for leadership with regard to construction. I think it is very much in the national interest that there should be an extension of this program.

I am one who believes—as we thought the Prime Minister used to believe—that there is need for additional highways, or a second trans-Canada highway, if you will, or for further main arterial highways to be constructed running north and south, with federal assistance, in order to provide more adequate road facilities. I think more adequate highways are necessary for a great many reasons. I think they are necessary because of local needs of transportation, including the need of roads for school buses.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I suggest there has already been a ruling from the Chair earlier this afternoon that this debate be confined to the second reading of the bill to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act and that the debate not be allowed to lead down other byroads and side roads.

Mr. Argue: On the point of order that has been raised, Mr. Speaker, may I say this. It is a well-known fact that on second reading of any bill, on the principle of the bill, discussion can be broad and general. I think it is very much in order to suggest an extension of the moneys provided in the bill or a contraction. I would suggest that a perusal of the statements that have been made on this question this afternoon will show a very wide-ranging discussion—much wider than anything I have attempted—getting into the question of federal-provincial financial arrangements, the federal government's policy with regard to the province of Quebec and the whole field of equalization grants and the principles that are applied. I would suggest that this year, just as last year when I raised this very same matter on the trans-Canada highway bill, it is in order to discuss—as has been done by hon. members and as was done by the hon. member who just sat down—an extension of this particular act and the provisions of this act to other sections of a trans-Canada highway or other roads in this country.

With great respect, Mr. Speaker, I hope you will be lenient because under the rules of the house as they have been applied for many years, when discussing the principle of a bill some latitude in discussion is allowed. I would suggest that it is very much in order to discuss what additional provisions should be made as far as the highway policy is concerned or an extension of this act. I would not think it would be in order to take 40 minutes to discuss something that is not in this bill. However, if one relates what is in the bill to other matters associated with it, I think that procedure is very much in order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question of discussing a second trans-Canada highway or byroads was raised at the beginning of the discussion this afternoon. I think there was general agreement on all sides of the house that this matter would not be relevant to the bill. A general reference might be in order. I would ask the co-operation of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) because I think he was going a little bit too far when he was interrupted. I would ask his co-operation.

Mr. Argue: I am perfectly willing to endeavour to abide by the ruling as you have laid it down, Mr. Speaker. I was not in the chamber when Mr. Speaker made the statement to which you have referred. I do not know whether or not Your Honour was in the chamber or whether you have read it. I am not wishing to comment on it in any case. But I was informed that this ruling had to do with discussion of the details of the proposal for a second trans-Canada highway, something which I say is different from saying that we should have an over-all transportation policy to meet the needs of this country and that there should be an extension of the principles of this measure.

The money that is being provided in this act will not accrue to all of the provinces in this country. Of those provinces that obtain money under this new act or the changed act some will, of course, receive money in much different proportion from that received by other provinces. This situation arises from the fact that a good deal of progress has been made in the building of the trans-Canada highway in some provinces and relatively little progress has been made in some other provinces.

I have in my hand the report of the proceedings under the Trans-Canada Highway Act for the last year available, namely the fiscal year ended March 31, 1959. It sets forth the construction accomplishments under this act up to that time. I am not going to quote all of the figures. I am merely going to point out that many provinces have a large mileage yet to be constructed. The province of Newfoundland has 502 miles still unpaved; Prince Edward Island has one mile. In other words, up to that time in Prince Edward Island the trans-Canada highway was almost completed. Nova Scotia had 90 miles to go, New Brunswick 72 miles, Ontario 349 miles, Manitoba 16 miles, Alberta 6 miles and British Columbia 209 miles; national parks 63 miles. Out of a total mileage through national parks of 143, the federal government had succeeded up to that time in paving just 80 miles. Saskatchewan was the only province up to that point that had completed its section of the trans-Canada highway.

We need a broader highway policy in order to make such highway facilities available to Canadians who wish to travel; to Canadians in their own business undertakings; to Canadians who need to obtain various services, some of them as important as emergency hospital and medical services.

I suggest to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker) that an expenditure of money on an accelerated highway program at this time—that is accelerated in order to speed up the completion of the trans-Canada highway and to provide other main highway facilities in this country—is money well invested. I think the government should not look at money spent on the trans-Canada highway in the narrow sense of some other moneys that are currently spent in the budget. Rather, I think the money spent under this act should be considered a capital investment and, as far as our national government is concerned, a self-liquidating investment.

I am convinced that money spent on adequate highway facilities in this country—completion of the trans-Canada highway, an auxiliary or secondary trans-Canada highway and other main north-south roads connecting with international highways in the United States—would return great dividends to the Canadian nation. Even from the revenue position of the federal government, considering the additional money that would come from tourist traffic and the additional money spent by Canadians, I am positive that this is an investment that would be very much a paying proposition.

At a time when our tourist trade is on the decline and when we have a larger and larger imbalance in our foreign accounts I would think that the government would be farsighted if it were embarking on a program of highway development in order to attract tourists into this country and in order to reduce the imbalance in Canada's international payments.

There are other reasons why an acceleration of this program would be very much in order at this time. The government cannot claim that we are not in a position to do the work, that we lack construction equipment, that we lack personnel for such a highway program. Contractors have been looking for work in recent years. We are told that some of the machinery has been idle because of lack of opportunities for construction, and we know that half a million Canadians are unemployed. Why should the country be allowed to stagnate? Why should the government not take a lead in providing necessary highway facilities when those are so obviously in the national interests of our country?

The government had a vision before the election, but the election is over and the vision has disappeared. Now we have just the same warmed-over program that the government inherited from the previous administration. We have statements made by the Prime Minister on television that representations about a second trans-Canada highway have been received, but he is not meeting the provinces on this question. As far as I have been able to find out he is not considering at this time an accelerated highway program, nor is the government considering an extension of the present measure.

I think the government should be doing everything to encourage those provinces that have so far lagged behind in construction of this highway. As the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) pointed out, I think additional measures will have to be taken by the government to bolster the financial position of at least some of the provinces and that on the basis of an exact formula, a fair formula, the government should consider increasing the amount of money paid under this act.

As far back as 1916 the United States inaugurated a federal system of roads, and in that nation because of federal leadership, they have built a system of interstate highways, state highways and local farm to market roads largely because the federal government has been paying money into the building of those roads. In Canada our vision has been narrow, it has been short. This government is paying into this highway and it is putting into the roads to resources program.

The people of the province of British Columbia can be very critical, I believe, of their own provincial government. I leave that to them. But they certainly have a legitimate claim that this government should embark on a secondary trans-Canada highway. The people of Alberta are in much the same position. The people of Manitoba think in exactly the same way. I think the people of Saskatchewan feel more aggrieved on this question than the people of any other province, because the province of Saskatchewan was the province which co-operated so well, so readily, so closely and so efficiently with the previous administration that it completed its section of the trans-Canada highway in 1957. Since that time the government of Saskatchewan has been endeavouring to impress upon the federal government the need to embark on a more extensive highway program. There is a large file of correspondence that has been exchanged between the government of Saskatchewan and various federal ministers on this question but to no avail. Today the government of Saskatchewan stands ready and anxious. It demands a chance to co-operate with the federal government in an extension of this very program.

Mr. Walker: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Assiniboia is not on the hustings; he is in the House of Commons. He seems to forget that. Already you have ruled twice this afternoon that a discussion of a secondary trans-Canada highway is out of order. I do not care except that many hon. members on this side of the house have been denied the privilege of expressing their views on the subject because they agreed with your ruling. The hon. member for Assiniboia, who recognizes no law except his own, continues to thwart the ruling of the Chair. I would ask you to call him to order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Argue: I think the minister is out of order himself.

Mr. Walker: Never mind what you think. May we have a ruling?

Mr. Argue: I have the floor, Mr. Speaker. This ill-mannered, ill-tempered, junior minister of the government—

Mr. Ricard: You are looking at yourself in the mirror.

Mr. Argue: —should not, in raising a point of order, talk about such things as not being on the hustings and the other extraneous matters that he raised in his so-called point of order. This point has been raised before, Mr. Speaker. We had your ruling a few moments ago. I was endeavouring to abide by it. I was not saying—

Mr. Walker: For 10 minutes he has not said anything but talk about a second trans-Canada highway.

Mr. Argue: I am rather surprised that the minister does not know he cannot raise a point of order when another point of order is being discussed.

Mr. Grafftey: It is the same one.

Mr. Argue: I thought a man of his alleged intelligence—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Argue: I do not like this kind of repartee, but I suggest to you, sir, that it was the minister who started this kind of thing.

Mr. Pallett: You had better go back to Montreal and get a new text.

Mr. Argue: Put that on the record; go ahead. The chief whip just whispers something to the Hansard reporter; he has been doing it all afternoon. If I may go on to the point of order, I believe that I was in order in what I was discussing when the point of order was raised.

Mr. Walker: Why?

Mr. Argue: What I was discussing was the request by the government of Saskatchewan for an interview to discuss with this government an extension of this act. That had nothing to do with discussing the details of a second trans-Canada highway. With great respect, Mr. Speaker, I suggest it has to do very closely with this act, and that the request was for a discussion of an amendment that would make this act applicable to the government of Saskatchewan.

Before you rise, Mr. Speaker, may I say this. In my 15 years in the House of Commons I have never had points of order raised by government members on the second reading of a bill as has been done on this occasion and on other occasions. I would suggest that there is a definite drive on the part of the government to endeavour to get Your Honour to restrict, more than has been the practice in this house, discussion on the second reading of a bill. I submit with respect that in the discussion of a bill to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act it is very much in order to refer to consultations that have gone on between governments as to possible improvements in the act.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: As I listened to the hon. member I was going to rise myself because I thought his reference to the extension of the act because a certain province had completed or nearly completed its section of the trans-Canada highway could have application only to a second trans-Canada highway. Therefore I consider that the hon. member is not relevant. I would also draw his attention to the fact that the question of a second trans-Canada highway or the policy of the government concerning highways may be discussed on other occasions. The principle of the bill is, of course, to extend the act for a further period and to provide an additional amount for the present trans-Canada highway. Therefore, even if we want to extend latitude to hon. members I do not think the points that the hon. member was discussing are relevant. I would ask his cooperation as there will be ample opportunity to discuss these matters.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, when we were discussing a similar bill on March 4, 1959 we discussed the possibility of the government making a statement as to its highway policy. On that occasion, as found at page 1603 of Hansard, the former minister of public works, now Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green), had this to say in reply to a question of mine:

> The officials of the department have, of course, been studying the best type of highway policy to follow the completion of the trans-Canada highway program. I am not yet at liberty to disclose what policy would be followed at that time. All of these points which the hon. member and other members of the house have raised in the course of this debate will be very carefully considered in this connection.

There was a long discussion. I have quoted this passage for the record today, not on the point of order but as an indication that the government has retreated from what appeared to be a broadening of its highway policy as indicated by the discussion last year when we were considering this very act. I am exceedingly disappointed, after having this indication from the former minister of public works, that the indication today is that the government does not intend to consider anything beyond the very words contained in the bill.

I do not think it necessarily follows that to advocate an extension of the Trans-Canada Highway Act you have to have a second trans-Canada highway. As the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Payne), I believe, said, there can be particular sections within a particular province—

Mr. Walker: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, you made a ruling this afternoon which deprived many government members of the opportunity to discuss a second trans-Canada highway. I raised a point of order, and the hon. member for Assiniboia, whom you found to be out of order, continues to persist in flouting the ruling of the Chair. This is the second time he has done so. Would the hon. member be good enough to wait until I have finished? I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that if the hon. member persists in flouting your ruling you should again bring him to order. He is continuing to discuss a second trans-Canada highway.

Mr. Argue: I think the hon. gentleman is very ill-informed. I have said that to discuss the extension of the trans-Canada highway does not necessarily mean that you have to ask for a second trans-Canada highway and that that had already been made clear in the house this afternoon. Surely if a particular province wishes another 10 miles to be built the hon. gentleman is not going to say that is another 5,000 or 6,000 mile trans-Canada highway. The point I was trying to make did not have to do with a second trans-Canada highway but with the refusal of the minister to meet with the Saskatchewan government.

I think the attitude of the minister has been contemptible in failing to meet with the provincial government when requested to do so to discuss this very policy and the very act that is now before the house. I can scarcely believe that this was the attitude of the minister. When he replies he will be able to explain why, at least for one province, the door of consultation has been closed and why a provincial government which has co-operated fully in the past as far as this act is concerned should not have a full opportunity to discuss its provisions with the minister involved.

If one looks at the mileage that has been built under the act and the mileage remaining to be built he needs no further proof that the legislation as it stands today is inadequate and ineffective as far as completing even a single trans-Canada highway is concerned. Not only is the government anxious that discussion be limited to the very words contained in the bill, to say nothing of the principle of the bill, but the government apparently is not willing to endeavour to formulate a policy that will speed up construction of the trans-Canada highway.

I ask the minister if the people of Canada are going to have to wait until December, 1963 to get a statement of government policy. Are the people of Canada to be denied even a single trans-Canada highway for many years to come because the government has failed to meet this problem? I do not know why the government is in such great retreat. This was the government that believed in expansion. This was the government that had a vision. But the vision is so narrow today that all the minister is prepared to do is to extend for a further period the ineffective and inadequate policy followed by the former administration. That policy was under heavy attack by the Progressive Conservative party when it was in opposition but now that it forms the government and its members occupy the treasury benches apparently it is prepared to continue indefinitely the very narrow scope provided by the act.

I would hope that when the minister speaks in closing the debate on second reading he will give the house some indication of what the government's attitude is toward an accelerated trans-Canada highway program and when the government intends, as promised by the former minister, to enunciate its highway policy. I challenge the minister to meet the government of Saskatchewan, to remove this discrimination and quit making Saskatchewan something of a scapegoat. I would think that the province of Saskatchewan, known so well by the Prime Minister, a province whose people have been so loyal to the Prime Minister on so many occasions, would get not preferential but equal treatment, and I suggest that under the present federal administration the province of Saskatchewan is today getting inferior and shabby treatment. We in this group are looking toward a highway policy that will mean the early completion of the trans-Canada highway and provide adequate roads for an expanding and growing nation.

(Translation):

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, may I, in turn, add a few words in support of this legislation, since we were all agreed in this house that the trans-Canada highway is of a great importance to the country and therefore to all provinces, including the province of Quebec.

You are undoubtedly aware, Mr. Speaker, that this year again we have heard nothing of the share which the province of Quebec should be getting under this legislation. In previous years, some of the present ministers made statements to the effect that they were on excellent terms with the Quebec government and that there was every reason to believe that they could obtain the co-operation of the present Quebec government. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker) said so on many occasions. I further remember the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green) also saying that particular attention would be given to any request from the province of Quebec, and that some arrangement was desirable and even probable. In fact, according to the present Minister of Public Works, there was possibility of agreement being reached so that the province of Quebec would benefit from this legislation.

Unfortunately, Quebec premiers succeeded each other without any of them bringing about a solution. However, we have lately read the statement of the present Prime Minister to the effect that the legislation was not acceptable to the province and inconsistent—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member allow me to point out that there is nothing in this bill, nor even in the act which the bill purports to amend, which deals with the province of Quebec or its participation in the program. I therefore fail to see the relevancy of any of the remarks he has made so far.

Mr. Denis: With all due respect to you, Mr. Speaker, and for your function, may I point out that there is reference in the bill to the extension of this legislation until 1963. Therefore, if nobody warns the present government that the province of Quebec has not yet benefited from that legislation, it means that in 1963, the province of Quebec will be left high and dry.

Section 7, mentions that "a certain amount not to exceed $400 million will be spent." I therefore believe, with regard to the sums spent by the government under that legislation, and which should benefit this country and the provinces, that the province of Quebec is interested in knowing, first of all, what amount will be spent under the act and how much time remains for the province to adhere to this legislation.

I think, Mr. Speaker, with all due respect for your decision, that Quebec, more than any other province, is interested in taking advantage of this legislation, and that is why I wanted to say that Quebec should benefit from it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I point out to the hon. member that it is up to the government of the province of Quebec, and to the Quebec legislature, to take a position to this effect, and that it is not a responsibility of hon. members of this house to take decisions on behalf of the Quebec government or its legislature.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Speaker, I am completely in agreement with your statement. However, I think it is proper for the representative of St. Denis, as for all other hon. members in this house, to warn this government that if it believes in good understanding, and in the national interest—if it believes in assisting and developing this country, it should try to reach some agreement with any province, whether it be Quebec or Ontario, particularly after the statements made over the years to the effect that there was some question of an agreement being concluded.

I therefore, Mr. Speaker, ask the present minister to carry out his promises and show his good will towards the government of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, if you rule that the province of Quebec has no say in the matter, since it has not benefited from the advantages resulting from that legislation, well, I will change the pattern of my speech.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I would suggest to the hon. member to change the nature of his speech. He may have the opportunity, when the estimates of the Department of Public Works are considered, to deal with the administration of the Trans-Canada Highway Act. His remarks will then perhaps be relevant; however, in the present context, they are not.

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, I respectfully submit that if, in the light of the principle on which you base your ruling, we may not now discuss the relations between the federal government and the province of Quebec, I fail to see how we could, when the estimates of the Department of Public Works are submitted to the house, deal with the attitude of the province of Quebec, since Bill C-57 is national in scope, thus providing for contributions to all provinces. Now, if I correctly understood the remarks of the hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Denis), I am of the opinion that as a member from the province of Quebec, he was trying to find out why the province of Quebec has not benefited from that act. If the hon. member for St. Denis had been allowed to go on with his remarks, I think we would have realized that he was about to criticize this government for not having taken the necessary steps, and for not having inquired from the Quebec authorities about the motives preventing them from taking advantage of that act.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that, in this context, the remarks made by the hon. member for St. Denis were in order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I do not think the remarks of the hon. member are in order, because the bill does not refer to the province of Quebec. It is merely a matter of extending the period during which contributions may be paid to the provinces, and of increasing the amount of the expenditures authorized under the act. There is no reference in the bill to representations or to the application of the act in the province of Quebec.

As to whether the point raised by the hon. member for St. Denis may be discussed when the estimates of the Department of Public Works comes up before the house, a proper decision can be taken at the time. I referred to this possibility only to illustrate the reason for my ruling.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Speaker, when you say there is no reference to the province of Quebec in Bill C-57 which is now placed before us by the present government, let me point out to you that under the terms of Bill C-57, the province of Quebec is a province like the others, because in the explanatory notes—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have made my ruling, and I see no need to discuss the matter further.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Speaker, may I suggest we call it six o'clock?

(Text):

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

(Translation):

Mr. Denis: Mr. Speaker, before recess we were speaking of that legislation, and more particularly of the benefits it might bring to the province of Quebec. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, you decided that hon. members from the province of Quebec had no right to discuss any advantages the act might bring to Quebec, even if the province has had no benefit from it for several years.

I venture to say, Mr. Speaker, that the legislation is of more particular interest to the province of Quebec because one section mentions that the act would be in effect only until December 1963. That is why I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that if the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker) did not come to some arrangement with the province of Quebec, there would be danger of the province never benefiting from it.

Since the legislation was passed in the national interest; since it is to the national advantage of this country, and since I feel that the province of Quebec is part of Canada and that, contrary to the views of the Solicitor General (Mr. Balcer), an act does not become unconstitutional because it is satisfactory to nine provinces only and not ten, I submit with all due respect, Mr. Speaker, that I have the right to discuss the matter. As a matter of fact, when university grants were discussed, the Solicitor General mentioned on several occasions various premiers who succeeded each other in the province.

He referred to Messrs. Barrette, Sauve and Duplessis, and, every once in a while, he reverted to the subject. If it was permissible for the Solicitor General to talk about his province in the matter of the universities, I believe it is also permissible for the humble member for St. Denis (Mr. Denis) to speak about his province, with regard to a different bill.

The hon. member for St. Denis is aware that the province of Quebec has not yet taken advantage of this act, one that will lapse, in so far as the province of Quebec is concerned, after 1963, because the act will then be annulled.

Yet, the Minister of Public Works, as well as members generally, are of the opinion that the trans-Canada highway is of vital importance for this country, in peacetime as well as in wartime, and for its development, because who knows what the future may hold for a country like ours?

I have explained that one of the most important, if not the most important, of the provinces had decided it could not take advantage of this bill because it is unacceptable to her.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, I say to the Minister of Public Works, that instead of letting the province of Quebec stand by itself and say that this bill is unacceptable, instead of merely saying himself: "It is acceptable", he should ask the Quebec government: "Why is it unacceptable?"

That is why I ask the Minister of Public Works to be a minister for all ten of the provinces and not only for nine of them.

He is aware that, maybe for electoral or other reasons—I do not want to impute motives to anyone—it is possible, because we once had a Liberal government in Ottawa. While the Quebec government was the Union Nationale, it is possible that for electoral or other reasons—I am not accusing anyone—it is possible that the Union Nationale which was entrusted with the future of the province of Quebec was not interested in finding an answer to the problem.

It is possible that there were certain reasons that we know nothing about, underlying or implicit reasons—call them what you will, Mr. Speaker, for which no agreement was possible.

It is a known fact the the present government is on good terms with the present Quebec government.

Mr. Rouleau: They go hand in hand.

Mr. Denis: They co-operate hand in hand. It is also known that the Minister of Public Works and the Secretary of State for External Affairs have stated that there was good co-operation. I would therefore suggest that the Minister of Public Works, while taking his responsibilities, ask the Quebec government why this bill is unacceptable to Quebec, and which provisions are unacceptable. I think the present Minister of Public Works has a duty to write or get in touch in some way with the Quebec authorities. After all, Quebec is no different from the other provinces, and if grants are due to the provinces, Quebec is entitled to them just as much as Ontario, for instance.

An hon. Member: Vote Lesage.

Mr. Denis: I would like the Minister of Public Works to get in touch with the premier of Quebec who, at the present time, regards this act as unacceptable. Have no fear, the members who are friends of the Quebec government and the other members will still support this bill, even if their provincial leader says it is unacceptable. They will decide that it is constitutional for nine provinces, and unconstitutional for one province, and vice versa, as the situation requires.

I therefore urge the Minister of Public Works to kindly ask the Quebec provincial government why Quebec cannot take advantage of the bill, which of its provisions would have to be amended, which of them are harmful or encroach upon provincial autonomy? What are the monetary, financial and other conditions? We should then know just why the province of Quebec refuses to have anything to do with the present program which is excellent, I think.

As a matter of fact I should say—if I may be excused for taking somewhat after the present government—that this is Liberal legislation. As you know, hon. members opposite never miss an opportunity of saying that this or that is Conservative legislation. Well this one is truly a Liberal one. And were it not for such Liberal legislation, leaving the Conservative party what little lingering popularity it still has I think this Conservative government would be pretty short-lived.

Then, Mr. Speaker, I should like the Minister of Public Works to give us the assurance that he is going to get in touch with the authorities of the province of Quebec. I ask the minister—and I am going to repeat my question to the Minister of Public Works, as he is probably going to have discussions with his counterpart in Quebec—I am in no hurry, Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: My colleague is trying to explain the situation to him, but it is difficult.

Mr. Denis: When the minister has finished his conversation with the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Tassé), he might be able to answer the questions I put to him; but if he does not listen, no wonder we never get any answers to our questions.

It is important that the Minister of Public Works tell us whether he will finally get in touch with the province of Quebec so that we might learn why it does not support this bill. What clauses are not acceptable to the Quebec premier? What clauses should be amended? What sum of money is it not acceptable?

I listened carefully this afternoon to the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets) when he pointed out that the provincial minister seemed to suggest that mention was made of fences and gates which are not included in the agreement. Maybe the minister could add a few gates so that the Quebec government might accept and then my province will get a few million dollars if it is only a matter of a few missing posts or signs—

I am told that it has been suggested that the highway would mean the razing of some towns and villages. Could the Minister of Public Works make arrangements with the provincial government so that those towns or villages could be by-passed; perhaps then the hon. premier of Quebec could agree to this project. Those are all ridiculous objections, I think, which prevent us from sharing in the funds expended on the trans-Canada highway which, being of vital importance to the country, is evidently so to the province of Quebec, as to the province of Ontario and to all others.

Therefore, I think that the present Minister of Public Works should be concerned about this refusal by the province of Quebec to share in this project. It is all the more important because if the province of Quebec decided to participate in this project, the amount that we are asked to vote might not be large enough, for we know that not a single mile of highway has been built in the province of Quebec under this project, while the other provinces have largely taken advantage of it.

I am told also there are at least 413 miles of highway to be built in the province of Quebec.

Our Conservative friends from Quebec claim that our roads are very good. Well, I have here an analysis of the estimates of the highway department, made in 1957 by the Canadian Good Roads Association. It shows that the amounts per capita spent by each province for their roads are as follows:

Newfoundland, $27 per capita.
Prince Edward Island, $40 per capita.
Nova Scotia, $47 per capita.
New Brunswick, $43 per capita.
Quebec, $26 per capita.
Ontario, $45 per capita.
Manitoba, $28 per capita.
Saskatchewan, $31 per capita.
Alberta, $51 per capita.
British Columbia, $50 per capita.
Average for all Canada, $45 per capita.

And it is suggested, Mr. Speaker, that Quebec, with expenditures of $26 per capita, has done its duty as far as roads are concerned.

[Mr. Denis.]

I have here a statement from the highway transport association, which says:

The highway transport operators finally hope that Quebec come to some agreement with Ottawa, so that the province of Quebec might recover—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member for St. Denis realizes that I have given him much latitude; but I notice that he wanders further and further away from the subject matter, because he is now discussing the policy of the Quebec provincial minister of highways, which has no connection whatsoever with the bill now before us. I hope the hon. member will henceforth cooperate, in view of the latitude which has been allowed him until now.

Mr. Denis: I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the latitude you have given me, and you probably did so because I was not out of order.

As I was attempting to show the proportion between the efforts made by the various provinces, and also to prove that Quebec had not done its full share, I had to mention that some important organizations in my province were hoping that an agreement might be reached between the present Minister of Public Works and the premier of Quebec. Consequently, I had to prove the importance of taking advantage of the minister's good will towards Quebec. And if the Liberals, the citizens of the province of Quebec, do not approve of the policy of the Conservative party or the Union Nationale, let at least the minister's good will towards the province of Quebec allow those sums of money which are being spent all over the country to benefit the province of Quebec as well.

I say that in Quebec, we do not have the highways we need. One of the reasons why we did not agree to the arrangement, according to the Union Nationale, is that we have excellent highways. Well, Mr. Speaker, if we have excellent highways almost everywhere, why does not the present minister ask Quebec authorities to mention those that are not excellent, so that we may know exactly where we are, and that we may do something about it.

Take for instance, the case of Montreal, which has a population of over a million people. The citizens of that city are up against great difficulties at this time. On the northern side, there is the Metropolitan boulevard, and the municipal authorities have prepared plans for a super-highway running east-west on the southern side. The trans-Canada highway will necessarily have to go through there. Why could not the authorities of that city get some of the funds made available by the present government?

Have no fear, Mr. Speaker, I have no intention to suggest a second trans-Canada highway. Bad enough that, so far, we have no such highway at all in the province of Quebec.

However, with regard to those two highways, perhaps the present Minister of Public Works could ask the government to tell us to which of those two constructions it would be prepared to contribute. The province of Quebec could thus share in the advantages of the act, at least in Montreal, and at the same time we should know whether the additional amount of $50 million that we are asked to vote would be enough.

I understand that the Minister of Public Works has increased the amount by $50 million, for he knew full well—as he is prepared to say—that Quebec would still turn down the program, for if the Quebec government changed its mind and decided to join the program this year, and went ahead and built the 400 miles of highway called for under the act, it is not a mere $50 million that would be needed, but a hundred million dollars. Therefore, would the minister indicate whether the amount that would be needed, if Quebec did accept to join the program, is included in the $50 million added to the total amount to be spent.

(Text):

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must inform the house that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I thought I was dealing with a request to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act by adding $50 million as our contribution to the provinces and by extending the time for the completion of the highway. However, I find myself in a fascinating position tonight. I have been invited by my good friend the hon. member for Levis (Mr. Bourget)—he is a great friend of mine—to become a constitutional authority and to give a constitutional answer for the benefit of the loyal opposition and, I am sure, for the benefit of the opposition in the province of Quebec. I have also been asked a question by that Bob Hope of the House of Commons, that straight man, the hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Denis). I am honoured also to think that we can get his mind away from post office robberies and on to this subject. Even if it is not on the subject, at least he is addressing questions to me and I am really honoured. This is the first time in my career that I have drawn his attention and I am really greatly honoured. I hope he will continue. I have not had as much attention in a long time.

I am asked whether Quebec is going to participate and whether I think Quebec should participate. All I want to do in answering the hon. member for Levis and the hon. member for St. Denis is to say this. If the prime minister of Quebec, Mr. Barrette, is always as able, good, wise and charming as he was in his visit to Toronto last week when he captivated that city and that province, I think the premier of Quebec can manage his own affairs and he does not need any advice from the new Minister of Public Works for Canada.

Mr. Denis: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Walker: Yes.

Mr. Denis: Does the minister mean that if he is as good, wise and charming, he is going to accept this contribution?

Mr. Walker: I did not quite catch the last part of the question.

Mr. Denis: Does the minister mean that if he is as good, charming, wise and popular, he will accept participation in this project?

Mr. Walker: One of the fundamentals that I learned as a youngster—and I have never forgotten it in the practice of law—is that one should mind one's own business. I therefore do not pretend to interpret the mind of the premier of Quebec. All I can say at the present time is that we are dealing with nine provinces. Put on the horn, my friend, and listen in on this. At some time my hon. friend might try that solution himself. If he did so, we would of course be deprived of a great deal of humour in this House of Commons. I appreciate that fact.

May I say this. I know that Quebec can manage its own affairs and that Quebec certainly would not seek advice from a Torontonian. That really means something. I am sure the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) would not even suggest that anybody from Quebec should ask advice from Ontario.

May we tonight come back to realities just for a few minutes. We have not discussed this subject since some of the hon. members of the government here followed the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill). This has been a heyday. It has been a picnic. We have had a lovely time on constitutional rights, the interpretation of the mind of the premier of the province of Quebec, second highways, extra highways, this, that and the other thing, plus all-round condemnation with trenchant blows from that conqueror from Assiniboia who has just returned from the hustings and who forgets always that he is in the House of Commons. May I bring him back to realities and correct him, if he will permit me to do so. He is a very good friend of mine. We are fellow sufferers. We both study French. We take French from the same professor. I admit that he is making great progress. I am a little bit jealous of him because I do not shine along that line.

But may I say to the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), so that he will not feel too hurt, that never since I became the Minister of Public Works—and that is only a period of nine months—have I ever received a request either from the Saskatchewan government or any member of the Saskatchewan cabinet for a conference. I am always open for conferences. I have sometimes five, six and up to 12 delegations a day, assisted ably by my friend, the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Tassé), who always sits in on these conferences. I cannot think of any more delightful experience than that of having a delegation from the province of Saskatchewan. I would ask my friend the hon. member for Assiniboia to extend on my behalf an invitation to the premier—the Black Douglas—or any member of the Saskatchewan government because I always like to see what makes these socialists tick.

Just to show how broadminded I am, I had a meeting with Hon. P. A. Gaglardi, minister of highways of British Columbia. He was in to see me the other day and we had a very pleasant time. I know I would do the same with Mr. Douglas. May I say this. The premier of that province did have a conference on highways with the present Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green). I think they discussed highways before I came in.

In connection with the province of Saskatchewan and its role, I should like to deal with that matter as I deal briefly with this bill. This is a simple bill. There is nothing to it. All we are trying to do is finish up what we started eleven years ago and is not yet finished. We are the people who are putting up a sum of money; I refer to the dominion government. Unfortunately, we have not the conduct of this highway. We check it and when the work is done we pay our share. Whether it is finished or not, I am not going to blame anyone; but I object to hon. members of the opposition blaming the dominion government. We did not set up the manner in which this highway was to be completed. It was done by our predecessors, and I am not even blaming them for it. All I am saying is that I am attempting to complete one of the grandest enterprises entered into by Canada since Sir John A. Macdonald brought about the completion of the unification of Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific by a railway.

Let me now talk about this highway and get it cleaned up. The bill contains two simple clauses providing for $50 million more and an extension of the time. As to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, I thought I would test him out this afternoon. The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) always told me that if you do not say anything he falls fairly flat; but if you interrupt him he blows up and carries on with great gusto. I therefore did not say a word to all the challenges he threw out, all the innuendoes and all the rhetoric. After about 20 minutes he just faded away. I was very happy to note that fact. As long as I am minister I shall always endeavour to use that method with the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

It was a wonderful exhibition we had this afternoon of twisting and turning. The hon. member for Humber-St. George's (Mr. Batten), who spoke very ably today and on the resolution, spoke in the same way in 1956. He is a member from Newfoundland. I appreciate the problems of Newfoundland and I appreciated the way in which he spoke. He has been consistent throughout. But the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate for the first 20 minutes was very eloquent in support of something that he steadfastly opposed all the time he was a member of the government, namely any change in the participation on a percentage basis of the provinces and the dominion in the completion of this highway.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Does he remember when, on a similar occasion, he took me to task because I was discussing a matter concerning the department of the Minister of Transport, and he was not here although it was on a motion to go into supply? Does he think that under the circumstances he should attack the member when the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) is not in his seat? Is there any difference between the two situations?

Mr. Walker: There is a great difference. I thank the hon. member for Laurier for asking that infantile question. When he attacked the Minister of Transport it was on a supply motion. The Minister of Transport had a long standing engagement which the hon. member knew about, and the attack was launched when the minister was not here.

Mr. Chevrier: I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Walker: I am replying to the question. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is supposed to be here.

Mr. Chevrier: On a point of order; the Minister of Public Works has said that the Minister of Transport had an engagement that I knew about at the time of the debate on the supply motion. I say here on my responsibility that I knew of no such engagement, and the Minister of Public Works has to accept my word. He must accept the word of a member of parliament under these circumstances. I am still on the point, sir.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): State your point of order.

Mr. Chevrier: Just a moment.

Mr. Walker: You see the difference.

Mr. Chevrier: No, I do not see the difference, because the minister is trying to be facetious—

Mr. Walker: No, I am very serious.

Mr. Chevrier: —and he is not succeeding. I should like to continue and say that when a motion to go into supply has been announced by the house leader a minister of the crown should be in his place.

Mr. Walker: It is quite obvious that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) had no idea that an attack would be launched on him that day. Had my friend been his usual courteous self he would have notified him. He did not notify him.

Mr. Chevrier: There is no obligation to notify him.

Mr. Walker: I was attacked by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. Because he chose to dine late tonight, that is no reason why I should not answer him and his attack. Does he seek to escape—

Mr. Bourget: What about the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming)?

Mr. Walker: Does he seek to escape my answering him by staying away from the house?

Mr. Chevrier: All you are doing is casting a slur.

Mr. Walker: I say to the hon. member who is usually so good-natured, just calm yourself. You hoisted yourself on your own petard, and you had better take it.

Mr. Chevrier: If you will calm yourself I will do the same thing.

Mr. Walker: In the future, you would do very well not to interrupt me. You know I have been around for a long time and I am not impressed by those cheap interruptions.

Mr. Chevrier: You have been around for a long time, but you are a cheap minister.

Mr. Walker: Let us just consider that. That was a very clever reply, was it not?

Mr. Chevrier: It was one that you deserved.

Mr. Walker: May I continue?

Mr. Argue: The minister should stay in order and address the Speaker.

Mr. Walker: Would it be all right to have the permission of the hon. member for Laurier to continue?

Mr. Chevrier: You do not need my permission to go ahead.

Mr. Walker: When I was attacked this afternoon by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate he could not have been serious because he argued strenuously that he did not participate in the discussions with his government but he went along with it and voted for it, and that was exactly what we are doing today. This arrangement of 50 per cent and 90 per cent of 10 per cent of the mileage was introduced by the Liberal government in 1956. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was a member of the cabinet of that time; he was in favour of it and voted for it. We have not changed it at all.

Mr. Bourget: After you had promised to change it.

Mr. Walker: When it was suggested that a greater percentage should be given we had the hon. member for Levis take part in the debate.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): The grand master of the House of Commons.

Mr. Walker: At that time he held a very important office in the government as parliamentary assistant to the minister of public works and this is what he had to say in reply to the request that more money should be spent by the government in this endeavour to build a trans-Canada highway to help the provincial governments. I am reading from Hansard of 1956, volume III, at page 2976. This was on April 16:

> Another criticism which was made, and which is generally made under similar circumstances, was that we were not doing enough.

Now we are doing exactly as the Liberals were doing. I continue:

Well, Mr. Chairman, we of course do appreciate the demands that are made upon provincial treasuries, but we also cannot lose sight of the fact that heavy demands are made upon the federal government for national defence and for social security measures. We frequently hear demands to increase social security measures such as family allowances, old age pensions and the pensions of superannuated civil servants.

May I interpose and say that they heard the demands but they turned a deaf ear to them. I continue with the quotation:

If we are going to meet all the requests that are made by hon. members of the opposition we certainly will have to find new sources of revenue. We will have to be practical and increase taxes. We must not lose sight of that fact.

I simply cannot understand, Mr. Chairman—

My hon. friend spoke very eloquently in English. I continue:

I simply cannot understand, Mr. Chairman, how hon. members can get up in this house and repeatedly ask for more money and in the same week accuse us of taxing the people of Canada too heavily. We will probably hear that accusation tomorrow when we resume the debate on the budget. Hon. members opposite will say that the people of Canada are too heavily taxed.

Now, the hon. member—

Mr. Denis: Mr. Speaker...

Mr. Walker: My time is limited, Mr. Speaker.

(Translation):

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. May I ask you how long a minister of the crown may be out of order before being called to order?

I respectfully suggest that all he is saying now has nothing at all to do with this bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am very glad that the hon. member for St. Denis raised this point of order with regard to the relevancy of the debate. In my opinion, I can hardly deny the minister a chance to reply to the arguments and objections raised during this debate.

(Text):

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, the then minister of public works, who is now Mr. Winters, president of Rio Tinto, had this to say in reply to a similar argument raised by the opposition today. I am reading from page 3070 of the debate of April 19, 1956.

Mr. Chevrier: Are you going to cast a slur on him, too?

Mr. Walker: You can determine yourself. These words are not a slur on him. They indicate the frame of mind of the government of the day of which the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was a member. At that time I believe the hon. member for Laurier was the chairman of the St. Lawrence seaway authority.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): What about your own promises?

Mr. Walker: I am going to deal with those; I will be delighted to.

The Hon. Mr. Winters said this:

It has been suggested that federal contributions should be increased above the present level of 50 per cent. In fairness to those provinces which have made the greatest progress, any general or over-all increase beyond 50 per cent would have to be retroactive—

I hope all hon. members will follow this. I continue:

—to the dates upon which the federal-provincial agreements were signed.

I interpose this remark. That would be 1949. The quotation goes on:

Retroactive legislation of this nature gives rise to many problems and moreover I have serious doubts as to whether this approach would achieve the desired end. Further, no advantage would be gained if the federal government increased its contributions only to have the provincial governments reduce expenditures on the highway by a similar amount. What is required is an increased effort on the part of all concerned.

This is the end of the quotation.

Mr. Bourget: May I ask a question of the minister?

Mr. Walker: Would the hon. member do so at the end of my speech? My time is limited. I should like to hear the hon. member.

Mr. Bourget: I will.

Mr. Walker: In 1958, of course, after the Liberals had been flung from power and were getting ready for another election they switched over completely and decided that 90 per cent should be paid by the dominion and 10 per cent by the provinces. That was their convention jargon. They went to the people but the people did not take them seriously and gave them the greatest licking any political party has received since confederation.

Mr. Chevrier: If you carry on the way you are carrying on now you may get a licking.

Mr. Crestohl: You forget that there is always another election coming.

Mr. Walker: There is always another election coming and my friend will note that according to the Gallup poll we would get 180 seats if there was an election tomorrow. Could this scheme have been changed? Perhaps it could have been changed in 1956 but could it be changed now? Up to 1956 only $225 million of work had been approved for construction. I should like your attention to this matter, Mr. Speaker, because

I want to emphasize this point. In the period from 1956 to 1960, $313 million more work was approved for construction. So you can see that with that tremendous sum expended it is too late to change the percentages in 1960 when three of the provinces have practically completed the work, when others will have completed it very shortly, most of them, we hope, by the end of 1963. We agree with the minister of public works of that day—hon. members will appreciate this—that any over-all increase would have to be retroactive to 1949 to cover all the provinces, including the province of Saskatchewan from which the hon. member for Assiniboia comes. To do otherwise would be discriminatory and that is something of which the Diefenbaker government can never properly be accused.

It would involve paying all the provinces on a 90 per cent basis and would require an increase of $265 million in federal funds—think of it, $265 million—so that the Atlantic provinces could be treated on a 90 per cent basis as was suggested by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. I do not think there is an hon. member in the house from any one of the 10 provinces who would suggest that an act such as the Trans-Canada Highway Act, which required each of the provinces to enter into a contract similar in every paragraph except as to the schedule of work to be done, should be changed unless all provinces were going to be treated alike. How could you change the contracts of one, two, three or four provinces without changing the contracts of all provinces? It would be an impossible situation, that $265 million more than has already been provided should be spent by the federal government so that some of the shortcomings which the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate claims have been perpetrated on certain provinces can be corrected. One cannot change the percentage for one of the nine participating provinces without making the same change for the other provinces. If there had been a separate deal for the province of Newfoundland alone there would not have been any trouble.

But this is not the way to get extra relief. It might be done as it has been done in the past. The Atlantic provinces have received additional stipends because of the fact that they have required general over-all stipends. No member of the house has complained about that, but you cannot make such a change in the Trans-Canada Highway Act. I would ask hon. members to keep in mind that all these agreements are exactly the same for all the provinces and that the only variation is in the schedule.

I want to answer the hon. member for Assiniboia. He has left the house. Probably like the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate—

Mr. Argue: On a point of order, I am in the chamber.

Mr. Walker: Thank you very much. I am glad of that. Now I can speak with impunity without the hon. member for Laurier criticizing me for taking unfair advantage of the hon. member's absence. All the provinces have entered into the same contract and are being treated exactly the same so far as contributions by the federal government are concerned. All the provinces have one thing to do. No province was forced to come into this deal. They all came into it voluntarily. Each one of them had an obligation to complete the share of the trans-Canada highway within their own borders and when they had completed the share within their own borders and had been paid by the dominion government they had been dealt with fairly, could require nothing more and could not claim that they had been dealt with unfairly.

If the province of Saskatchewan, through no effort of the socialist government, happens to be a great plain where there is no necessity for bridges or detours Tommy Douglas and the hon. member for Assiniboia cannot claim that they are responsible for that. If they get their part of the highways built on time and are paid by the dominion government as they have been paid and if they have the use of that magnificent highway that goes right across their province, how can the province of Saskatchewan complain? It has been dealt with fairly under the terms of the Trans-Canada Highway Act.

So I say to hon. members that the object of this federal government—I do not claim that the former government had any other purpose—is to deal freely and fairly with all the provinces, but the federal government wants the trans-Canada highway completed and the sooner it is done the better.

My conclusions can be summed up in this way. In the first place, we cannot discriminate by changing the contract now for one province or two provinces and leave out the others. Second, in the alternative it is impossible at this stage in that we cannot afford to change the contracts of all the provinces because it would cost another $265 million. I should like to discuss the suggestion of some hon. members that there should be a second trans-Canada highway but I know that has been ruled out of order.

Mr. Chevrier: The Speaker said you could go ahead.

Mr. Walker: I will not attempt to buck the ruling of the Chair. I want to thank the hon.

member for Bonavista-Twillingate for recalling that I did go to St. John's, Newfoundland, that I did make a speech on television and that I did carry out what I said I would do in that speech, namely review the policy under the Trans-Canada Highway Act. We have reviewed it and after serious consideration we have continued the legislation for a further period and asked for additional money in order to complete the highway. When hon. members of the opposition who were members of the government in 1956 argue that the provinces should have a greater share their argument is applicable to a time when it was possible that all the provinces should have a greater share because up to then only a small amount of money had been expended on the trans-Canada highway. It was perfectly proper to do so then, but anybody contemplating the amount that has been spent up to the present time will see how impossible it is to make a change in 1960 which was feasible in 1956.

I am enthusiastic about the trans-Canada highway, Mr. Speaker. It is a magnificent achievement. The portion in the national park in Newfoundland I am proud to say will be completed this year. The dominion government will complete its chore and that is not included in the $400 million that we are spending as our contribution to the provinces. This is a magnificent project. We have had tremendous problems. The problems in Rogers pass in British Columbia are almost beyond description. The problems in that great wide belt of northern Ontario north of lake Superior are fantastic. The difficulties being encountered are almost incredible. Newfoundland has its problems, Mr. Speaker. At this stage, I have nothing but good will for all the members of the house—

Mr. Chevrier: Hear, hear.

Mr. Walker: —including the hon. member for Laurier.

I should like to suggest, with the greatest deference to all hon. members in this house, that the job we are completing is a job which has to be completed. I agree with the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that until it is completed we should not consider a second highway. In saying that, I might be out of order, but that is all I am going to say here. If, in the committee stage, there are any questions I can answer I shall do my best to answer them.

Mr. Bourget: I hope the minister will now allow a few questions.

Mr. Walker: May we wait until the committee stage?

Mr. Bourget: I believe the minister mentioned what I said in 1956 when the act was amended. I can tell the minister that I have nothing to withdraw. As a result of what the minister said in his concluding remarks I should like to ask him how he can logically say that the act could not have been amended in 1957 to pay more to the provinces. This was only one year after the Conservatives made promises right here in this house that they would increase the federal government's share. If the minister does not believe me, he only has to ask the hon. member for Victoria, (Ont.) (Mr. Hodgson) who is sitting right behind him and who said the federal government should pay 90 per cent of the cost of the trans-Canada highway.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Bourget: How can the minister explain the fact that within one year they could not change the act and pay more as they promised to do?

Some hon. Members: Order. Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order; may I remind the hon. member that he may not speak twice in the same debate.

Mr. Bourget: I am just asking the minister to answer that.

Mr. Walker: I have always thought, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Levis (Mr. Bourget) should have been a lawyer and not an engineer. He is very eloquent.

Mr. Chevrier: He would have been a good one.

Mr. Walker: A very good one; I am glad the hon. member for Laurier agrees with me. In reply to the hon. member for Levis may I say that unfortunately in 1957 I was not the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. Bourget: There is another question that I asked, a very serious question—

Some hon. Members: Order; committee stage.

Mr. Bourget: The minister has allowed me to ask him some questions at the conclusion of his remarks. I am in order, Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the minister, to ask a question. I am asking the minister, and I think it is a very serious question—

Mr. Grafftey: Let us hear it.

Mr. Bourget: You had better wait.

Mr. Grafftey: We will tell you if it is serious.

Mr. Bourget: A serious question is the kind of question you would not understand.

Mr. Grafftey: I never understood your first question.

Mr. Bourget: I like my hon. friend, so I will not say anything. I ask the minister to answer the question that I asked him this afternoon, does he believe that the trans-Canada highway bill that is now before the house is constitutional?

Mr. Walker: I am just the plumber of the government, not the lawyer.

Mr. Bourget: You will agree with me that it is a very serious question. I feel the minister should not evade the question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order; I must remind the hon. member that he can put a question but he cannot decide what answer he is to get. Is the house ready for the question?

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1—Termination of contributions.

Mr. Argue: We listened to the remarks of the minister with great interest. I am not sure he was always in order, but it was very pleasant hearing from him this evening. I was glad he was able to admit that the good province of Saskatchewan was the first to complete its section of the trans-Canada highway. I do not think the fact that we have relatively level terrain is the main reason why it was completed first, because if this were the only factor the provinces of Manitoba and Alberta would be in a comparable position. We have a government that wished to proceed with this project as rapidly as possible, and although our resources are relatively limited compared with those of some other provinces, we pressed forward, and we are very pleased with the fact that we are the first province in Canada to complete its section of the highway.

The minister has advanced some arguments as to why this government is not prepared to change the formula. He says that if it does so the formula will have to be made retroactive. With that I certainly agree, but as I have already pointed out it is not very many months from the time when members of the Conservative party were advocating vast changes. They advocated these changes until they had the opportunity to perform, and they proved a complete failure when it came to performance.

The people of Saskatchewan feel aggrieved, not only because they have had to wait for so many years without any extension of this act but also—and I do not intend to go into this at length—because they feel that in another program which has to do with roads they have been short-changed by a few million dollars that have been charged against the province in an unfair way, having to do with the Prince Albert bridge.

I wonder if the minister could give the committee a report as to the number of miles of highway yet to be completed in the various provinces. As I have said before, I have a report—I believe it is the latest report which hon. members have—going up to March 31, 1959. I wonder if the minister could bring the committee up to date as to the number of miles completed in each province; the total mileage, and the mileage yet to be completed. While the minister is doing that, I hope he will pass some comment concerning whether or not the federal government believes there is any real likelihood that all the provinces will complete their portions of the highway within the time set by this present amendment. If we are going to wait until every province in this nation has completed its section before this government announces its highway policy, we shall wait for many, many years and the majority of the people of Canada will be extremely disappointed inasmuch as they are having to suffer because other provinces are so tardy in proceeding with this program. In addition to the information as to the number of miles completed in each province, I should like the minister to make some comment about what progress the federal government expects will be made on the trans-Canada highway within the period of this act.

Mr. Walker: I want to thank the hon. member for Assiniboia for asking this question. I should have given this information sooner. The total mileage of the trans-Canada highway in the nine provinces, including Newfoundland, is 4,491, and the grading contracts approved to date—this was up until April 27; I have had the figures changed three times waiting for this bill to come up—amounts to 3,317. Grading contracts completed add up to 3,068 miles. Paving work approved for construction amounts to 2,617 miles, and paving work completed to 2,373 miles. I may say that 800 miles of the designated trans-Canada highway route was paved prior to the act being passed and, of course, that distance is not included in the figures I have given. The total value of the work approved for construction up until April 23 was $562.6 million of which Canada's share is $335 million. Total payments to date by the dominion government amount to $260 million. This amount has been paid on provincial claims in respect of work undertaken and completed.

In reply to the hon. gentleman as to the amount of work completed, does he want this information with respect to each of the nine provinces?

Mr. Argue: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

[Mr. Argue.]

Mr. Walker: If I can get the consent of the committee, I shall be very happy to have appended to Hansard, if possible, supplementary tables indicating, first, the length of the highway by provinces; second, the grading contracts; third, the paving construction for each of the provinces; fourth, the structures built; fifth, a summary of the contractual commitments; and, sixth, a summary of Canada's commitments for the additional 40 per cent contribution arranged in 1956 and the payments made. Could I have the approval of the committee to have them printed?

Mr. Argue: For what date?

Mr. Walker: Up to April 23. Some of them are just up to March 31, but most of them are to April 23, 1960.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Order. I think I have already indicated that if the minister asks for permission to have them printed at this point in his speech, the committee would have authority to give that permission. But if the minister asks that these documents be printed as an appendix, it would be necessary for him to ask permission from the Speaker when he resumes the chair.

Mr. Walker: I would appreciate if they could be printed as part of my speech because it would save a great deal of time; otherwise we would be getting quite confused.

The Chairman: Does the committee consent to having the documents printed at this point in the minister's speech?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Walker: Does my hon. friend want the provinces broken down for the grading construction or the final stage, paving construction?

Mr. Argue: The figures I should like to have would be figures comparable to those given in table No. 1 in the annual report. The minister should have that report available. On page 4, in the third column, is shown the paved mileage. If we had the paved mileage brought up to date I think it would give the committee in a very brief way some indication of the extent to which the highway has been completed in each province and what progress has been made.

Mr. Walker: I shall be glad to do that. However, I want to say this. I know that the hon. member for Assiniboia appreciates the fact that the greatest problem we have is to get into a position to grade it. Once you have it graded, of course you can travel over it. But I shall give you the paving construction which, of course, is not nearly as great as the grading. In Newfoundland: miles of paving, contract approved and mileage completed, 108 miles approved, 63 miles completed; Prince Edward Island, 71 miles approved, 71 miles completed; Nova Scotia, 80 miles approved, 34 miles completed; New Brunswick, 142 miles approved, 133 miles completed; Ontario, 775 miles approved, 650 miles completed; Manitoba, 297 miles approved, 297 miles completed; Saskatchewan, 406 miles approved, 406 miles completed; Alberta, 281 miles approved, 278 miles completed; British Columbia, 377 miles approved and 361 miles completed.

Just in order to give a comparison, may I say that as to grading the figures for Ontario are 957 miles approved, 872 miles completed; for British Columbia, 528 miles approved, 477 miles completed. In Newfoundland, because of the fondness I have for all the people in that province I am very happy to say that you can go right across the trans-Canada highway from sea to sea. At the present time I will admit, with other hon. members, that it is not too good. However, 375 miles have been approved for grading and 288 miles have been completed.

Mr. Argue: Has the minister the totals for the various figures he has given?

Mr. Walker: Yes. For the provinces the total mileage approved for grading is 3,317 and the mileage of grading completed is 3,068 as compared with paving; the number of miles of paving for which contracts have been approved is 2,617 and the mileage completed is 2,373. I should say that to this figure we must add the 800 miles which are included in the highway but which were done prior to the act.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to ask the minister where the most expensive mileage in the whole trans-Canada highway has been undertaken and whether, in going through the Kicking Horse pass region at Revelstoke and particularly through the parks, it was found necessary on occasion to change the type of construction from that which was originally intended or to modify it on account of possible snow slides and the nature of the rock.

Mr. Walker: As the hon. member for Kootenay West, the squire of the house, knows,—and I am sure he does not mind my saying that—his province has had the most expensive mileage. But there are parts of Ontario where there are tremendous problems with regard to bridges, grading and so on; this construction has also been very expensive. But in all the provinces, with the exception of the prairie provinces, there is some point where the construction is very expensive. The hon. member has asked where would be found the most expensive mileage; not the total number of miles, but the mileage. That would be British Columbia, I am advised, with Ontario running fairly close. Newfoundland is also well up.

Mr. Tucker: I wonder whether the minister could advise the house whether the 25 miles through the national park is included in the 108 miles in Newfoundland?

Mr. Walker: No; I am happy to say that is extra. The amount of the cost of building that mileage, which was a very good sum, is not included in our figures. It has nothing to do with the Trans-Canada Highway Act expenditures.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): I have a couple of questions to ask of the minister. Is it still an obligation on the part of every province participating in the trans-Canada highway scheme to call for public tenders with regard to the construction works on the roads? That is my first question. My second question is this. Is there still a provision calling for some kind of supervision of the work by federal representatives? My last question is this. If so, in view of the fact that lately the premier of Quebec has led the people of Quebec to believe that his late government was about to adhere to the federal plan, is it the intention of the federal government to amend the act with a view to removing those two obstacles for Quebec?

Mr. Walker: What was the third question? I will ask the hon. member what it was when I come to it. I could not grasp that question about Quebec.

In reply to my hon. friend's first question, may I say that the system, of course, is public tender open to all bidders and on the principle that low tenderer gets the contract. In some isolated parts of the provinces—principally Newfoundland—there are areas where it is not practical to have a public tender on certain local matters, where there is some day labour. I think that has been principally in Newfoundland. I am told that it is not just confined to Newfoundland. There are other provinces where locations are out of the way, where a public tender would be useless for small parts of the highway, but the general principle is public tender.

As to the second question, my hon. friend is quite right in his suggestion that there is careful federal supervision. Each area is constantly inspected. Before any payment whatever can be made on any part of the highway by the dominion to the provinces, a federal inspector, of course, must approve it. What was the third question?

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): The minister's reply was so polite that I do not intend to ask my third question.

Mr. Argue: Can the minister give us the total mileage that was finished in 1959? The minister has said that the total mileage paved to date up to the trans-Canada standard was 2,373 miles. I should like a comparable figure for a year ago.

Mr. Walker: I have here the report that my friend was reading from, the report of proceedings under the Trans-Canada Highway Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1959. The paving constructed up to the end of March, which was a little more than a year ago, or the paving contracts approved numbered 353 and the miles completed were 396. There must be a mistake there.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister is not surprised.

Mr. Walker: In the calendar year 1959 the number of miles approved amounted to 421 and the number completed was 270 miles.

Mr. Argue: This gives us a very adequate picture of the progress that has been made to date. The minister has already said that of some 4,491 miles, 2,373 miles have been paved to trans-Canada standards to date. Another 800 miles have been paved, I understand, to somewhat lower provincial standards. On the basis of the mileage of road paved to trans-Canada standards, after 11 years of operation we have just over half of the total mileage paved. If one adds in the mileage paved to the lower standards we still have some 1,300 miles or so yet to be paved. I suggest that at this rate we shall be lucky if we are half way through by way of time of construction of the trans-Canada highway across this nation by 1963, and in this I am making no reference at all to the province of Quebec. For a nation like ours to take 11 years to construct approximately 50 per cent of the mileage to standard is far too slow.

I suggest to the minister that the government should have a new look at the trans-Canada highway program, and the problem that it is endeavouring to solve. I suggest that now is the time that the government, as a government, should do some of the things necessary to speed up construction, to make more money available to the provinces so that this highway can be completed and in use before too many more years go by.

I hope I am pessimistic; I mean, I hope I am too pessimistic, I hope my pessimism is not borne out by events, but it looks to me as if we shall be back in parliament a few years from now considering a further extension of this act because with the leadership, or the lack of leadership, I should say, given to this problem by the federal government I see little hope of a completed trans-Canada highway being available to Canadians even as late as the end of 1963.

Mr. Bigg: Nonsense.

Mr. Argue: I suggest to the government—

Mr. Bigg: Utter nonsense.

Mr. Argue: That is the limit of the contribution of my hon. friend over there, an interjection inaudible to most hon. members.

Mr. Bigg: I said it was utter nonsense.

Mr. Argue: I ask the minister whether he feels that there is any real possibility of this highway being completed by December, 1963, at the rate it is now being constructed? Will he comment on the possibility of some agreement being made with the province of Quebec? I would appreciate very much his doing that. I would like him to be as specific as he can and tell the house what conversations or consultations he has had with the various provinces that have not yet completed their section of the trans-Canada highway in order that he may give parliament and the nation the information that is available to him as to how long we shall have to wait before we can expect this greatly needed highway to be completed.

Mr. Walker: I thank the hon. member for these pertinent questions. My answer is this. When the hon. member is away from the house making political speeches—and as the leader of that party I think he should do that—I shall be grateful to have his assistance in whatever province he goes in stirring them up and encouraging them to complete their particular part of the highway. After all, we can only do that. We have opened up this offer and we say, "Now here it is, boys; we will pay you when you deliver." We pay them as soon as they deliver, and all I can tell my hon. friend in reply to his inquiry as to whether or not this highway will be completed by the end of 1963 is that the plans of each of the provinces, with the exception of Newfoundland, call for the completion of its share of the highway before 1963.

Before coming to this house with this legislation we had our departmental inspectors right across the country make inquiries as to that and that is why we were able to come to the house and make the proposition that we make tonight. I must admit, however, that we are relying on the information that we have from the provinces. In view of the enthusiasm of my hon. friend and other members, I am sure they will encourage the provinces to complete their own program by the end of 1963.

Mr. Herridge: The minister mentioned the fact that as soon as the provinces delivered the goods in connection with the construction of their portion of the highway they were paid. I have not the newspaper clipping here—I intended to have it with me; I overlooked it—but quite recently I read in a newspaper report a statement by Premier Bennett of British Columbia in which, if I am correct, he complained about the delay in payments being made to the provincial government on account of the trans-Canada highway. Can the minister inform the committee whether there has been any delay?

Mr. Walker: I might say that when I said that as soon as they completed it we paid them, I meant that we do not pay them until we are satisfied that they have completed their share of the highway in accordance with the standards laid down in the trans-Canada highway agreement. They are strict standards, of course,

As far as Premier Bennett is concerned, I do not know what he has said recently but I saw his inimitable minister of highways less than a week ago and if he had any complaints I am sure that in our hour-long interview he would have mentioned them. He did not utter a word of complaint.

Mr. Bourget: If, for instance, the province of Quebec were to decide to take part in this program, would it be entitled to receive 50 per cent of the cost of the road built between 1928 and 1949? Would the act that we have now and the amendments that were passed in 1956 entitle the province of Quebec to receive 50 per cent of the cost of the road built between 1928 and 1949?

Mr. Walker: As I told the hon. member for Levis a short time ago, I am not the Minister of Justice; I am just the Minister of Public Works and I am not going to embroil myself or the government.

Mr. Chevrier: Is the Minister of Justice in the house?

Mr. Walker: The hon. member may ask him if he wishes. He is a very able minister. I have always looked up to him and to serve under him was a great pleasure. But my reply to that would be that my hon. friend has asked a hypothetical question and I know that under all the circumstances he would not expect me to be able to reply at this time. Never having had the matter presented to me before, never having contemplated it, never having had any request except from my hon. friend this afternoon and from a few others at the resolution stage, I have never gone into the matter and I am unable to give the hon. member a reply.

Mr. Bourget: I am most surprised because a year ago I think the minister was recognized as one of the best lawyers in Canada when he was the prosecutor in a committee.

Mr. Walker: I know you thought so but I do not think everyone did.

Mr. Chevrier: I certainly did not.

Mr. Bourget: Nevertheless I think that the minister as a lawyer and having beside him the Minister of Justice should be able to answer this very simple question. I simply ask him this question. If the province of Quebec decided today to take part in this program would the province of Quebec be entitled to receive 50 per cent of the cost of work done previously from 1928 to 1949 and recognized by the federal government? That is what I should like to know.

An hon. Member: It is hypothetical.

Mr. Bourget: It is not. Surely we are entitled to receive that information because we have read in the newspapers that Quebec may take part in the program. Surely the people of Quebec are interested in knowing what they can get and what they cannot get. It is a very simple question.

Mr. Walker: I am under strict instructions from the Chairman to keep in order and he has declared this discussion out of order. On this occasion all I am interested in is an additional $50 million and three years more to complete the highway. At the moment the plan concerns nine provinces. My job tonight is to get the bill through as it stands at present and with the present participants in the plan. With the greatest respect, as the humble Minister of Public Works I do not think you should ask me a question like that. I am burdened with cares. I have not only public works with all the problems that are involved there but I have Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the national capital commission and now I am chairman of a Hull-Ottawa bridge project.

Mr. Bourget: After all, Mr. Chairman, the minister is a lawyer, he has been Minister of Public Works for some months and he has beside him the Minister of Justice. These are the men who had all the answers in the elections of 1957 and 1958 but the minister cannot even answer a simple question. Surely it is a simple question.

The Chairman: Order. May I point out to the hon. member that one way or the other the amendments to the act which we are studying do not relate at all to the question he has put.

Mr. Bourget: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Argue: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman—

An hon. Member: Here is the expert.

Mr. Argue: —as I understand the situation, this is a measure brought before the House of Commons to make provision for a trans-Canada highway and not to discriminate in any way against the province of Quebec. I will be greatly surprised if the province of Quebec has not equal rights under confederation with those of any other province so far as this act is concerned. I suggest that it is very much in order and very pertinent for the hon. member for Levis to ask whether or not the terms of this act, as now applied to nine provinces, are available to the province of Quebec and, if so, if this money would be applied on construction prior to 1949 in exactly the same way as was done with the other nine provinces. I suggest it is a fair and proper question and that the house is entitled to an answer.

Mr. Grafftey: Where is the member for Port Arthur?

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I should like to address another question or two to the overburdened Minister of Public Works. I wish I had brought the newspaper with me but in reading the newspapers lately it has been interesting to note that the minister of highways of British Columbia, Mr. Philip Gaglardi, came to Ottawa and had a discussion with the Minister of Public Works since our discussion of this measure at the resolution stage. My curiosity has really been aroused in view of the caustic comments about the federal government in connection with the trans-Canada highway that have appeared in the press of British Columbia. Would the minister be able to report to the committee any of his conversation with the minister of highways and tell us whether the minister expressed severe dissatisfaction with the conduct of the government in this respect?

Mr. Walker: It is very good of the hon. member to have such consideration for me and the comments I have made. I had a very pleasant interview of over an hour with the minister of highways of British Columbia. He told me in parting that he had thoroughly enjoyed himself, that I had answered some questions and that he would like to be in the same party as myself. That was an invitation for me to join the Social Credit party and he did not offer to join the Conservatives. We had a very pleasant time and the only time that I had to say no was to his suggestion that I should amend what I had said in the house with regard to a second trans-Canada highway. I had to tell him, of course, that that was a question of government policy and, like the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, we did not feel that this was the time to contemplate a second trans-Canada highway or even to consider it when we are so far from completion of the first trans-Canada highway.

He was disappointed because he said they had a program in British Columbia and would like to chisel in on the federal government for some more funds. I asked him if he got more funds would he still take credit for all the highways that were built with federal money? Signs have been put up all over indicating that highways have been built by the provincial government and Mr. Gaglardi's name is prominently displayed at the bottom of these signs. All in all, it was a very pleasant visit, but although we have made fantastic monetary contributions to the province of British Columbia so far for their part of the trans-Canada highway, not only have we received no thanks but we have received no recognition. One would think that the federal government, and I include the former government as well, had made no contributions to British Columbia whereas that province is the second greatest recipient. The sum of $162 million has been approved and, including the additional 40 per cent, $93 million has already been paid. We have paid them $66,939,901, and I would ask the hon. member if he can find anybody in the whole province of British Columbia who realizes that the federal government has paid a cent.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I am surprised that the minister would not hesitate to deal with a question concerning the province of British Columbia but would consider another question, that asked by the hon. member for Levis, as being hypothetical. May I suggest to him that the question was not hypothetical because a former premier of the province of Quebec indicated an agreement could be forthcoming and the present premier has given his views in no uncertain terms in connection with the matter. So I suggest to the minister that the question is not at all hypothetical. While the minister has been very good at giving evasive answers, let me tell him that I think the committee is entitled to more than evasive answers in connection with a matter of this kind. I do not see why the minister will not make an honest attempt to answer the question put by the hon. member for Levis.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, I will try to make an honest attempt and I thank my hon. friend for making that reference. My hon. friend has drawn a long bow and is trying to make a comparison where there is none. There is no comparison between the situation in British Columbia and the situation in Quebec. British Columbia is now, and has been, a signatory to the Trans-Canada Highway Act and is under contract with the dominion government. I was able to talk with their minister on a subject which exists, namely the contract between the dominion and the province.

The province of Quebec is not a participant. There is no contract existing between the federal government and the province of Quebec. For my part, I have neither seen nor heard from any minister in the province of Quebec in connection with this matter. My hon. friend, who is an astute lawyer and a much more astute politician, I think can appreciate that it would be folly for me to attempt a positive answer to something which must be completely hypothetical because the terms of any contract which might be entered into with the province of Quebec are something which I could not even contemplate at the present time, and something which has not been given any consideration by me. I do not intend, for the purpose of satisfying my friend, to inject another political issue into the provincial election coming up in Quebec next month and to commit myself on something about which I have no information.

Mr. Bourget: I am quite sure that the minister is very wrong. I asked a question, and I can assure the minister I am right. I am giving him my word, as a member of this house, that I had no political aspects in mind.

Mr. Walker: I accept my friend's word.

Mr. Bourget: I am only asking a very reasonable question, Mr. Chairman. I feel that tomorrow, when the minister reads my question, he will request this information from the Department of Justice. If the Minister of Justice is not capable of giving me an answer tonight, I am sure he will ask his deputy ministers tomorrow whether or not my question is a logical and honest one.

Mr. Fulton: The only answer I will get will be that it is neither.

Mr. Bourget: Are we going to get the brush-off like that? I am asking the minister if Quebec should decide today—

Mr. Grafftey: Hypothetical.

Mr. Anderson: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Bourget: I am asking if Quebec—

Mr. Anderson: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman; have you not ruled that this question is out of order?

Mr. Bourget: I am going to pursue that for two days.

Mr. Chevrier: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman; I did not understand your ruling to be that the question was out of order. I think your ruling had to do with the fact that we were discussing clause 1 and that, under that clause, a specific question such as that put by the hon. member, although not that particular one, was not in order. The hon. member for Assiniboia, and I think rightly, drew to your attention the fact that it is clearly set out here that this amendment would extend for three years the period during which contributions or payments may be made to the provinces—

An hon. Member: Participating provinces.

Mr. Chevrier: It does not say "participating provinces", it says "provinces", and that being the case it would appear to me that questions are in order about a province which is not a participant. It is for that reason I submit that the point of order was well taken and that the question is in order.

Mr. Anderson: The chairman has already ruled it irrelevant to the subject.

The Chairman: I mentioned that it was my feeling this question was not relevant to the bill. However, the question has been put and it seems the problem now is that it is becoming repetitive and, for that reason, might be out of order.

Mr. Argue: The answer was not satisfactory.

The Chairman: A question cannot be put again and again merely because the answer is not satisfactory. Therefore, I think the rule must be invoked when a member repeats a question.

Mr. Bourget: I want to appeal to you personally, Mr. Chairman, because you come, as I do, from Quebec, and if you would allow me just a minute or two I would explain my case. You know, and the minister knows—

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Bourget: Just let me speak. You have said that you are a plumber, now do not show it. Let me explain. Mr. Sauve said before he died that he was studying the question of taking part in the trans-Canada highway because, as he declared, it was not so much a constitutional question as it was a question of business. This leads us to believe that Quebec, even with a Union Nationale government, may take part in that program. Is it a hypothetical question to ask, then, if Quebec—

Mr. Grafftey: If?

Mr. Bourget: Yes, if; we have to put so many "ifs" in a question when we have a Union Nationale government in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Grafftey: Lesage will be proud of you.

Mr. Bourget: I am asking the minister, and I think it is a fair question as he will realize, if Quebec decided to take part, let us say within two or three months—

Mr. Grafftey: It is a hypothetical question.

Mr. Bourget: Never mind the hypothetical; if Quebec were, within the next two or three months, to take part in the trans-Canada highway would the province of Quebec, according to the act passed in 1949 and the amendment passed in 1956, without amending the act as it is be entitled to receive 50 per cent of the cost of the route built between 1928 and 1949, to which the other provinces were entitled before the amendments of 1956? I believe that is a fair and reasonable question.

I think you will admit, Mr. Chairman, that I am in order and I am entitled as a member of parliament to an answer. If the minister is not ready now, would he be kind enough to look into it and give me an answer tomorrow?

Mr. Walker: It is almost ten o'clock. May I say to my friend—first, may I ask him a question. Did he know that a provincial election had been called for the twenty second of June?

Mr. Bourget: Yes, I know that, just as you know.

Mr. Walker: May I say that my friend became so involved, and since he has a couple of minutes to go I would ask him to be good enough to repeat his question?

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order; I think that reply by the minister is not worthy of him, particularly the first part of the reply. After all, a minister—

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Chevrier: A point of order; I am speaking to a point of order.

An hon. Member: What point of order is this?

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, may I ask that you call it ten o'clock?

Mr. Chevrier: I have a right to speak to a point of order, nevertheless, and the point of order is this: When a minister comes before the committee seeking funds he should not take the high-handed attitude that the Minister of Public Works has taken all evening.

The Chairman: I do not think it is necessary to decide whether or not we have a point of order because it is ten o'clock and I shall have to rise, report progress and request leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the acting house leader what the business is for tomorrow and whether there is any change in the announcement made for Monday and Tuesday, and the item for Wednesday?

Mr. Brooks: There is no change so far as the business for tomorrow is concerned: it will be the agricultural estimates. On Monday and Tuesday there is the motion to go into supply.

Mr. Argue: What is first tomorrow? The estimates?

Mr. Brooks: The estimates are the first item tomorrow.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask, do we go back to the provincial tax-sharing agreement on Wednesday, as announced?

Mr. Brooks: That will be announced on Monday night.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, April 29, 1960

The house met at 11 a.m.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

BOMARC MISSILE—REPORTED U.S. INTENTION TO TERMINATE PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence whether he has any comment to make on the report which has just been received from Washington that the house appropriations committee of the United States congress has now recommended the termination of the Bomarc missile program and also its replacement in part at least by the purchase of more interceptor fighters.

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I understand that the appropriations committee of the United States senate reported today that they were recommending that the Bomarc B production be eliminated, that a small development program be continued, and that the funds be used for the purchase of more F-106 interceptor aircraft. This is a recommendation, of course, by the appropriations committee which has yet to receive the approval of the senate and the administration. If this recommendation is approved and made final then it will not be in keeping with the arrangements which were made over a year ago between our two countries for the air defence of this continent.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a supplementary or at least a related question. Would the minister comment on the statement he is reported to have made in Victoria last week that—and I quote from the press statement—

> —we will have to have interceptors to engage bombers at greater distances. There will have to be longer range interceptors than we have at present—and longer than the range of the Bomarc.

Mr. Pearkes: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I was alluding then to the weapon which is known as the Skybolt, namely an air to ground weapon which can be guided from an aircraft for some considerable distance, perhaps a distance of 1,000 miles or more. I said that if such a weapon were produced—the Skybolt cannot be produced until 1965, but if Russia or any other country produced such a weapon —in order to engage it our defences would have to have a ground to air missile or interceptor with a longer range than any we have at the present time. If I am quoted as saying "we" that, of course, means that I was referring to the west, not necessarily to Canada.

[Later:]

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. I wonder if the minister would comment on a statement made by a member of the subcommittee on defence appropriations in the United States, who said that the only reason for not terminating the entire Bomarc program earlier was political implications in Canada.

Mr. Pearkes: I should think that is quite an inaccurate statement. As the hon. member knows, Canada entered into an arrangement with the United States to take certain measures for the defence of the North American continent. We have co-operated with the United States in fulfilment of that agreement, carrying out step by step the various points which were agreed upon at that time. Bomarc sites were part of that agreement. We were to establish two Bomarc sites, one at North Bay and one at La Macaza. We have been proceeding with the selection and surveying of those sites and the necessary planning and engineering which is required. Major construction has not yet started, but we are in a position to start such construction if the plan is to continue. However, I know of no political implications which would justify a congressman or a senator in the United States in making a statement such as that which has been attributed to him.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister a supplementary question. Has he any comment to make on the statement of the same congressman, "I would rather be a congressman from Cuba this week than secretary of defence in Canada"?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think we are getting rather far afield here in asking the Minister of National Defence to comment on the views of a congressman. After all, that is not part of his ministerial responsibility. Unless there is a question of fact involved I would suggest that the matter be dropped.

Inquiries of the Ministry

IMMIGRATION

INQUIRY AS TO REVISION OF POLICY AND PROCEDURES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. I do not ask the question with any intention of embarrassing her. In view of the statement in this house on February 17, 1955 by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), as follows:

> What a travesty of justice it is that the immigration department should refuse a person admission to Canada and refuse to let the individual know their reasons for making a decision—

And in view of a similar position taken by the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton), on August 8, 1956 in this house, will the minister inform the house whether she is giving consideration to a revision of immigration policy and procedures in order to conform to the views expressed by her distinguished colleagues?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I allowed the hon. member to continue with his question although it seemed to me as he went along that he was really making an argument rather than putting a question. Then he finished with a request for information on a rather broad matter of policy. I do not think that is the type of question the hon. member should be asking on the orders of the day.

Mr. Herridge: I was basing my question on a newspaper comment. That is very common practice in seeking information.

Mr. Speaker: It was not the source of the question but the substance of what the hon. member said that I was referring to.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I ask the hon. lady a question. Has the government yet reached a decision as to whether the amendments to the Immigration Act that we were promised two sessions ago will be introduced at this session?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I have to say no to that question. I had hoped, as the hon. member knows and as other hon. members know, to have brought in those amendments before now, but no one knows better than the hon. member just how complex are the problems which must be faced. I am sorry to say we have not yet reached a definite conclusion.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask a supplementary question. Does the hon. lady think the problem less urgent now than in 1958?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mrs. Fairclough: No, Mr. Speaker; I think it is urgent.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DISARMAMENT—STATEMENT ON PROPOSED INTERNATIONAL POLICE FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Yesterday the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) asked a question based upon a New York Times report of a speech made by General Burns in the ten nation disarmament committee. The Leader of the Opposition will understand why, because of the confidential nature of the negotiations, it is not possible to give a detailed reply. However, I might say that the wording of his question suggests that he understood from the new York Times account of General Burns' statement that some new proposal had been put forward.

This was not the case. General Burns was simply reverting to a point of considerable importance which has been a continuing source of difficulty between the two sides in these negotiations since the very beginning that is, the question of whether international security machinery will be required to maintain peace in the world when the final stages of disarmament have been completed.

The western side has consistently maintained that some machinery—which has been frequently described in the press as an "international police force"—would be required; the Soviet side has argued that there would be no need for machinery of this sort. This is one of several important unresolved difficulties which have impeded progress in the opening stages of the negotiations.

TRADE

URANIUM—INQUIRY AS TO COMPETITION FROM AUSTRALIA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): In the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce perhaps I might ask the Acting Prime Minister, although I know he is preoccupied with other matters today, whether the government has any comment to make on the likelihood of increased competition to the Canadian uranium industry from Australia due to new government plans for financial assistance to the industry in that country, either through subsidies or stockpiling?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce will be present at the next sitting of the house. I think it appropriate that the answer to this question be given to the house on his return.

URANIUM—REQUEST FOR COMMENT ON EFFECT OF INCREASED U.S. PRODUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister a question. At the same time he draws the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to the question of the Leader of the Opposition, will he also ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce to expand and clarify his remarks made earlier this session with respect to the refusal of United States authorities to grant any extension of options to purchase Canadian uranium by commenting on the figures released yesterday showing that United States production of uranium has increased since that date?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did observe that these figures appeared in an announcement yesterday, and I will be glad to bring the observation of the hon. member to the attention of my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

PUBLIC SERVICE

HOUSE OF COMMONS—EXTENSION OF SALARY INCREASES TO MEMBERS' SECRETARIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. I apologize for not giving him notice, but I succumbed to the tearful entreaties of certain secretaries just prior to coming into the house and I am very subject to the influence of ladies in distress. Would the Acting Prime Minister assure the house that the secretaries attached to the House of Commons will receive the increases granted certain groups of civil servants, and that the same will be made retroactive?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to turn an attentive ear not only to the question of the hon. member but to the tearful entreaties of his secretary. In this we are like-minded. The salaries established for members of the staff of the House of Commons are, of course, a matter that comes within the jurisdiction of the commissioners of internal economy. Mr. Speaker has called a meeting of the commissioners to be held next week. I do not think I would be erring in the conjecture that this might be one of the subjects that would be brought before that meeting by Mr. Speaker. In any event, I indicated in reply to a question a fortnight ago that I fully anticipated it would be the wish of the commissioners to make effective, with respect to the stenographic staff of the House of Commons, increases comparable to those that have been applied to the stenographic and clerical services in the civil service.

Mr. Winch: Will they be retroactive?

Mr. Herridge: I should like to correct a wrong impression that I believe the minister got from my question. This was not the complaint of an individual or of my secretary, but was a collective appeal.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder whether I might ask the minister a supplementary question. Is the minister one of the commissioners?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the minister is still one of the commissioners.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

STATEMENT RESPECTING DISPOSAL OF U.S. COINS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for St. Denis and the hon. member for Ottawa West asked me certain questions regarding post office practices in the handling of United States coinage. I now have some further information. The question of whether to charge discount on United States coinage is one that has been left to the discretion of our individual district directors in the 14 postal districts of Canada. We have followed this principle so that in this matter, as in many other fields, the local post office practice could conform to general business practice in the area.

Thus, where United States coinage was generally being accepted at par by local merchants and was also being handed out as change at par by them, we have followed this practice. Naturally, if any patron happened to request Canadian coinage or objected to United States coins, he would be given Canadian coinage. This has caused no hardship to patrons, since United States coins were generally in circulation at par. I might add that where we accept United States coins at par, as we generally do across Canada in our 11,500 post offices, unless we used them as change in accordance with normal business practices we would be in danger of becoming the repository of all the United States coins in the area, and thus bearing the total exchange costs with respect to this type of money for the entire community.

Following the action of the Canadian Bankers' Association in discounting coinage when it was included in deposits, in some areas business firms generally began to discount United States coins received from their customers, and in one district of which I know, the Winnipeg district, our post offices were instructed by the district director to follow a similar practice.

However, in accordance with our standard instructions in such cases, the post offices were also instructed in the same memorandum that United States coins were not to be handed out to patrons but deposited in the banks. This practice is always followed by us whenever United States coins are discounted, so there may be no suggestion that we are accepting the money at a discount and then passing it out at face value and profiting thereby.

After about two weeks, when the general business practice in the Winnipeg area reverted to the acceptance of United States coins at par, we followed the same practice and discontinued discounting United States coins when received. Of course this whole question refers to United States coins, which are only a tiny portion of our normal handling of cash.

The best indication I can give hon. members of that fact is in the case of Winnipeg where, during a short period when United States coins were being discounted, and they of course were all deposited in the bank, we received in the Winnipeg stamp depot postal funds totalling $330,421, and of this only $150.05, one twentieth of one per cent, or $1 in $2,200 was in U.S. coins.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): I shall endeavour not to follow precedent and debate this subject but merely content myself with asking a question. My question is this. In view of the minister's explanation as a result of the question asked by my colleague the hon. member for St. Denis yesterday, how does he account for the fact that the earlier paragraph in the same directive to subpostmasters instructed them not to include United States coins in their deposits or remittances, presumably remittances to the main post offices, if they were of the same value and meant no loss to the public?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Let me say first that I appreciate the practice followed by the hon. member for Ottawa West in asking a question and not debating the issue. I might point this out to the hon. member for St. Denis. The answer is quite simple, Mr. Speaker. As I pointed out, we are not desirous of becoming the repository for United States coins for the entire community. Since they are out in very tiny proportion, as I also pointed out in my answer, of our total cash, our normal practice, where we are not discounting them, is to use them as change and not include them in our deposits.

Mr. McIlraith: I should like to ask a further supplementary question, if I may. Why does the circular make reference to the fact that they are at a discount, and then instruct the postmasters in the local areas not to remit them to the central office but to pass them off on the public?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Well, this is obvious, Mr. Speaker. We are, so far as I know—

Mr. McIlraith: You receive them.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): So far as I am concerned I like our people all down the line in the Post Office Department to be not only instructed what they are to do but to be given a reasonable explanation of why they are being asked to do it. In this particular case they were told that United States coins deposited in banks would be discounted. The post office people themselves were taking them in at par. They were instructed, therefore, whenever possible, not always but whenever possible, to pass them out at par as change.

Mr. McIlraith: Would the Postmaster General—

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I remind the hon. member that the post office estimates are second on the agenda, and there can be a full discussion of the matter when those estimates are being considered. I think there has been a fuller discussion than is necessary on the orders of the day.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I ask the Minister of Finance whether United States coins are legal tender in Canada.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): They are not legal tender, Mr. Speaker. Of course in this free country anyone who does accept them in lieu of legal tender is entitled to do so, but he cannot be obliged to accept them as legal tender.

HOUSING

NEWFOUNDLAND—ST. JOHN'S LAND ASSEMBLY PROJECT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I ask the Minister without Portfolio whether he is in a position to make a report on the proposed housing development in metropolitan St. John's, about which he made a public announcement some time ago?

Hon. W. J. Browne (Minister without Portfolio): I think this question would be more properly directed to the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I could ask the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Public Works whether he could enlighten us.

Mr. Y. R. Tassé (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Public Works): In view of the unavoidable absence of the minister, I should like to take the question as notice.

REQUEST FOR REMOVAL OF RESTRICTIONS ON BUILDING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): In the absence of the Minister of Public Works I wonder if I might ask a question of the Minister of Finance in his dual capacity as Minister of Finance and Acting Prime Minister. In view of the statements made in this house, in particular on February 4, by the former minister of public works to the effect that the construction of 146,000 homes in 1958 created 400,000 jobs, will the government, with housing starts down now nearly 50 per cent, consider increasing the moneys available for direct lending already approved by parliament?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member asked a similar question yesterday which was really pressing for action rather than asking for information. I think he should not repeat every day the same demand that he wishes to make.

Mr. Garland: With great respect, Mr. Speaker, may I say that we are rapidly approaching the peak—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not disputing what the hon. member says. The point is that this is not the proper place to continue what is in effect a debate on the housing situation.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

VANCOUVER—ALLEGED PHYSICAL BEATING OF CITIZEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Taylor (Vancouver-Burrard): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Did the minister hear the news broadcast over a Vancouver radio station on Wednesday, April 27, or have the statements been brought to his attention relating to an alleged physical beating by the R.C.M.P. of a Vancouver citizen? If so, can the minister say whether the police officer entered the restaurant in question, removed the complainant who apparently had committed no offence, and in the ensuing scuffle broke his ribs?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): I did not hear that news broadcast so I cannot comment on it, beyond saying that I have received no report of any such incident and that if such an incident had taken place I would expect an immediate report. Furthermore, if the incident as alleged did take place the person who claimed he was thus maltreated would have a proper and, I imagine, immediate recourse to law.

In these circumstances, and in the absence of any report, I am in a position where I think I must say that as far as I know no such incident ever took place.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

1. Departmental administration, including advisory committee on agricultural services, $777,657.

Mr. Harkness: When the estimates of the Department of Agriculture were introduced in March, I made an introductory statement outlining some of the activities of this department and giving a general survey. I do not propose to make another such speech at the present time, but there is one matter which has caused some considerable concern, and I think I should take this opportunity—it is really the first I have had—to clear it up.

The need for this statement arises from a Canadian Press dispatch under a Washington dateline which appeared in nearly all our Canadian newspapers. The particular clipping I have is from the Montreal Star of Tuesday, April 19. This dispatch states:

> Opening of the St. Lawrence seaway has raised fears among some United States authorities that North American farm lands may be threatened with heavier invasion by foreign crop-damaging beetles, viruses, bugs and other pests and disease.
> One of these experts, recalling the devastating foot-and-mouth disease outbreak among Saskatchewan cattle eight years ago, told a congressional subcommittee that the Canadian government still is not alive to the full dangers of the new threat posed by heavier foreign shipping on the great lakes.
> In a report of subcommittee testimony published today, Donald Fletcher, executive secretary of the rust prevention association at Minneapolis, said the U.S. needs Canada's full co-operation in stepping up port inspection work to block foreign pests and disease.
> "I am sure we will get it," he said talking of Canadian co-operation, "but they just do not understand the dangerous possibility yet."

The report goes on to quote Mr. Fletcher as saying further:

> "Canada has the attitude that they are more interested in what is going out rather than what is coming in. They are inspecting their ships for insects and diseases and have the proper sanitation of the grain going out. I have been at meetings attended by top quarantine people of Canada and their interest is definitely in the export trade. They fail to realize that they get some of these animal diseases and insect pests which may cause trouble to their producing areas."

I also have a clipping here of an editorial written on this subject. It is headed "Negligence in import inspection". Other editorials dealing with this question have been written.

I should like to assure the house that Mr. Fletcher is speaking, apparently, without being aware of the facts, and that there is no validity in the allegations he has made. I wish to outline what the actual situation is with regard to the prevention of disease and pests harmful to plant or animal life in Canada. We have in effect an extremely thorough inspection service to look after this matter, and I regret very much that a considerable number of people in Canada should have been perturbed and alarmed over this report which, as I say, has evidently been made without the gentleman concerned being aware of the facts.

The government, through the Department of Agriculture, has for many years been cognizant of the danger of introducing foreign animal and plant diseases and plant pests through foreign imports and foreign shipping. With respect to animal diseases, veterinary port officers have been maintained for many years at ocean ports.

Prior to the opening of the new St. Lawrence seaway, all foreign vessels entering the Lachine canal and existing waterways serving a route identical to the St. Lawrence seaway were boarded and examined by port officers operating under the provisions of the Animal Contagious Diseases Act.

With the development of the St. Lawrence seaway, it was recognized that the dangers of introducing foreign diseases would be increased. Fully one year ahead of the opening of the seaway negotiations were opened to establish a system of boarding and checking each vessel entering the new seaway. All vessels docking at Canadian ocean ports are boarded and all foreign garbage is either retained in enclosed containers on board the vessel or is removed and incinerated under the supervision of a departmental officer. All vessels arriving at or docking at the port of Montreal and entering the St. Lawrence seaway are required to have all garbage removed and incinerated under departmental supervision.

In addition, all vessels entering the St. Lawrence seaway are inspected for foreign meats included as ship's stores. Where such foreign meats are found they are sealed in the ship's locker with a departmental seal. The master of the vessel must sign a statement, available in 16 languages, that no garbage is to be dumped in Canadian waters.

An Animal Contagious Diseases Act certificate of clearance listing the foreign meats aboard, the government seal numbers on the locker, and the ports of call both Canadian and United States of the vessel within the St. Lawrence seaway and the great lakes is issued to the master. Copies of this certificate are forwarded by mail to the Canadian and United States port veterinarian for each port of call of the vessel. In the case of Canadian ports of call, the vessel is checked at each port to assure that departmental requirements are being met. Also, at certain designated Canadian great lakes ports garbage is removed and incinerated under supervision.

All this is required under the provisions of the Animal Contagious Diseases Act, and violators are subject to prosecution. While this entire operation at the entrance of the St. Lawrence seaway is carried on by Canadian government officers of the department's health of animals division, veterinary officers of the United States department of agriculture are kept informed, and the program was developed in consultation with them.

With respect to plant pests and plant diseases the department, through its plant protection division, has for many years maintained port inspection officers at all ocean-going ports. With the opening of the new St. Lawrence seaway, inspection under the Destructive Insect and Pest Act has been provided at all seaway ports where foreign plant cargoes are permitted to be off-loaded.

In addition to requiring import permits and closely checking each individual shipment of plant material, attention is paid to the general cargo for evidence of all insect pests. For the purposes of both the Animal Contagious Diseases Act and the Destructive Insect and Pest Act, departmental fumigation stations are maintained at Halifax, Nova Scotia; Saint John, New Brunswick; Quebec city and Montreal, Quebec. At other ports where fumigation services are needed, commercial fumigation units are used.

I thought it was desirable to make a fairly complete statement in connection with this matter in order to reassure Canadians who have been disturbed over this report. Particularly as it mentioned the foot-and-mouth outbreak in 1951, which caused a great deal of damage as far as the Canadian cattle and livestock industry generally is concerned. I should like to repeat that I regret very much that a statement of this kind was made without knowledge of the facts. I think our inspection service is as thorough and painstaking as any which exists anywhere in the world. In fact most of the complaints we get in connection with it is that it is too thorough. There are some who are prevented from bringing things into the country because of our very strict regulations.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: When the house went into committee on March 4 last, we heard two speeches, one by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the other by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness). Those speeches were mere patchwork, such as we have been hearing since the beginning of the session, designed to disguise the farming situation and to justify the election promises of 1957-58. They are the new garment that was to be offered to the farmers and which, after three fittings, is in tatters.

All through his ten-minute speech, the Minister of Agriculture reviewed the achievements of his government. I noted, however, that his statement on price stabilization policy covered only 14 lines in the official report.

For his part, the Prime Minister spoke about the government's farm policy.

The following are the main points he made. First, the Prime Minister said, as reported on page 1765 of Hansard:

> The government proposes, subject to approval by parliament at the next session—
> That was in 1959.

He was referring to a statement he had made in the house on August 30, 1958.

> —to continue the fund to assist in the export of surplus wheat stocks to non-commercial markets under the Colombo plan.

He then said that the house had voted $50 million a year for the three coming years, or $16 million more than the previous amount. About that policy, Quebec "Duplessists" said during federal and provincial election campaigns:

> Duplessis caters to his province and Ottawa to foreigners.

It will be recalled that, at that time, the Conservative members voted in favour of the motion.

A second point made by the Prime Minister was this, which I quote:

> The government is studying in consultation with the provinces legislation to provide for a comprehensive crop insurance program.

The legislation was passed, but as it offered no advantage to the provinces, the program was not put into force in any part of Canada, except for a limited experiment made in the province of Manitoba.

Concerning the third point, the Prime Minister had this to say:

> In recognition of the recurring hazard of drought to the stability of livestock production in the prairie provinces, the government has taken steps to provide assistance to provincial governments, which have the prime responsibility for meeting the needs of feed deficit areas, and is giving sympathetic study to the establishment, under provincial administration but with federal financial assistance, of a forage bank program.

And the Prime Minister added:

> This particular portion of the enunciated policy has not been carried out as yet.

A fourth point had to do with the farm credit legislation. The P.F.R.A. was amended last year. I would say that it now affords farmers the opportunity of getting deeper into debt for a longer period of time. However, they cannot get short term loans for a more efficient production, as was requested by farm associations.

A fifth point had to do with the program to meet the needs of small farmers, and the Prime Minister said:

> The government has under consideration ways and means of improving their level of living for farmers on small farms by means of better land use, encouraging the formation of economic family farm units, improving technical training—
> That particular portion—

Said the Prime Minister—

> —is still under consideration.

As for the sixth point, the main feature referred to by the Prime Minister, and to which he attached the greatest importance, was about deficiency payments to western producers of wheat, oats and barley. He said in his statement of March 4 last, as recorded on page 1768 of Hansard the following:

> In August, 1958 I set out the reasons why in our opinion, deficiency payments were not the answer to the western farm situation. I am not going to repeat those reasons. They can be found at page 4306 of Hansard of that date.
> These proposals, as we consider, after giving the matter the fullest and most comprehensive study, tend to neglect the needs of the smaller farmers. They provide no aid to the farmer who has suffered a crop failure. They give little to the mixed farmer and livestock raiser who markets a limited amount of wheat.

And reading farther down, we come now to the Prime Minister's refusal to entertain the demands of western farmers. Here is what he said:

> However attractive it is to secure that amount of money to be distributed among the western farmers whose needs I know, and whose requests I view with more than usual sympathy, the proposals had weaknesses. The most grave weakness is that the payment of deficiency payments would not touch the fundamental problems of the farmer on the land.

Thus was the Prime Minister refusing to yield to the demands of western farmers. However, here is the statement the Prime Minister made to the delegation of 1100 western farmers who came to Ottawa to submit their grievances on March 10, 1959:

(Text):

Now, ladies and gentlemen, I repeat that, in so far as your representations are concerned, they will receive the fullest and most complete and continuing consideration. I am glad you came.

(Translation):

Further down, he went on to say:

(Text):

I say this, it will be my undeviating purpose and that of those associated with me to do what we can to assure that degree of prosperity for agriculture without which the Canadian economy cannot be maintained.

(Translation):

Since that visit of the western farmers, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) has been urging the Prime Minister to give a reply to Canada's farmers. Six days short of a year later, that is on Friday March 4, a negative reply was given, despite the fact that the Prime Minister recognized the needs of the western farmers and viewed them with more than usual sympathy.

To use a favourite expression of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), I might say that it took the Prime Minister a year to lay an egg, and a cracked one at that.

Mr. Chairman, after having expressed all his sympathy to the western farmers, the Prime Minister, in a flight of lofty oratory, said this, as witness page 1766 of Hansard for March 4, 1960:

When we assumed office one of the first things we did was to examine the agricultural policies that had existed for a number of years under the former government. During many of those years the Progressive Conservative party insisted there was a need of basic reform measures in agriculture. We maintain that the very cornerstone of national development is a dynamic and flexible national agricultural policy.

Following that viewpoint we introduced, pursuant to the national agricultural policy of the government a long range farm policy comprehensive and co-ordinated. We did not in doing so neglect regional interests. We recognized in the most fundamental terms the national requirement that men and women on the land be given their right to a fair share of the national income.

Mr. Chairman, there are no bounds to the pompous, inaccurate, fallacious and inconsiderate statements of the Prime Minister and of the Minister of Agriculture.

I shall prove to you in a few moments what the real position of the farmer is like in this country. I shall show that he receives less for his work than he ever did during the years of Liberal regime.

And what about the Minister of Agriculture? Since the beginning of the year, he has travelled across the country, and attended farmers' meetings and conventions. He has received delegations and briefs, and whenever he had the opportunity to speak, he tried to justify his government's farm policy.

At the federal-provincial economic conference, which took place here in Ottawa, he stated:

The farm industry has had its share of the economic recovery which started in 1958 and went on in 1959.

He told delegates at the congress of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture that revenues from the sale of farm products for the first three quarters of 1959 were $40 million more than in 1958, whereas he knew as a fact that the year's end would show a decrease.

Read the speeches he made in this house since the opening of parliament. Whenever he makes comparisons, the Minister of Agriculture quotes figures that suit his purpose. Whenever he deals with farm income, his comparisons hinge on figures for 1957. When he compares prices of certain farm commodities, he selects those he likes, of any country in the world, to compare them with our own.

(Text):

Mr. Kindt: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Boulanger: After I finish my speech I will be glad to answer any question the hon. member may have.

Such subterfuge and evasions, to hoodwink the agricultural class must be looked upon with disgust and revolt by economists and right-thinking people.

The attitude of the Minister of Agriculture is understandable, Mr. Chairman. It reminds me of a trapped animal, sensing its approaching doom. It struggles and yelps until it is destroyed.

In 1960, farmers are being led into the same fix, the same trap as in the years 1930-1935, by a minister suffering from chronic obsession of camouflage and denial of promises.

Mr. Chairman, I shall picture the true situation of our farmers such as it used to be and such as it is now. And if my criticism is unpalatable to my Conservative colleagues, it means that it is accurate and to the point.

I realize that, because some of it might well be bitter, there will be hon. members who will think I am playing politics. As we have already seen, those members are narrow-minded people who do not understand anything about democracy. If the party of which I am a member was at the head of an oppressive government, such as the one now at the head of this country, I would be the first to denounce it.

Our role in the opposition is to criticize, to show up the weaknesses of the government, and heaven knows there are plenty of them. We are doing this in the interest of all classes of society and, for my part, it is the agricultural class I wish to defend.

Mr. Chairman, the history of agriculture in the last three years may be divided in three phases.

The first one is pre-electoral, and to sum up the attitude which the Prime Minister and the Conservative members and candidates took at the time, I shall simply quote a sentence spoken by the Prime Minister, which epitomizes all his promises. The sentence was uttered in Massey hall, on April 27, 1957. Here it is:

(Text):

We will assure the farmer of his fair share of the national income by maintaining a flexible—and I underline the word "flexible"—price support program to ensure an adequate parity for agricultural producers based on a fair price-cost relationship.

(Translation):

It was on that theme that the government and the Conservative candidates launched their election campaign.

Now, let us consider the 1958 session at the second stage; the government pased the Agricultural Stabilization Act which is summarized in the preamble reading as follows:

Whereas it is expedient to enact a measure for the purpose of stabilizing the prices of agricultural commodities in order to assist the industry of agriculture to realize fair returns for its labour and investment, and to maintain a fair relationship between prices received by farmers and the costs of the goods and services that they buy, thus to provide farmers with a fair share of the national revenue—

In short, the purport of that act was to attempt to find a formula that might give farmers fair returns for their commodities in relation to the cost of production. This act was carried unanimously.

But on February 22 last, on a motion to go into supply, an amendment was introduced by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson). We are now at the third stage in the farming history of the Conservative party. The amendment reads as follows:

This house is of the opinion that the government should give immediate consideration to the implementation of agricultural policies designed for the purpose of stabilizing the prices of agricultural commodities in order to assist the industry of agriculture to realize fair returns for its labour and investment, and to maintain a fair relationship between prices received by farmers and the costs of the goods and services that they buy, thus to provide farmers with a fair share of the national income.

The amendment was debated for two days and defeated by a vote of 172 to 48. In other words, Conservative members reneged on the government's opinion, their promises, their own legislation and betrayed farmers generally.

Now what has come out of this agricultural policy? Mr. Chairman, I should like to give figures to prove, as I have said at the beginning of my remarks, that under the Liberal government farmers were getting more than they have been getting for the last three years under a Conservative regime.

I shall quote from the Current Review of March 1960—I do not have a French version. Here is a paragraph on page 3:

(Text):

Net income of farm operators from farming operations in 1959 is estimated at $1,189.4 million which is 7 per cent below the preliminary 1958 figure—

Mr. Harkness: Finish reading that—12 per cent above 1957.

Mr. Boulanger: I am talking about 1958.

Mr. Harkness: You do not like to talk about 1957.

Mr. Boulanger: The Minister of Agriculture said in Toronto at a meeting of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture that farm net income in 1959 would be higher than 1958. That is why I am telling the minister that net income is 7 per cent less than 1958. I know it is 12 per cent higher than 1957.

(Translation):

I know the Minister of Agriculture does not like to be reminded of the truth in this House of Commons because he has always resorted to half-truths, but I shall prove to him that the sale of farm products brought lower returns to farmers in 1958 than in 1957. To that end I shall use information supplied by the government itself.

On March 8 last, I asked the Department of Trade and Commerce about the selling price of wheat for the years 1947 to 1956 inclusive, and also the average price for the years 1957, 1958 and 1959 inclusive. Here is the list I received in reply.

In the last 10 years of Liberal administration, farmers were getting $1.49 a bushel for their wheat; under the Conservative administration, the average was $1.23. Under the Liberal administration, farmers were getting $1.00 a bushel for their barley; while under the Conservative administration, they have been getting 75 cents.

Mr. Michaud: The price keeps going down.

Mr. Boulanger: Oats, under the Liberal administration, sold at 65.6 cents, and under Conservative administration, at 53 cents. Grain, under Liberal administration, sold at $3.36 a bushel, and under Conservative administration, at $2.67. Hogs, under Liberal administration—this is an average covering the years 1947 to 1956—sold at $27.16 per hundredweight, and under Conservative administration, at $26.19.

Mr. Michaud: It is going down all the time.

Mr. Boulanger: Eggs, over the last 10 years, sold at an average price of 41.6 cents a dozen; under the Conservatives, eggs sold at 35 cents.

Mr. Pigeon: Not over a 10-year period.

Mr. Boulanger: And here is the answer to another of my inquiries from the Department of Agriculture on March 8, 1960.

Some hon. Members: Tell us about butter, yes, butter.

Mr. Boulanger: I had enquired about the average cost of eggs for the years 1949 to 1959 inclusive. Here is what is said on the cost of eggs in 1959:

And the price quoted for Canada as a whole in 1959 is 29.2 cents. A quick look in the past, in 1958 for instance, shows that the price was then 32.7 cents. In 1957, it was 31.4 cents.

On the other hand, under the Liberal government—we are now falling under the Liberal government—

Mr. Parizeau: You could not put it more accurately; you did fall—

Mr. Boulanger: —1956, 38.1 cents; 1955, 38.1 cents; 1954, 33.7 cents; 1953, 43 cents.

Further back, we find prices of 39.4, 34.9 and 48.1 cents. That was under the Liberal administration.

An hon. Member: There was no unemployment at the time.

Mr. Paul: Will the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Boulanger: I said earlier that I will answer questions when I am through with my remarks.

An hon. Member: The hon. member will be saying he barely has time to finish.

Some hon. Members: What about butter?

Mr. Boulanger: Some time ago, I met a lady in my district who discussed the price of eggs with me and asked me if I could not—

An hon. Member: Twin-yolked eggs.

[Mr. Boulanger.]

Mr. Boulanger: —she was asking me whether I could make representations to the Minister of Agriculture so he might consider establishing an allowance for fowl.

Mr. Chairman, city people have just as much cause to worry about the farming situation, because their interests are directly connected with the solution of farm problems which may affect the price of food and the level of taxation.

Somebody must benefit from the difference between prices paid to the farmer for his produce, and those paid by the consumer; the middleman is the one who benefits. The cost of marketing farm products has risen by 84 per cent between 1949 and 1958.

For the year 1957, the rate of revenue from investments, after tax deduction, is distributed as follows, and the figures I quote are from a report of the royal commission on price spreads. For the retail business as a whole, a net profit of 9.8 per cent was indicated; the over all net revenue of wholesalers was 11.1 per cent; and for the over all profit of the manufacturing industry we find 10.7 per cent. Among those industries, three were manufacturing breakfast foods and declared a net profit of 29.2 per cent.

I could go on and take the net profit figures for dairy products processors section, which declared a profit of 10.9 per cent. If the farmer was treated in the same fair way as was promised by the Prime Minister, he would, with an investment of $25,000 to $30,000, which today is by no means exaggerated, get a revenue of $3,000 to $4,000 even if we take the lowest rate accruing to private enterprise.

The government chose to appoint this royal commission on price spreads for food products, but is in no hurry to put its recommendations into practice.

An explanation from the Minister of Agriculture, or the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) as to the position of the government in this matter would be of great significance.

Let us do away with the old theme: "Parity not charity" and sing another one, the theme of justice.

The 1956 census indicates that at least one third of those who are registered as farmers received cash returns of less than $1,200 a year, or $23.20 a week.

Last year, Dr. Mel Andal, an economist of the Department of Agriculture, said when he submitted a brief to a Senate committee on land use, that one third of 575,015 farmers in Canada were living on submarginal farms.

The "Co-operative fédérée" stated that the annual income of Quebec farmers in 1957 was $1,554, which represents a wage of $30 a week, while the purchasing power of workers increased by 30 per cent.

The province of Saskatchewan, in a brief submitted to the same commission—

The Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I must tell him that his time has expired.

Mr. Boulanger: With your permission, Mr. Chairman, may I have three or four minutes more?

(Text):

Some hon. Members: Agreed, agreed.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Yes. Agreed.

(Text):

The Chairman: Has the hon. member consent to carry on?

Some hon. Members: Agreed, agreed.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. The province of Saskatchewan, in a brief submitted to the same committee, said that in 1951, one third to one half of the 103,000 farmers of the province lacked adequate revenue to support their families. In 1958, according to the same report, the situation was even worse.

I have before me a report, prepared by the authorities of Macdonald College in January 1960, showing farmer's incomes.

The report, which is based on figures—they are estimates, of course—of the dominion bureau of statistics, indicates that in 1959, the net income for the whole of Canada was $1,200 million.

Adding up the figures for the last three years of Conservative administration, I arrive at the following results: the average income over the last three years, namely 1957, 1958 and 1959, was $1,176 million.

Now, taking the figures for the last ten years under a Liberal administration, I arrive at a total of $1,460 million.

In other words, the average net income on the sale of agricultural products over the last three years under a Conservative government, has dropped by $284 million.

Mr. Chairman, in quoting these figures, I am aware that the Minister of Agriculture can check them and try to deny my point. However, the figures are taken from a report published by the dominion bureau of statistics, and I wanted to draw them to the minister's attention.

Yet in the face of such evidence, there are still members in this house who have the gall to say that the agricultural situation in Canada, and particularly in the province of Quebec, is fine, and that farmers are quite happy.

Mr. Chairman, we would have expected that, in view of present conditions, the government would have announced new legislation, or would have introduced a new program to correct the situation, but it has taken no action.

The agricultural situation in Canada is like a ship that is lost in the fog, at sea, with the Minister of Agriculture at the helm. He has so tampered with the compass of election promises that he put it out of commission. The crew stands by, watching the skipper struggling along, and dare not say a word lest the already precarious situation of their ship become worse. That is what the Conservative members are doing except for two mountebanks who try to amuse them with nonsensical acrobatics. The member for Rosthern (Mr. Nasserden) did try, however, to steer his skipper away from some of the reefs, but the skipper refused to put the tiller hard over.

The situation is not hopeless. It is a matter of appealing to farm organizations, universities, co-operatives, agronomists and leading farmers; of listening to them and sitting down with them to consider their suggestions. If the farmer is discouraged today, if young people no longer want to remain on the farm and if so many farms are abandoned, the fault lies nowhere but in the discriminatory policy of the Conservative government toward the farm people.

Promises were made but not kept.

The farm legislation passed by the Liberal government to ensure the farmers fair returns for their trouble and their work has been completely upset.

The present government's obvious disregard for farm policy, in favour of trade and commerce, has caused the chaotic and desperate situation that is facing us today.

Like the various farm organizations throughout the country that submitted briefs to the government, I express the hope that the Minister of Agriculture will give consideration to and put into practice the good advice they contain.

Unless the government makes a survey of farm conditions in co-operation with the experts I just mentioned, that is, university professors, managers of co-operatives, agronomists and leading farmers, and unless an over-all plan is established to reintegrate agriculture into our economy, the farming sector will collapse.

Farmers will have no alternative but to quit the land or to keep hoping that one day, men of intelligence and courage who are conscious of their responsibility will take over the job. Indeed, that day should not be too remote by now.

Mr. Paul: Would the hon. member allow a question?

Mr. Boulanger: With pleasure.

Mr. Paul: The hon. member has given many figures with regard to the marketing of farm products. Could he tell us whether he has forgotten to mention statistics for butter?

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I shall be pleased to deal with the butter question and I shall remind my hon. friend of the statement which the Minister of Agriculture made last April 13, when he said that the farm price stabilization board was keeping the butter price at the same level, that is, at 64 cents a pound. Moreover, he said—

Mr. Rompre: You should compare it with the previous years.

An hon. Member: Wait a minute, and you will be able to learn something.

Mr. Boulanger: The Minister of Agriculture also said:

> The price support for butter during the dairy year May 1, 1960 to April 30, 1961 will be 64 cents per pound for Canada first grade creamery butter scoring 40-93, basis delivery Montreal, with appropriate price differentials for other grades and qualities.

Mr. Chairman, that statement would indicate that this year's price would be 64 cents a pound for first grade butter, and, when the quality of the product falls down to 39-92, the price will fall accordingly. Yet the Minister of Agriculture stated in this house that the price for farm products would remain on the same basis as last year, which is inaccurate.

In the province of Quebec, about one sixth of the total butter production may be classified in category 40-93, while the remaining five sixths is of lower quality.

That is the result of the agricultural policy of the Conservative government, that selfsame policy that the Conservative members from the province of Quebec are applauding. That is just what they did when the minister made that statement, and I am sure that no one on the government side, understood that.

Mr. Paul: Would the hon. member allow a supplementary question? I do not know whether he did it wilfully or not, but he did not see fit to give the comparative figures I had asked about the price of butter in 1957, 1958 and 1959, and in former years. That is the question I had put to him.

An hon. Member: You are slipping on Mr. Bennett's butter.

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Chairman, are we making a court case out of this?

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I am pleased—

Mr. Pigeon: It was then 58 cents a pound.

An hon. Member: Listen and you will learn a lot.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, if the cost price is taken into account, the price of 64 cents a pound is not higher than that of 50 or 54 cents, as it was six, seven or eight years ago, and I will prove it to you.

An hon. Member: Tell us something about the price of 25 cents a 100 pounds for milk.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I apologize if I have addressed myself to the other side of the house. The cost price index has increased by 16.9 per cent over that of last year. This year, from January to February, that is for a period of 30 days, it has gone up 2.9 per cent.

I would ask the Minister of Agriculture to check my figures; if they are not correct, I shall be glad to withdraw what I said.

The price of 64 cents a pound for butter is not higher today than that of 48, 50 and 54 cents, as it was six, seven or eight years ago.

(Text):

Mr. Herridge: Before proceeding with my remarks in connection with these estimates I want to say on behalf of this group that we appreciate the good work that is being done by the staff of the Department of Agriculture at the headquarters in Ottawa, at the various experimental stations and throughout the country. I might say that until quite recently there were several members of this staff who were old classmates or college mates of mine, but they have all retired and vanished from the scene. I am the only antique member of that generation gyrating around here at the present time.

I want to say that the study of the agricultural development in Canada is to me fascinating. I have read the history of this country from a number of sources, and I have always found it interesting. I think possibly that is because I come from pioneer stock. I have known what it was to take two dozen eggs to the store in a lard pail in order to get a package of tobacco and two boxes of matches. I therefore speak from experience as a pioneer settler. I have a keen appreciation of the problems of the smaller ranchers in particular.

However, the history of agriculture in this country is a most interesting study, dealing as it does with the early settlers in Quebec, in the maritimes, then later in Ontario, then along the coast of British Columbia and Vancouver island, then later the settlements in central British Columbia and in the southern interior valleys with which I am most acquainted. These valleys were settled by people who in the early days principally supplied the local market for beef, dairy products, small fruits and vegetables. That local market has been destroyed in recent years by certain influences in this country. The hon. member for Vancouver East will deal particularly with that problem later this afternoon; my remarks are going to be somewhat general.

This settlement in the interior valleys of British Columbia included many types of people, some with experience and some without. In any event they were sturdy, happy pioneers of many races, including a good number of people from our neighbour province of Quebec, who went out there in the early days. Those valleys were settled by people who were attracted by the climate, the scenery, the fishing, the hunting and their hope, at least, of the opportunity of making a reasonable living in good circumstances.

In following the hon. member who has just spoken I want to mention this matter in order to show the close relationship this group has with Canadians of French descent, and our appreciation of their problems. I enjoyed the speech made by the hon. member who has just spoken. I want to say that the district from which I come is extremely interesting in that respect. When David Thompson discovered the Columbia river, his boats were rowed by Canadians of French descent. The first agriculturist we had in the Arrow lakes area was an old gentleman of French descent by the name of Nels Demers who stayed in that country alone, after the Hudson's Bay Company left, from 1866 until such settlers of whom I am speaking arrived in the early days of this century. I cared for that old gentleman prior to his death. He was the first agriculturist in the area. I am glad to say that we have two small communities named after him, namely East and West Demers. I knew a gentleman of French Canadian descent who was also a small rancher and was the first shipbuilder in the area; he was named Blondin. As a matter of fact a creek that flows through my ranch is named after him because of our friendship and our great respect for him. Those were happy pioneer days. Conditions are entirely different today.

I cannot help living in the past on occasion. I knew another Canadian of French descent who was an early pioneer rancher and a prominent Liberal. One day just prior to the 1945 election he said to me, "I am president of the Liberal association and I work hard for my party, but I want to tell you this. We have known one another for nearly 50 years and I am praying like hell for you". I won the election. Hence I have had some valuable assistance from my constituents of French descent.

I am coming around to my general theme in a few minutes. Anyway, some of these people arrived with capital, some with small assured incomes; but as to others, the only assets they had was grit and the determination to succeed. All of them, whether they were of British stock or not—and I may say, in case anybody does not know, that I came originally from the old country—had a sense of humour; they were fond of animals, particularly horses, and some were overfond of the ladies. But this combination of settlers from Britain and people coming from French Canada built the farmer and co-operative movement; it was the foundation of the co-operatives which developed in connection with the fruit industry of British Columbia.

I mention these things to show what can be done on the basis of mutual co-operation and understanding. When I hear all this talk about Quebec and Ontario and British Columbia, from my point of view it seems to be all tommy-rot. As far as I am concerned we are all Canadians first.

There are, of course many different types of Canadians, and before I proceed I might mention, in order to illustrate the difference in these types, that a Kootenay rancher is entirely different from those to be found in other parts of Canada. For the first ten years when some people occupied the land, they kept the farm. Afterwards, with experience they became ranchers and graduated to the point where the farm kept them. On one occasion a dear old gentleman asked me to go and see his cows. He had been a secretary-valet to a well-known noble lord in Britain and had come out to this country to settle. He was a Christian gentleman with a great love of animals, anxious to learn all he could about farming. He had attended a meeting addressed by some official of the federal department of agriculture, who told him that if he wanted to get the greatest possible milk production the cows had to be kept comfortable. The more comfortable they were, the more milk they would produce. One day he came to my place in the middle of the winter—we had a cold spell and the temperature was one or two degrees below zero, a somewhat unusual occurrence in our part of the country, I must say—and asked me to come and see what he had done to keep his cows comfortable. He had commanded his wife to make up blankets to cover the animals; then he had contrived something after the fashion of tea cozies which he used to cover the udders. Then he finished the whole thing off by having puttees very nicely made out of sacking. When I had admired all this he asked me, "After all that, don't you think I should get more milk?" I agreed with him.

I mention this to illustrate the various types of settlers we had at that time. Those were different days. The wants of the pioneers were simple and costs were low. They were catering, on the whole, to local markets which were growing at that time, the mining industry and the developing forest industry. Today the situation is entirely different. We have machine production, high capital investment and high costs. One cannot go on the prairies now and get 160 acres and start farming with an expectation of getting anywhere. Nor would it be of any use attempting to begin with the small amount of capital which once was sufficient. A high capital investment requires abundant credit, and we are increasingly dependent on export markets. In British Columbia this is particularly true with regard to the marketing of fruit and other commodities.

Agriculture is without doubt in a crisis, and I am of the opinion we are not going to solve the problem in Canada if we treat it on a partisan basis. This group makes its contribution in this house with respect to agriculture in an effort to find some common and satisfactory solution. I think we should not underestimate the difficulties and complexities in the changing industrial society in which we are living—

An hon. Member: You are not speaking for your group, but for yourself.

Mr. Herridge: The hon. gentleman does not realize that I am expressing a general approach to agricultural problems on behalf of our party this morning.

There is no doubt that we face a serious crisis in agriculture in the years ahead unless there is some appropriate action and leadership by federal and provincial governments. In a democratic society they must give some leadership in the right direction. First, in our opinion, we have to decide the place and value of the family farm in our society. I am a great believer in the family farm. I am one of those persons who deplore human beings becoming robots and I recognize, as do the other members of this group, the values which have sprung from family farms and rural communities throughout the generations in the history of this country.

In this connection I should like to quote from a book which I have been reading and which I have found most interesting. It is called "The Failure of Success—The American Crisis in Values" and the author is Esther Milner. I advise anyone to get a copy who is interested in studying the circumstances under which we live and the problems we face at this time, problems which cannot be solved by short-run methods. I want to quote from this book, because I am one of those who do not see everything as black or white, whether in regard to international or domestic affairs. I believe that in a democratic society all sections can make some contribution to the solution of any problem, whether it is unemployment or farm markets or the maintenance of the family farm, providing democratic governments give some leadership and thought to the problem. On page 17 there is a passage in this book which reads as follows:

> I find it the colossal irony of our times that the hostility of the two major antagonists on the world scene originates in their mutual commitment to the same philosophic fallacy, the doctrine of "economic man." Both the United States and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics espouse social ideals of the highest order, but in practice the leaders and the people of both countries believe that the economic aspects of man's life are not merely of primary but of ultimate importance. Our disagreement lies essentially in our insistence that our own economic system is the better pathway to the goal—but the goal is essentially the same: "On both sides it is asserted that the only, or at any rate the main objective of nations should be industrial prosperity. This is implied in the dogma of economic materialism, which forms the basis of both these systems, ostensibly opposed as they are.

I think there is a lot of truth in that statement. The subquotation continues:

> "And as these theories merely reflect the state of public sentiment, industry, which was formerly regarded as one means to a higher end, has become the supreme end for individuals as well as for whole societies."
> Although the writer of these words was speaking of what at his time were two economic theories only, his words have proved more prophetic than he could have realized. Emile Durkheim wrote these words in the 1890's, twenty five years before the formation of the U.S.S.R. and nearly sixty years before our current international stalemate.

I have read that paragraph, which I think is most informative, to indicate that our attention must be directed to several problems in our society, and that the economic problem is only one line of advance toward a solution. In my opinion the improvement and development of the family farm offers an opportunity to preserve the traditional values of our society, to preserve a contribution of real value while at the same time stabilizing at a satisfactory level the economic position of our farmers in a changing, industrial society.

In saying this I am not overlooking economic security for all groups in our country. In dealing with these questions as parliamentarians, with possibly the greatest responsibility of any parliament in our history, we have to move ahead on a number of parallel lines of which economic improvement is only one. However, one of these lines is a program that will provide economic security for our farmers.

Conditions have developed rapidly since the termination of world war II, and there is no question but that the policies of federal and provincial governments have been unrelated in a number of fields. I am not criticizing the emergency measures which have come into being to meet the problems of depression, war, inflation and drought. The major problem now is surpluses. In view of this group the measures have been emergency, piecemeal and unrelated to one another. There is no evidence of a planned over-all national policy based on a long range approach to economic and sociological facts.

I am not blaming individuals or particular governments. To some extent governments, organizations and individuals are victims of circumstances that have arisen in recent years. But there is no evidence of a sound approach to the genuine happiness sought by all mankind. This is not found purely in the pursuit of monetary values. Happiness embraces a contentment in the pursuit of a useful occupation, a love of nature and satisfactory relations with human beings.

On the one hand government and research workers, to whom I give all credit, are devoting themselves to knowledge and methods which increase production and surpluses and at the same time depopulate the farms and rural communities. Other government agencies are providing credit to apply this new knowledge and these new methods to an expanding production. On the other hand the federal government, with price supports and deficiency payment policies, is limiting production. We have this agricultural team pulling in opposite directions, with the horse representing the scientists going ahead but the horse representing the marketing policy sitting back on its haunches. There is contradiction in over-all agricultural policy that is difficult to avoid without planning. The problems this creates increase daily. A number of small farmers are unable to make a living through failure to adjust to these changed circumstances. They cannot meet the forces at work as the result of our lack of an over-all agricultural policy.

I have never accepted the philosophy of the worship of bigness, size or quantity. I know there is an attraction to large scale industry, huge production and size in anything. I have known a man to enter a room full of ordinary people, and when it was whispered that he was worth $10 million it seemed to establish an aura around him. People are hypnotized by wealth, numbers and size, which in my opinion represents an unsound approach to life, instead of being hypnotized by character, intelligence and industry. However, that is all part of the evolution of the capitalist society.

Of course we do not see things in black and white. There has to be some common ground between the extremes if there is to be a solution. We can learn from our past history and from the practices of the present in other countries.

We find a lack of concern for agricultural human resources. Some people are not fazed by the thought of doing away with the number of farmers. This is accepted by people without thinking of the impact on our society and the contribution made by farmers to our national development. I have met many farmers. Many are without clear objectives and a sense of direction. They are confused by the fog of the circumstances under which they live. I think it is also fair to say that many farm organizations lack over-all agreement as to the policies best suited to correct the situation, but all agree on the value of the economic family farm. That is a good starting point on which they all agree. They feel that because of its value the family farm should be preserved.

In that connection I want to quote briefly from the brief of the interprovincial farm union council presented to the federal government on February 17, 1960, the second paragraph of which states:

> We believe that an agricultural industry based on the concept of the family farm can best serve the national interest of Canada. To maintain the industry on this basis requires a clearly defined agricultural policy.
> On October 14, 1959, addressing the farm equipment institute's 66th annual meeting in Montreal, Quebec, the Minister of Agriculture, Hon. Douglas S. Harkness, stated as follows:
> "The agricultural policy of the Canadian government is designed to ensure that the average economic producer will secure a standard of living comparable to that of people in other industries, and thus ensure a healthy agriculture, with sufficient production to meet our own needs and those of export markets."
> Under the combined circumstances of rising farm costs and declining farm prices, we submit that the realization of this stated objective cannot be attained.

I support this question posed to the government in the brief:

> Are federal agricultural policies to be enacted that will aim at the preservation of widely distributed private ownership of productive assets, enabling men to maintain themselves and their families on their farms, or does the federal government intend to let those economic forces have free play, that encourage the trend to anonymous, corporate ownership with all its inherent dangers?

There is a general realization among farming people and others in Canada that the family farm is a necessary productive unit in our society, because it has proved its value.

What are we going to do about the problem? I said that farmers lack purpose and direction, and that farm organizations have failed to agree in general on a solution to the question. Federal and provincial governments lack accord with respect to a common policy. We also have disagreement among individual farmers because of differences in their experience or training and the circumstances under which they live. This great industry is drifting in a sea of day to day expediency on the part of government, farm organizations and farmers themselves. All have been forced into this state of expediency because of the lack of planned over-all national policy for agriculture related to the facts and the circumstances of our time.

I pay tribute to what is being done; I do not underestimate it. I recognize the value of the marketing legislation that has been passed by governments as the result of prodding by agricultural organizations. I recognize the value of the credit facilities provided by the federal government and some provincial governments. I recognize the value of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, which has done a great work in that field. I recognize the value of the Praire Farm Assistance Act and the Maritime Marshland Rehabilitation Act. However, all this work that is being done on a piecemeal basis is based largely on expediency so far as the federal and provincial governments are concerned. I wish to pay tribute to those who conceived these policies and have given effect to them, and also to those who have responsibility for administering them. However, Mr. Chairman, in our opinion a satisfactory and effective long term, sound agricultural policy can result only from research into all the facts, and we lack that. You cannot design a satisfactory policy without knowledge, without the facts.

As I said before, I pay tribute to our scientists in the agricultural service and in universities who are engaged full time in meeting day to day problems, whether in the field of production, marketing and so on. But what is required—our farmers' organizations have touched on it to a limited extent up to now and I think the agricultural institute of Canada has been dealing with this question possibly in more detail in recent years—in the opinion of this group is an independent farm policy agency. We need the facts; we need some organization to get the facts, to get the truth—not propaganda, not opinion, but the facts—upon which to base for a number of years a satisfactory national agricultural policy. We need the facts with respect to land available and land resources, the productive capacity of this land, the markets, the transportation and all the other factors, shall I say, that relate agriculture to the rest of the community.

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, on behalf of this group that this government should immediately sponsor a Canadian farm policy research foundation. We suggest this because we believe the more governments secure the co-operation of the organizations representing the farmers and of other governments on as wide a scale as possible, the sounder will be the approach in a democratic society. We believe that such a foundation should include representatives of governments, both federal and provincial; it should include representatives of the agricultural institute of Canada, which is a professional organization of registered agriculturists in this country, with a lot of good men in its membership and a lot of experience gained throughout the years; it should include representatives from the staffs of the universities and representatives of the farm organizations. I suggest in that group of persons you have a—

The Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Herridge: May I just add two sentences?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Herridge: I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that if we can approach this problem in that spirit, using the intellectual resources we have available and the experience we have in abundance, with the good will of all parties, we can have a co-operative and planned study, a planned program of agricultural research upon which a national agricultural policy can be founded, because we will then have the knowledge and we will have the facts. With that we will have an understanding of the problem, and we will have secured that knowledge in an atmosphere of co-operation which is essential for the application of the national policy that will be the result of that study.

Mr. Speakman: Mr. Chairman, before making my few remarks I wish to comment on some of the remarks of the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska. During the course of his remarks he spoke as though his party were very strongly in favour of deficiency payments. I ask him, what was the attitude of his party in the years 1946 to 1957, and the reply of his party to the farm representations made over those years in response to the promises which the government of which he was a supporter made during the war years when it said, "Hold the line and we will see that you get full payment, gentlemen"? I believe he will admit with me that the representations now being made have accumulated from the days of the government of which he was a supporter.

May I call it one o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Speakman: Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose for the luncheon adjournment I had been mentioning some of the things said by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska. In his remarks he made some comparison of prices with reference to the time that the previous administration was in office but what he failed to mention was the fact that from 1950 onward prices of these products steadily declined and production compared with consumption rose very sharply. He said that government members were complacent about the agricultural situation. I should like to tell the hon. member that we are not, that members on the government side who represent rural constituencies are no more complacent than anyone else. We know there is a problem but we do know that the government, the first in a long time to do so, is making an honest attempt to find a solution under a very capable and honest minister.

During the Easter recess I drove some 1,200 miles through my constituency in central Alberta and talked to farmers, elevator agents, municipal and county authorities and small businessmen. The 1959 crop, a very small percentage of which was taken off during the harvest season last year, was coming off quite well with the exception that losses in the amount of production amounted to about 20 to 25 per cent and losses in quality were about the same. As a result farmers were harvesting less than they would have got if harvesting had been normal.

I would not say that they were discouraged because they feel that the government will look for some method to assist them. Farmers who took off their grain during the last harvest season had grain that was in a damp or tough condition and they have suffered losses for that reason. I think there is a very real need at the present time for some type of assistance. I have been getting letters constantly from the farmers union of Alberta and the locals in my constituency, all of which make the same plea that I have made before and repeat today. I think it is time for the government to consider very seriously repeating the acreage payment that was made in 1958, namely $1 an acre to a maximum of 200 acres. I feel this would afford real relief at a time when it is most needed. In the area I represent the farmers average 300 acres or less. This means that these people need assistance, particularly in view of the fact that they have suffered a partial and in some cases very substantial loss so far as their 1959 crop is concerned.

I should also like to bring to the attention of the minister and the government an idea which has been put to use in the United States. I read about it this morning in a publication of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and I think the government should give some consideration to it. I have here the news and information bulletin of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and on page 5 there is reference to the United States conservation reserve program under which an annual rental running from $11.53 to $11.75 per acre is paid.

We have in Canada, particularly in the west, areas that have been in crop production for a good many years and where a conservation reserve of this type would enable the replacing of valuable soil elements which constant production has taken from the land. We also have areas which at one time were in forest and are now under agricultural production but which I think could well be reforested. We have great hopes, of course, with respect to the new department of forestry which it is proposed to set up because in that area millions and millions of feet of lumber used to be produced. That production has now disappeared and our lumbering industry has also disappeared with it. I would hope that the government would have a look at this conservation reserve program and the taking out of production of land which has been farmed so long and also land which is basically not suited to agricultural production.

Mr. Michaud: Mr. Chairman, I have already had occasion in previous debates on the subject of agriculture earlier in the session to make known some of my views on this problem. There are, however, a few more observations that I should like to make at this time pertaining to the item now before the committee. On March 4 when these estimates were introduced into the house the Prime Minister had this to say on agriculture, as found at page 1766 of Hansard:

> We believe that agriculture is one of the most important sectors of the Canadian economy; that the prosperity of agriculture is an integral part of Canadian prosperity; that governments do have a responsibility in the constructive and effective manner to strengthen Canadian agriculture for in doing so the economy as a whole is strengthened. We believe that the national interest can best be served if we endeavour to do our utmost to develop efficiently and economically our resources, including agriculture; that farmers should have continuing opportunities to earn sufficient income to enjoy the benefits of our rapidly growing economy and the rising standards of living enjoyed by the population as a whole; and that a reasonably high and stable level of farm income is an essential prerequisite to a high level of employment and income in Canada generally.

I wholly subscribe to the views expressed in that quotation and, as applied to the agricultural situation in the maritime provinces particularly, I think that every effort should be made to stimulate agriculture.

This is a point about which I feel very strongly. I have already said in this house, and I repeat at this time, that if we ever find a solution to the agricultural problems which exist in the maritime provinces we will have gone a long way toward the solution of the unemployment problem in that area. It is known to everybody that unemployment is the main curse that we have to face in the maritimes, and if we have to accept the views expressed in the quotation I have just given as reported in a speech by the Prime Minister on March 4 it would be evident that special efforts would have to be made, as I just mentioned a minute ago, to stimulate agriculture in the maritime provinces. Agriculture is one of the main industries in that area, and unless we adopt ways and means of keeping our farm population on the farms we can expect that the unemployment problem will remain with us in a very acute manner.

The present government, in attempting to solve some of the agricultural problems which we are facing today, last October applied deficiency payments to the poultry industry and last January applied deficiency payments to pork. Speaking on this item in a previous debate I expressed serious doubts that the aims sought by that legislation would be attained, particularly as applied to the poultry industry. I wondered if that policy would not be self-defeating and if instead of discouraging the big producers it would discourage the small producers. Since that time a statement has been published by the Canadian Poultry Review, which I now hold in my hand on that very subject. It would seem that the quotation which I am about to give would support the contention that it is the smaller producer who is being discouraged, who is being squeezed out of the industry, whereas the large producer remains in business.

These statistics cover 45 Ontario hatcheries and the report covers a period from October 1, 1959 to February 28, 1960, in respect of chick orders. Here are the statistics: In 1958-59, the number of orders for flocks under 500 was 1,068 for a total of 285,133 chicks. During the same period in 1959-60 the number of orders had declined to 613 for a total of 167,000 chicks. For flocks from 500 to 1,500 the number of orders in 1958-59 was 640, for a total number of 503,000 chicks. During the same period in 1959-60 the number of orders declined to 468 for a total of 386,000 chicks. For flocks over 1,500, in 1958-59 the total orders amounted to 190, for a total of nearly 593,000 chicks. For the same period during 1959-60 the number of orders had declined to 182 for a total of 584,000 chicks. It is clearly indicated by these figures that it is the smaller producers who are going out of the poultry industry whereas the larger producers, with their mechanized equipment and their more available capital, are able to resist the present price depression and remain in the poultry industry. This is exactly the reverse to what was expected when this law was put into force.

There is one other observation which I should like to make and which applies particularly to the maritime provinces. I refer to our experimental farms. I think we have wonderful experimental farms in the maritime provinces, and they are serving a useful purpose. The government has always spent, and is still spending, huge amounts of money to keep these experimental farms in operation. The point which I should like to make at this time is that I wonder if we are reaping the full benefits of these experimental farms.

There is at Nappan, Nova Scotia, which is only about 100 miles from the area where I live, an experimental farm which is serving a very useful purpose. This farm specializes in the growing of grasses and grain, exactly the things in which the farmers in my area are interested. I wonder how many of my farmers have ever taken the trouble to even visit that farm? I would say that at least 95 per cent of our local farmers do not even know where Nappan is. The point which I would like to make is that greater efforts should be made by the government to disseminate the knowledge gained from the experiments which are being conducted at this station. In my opinion it is useless for the government to continue spending these huge amounts of money in research in the agricultural field unless the knowledge gained is brought to the attention of those farmers who can be served by these experiments. I wish to repeat what I have just said, that I would like to see the government making greater efforts to bring to the rank and file of farmers the knowledge which has been accumulated by the experiments carried on at these experimental farms.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, in these brief remarks I wanted to draw to the attention of the house the farm problem as I see it in its national context at this time, that is today.

Before concluding what I have to say I would if I may, read into the record an editorial dated December 16, 1959, from Terre de Chez Nous of the same day, entitled:

"True rural policy an urgent need." Canadian farms are being deserted. Thousands of young, unprepared country boys are going to swell the great number of unqualified workers and unemployed in our cities. Our rural areas are progressively drained of their population. It is hard today to find a farmer's son who is willing to take over his father's farm. The number of farms under operation decreases by a few thousand every year. The disastrous results of integration are a cause of concern. Marginal lands raise a problem of considerable and acute portent. Our farm districts are going through a particularly serious period of depression and a number of farmers are bewildered and distracted.

Some explanations are given for this state of affairs. Certain solutions have been tested. But the feeling remains that secondary causes are being fought because their effect seems to us particularly striking. Nobody dares to find out the primary cause of this evil. The settlement of that fundamental issue is left to natural selection. In practice things are being allowed to drift, and people hope that time and tide will ultimately settle everything. People close their eyes to the terrible human problems emerging from that situation and which will not fail to multiply. Nobody dares accept, and, more particularly, to put into practice a much needed over-all policy which has been sought for many years—

First of all we should complete the inventory of all our renewable resources. We would then adopt some program for their maximum development and use for the benefit of our rural class. We have there an enormous task for a special body having all necessary powers and means at its disposal. This is the essential basis, that the state alone can provide so that we can build the framework and outline of the general conditions in which individual and collective action may really be efficient.

Once we know on what raw material we must work, and once we have decided on the most appropriate use we can make of it, then we would only have to adopt certain concrete steps to achieve the general objective. In the case of economically sound farms or of those likely to become so, for instance, we should provide the required credit facilities to assure their efficiency, and put at their disposal all the techniques they need. It is all very well and good to talk about efficiency, but still, such an objective must materially and economically be accessible to those who wish to achieve it.

The importance of marketing no longer needs proof. At least, in theory. In practice, there is much to be done yet, before farmers can play the role which is theirs in that field. Excellent beginnings have already been noted. But it is urgent to adopt legislation which is imperative, or to improve the existing one, in order that well understood collective action may have its full scope.

But, all that will amount to very little, if the coming generation is not better prepared to earn their living. It is the whole problem of rural education and instruction which is involved. First of all, an efficient guidance system is imperative, if we want each young rural man to find his true way. Then, these young people must have the opportunity of preparing themselves according to their vocation. Not only those who wish to take up farming, but also the increasing number of those who wish to earn their living by other means.

Each one of those points would call for a lengthy examination. However, the first step is to draw up once and for all and to apply an over-all plan for our rural communities. The first thing is to know where we are going. Then it is a matter of taking the means to the end. The present situation shows that any further delay might be disastrous and even criminal.

Unless and until a start is made on such an over-all plan, any individual measure will be nothing more than a stopgap. It will be a poultice which, instead of having a healing effect, will only worsen the condition of the diseased organ. In such a context, anyone who satisfies himself with partial solutions is acting like a quack, either through bad faith, naivety or ignorance.

Mr. Chairman, I commend to the attention of the house and particularly of the Minister of Agriculture the wise advice and recommendations found in this editorial.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I want to open my remarks by congratulating the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) for giving the welfare societies of this country thousands of pounds of pork to help the needy.

Even if social work is primarily the responsibility of individuals, the federal government has shown a wonderful example of generosity. In fact, through the Gold Cross organization, in the Montreal area, the government has given thousands of pounds of pork and, out of this gift, 50,000 pounds of pork have been distributed to charitable organizations in the Joliette diocese. I am justified in saying that this government, for the first time, has given something to Canada as well as to foreign countries, contrary to the Liberal policy of the past.

Mr. Chairman, I also want to point out to the minister that, under the former government, many federal experimental farms have been abandoned in this country. So far the following farms have been idle: Farnham, 1940: Cap Rouge, 1945; Abitibi farm, 1936; Rosthern, Saskatchewan, 1940; Wainwright, Alberta, 1951; Windermere, B.C., 1940.

You have there a clear indication, Mr. Chairman, of the way the former government treated the farmers of this country. In the province of Quebec, three experimental farms folded up under the former government.

Unfortunately, the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger) did not mention those facts to the house. Quebec was one of the hardest hit provinces under the former Liberal administration. Consequently, I ask the Minister of Agriculture, if possible, to consider the advisability of either creating new experimental farms or increasing the funds for research, not only in the other provinces but especially in the province of Quebec, because a greater number of experimental farms have shut down.

An hon. Member: Use the remaining ones.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member—

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I ask the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska not to interrupt me. I did not interrupt him when he made his speech. If he has any questions to put to me, he may do so as soon as I have finished my speech.

Mr. Chairman, I strongly urge the farmers of the province of Quebec to become members of the U.C.C. (Catholic farmers' union) and to join other co-operative movements if they really want to make progress. The U.C.C. has always upheld the interests of farmers. It is their duty to become members of that organization.

Mr. Chairman, I refer to an article published in Action Populaire of Joliette of July 8, 1959, which includes a report by Mr. Jean-Baptiste Lemoine, from Terre de Chez Nous. I quote:

> The UCC played a prominent part in the fight for the maintenance of a reasonable price balance for dairy products. This is a target to shoot at.
> But the farmer's aim should be to take over the control and guidance of our agricultural development. The professional association will have to take a considerable part in co-ordinating this field, in the view of Mr. H. H. Hannam, chairman of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture.
> Never have we farmers had such need of a strong organization. The part played by an organization like the UCC has now taken an unparalleled significance. The union is the only means the farmer has of acquiring the needed prestige and strength and for obtaining the basic policies that will allow the establishment of a realistic farm economy, adapted to our times.
> In conclusion, I would like to quote a sentence in a pastoral bishops' letter on the rural problem: "The U.C.C. will be the sheet-anchor of farmers". That sentence is still true today. Farmers; in your own better interest, join the U.C.C.

[Mr. Pigeon.]

I would ask the U.C.C. to carry on its work of devotion with the agricultural class, in order to encourage farmers' sons to improve their knowledge in agricultural schools.

Co-operatives are the best means of achieving economic democracy. If they are encouraged by farmers, agricultural co-operatives may solve agricultural problems to a very large extent. They can give farmers the economic power wielded by large unions and business magnates.

The only thing which helps farmers prevent outside interests to get control over agriculture, is the setting up of more and stronger co-operatives.

Mr. Chairman, may I point out that agricultural surpluses are not created by the farmers, and to back up that statement, I refer to Le Devoir of February 5, 1960. At the congress of the Cooperative federee de Quebec, Mr. Reynald Ferron made a statement from which I want to quote a few sentences:

> He accused some large commercial corporations of being responsible for those surpluses and for the glutting of the markets. Such conditions, he explains, have forced the federal government to modify its price support formula and to adopt another, i.e. the system of deficiency payments.

A little further on, he said:

> He expressed the opinion that, by now, some large industries whose chief interest is to sell mill feed or to dispose of other commodities, look into the future with uneasiness and think of withdrawing from the market.
> If farm production remained solely in the hands of bona fide farmers, he said, Canada would certainly not need to spend so much on some form or other of price support.
> He stated that it was after representations had been made by farm organizations, like the federated co-operatives, the U.C.C. and, on the national level, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, that a formula was established which, it is hoped, will rectify those conditions.

Mr. Chairman, during the election campaign of 1958, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) went about the country declaring that the support price for butter was too low, and that it should be raised to 63 cents. On the other hand, during the discussion of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, he stated that this price would be too high.

Allow me, Mr. Chairman, to point out to the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger) that, as from May 1, 1959, until the end of last March, deficiency payments of 25 cents for 100 pounds of milk to be processed in factories has helped our farmers to get an amount of $9½ million until the end of March.

Quebec farmers have received approximately $4,250,000.

I should have liked the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska to state his figures more clearly.

Allow me, Mr. Chairman, to say a word about butter in relation to domestic consumption.

In the last four years Canadian production and domestic consumption reached 1,212,597,000 pounds, leaving a slight deficit of 3,700,000 pounds.

In 1953, domestic consumption was 308,674,000 pounds, or 20.88 pounds per capita. In 1948, before the introduction of margarine, the average consumption per capita was 27.73 pounds of butter. There is no doubt that the decrease in butter consumption is due to margarine consumption, averaging 7.46 pounds per capita in 1953.

In Quebec, where the sale of margarine is prohibited, butter production is almost exactly equal to butter consumption.

Mr. Chairman, I am not the one who says this: it is the statement of a farm expert, Mr. C. E. Couture, assistant manager of the Quebec branch of the Quebec federated co-operative.

In that same article, he refers to margarine.

Margarine, that butter substitute, manufactured with vegetable fats and oils, has now become the worse threat to the prosperity of butter industry in particular, and to dairy industry in general. Even if the manufacture and sale of that product are prohibited in our province, we suffer from the detrimental effects of its marketing in the other provinces.

Mr. Rouleau: Margarine is sold even in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Pigeon:

The experience of the last five years has shown that butter is losing the very ground gained by margarine, whose Canadian production has reached 110,266,000 pounds in 1953.

If the butter industry is to survive, it will have not only to work hard at improving the quality of butter, through better techniques for the production of the raw material, the manufacture, handling, stocking and marketing of that product, but it will also have to restrict, with the utmost energy, the development of that encroaching and threatening product, margarine.

Mr. Chairman, I simply wished to underline the policy of the government of the province of Quebec, which has outlawed margarine. It is stated here, Mr. Chairman, in that magazine entitled Agriculture, in an article written by Mr. Couture, that in the province of Quebec the marketing of margarine is prohibited, but that the province of Quebec produces nearly exactly the quantity of butter it requires.

Mr. Chairman, I should like also to draw the attention of the house to a brief submitted by concentrated milk producers of eastern Canada to the agriculture committee of the House of Commons. This brief is dated March 29, 1960, and here is what it says:

Mr. Chairman, concentrated milk producers have never asked your government, or in fact any government, more than they needed. Many of us can remember that when the previous government placed a 17 cent support on spray process milk powder, that support was higher than we had requested.

Unfortunately, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska has failed to draw attention to that situation, or to the brief that was submitted by concentrated milk producers, and which contains an indirect criticism of the former government. However, at that time, the Liberal party was concerned only with elections, not with the interest of farmers, and failed to realize that this shortsighted policy of the former government ran against the interests of the Canadian people and created a serious discrepancy between production and consumption. The result was that at one point, the present government was faced with a surplus of over 100,000 pounds of milk powder. Such was the result of the shortsighted policy of the former administration. Unfortunately, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska preferred not to mention those facts, and failed to point them out to the house.

If you read La Presse for March 8, 1960, you find that the price of hogs is higher this year.

Mr. David Adams, a representative of western farmers, has indicated that the prices of Canadian hogs will rise this year.

And here is an item which appeared in Terre de Chez Nous on January 20, 1960:

Quebec egg producers favoured in 1960.

Here, to say the least, is a piece of good news. Even if over-production and low prices are expected in the first half of the year, Quebec egg producers would be ill-advised to curtail or stop their production.

Conditions prevailing in Quebec offer truly favourable possibilities, according to the poultry industry division of the provincial department of agriculture.

This is what I find in Le Devoir of September 11, 1959:

The cash income of farmers increased during the first six months.

The cash income of Canadian farmers reached $1,318,556,000 during the first half of the year. This is a record showing a 3 per cent increase compared to last year.

From January to June 1959, the cash income of New Brunswick farmers was $20,276,000, compared to $22,817,000 during the first six months of 1958; the income of Quebec farmers reached $181,115,000 compared to $180,410,000 the previous year; in Ontario the income of farmers reached $417,541,000, compared to $399,201,000 during the first half of 1958.

This morning, the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska criticized the federal farm credit, and blamed the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness), though, Mr. Chairman—if we look up the French text of Hansard for April 13, 1959—he is the same man who, last year, answered the minister:

Mr. Chairman, it is with great pleasure that we heard the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) state that he would leave the interest rate at 5 per cent. I commend him for that and thank him on behalf of our farmers.

That is what the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska said last year; yet this morning he made a political speech criticizing federal farm credit; whereas, as I said, last year, the Minister of Agriculture had been congratulated by that very man. I also would tell the Quebec farmers and the whole country: "Look what kind of men make up the opposition." The one I am speaking of is a man who lies in the face of the people. He contradicted himself this morning and we find the proof in the official record of the house.

Mr. Chairman, allow me also to refer to a joint brief of the co-operative society of tobacco growers (Societe cooperative agricole de tabac) of the Joliette district, and of the co-operative agricultural society of the Yamaska valley. The brief was sent some time ago to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) and, I think, also to the Minister of Agriculture.

Allow me to quote a few paragraphs:

Cigar and pipe tobacco producers of the province of Quebec, about 1,600 in number, have been grouped for more than thirty years, in overwhelming majority, under the leadership of two co-operative associations: the co-operative society of tobacco growers of the district of Joliette and the co-operative agricultural society of the Yamaska valley. Since June 15, 1957, all planters have rallied under the banner of the cigar and pipe tobacco producers board, a body operated under the authority of the Quebec Farm Markets Act. Although their occupation is connected with a specialized branch of the farm industry, the general prosperity of a vast area depends to a large extent on the increase or decrease of tobacco production. That is why, through their associations and with the authorization of their respective administrators, producers wish to express their views on the precarious situation of their farm specialty, and are requesting from the federal government a taxation system which would be more in keeping with their interests, as well as with those of the whole Canadian cigar tobacco industry.

I would also point out to the minister that the production of cigar tobacco is centralized in the province of Quebec only and is of capital importance for the constituency of Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, as well as for the economy of the province of Quebec.

[Mr. Pigeon.]

I should like also to say a word about tobacco duties and taxes, in relation to the considerations mentioned in their brief, under the heading: Tax on cigar tobacco.

The duties on cigar tobacco may be classified under two headings: (a) customs duties; (b) excise duties and taxes and federal sales tax.

(a) Customs duties. Those duties affect imported tobacco which we buy mainly from the United States and Cuba. They are of 12½ cents a pound, on unstemmed tobacco leaf, and of 20 cents a pound on stemmed tobacco—that is to say the tobacco leaf stripped of its central vein.

It should be pointed out here that there is a tendency towards gradual decrease in customs tariffs, as shown by the following table:

Change in custom tariff—Non-manufactured cigar tobacco

Year	Unstemmed (pound)	Stemmed (pound)
1936—Budget	$ 0.40	$ 0.60
1948—January 1st	0.20	0.30
1951—June 6	0.15	0.22½
1956—June 30	0.12½	0.20

I would also point out to the house that this procedure of the former government was contrary and seriously detrimental to the interest of cigar tobacco producers of that area of the province of Quebec.

The hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska, unfortunately, did not want to emphasize those figures this morning. Besides, as an hon. colleague is telling me: "He does not know anything about it".

We might add that the tariff on other types of tobacco (n.o.p.) has remained unchanged since 1948, being limited to 20 cents a pound for unstemmed leaves.

The brief says also:

Finally, it is important to point out that a new tariff item, in force since July 16, 1959—

That is under this government—

—applies to the synthetic envelope from the United States (converted tobacco leaf for use in the manufacture of cigar binders) and provides a tariff of 75 cents a pound.

Besides, I already had the opportunity, right at the first session, to make some remarks on this matter in this house.

(b) Excise duties, federal excise and sales tax. First, we must point out that in April 1959, the federal government increased excise duty, by $1 per 1,000 cigars, and the federal sales tax by 1 per cent.

I would also ask, if it is possible, that the Minister of Agriculture, in co-operation with the Minister of Finance, undertake a wholesale revision of the duties and taxes on cigars, as a measure of encouragement for this production in the province of Quebec.

I ask also the government to increase the customs tariffs on unmanufactured, unstemmed and stemmed cigar tobacco.

Mr. Chairman, I would not want to conclude my remarks without saying a few words about the situation of producers of cigarette tobacco in the province of Quebec, whose yearly production is about five and a half million pounds.

If I may be permitted, I would like also to have three tables put on record: first, a table entitled "A few statistics on the tobacco industry"; second, "Production costs of a 50-acre flue-cured tobacco crop"; third: "Capital costs of a 50-acre flue-cured tobacco farm".

Those tables are rather brief and they are official because they have been published by Mr. Conrad Turcot, head of the tobacco division of the government of the province of Quebec.

Therefore, I ask the house to allow me to put these tables in Hansard.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): We have no objection.

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: Does the committee consent to the hon. member tabling the documents in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: May I ask the hon. member how long they are?

Mr. Pigeon: Very short.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the committee give unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Those figures help prove that the tobacco companies have to pay a fair price to the planters, so that they may have a fair share of the national income.

And for the information of the house—it is not an historical fact, but it happened nevertheless under the previous government, when cigarette tobacco growing was started in the province of Quebec—I will recall that it was opposed very vigorously by some officials of the Liberal government.

That is the way, Mr. Speaker, in which the people of the province of Quebec, the Quebec farmers, were treated.

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) a question, if I may.

He said in his speech that the sale of margarine was prohibited in the province of Quebec—

An hon. Member: Certainly.

Mr. Boulanger: Can he explain to us how it happens to be sold in the province of Quebec?

Mr. Pigeon: First of all, can you prove it?

Mr. Rouleau: Yes, we can prove it.

Mr. Pigeon: Second, do not forget that it is being sold in other provinces.

Mr. Rouleau: Any chain groceteria or store sells it.

Mr. Pigeon: That is somewhat like smuggled-in cigarettes. You remember that they were coming in by the truck load under the former government.

Mr. Boulanger: We are discussing the fact that a law prohibits the sale of margarine in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Pigeon: Is there not also a law against the infiltration of American cigarettes? It is the same thing.

(Text):

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, like all hon. members, the minister has a general interest in all affairs which affect the Canadian economy but because of his position in the cabinet he of necessity has a particular interest in the problems of agriculture. It is because of his position as Minister of Agriculture that I should like to take this opportunity, on the first item in his estimates, to ask both for his consideration of and comments upon a problem which in our estimation, because certain policies have been allowed to go unchecked, is proving a serious detriment to agriculture directly, to the agricultural industry not quite so directly, and is indirectly affecting all other aspects of our economy and business itself.

I have mentioned this particular problem briefly during this session and now, when there is an opportunity to discuss it with the Minister of Agriculture, I should like to go into it in a little more detail. I have reference to a dual policy which up until now has been allowed to go completely unchecked by either this or the previous government. I refer to companies outside of Canada, in particular companies in the United States, being permitted to purchase outright fruit and vegetable canneries in this country and to close them down as far as all operations are concerned, thereby blocking out completely the purchase of Canadian agricultural produce, blocking out completely the employment of Canadian workers and, as far as their operations are concerned, the opportunity of Canadian consumers to buy produce grown and processed in Canada.

I know for a fact that this policy has been in operation for some time in British Columbia, in Ontario and in at least one important place in the province of Nova Scotia. United States companies have bought out Canadian companies and have closed up the industries, retaining only two things, namely the incorporation and the name brand. It is now the practice of those United States companies to process the production outside of Canada, to can it outside of Canada, to ship it into Canada and then place a Canadian brand name on the product. I gave some examples of that in this House of Commons some three weeks ago where fresh frozen strawberries sold under the well-known Canadian brand name of York were not Canadian. They came in one instance from the United States and in the other from Holland. I gave a further illustration of tomato juice being sold in Canada under a Canadian name brand but which was produced and canned in the United States.

I say there is a general application of the policy of United States companies buying out Canadian companies and following that procedure.

There is also another policy which has gone unchecked about which I have not made mention before. Well known, long established large wholesale distributors within a province are being bought out by large financial and chain stores who, after the purchase, operate them wholly and solely under their original names and original brands. That is, they follow a practice along the same lines as that which I have previously mentioned. Goods produced outside this country are processed outside this country and then sold in this country under the known provincial brand, although most people do not realize that those companies no longer operate under the original ownership but are part and parcel of big financial interests and financial chains.

I say this is a problem in Canada. It has resulted in a loss which I am going to estimate as being in the neighbourhood of many, many millions of dollars to our agricultural producers and to the industry which necessarily follows success in agriculture.

I know this is the general effect across Canada, but I want to speak in particular of the province of British Columbia of which I have the honour to be one of the representatives in this house. In the past the Fraser valley has been, among other things, famous for its production of strawberries, not only for the consumer market when they are picked fresh but also for canning and frozen purposes. That situation no longer exists. To a great extent that marvellous production of the past is now dead because of the two policies I have just mentioned and because the canneries no longer exist. Instead of strawberry jam and fresh frozen strawberries from the famous Fraser valley being sold under the York brand we now get imports from the United States and Holland. To me there is something blatently nonsensical about that situation.

But let us go on to something that, important as the strawberry crop is, is of even greater value to the people of British Columbia. In that regard I wish to refer to the world famous Okanagan valley which I maintain is one of the finest areas not only in Canada but in the world for the production of fruits, small fruits and vegetables. Until a few years ago there were 15 or 16 large canneries operating in the area from Lillooet on the north down the Fraser to Lytton, Ashcroft, Kamloops and Chase and in the actual Okanagan itself at Vernon, Rutland, Kelowna, Summerland, Oliver, Keremeos, Osoyoos and Cawston.

Today there are only two vegetable canneries left of any size and I am informed by the operators that the operations of the remaining two are declining rapidly. Why? Not only was this a marvellous area and can continue to be for the production of beans, beets, pumpkins, asparagus and so on but it was also a wonderful tomato belt. These canneries operated not only because of these other vegetables but were primarily required for the processing of tomatoes. However, because of the two policies I referred to a few minutes ago there are now only two canneries operating and their operations are diminishing. This has come about because of the purchase by United States interests of our canneries in British Columbia and the fact that they have closed them and because of the purchase of the wholesale distributing companies by national chains and big financial interests who have done this for some reason or other although they claim they love Canadian enterprise. They are importing agricultural products from outside our country with the result that the agricultural producers of British Columbia and the industries associated with agriculture have suffered very severe losses.

Surely the reduction from 16 canneries to two shows what has taken place. I admit that until some two and a half weeks ago I did not know how serious the impact was. I received by air express cans of tomato juice purchased by a citizen in the city of Vernon in the heart of the Okanagan and the tomato growing region. I do not know how well the Nabob name is known in eastern Canada but it is certainly known in western Canada. There was a can of Kelly Douglas tomato juice packed in the United States by Nabob. Then there was a can of Malkin tomato juice. The Malkin name is as well known in British Columbia as Nabob or Kelly Douglas. Again this was tomato juice packed in the United States for the Malkin company of Canada. Yet this tomato juice was being sold in the city of Vernon where one of the remaining canneries is located. The president of that company, in a letter to me which is not marked confidential, informs me that on the basis of his lifelong knowledge of the Okanagan and the industry as a producer and packer it is his conservative estimate that the policies about which I am now complaining are resulting in a direct loss to Okanagan agricultural producers and labour of not less than $5 million annually.

I know that the minister has at least some interest in this matter because the information branch of the department issued a release on the 14th of this month and I should like to quote from it.

The agricultural stabilization board has been authorized to provide assistance to the growers of tomatoes in British Columbia in the form of a payment of $8 per ton for No. 1 cannery tomatoes and $5 a ton on No. 2 cannery tomatoes marketed from the 1960 crop, agriculture minister Douglas S. Harkness announced today. Mr. Harkness said the assistance, which has been provided to British Columbia tomato growers since 1958, would not be extended after 1960.

He noted that while B.C. tomato production had been subsidized by assistance payments of $109,000 in 1958 and $38,000 in 1959, the contracted tomato acreage in the province had declined by more than 50 per cent between 1957 and 1959. Further, while B.C. tomato production represented only about 6 per cent of the Canadian output of processed tomato products, the producers in other areas have been able to carry on their operations without assistance under the stabilization act.

He stated that under these circumstances continued government subsidies to B.C. tomato growers could not be justified. Assistance had been approved for 1960 only for the purpose of permitting producers to make any necessary adjustments in their future plans, and support under the stabilization act would not be available after this year.

It is quite obvious that is the end of assistance as far as the tomato growers of British Columbia are concerned. But, Mr. Chairman, the date of that announcement was the 14th of this month and my information from the producers and canners of the Okanagan is that April 14 was too late to make this known to them and that they cannot do any planning now for the increasing of acreage or with a view to reopening any additional canneries. They say that not only is it too late now for anything of major significance to be done to bring back that segment of agriculture in the Okanagan but the fact that the door will be closed after this year is a further blow.

I know that all of us are grateful that there is going to be some assistance this year, but what did it amount to last year—thirty eight thousand dollars. The important issue is, what is contemplated by the minister and the government to reclaim agricultural production and cannery operation so far as tomatoes are concerned, to name just one field? If we lose out as far as tomatoes are concerned then we will also lose so far as the production and canning of other vegetables is concerned. All that is left, therefore, is the fresh vegetable market.

When we have statements made, I would take it by very responsible officials of Boulman's Limited that they are losing out now to the extent of over $5 million a year as a result of this policy of foreign ownership, control and incorporation but selling under Canadian brand names, then I think we who are interested in the development of agriculture in Canada and processing in Canada as well as consumers being able to support products which are grown and processed in Canada through their purchases, should ask the minister at this time what consideration he has given to the impact of the two policies about which I have been speaking for these past 15 minutes; what interest he has shown in them and what action he is taking or contemplates taking to renew and revive the agriculture and canning industries in Canada. This problem not only affects British Columbia and Ontario, but within the last three weeks I have found that the system is now going into effect in Nova Scotia.

This is a creeping disease which has to be stopped and only the government can do it. I realize there are many difficulties in the way. I realize there are many problems, but they will have to be tackled, even if it means going to the extent of charging for the use of the brand name of Canadian companies which are bought up and closed out and using that money to assist agriculture in other directions. If we are going to have outfits like Kelly Douglas doing what I say they are doing, and about which I got the evidence sent me by express the other day, then they too will have to be made to contribute in some way or other toward the assistance of agriculture in other directions.

If no policy is going to be laid down to recapture what we are now losing, then I say this is indeed a serious matter and something which should never have been allowed to go unchecked as long as it has. I sincerely hope the Minister of Agriculture will have something to say about this, some good and constructive information to give us as to his policy for the protection and enlargement of agricultural development along the lines I have been mentioning.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, it may seem strange to many that I, from the far north and the far west, should rise in this committee to speak on agriculture. Apart, however, from what was said about the dominion experimental farm at Haines Junction, Mile 1019 on the Alaska highway, some years ago, there has not been a word said in the house or in committee about agriculture in the Yukon since the Yukon has had a seat in this house. I propose, first, to deal with the possibilities of mixed farming in the Yukon, and to make a few suggestions as to how this can be achieved. I also admit freely at the outset of these remarks that I am certainly no expert on agriculture, nor a farmer. The information I have gleaned has come, however, from experts and from those who are undoubtedly acquainted with agricultural problems in the north. I will be making remarks about certain negative attitudes on the part of government administrators in the north in so far as the development of agriculture there is concerned.

Agriculture has an important part to play in the development of the Yukon. People, wherever they are, must eat. Virtually all the foodstuffs consumed in the Yukon must be shipped in from the outside. In addition to the climatic severity, Yukon residents are penalized by a certain isolation from the rest of Canada. Modern facilities for travel and communication have reduced this isolation factor to a minimum, but the high cost of importing food still remains. Much will be done to alleviate this with the increase in the development of agriculture. A thriving local agriculture industry in the Yukon could supply much of the beef, pork, poultry, eggs and common garden crops now consumed there. With proper management it would be possible to supply local markets with fresher and higher quality produce. Eliminating the roughly 1,500 mile freight haul from outside points would result in a saving to the Yukon consumer both in quality and in price. There would be less danger of food shortages brought on, for example, by longshoremen's strikes at our only port of entry on tidewater at Skagway, although there is the port of Haines which is seldom used.

Agriculture would also lend stability to the economy of the country in this way: Farmers are generally good citizens. They attempt to build homes for their families and businesses for their sons. They must keep abreast of the times in order to survive, and in doing this they show an interest in their community and in the country as a whole. The permanent settlement of the Yukon could be aided considerably by agricultural development. Of lesser importance, yet nevertheless significant, would be the labour required for the building up of farms. There would be a demand for such skilled labour as carpenters, heavy duty operators, mechanics and, later, a demand for unskilled labour.

Much of the native population, now more or less unemployed, could be utilized as unskilled labour on the farms as they develop. Work on or about farms would give natives a chance to obtain better food and living conditions than they now enjoy, and heaven knows the standard they are now experiencing is low enough. With some training and experience gained working on farms some Indians could very easily become good farmers. This could work in well with the government's program of training the Indian people. At present those people interested in agriculture are apt to be a bit scarce. There are, now, only two possible sources of such men. One source would be the natives who have worked on farms, both private farms and the experimental farm. You might find some natives, also, amongst those who have worked for the big game guides who would be interested in livestock production. The second source would be the native schools.

The men from the first mentioned source would be older and better able to judge whether farming could hold their interest. They may also be inclined to let things slide along the way they are and look to the government for support whether or not they work. The group from the schools would be younger and would learn more easily. They might be given encouragement and counselling before leaving the schools. The government, in co-operation with private farmers, could select a few likely candidates and introduce them to the art of farming. It might be possible to work out some scheme whereby the government could give the farmer some assistance with wages and the farmer could supply room and board and training for these natives, in much the same fashion as the on the job training that has been provided by the Department of Labour and the Indian affairs branch of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration.

If this proved satisfactory the natives, after becoming basically familiar with life on the farm, could be given additional training in agriculture. It is unlikely that there would be sufficient interest at first to justify an agricultural school in the Yukon, but interested students might be sent to schools such as the Olds and Vermilion schools of agriculture in Alberta. If there were sufficient interest, various short courses in agriculture might be instituted for the special training of these natives. Courses in mechanics and machinery maintenance were given at the Alberta school of agriculture to Indians and Eskimos from the Northwest Territories.

I believe that local farmers would be willing to co-operate in such a program. Most of these hire some native help during the heavy work periods. While the farmer is unable to afford year-round unskilled labour he would have work enough or be willing to train a native if he had some assistance with wages. If candidates that were genuinely interested in agriculture were selected for such a training program, they could become quite successful farmers. If a few natives got a start in farming it is unlikely that others would not follow their example. Such a program could be of great assistance in solving the native problem in the Yukon. It requires co-operation, I would suggest, between the two departments.

Agriculture in the Yukon is an economically sound venture and is advantageous to the country as a whole. Before I rose to make these few remarks one or two of the hon. members in the chamber here tempted me by saying that all we could produce in Yukon was perhaps onions, potatoes and a few stunted trees. I took it as a joke because I know those who make such remarks are joking and that they have not been to Yukon in order to see for themselves.

One of the sources or in fact the main source from which I am obtaining the technical information which will be following in my remarks is from one of two brothers who operate a farm in the Yukon called the Pelly ranch. The brother with whom I correspond and of whom I speak and from whom I get my information is a gentleman by the name of Hugh Bradley who is a Bachelor of Science having graduated from the University of Alberta and the other brother is a graduate of the agriculture school in Vermilion, Alberta. These two lads have farmed in the Yukon since 1954, have kept very accurate records of their production and have formed a few ideas, many of which I will be stating here, on how agricultural development should be going in the Yukon. So when I say that agriculture is economically sound, I am not just stating a possibility or a thesis; I am stating a fact because there are economic farms in the Yukon but they are having their difficulties.

Why then are there not more farmers in Yukon? One reason is the lack, among people who may be interested, of knowledge of conditions and opportunities in the Yukon. Most Canadians still think about the Yukon in the terms of the writings of Robert Service, Jack London, Rex Beach and the like. Much has been done recently to publicize our part of the country but much remains to be done. We are endeavouring to sell Yukon to the rest of the country and we must do so if Canada is to derive the advantage of her development.

Our territorial government in the Yukon, in my view, should show some positive action in this direction. In the past the attitude of both the administrative and legislative bodies has been apathetic or negative. Our chief administrator, known as the commissioner of the Yukon Territory, let it be known on several occasions that he thought and still thinks that any attempt at agriculture was and is foolishness and that assistance would have to come from the federal Department of Agriculture. With this latter part of the commissioner's statement I agree but with his negative attitude toward the development of agriculture in the Yukon I most emphatically disagree. Official encouragement could possibly have influenced private individuals in years past to start farming in the Yukon. Official endorsement and aid would certainly have helped. That official endorsement and that official aid has not been forthcoming and has yet to be forthcoming.

If no interest is shown by the local government so-called—and I call it local government so-called because there is still much to be done in the way of leadership by the commissioner and those about him—why then should we as a federal government be interested? Nevertheless, the federal government was sufficiently aware of the need to establish three experimental farms in northern Canada. The station we are concerned with is at Mile 1019 on the Alaska highway and is now an experimental farm. Results of experiments carried out on this farm are available. These reports clearly show that an agricultural enterprise in the Yukon is possible; that crops will grow; that livestock will survive and multiply; that garden crops can be produced. The continued existence of private farms and results obtained at the experimental farm show that agriculture is feasible from an economic standpoint as well.

The territorial government should be interested in the development of agriculture and indeed it has expressed that interest in the session of last year—in 1958—when they passed a resolution calling for federal financial assistance in the setting up of a committee to assess the agricultural possibilities in the Yukon and the methods of developing the area. To my knowledge no federal action has been taken on that request of the Yukon legislative council. The present council is showing great interest in the development of agriculture, but this has not been so in the past. The council could assist in many ways. The cheapest form of assistance would be an information service. There could be a main source of supply from which people who may be interested could obtain information. There should be a main source from which people could obtain estimates of amount and location of land, costs and prices, climatic conditions, production data as far as is known, populations, markets, regulations governing the sale of farm products, taxes and licences required and many other factors. To obtain such information now you must trot from one department to another all over the federal building in Whitehorse and finally end up at the office of the chief administrator who, I informed the committee a moment ago, is the commissioner and who thinks it is all foolishness. Our commissioner just does not know or just does not care to find out.

The territorial and federal governments should be interested enough in the development of the country to assist in road building to agricultural areas. Many of the best areas for farming are now rather inaccessible. It will be rather difficult to encourage settlement of these lands unless there is some promise of accessibility. Agriculture is just as much a resource as are the mineral deposits in the land. The government is making great strides in opening up and making accessible mineral land. The same approach should be made to the opening up and making accessible of farm lands.

The federal government should be able to do something about the most deplorable situation which exists with regard to obtaining agricultural land. This situation is in a terrible mess. Picture, if you can, a farmer who wishes to commence his operation in the Yukon being faced with the requirement to pay $30 an acre for his land before he can commence farming. It should be possible to arrange some terms for deferment of taxes and purchase price until the farm can become established. Much of this might be beyond the jurisdiction of the territorial government, yet they should be heard on the subject. They are in a position to bring certain pressures to bear on the proper agencies. They should at least try.

Of direct assistance to farmers the federal government might undertake the following projects in the Yukon:

1. A caterpillar tractor of no smaller than D-6 size with equipment for land-clearing and breaking should be made available for the use of farmers. The government could in the interests of agriculture supply the "cat" and transportation for it. The farmer could cover the cost of the fuel oil and the operator. Such a program would have to be planned in advance so that the machine could be used to the greatest advantage. Work in each area would have to be arranged so that the "cat" would spend a maximum amount of time working and a minimum of time in transit. This program might be patterned somewhat after the project of the Alberta government in farm land clearing in the Wanham area of the Peace river district.

The land clearing project would have to be administered by the government. In this regard there is need for a full time extension man in the Yukon. I would suggest an employee of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources with an extension office located at the experimental farm at Mile 1019. Location at the farm would to best, since such a man would have to work in close co-operation with the Department of Agriculture. This man could administer the plan mentioned earlier in regard to natives in agriculture. He would organize and administer land clearing projects and land settlement. He could also report to the farmers the findings of the experimental farm and advise the staff there on new research projects farmers would like to see undertaken. Another part of his job could be the planning and planting of lawns and gardens in the Whitehorse area.

Another way in which the government could aid farmers is in connection with freight subsidies. For example, the cost of freight on fertilizer amounts to about $130 per ton. High freight costs such as these virtually prohibit the use of fertilizers and limits the use of livestock and poultry supplements. Freight nearly doubles the price of farm machinery in the Yukon. Such a situation does not encourage agricultural enterprise. Most provincial governments give some aid along these lines to settlers in fringe areas. Some such program should be instituted to aid Yukon farmers.

A fourth form that government aid could take is indirect, but it would be of great benefit to the Yukon farmer. I am referring to realistic support of the experimental farm. I am not criticising what has been done. Much valuable work has been accomplished, but there are some fields that have been neglected because of insufficient technical staff. It has been ten months since the tragic death of the farm superintendent at mile 1019. This seems an over long time for even the civil service to find a replacement. The position should be re-examined and if necessary re-classified to make it sufficiently attractive to interest and hold a high calibre man, since it is a position of utmost importance to Yukon agriculture.

Perhaps it is because of the recent reduction in the isolated post allowances that it has been difficult to find a man to adapt himself to life and work on the experimental farm. If this is the case, it must be deplored that the interdepartmental committee on isolated post regulations found it necessary to recommend such a reduction in this allowance.

The field of animal science is the most important field to Yukon agriculture yet there has been no technical staff in that field there long enough to do any important research. The new superintendent might well be an animal science man. My understanding is that the person who will be going to take over the farm at the end of this month is a soil expert. If that is so, it is most important that a research officer in animal husbandry be appointed soon. The following topics might be suggested for research in this field: research in pastures; the best species or mixtures to use in planted pastures; carrying capacity of planted and native pastures; assessment of native pastures from both carrying capacity and nutritive standpoint; best management practices for tame and native pastures; livestock insect pests. Winter feed: hay planted versus native; species yields and nutritive properties; relative merits of hay; straw and bundles for winter feed; study of mineral and vitamin supplements that may be necessary when using local feeds; silage for winter feed. Is silage the way to beat the unfavourable haying season we have? Is there sufficient moisture in our crops to make good silage? What crops and mixtures can we grow for best silage? Housing: do cattle significantly do better when they receive warm housing? Can open shed housing be used satisfactorily? What about housing against black flies in summer? Research in hogs, poultry, dairy cattle and sheep—these would come as minor projects and are listed in order of importance. The reason they would be of secondary importance is their relatively larger demands for concentrates which are harder and more expensive to produce.

Climatic conditions make crop production alone a marginal venture, but in conjunction with livestock production it is important. Any research which will lead to production of more and better feeds will be most helpful. Variety trials should be continued. Field management experiments should be expanded, since there is much to be learned about rotation, fertilizers and tillage practices in relation to the north. There is room for work in drought tolerant and frost tolerant varieties. Farmers will want to know the best methods of breaking and preparing land in this area, also to what extent irrigation will be economical. Forage research is very important. We have only one legume that is dependable, and even it has serious drawbacks. Much more selection and breeding work is needed. Some attention need be given to introduction and adaptability of new species. There should be experiments with silage under our conditions.

There should also be sufficient staff on the experimental farm to permit off-station work. Crops and practices suitable for the Whitehorse area may not be suitable for Mayo and Dawson city. As more farms are established more off-station work will be required. It would be an advantage to have information available for the use of prospective settlers. It is important to have some correlation of meteorological data. To illustrate the variability over the territory, Dawson city has a frost free period of 78 days; Mayo, 64 days; Snag, 51 days; Watson Lake, 85; Whitehorse airport, 78. Undoubtedly there will be a wide variation in precipitation, and mean temperature conditions should be investigated near all centres of population and in as many good farming areas as possible.

Horticulture may not be of prime importance to farmers, yet more people will be growing kitchen gardens. There should be research along these lines. Farmers will be interested in easily grown horticultural crops such as potatoes. Early drought tolerant varieties adapted to Yukon conditions should be produced.

It is hoped that the federal government will see that the experimental farm has sufficient staff to carry out these and other important research projects. There is a large investment in land, buildings and machinery, a very large investment; now let us have personnel to turn out some badly needed information. Of prime importance, perhaps before any of these things are undertaken, should be a careful assessment of the available arable land in the Yukon.

The future of agriculture will depend greatly on the development of the rest of the territory. The Yukon will never become primarily an agriculture area. However, farming will be a basic industry. Even the present population would benefit greatly by the presence of more farms. As the population increases, so will the need for farms increase. Yukon agriculture should aim at the production of high quality produce. In the future there will likely be an outlet in Alaska for our produce. To ensure maintenance of quality, to protect producers and consumers, the government should institute inspectors and inspection services as soon as possible. There should be restrictions on imports to protect the growth of the industry. Diseased potatoes have already been imported from Alaska. This could seriously injure any future potato production in the Yukon.

The relative isolation of the Yukon and of farms in the Yukon will make it possible to grow highest quality seed for export. Isolation is required for the production of cross-pollinated forage seed. In dense farming areas it is almost impossible to plant pure varieties because of this. The Yukon could make much use of this feature.

Longer hours of daylight in our northern latitudes favour flower and seed formation. For example, Russian wild rye grass will not head out and set seed in North Dakota because of shorter days. It seeds well in the Yukon, so in the future a good export business may develop. Winter hardiness of crops which will survive in the Yukon will be another selling point. There is a strong possibility of exporting seed to countries of similar latitude in Europe. To go along with this idea, seed production is favoured by mixed farming and the Yukon will most surely be a mixed farming area.

In the future there will be smelters in the Yukon. Many by-products of smelters are converted into fertilizers. Fertilizers alone form a large part of the income of mining companies. A ready market for their by-products would be a help to smelters and a source of fertilizers near at hand would be a help to farmers.

Storage facilities, slaughter houses, inspection services, expanded markets will all go together to ensure that the Yukon consumers get fresh, top quality locally raised produce. We will be able to break an egg in the frying pan and be reasonably certain that it was laid this year. As the Yukon grows so will farming grow.

[Mr. Nielsen.]

All this points to a healthy, more stable economy and to the need for a greater understanding and appreciation of the development of Yukon agriculture both at the federal level and more particularly at the administrative level in the Yukon. There must be something more at the administrative level, at the level of the commissioner, in the Yukon. There must be leadership at the administrative level in the Yukon to ensure that this development will occur. There must be the will to encourage agricultural development. There must be a strong desire at the administrative level in the Yukon to assist in that development. Negativism must be banished. There are great possibilities in the Yukon for the development of agriculture and if the Yukon is expected to support a large population in anticipation of the development of industries in the north, then planning should commence now and not ten years hence for the development of an agricultural industry which will sustain that population.

Mr. Badanai: A few weeks ago the Prime Minister said something about the agricultural policy of the government and the statements he made interested me very much, especially when he referred to that portion of the policy which he enunciated in 1959 to the effect that the government was engaged in a comprehensive study and review of the Canadian Farm Loan Act as a means of meeting the small farm problem, etc. Then he went on to say, and I quote from Hansard of March 4, 1960 at page 1766:

> We believe that agriculture is one of the most important sectors of the Canadian economy; that the prosperity of agriculture is an integral part of Canadian prosperity; that governments do have a responsibility in a constructive and effective manner to strengthen Canadian agriculture for in doing so the economy as a whole is strengthened. We believe that the national interest can best be served if we endeavour to do our utmost to develop efficiently and economically our resources, including agriculture; that farmers should have continuing opportunities to earn sufficient income to enjoy the benefits of our rapidly growing economy and the rising standards of living enjoyed by the population as a whole; and that a reasonably high and stable level of farm income is an essential prerequisite to a high level of employment and income in Canada generally.
> We take the stand, and have, that government action to help Canadian agriculture to help itself is in the Canadian tradition of self-reliance and that government action primarily designed to provide and round out opportunities for farmers to do well on their own is a desirable objective.
> Some of the agricultural problems are national in scope while others are regional. The policies that we have followed have been designed to deal with problems where they occur.

I do not think anyone would quarrel with a policy designed to deal with problems where they occur, be they national or regional, but what about the implementation of this regional policy enunciated by the Prime Minister? The district of Thunder bay has yet to benefit from such policy.

I complained on several occasions at the lack of consideration for the farmers of the Fort William district. The Prime Minister said in effect that the Canadian Farm Loan Act would be amended to better facilitate assistance to small farmers. It seems to me that it is not so much the revision of the act that is important—the name was changed, I believe—but rather the implementation of the act by the officials in the field. That is what is important.

I have said previously and I say again that unless a farmer in our district has sufficient collateral to show it is next to impossible for him to secure a loan to enable him to develop efficiently and economically the agricultural potential of his holding. For some years there has been considerable discontent among the farmers in the lakehead area, the Thunder bay district. Many Thunder bay district farmers had a very difficult winter following one of the poorest growing seasons in many years. Grain crops were 62 per cent below those of 1958. The decreased harvest was estimated as a loss of $300,000. Some farmers did not have sufficient crops to make harvesting worth while. A great number were forced to buy feed for their cattle. Potatoes and other crops were also down, leaving farmers with little revenue with which to purchase feed.

Last year the hon. member for Port Arthur and myself suggested to the minister that a meeting be held between federal and provincial members of parliament and representatives of the federal and provincial departments of agriculture and interested farmers to discuss problems peculiar to the district. Unfortunately, while we did suggest a date we received nothing but a scant response from the minister.

Subsequently we asked for specific information on our region and finally we received a copy of a summary and conclusions designed to strengthen the position of agriculture in the district of Thunder bay. We were told that these conclusions were arrived at with considerable difficulty which necessitated on the ground investigation. It was readily found that one of the great and primary advantages of farming in this particular district was the expanding of the local market which is located at a considerable distance from other farming areas.

The total population of the Thunder bay district is approximately 140,000, of which less than 6 per cent are farmers compared with an estimated 12 per cent for the whole province of Ontario.

With a distinct federal and provincial farm policy, supported by long term loans, this region could be developed into one of the best garden areas of Canada, especially if the government were to initiate an immigration policy designed to attract suitable immigrants who would undertake to settle on the land. I have advocated such a policy ever since I was elected to parliament, and I have found no sound argument here to induce me to change my view on the situation. Indeed, I am now more than ever convinced that such a policy would be beneficial to the whole of Canada.

Another great advantage which would stimulate farming in this area is that although grain production is very limited, with the great source of livestock feed at the local terminal elevators, it could become a No. 1 livestock producing area of Canada. The distance from marketing facilities could be overcome with the adoption of an equitable freight rate structure. The present structure militates against the farmers having a fair chance to compete with primary producers of the west and east.

It is true that the area of improved farm land is comparatively small; it is approximately 70,000 acres. The reason the area is no larger is the freight rate discrimination which I have already mentioned and the apparent indifference of our senior levels of government in not giving this district a fair chance to develop.

Our present farmers are concentrating on dairy products, poultry, eggs, potatoes, and so forth. Of course, there are other products, but in the main these constitute the bulk of products from which our farmers make a living. There is a great potential for expansion in fluid milk, potatoes, vegetables, greenhouse products, small fruits such as berries of all kinds, mushrooms, poultry, eggs, turkeys, honey and feeder cattle. The establishment of feeder plants for cattle and hogs near our terminal elevators should be considered as a distinct advantage to the area.

I know that most people in Canada, including a great many hon. members in this house, have the conception that Thunder bay is a land of timber and rocks. Thank God, we have rocks, beneath which there lies the pre-Cambrian shield, which is rich in minerals of all kinds; but make no mistake, we have thousands of acres which could be under cultivation now, but because of a lack of promotion and interest is worthless bush. Seventy per cent of the total farm area is unimproved land, compared with 39 per cent for the province of Ontario, and only 20 per cent of the total occupied land is under crops, roughly one half of the provincial average.

I say to this government, give us help to establish large cold storage facilities; establish a meat and crop grading station. This is one of the things that the farmers of my district have asked the federal and provincial governments to establish for a long time. The answer to our problems have invariably been the stock answer: farming is not sufficiently developed to warrant the establishment of these facilities. How can we develop our potentials if the government continues to ignore the needs for such development?

If this government is consistent in its promises and statements to the effect that farmers in ever part of Canada will receive the same consideration, it should practise what it preaches. I admit that the farmers in my constituency cannot compete in numbers or in wealth with the farmers of the west or of the east. It seems to me, therefore, that precisely because of these deficiencies the government should extend no less consideration to them in evaluating their needs. I suspect that one of the reasons why they are neglected is that they are not organized like a trade union. They are more of a rugged individualistic nature, but that is no reason why they should be forgotten.

Last year the interprovincial farm union council presented a brief pertaining to policy research. They advocated the setting up of an independent research agency to help in providing farmer organizations with the information for sound decisions in matters of crops, marketing, and so forth. This was to be an independent government research agency to help solve problems of agriculture. I wish to quote from page 3 of this document:

> The objectives of this research would be: to explore the underlying principles of agricultural policy; to examine and place in perspective the peculiar features of the Canadian economy that are significant for such policy; to establish sound bases for developing and applying economic policies; to appraise particular current policies in this field with the object of suggesting alternatives or recommending changes; and to make the results of such research widely available, especially to farmers governments and the general public.

On page 6 it goes on to describe the scale of research activities and says:

> While it would be desirable to start such research on a substantial scale there are good reasons for establishing a modest organization in the beginning to permit it to be developed on a sound basis as it expands. It should be emphasized that if the maximum benefits are to accrue to farmers, governments and the general public, it would need to be so organized as to be capable of logical expansion to meet policy research needs.
> It is proposed therefore that the research organization be established with a nucleus staff of researchers, a small clerical and stenographic staff, a moderate allotment for office and travel funds, and a small allotment to be used for grants to colleges or universities where such may be needed to obtain the supplementary information required by the research agency.

The Canadian Federation of Agriculture, in their presentation to the cabinet on February 24 of this year, made another plea for such a research council. They recognized the need for a study of farm problems and included in their presentation was this passage which I wish to quote:

> There is a keenly felt need today for expanded research both into farm marketing and into the more general economic and social problems facing the farmer. Such research is needed so that we may intelligently develop and improve our marketing and support programs. It is needed also so that we may better understand what is happening in the farm economy and to rural society, and in doing so learn to develop farm policies and extension programs that will better meet the needs and problems which agriculture faces.

I fully agree with the establishment of such a council. Indeed, I urge the minister to give consideration to the implementation of this request. But in all of this there is not a word on behalf of farmers of the kind we have in northwestern Ontario. I suggest that if such a council is established it should have a member from the district of Thunder bay, one who would be familiar with the problems peculiar to the district, and that the council should not be just for the exclusive benefit of the wheat farmers of western Canada.

I come now to one of the most important features necessary for the development of the farming communities of our district, and that is an adequate system of providing funds without which farmers cannot expand nor can new farms be developed. Up to the present the experience with the farm loan board has not been the happiest so far as the farmers of the Thunder bay district are concerned. Recently I expressed the hope that the farm credit corporation, successor to the defunct farm loan board, will be more amenable in its policy toward small farmers and would-be farmers desirous of establishing themselves on the land because up to the present it has failed to establish an equitable policy of farm assistance for areas such as northwestern Ontario. However, hope springs eternal. What is needed is a policy of liberal credit and a national agriculture policy designed to encourage ownership and operation of farms in every section of Canada.

Finally, I wish to appeal to the minister to give the lakehead area some consideration. I suggest that he and some of his departmental assistants pay a visit to the Thunder bay district. The minister would be astounded and it would be an education for him. I suggest that such a visit would stimulate interest in the development of our land and it would also serve as a valuable encouragement to those who are already established in our rural communities.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that we will be proceeding with private bills in about 20 minutes I thought I might reply to some of the comments and speeches that have been made this afternoon. I thought that the hon. member for Kootenay West made a very good speech. He stated that agriculture has been going through a difficult period due to changed conditions and the technological revolution that has taken place in agriculture particularly during the past 15 to 20 years, and that a partisan approach will solve nothing from the agricultural point of view. I thought that was well said by the hon. member for Kootenay West and I was very glad to hear him say it. I am only sorry that some of his colleagues were not here to hear him say it.

There is no question that agriculture has been going through a difficult period during the last 15 to 20 years. Everybody concerned with agriculture knows that that has been the situation. Everybody knows that during this period a very rapid mechanization of agriculture has been taking place. Great improvements have been made from the scientific point of view in feeding methods, in breeding and so on. All of these things have combined to produce in the western countries at any rate a surplus situation so far as a large number of agricultural products are concerned with the result that during the past 10 years particularly we have had increasing difficulty in disposing of the agricultural products that we have been able to produce. In other words, production has been going ahead more rapidly than the ability to find economic markets for these products has developed. This is a situation in which we are likely to be for some time, at least during the immediate future.

All of this has created quite a different set of circumstances from those which prevailed in the past and has made it necessary for us to change our thinking very materially as far as agriculture is concerned. Unfortunately the thinking on agriculture of a considerable number of people has not kept up with the changes that have taken place. They are still thinking of the past when it was possible to operate a farm of comparatively small acreage and provide the family with a living which would at least support them in a reasonable way. That day is now past.

The standard of living existing in this country is very much above what one might call the peasant level and therefore small acreages which in the past were capable of supporting a family are no longer capable of doing so on the basis of anything like the standard of living that is demanded in a country such as Canada at the present time. From the point of view of economic family farm units this makes it necessary to form considerably bigger units from the acreage point of view and particularly from the capital point of view, involving livestock, machinery and so on, than was the case even as little as 15 to 20 years ago.

The hon. member for Kootenay West said that there was a great contradiction in our agricultural policies because on the one hand the scientists were constantly working to produce better breeds of livestock, better types of plants and improved methods of producing agricultural products of all kinds—in other words, we are doing a great deal of work to encourage and increase production—while on the other hand marketing policies to quite an extent were designed to limit production. I would point out that these two lines of activity are not necessarily in contradiction of each other. If we are to have successful farmers they must be able to produce in as efficient, scientific and up to date a way as farmers in any other part of the world, and in order to put them in the position where they can do so we have to continue to develop our research activities and to ensure that these activities produce the best types of both plants and animals for particular localities and evolve the best methods of producing agricultural commodities of all kinds. In view of the sort of situation we have at the present time, where in most of the western world agricultural products are being produced in excess of the ability of the people to consume them, it is necessary to have production and marketing policies which will keep production down to the limits of what can be marketed or disposed of in an economic way.

We can, of course, give away a certain amount of our products in certain areas. Canada has done a great deal of that, but there is a very definite limit to what can be done along that line. By and large we have pursued policies which, as I say, ensure, so far as that can be done, that very large surpluses which cannot be disposed of are not piled up with consequent storage costs and so on.

The hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska made a speech, but I do not believe I will say very much about it. His speech was of the type, as the hon. member for Kootenay West said, which did not carry forward the cause of agriculture in any way. It was a purely partisan, political speech. It was designed to show that the situation of the farmer was better under the previous Liberal government than it is under the present Conservative government, something which it is impossible to do. Every farmer knows that this government has done far more in the way of putting schemes into effect or passing legislation to aid farmers in the two or three years which it has been in office than the previous government did in the 10 or 15 years before that. As I say, I do not think I should take up any time in dealing with the very large number of, what shall I say, false assumptions and misinformation which the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska put forth.

The hon. member for Wetaskiwin spoke of a scheme being carried on in the United States for taking land out of production, the soil bank as it is called there. I should like to point out that we have done a fair amount along this line in Canada. We have set up the P.F.R.A. community pastures and provincial community pastures in western Canada, a means by which land has been taken out of ordinary production, out of grain growing, and made available for the use of smaller farmers to pasture livestock, thus enabling many people who otherwise would not be able to diversify their activities to get into the livestock business. The conservation measures which we are presently carrying out, and which we contemplate carrying out to a greater extent in the future, will involve more work along this line.

The hon. member for Kent, (N.B.) quoted some figures by which he attempted to show that the deficiency program in connection with eggs had led to a decline in production from the small producer rather than the large producer. Of course, our great trouble had been overproduction. The statistics used were from a paper which has been a most bitter opponent of deficiency payments on eggs. I do not know where this publication obtained these figures, but as I say the paper has been the bitterest opponent of this program in connection with eggs. Actually our records, taken from the grading stations, indicate the exact opposite. A big reduction in egg production has taken place in so far as the large producer is concerned. I think every logical examination of the matter would show that was what was most likely to take place, and I think that is what has taken place. Actually this same publication from which the hon. member quoted these statistics complained for several months that this policy was going to destroy the large egg producers, the most efficient producers. Now, evidently, this publication is trying to be on both sides of the fence in connection with this matter.

[Mr. Harkness.]

The hon. member for Kent, (N.B.) spoke of the necessity for disseminating the results of agriculture research to the farmers so that they can make practical use of it. I agree with that thoroughly. It is essential that improvements which are discovered by scientists at research stations be communicated to the farmers, the men who can actually make use of them. We, of course, do a considerable amount of work along that line by making the results of our research work available in pamphlets of all kinds which are distributed particularly to agricultural schools and tc the provinces. As the hon. member knows, education is the exclusive prerogative of the provinces and, in so far as agriculture is concerned, the division of the work between the dominion and the provinces is that the provinces are primarily responsible for the dissemination of agricultural information to the farmers and we are primarily responsible for the research work, the discovery of new methods, new types of plants, better types of livestock and so on.

The hon. member for Vancouver East made a speech dealing particularly with the fact that United States firms, in recent years, have been buying up Canadian canning plants and closing them down. He dealt particularly with the tomato situation in British Columbia. I should like to assure him that I was alarmed at both of these situations, and I had an investigation made in order to ascertain what the situation was. In so far as the allegations which have been made about United States companies buying up Canadian plants and then shutting them down, are concerned, this is what the investigation showed. In so far as Ontario is concerned, whilst there has been a considerable amount of buying up of small canning plants by large United States canning concerns, the total amount of production has not been reduced. In many cases what happened was that three, four or five small and comparatively inefficient canning plants were bought up and one big canning plant with a large production, greater than the four or five, was built or one of the bigger plants which had been bought was greatly enlarged in order to make one large, more efficient operation. In British Columbia there has been a definite reduction in the number of canning plants, but that is a different story which I shall mention later.

Production as a whole, so far as the canning of fruits and vegetables in Canada is concerned—I have not got the report here—has not been materially reduced as the hon. member for Vancouver East seems to believe.

Mr. Winch: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Harkness: Yes.

Mr. Winch: If that is so why is it if you go to a store in Ottawa or in British Columbia and you buy—let us take the Aylmer brand which is a big one—canned produce, why do you read on the label, "Produce of the U.S.A."?

Mr. Harkness: I think the only way to see the whole story is to look at the complete figures. If you go into a store here or in British Columbia you will find that for the most part the goods are Canadian. However, you will find some that have been canned in Italy, England and all other countries. However, the bulk have been canned in Canada.

So far as the tomato situation in British Columbia is concerned, the difficulty there has not been a matter of United States plants buying up British Columbia canning plants and then deliberately closing them down, the difficulty has been entirely one of economics. The cost of producing tomatoes in British Columbia had risen too high to enable them to compete with tomatoes canned in the United States or other areas. There are several reasons for this. The first one is that the tomato acreages in British Columbia were quite small. They were too small to be worked by machinery and, therefore, a great deal of hand labour was involved.

The second thing is that labour has become increasingly hard to get in British Columbia and increasingly expensive; I refer to farm labour. Hence the cost of producing tomatoes in British Columbia has gone up out of proportion to the cost of producing them in Ontario and particularly out of proportion to the cost of producing them in California.

The most important factor of any is that, as a result of soil deterioration in British Columbia, both the yield and the quality of the product has gone down. It is owing to lack of organic material, to a large extent, in the soil which they have not been replacing as they should have done. As a result, the yields of tomatoes in British Columbia at the present time are just about 50 per cent of what they are in California. It is quite clear that if you are producing only half as much of a product on an acre of ground in one place as is being produced in another, you cannot compete. The actual fact is that the growers in California have been getting an average of $10 a ton less for their tomatoes than have the growers in British Columbia. But nevertheless, in spite of that fact, the growers in British Columbia have been steadily driven out of the business; they have not been able to compete because they were growing only half as many tomatoes per acre.

These are the basic and essential reasons why the tomato canning industry in British Columbia has been getting smaller and smaller and, it appears, is not going to be able to continue as an economic industry in competition with tomato growing either in Ontario or in California. No one regrets more than I do that that is the situation.

Mr. Macdonnell: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Harkness: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell: Would that situation apply to other products?

Mr. Harkness: Would it apply to other products? Where does the hon. member mean?

Mr. Macdonnell: In British Columbia.

Mr. Harkness: No. Apple production in British Columbia is still being carried on in a fairly successful way and also the production of other tree fruits of various kinds. But as to tomato growing and tomato canning, the chief vegetable canning business in the Okanagan and adjacent valleys, as the hon. member indicated, this is what has happened. As I say, nobody regrets that more than I do. During the past three years we have been providing a considerable subsidy in order to try to get this industry going. However, it is not much use to be paying out subsidies for an industry which is shrinking rapidly every year. In other words, it is like throwing your money down a rat hole. You are better off spending the same amount of money on an industry which shows some sign of being capable of being improved or revived or of being made successful.

The hon. member for Yukon gave an extremely good and thoughtful speech with regard to agriculture and development in the Yukon. I am extremely glad to have his ideas in this regard and I should like to assure him that I will have the officials of the department study his suggestions; and we shall see how many of them we can put into operation or make preparations to have put into operation in the coming years.

The hon. member for Fort William was requesting cold storage and other facilities of that sort to be provided at the lakehead for the benefit of lakehead farmers and he went on to say that the government should extend the same consideration to farmers there as to farmers elsewhere. The answer to that statement is that we do so. What the hon. member seems to want is special consideration which is not extended to farmers anywhere else.

The government does not build cold storages for farmers at any place. We make a subsidy to a farmers' co-operative or to a commercial concern that wants to build a cold storage. The same thing applies with regard to a cheese factory. We do not build any of these things. The farmers themselves or some commercial concern in the area must go ahead and build; under these circumstances we provide subsidies but we do not build them. I think perhaps the hon. member was under a misapprehension in that regard. I should like to assure him that we give or are prepared to give to the farmers in the Thunder bay district the same consideration as that accorded to farmers anywhere else in the country.

Mr. Michaud: Is the department giving subsidies to potato houses?

Mr. Harkness: Yes. We have given subsidies for the construction of a considerable number of potato storages.

Mr. Badanai: May I ask the minister whether he intends to pay a visit to the lakehead area? We should like to have him make a visit there.

Mr. Harkness: I should be very happy to pay a visit to the lakehead area on some suitable occasion. One of my great difficulties, I might say, is that I am obliged to turn down at least nine tenths of the invitations get to appear at various agricultural meetings and fairs, district shows and things along that line. I find that it is quite difficult to get around to see all these places. It is a big country and time is always somewhat at a premium.

(Translation):

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Chairman, during the two minutes or so left before five o'clock, I should like to tell the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) that, if I were as considerate and courteous with him as he was with the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger), I would point out the hollowness of his remarks concerning the constructive criticism made by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska on agriculture.

The fact remains that the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska gave statistics that the minister could hardly deny. So, instead of trying to deny them, he preferred the easier path of irony and sarcasm, which obviously means that he had no solid argument. I will take it upon myself next week to answer the points he put forth this afternoon, as in my opinion the remarks of the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska were actual facts, contrary to the Minister of Agriculture's contention.

May I, Mr. Chairman, ask you to call it five o'clock?

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being five o'clock, in order to allow the house to proceed to the consideration of private and public bills it is my duty to rise, report progress and request leave to sit again later this day or at the next sitting of the house, as the case may be.

Progress reported.

PRIVATE BILLS

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private and public bills, the former having precedence, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15.

THIRD READING—SENATE BILL

Bill No. SD-39, for the relief of Stella Jean Margaret Newman Lamartine.—Mr. McCleave.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it the pleasure of the committee that the 54 divorce bills in this order be considered together?

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I was wondering if I might present a suggestion to the committee which might help solve some of the problems which have beset us for some time, now.

I realize that among these 54 divorce bills before us for consideration there are some which present special problems, problems which certain hon. members will undoubtedly wish to debate. However, there are other bills among them which need concern us very little and which might, indeed, be passed with little debate, or no debate at all. It seems to me that an appropriate course, if all hon. members would agree, would be for the committee to rise and report progress now, and before next Tuesday hon. members would have the opportunity to study the 54 bills which are now before us, if they have not considered them already, and pick out those particular ones which they want discussed. This course seems a reasonable one, and if it were adopted it would tend to break the log jam which has developed in connection with this particular responsibility of members of parliament.

I have heard the criticism made that we cannot wax very eloquent about the kicking around of the poor people in the Union of South Africa, because when it comes to arrangements here at home an unmerciful hosing has been given to the inhabitants of a certain province. I take that to be a justifiable criticism if the present situation continues, and I suggest that the proposal I have put forward might be a solution. If the hon. members belonging to the C.C.F. party would agree, we could rise and perhaps return to the debate on the agricultural estimates or take up some of the private members bills which so far we have not been able to debate under the rules of the house. I do not ask the hon. members to pass these 54 bills this afternoon.

Mr. Howard: I can appreciate the hon. member's position, but I must say that this has come without warning. In the second place, any comments on the suggestion made by the hon. member for Halifax would, strictly speaking, be out of order. Nevertheless, I hope the committee will not mind if we spend a few moments commenting on the suggestion which has been made.

Perhaps the hon. member for Halifax should have made his proposal a little more clear. Let us assume that the course as suggested is followed and that the committee reports progress and asks leave to sit again. There is then the next order to be considered, order No. 70, the house in committee on a particular divorce bill. Thus, it would have to be unanimously agreed that the committee dispense with this particular debate.

Mr. McCleave: That was in my mind, that we should take no further action on divorce bills this afternoon. If that were agreeable to the hon. gentleman, they could pick out from all the bills before us now the ones they would like to discuss.

Mr. Howard: There is another matter which will have to be taken into consideration. While for the last month or so this private members' hour from five to six o'clock has been spent entirely in dealing with divorce bills, it is, nevertheless, the hour for private and public bills, and if we dispense with the consideration of divorce bills we would, I assume, go on to deal with the further items on the order paper, public bills standing in the names of private members. We should have to think in those terms before we thought of agreeing to the suggestion put forward by the hon member for Halifax. Some of the hon. members who have public bills standing in their names—and I have some standing in mine—will want to proceed to debate certain of the items which are listed under public bills and orders. I know, for instance, that the hon. member for York-Scarborough is extremely interested in one bill which is in his name dealing with capital punishment. We might conceivably reach the resumed debate on the question of capital punishment raised by the hon member. This would be a good time for it The hon. member for York-Scarborough could speak and close the debate and we could vote on the subject matter this afternoon. These are all things that must be considered.

The Deputy Chairman: As far as the committee is concerned, all we can do is this: if I have a motion to rise and report progress, and the motion carries, that is what must take place. As for the next procedure of business, that would be a matter to be decided by the house as it saw fit.

Mr. Peters: Could the committee not give consideration to debating this whole matter which is before us, not necessarily picking out one or two bills, but considering general principles. I think it is generally agreed that the situation, as it is, is far from satisfactory. In other words, would it be possible for us to set aside the next private members hour so that we could discuss this whole matter and try to arrive at a more satisfactory method of handling this particular procedure than the one we have at the present time?

The Deputy Chairman: That is strictly a matter for the house to decide. The committee only does what it is instructed to do by the house. That is why, in committee, everything must be relevant to the subject matter for discussion. The committee is only able to do what it is instructed to do by the house.

Mr. Benidickson: May I simply say I should like to suggest to the hon. member for Halifax that if there is merit in the suggestion he is advancing he would probably make more progress with a suggestion of this kind if he arranged to see the representatives of the parties prior to the arrival of this particular hour. Perhaps, having next Tuesday in mind, he might come to an arrangement of this kind. I have a great objection to interfering with this hour without adequate notice being given in advance. It is probable that there were hon. members who were interested in the discussion which has just concluded and who felt they could return to other duties. For this reason they would not be here to take part in a debate which they had every reason to think would not come on, supposing, that is, we were to agree to making the alteration proposed. Moreover, there are hon. members who have come here especially to be present during this particular hour, and I do not think they should be asked, except in exceptional circumstances, to agree to a change of rules without there being prior consultation and inter-party discussion.

Private Bills—Divorce

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the 54 bills be discussed in one item? If not, we shall discuss Bill No. SD-41.

MARGARET ESTELLE ELEANOR EVANS LANESE

House in committee on Bill No. SD-41 for the relief of Margaret Estelle Eleanor Evans Lanese—Mr. McCleave—Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Howard: I have a comment or two to make in respect of this particular bill and the situation surrounding it, the evidence leading up to the petition being presented, and certain other material considerations which arise in the evidence presented before the Senate committee.

As the petition indicates in the first paragraph, the marriage between the petitioner and the respondent took place on September 27, 1952 in Montreal. The allegation of adultery is made in the petition and it is stated that the respondent committed adultery on September 16, 1959 with a person whose name and address is given. The petition states further that the respondent and the corespondent lived openly together as man and wife, and there is evidence given in support of these statements. I may say that there are no children born of this marriage; consequently this is a case with regard to which I do not run any risk of falling foul of the rulings made governing the committee in so far as references to children are concerned.

The petitioner was sworn and at page 9 of the evidence testified that she was married, where, by whom, gave her husband's and her own religion and was shown a document which she identified as the church certificate of her marriage. Some evidence was given about the problems existing prior to the alleged adultery. At page 10 Mr. Leithman, counsel for the petitioner, examined her as follows:

Q. Now, witness, following your marriage to your husband did you live together as man and wife?
A. Yes, we did.
Q. Are there any children?
A. No, sir.
Q. When did you and your husband stop living together as man and wife?
A. About September, 1957.
Q. Will you tell this honourable committee under what circumstances you left. Tell the committee just what happened.
A. Well, as you know—
Q. Just speak to the committee.
A. —I worked, and came home from work about nine o'clock in the evening and found my husband in bed with another woman. He put up quite an argument, and I left and stayed at my sister's for the night. I came back the following night thinking he would have a reasonable answer and found all my clothes outside the door, so I never went back.

[Mr. Benidickson.]

Q. In other words, he evicted you?
A. That is right, sir.

That is a startling question. I continue:

Q. Can you recall the exact date? Would you repeat the date?
A. September, 1957.
Q. Since September of 1957 have you lived together as man and wife? Did you get together again?
A. No.
Q. Has he supported you since that day?
A. No, sir, I have supported myself.
Q. You have had no relations at all since September of 1957?
A. No, sir.

I assume the reference is to intimate relations. I continue:

Q. Have you any personal knowledge of the alleged misconduct set out with one—?
A. I have never met her.
Q. Do you know this woman—?
A. I have never met her.

I am deleting the names of the parties.

On page 11 reference is made to the fact that no collusion or arrangement exist between the parties. The examination of the petitioner by her counsel continues as follows:

Q. Now, witness, is there any arrangement between you and your husband that you should go to Ottawa and petition for divorce?
A. No, I have not spoken to him for two years.
Q. Is there any inducement given by him for you to come here to obtain this divorce?
A. None at all, sir.
Q. Have you condoned his act? Have you forgiven him?
A. No, I have not.
Q. Would you take him back?
A. No, sir.
By the Chairman (Senator Roebuck):
Q. And you did nothing, I take it, witness, to bring about the adultery about which you complain?
A. Pardon?
Q. I say you did nothing to bring about the adultery about which you complain?
A. No, sir.
Q. You did not throw anybody in his way, or anything of that kind?
A. No, sir.

There are two investigators in this case, Mr. G. Daigneault and Mr. Clovis Paquette of Montreal. The Christian name of the former appears interchangeably in the evidence as "Gerard" and "Gerald" but I assume it is the same individual and that there has been a typographical error. Mr. Daigneault was sworn and testified as follows when questioned by Mr. Leithman:

Q. Witness, I show you a photograph of an individual, which photograph has been produced as exhibit 2 in the petition. Would you take cognizance of the photograph and say of whom it is a likeness?

The witness gave the name of the respondent. I continue:

Q. Witness, did you have occasion to investigate the conduct of—?
A. I did, sir.

It is established that the photograph was taken probably two months after the marriage, late in 1952. One wonders if a person's features could so change in seven years as to render a photograph invalid for purposes of identification but that is not important here because of other evidence adduced. I continue:

Q. What did you find out about him?
A. Well, sir, we were retained by you, Mr. Leithman, at the end of August 1959 at which time you gave us this photograph over here, and also gave us certain particulars. I verified those particulars, and as a result of our investigation on September 16, 1959 at approximately 12.45 a.m., accompanied by Mr. Paquette, we proceeded to— avenue, apartment No.—, where, after knocking at the door a few times, a woman's voice was heard asking who was there. I then asked to speak to —, and she said: "One minute, please", and I heard her say: "—, it is for you". After a minute or two the door was opened by Mr.— himself. I then identified myself and asked to speak to him. He let us walk in and he invited us in the kitchen, which was to the right of the apartment as you walk in there.

In every other case I have reviewed the investigators pushed their way in or walked in casually, but in this instance there was an invitation. I continue:

With the aid of the photograph I asked if that was his photograph, to which he said: "Yes". I told him why I was there and that I knew he was living there with somebody else. At the time I was speaking the woman came back in the kitchen and we started talking, the four of us together. I asked the woman's name and she answered "—", and they both admitted they had been living as man and wife since the month of June, 1959 at that address. Previously, they told us, they were living as man and wife at—. The apartment consisted of three rooms with only one bedroom, a living room and a kitchen. There was a double bed and on the double bed both pillows had an impression.

I assume that he got into the bedroom of this apartment. I notice that Senator Roebuck asked some questions after this:

Q. What time of the day was this?
A. 12.45 a.m.
Q. How was the man dressed?
A. When he answered the door he was wearing grey pyjamas and slippers, and the woman was wearing a blue dressing gown and had the bottom part of pyjamas on, you could see underneath the dressing gown.
Q. Had she shoes on?
A. Slippers.

Then he describes this particular woman, estimates her weight, age, height and other features. I would point out that other evidence is given by Mr. Daigneault to the effect that he made some additional checks and found out that the apartment was registered in the woman's name, the corespondent, and she is paying the water taxes under that particular name.

Following this Mr. Paquette was called as a witness. He gave evidence which substantiates pretty well what Mr. Daigneault had said. He answered questions about what were his activities and so on, and then he said:

A. On September 16, 1959, I was accompanied with Mr. Daigneault and we went to his apartment.

He gave the name of the apartment and the name of the street. I continue:

It was 12.45 a.m. when we went to the apartment and after Mr. Daigneault rang the bell we heard a woman's voice asking who it was, and Mr. Daigneault told her that he wanted to see Mr.—— So about a minute after Mr.—— opened the door and we identified ourselves we went into the apartment, and once we were in the apartment we found out that there was a woman in the place.

I assume, Mr. Chairman, they knew the woman was there in the first place or they would not have wasted their time going to discover what was taking place there. However, this may only be the phraseology of Mr. Paquette. Perhaps he had to say they found a woman was there; they knew it beforehand but they had to verify it once they got into the apartment. In any event, he continues:

We told him we knew this woman is not his wife and he says, that is right, but we have been living together, I imagine, a couple of years, and he says we are known in the apartment as Mr. and Mrs. So we told them the reason of our visit and after taking a sketch of the place went out.
Q. The woman you saw in the apartment, was it this lady here?
A. No, sir. I never seen this woman before today.
Q. What else transpired while you were there?
A. What do you mean by that?

The lawyer was having some difficulty in getting him to say the right thing here, apparently. I continue:

Q. Was there any other conversation between Mr. Daigneault and Mr.—that you heard personally?
A. He showed him the picture and he admitted that it was his picture.
Q. How did he get the name of the woman who was there?
A. Some other investigator made a previous investigation and I don't know anything about that.

I would gather from this that these particular investigators and others do not follow through one case from the time that they are commissioned by a lawyer. By the time they enter into it from one end to the other some of the investigation is given to some other investigator, and the information made available from previous investigations was probably passed on to Daigneault and Paquette. Then, Senator Roebuck made some comments and asked some questions as follows:

Q. Do you remember whether she was asked her name on that occasion?
A. Yes, he asked her her name and she mentioned—.
Q. When that admission was made were they both together?
A. Yes.
Q. Who spoke, the man or the woman?
A. She said it was—.

Q. No, I mean the statement about living together.
A. He said it.
Q. And was she there?
A. Yes.
Q. Did she make any response?
A. No.

Mr. McGee: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, I draw your attention to citation 144 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, fourth edition. For some time now the hon. member and his colleague behind him have been following the practice during private members' hour of connecting up a speech or so-called address to this house with lengthy quotations from a document which he has in his hand. By citation 144 and rulings of other Speakers in the past it has been clearly established that the purpose of the rule is precisely to prevent that pattern of addressing the house or the committee. This citation reads:

It is a rule in both houses of parliament that a member must address the house orally.

Certainly I do not think that citation can be stretched to the point where an hon. member may link together extensive verbatim quotations from any document whatsoever with a very few words. I would appreciate very much, Mr. Chairman, if you would consider whether the pattern of addressing this committee in this way is consistent with the spirit of the citation I have quoted.

Mr. Howard: May I comment on the point of order raised by the hon. member for York-Scarborough. I say first of all I appreciate his drawing of this question to the attention of the committee. However, I do not think we are justified in giving the weight to the point of order raised by the hon. member that he is asking us to do. Citation 144 reads:

It is a rule in both houses of parliament that a member must address the house orally, and not read from a written, previously prepared speech—

Then, it goes on to say:

—for the reason that, "if the practice of reading speeches should prevail, members might read speeches that were written by other people, and the time of the house be taken up in considering the arguments of persons who were not deserving of their attention".

I do not think the hon. member for York-Scarborough would suggest, for instance, that the comments and questions of Senator Roebuck were not deserving of our attention. This is not a previously prepared speech, I submit. In this instance, what it is is substantiation; in other instances it might be argument against the bill. The bill says, "The marriage is hereby dissolved." Therefore, in order to prove whether the marriage took place in the first instance it is necessary to read from the testimony before another committee, not a previously prepared speech but testimony, to prove that particular allegation in the bill.

In the bill reference is made to adultery. That is the reason why the marriage is to be dissolved. Again, what I am doing is not reading a previously prepared speech but reading evidence taken under oath before a committee of the other place in substantiation of the question of adultery.

Mr. McGee: If I may reply to the hon. member's attempt to avoid the clear implications of this ruling, he has said that he is not reading a previously prepared speech. That is exactly my point.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The Chair cannot accept that point at all. The hon. member for Skeena is referring to evidence given to the committee and I certainly would not want under any conditions to rule that evidence given in a committee cannot be discussed or read in this committee.

Mr. Chambers: Is it not a rule that things that are read by a member should be vouched for by him? I wonder whether the hon. member would be willing to vouch for the information he has given the committee this afternoon?

The Deputy Chairman: Order. This is evidence given in committee under oath.

Mr. Howard: Just as an aside, what I intend to do is to vouch for the fact, with respect to some instances we have discovered, that the evidence given is not true.

Mr. Chambers: You are misleading the committee then.

Mr. Howard: I know that my friend asked that question with a slight smile on his face and in any event he indicated the answer before he asked it. Prior to the point of order being raised, I had in fact reached the end of the quotation from the evidence taken before the other committee because it proves the points that it is necessary to prove so far as marriage, adultery and so on are concerned. I have not looked at the file in this case to see whether the respondent and corespondent were properly served. Neither the respondent nor the corespondent appeared. On the evidence of Daigneault and Paquette it would appear that there was a frank and open admission that these people were living together as man and wife. This carries with it the implication that intercourse took place between them and probably will continue to take place between them as long as they continue to live together as man and wife. In fact, if this divorce is granted it may provide an opportunity for the respondent and corespondent to legalize the relationship they have had for some two or three years. I think it has existed for about that length of time but in any event it has been in existence for some time.

There does not appear to be a great deal more to add apart from mentioning the evidence of the petitioner herself. She said that she came home and found her husband in bed with another woman. She came back the next evening thinking that he would have a reasonable answer, found her clothes outside the door and never went back again. It makes one wonder why she did not consider taking action for divorce in September, 1957 when this incident occurred in her own home involving her husband and another woman. I do not know why it took some two years for her to petition for a divorce. That is beyond our knowledge at the moment. One wonders why she waited for two years but apart from that I think we can classify this case as one of those so-called open and shut types of cases where there is no conflict in the evidence given by the two investigators.

Both investigators appear to be fairly sure of what happened so far as time and so on are concerned. That is in contrast to other cases we have had where the investigators were not sure. Because these investigators worked on this case together from start to finish and were both there at the same time I think we must insist that their evidence coincide and not be at variance. After all, they are working together and collaborating. How many members did the hon. member count?

Mr. Jones: Those who are here are getting very tired of this nonsense.

Mr. Howard: I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, and to the hon. member for Saskatoon that if he is not careful he will be misquoted again and his remarks will be attributed to someone else as they were the other day. I do not mind his interruption about nonsense.

Mr. Jones: I think what the hon. member has to fear is that his own remarks will be quoted.

Mr. Howard: The hon. member is at liberty to do that any time he wishes. For that matter, anyone else can quote them if they wish. This case appears to be one of those open and shut ones. There is not too much argument about it apart from wondering why there was a delay of two years from the time the wife discovered her husband in bed with someone else in their own home. She left and stayed with her sister over night, came back the next night and found her clothes outside the door. She has not spoken to him or had any support from him since that time. One wonders why action was not taken then rather than two years later? As I say, this is a matter of speculation and we might wonder about the delay in the same way as in cases that appear before the courts but I doubt very much whether that has too much relevance or importance.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, there are several remarks that might be made about the contribution to the debate we have just heard but more particularly about the poor lady who has come before us to ask for relief. She seems to have been lost sight of in the welter of words that have been read from the proceedings of the Senate divorce committee. Mrs. Lanese, the lady concerned, is 35 years old. She is a receptionist and waitress and as such she falls into the general category of cases that come before us. This is not a place for rich persons to seek relief by divorce. Most of the people who come before us as this woman does are of humble circumstances and most of them are women. She fits into that category.

She is a working woman and was at all relevant times. She came home one evening after working to find that her husband had taken up with another woman. In those circumstances I would think that she would be an object of pity and a person to be helped if some procedure could be found to help her. Years ago the fathers of confederation decided on the procedure and she has followed it faithfully. On September 21, 1959 she signed a petition in due and proper form and it may be found in the case book before us this afternoon.

I suppose when she signed her name on that petition and thought of the relief that would eventually come to her she had no idea that by coming before us she would be treated more miserably and in a more debasing and humiliating way than anybody anywhere else in the world, and in that regard I think, without referring to a particular area, of the debate we had on Wesdnesday last.

That is exactly what is happening here to this 35-year old woman. The record shows no blot against her and no reason why her problem should be flapped around like so much dirty linen in a place such as this. This is the sort of case which has been well handled all the way down the line. The proper procedures that parliament has set up have been used in this case, procedures which some of us have worked very hard to perfect in order that cases such as this would get due and proper consideration.

I will say no more than that, Mr. Chairman. It has been a scandalous state of affairs and if anybody ever had a clear right to come and ask that relief be given in a gentle and considerate fashion rather than in a scandalous and irresponsible manner, it is the woman who petitions us now.

Mr. Howard: I should like to raise a point of order. I followed very closely the remarks made by the hon. member for Halifax. Although he did not make reference to me, I must assume I am the person to whom he was referring because I am the only person who has participated in the debate so far, although there have been one or two interruptions. The use of the words "scandalous" and "debased" should not be allowed to pass unnoticed. I should like the hon. member to reconsider those particular words as they apply to me because I am sure I am the one to whom he was directing his remarks. I believe those words should not be used in a personal way because the hon. member knows very well, and we have said it I do not know how many times, that it is scandalous this type of action has to come here and be dealt with in parliament. There are so many alternatives which would make it easier for the individual and better for the individual. This is what we are trying to do. If, in the process of doing that, to get them out of parliament, we take up time, we feel it is unfortunately necessary in order to relate the cases as they come before us, whether they be good or bad.

My point of order is that the hon. member should reconsider those words "scandalous" and "debased".

Mr. McCleave: I can assure my hon. friend that I was not using the words "scandalous" and "debased" in connection with his person. I was saying the method was scandalous. I think there is a distinction between the two. I do not want any inference to be drawn that I was making a personal attack on him. It has never been my practice to do that sort of thing in the House of Commons, but I do think the method used is an extremely unfortunate one. The words were strictly directed toward the method and not toward a person in the House of Commons.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I want to ask the hon. member for Halifax a question. Would the hon. member say that, as a result of the C.C.F. filibuster here he feels the C.C.F. is setting up a new class consciousness and that the poor people are deprived of a divorce while the wealthy people can still go to the United States?

The Deputy Chairman: Order; I am sorry but the Chair cannot allow a question of that kind.

[Mr. McCleave.]

Mr. Jones: During the remarks made by the hon. member for Skeena he said that his objective in discussing these bills in the way he has been discussing them was in order to focus attention upon what he considers to be the unsatisfactory way of dealing with these matters in this committee. Now, that statement, Mr. Chairman, is quite out of order. By his own admission, therefore, this whole practice is out of order. He has said, in effect, that he is not discussing the bills that are before the committee at all for any purpose related to those bills, but he is discussing them for the purpose of changing the procedure by which divorce is handled.

He and every hon. member in this house has an opportunity, in the proper way, of bringing suggestions before this house for an alteration in the procedure.

The Deputy Chairman: Order; the point of order was strictly related to two words, and as to whether or not they referred to another hon. member. This matter was cleared up so the point of order has also been cleared up.

Mr. Howard: I merely want to say that the hon. member for Saskatoon has put succinctly and exactly what we are trying to do. I agree with him; that is exactly what we are trying to do.

Mr. Peters: The previous remarks remind me of one of our farm labourers. When I was a little boy he used to tell me that there were more ways of killing a cat than choking it with butter. Probably some of the remarks that have been made here were suggestions concerning alternate ways of disposing of that cat.

This bill is probably the kind of bill that the chairman of the miscellaneous bills committee was suggesting might be lumped into a category that would separate it from some of the bills we have been discussing during the past few weeks. In my opinion, and probably in the opinion of any hon. member who has taken the time to read the evidence, this bill is mild in comparison with many of the others. It may be that it was, in the light of this situation, that the chairman of the miscellaneous bills committee suggested this woman was having a disservice performed for her because we were discussing her particular case.

I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the fact she brought her divorce to parliament rather than having it handled through the procedures available in some of the other provinces results in the public of Canada being entitled to know about her problem. It is necessary to discuss it, and discuss it in the terms in which it has been reported to us from the committee which had the opportunity of hearing the evidence. I am pleased, as was the hon. member for Skeena, to learn that there were no children of this marriage. I believe that if our law were different it would be quite possible, because of the circumstances surrounding this marriage and the fact that there were no children, to dissolve this marriage in a much simpler manner than the course that has been followed.

The Deputy Chairman: Order; we cannot discuss the various methods of divorce. We must discuss this bill.

Mr. Peters: I was leading up to the fact that the circumstances surrounding the marriage were discussed on page 10 of the evidence. We find the following question asked by Mr. Leithman:

Q. Will you tell this honourable committee under what circumstances you left. Tell the committee just what happened.
A. Well, as you know—
Q. Just speak to the committee.
A. I worked, and I came home from work about nine o'clock in the evening and found my husband in bed with another woman. He put up quite an argument, and I left and stayed at my sister's for the night. I came back the following night thinking he would have a reasonable answer and found all my clothes outside the door, so I never went back.

It would seem to me, in this particular instance, if the woman was going to get a divorce she might base it upon the adultery of that particular night. However, it seems that this particular offence was condoned, and I suggest, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. McCleave: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Peters: Yes.

Mr. McCleave: Is it not a fact there were no other witnesses at that particular time, and might that not have had a bearing on it?

Mr. Peters: I am not so sure that the hon. senators would not have given some consideration, whether or not there were witnesses. I am not too sure about that. But the surprising thing is that the lady came back the next day. She did not really see anything wrong with this procedure. Frankly, if I had been a senator at the time and had been on this committee I would have asked her what they had had the argument about. She said he put up quite an argument. I am not sure what he put up the argument about. Would he not let his wife in bed also or did she want to get the other woman out and he did not, or what was the argument about? It seems to be very academic. Here would be grounds for adultery. If she had wanted to do so she could have gone out and brought in a neighbour. Here is another woman in her bed. It would have been as strong evidence as we usually get to confirm that adultery has been committed. But no; he put up quite an argument. The committee has not asked about the argument, as I say. I therefore fail to understand just what has gone on. This marriage just did not end at that particular time. There must have been situations and circumstances developing up to that particular night.

Then she left after this argument, but no explanation was given what it was about. I can see many reasons why there would be an argument on that particular night. But I should like to know whether they were the things that I think the argument would have been over or whether they were matters which may have had a considerable bearing on the fact that she did not immediately go out and bring in her next door neighbour and ask her to be a witness to the other woman being removed from her bed or in laying a charge of adultery which could result in this divorce. She came back the next day and I am not sure what she came back for. From reading the evidence it looks as though she came back to move back into the house again but her clothes were outside and obviously she did not do so.

Mr. McCleave: Scandalous, scandalous, scandalous.

Mr. Peters: I hear the sponsor of this bill saying "scandalous". I am not sure just what he is referring to. There are a number of things involved at the present moment that are scandalous. One is that the Canadian people are electing their representatives and are sending them to Ottawa to handle this particular bill which obviously should be handled in a court by legal advisers.

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Peters: It is scandalous, Mr. Chairman, because we are being asked to consider evidence that was obtained at a subsequent date on an adultery charge, when an adultery charge already had resulted and had been quite obvious because of the break-up of this marriage in the first place. It is scandalous in a number of ways. If the legal counsel had been consulted shortly after this offence took place I would be greatly surprised if they could not have established the divorce at that time.

Mr. McCleave: They could not have done so.

Mr. Peters: The sponsor says they could not have done so. I am just as happy to take somebody's word, that of the sister to whom she went and to whom she probably related the story. That would be almost as corroborative evidence as one would receive from this particular investigator.

Mr. McCleave: It would not be in court.

Mr. Peters: Maybe it would not be in court but we are not in court. We are in the House of Commons debating a bill. I suggest that I personally would be just as happy to accept the evidence given by the sister to whom she went and knowing that probably the other woman was under duress. When she went to her sister I am quite sure she would have told her the story. I think even the sponsor would have given some consideration to that evidence and would not consider it to be unsupported testimony.

But, Mr. Chairman, this is not what happened. Some time went by and detectives were called in. They restated the case. The case, as I understand it, is where the husband has set up a common law alliance and is living with the other woman, and both admit they are living common law. But this happens in 1959, not in 1957 when the original problem developed. I am therefore suggesting there is some discrepancy in that particular. Certainly we are not using the easiest method and providing these people with the cheapest type of divorce bill possible.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member is back again to the method. We must stick to this bill. I do not want to be obliged to remind the hon. member again about this matter.

Mr. Peters: I am sure you will recall, Mr. Chairman, that the reason why I mentioned the matter of costs and some of the discrepancies was the fact that the sponsor, in speaking on behalf of this bill just a few moments ago, pointed out that this was quite an expensive divorce and that what was happening was causing undue expense and undue hardship to this lady in other respects. I am pointing out that if the legal counsel at that time had given advice that I think would have been acceptable we could probably in 1957 have established the grounds for adultery nearly as well as we could in 1959 without the added expense of having detectives and the other things.

Mr. McCleave: Will the hon. member permit one question?

Mr. Peters: Yes.

Mr. McCleave: Would it not suggest itself that this woman was so poor that it took her a couple of years to get the money together to come here before parliament? Will he also say whether he is going to vote for the bill at the last minute before six o'clock? If he does not do so and if he wants to talk the bill out, perhaps we could agree that it is six o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Timiskaming has the floor.

Mr. Peters: I agree that this case is one in which there is a common law alliance. I should have liked to continue and to point out that this common law alliance does not necessarily constitute adultery; but I will not do so because of the fact that it is all of six o'clock, that we want to see this woman get the divorce and in this case we also want to see the corespondent and the respondent get the redress that they are being given by this bill.

Clause agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): When shall the bill be read a third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Fulton: By leave.

Mr. McCleave moved the third reading of the bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Habel: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Carried on division.

Mr. Peters: I want the sponsor to be sure to note that I voted for it.

Motion agreed to, on division, and bill read the third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Benidickson: Would it be possible for the Minister of Veterans Affairs or the Minister of Justice to give notice now of what might take place on Wednesday? I know we have a supply motion for Monday and Tuesday.

Mr. Brooks: The business for Wednesday will be announced on Monday night.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

COURT OF APPEAL, NEWFOUNDLAND

Question No. 255—Mr. Argue:

1. Is there a court of appeal in the province of Newfoundland?
2. If so, on what date was it constituted, on what basis, by and under what authority?
3. Who are the judges serving in this court, by whom were they appointed, on what date, and what are their terms of office?
4. Do any of these judges serve in any other court in any capacity?
5. If so, which judges, in which courts, and in what capacity?

Answer by: Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice):

1. The judges of the supreme court of Newfoundland sitting en banc constitute the court of appeal for Newfoundland.

2. The supreme court of Newfoundland, with jurisdiction to hear appeals en banc, was established in 1824 by an act of the United Kingdom parliament, was continued by a further act of the United Kingdom parliament in 1832 and by Newfoundland statutes in 1867, 1889, 1904 and 1916, and was continued by term 18 of the terms of union of Newfoundland with Canada.

Question

3. The present judges and date and manner of appointment are as follows: Judge R. S. Furlong, chief justice, date of appointment, May 12, 1959, manner of appointment, governor general; Judge Sir Brian Dunfield, date of appointment, November, 1939, manner of appointment, the sovereign; Judge H. A. Winter, date of appointment, December, 1947, manner of appointment, the sovereign.

Their term of office is during good behaviour subject to removal by the Governor General on address of the Senate and the House of Commons.

The judges in office at the date of union were continued in office by term 18 of the terms of union.

4 and 5. By section 80 of the election act (act No. 79, 1954) a judge of the supreme court may serve as a recounting officer in elections of members of the legislature but as such he sits as persona designata under that act and not as a judge of the supreme court. By section 13 of the district courts act (cap. 116, revised statutes, 1952) a judge of the supreme court may preside in a district court. The judges have appointments as district judges in admiralty of the exchequer court for the Newfoundland admiralty district. One or other of the judges has from time to time served as chairman of a royal commission.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, May 2, 1960

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

WELCOME TO HON. MEMBERS RETURNING TO HOUSE FOLLOWING ILLNESS

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, may I draw attention to the fact that two members are with us this afternoon who have been prevented by illness from attending the sessions of the house. I refer to the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan) and the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin). I am sure the house is, to a man and to a woman, glad to welcome the two members back to our midst in good health, and will trust that good health may attend their efforts in the house.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might be permitted in my turn to welcome back to the house the hon. member for Middlesex East (Mr. White) who has been away for some weeks now and I understand has had a serious illness. He is a member who has won the respect of all members of the house, to whatever party they may belong, both as a member of the house and as chairman of the committee on external affairs. We are delighted to see him back in such good health.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

PRIVILEGE

MR. ARGUE—REFERENCE TO REMARKS IN DEBATE BY PRIME MINISTER ON APRIL 27.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege arising out of a statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) on Wednesday, April 27, at a time, sir, when I was not in the house or I would have answered it at that time. The Prime Minister had this to say, as reported at page 3335 of Hansard:

> When about two weeks ago I spoke on this subject and referred to the possibility of there being a debate, my natural view was that the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), having regard to Monday being the last private members' day, would have permitted the clearing away of a number of cases on a subject that is receiving general attention from members of the C.C.F. party.

I want to make it perfectly clear that this suggestion was not made to me nor, as far as I know, to any other member of the C.C.F. party. On the basis of our attitude on this question in the past, on the basis of proposals we have made about bringing on such a debate, I would suggest that any proposal for unanimous consent to have the subject of apartheid brought forward on Monday would have received our consent. The Prime Minister went on to say:

> If that had been so, we could have placed on private members' motions a motion similar to the one indicated by the hon. gentleman—> —and with consent could have proceeded to discuss it.

That is, the Leader of the Opposition.

I want to point out that if such a private member's motion, not a government motion, had been placed on the order paper it would have been No. 53 and could not have been debated at that point except by unanimous consent. My question of privilege is that I was not asked on behalf of the C.C.F. group to agree to any alteration of business, and I would point out that anything that could have been done by consent on Monday could have been done by consent on Wednesday.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PERSONNEL OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE EXPENDITURES

Mr. John Pallett (Peel) moved:

> That the special committee on defence expenditures, appointed on March 18, 1960, be composed of Messrs. Baldwin, Carter, Chambers, Fairfield, Forgie, Halpenny, Hellyer, Lambert, MacEwan, Parizeau, Pratt, Roberge, Smith (Calgary South), Webster and Winch.

Motion agreed to.

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT TO SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved:

> That items numbered 217 to 237 inclusive, as listed in the main estimates of 1960-61, relating to the Department of National Defence, be withdrawn from the committee of supply and referred to the special committee on defence expenditures, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister, with regard to the motion he has just moved, how it will be possible to refer these estimates to a committee which, by its terms of reference, will be prevented from dealing with them? Before the motion is adopted would the minister deal with that question?

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, but I am informed that the motion is not debatable. It may either be accepted or rejected.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): In that case perhaps I might raise a point of order with respect to whether the house should entertain this motion to send to a committee, which has specific terms of reference set out by the house, a reference which, under those terms set by the house that committee would not have the power to deal with. Perhaps the house leader could deal with the point of order.

Mr. Churchill: The point of order would be decided by standing order 57, which reads as follows:

A motion, to be decided without debate or amendment, may be made without notice during routine proceedings by a minister of the crown withdrawing any item or items in the estimates from the committee of supply and referring the same to any standing or special committee and, upon report from any such committee, the said item or items shall stand referred to the committee of supply.

Mr. Speaker: If there is any substance to the point of order I suppose it would be that this motion is in conflict with a previous motion of the house. But I would think the house is free to enlarge its reference at any time by adopting this motion. There is really no point of order arising from this motion which is now before the house.

Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT TO SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved:

That items Nos. 66 to 74 inclusive, as listed in the main estimates of 1960-61, relating to the Department of Defence Production, be withdrawn from the committee of supply and referred to the special committee on defence expenditures, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

Motion agreed to.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

BRITISH COLUMBIA PENITENTIARY INMATES

Motion No. 92—Mr. Howard:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the federal government or any agency or branch thereof, and any provincial government, person, or organization since January 1, 1957, dealing with amnesty, pardon, parole or remission for any inmate in the British Columbia penitentiary.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): I spoke to the hon. gentleman about this motion, and I think I should point out to the house that the subject matter dealt with therein, amnesty, pardon, parole or remission, it seems to me is one dealing with the prerogative powers of the crown, with the exercise of which the government is specifically charged, and as such it has always been a principle of this house that such a matter should not be inquired into by the house and that the documents relating thereto should be treated as confidential. It would not be in the public interest to make them public.

On this ground I suggested to the hon. member that he might agree to drop the motion. I also pointed out to him that the number of files involved would be enormous, within the terms of the motion as framed, and I indicated to him that if he had an interest in any one particular file I would be prepared to consider, on a personal and confidential basis, an arrangement that would allow him to look at the file. Under those circumstances I understand the hon. member will agree to allow the motion to be dropped.

Mr. Howard: That is quite true, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Since the motion has not been put I presume it may be withdrawn.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

DISALLOWANCE OF LABOUR LEGISLATION, NFLD.

Motion No. 93—Mr. Winch:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged, during the past twelve months, between the federal government, or any agency or branch thereof, and the province of Newfoundland; and any interdepartmental correspondence and documents, dealing with disallowance or otherwise of labour legislation passed by the legislature of Newfoundland.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): When this motion was first called a week or so ago I pointed out that it seemed to be divided into two parts, one asking for the production of correspondence between governments and the other asking for the production of interdepartmental correspondence. Since that time the hon. member and I have had a discussion, and he pointed out that what he really had in mind in the words "interdepartmental correspondence" was a copy of any order in council or similar document dealing officially with the matter of disallowance.

He also pointed out that previously there had been a number of occasions when such documents of the class I have just mentioned were produced. On that basis, if the words "interdepartmental correspondence", were to be interpreted as meaning the official report of cabinet decisions regarding disallowance, I would have no objection.

With respect to the first part of the motion, then, I would ask that it be accepted, subject to the usual arrangement that the consent of the provinces be sought.

Mr. Winch: May I ask through you, Mr. Speaker, whether the Minister of Justice includes in what he is prepared to file under the latter part of the question what has been filed on occasions in the past, and particularly in 1938; the report of the minister of justice on the question of allowance or disallowance?

Mr. Fulton: I have not the case of 1938 but I have one in 1945 with regard to the possible disallowance of certain Saskatchewan statutes, in which case the then minister of justice tabled in the house his report to council and the council minute. With respect to these Newfoundland statutes I would be prepared to table similar documents if they exist, but it is my recollection that my report to the council was oral. We will certainly produce any such minute of council that exists with respect to this matter.

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure whether what has been said will give any different effect to the motion from that which the words impart. Perhaps if the hon. member who moves the motion is satisfied with the proposed interpretation of it and the house is willing to deal with it on that basis, it may be so dealt with, but I should think it would be preferable to have the motion amended.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Since this is a motion which the house is being asked to adopt, it seems to me it would be preferable to have the motion in the form in which the government intends to comply with it.

Mr. Speaker: It appears to me that it would be more satisfactory if the motion said what it was intended to say. I suggest that it stand, be reworded and brought forward again. Is it agreeable to the house that the motion stand? Is the hon. member for Vancouver East agreeable?

Mr. Winch: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

Motion stands.

Inquiries of the Ministry

SECTION 64, INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS AND DISPUTES INVESTIGATION ACT

Motion No. 95—Mr. Howard:

For a copy of all orders in council made since January 1, 1950, which altered the remuneration payable under section 64 of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): I wonder whether the hon. member would be agreeable to allow this motion to stand.

Mr. Howard: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreeable that this motion stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

Motion stands.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO REVIEW OF CANADA-U.S. AIR DEFENCE POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence whether he will comment on reports attributed to him over the week end to the effect that the whole question of Canada's part in air defence policy is to be considered at the next meeting of the United States-Canada joint cabinet committee.

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): At the next joint meeting between ministers from Canada and from the United States, scheduled to be held on July 11 and 12, next, the air defence policy of Canada and the United States, as far as defence of the North American continent is concerned, will be reviewed.

Mr. Pearson: As a supplementary question may I ask whether the minister intends to introduce his estimates into this house shortly so there can be a review of defence policy in the house?

Mr. Pearkes: I understood that my estimates had been referred to a committee, the members of which have been announced to the house today.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Can the minister say whether it is the intention of the government to have Canada's air defence policy, and particularly our expenditures on the Bomarc missile, considered by this committee?

Mr. Pearkes: The committee has every right, if it sees fit to do so, to examine any expenditures of the Department of National Defence of any kind during the period which was indicated by the Prime Minister. As far as the estimates for this year are concerned, there are in those estimates amounts for the construction of the Bomarc sites. Therefore it would be perfectly within the right of the committee to examine those expenditures.

Mr. Argue: A further supplementary question. I appreciate the minister's answer but would the committee, in his view, have the power to recommend the deletion of the item in the estimates covering the Bomarc missile?

Mr. Speaker: I do not think that is a proper question. It is a matter of the interpretation of the references to the committee which have been made on two occasions by the house, and it certainly is not the administrative responsibility of the minister to interpret the committee's power.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the Acting Prime Minister whether it is the intention of the government to provide an opportunity to discuss the whole question of defence policy in this house before this particular committee has reported back to the house?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the estimates of the Department of National Defence for the fiscal year 1960-61 have been referred to the committee—

Mr. McIlraith: Saving our right to discuss them.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, of course, saving the right of the committee of supply. That means that when the committee reports back to the house the estimates must come back before the committee of supply, and full debate may occur in committee of supply.

Mr. Pearson: Then we will be discussing defence expenditure before the committee, but not defence policy until that committee has reported back to the house?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): With respect, I think the hon. gentleman is not quite right. Certain functions were assigned by the house to the committee with respect to defence expenditure. The house also referred to that committee today certain tasks with respect to the defence estimates for the current fiscal year. As the Minister of National Defence has already pointed out, included in the estimates for the current fiscal year are sums proposed with respect to the development of the Bomarc sites. Therefore in the committee there will be full opportunity for any hon. member to make inquiry on this matter, and then when the committee chooses to report to the house there will be the usual opportunity for debate in committee of supply.

[Mr. Pearkes.]

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I would like to ask a supplementary question of the Acting Prime Minister. Does he not believe that in view of the great developments in the United States with regard to the Bomarc missile and the very important fundamental changes in policy of one of Canada's major partners, the United Kingdom, the time has arrived in this country when the earliest opportunity ought to be provided for the fullest discussion in this chamber of national defence matters?

Some hon. Members: Today.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the house has referred the matter to a committee, and as I understand it the committee will meet as soon as the members so decide.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Minister of Finance if he does not appreciate that only the estimates have been referred to this committee, in connection with which there could be a limited discussion of the expenditures of the department. Will the Acting Prime Minister arrange for the earliest discussion of the department's estimates?

Mr. Fulton: Supply motion today.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Of the department's estimates. When will the minister be in a position to make a statement on policy, not merely to answer specific questions but to make a statement on policy which at this time the newspapers clearly indicate is the wish of the Canadian people?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member asked for a review of the estimates. That is precisely what the house has provided for in this reference of the estimates of the Department of National Defence for 1960-61 to the committee. I do not know whether the hon. member is a member of that committee—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —but surely nothing could be done to offer fuller or more effective opportunity for detailed review of estimates than that they should be referred, as they have been by the house this afternoon, to that committee. It would then rest with the committee to report back to the house as soon as it chooses.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the Minister of National Defence whether it is his intention to appear before this committee to state government defence policy.

Mr. Pearkes: I shall make myself available to that committee whenever it is possible.

[Later:]

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Speaker, may I make a correction to a statement I made earlier. The dates for the meeting are the 12th and 13th, not the 11th and 12th, as I stated.

BOMARC MISSILE—INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE CHANGE IN CANADIAN POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): May I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence which arises out of the far-reaching developments in the United States with regard to the Bomarc missile. Has there been any change in the policy of the Canadian government toward the Bomarc missile as the result of these developments?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): The developments to which the hon. member refers were a recommendation of the appropriations committee to the House of Representatives. As far as the government of the United States is concerned there has been no change in its policy regarding the Bomarc. As the hon. member knows, after the matter has been considered by the House of Representatives the report of the appropriations committee of the Senate will then have to be considered, and the final decision in this matter is not expected until the end of June.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to press the minister too hard, but my question was this. In view of developments in the United States has there been any change in the policy of the Canadian government toward the missile?

Mr. Pearkes: The Canadian government entered into an agreement with the United States government 18 months ago to construct two Bomarc missile bases in Canada as part of a chain of Bomarc missile bases across parts of the North American continent. Until the government of the United States changes its policy, notifies us of a desire to change it or consults us regarding a change, Canada intends to live up to this agreement.

ELLIOT LAKE—REPORTED PROPOSAL TO ESTABLISH TRAINING CENTRE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Minister of National Defence whether his department proposes, as reported, to set up a training establishment at Elliot Lake.

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): As the Leader of the Opposition knows, the government as a whole has been investigating various means by which it could help to rehabilitate Elliot Lake, and the Department of National Defence has been making inquiries as to the practicability of establishing a training centre there.

FISHERIES

MARKETING ACT—INQUIRY AS TO ROYAL COMMISSION RECOMMENDATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries, notice of which I sent him, and ask whether he could inform the house what steps are being taken to put into effect the recommendation of the royal commission on food price spreads for a federal fish marketing act which would enable the provincial governments which wished to do so to pass their own legislation and thus regularize the negotiation of prices to fishermen.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. The report of the royal commission on price spreads on food products is under study by the government at the present time, and has been for some time. No action or decision has yet been taken with regard to the recommendation in the commission's report referred to by the hon. member.

Because of the need for thorough study and consideration of this section of the report, as well as the other recommendations, it is unlikely that legislation will be introduced at this session dealing with the subject of a federal fish marketing act.

Mr. Howard: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. When this takes place will it be as a result of discussions between representatives of the industry and organizations in the fishing industry as well?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Before a decision is taken to introduce such legislation the industry would certainly be consulted.

Mr. Howard: And the union?

INQUIRY AS TO EXTENSION OF COASTAL FISHING RIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the failure of the United Nations conference to set new limits for territorial waters and coastal fishing rights, will the minister inform the house when Canadian fishermen can expect the abolition of the twelve-mile limit and the extension of fishing rights in Canada's coastal waters similar to those enjoyed by fishermen in all other countries?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, first I should like to clear up a point that is implied in the question which I know is not intended to be misleading. With reference to Canadian fishermen it is only large Canadian trawlers, over 65 feet in length, that are excluded from the area between the territorial waters of Canada and nine miles beyond, and that is only true in certain parts of Canada and does not apply in Newfoundland, for example, or on the Pacific coast.

I think it would be too early to say what action may be taken by the government, or what proposals the government may make by way of amendment to the appropriate acts, but the matter is under close consideration at present in the light of developments which took place at Geneva.

HOUSING

NEWFOUNDLAND—ST. JOHN'S LAND ASSEMBLY PROJECT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, may I reply to a question of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate addressed to the Minister without Portfolio and then to myself on Friday last, as reported at page 3398 of Hansard of April 29 in these words:

> May I ask the Minister without Portfolio whether he is in a position to make a report on the proposed housing development in metropolitan St. John's, about which he made a public announcement some time ago?

In reply, Mr. Speaker, let me say that preliminary work in connection with the investigation of the proposed land assembly project is proceeding. The work includes such matters as the carrying out of boundary surveys, the preparation of contour plans, and investigations into the cost of acquiring the land as well as the cost of installing such services as sewage, water mains and roads.

COAL

NOVA SCOTIA—INQUIRY AS TO ACTION TO PREVENT CLOSING OF MINES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. Can the minister give an assurance to the house that the government is taking the necessary action to avert the closing of coal mines in Nova Scotia this year, as contemplated by certain coal operators of the area?

[Mr. Crouse.]

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, in answering this question I think it would be well to inform the house that around April 20 last, we were notified by Mr. A. L. Fairley, Jr., president of Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation, Limited, that seven of their nine collieries would not be in production for five days commencing Monday, April 25. This is the first of a series of temporary shut-downs that will be scheduled during the summer months of this year. They are caused by a shrinkage in coal consuming markets due to competition from secondary power, natural gas and oil. It is not possible at this time to state the total number of non-producing days that will be in effect this year.

The total production of the seven collieries for a five day period would average approximately 85,000 tons. The two collieries which will continue in full-time operation are No. 26, Dominion Coal Company at Glace Bay, Cape Breton Island and McBean, Acadia Coal Company at Thorburn, Nova Scotia mainland.

At the same time I should say that last week the fact-finding committee held a sitting here in Ottawa attended by the Minister of National Revenue and myself, Premier Stanfield, representatives of the united mine workers association and the provincial minister of mines, Mr. Manson and also the chairman of the coal board. They have produced their report and conclusions based on the hearings they held, and we are actively studying those conclusions and recommendations. Everything is now before the government, and when I have a statement to make I will inform the house.

Mr. Robichaud: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister inform the house whether any action has been taken not only to prevent a cut-back but to avert the complete closing of certain mines?

Mr. Comtois: I should say, Mr. Speaker, that there were no closings at all during the whole winter. The only thing that is contemplated at this time by the company is a temporary shut-down during the summer months. As far as complete closings are concerned, no decision has been taken, even by the company.

PUBLIC WORKS

CONSTRUCTION OF DREDGE FOR USE ON PACIFIC COAST

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, on April 28 last the hon. member for Laurier made some inquiries about the new hopper dredge on the west coast, two of which questions I answered and the third of which was:

—will he inquire from his departmental officials whether it is a fact that the laying of the keel of the dredge was postponed?

The reply is that there has been no delay in the laying of the keel. The contract for the construction of this new dredge was signed by the contractor on March 16, 1960. The keel is expected to be laid some time in the latter part of May.

As the hon. member would know, before the actual construction of the dredge could be commenced, working drawings had to be prepared by the shipyard and approved by the department. There has been no delay in the laying of the keel, as it would be impossible for the contractor to have taken any action toward preparing working drawings before December 29, 1959, the date on which he was advised by registered mail that he had been awarded the contract.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

LAND ASSEMBLY PROJECT, ST. JOHN'S, NFLD.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Public Works whether he can say how soon he expects to be able to table the documents with reference to the St. John's land assembly project, which was ordered by the house before the Easter recess.

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Oh, yes; I think by tomorrow I shall be able to table the documents. I thank the hon. member for asking the question.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

MAGAZINE ARTICLE CONCERNING CONSTRUCTION OF SCHOOL AT OLD CROW

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): May I ask the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources whether he is able to reply to the question I directed to him on March 30 last, in his absence, concerning the flying of supplies for the construction of the Old Crow school.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member for Yukon, the decision to fly certain supplies into Old Crow was taken because of the inability of the transportation services available on the river to carry the full amount of freight that would have to be carried in if the school were to be opened this fall.

Mr. Nielsen: May I ask a supplementary question. Will the minister check with the officials of his department? In view of the information I have recently received, is it still the intention of the department to fly in those supplies for the construction referred to?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I was checking with the department on Friday on this subject, and the decision is still the same.

PENITENTIARIES

ST. VINCENT DE PAUL—REPORTED SLAYING OF INMATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Justice. Is the minister able to give the house any information regarding the reported slaying yesterday of an inmate in St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): The information is much the same as reported in the Gazette this morning to the effect that the warden of St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary has reported that while the inmates were returning to their cells following the church service on Sunday morning, May 1, at approximately 10 minutes past 10, inmate Laurent was observed to fall while proceeding with the other inmates along the second gallery of the dome toward his cell on the third level. The officers on duty immediately went to his assistance and found that he had been stabbed in the back with a sharp instrument. The physician and chaplain were summoned immediately, but inmate Laurent died shortly afterward. The homicide squad of the Quebec provincial police took charge of the investigation, which is still under way.

Mr. Howard: A supplementary question The minister may not have the information readily available, but can he indicate just where the physician was at the time the man fell? Where did he have to be called from?

Mr. Fulton: I will get that information, Mr. Speaker.

TRADE

WHEAT—REPORTED AGREEMENT FOR SALE TO INDIA BY UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce arises out of a report in today's press that the United States and India will sign this Wednesday an agreement by which the former will sell to India over four years more than $1 billion worth of surplus wheat, to be paid for in rupees. Will the minister advise the house what effect this agreement may have on the sale of Canadian wheat?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I doubt very much whether it will adversely affect the sale of Canadian wheat. Our commercial market in India is limited, but we are watching this development very closely and we will have more information later on concerning this agreement.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister whether the Canadian government was consulted before the agreement was made, and also whether the Indian minister of agriculture, who is now in Washington, is to visit Ottawa?

Mr. Churchill: The information was made available on the official level, Mr. Speaker. The United States has been very co-operative in keeping us informed with regard to their surplus disposal program; and Mr. Patil will be here in Ottawa this week.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Has the Canadian government given any consideration to the adoption of a similar policy so that we may have a greatly needed expansion in Canadian wheat exports?

Mr. Churchill: The government of Canada has been pursuing this policy for the last three years in regard to giving assistance to countries like India, which are in need of food.

Mr. Argue: Has any consideration been given to the provision of Canadian funds for wheat in exchange for Indian rupees in anything like the size of the United States deal?

Mr. Churchill: There is a difference in the size of the countries, our population, the wealth of Canada and the United States; but the hon. gentleman knows that counterpart funds have been set up in India when we have made gifts of food to that country.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

CANADA SHIPPING ACT—INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENT THIS SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): On February 24 last, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport told us that it might be possible that changes in the Canada Shipping Act, which have been pending for two years now, would be introduced at this session. Can he give us any more information as to whether those amendments are to be put into effect this session?

[Mr. Pearson.]

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I hope to be able to introduce this session amendments to the Canada Shipping Act affecting pilotage on the great lakes.

FLOODS

MANITOBA—INQUIRY AS TO AGREEMENT ON RED RIVER CONTROL PLAN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I ask the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources a question. Does the government expect to reach an agreement with the government of Manitoba during the course of the present session of parliament concerning flood control in the Red river valley?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): I am not able to say with certainty that the agreement will be reached, but proposals have been put forward and are now under discussion.

Mr. Pickersgill: Are the negotiations continuing?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED REVISION OF HANDBOOK RESPECTING RIGHT TO VOTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. My question is based on a publication of the Indian affairs branch entitled "A Handbook for Indian Band Chiefs and Councillors". On pages 14 and 15 reference is made to the waiver forms of the Canada Elections Act, and the right of Indians to vote. Will the minister undertake to have this revised in order that no confusion will exist in the minds of the people who are circularized?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that will follow in the normal course of events after action has been taken.

AGRICULTURE

PORK—DISCONTINUANCE OF DISTRIBUTION IN SASKATCHEWAN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Minister of Agriculture what protests he has received from charitable and welfare organizations in Saskatchewan arising out of his announced decision that free canned pork will no longer be provided to that province.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have received no protests. I should like to make it clear that Saskatchewan has received a very much larger quantity of this free pork than any other province. From information which has come to light during the past week it would appear that they have received all the pork required for the purposes for which it was made available, that is for the relief of needy cases, people on municipal relief and so forth.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Has the minister not received protests from at least three of the hospitals in the province of Saskatchewan?

Mr. Harkness: No, Mr. Speaker.

SUPPLY

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

FEDERAL AID TO ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, there are a good many subjects on which the opposition might, with profit to the Canadian people, express grievances against the administration of the country by the present incumbents of the treasury benches; but we have felt that it would be indelicate at this particular time, with the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) absent from the country on the nation's business, to introduce a motion which would be in any way controversial. Therefore I have been chosen, for obvious reasons, to introduce a motion—which I intend to do before I resume my seat but not immediately—which we believe will commend itself to every hon. member; which will not express any condemnation whatsoever of the present administration, but will instead make an appeal to the administration to undertake certain things which we believe, and which we feel some of their supporters will also believe, would be in the general interests of Canada.

This, of course, is not an unprecedented use of the right of the opposition on a supply motion. The Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Fleming) will, I know, well recall several occasions on which this course was followed when he was over here and the opposition invited the government and its supporters, perhaps its supporters more particularly, to join in a unanimous expression of the views of the house. I do hope that when the vote comes tomorrow it will be possible to have the somewhat rare spectacle on supply days of such a unanimous vote.

What I am going to talk about is the present position of the Atlantic provinces. This will not surprise the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) or the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Brooks) or the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. MacLean) or the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Browne), all of whom are here today. We can only commend them for being here, unlike some of their colleagues on some previous occasions, and for anticipating that such a course would be followed. I said that I thought the government would perhaps be more apt to listen to this kind of appeal at this particular time. I do not propose to elaborate on that statement. I think it will be understood by every hon. member who wishes to understand and not misunderstand me.

It is just three years since the people of this country were engaged in listening to the candidates in an election campaign which some of us on both sides of the house are not apt to forget for a considerable time. In the Atlantic provinces the people were told by some hon. gentlemen now opposite that they were going to do something in the Atlantic provinces to increase the economic activity of that area, to increase the welfare of people in that area, to give it a closer approach to equality with other parts of the country than had been the case during what they were pleased to describe as the 22 years of Liberal neglect.

I want to say a word or two very briefly about those 22 years of so-called Liberal neglect in the Atlantic provinces. First of all I should like to recall to the minds of hon. members one of the best of all indices by which one can judge the effects of that neglect. Hon. members will recall that during the war it was necessary for the government of Canada to enter into agreements with the provinical governments—with all of them, I might add, because all of them did enter into these agreements at that time—for the renting of the direct tax fields, income and corporation taxes, that were occupied at that time by the federal government and by most of the provinces, though not by all of them.

In the year 1945, at the end of the war, the Atlantic provinces were receiving by way of rental payments—I should rather say the maritime provinces, because at that time Newfoundland was not a part of Canada—$7\frac{3}{4}$ million in lieu of the exercise by those governments of their taxing powers in those fields. That was in 1945. In the year 1956-57, the last full year the Liberals were in office, as the Minister of Finance is so fond of describing it, the three maritime provinces—here I am deliberately leaving Newfoundland out so the comparison will be exact—were receiving $43 million from the same taxation fields in lieu of the exercise of their rights of taxation, that is to say, about five and a half times as much as they had been receiving in 1945. In 1957-58, the year in which this government came into office, without any thanks whatever to this government because, as the Minister of Finance pointed out the other day, he voted against this legislation about which I am talking, the three maritime provinces were receiving under the tax-sharing arrangements $52 million. The increase made by Mr. Harris' legislation of 1956, which came into operation in the year 1957-58, was $9 million, and this was in the last year of our so-called neglect.

What does this mean, sir? It means that in only the last 12 years out of the 22 years what these provinces were receiving in the way of tax-sharing payments or equalization payments had risen from $7.75 million to $52 million or had been multiplied, as hon. members can very well see, something like seven times. Now, that is a very considerable increase indeed.

If other evidence were needed or desired as to the way the maritime provinces fared during this period that has been described as a period of Liberal neglect, there are two or three rather striking statistics that I can cite. In the first place, between 1936 and 1956 the population of greater Halifax rose from about 75,000 to 165,000. The number of motor vehicles registered in the province of Nova Scotia rose in that period from 45,000 to 150,000. The provincial revenues of Nova Scotia rose from $10 million to $57 million. This does not suggest, sir, that there was no advance in that area. In New Brunswick the population increased even faster than it did in Nova Scotia. The population of the whole province rose from 428,000 to 565,000 during those 20 Liberal years. The number of motor vehicles in New Brunswick rose from 31,000 to 116,000. I do not say that the motor vehicle is the only measure of the wealth of a community, but it is certainly a measure and perhaps, in our kind of society, not an altogether inaccurate measure.

I have had some calculations made and to the best of my ability I have based those, so far as possible, to take account of the fact that a certain thing did not appear at the end of a calendar year or at the end of a fiscal year. A certain very important event, for instance, happened on June 21, 1957, and this makes it a little difficult to measure these things precisely. However, it does appear that during the three years Mr. Harris was minister of finance of this country the personal income, the real income—here I am making due allowance for the change in the value of money and for inflation so the figures will be comparable—of the people in the Atlantic provinces increased at a very much more rapid rate than has been the case since. There has been some increase since, but the increase during the last three years the Liberals were in office was very much more marked.

When one turns to employment, the situation is even more startling. I am not saying anything about whether or not these figures are an accurate measure of unemployment; that is another matter. But certainly if you take the figures for one year and compare them with another year they are a pretty accurate measure of the change. When we were appealing to the people in the spring of 1957, or at the available date closest to that for purposes of comparison, and this is the poorest date I could take from our point of view, there were registered at the unemployment offices and looking for work in the Atlantic provinces, nearly 95,000 persons. On March 20, 1958 there were 135,000 and on March 19, 1959 116,800. This year there were 116,500. When you make allowance, sir, for the fact that in the last year the fishermen were treated as though they did not exist and were deducted from the figures, it will be seen that unemployment is very much more considerable in the Atlantic region now than it was when we went to the country.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Are these figures for the four provinces?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, for what is called the Atlantic region. I must point out, of course, that when we went to the country in 1957 there was a considerable amount of seasonal unemployment and had been during that past winter, as everybody on the Liberal side of the house admitted. In contrast, we have been told by the Minister of Labour and by other hon. gentlemen opposite that the recession is now over; that we are at the beginning of a year in which they expect a very substantial improvement, if not a boom.

When you look at certain of the key industries in the Atlantic area you can once more make a comparison which is not very flattering. A few moments ago the hon. member for Gloucester asked the minister of mines a question about coal. Of course we remember the advertisements, and we remember those pictures that appeared in the newspapers of Mr. Diefenbaker and Mr. Stanfield side by side on the public platform in Nova Scotia during the June election campaign of 1957, promising to increase coal production. Our leader during that election campaign told the truth. He said he would not promise to increase coal production, but he would promise that we would not allow the coal towns to become ghost towns. He was pilloried by hon. gentlemen opposite all over the maritime provinces for that truthful, straightforward statement. I think today, when you compare the two of them, you would rather have been responsible for making the one statement than the other, because coal production has declined steadily ever since that statement was made.

Mr. McCleave: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly.

Mr. McCleave: At that time did not his leader, Mr. St. Laurent, suggest that coal was too valuable to be burned and should be kept in the ground?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am very grateful, as I always am, to the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. McCleave), who has just asked me a question. He has given me an opportunity to state what Mr. St. Laurent said. I was there and I heard what he said. I have in my files the text of what he stated, although I have not got it right here. I will not guarantee to reproduce every word, but I will guarantee to give the correct sense of what he said. What he said was this. He believed that the time would come before too many years when coal, as a chemical and as a source of other chemicals, would be much more valuable than it would be as a fuel, and that apart from any other consideration he believed that was one reason why it would not be desirable to increase the production of coal. But he went on to say and to make very clear that what we intended to do—as we had been doing, I might say, up to that time—was to see that the coal industry was not allowed to decline to the point where these towns would become ghost towns. That was our position, and it was honestly stated.

Mr. MacInnis: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly.

Mr. MacInnis: Is the hon. member now saying that the Fredericton Gleaner incorrectly reported what Mr. St. Laurent said at that time, or is he now prepared to make an apology as called for in the front page editorial?

Mr. Pickersgill: There is a certain non sequitur in the hon. member's question which I shall deal with a moment. I believe the Fredericton Gleaner reported quite accurately what Mr. St. Laurent said, but I also believe that it misinterpreted what he said. About that particular matter I have no apology of any kind to make. I am sorry—and the hon. member knows this as well as I do—that I have not been able to find that particular copy of the Fredericton Gleaner. I have really made a thorough search. I even went to the length of asking the hon. gentleman to lend me his copy so I could refresh my memory as to precisely what it said.

Mr. MacInnis: I will see that it is made available.

Mr. Pickersgill: I shall be glad at any time to deal in detail with the point. But after all, whether I apologize or do not apologize to the Fredericton Gleaner is not going to change the fate of this country very much. I do not think the hon. gentleman and I want to get into any controversy just now about this matter. However, if I said anything that was inaccurate, I think hon. members know well enough that I have always been willing to admit an inaccuracy and correct it whenever it was drawn to my attention. I hope I shall always continue to do that. Whenever I find one myself, as hon. members will recall from certain experience in this house, I have not hesitated to do that either.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that it seems to me the time has clearly now arrived when we cannot go on contemplating much longer this steady decline in the coal industry without doing two things. The first is to try to arrest that decline to the limit that it is possible to do it, using every reasonable device; but also certain other devices should be used for putting something else in its place in that area, something which I think is perhaps even more important.

The situation in the fisheries is not as serious as it is in the coal industry, but it is serious. The output of the Atlantic fisheries is nearly all sold outside of Canada. The fisheries industry is, to a much more substantial degree even than the wheat industry, dependent upon export markets. I think that fact is not nearly as widely realized in Canada as it should be. Like all our primary export industries the fishing industry has suffered in the last few years from the cost-price squeeze. The price of the product has not gone up or has not gone up substantially in most cases—in some cases has not gone up at all and in some cases has gone down—while the cost of production has gone up and the cost of living of the producers has also gone up. You can make almost a complete parallel between the cod fishery and the wheat industry from an economic standpoint, except in one respect. While the government once in a while, seems to be aware of the wheat industry—although they are less and less aware of it as time goes on—they seem to be totally unaware of the plight of the fishermen.

Agriculture in the Atlantic provinces is unquestionably very much worse off than it was three years ago. Perhaps relatively it is not much worse off than is agriculture in the rest of Canada which, after the false dawn, has been overcast by the clouds emanating from the government rain-making machine so far as the farmers' hopes are concerned. Farmers often hope for rain at the right time but unfortunately the rain from this government always seems to come at the wrong time, namely at the time when the crops are ready for harvesting and not at the time when the crops would be improved.

I think, Mr. Speaker, I had better drop that figure of speech before it drops me. However, there are among my colleagues from the Atlantic provinces others who have a much more intimate knowledge of this subject than I. It is true that I have in my constituency two of the best agricultural areas in the whole of Newfoundland, but even when I have said that I could be accused of exaggerating if I said that agriculture had the same importance in Newfoundland that it has in any of the three other maritime provinces, because up to now it has not had the same importance.

What about provincial finances? I say something about this because, as I said, I am seeking to be absolutely fair about this whole matter. I say there is no question but that in one or two respects the governments of the Atlantic provinces are better off than they would have been if no change had been made in the law since June 21, 1957. I at once admit that fact. I have never failed to admit it in any circumstances. I think the adoption by this parliament, at the request of the present government, of the Atlantic provinces grants was a beneficent measure which I was pleased to support and for which I have always given this government credit.

I think we must also give this government credit—and perhaps they will not be so anxious to take this credit as the one I have just given them—for the fact that when Mr. Harris was minister of finance it was possible for all the Atlantic provinces to float loans in Canada at rates of interest which were considerably below those which have been prevailing in the last year or so. What is more, Mr. Harris was paying off the national debt. In the last year he was in office he paid off a billion dollars of the national debt, a fact which left a great deal of room for other public borrowers to go to the market. In his day the provincial governments were not facing from the national treasury or from the minister of finance the kind of competition which they have faced in the last year and which has driven them to borrow in New York, with consequences which it is not easy to foresee but which could be quite serious.

As to these Atlantic provinces grants—and I say this because I anticipate that the matter will be raised by some hon. gentleman opposite—I want to say a word or two about their earlier history. The idea of something more than tax rental or equalization was first proposed by Mr. Henry Hicks when he was premier of Nova Scotia, at the preliminary meeting of the federal-provincial conference of 1955, on April 26 of that year. The proposal will be found set out at pages 22, 23 and 24 of the proceedings. I do not intend to say anything beyond drawing attention to the fact that it was made in terms which were of universal application to every province of Canada. What Mr. Hicks suggested was really carrying out the idea of fiscal need as set out in the Rowell-Sirois report and providing a formula to meet somewhat different conditions.

In the autumn, at the main conference on October 3, 1955 Mr. Hicks elaborated his proposal and Mr. Flemming, the premier of New Brunswick, also made a proposal which was somewhat different in character. At that particular time those proposals were very seriously considered by the government of the day; I say that of my own knowledge. The government of the day had already in its proposals to that conference suggested making another $100 million a year available to the provinces under the new legislation, over and above the old. It was a little over $100 million. Hon. members will see that by looking at Hansard for last Wednesday, when the Minister of Finance replied to a starred question of mine and indicated that in the last full year the Liberals were in office the provinces received or were given abatements equal to $523.3 million, and in the next year, 1957-58, these payments and abatements amounted to $628.9 million, that is to say an increase of nearly $106 million. Then I asked if any part of that increase was the result of legislation passed since June 21, 1957 and the answer was no.

Therefore the whole of that $100 million increase, which I may say parenthetically, and only parenthetically, hon. gentlemen opposite from the Prime Minister down constantly claim in their speeches as something done by the present government, was in fact entirely the result of legislation which the Minister of Finance told us, in a candid moment the other day in the house, he voted against and opposed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is right, because of its inadequacy.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is not at all what the hon. gentleman said at that time. The hon. gentleman said that the scheme was too complicated for him to understand.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is not true.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was true then and I am not sure it is not true still.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is not true now and never was true.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, the hon. gentleman can tell us the truth when he gets up to make a three-hour speech a little later in the debate.

Mr. Crouse: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes.

Mr. Crouse: Will the hon. gentleman tell us on what page the budget of Mr. Harris shows this amount under the Atlantic adjustment grant; in what year and in what section of the budget?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not sure I understand the hon. gentleman's question, and I suspect that he did not hear what I said. I said that we were not able to accede to the request of Mr. Hicks, and we did not accede to it for this reason. I was quite candid about this; it is well known because, after all, it is part of history, and I am not revealing any great secret when I say this. The reason was that we had already offered to increase the payments to the provinces out of the national treasury by $100 million. In other words we were going to reduce the amount of income tax and corporation tax which would go into the federal treasury and put it into the provincial treasuries to the extent of $100 million, which we thought at that time was a very substantial increase indeed. It was an increase from a little over $500 million to a little over $600 million, in other words an increase of 20 per cent. We simply did not believe that at that time, having regard to all the other demands on the treasury, we would be justified in reducing the amount in the federal treasury by a still greater amount because that would have affected the balance of ways and means.

That was the position we took. Whether we were right or wrong, it was the position we took. I have always said that, notwithstanding the fact that we took that position, I would give credit to this government for taking a different position and for accepting Mr. Hicks' suggestion which we did not accept. I do not think I can make it any plainer than that; we did not accept it but this government has accepted it.

However, they did accept it with one modification, which I must say I do not think was an improvement. Mr. Hicks himself said this in the legislature; it has been said by me in this hosue before, and I say it again. My own opinion is that the position of the Atlantic provinces would be stronger if these Atlantic provinces grants were not called Atlantic provinces grants and if the formula was applicable to all the provinces if they found themselves in a similar position.

Now, if I understand the formula aright there is no other province at the present time which would find itself in that position, and we would hope there never would be. But there was a time during the thirties when Saskatchewan, and to some extent Manitoba and Alberta, were in just as bad a position as any of the maritime provinces. We do not believe that will ever happen again; but after all the taxpayers all over Canada pay the taxes which go into making these payments, and we should not forget them. I believe that if the government had gone the whole of the way Mr. Hicks suggested and had adopted a formula which, while in fact it would only have provided funds for the Atlantic provinces, would have been applicable in like circumstances right across the country, that would have been a better way of doing it. It would have accomplished the purpose just as well, and it would have created a better impression. I may say that this view was also taken at the conference in 1957 by Mr. Douglas Campbell of Manitoba and by Mr. T. C. Douglas of Saskatchewan, and I am not sure that it was not taken by some of the other premiers. I happen to remember because I went as a spectator at that conference, and I heard them take that position.

There was another feature of the arrangements which were made by the Liberal government in the tax-sharing plan, which I regret to say was not continued, with respect to the increase made by the present government, and that was the stabilization feature. The stabilization feature, of course, was a feature which it happens to be a matter of history was suggested by Mr. Hicks at that conference in October, 1955, as hon. members will see from looking at the proceedings at page 47. There is no doubt that, at that time, most of the provincial governments were not much interested in the stabilization feature. They were not much interested because—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a point of order. The hon. gentleman is launching into a discussion of financial relations between the dominion and provincial governments. He is speaking now of certain features which are written into the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act.

There is before the house at the present time a bill dealing with this very subject. The debate on the motion for second reading of that bill has already had one day devoted to it, and it seems to me with great respect, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. gentleman is now giving us the speech which evidently is intended to be a repetition of what has been said or what he may intend to say with respect to the amendments to the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act.

He is questioning now the fact that, with regard to the increases made in the provincial share of the personal income tax, the stabilization principle is not applied to the 3 per cent increase in the provincial share. This takes us right back into the middle of the debate on the bill to amend that act. You will find it in item No. 9 on today's order paper, Bill No. 56.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, on that point, I have no intention of continuing in this vein. I simply made that as a single isolated statement.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member is coming back to the Atlantic provinces I shall not need to deal at length with the point of order. I felt myself that, although he had been within the scope which he had set for himself when he was talking about the Atlantic provinces particularly and their dominion-provincial relations he was getting into a broader field which gave rise to the objection which was well taken.

Mr. Pickersgill: I hope there will not be any suggestion that I cannot say anything I like about the federal-provincial conference of 1955 or the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act of 1956 neither of which is before the house and both of which happened before the present government came into office, but I agree with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) that to the extent I talked about the extra 3 per cent which is all his bill dealt with it would not be proper to go on and I yield at once. Since I have not moved an amendment or anything else, surely I can discuss the federal-provincial conference of 1955 or the statute which is on the statute books and is now the law of the country and so as long as I do not discuss the amendment to that statute which is before us it would seem to me that I would be quite in order.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question which is right on the point he is now talking about. He is referring to the general abatements to the provinces across Canada constituting a total of $405 million between 1956-57 and 1957-58. The hon. member did not make any reference to what the effect was in the maritime provinces or the Atlantic provinces.

Mr. Pickersgill: I gave the figure for the three maritime provinces earlier in my speech.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): That was for three years, was it not?

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, no. I have the figure right here somewhere and I placed it on Hansard a few minutes ago. The figure for the three maritime provinces was $43 million in the last year of the old tax rental system and $52 million in the first year of the tax-sharing arrangements. That would be a difference of $9 million.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): For two years?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, the hon. member does not seem to understand. In the fiscal year 1956-57 the three maritime provinces received $43 million by way of tax rental payments in lieu of these taxes and in the subsequent year, 1957-58, under the new statute they received $52 million, an increase of $9 million. The increase in Newfoundland was in proportion. I do not have right under my thumb the exact figure but the total increase to all the four provinces was between $11 million and $12 million, as I remember it.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Was it not $9 million?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, it was $9 million for the three maritime provinces and the Newfoundland increase has to be added to that.

As I was saying there is one other aspect of this matter beside the question of stabilization which seems to me to be of great importance. It was also pointed out by Mr. Hicks in 1955 that there should be—and again I may be criticizing the former administration when I say this but I am seeking, as I pointed out at the beginning, to make a non-partisan speech—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): How extraordinarily you are succeeding.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think there was a great deal of merit in the contention of Mr. Hicks that equalization and stabilization and the whole basis of these payments including the Atlantic provinces arrangement which I hope could be generalized should all be put into the constitution, and that instead of having these five-year agreements which there is no real certainty of having continue it would be preferable to include them in the same way as, at the original confederation, statutory subsidies were included, without which there would have been no confederation.

I would not have thought this argument half as important two years ago as I do today. And why? I regret to have to say it and I do not intend to make any issue of this for obvious reasons, but we have witnessed a repudiation of the constitution in this very field by the present administration with respect to term 29 of the terms of union with Newfoundland. That makes it all the more important that all of the provinces should know exactly where they stand in matters of this kind.

There is another thing I want to say about the Atlantic provinces grants before I leave the subject. When they were brought forward by the Minister of Finance in this house in January of 1958 they were described by Mr. Kirk, then the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare, as deficiency payments and that is, of course, precisely what they are. They are payments made because the income and the taxable capacity of these provinces is below the national average, and substantially below it.

Mr. Phillips: How did that happen with you in office?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am pleased to answer that question of the hon. member. If you had gone back to 1935 and compared their position then with that of some other parts of Canada you would have found that there was a vast improvement in the period we were in office. I can tell hon. members that there are lots of people in the Atlantic provinces somewhat older than the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Bell) who are old enough to remember that.

Mr. Simpson: Do you remember?

Mr. Pickersgill: But I am afraid that if we are not careful this may—in the words of a distinguished friend of mine—degenerate into a debate.

These deficiency payments are needed and there is no one who would question that in the light of the experience of the three years. I do not believe that any government even if it wanted to would dare to terminate these arrangements. But I do say that what we really want to do, what should be the aim of all of us and what I really believe is our aim —although perhaps some of us have a better aim than others—is to end the deficiency so that the payments will not be needed to correct a basic weakness in the economy of the Atlantic provinces.

How is that going to be done? That is the problem. I have already alluded to the weak position of agriculture, to the coal industry and its serious plight, to the relative and absolute decline in the fisheries. About all these things I believe a good deal could be and should be done and on various other occasions suggestions have been made. If some of the suggestions, for example, made in another debate the other day by my friend the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Granger) were carried out they would be a step in that direction.

Even if the fisheries were restored, even if the coal industry employed as many people today as it did in 1956, even if agriculture was on a much sounder foundation than it is at present, with the population and the number of young people there are today in the Atlantic provinces those industries could not possibly provide the employment that is needed in that area in order to have a healthy expanding economy.

What about the other industries? There are some healthy industries. On the whole the forest industries are in a very healthy condition. They have their ups and downs from year to year, but happily this is one industry that gives signs of having a somewhat better year than last year; at least that is true of some parts of the forest industry. The long term future of the forest industry in the Atlantic provinces is probably better than any other industry.

Mr. Speaker: I am troubled by the time of the hon. member who has the floor. I understood him to say at the beginning of his speech that he did not propose to move a non-confidence motion. It is only if he is making such a motion that he would have more than 40 minutes; at least, that may be one interpretation of the rule. I just raise it because we do not want to let the procedure be altered by default.

Mr. Pickersgill: I intend, sir, to move an amendment and what interpretation is put upon it is not for me to say. Of course I suppose the rules govern. I say it is not going to be in the language of a non-confidence motion, but from my past experience I may say it might be so interpreted.

Mr. Speaker: I suppose it is not really for the hon. member to say whether the government will accept his amendment as a want of confidence motion. I raise the point because I had some doubt about it. The only reason the hon. member would be permitted to speak beyond 40 minutes would be to introduce a non-confidence motion.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Moving it and indicating it as such.

Mr. Speaker: I raised the point because I was not sure whether the rule would go that far.

Mr Martin (Essex East): What other intention could a reasonable man have?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Is the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate not a reasonable man in view of his colleague?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is exactly what I said.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is exactly the opposite of what the hon. member said.

Mr. Pickersgill: If this matter is quiescent for the moment, sir, I would go on to say that there is no doubt in my mind—making the very big assumption that was made by the Gordon commission and that in discussing any domestic issue we always have to make—if there is going to be any future and we are not going to face a nuclear war, about which, of course, others are more competent to speak than I am; but assuming that there is going to be a future, I do not think there can be any doubt that one would predict that the future of the forest industries of the Atlantic provinces is probably better than others in the long term, because happily the forest is a continuing crop and happily in the main it is being well cropped. I am sure there is room for some improvement there, too, as there always will be, but great steps have been taken in all the provinces to see that this most valuable of all the crops in the Atlantic provinces is maintained as a continuing crop.

There is no doubt there will be some expansion of the industry but the area of the provinces is not going to be expanded. The accessibility of the forests may be somewhat improved, as it is being improved by the spread of roads, particularly in Newfoundland, where it has been so marked in the last few years. But this is not the whole answer. This industry may, with increased fabrication, provide a somewhat expanded employment, and particularly perhaps in Newfoundland which is at an earlier stage of development than the other provinces.

The mining industry, of course, apart from coal mining, is happily showing signs of improvement. I see the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Comtois) smiling and about this he can smile. This is particularly true of the iron mines of the Labrador, and I am sure the minister will be the first to admit, that they are expanding even more rapidly in Newfoundland than they are in his province. There is no doubt that one of the biggest sources of immediately increased employment will be the development of the iron mines of the Carol lake and the Wabush lake areas, and all the development ancillary thereto.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Undoubtedly, too, as the demand for power becomes greater and the possibility of its economic exploitation becomes more real, the development of the vast hydro electric resources of the Hamilton river will also give a stimulus, I would hope, not only to the province of Newfoundland but also that all the surplus power would not be sent westward into Quebec and Ontario, but that some of it would go eastward and in a southerly direction to supplement the less extensive power resources of the other Atlantic provinces and that technical advances would be such in the next few years as to make that possible.

One of the industries which I believe will expand the most in the next few years is the tourist industry. I believe we are not doing nearly enough to accelerate that expansion which is one direction in which we could move more quickly and get immediate results; but, when all is said and done, sir, if we are to have a development at all comparable with that of the rest of Canada there must in addition be the development of secondary industries in the Atlantic provinces, not on the scale of Ontario and Quebec—I do not think anyone would expect that—but on a very much greater scale than exists at the present time.

This area is dependent, far more than the Canadian average on trade. If between one quarter and one third of our population is dependent on trade for their incomes, it must be over half in the Atlantic provinces and far more than half in the province of Newfoundland. That is why it is very hard even for Tories in the Atlantic provinces to be protectionists and it is perhaps—

Mr. Nowlan: The only Tories there are the hard-shell Grits.

Mr. Pickersgill: One sometimes wonders about the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) who brought certain legislation in here a couple of years ago which most people in the Atlantic provinces did not think much of.

It seems to me, that in addition to the general development of trade, and in addition particularly to the development of trade in the whole Atlantic area—and I use "Atlantic" now in another and much wider context—there is one area which is naturally complementary to the Atlantic provinces, and that is the whole Caribbean region, and particularly the British West Indies federation and British Guiana, those areas with which there has been a traditional trade. It does seem to me that here we could do a lot more than we are doing. I should like to see a free trade area between Canada and the West Indies federation. I should like to see a study made, at any rate, of the possibilities of bringing this area within the ambit of the Canadian monetary system, as Newfoundland was before confederation, and I should like to see a much more vigorous development of the technical and other assistance which has already been started in that area, really a development into something like a Colombo plan for that area.

But there is another thing. I am one of those who believes that a fundamental mistake was made in the development of Canada in 1878 when the national policy was adopted. I believe that that has had the effect of concentrating, of centralizing industry and wealth in the area of the lakes and the upper St. Lawrence valley to an inordinate degree, but no one in his senses—I include myself in that category—would say that we could wipe out the tariff and undo the results of those 50 or 60 years of development. We, when we were in office, pursued a line of policy which it is calculated had the effect of reducing the effect of the tariff by about 50 per cent in 22 years.

But to wipe it out suddenly would, of course, create dislocations of a kind that no government, and I would hope no political party, in its senses would contemplate. The Gordon commission did estimate, and they had very competent people to do it, that the effect of the tariff upon cost to consumers was about $1 billion a year and that the cost was very inequitably distributed across the country. It does seem to me that if the people of Canada are going to pay that kind of price for the tariff, the price that the experts have estimated, we should have more say than we do now in the location of industries that are protected and in the national interest an effort should be made not to establish rigid controls and decide that this industry must be put here and that there, but to create certain advantages and inducements that will overcome some of the disadvantages that otherwise exist in certain areas.

I am not going to take a lot of time to deal with these points. I have taken things that have been endorsed not only by the Liberal party but also, in words at any rate, by hon. gentlemen opposite in their presentations to the electorate, and I am simply going to say that one way in which what I have suggested could be done is by capital grants and another by fiscal incentives. It would, of course, be against the rules if I were to read this passage since it is from another debate in this session but I will take the risk of giving the page reference. If hon. members will look at page 1693 of Hansard for March 3, the second column, they will see that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) indicated the kind of way in which this could be done and the kind of way in which it is done in the United Kingdom.

Then there is another very serious question mark hanging over the whole of the Atlantic area. It was underlined the other day by the closing of Fort Pepperrell in Newfoundland, for which, of course, no Canadian government had any responsibility. But we have seen what the cancellation of the Arrow contract did even to the great and resilient economy of one of the two leading metropolitan centres of this country. We have seen what another shift in defence requirements of another country has done to a great new settlement in northern Ontario—I refer to Elliot Lake.

I am sure that there must be members of the government who sometimes wake up early in the morning or lie awake at night wondering what disarmament would do to Halifax or to the Annapolis valley, to Cornwallis, to Greenwood, to Chatham, to Summerside, to Gagetown. The concentration of defence expenditures by the previous Liberal government in the Atlantic provinces has had the effect of acting as a cushion against recession in that area, and a very badly needed one it has been in the last couple of years. But what would happen if peace suddenly broke out, as has sometimes been said? What would happen if even a lesser thing occurred, if there were some important change in strategy or weapons without alternative plans having been prepared?

What would happen to that great metropolitan area which under Liberal neglect grew in population from 75,000 to 165,000? I refer to metropolitan Halifax. We do not want to hold up disarmament to keep Halifax going. No one in his senses would want to do that, but if there are going to be changes we want to be prepared with alternatives that will meet the situation and make the transition possible.

Then, of course, there is transportation about which I could say a great deal and about which I said something and the Leader of the Opposition said something in a debate the other day. I think our views on this subject are very well known. Not only are our views well known but our actions have spoken louder than some words have spoken. In 1957 we increased the effective subvention under the Maritime Freight Rates Act by 50 per cent. The present government permitted the railways to increase their rates by 17 per cent and then took off 10 per cent of the 17 per cent so that there has been an increase of 7 per cent. That has been the difference. We did something to alleviate the situation and the present government has permitted something to be done which has made the situation worse.

We believe that there should be a highway program specifically for the Atlantic provinces as an offset to what is done to provide railways in the other parts of Canada. I said one day that it was really too bad that the trans-Canada highway had not been decided upon two years earlier, before the negotiations with Newfoundland were started, because undoubtedly it would have been written into the terms of union. I think it is perhaps too bad in a way that in 1864 at Quebec nobody foresaw that a trunk road from Halifax to Montreal would be just as important as the intercolonial railway and perhaps ultimately a great deal more important.

This is a favourite theme of mine and I could go on and on but particularly in the light of Your Honour's qualms I do not intend to do so. I had hoped to recall to hon. gentlemen's minds, with a few comments, that famous advertisement which they will all remember much better even than I do and which is headed, "Before You Vote Read the Atlantic Resolutions". I hope that a lot of people in the Atlantic provinces before they vote in the next few weeks will read the Atlantic resolutions over again.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): That is why you are making your speech. It slipped out.

Mr. Ricard: The cat is out of the bag.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Bell) every so often suddenly becomes aware of the obvious and thinks he has made a great discovery. This has happened again. I said at the beginning of my speech that I was making an appeal to the government at a time that I thought was propitious, at a time when I thought they might be more apt to listen than at other times, and apparently I am right. But notwithstanding the great temptation, sir, I shall not read the Atlantic resolutions. I would also commend to the attention of hon. gentlemen, as I did once before in the house, the document entitled, "A Blueprint for the Atlantic Provinces" which is a reprint of articles in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald in March, 1959, articles which in their basic structure bear a striking resemblance to the Atlantic resolutions. This is a very well written series of articles and I think they set out aspirations that extend far beyond the editorial offices of the Halifax Chronicle-Herald, aspirations that I believe are widely shared by the people of the Atlantic provinces regardless of party.

I could also read some of the aims of the Atlantic provinces economic council. I have them here but again I am not going to do that. But I do want to read one other thing before I conclude if I can find it. I want to read a statement which I commend particularly to members on the other side of the house and in the rump here who were elected from the Atlantic provinces. I am not speaking these words. This is a quotation I am reading and it begins as follows:

> I do not want to involve myself in any maritime argument, but I would say this. There is one difference between the members from the maritimes and those from the western provinces, and it is this. While we from the western provinces do disagree, sometimes on the basis of partisanship, none the less when the welfare of the western provinces is being discussed and in particular when our major subject, agricultural production, is being discussed, we bury our disagreements and unite for the common benefit of the western provinces. Sometimes, as I listened to my hon. friends from the maritimes upholding those things which they themselves assuredly cannot support other than vocally, I wonder whether a similar united front analogous to that being formed today by the premiers of the maritime provinces would not have a most beneficial effect upon the economy of the maritimes, especially if that analogy were continued and extended into the House of Commons.

This statement was made in the House of Commons on July 24, 1956, and will be found on pages 6368 and 6369 of Hansard. It was made by the hon. member for Prince Albert, who a few months later became leader of the opposition and within a year was Prime Minister of Canada.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): And elected by the people of the maritimes, too.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, exactly. This is the advice he gave to members from the maritimes. Perhaps I should repeat the last paragraph for the benefit of the hon. member for Saint John-Albert:

> Sometimes, as I listened to my hon. friends from the maritimes upholding those things which they themselves assuredly cannot support other than vocally, I wonder whether a similar united front analogous to that being formed today by the premiers of the maritime provinces would not have a most beneficial effect upon the economy of the maritimes, especially if that analogy were continued and extended into the House of Commons.

Mr. MacInnis: I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly.

Mr. MacInnis: Does he realize that at the time about which he is speaking most maritime members were Liberals?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, I realize that very well. I do not imagine that the hon. gentleman would suggest that his leader, the present Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), would have given one kind of advice to one kind of member and another kind of advice to another. Although he might think that, I would not suggest it.

Mr. MacInnis: The members now are different.

Mr. Pickersgill: The members now are different, and there is one very great difference to which I was just coming when the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. MacInnis) asked me the question, and it is this: This advice that the present Prime Minister was giving to members of parliament from the maritime provinces—

Mr. MacInnis: Given to the Liberal members.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the hon. member would not mind if I said what I have to say. This is advice which the Prime Minister was giving to the members from the maritime provinces. Since that time a large number of members have been elected from the maritime provinces, and two from the province of Newfoundland, to "follow John". I commend to those members the advice they were given by their leader. I suggest when they come to vote on the motion which I am now about to move that they do precisely that, that they follow the advice given to them by their own leader.

Mr. MacInnis: It was not given to us, but to you.

Mr. Pickersgill: In order to make it that much easier for them to follow that advice of their leader I have couched my motion, as nearly as is it possible to do in three out of four particulars, in terms that will be found in those Atlantic resolutions. In other words, I am not asking the hon. members elected from the Atlantic provinces who support the government to support anything in the Liberal program that is not also in their program. I am not asking them to support even the language of our program but their own, and the program upon which they were elected.

There is one part of the motion I am going to move that is not in the Atlantic resolutions, but it relates to something that the premiers of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick are very anxious to have done at the present time, so anxious that they are willing to spend provincial money and to go outside the country to get someone to do it. I am suggesting that they be spared that expense, and that this be done by the government of their own country, inside the country. I cannot believe that hon. members, particularly those from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, will want to vote against what the premiers of both of those provinces very urgently desire.

I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. McWilliam):

That all the words after "that" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

This house is of the opinion that immediate steps are required to strengthen the basic economy of the Atlantic provinces through a comprehensive and planned program of federal assistance; and urges the government to give consideration to the following proposals as elements in any such program.

1. The establishment of an Atlantic capital projects program for the purpose of assuring the financing of projects essential to the economic development of the Atlantic provinces.

2. The provision of special fiscal incentives to private enterprise for the purpose of encouraging industrial growth and the processing of natural resources in the Atlantic provinces.

3. The institution of an immediate enquiry to determine the effects of national monetary, fiscal and economic policies on the development of the Atlantic provinces and to make recommendations on desirable changes in the application of such policies for the benefit of the Atlantic provinces.

4. The adjustment of freight rates and the provision of transportation facilities to overcome the handicaps of the geographic position of the Atlantic provinces.

Mr. Speaker: Before I present the motion, does any hon. member wish to speak to its content, from the point of view of its having been dealt before.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, because of the presence in Ottawa today of some of the leading Canadian labour leaders I had expected the Liberals would decide to raise the issue of unemployment, particularly as it affects the province of British Columbia. However, the members of the C.C.F. group are very happy that the official opposition has raised this issue of the need for action on behalf of the four Atlantic provinces. We readily admit that we have here a real national problem. The economy of the Atlantic region has been ailing for a number of years now, and I believe that no one in Canada would be prepared to lay all the blame for the ills of the Atlantic economic community on the Conservative government today. The ills that exist may, in certain aspects, have worsened within recent years. However, in the main, the ills that are now obvious were especially obvious to the people of the Atlantic area long before this Conservative government assumed office. I believe that was one of the major reasons why most of the people in the Atlantic area decided to vote against the Liberal government back in 1957, and with even more emphasis in 1958.

I am very pleased to see that the Liberals, at least at this late stage, recognize that we have on our hands a problem that is not only of local significance or responsibility, but that we have a difficulty that has to be faced up to by the national government in Ottawa.

The people down there expected a great deal when they upset the Liberal governments within their provinces and the Liberal government at Ottawa. I am afraid that the people there are rapidly coming to the conclusion that they may be waiting in vain for a solution to their difficulties because after this government has been in office now for practically three years there have been extremely limited indications that the government of the day is looking at the problem of the Atlantic region with any more serious concern than that which was evidenced by the Liberal government.

The people of Canada owe much to the people of the Atlantic region. They are people who, along with those of Upper and Lower Canada, founded our nation. Their sons and daughters emigrated and were largely responsible for the development of the larger areas of Canada. Especially did they make a tremendous contribution in that they educated so many of their sons and daughters before they saw them emigrate into other areas of Canada. Many of the western and central Canadian leaders of today were educated at the expense and sacrifice of their parents in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick or Prince Edward Island. These people supplied much of the money that was necessary for the opening up of our nation. They were taxed for our development. A great deal of the investment capital that was originally created in this region was invested in other areas of Canada rather than in the maintenance of its own economic health and welfare. In that regard I feel that any investment on the part of the national government in the Atlantic region is merely paying off the obligation we owe.

I cannot ignore the tremendous contribution they have made to the rest of Canada in the development of the co-operative movement and the credit union movement. However, Mr. Speaker, as has already been indicated, the people in the Atlantic region of Canada are not being allowed to enjoy their full share of the blessings that accrue to Canadians as a whole. They are denied equality of opportunity to share in the development of Canada. Many of them are even unemployed. Certainly, as the statistics have indicated over so many long years, they are not allowed to receive an equitable amount of the riches that are produced in the nation as a whole.

The whole nation is their heritage, as it is of all other Canadians. However, they are being denied their proper portion of that heritage. We note this fact when we look at the levels of wages that exist in this part of Canada, in four out of our ten Canadian provinces. Their cost of living is almost equal to the cost of living anywhere else. For instance, I am told that in Halifax rents are higher than they are in many other major urban areas of Canada. Nevertheless, wage levels throughout New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland are, by a considerable degree, lower than they are in the other parts of Canada. The fishermen there have never had a standard of living that was anywhere nearly equal to that which obtains for the fishermen of British Columbia. In Nova Scotia and New Brunswick agriculture does not receive the same per capita income that it receives in other areas of Canada; and even in the other areas it is low enough indeed, far lower than it ought to be. This Atlantic area has more than its proper share of the unemployed in Canada. There are particular areas in which as many as one half of the able-bodied men are unemployed. Many of them have been unemployed not for half a year but for a year and in some cases for a goodly number of years.

The Atlantic area is not obtaining its portion of the industrial development that is taking place in Canada. As a matter of fact many of their industries are losing out and are having to close their doors, thereby adding to the already aggravated unemployment problem. In this regard I note the great regret that was expressed—and aptly so—by the newspapers in the Atlantic region when the estimates for the present fiscal year were laid before the house in that they noted a large reduction in federal capital expenditures. I believe the Halifax area alone this year can expect some $8 million of a reduction in federal capital expenditures as compared with the amount a year ago. All the statistics are borne out when we look at the per capita income. I note with regret that the people in Nova Scotia, for instance, receive only one half of the per capita income received by the people of Ontario or British Columbia. To me this situation is a violation of one of the concepts of nationhood, when for their work the people of one region of one and the same nation receive a per capita income that is only one half of what is being received elsewhere.

In the field of education I notice that the income of the school teachers is roughly half of what it is in many of the western portions of Canada. In the matter of health services, the governments in the Atlantic region are simply unable to supply the residents with the level of health services existing elsewhere. The Canadian boy or girl has the same rights to health services and to education, whether that boy or girl is living in Halifax, Toronto or Vancouver. The object of the government ought to be to undertake measures that will ensure equal rights of citizenship to every Canadian, no matter where in Canada he may live.

In looking at this amendment offered by the Liberals I am pleased to note that the Liberals realize that in order to help the Atlantic area to any significant extent the government must embark on a planned program of federal assistance. I think the Liberals are now beginning to move a little way in the direction in which I am sure political needs will make them move much more yet before the next federal election rolls around. In a major undertaking of this kind they are now willing to adopt the idea and the concept that effective help can only be given if it is being given on the basis of a planned program.

We hear a great deal about the prosperity of the nation this year. However, the conditions as they exist in the Atlantic region once again indicate that the so-called prosperity which we have is far too narrowly based in that more regional problems are arising on the Canadian national scene. The Atlantic area is possibly the largest and most needy region with regard to aid in Canada today. As between different parts of Canada, once again the rich are getting richer at a much more rapid rate than the poor are getting less poor.

The recommendations that we see in the amendment calls for the establishment of an Atlantic capital projects program for the purpose of assuring the financing of projects essential to the economic development of the Atlantic provinces. In our opinion this is only the Liberal name for the old C.C.F. name for a national investment board. However, we believe that they now realize the need for the establishment of what would in effect be a national investment board because this Atlantic capital projects program is intended, they say, for the purpose of assuring financing. To rely on the whims of private investors to resolve the capital needs of the Atlantic area would not be very realistic and I am very happy to note that the Liberals realize that action on the part of the federal government toward the raising of the necessary money is necessary.

It is my opinion that for this proposal to be effective a lot of money will have to be spent. I would advocate that the federal government begin initially with an investment in the neighbourhood of $500 million. That may sound like a lot of money, but when we consider that four of the ten Canadian provinces are involved and when we look at the needs of this area of Canada I think the amount I have mentioned of half a billion dollars would be a modest yet effective beginning. Agriculture alone in the Atlantic area can absorb hundreds of millions of investment capital in order to consolidate existing uneconomic units into efficiently operating economic units. Industrial development would be able to absorb at least as much as agriculture.

I would like to underline that an outlay of $500 million for aid in economic development in the Atlantic area would not be a net expense. There would be returned to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) a hefty proportion because of added revenue emanating from income tax and the general 11 per cent sales tax. I believe that if an undertaking of this magnitude were launched the people who now live in the Atlantic region would supply a considerable amount of this money because of their own belief that this area needs this assistance.

We are a little worried about the next recommendation which we see in the amendment, the provision of special fiscal incentives to private enterprise for the purpose of encouraging industrial growth. We have noted the encouragement of private enterprise in the investment field, especially as it applies to natural resources in many areas of Canada, and our experiences in this regard have not always been happy. We want to be very careful that when we undertake measures of this kind—and we as a group are not opposed to this recommendation—when this recommendation is implemented, if it is, there ought to go along with it ample protection of the resources for the people to ensure they will not be plundered away from the people. The workers and the farmers and everyone within the area should reap some of the blessings of the exploitation of what is their own heritage. We do not want any Wenner-Grens in the Atlantic area, for instance, and we note with utter dismay how the people of Newfoundland are being exploited and their natural resources used to make multi-millionaires in other areas of the world.

I hope that if the government undertakes incentives to encourage more private enterprise to invest its capital it will also encourage the democratic movements within the area—I have particular reference to labour unions, to farm organizations and to organizations of fishermen—so that the men and women who do the work will receive an adequate return from their resources. Unless there is this kind of economic democracy at the grass roots level whereby people are able to obtain a larger share of their heritage then I am afraid exploitation and regret many years later will be the order of the day.

I noted the omission of many specific recommendations which might have been made in an amendment of this kind. However, I realize that the obvious intent of the amendment is not to clutter it up with too many specific recommendations. I notice nothing which calls upon the government to ensure the survival of the independent small businessman in the Atlantic region. I notice nothing in here for the inclusion of coal as one of the responsibilities of the national energy board. I see nothing for the need of the people of that region for an aggressive policy of vocational training with pay so that the many unemployed would more likely be provided with employment. I notice no reference to the need for education.

On the question of unemployment mention has been made of the coal industry, and I would like at this time to propose that the steel industry which exists in the Atlantic region be not permitted to move out of that region. I think it is simply scandalous that such a great proportion of our iron ore, when we have our own energy in abundance, especially in Nova Scotia, has to be taken right past the door of the Atlantic provinces, down the St. Lawrence seaway. Our energy is exported out of western Canada and iron ore is exported out of eastern Canada to the heart of the United States of America, supplying employment to the United States instead of supplying employment to Canadians. I believe that action on the part of the government may be necessary to ensure the survival of whatever steel industry exists, not only in the interests of those who work in that enterprise but also in the interests of continuing markets for Nova Scotia coal; and because we in Canada are, on balance, even yet importers of steel, I believe there should be established in the Atlantic region additional steel facilities.

It is for these reasons that at this time I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard), that the amendment be amended by adding thereto:

5. The maintenance of the present steel industry in the Atlantic provinces, together with the expansion of the steel industry by every appropriate means including the provision of a publicly owned steel mill.

6. The active encouragement and strengthening of such peoples' organizations in the Atlantic provinces as farm, fishermen, and labour unions, and the co-operative and credit union movements.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has submitted an amendment to the amendment which seems to go into the provincial field whereas the initial amendment relates entirely to federal assistance. I raise the question of whether he is not doing more than submitting an amendment but rather submitting what in effect is another motion because, as I understand our practice, the subamendment should come within the scope of the initial amendment.

Mr. Regier: I assume you have reference to the latter clause?

Mr. Speaker: Yes.

Mr. Regier: May I point out that while in the main these are responsibilities of provincial governments there is also federal responsibility and indeed there exists federal legislation with respect to most of these items. There has been federal participation in respect to all these items. Labour is not exclusively a provincial matter nor are agricultural organizations.

Mr. Speaker: May I read the clause about which I have doubt. It is item No. 6, in these words:

6. The active encouragement and strengthening of such peoples' organizations in the Atlantic provinces as farm, fishermen, and labour unions, and the co-operative and credit union movements.

Generally speaking, those organizations in the Atlantic provinces are the subject of provincial jurisdiction although there is to some extent co-ordinate jurisdiction of the federal government.

Mr. Regier: In that case, if you so rule, I will omit the last clause.

Mr. Speaker: I would certainly feel that it would remove the very strong doubt which I have that No. 6 does not come within the scope of the initial amendment. If the hon. member wishes to submit his amendment limiting it to item No. 5, I will accept it.

Mr. Regier: I so move.

Mr. Speaker: It is moved by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier), seconded by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard), that the amendment be amended by adding thereto:

5. The maintenance of the present steel industry in the Atlantic provinces, together with the expansion of the steel industry by every appropriate means including the provision of a publicly owned steel mill.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in making a few brief remarks on the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill), may I first of all commend him for bringing this matter concerning the Atlantic provinces to the attention of this house. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate enjoys a very good sense of timing and has displayed it on many occasions. I do not know whether he realizes that today, May 2, has some significance for the maritimes in that it is the birthday of the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Montgomery) and also of my young son, and in a few minutes we would have been toasting this fact. I mention this because the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton is a great maritimer. My son, unfortunately, was not born in the maritimes and will go through life with that handicap.

Mr. McCleave: Just like the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Yes. As the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. McCleave) has said, this is the same disability under which the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate operates. I do feel, however, that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has some right to speak on matters relating to the Atlantic provinces because recently a meeting of Conservative members elected him as the man they would most prefer to have speak in their ridings at election time, having realized that in the past election, in every constituency in which the hon. gentleman spoke the Conservative government member was returned. Everyone is aware that provincial elections are coming up and while the federal members may be limited in their participation I do hope that if the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate does decide to travel east and participate in the provincial elections he will make my constituency of Saint John-Albert the very first on his list.

Before the supply motion was brought forward today there was a great deal of speculation as to what would be the subject of the motion. This always occurs on these occasions but I believe that today over 95 per cent of the hon. members of this house would have thought that the Bomarc or national defence would have been the subject of the amendment.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. member permit a question. Does he think that would be a suitable subject for a want of confidence motion?

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): The hon. member has many subjects which he feels would be suitable subjects for want of confidence motions but I do not think anyone in this house or in the country worries about them to the same degree he does.

As I mentioned, I believe there were very few hon. members in this house who did not expect that the Bomarc or national defence would be the subject of today's supply motion. But there was one fellow in this chamber, my friend the hon. member for Prince (Mr. Phillips) sitting behind me, who thought differently. I asked him what he thought might be the subject and he said he felt that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate—to use the more impersonal, than affectionate term—was probably going to bring forward an amendment concerning the Atlantic provinces. I admit that this thought had not crossed my mind but as I glanced across the aisle and saw the determined, supercilious and perhaps even courageous expression on the face of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, I knew we were in for something today.

Perhaps I use the word "courageous" advisedly because I think it took a great deal of courage on the part of the hon. member to stand up in this house, knowing a bit of the background of this subject of the maritime provinces, and speak on it. He knows, as we all do, the history that goes back over a period of 22 years of absolute neglect of the maritime provinces. When he makes a statement that the time has now arrived for action, that is when I say he certainly deserves full marks for courage because he knows that the time arrived in 1957. He knows, as does everyone in this house and in the country, that we constantly pressed the previous administration in an effort to have it pay some attention to the problems of those provinces by the sea, but we met with no success.

One could mention many matters, but the subject that I feel the opposition party, the former government, is most vulnerable on is the matter of Beechwood. After the second world war we realized in the maritimes that our main difficulties were power and transportation. We had not shared in the federal war contracts and we had gone even further behind at that time. We said that we would come to Ottawa and make approaches regarding our power situation. The former Liberal government of New Brunswick came here without any definite proposals but they did talk about power. What did they get? They got no attention whatsoever from their fellow members here at Ottawa.

History began, Mr. Speaker, in 1952 when we changed to a new Conservative government under Premier Hugh John Flemming of New Brunswick. He, realizing the great need for power in our province and in the maritimes, at once began his campaign to bring this matter to the attention of the powers that be at Ottawa, the then old, tired Liberal administration. It was not a case of merely receiving a no answer, Mr. Speaker; it was not a case of indifference; it was a complete cold shoulder on every single occasion that this matter was mentioned on the many trips of Premier Flemming to Ottawa.

I could also mention the indifference of the former minister of finance, Mr. Harris, who on every occasion not only said "no", but would not even discuss the various thoughts that we had about power and other financial matters. Yes, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate certainly deserves a lot of credit for courage in bringing this matter forward today, knowing the background of his party on this subject of Atlantic provinces' assistance.

We also note that when this government took over in 1957 one of its first acts was to deal with this matter of Beechwood. Today we have in New Brunswick on the Saint John river an everlasting monument to the promises made by this government.

Mr. Robichaud: Will the hon. member permit a question? In what year was Beechwood built?

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Beechwood was completed last year and we were all down at the ceremony; hon. members from the opposition were present as well.

Mr. Robichaud: Will the hon. member tell the house at what stage Beechwood was when this government came into office?

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I am not certain of the date, but the point is that the old government would have nothing to do with the financial arrangements for Beechwood. I sat in this house, when the former member for Charlotte, a member of the Liberal party, got up at that time and said he was definitely opposed to Beechwood in every aspect. This government definitely financed, in every way that they had promised, the Beechwood project in New Brunswick and that is the significant part. We did something about the power problems at Beechwood and in our later power assistance for the maritimes and the Atlantic provinces.

I come now to the second matter that I mentioned. One does not have to be an historian, like the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, to know that one of our other difficulties was transportation. We acted, on transportation. After many cries while in the Conservative opposition we set up a royal commission to deal with the freight rate problem, and that commission is now sitting and has been sitting for many weeks. It is considering our problems and I hope something will come forward that will assist us in the future.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the hon. member permit a question at this point? Will the hon. member recall that while this government set up a royal commission we increased the subvention under the Maritime Freight Rates Act from 20 per cent to 30 per cent, that is by 50 per cent?

Mr. Phillips: And also increased the freight rates by 20 per cent.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): The hon. member mentioned that in his speech and it is quite true. But he did mention in connection with the freight rate increase that the 7 per cent applied only to the Atlantic provinces. The 7 per cent is a horizontal increase across the country. I do recognize that part of it, anyway, Mr. Speaker.

The Chignecto canal project has been talked about for many years but the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate shied clear of that even though he did mention it once or twice in questions on the orders of the day. But the present government on coming into office, and in connection with promises that were made, set up surveys, both engineering and economic, to deal with the Chignecto canal. This is something again that I say makes me wonder about this courage that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate shows in bringing this forward today when he knows that for at least 22 years they failed to act in this regard.

I now want to deal with my constituency of Saint John-Albert. I do not wish to indicate great knowledge on the various subjects of fish, agriculture and power. This reminds me that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate sat in this house and opposed the federal power proposition last year. Now he has enough nerve to get up and quote speeches advocating unity amongst the maritime members.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I know the hon. member is allowing his enthusiasm to run away with him but if he will examine the votes he will find that I supported and voted for the Atlantic power legislation of this government, which carried out the policy announced by Mr. Harris in 1957. My only complaint was that it did not apply to Newfoundland.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): That is not a question of privilege.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I do not need to apologize for my enthusiasm in so far as the maritimes are concerned. I think quite modestly that it is a better type of enthusiasm than the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate displays. Incidentally, the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Simpson), in speaking about this matter, said to me he was glad to see that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was now back in the maritimes and might leave the matter of the station at Flin Flon, Manitoba alone for a while to some people who know something about it.

I do wish to refer particularly to my constituency of Saint John-Albert, and it is an occasion I have been waiting for for some time, to mention the great prosperity that we have in Saint John. While I may not be qualified to speak with great knowledge on financial matters, I do feel that I can speak as one from an area in the maritimes that since 1957 has prospered and has gone forward under this government to the nth degree. We had our problems of power and of transportation, as I have mentioned. I feel that the prosperity that the city of Saint John is now enjoying—and one that will be welcome by everyone in Canada—is due definitely to the actions that have been taken by the new government. It may be that certain matters of direct assistance have not been given but after all we are living in a private enterprise economy and it is the duty of the government to provide the means for private enterprise to go forward, and I say that this government has given this means, particularly to Saint John.

I wish to quote from an editorial in the Saint John Telegraph-Journal of February 9. It is a reliable editorial. This is a newspaper, that has lately been criticizing this government in many respects but in straightforwardly telling this case I feel that we will have the answer as to the status of a certain area in the Atlantic provinces. I quote:

I do not know whether my friends from Halifax will agree with that but proportionately we have always had a great deal of industry > —entered a new era of booming expansion in the late 1950's, an era which is destined to see the city reach an unprecedented level of prosperity in the decade ahead. Never in her long history have prospects been so good for this seaport city, transportation centre and hub of industry. Never before has this proud loyalist city had reason to flex her muscles with such commanding authority. Never, in fact, has the mushrooming area of greater Saint John experienced such a period of boisterous expansion and optimism. Major capital expenditures of the last three years far exceed $100 million and many, many more millions are to be spent on expansion in the years immediately ahead.

> The whole metropolitan area is riding the crest of a wave of construction never matched since the United Empire Loyalists set foot on the peninsula in 1783 and founded the city two years later. All over greater Saint John—Saint John, Lancaster and Simonds—a wealth of new building is evidence of the new prosperity. Industry and government are spending many millions in long term projects. Businesses are expanding and adding new plants and equipment. Communications are multiplying, with new roads either just completed or under way at every city approach—

The special article goes on to tell the story of Saint John and explains in better words than I could use why I feel that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate does not know what he is talking about and should make the visit to Saint John which I mentioned a moment ago. To be more specific, I should like to outline some of the private enterprise capital projects that have been completed and are listed here. I will start by mentioning those that are of a private enterprise nature.

First, we have the $50 million Irving Oil refinery in Simonds. May I say that in reading an article this morning in connection with the Encyclopedia Britannica I noted that the city of Calgary has a new oil refinery that will deliver 14,700 barrels a day and that it is the greatest capital project they have ever had in their city. The refinery we have in Saint John will deliver 43,000 barrels a day.

The second project is a kraft mill, lumber mill and pulp mill extension by Irving Pulp and Paper Limited, with a total investment of $40 million. The third is the new $7 million paper mill of Kimberly-Clark Limited. The fourth is a new steel works and foundry built for Ocean Steel and Construction Limited. Then there are several new plants on Lancaster's Fairville boulevard, now known as the golden mile. There is a long list of about 10 other items involving capital projects of a nature that I feel will be envied by every member of the house.

There has also been a tremendous development so far as government projects are concerned. New government buildings and wharves, for which we waited 22 years under the old Liberal government, have been constructed. In 1957 when we took office these projects were commenced and now they are ready for business.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate did make some very good points in his so-called non-political speech. He made certain remarks about the West Indies to which I feel attention should be called. Having just returned from a commonwealth parliamentary association meeting there over the Easter recess, I recognize the need for greater attention to that area. Efforts should be made to strengthen our traditional ties and to foster greater trade expansion. In so far as our connections with the West Indies are concerned, we miss the C.N.S. ships. It is true that our trade with the West Indies has been going ahead but it has been more of a natural growth. I would certainly want to be associated with the remarks of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate about paying more attention to the West Indies federation.

It may be that we should put forward some proposals regarding free trade. Having been there and talked to many representatives of the West Indies federation, I do not have the answer, but I do know that it is in Canada's interests not only from the point of view of trade benefit but as a commonwealth country to give all aspects of the situation in the West Indies even closer attention.

Mr. Pickersgill: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I do want to say that there is a lesson that the new West Indies federation has to learn. We made reference to it in our speeches there and in our discussions about the difficulties of the federation. We pointed out the fact that Canada had poor and rich areas and that a great deal of consideration had to be given to those areas which do not come up to the national average economically speaking. In Canada we have some areas that are not as wealthy as others. In its very early stages the West Indies federation is beginning to realize that there will be great difficulties in that some of the islands will probably never be as wealthy as the large ones such as Jamaica and Trinidad.

I mention this merely to point out that this is a problem we have recognized in Canada and it is one that they must recognize. It is a problem that we must always be watching here. In the speeches that were made at the conference reference was made to the fact that our central provinces continually have to be making what they call concessions to the poorer areas in order to bring up the average. I am one who feels that by some method greater concessions will have to be made.

But I do want to say that so far as the new government is concerned, by Beechwood, by federal power assistance, by transportation investigation and by fiscal measures such as the special adjustment grants we have gone forward and done many of the things we promised, things that were not only forgotten for 22 years but were given the cold shoulder completely.

With regard to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, I want to say that there is a gross inconsistency in it. In his speech he referred to the fact that he was against the principle of the special adjustment grants. I am surprised to hear anybody representing the Atlantic provinces stand up in the house and say that he is against the special adjustment grants, particularly a member from Newfoundland which, pro rata, gains a little bit more than the other Atlantic provinces from the adjustment grants.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, once more the hon. gentleman's enthusiasm has outrun his accuracy. I said no such thing. I said and I have always said that I was in favour of them and I only wished that the principle could be extended so that it would apply to any province in need.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Unless I heard the hon. member incorrectly, Mr. Speaker, he stated that the former member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare said that this was a form of deficiency payment and he went on to derogate the adjustment grants.

Mr. Pickersgill: Not at all.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Whether he said he was opposed to them, I do not know. As far as I am concerned, if this principle does not meet with the approval of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate then his amendment does not agree with his thinking because the whole amendment is full of special considerations. As a member from the Atlantic provinces, from the constituency of Saint John-Albert which is doing well, I want to say that while I go along with special adjustment grants and some other special considerations I certainly would not want to be associated with them to the degree that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has put them forward today.

Mr. Pickersgill: They are exactly as in the advertisement containing the Atlantic resolutions, in which advertisement your picture also appeared.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): You may say so, but I do not take a back seat in supporting the Atlantic resolutions. We have fulfilled many of them and many more will be fulfilled before the hon. member knows how to say Jack Robinson.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Or Jack Pickersgill.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Jack Pickersgill, as the Minister of Finance has said.

I also want to say that in this amendment put forward by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate mention is made of transportation difficulties. We are dealing with the transportation difficulties now, after having waited 22 years for the Liberals to do something about them. We have undertaken surveys of the Chignecto canal and other matters. There is a royal commission sitting now on all our transportation difficulties. The commission deals particularly with rail transportation, but its terms of reference also have other implications.

The C.C.F. party has moved a subamendment, and as usual it is so involved in—I do not know what you would call it—state enterprise, that it is impossible to figure it out. Someone said that the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) likes to chide Conservative members by saying that the only part of Canada in which the C.C.F. party has no representation is the most backward part, that is the maritimes. All I can say is that we do not want the C.C.F. party, anyway. If they show themselves in these two provincial elections, which have prompted the speech by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, I am sure they will again get a goose egg.

Mr. G. R. McWilliam (Northumberland-Miramichi): The amendment which I had the privilege of seconding deals with a matter of far-reaching importance, not only to the Atlantic provinces but also to all parts of Canada because, as has been said so often, no nation can flourish to the extent it could and should flourish when any segment of it is a depressed area. This is the situation with respect to the Atlantic provinces in the Canadian nation. This situation is more disturbing because at the time of confederation this was a flourishing community which joined this nation to make a bigger and better nation. This action brought about the direct opposite over the years.

The retarded economy of the Atlantic provinces is a subject which is receiving many comments in periodicals all across Canada, a subject which has been brought to the attention of the government and the public through many channels, by editorial comment, by speakers in chambers of commerce, boards of trade, service clubs, and by other means. Lately there has been a strong awakening amongst the people of the Atlantic provinces as to their present position in the Canadian community, and keener concern as to their future. This stronger awakening and keener concern has brought about more serious thinking and action on the part of groups and individuals, with the Atlantic provinces' press urging government action, with timely and well considered planned programs of action aimed at bringing about these things that are necessary to ensure that the Atlantic provinces' place in our confederation is close to the Canadian average.

The adverse position of the Atlantic provinces is being recognized more and more by Canadians in the other six provinces. The Canadian press of central and western Canada have also taken up the plea for an improved economy for the provinces on the Atlantic coast. With the widespread movement for concerted action to bring about an improvement in the Atlantic region it is timely that this amendment to the supply motion be placed before the House of Commons because it provides an opportunity for a two-day debate on a matter which is one of the most important facing Canada on the home front.

Many appeals have been made, and from many sources, for unity amongst all Atlantic province members of parliament in the matter of aid to the Atlantic region. A prominent Canadian journalist expressed the view that the problems of the Atlantic provinces should be aired vigorously, and the only effective place in which that could be done was on the floor of the House of Commons, where every voice raised strengthened the case and pricked the conscience of those who forgot the Atlantic provinces. The case is for unanimity on the part of all Atlantic provinces members. Neglect of this region cannot continue if all members from the Atlantic provinces with one voice call for a program of required assistance. I should like to add that this view was expressed by a journalist from central Canada.

This unanimity should be expressed by all Atlantic members, without reservation, in the initial stages of the planning. When the necessary data has been compiled it is conceivable that there will be internal disagreements which will have to be worked out, if a program is to be developed that will bring about the over-all desired result without having a serious adverse effect on any area. Action cannot be postponed much longer without a still more serious situation developing. Whatever is done must be done without further delay. The action taken will, of necessity, have to be something exceptional, something never undertaken before.

The Gordon commission, in its supplementary report on the retarded economy of the Atlantic provinces, stated as a general conclusion:

> The long term and ultimately effective solution of the problem must be expected to come from further resource development. The core of the problem is the creation of conditions which will attract capital into such development.

It was unfortunate that the solemn pledges made by Conservative federal candidates in the 1957 election campaign and repeated in the 1958 campaign, called the Atlantic resolutions, died a hurried death. I feel that I should express the view that probably some of those candidates who were in the political arena for the first time felt that those promises and pledges would be as vigorously promoted in parliament as they were on the hustings, in government as well as in opposition. The candidates who were not successful at the polls have not the same onus, or the same opportunity, to promote these pledges. It is the duty of those elected, who so pledged themselves—and there are 21 of them—to vigorously promote the solemn promises made.

No doubt many of the Conservative members from the Atlantic provinces elected for the first time in 1957 and 1958 felt that all the things that were promised would materialize. They probably waited for their senior colleagues to lead the fight, particularly their four senior colleagues who became cabinet members representing the four Atlantic provinces. These same members who cried out when in opposition for the very things they later promised to do in the Atlantic resolutions have failed to promote any action toward bringing about those things that are recognized as essential for the improvement and future stability of the Atlantic provinces.

Let us take a look at the pledges made in the Atlantic resolutions, a charter drafted by the 31 Conservative candidates in the Atlantic provinces during a meeting and released to the press in the form of large advertisements on June 4, 1957, just six days before election day that year. These advertisements were headed, "Before You Vote Read 'The Atlantic Resolutions' ". A subheading in the advertisement states that the promises were endorsed by every Progressive Conservative candidate in the maritimes. I wonder why this subheading did not include the Newfoundland members? The opening paragraph, following the subheading entitled "Atlantic Resolutions", included the names of all 31 Conservative candidates in the Atlantic provinces.

The most significant heading in the advertisement, most significant in view of the fact the action promised has not been taken in the three-year period, is the heading entitled "A Call for United Action at Ottawa".

In view of what has taken place since June 10, 1957, one is led to believe that the Atlantic resolutions were drafted with the view held by the Atlantic Conservative candidates that the Tory party would still be in opposition.

The seven resolutions were entitled: National resources development program, Decentralization of industry, Atlantic provinces power development, Transportation, Capital projects program, Fiscal needs of the Atlantic provinces and Canadian coastguard.

I hasten to give credit to the government for the financial assistance rendered in special grants to the Atlantic provinces. It would be unfair not to give credit for this action as it materially assisted these provinces.

What has taken place in respect of some of the other Atlantic resolutions has been put into proper perspective by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill). Other hon. members speaking for this party will deal with the Atlantic resolutions and with other matters of vital importance to the other Atlantic provinces.

Let me bring to the attention of the house a few of the statements contained in the Atlantic resolutions advertisements beyond the headings and subheadings I have listed. I believe that the vast majority of the hon. members of this house are not familiar with the document which is under discussion and I suggest they read the resolutions and decide where the onus lies. I quote from the leading paragraph:

We—

Which means the 31 Conservative candidates.

—are resolved to stand together in support of these measures—

The measures being the ones which I have just enumerated under the seven headings.

—which will help to overcome the historic disabilities which have limited and even denied opportunity to this area.

The same leading paragraph states:

We the Progressive Conservative candidates from the 31 federal constituencies in the Atlantic provinces, believe the just demands of the Atlantic community for recognition of their economic problems and special needs urgently require more united and forceful representation in the parliament of Canada.

Let me repeat the latter part of this quotation:

—urgently require more united and forceful representation in the province of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, that is exactly what is being done today by the official opposition and in view of the statements in the Atlantic resolutions it is hard to conceive that the amendment will not receive the support of all Atlantic provinces members. I feel sure that the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Van Horne) will support the amendment as he has been the only Atlantic Conservative member to demand action for the Atlantic provinces from the government on these resolutions.

The Atlantic resolutions is a good document. What is unfortunate is that it was never put into effect, that it apparently was used for a particular purpose at a particular time and then was forgotten about. It certainly had a great appeal to the voters in the maritime provinces and was an instrument by which a very large measure of party support was secured at the polls. When solemn promises are made to the electors in a public document, those who make the promises and are elected have a solemn duty vigorously to demand in parliament and outside parliament that the promises be implemented. These demands have been found wanting.

The onus for bringing about the Atlantic resolutions rests primarily with the four Atlantic provinces cabinet ministers. They are members of the group that decide upon government policies. They are the four representatives to whom the people of the Atlantic region look for, and from whom they expect—yes, demand—leadership in the promotion and enactment of the Atlantic resolutions, in the drafting of which they played a major role. If the four Atlantic cabinet ministers lead in these demands on the floor of this chamber I am sure they will receive the complete support of all Atlantic provinces members of both parties and, I venture to say, the support of the majority of the hon. members of this house.

What contributes to the present economy in the Atlantic provinces? Federal government projects that contribute to the economy of the province of New Brunswick were all established by the former Liberal government and the same statement applies to the other Atlantic provinces. The large military camp at Gagetown is an important factor in the economy of the Fredericton-Saint John area. The Department of National Defence is by far the largest single employer of civilians in Northumberland-Miramichi and together with air force personnel is the backbone of the economy of this area. The R.C.A.F. jet operational and training base at Chatham, the R.C.A.F. radar station at St. Margarets and the naval ammunition depot at Renous were all established by the former government as was the army ordnance depot at McGivney in the adjoining county of York.

This government has not placed a single labour-employing establishment in the province of New Brunswick. A comparison of Department of Public Works and other departmental estimates for the past three years, with those of previous years under the former government shows drastic cut-backs in expenditures for New Brunswick.

Mr. Montgomery: Where did the hon. member get those figures?

Mr. McWilliam: They are in the book of estimates.

Mr. Montgomery: No.

Mr. McWilliam: The hon. member can check the matter and he will find that what I have said is correct.

A realistic approach has not been taken by this government toward long awaited adequate economic and engineering surveys of the Atlantic seaway and the Northumberland strait causeway. I say that a realistic approach has not been taken and it is evident, from the answers to questions as found in Hansard, that the surveys are more or less of a superficial nature, despite the promises made in 1957 and 1958 that full scale surveys would be carried out immediately.

Members of the Liberal party have listed for government action, as can be found in Hansard, many proposals considered to be for the benefit of the Atlantic region. One of these proposals is improvement in the highway transportation system. The Liberal party at its last convention endorsed a policy of an adequate highway system for the Atlantic provinces.

An adequate highway system is a dire need for the north and east area of New Brunswick. In this area where lumbering, fishing and farming are the chief industries and where there is a potential base metal mining industry there is a vital need of good roads for the development of these industries and the facilities with which to transport the products to distributing centres and on to their markets. Toward this end the government should promote a second trans-Canada highway, together with a network of connecting highways, needed to give incentive for investment of capital with a resultant expansion.

In the 1860's railways were required to open up the maritime provinces. In the 1960's the requirement for industrial and tourist expansion is highways. Today the maritime rail passenger services are being curtailed. Many of these services have been or are about to be eliminated or reduced. Highway transport has taken over the bulk of transportation, with the exception of carload lot shipments. Railway employees are continually being laid off, a fact which is indicative of the trend to highway transportation. Mail and express shipments are being transported over highways. All of these things point to the need for a better system of highways and connecting roads.

The foreseeable economic future of the Atlantic provinces gets more disturbing as time goes on. More and more of our young people are leaving the area in search of employment. While many are returning because they cannot find employment elsewhere, still many more never return a loss that cannot be reconciled. This exodus is due to the alarming unemployment situation in most parts of the Atlantic region. This situation is most acute in this area. It creates a problem that affects the very root of family existence. It is a problem that is crying out for remedy and a problem that must have adequate action and co-operation at all levels of government.

Despite the exodus from the Atlantic provinces the unemployment situation has reached alarming proportions. The "Do it now, don't wait for spring" campaign met with no success in most areas of the Atlantic region. The present situation in many parts of this area is that hopes are dim for even a fair scale of employment this summer, the results of which will not reach their full impact until next winter. Is the next campaign slogan to be the opposite: "We didn't do it this year, wait until next year"?

The future economy of the Atlantic provinces looks bleaker as time goes on. More people are wondering if joining confederation was as good a move as was anticipated. It has not brought about the improvements that were envisaged, improvements that would compensate for some of the losses. The situation today reminds us of the misgivings voiced by men in public life at the time of the conference preceding confederation. No Canadians are more loyal than maritime Canadians. Our forefathers played a great role in making the Canadian nation and their descendants are proud of the contribution. Will the generation to come hold that same pride? I trust that action will be taken to preserve this pride for all time.

The maritime provinces area at the time of confederation was a flourishing community with good future prospects. It had a high Canadian average of income and standard of living for that day. Today the average Atlantic family income is away below the Canadian average and the per capita income is also away below the Canadian average. In 1955 the Gordon commission report compiled the family income at 31 per cent below the Canadian average and the per capita income at 37 per cent below the Canadian average.

The people of the Atlantic provinces are bearing their share of the Canadian contributions to underprivileged areas of the world and are pleased, I am sure, to have a part in this great humanitarian work. The Atlantic provinces are Canada's own underdeveloped area. The development of the Atlantic provinces is a national task calling for the application of national policies designed and tailored for this specific purpose and not merely the application of policies which are applied uniformly across Canada.

Much is heard these days about the best way to celebrate the one hundredth birthday of confederation seven years away. Surely the best way would be to take measures to make sure that by 1967 the people of the Atlantic provinces will have equal reason with residents of the other six provinces to rejoice, to be proud and to be fully satisfied to be a Canadian.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to have the opportunity of taking part in this debate on this most interesting subject. I certainly appreciate the broad line of non-partisan motives which inspired the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) to bring forward this resolution at this time. I would say it is only a mere coincidence that an election was announced in Nova Scotia last week and that it is rumoured in various newspapers and elsewhere that there may be other elections forthcoming in the maritimes in the immediate future. That, as I said, is one of those mere coincidences which only happens in the politics of the maritime provinces.

I also appreciate the broadminded and non-partisan speech, which went a little further to emphasize its non-partisanship, which has been delivered by the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. McWilliam). It certainly was one of the most non-partisan speeches, and so non-partisan that I think it was a preliminary warm-up to a statement to be read on every platform in his constituency during the provincial election when he goes down to take part in it.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate referred to the Atlantic resolutions, and he inferred, of course, that hon. members on this side of the house would naturally give support to a motion which included in it part of the language of those Atlantic resolutions. Naturally we on this side of the house and our friends on the other side will always give support to the Atlantic resolutions. As has been said, we drafted and prepared them; we have largely implemented them and we are going to stay in office until we conclude the implementation of them. The hon. member is perhaps laying a little land mine there in order to say that these terrible Tories said something one day, and then some time later he will point out where we voted against it in the resolution now before the house.

Everyone can read and everyone knows that this is a vote of non-confidence. Whatever language may be included in this resolution immediately before us, the resolution is one which we cannot accept, because if we did accept it as a vote of non-confidence it would result in the defeat of this government. Of course, it would only be defeated in the house because when we went to the country we would be re-elected. But the result of any action which would restore hon. members opposite to the seat of power is such that we could not even continue our support of such a motion. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, who had read these Atlantic resolutions of two years ago with shocked surprise and who should know how little had been done, reminded me very much of the tale of Rip Van Winkle who slept in peace for 22 years and then came out of his sleep and suddenly realized what should have been done and what had not been done during the time he was asleep.

May I call it six o'clock?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I was making some casual reference to my friend the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate having had an experience comparable to that of Rip Van Winkle who wakened after his long sleep and expressed surprise at what had happened in the meantime. Perhaps it would be equally accurate to use Saul of Tarsus as a simile because on the road to Damascus he kicked against the pricks and saw a great light. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate after having spent three years in opposition has now undoubtedly seen a great light and speaks and acts far differently from those days when he sat on this side of the house.

Whatever may be the merits of any case the hon. gentleman presents in this house one always admires his skill as a debater in presenting the facts as he would like to have them presented, minimizing those things he does not want to be recognized and magnifying those things that should not be magnified at all. Never is he better at that than when he makes reference in fair terms—he always wishes to be fair—and then pays his respects with a slight tone of praise in his voice to the Atlantic provinces adjustments grants which he says are a good thing and then proceeds immediately thereafter to exaggerate many other matters and attacks the government for all the things it has failed to do. The hon. member reminds one in some ways of the doctor who had been dismissed by a patient who was dying of leukemia. A new doctor was summoned, diagnosed the illness, prescribed treatment and soon had the patient well on the road to recovery. When the patient had his health restored the old doctor who had been dismissed came along, examined the patient who was recovering, and said: "Your doctor did not do much for you; it is true that you are looking well and have regained your health and strength but you are not as big as Goliath; if I had been able to recognize the illness you had and prescribe treatment I would have been able to restore your health and make you well and strong again."

The economy of the Atlantic provinces has not yet attained the status of a Goliath but it is well on the way to recovery. There are many things which need to be done in those provinces. The Conservative members on this side of the house and the four cabinet ministers from that area to whom more than one reference was made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate are fully conscious of the fact that there is much left to be done but we also recognize that a great deal has been accomplished during the last three years, very much more than had been accomplished in any comparable period in the history of those provinces.

I wish to refer to the maritimes adjustment grants to which the hon. member pays such slight praise. After all, they represented only a grant of $25 million a year for four years, or $100 million in all. I realize that $100 million is not a staggering sum of money these days but it is a substantial sum of money for the economy of the Atlantic provinces. This year the province of which I am proud to be a native son had a slight surplus. I have forgotten the exact figure but it amounted to a few hundred thousand. Also, it is budgeting for a surplus of a very few thousand next year. In the meantime, it has increased its payments to municipalities by several millions of dollars, and it has embarked on various other services. Where would those government services be today were it not for the Atlantic provinces grants which have been received by that government from this government?

The same thing can be said, of course, for each one of the other Atlantic provinces. All of them have been able to improve the standard of services, maintain that standard, and balance their budgets. Without those grants they would not have been able to carry on at all, let alone introduce improvements. From the political and fiscal standpoint the grants have represented the difference between life and death. That is what this government has accomplished in that field in a very short time.

I do not propose tonight to clutter up the record with a lot of figures. We all realize that figures can be used in various ways, always fairly of course, but that various interpretations can be placed upon them. I also realize that this is probably only the overture to what will be said time and time again during the next few weeks in at least some of the provinces in the Atlantic area, and I expect that I may be called upon on one or two occasions to make some slight contribution to the ensuing argument. I therefore do not intend tonight to go into detail in this respect nor to build up the record as it will undoubtedly be built up during the next few weeks at least in so far as the province of Nova Scotia is concerned.

There are facts, however, that are worthy of mention. Not only were these adjustment payments made of $100 million but there were increases in revenue in other ways. There were unconditional payments made to the Atlantic provinces to which I think attention should be drawn. For a moment or two I should like to put some of these figures on the record. I am now going to cover the four Atlantic provinces with respect to the amounts of these unconditional grants.

Unconditional payments to Newfoundland in 1957-58 amounted to $19 million; in 1958-59, under this government, they had increased to $41 million. Unconditional payments to Prince Edward Island in 1957-58, in the budget which was the last budget brought in by our friends who were then the government, were $4.8 million; in 1958-59 they had increased to $7.5 million. Unconditional payments to Nova Scotia which in 1957-58 were $29 million had jumped in 1958-59 to $37 million. Unconditional payments to New Brunswick which in 1957-58 were $23 million had jumped in 1958-59 to $32 million. In the aggregate the total of these unconditional payments to the four Atlantic provinces amounted to $76 million in 1957-58 and had jumped to $117.5 million in 1958-59. The increase amounted to $40.5 million or 58 per cent; I repeat that, 58 per cent.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. member permit a question just about the figures? Does not the figure for Newfoundland include two years' instalments of the Newfoundland adjustment grant paid in that particular year?

Mr. Nowlan: I think that is probably right and so the figure should be adjusted accordingly.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, downward.

Mr. Nowlan: I thank the hon. member for bringing that to my attention. The increase was 58 per cent taking cognizance of the fact which the hon. member drew to my attention. On the other hand, the increase in the unconditional grants to the other six provinces amounted to only $33 million or 10 per cent. That is the rather striking figure to which I wanted to draw the attention of this house, a 58 per cent increase in unconditional grants to the four Atlantic provinces as compared with a 10 per cent increase in the unconditional grants to the other provinces of Canada.

Of course, we must also consider the conditional grants. In 1957-58 these amounted to $26 million and in 1958-59 they jumped to $49 million. In the year just closed they amounted to something over $68 million. This is an increase of 160 per cent in a two-year period.

These are some of the figures to which attention should be drawn, when my hon. friend asks, or other hon. members ask, what have you done? I ask them to look at that record. When one considers the period through which this country and this government were passing, a recession, and all of the other problems, the record of this government with respect to the Atlantic provinces is something which no one needs to apologize for when an attack is made. I am sure it is something that the Atlantic provinces can look at with a great deal of pride.

Those are the purely fiscal payments; there have been many other payments made as well. Much has been done in other fields. Something was said about industry. I am not going to embark now on a discussion which my hon. friend and I have entered upon from time to time in the past and perhaps will again as to what was proposed by the former government shortly before its demise with respect to assistance to the coal industry and the establishment of industry in the Atlantic provinces, and as to what was done by this government. Suffice it to say that under this government a system of moving Nova Scotia coal, maritime coal but primarily Nova Scotia coal, by subventions, to industrial sites in the maritimes for the development of power was inaugurated, and those subventions were fixed at a level which it is estimated would enable power to be produced at a seven mill rate, and I am advised, without being an expert at all on engineering matters, that a seven mill rate would compare favourably, if not very favourably, with the power rate in Ontario from thermal sources. That should go a long way toward meeting one of the demands which has been heard in the Atlantic provinces for a long time, namely the necessity of getting lower cost power so that industry could be attracted there.

This government, under the legislation and coal subventions, up until this year has paid out over $3,540,000 for the movement of coal for industrial purposes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is that within the Atlantic provinces?

Mr. Nowlan: Yes, within the Atlantic provinces.

Mr. Pickersgill: Not outside?

Mr. Nowlan: No. Also, in the construction of power lines, transmission lines, a grid system which is envisaged within the Atlantic Provinces Power Development Act, millions of dollars have been paid out. This money has been paid out in the establishment of those transmission lines so that all of the sources of power on the mainland from Nova Scotia to New Brunswick will be linked together in one grid system, enabling power to flow from one source to the other as it is required.

Last year my colleague, the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Hamilton), placed some figures on the record. I am not going to weary the house with figures tonight, but anyone who is interested will find them in Hansard of June 10, 1959, at page 4507. It is a long list of figures showing what this government has done in the establishment of various projects such as I have referred to, and particularly the transmission lines. Over $6 million was spent on this last year and a further $13 million has been pledged. Of that $13 million I understand that now the expenditures, although not complete, have run up to about $12 million. That system consists of the establishment of those transmission lines throughout the maritime provinces so that power can be transferred back and forth, thereby helping to establish an industrial life in those provinces which has not been possible before.

One could go on and develop this argument at great length but I know there are many other hon. members who wish to take part in this debate and I do not wish to interfere with them by dealing with matters that some of the others would like to deal with.

This afternoon the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. McWilliam) referred to highways. He made a good provincial speech, outlining the need for more highways in New Brunswick. Undoubtedly, highways are necessary, Mr. Speaker; perhaps more money should be spent on highways; but in addition to the moneys which had been promised under the Trans-Canada Highway Act this government has also established a system of building highways to resources in the various provinces of Canada. Of this amount the maritime provinces, regardless of their size, the fact that they are very small in area and in population, are receiving the same grants as are the larger provinces of Canada. Each province is receiving $7,500,000 from the federal government, and an equal amount from the provincial government, the money to be spent over a period of years. The period was originally fixed at five years but at the request of the provincial governments this period has been extended to a time agreed upon among the various provinces. Although it will not result of course, in all of the highways being reconstructed or built, it is a substantial contribution toward the solution of a problem which the provincial governments have not had the means to deal with adequately. When I hear someone talk, as the hon. member did this afternoon, about the need for highways, I think we should indicate here again the amount of money we shall be getting in the maritime provinces within the next five or six years for the construction of highways and the reconstruction of highways, without which money it would have been impossible for the provinces to have dealt with those problems.

One of the great problems of my province in so far as its industrial life is concerned—not only of its industrial life but its agricultural life as well—is wrapped up to a great extent with the industrial area of the eastern part of the province, the coal fields and the steel mills of Cape Breton island, or the steel mills of Cape Breton island and the coal fields of Cape Breton and of the eastern part of the province.

Much has been said in this house about what has happened to coal during the time this government has been in power. Questions are asked from time to time as to when mines are going to close, and a picture has been painted of the coal industry of Nova Scotia being in a very deplorable state indeed, and the inference is left that the responsibility for this to some extent, at any rate, or to a large extent rests on the shoulders of the governments, provincial and federal. The truth of the matter is, of course, that the coal industry all over the world is in a very bad shape. Coal is being supplanted by other forms of fuel and, particularly in this country, by oil and gas which are natural Canadian products and which are entitled to a share of the market. The fact remains that despite the competition of those fuels it can be safely said that the coal industry of Nova Scotia has come through this period in a better way than have the coal fields of any other part at least of the North American continent.

We also, of course, had the problem aggravated in the last year or two by high water levels and an increase in hydroelectric development and various other factors which have depreciated the market for coal in some ways on a temporary basis and in other ways on other than a temporary basis. These figures are rather interesting. The coal consumed in Canada during the fiscal year just ended amounted to 22,495,000 tons, the smallest tonnage of coal burned in this country since the industrial revolution took place. While the imports of bituminous coal fell from 20,180,000 tons in 1956-57 to only 11,800,000 tons last year, the production of Nova Scotia coal increased—I want the house to get this—from 5,701,000 tons to 5,806,000 tons, not a very substantial increase, it is true, but an increase of 105,000 tons when markets for coal were shrinking and falling all around the world and imports of coal into Canada were falling by this substantial amount. Is it any wonder that the market fell? Five years ago the domestic market consumed 6,700,000 tons of bituminous coal; in the year just ended it consumed only 4,600,000 tons. Five years ago the railways consumed 5,850,000 tons of coal but in the year just ended they consumed 750,000 tons, a drop of over five million tons. The total consumption of bituminous coal five years ago was 33 million tons and last year only 15 million tons.

There has been a falling off in the demand for coal but in the face of this collapsing market this government, with the assistance and co-operation of the government of Nova Scotia in providing subventions to a certain extent, by the provision of increased amounts of assistance, has managed to provide a remarkable degree of protection for the maritime coal industry. This has largely been established by the assistance of the movement of maritime coal into the province of Ontario. Three years ago, when the severity of the competition from other fuels was first felt, there were 109,000 tons of coal moved into Ontario at a cost of $167,000. In the year just ended markets were found in Ontario for 806,000 tons of coal at a cost of $2,786,000. At the same time imports of coal into Ontario fell by 4,670,000 tons.

One could go on dealing with figures in this manner but, as I promised the house in the beginning, I do not want to bore the house with too many figures at this time. However, perhaps I should put this on the record. I am referring now to the report of the coal board for the year 1958-59, with the figures added in pen for the year 1959-60, the one just closed. In 1958-59 Nova Scotia coal moved under subvention amounted to 2,238,104.13 tons and the total amount of subvention paid was $8,257,741.93; in the year just closed, 1959-60, Nova Scotia coal moved under subvention amounted to 2,414,786 tons or an increase of about 175,000 tons of coal compared with the year before despite falling markets.

Look at these figures, Mr. Speaker. The opposition says, "What have you done?" This is what the taxpayers of Canada have done under the leadership of this government and co-operating with it. Last year, 1958-59, subventions amounted to $8,257,741.93 as I said a moment ago. In the year just closed subventions provided by the government from the consolidated revenue fund of Canada on behalf of the taxpayers of Canada amounted to $13,518,396.11, and the same subvention has been provided in the estimates for the year on which we have now entered.

It is due to measures such as these that we have been able to give to the coal industry the degree of support which we have, a degree of support that I am sure is a surprise to the corporation, a surprise to the union and employees, and a very pleasant one indeed. At this juncture I think it is only fair to say that we cannot help but be impressed with the degree of co-operation of the union and the men working in these coal mines who have carried on their employment without seeking increases in pay. As a matter of fact, the corporation, the union, this government, and the government of Nova Scotia to the extent to which it has contributed, have been working together as a team and as a result of that team play the industry has been kept in this relatively strong position.

That is the present. Of the future what can one say? The future certainly is not one to cause great joy. The coal industry is facing increasing competition and undoubtedly solutions to problems will have to be found. The government, realizing that, has appointed a royal commission under the chairmanship of Mr. Justice Rand to study the problems of the industry and, we hope, to come up with suggestions and solutions for at least some of its problems. Mr. Justice Rand has had a distinguished record on the bench and in the public life of the country. He has enjoyed the confidence of labour and of all the Canadian people because of his qualities of mind, his integrity and his judgment. Although no one man can accomplish miracles, I think everyone interested in the Nova Scotia coal industry is highly appreciative of the fact that the government was able to persuade Mr. Justice Rand to enter upon this task and we are very hopeful of the results which will flow from it. Those are the problems of the future.

As far as the amount of work is concerned, there will not be any greater "down time" than last year but it is expected that there will not be as much "down time" as there was last year. The union was perfectly satisfied with the results that were achieved last year. It was not happy, of course, but very much surprised that they were as good as they were. The union representatives who were here last week met with my colleague, the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Comtois), the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and myself and expressed their great appreciation of the effort that this government and the government of Nova Scotia have made in trying to cope with the problem which they admitted was one of the most serious with which any economy could be faced.

Reference was also made this afternoon by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate to transportation problems, and we were somewhat chided because we had not solved all the problems set forth in the Atlantic charter. I was one of those who had something to do with the drafting of that charter and I am rather proud of it. Together with members of the House of Commons from Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland I worked to draft that charter. We did not expect that we would solve all the problems in a day. We never suggested we had ready-made answers at all times to all problems. I have said enough to indicate that we have found answers to many of the problems which were confronting us when we wrote that charter. If on the afternoon and evening when we were working on the charter we could have looked forward three years and could have seen that we would have accomplished as much as we have, we would have been very pleased with ourselves indeed.

Transportation is a deep-seated problem, a deep-rooted problem, a problem of geography, a problem of history. We have a railway running in a round-about way through northern New Brunswick. It reminds one of the changes that take place in defence policy from time to time. When the British built the Rideau canal so as to be able to send troops down to the St. Lawrence it was the early D.E.W. line of Canada. In the same way, because of the danger of war with the United States, the railway was built through northern New Brunswick so as to keep it as far away as possible from the United States boundary. We are paying the price for that today with the long haul although we are assisted to some extent by the Maritime Freight Rates Act. My hon. friend spoke of the increases they made in the payments under the Maritime Freight Rates Act. That is perfectly true, but I think my hon. friend would be the first to admit that changing economic conditions, the inauguration of truck competition and of agreed charges have to a large extent minimized, although not entirely wiped out, the very substantial benefits envisaged by the Maritime Freight Rates Act when it was first introduced. We have at least reduced the increase this year to a reasonable degree.

In addition to that, we have appointed a royal commission, headed by a western maritimer or a maritime westerner, whose work, unfortunately, was delayed as a result of the illness of the first chairman, but which is conducting an exhaustive study of the freight rate problems of Canada and certainly the freight rate problems of the maritime provinces will receive very special attention. When that commission reports I hope we will have a charter before us on which we can proceed with confidence to the solution of that problem, in so far as the transportation problem can ever be solved in a country thousands of miles in width and on a very narrow basis in so far as the depth of population is concerned.

I have outlined very briefly, and very succinctly, only touching some of the highlights, what has been accomplished by this government in three years. Despite the Jeremiah wails of my friends opposite, which I suppose are natural when one is sitting in the opposition and one feels like Jeremiah that the situation is hopeless, and they undoubtedly feel more like Jeremiah than ever now, I think the greatest accomplishment is the changed outlook, the changed attitude, of the people of the maritime provinces. There is a new confidence, a new hope that was not there a few years ago.

As I have said, the problems are far from solved. However, the people today realize that they have a government in Ottawa, and governments in the provincial capitals, which are interested in their problems and are determined to find solutions in so far as solutions are possible. Despite anything that my hon. friend may, in his political enthusiasm, say about these matters, I would ask him to go back carefully over the record of his government or any other government and find accomplishments in dealing with the problems of the maritime provinces in any period of 10 years which would compare with what has been done by this government during the last three years.

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest this afternoon to the speech which was made, and the amendment introduced, by my colleague the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill), and seconded by my colleague the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. McWilliam). I have also followed with great interest the speeches delivered by the hon. member for Saint-John-Albert (Mr. Bell) and by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan), who has just resumed his seat.

The minister said it could be a mere coincidence that such an amendment was introduced at this time. I should like to tell the minister that it is not a mere coincidence, but is the result of the unemployment situation and other conditions in the Atlantic provinces. The minister referred, in a very mild manner, to what he called the political speeches made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and my colleague the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi. All of us who have been in this house for a number of years know that it has not been the practice of the minister, especially when he sat on this side, to make what he would call a political speech.

The minister referred us to the grants that were paid to the Atlantic provinces. It is true that the grants which will be paid this year and which were paid last year were bound to be higher than those that were paid in the years 1955-56 or 1956-57. We must take into consideration the increase in revenues in this country and the increase in population. I join with my colleague the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate in recognizing this special grant of $25 million which is now being paid to the Atlantic provinces.

The minister referred to the coal problem in the Atlantic provinces, and particularly in Nova Scotia. He more or less intimated that we in the opposition are saying that the responsibility rests on the provincial and federal governments. I should like to say at this time that we in the opposition have not forgotten the promises made by the Conservative candidates prior to the last two federal elections, especially those from Nova Scotia. These promises were not only to maintain production and try to keep the coal mines of Cape Breton open, but to increase the production of these mines.

Mr. Nowlan: We have.

Mr. Robichaud: I question some of the figures that were cited by the minister. The records are there to show that in the last two years the production of the coal mines of Nova Scotia has decreased by over one million tons or 25 per cent. Now, the minister may have used two specific years for comparison, but if he takes the production figures for the last two years I believe he will have to admit that the production is down by over one million tons or 25 per cent. In so far as the unions in the Cape Breton area are concerned, I think I have enough correspondence in my office to show that they are not satisfied, and they are certainly not happy about what is happening in their area.

I should like now to say a few words about the Atlantic charter. The minister stated that he had taken part in the framing of this Atlantic charter. I have here in front of me the Atlantic charter. The minister said that this government had found an answer to many of the problems. Earlier in his speech, before the dinner recess, he stated that most of the problems mentioned in the Atlantic charter had been taken care of by this government. I should like to know—

Mr. Nowlan: I think I said an approach had been made to taking care of them. I do not believe I said they had all been taken care of.

Mr. Robichaud: Did I hear the minister say an approach had been made?

Mr. Nowlan: I said that approaches had been made to the solution of many of them. I did not say that they had been solved.

Mr. Robichaud: There is quite a difference between an approach to a problem and the solution of a problem. What we in the maritimes are interested in right now is the solution of the problems which are facing us. It is the implementation of what is mentioned in the Atlantic resolutions in which we are interested.

What is mentioned in the Atlantic resolutions? I have here a copy of these Atlantic resolutions, with pictures of the candidates in the province of New Brunswick. I know this is the same as the charter which was approved by the Conservative candidates in Nova Scotia, Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island. As was said this afternoon, this resolution says:

> —we are resolved to stand together in support of these measures which will help to overcome the historic disabilities which have limited, and even denied, opportunity to this area.

Resolution No. 1 is:

> National resources development program.

Here is what it says:

> We emphatically endorse John Diefenbaker's policy calling for a national development program;—

Well, I would ask the minister, the hon. member for Saint John-Albert and other members from the Atlantic provinces, what has been done to endorse the policy of John Diefenbaker calling for a national development program? What has been done to develop the economy of the Atlantic provinces?

No. 2 reads:

Decentralization of industry

By united and resolute representation from the members of parliament from the Atlantic provinces, we believe that all Canadians will support a federal program of industrial decentralization.

We will urge that: 1. The Atlantic provinces receive a more equitable share of defence contract expenditures.

I should like the hon. member on the government side to produce the figures on that particular item.

2. That crown corporations be established in the area.

I should like to have named any crown corporations that have been established in the Atlantic provinces since June of 1957.

3. That special fiscal consideration be given to private enterprises which will encourage the location of industry in the Atlantic area and, further, encourage the processing of our natural resources here.

Here again I should like to know what special fiscal consideration has been given to industries in the Atlantic area. The answer would be absolutely none. No. 3 is:

Capital projects program

We favour the immediate institution of an Atlantic capital projects program which will provide federal capital assistance for provincial projects designed to enlarge the basic economy of the area.

But the facts are—and I will come back to this matter latter—that since this government has taken office, no capital projects of any nature have been introduced in the Atlantic provinces. No. 4 is:

Atlantic provinces power development.

Here I will admit that a bill has been passed having to do with Atlantic provinces power development. I am sure this point will be dealt with in detail by other members on this side of the house before this debate is over. No. 5 is:

Fiscal needs of the Atlantic provinces.

On this point I would say that I agree with my colleague the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate who recognized the fact that additional grants are being paid to the Atlantic provinces in the amount of $25 million a year. No. 6 is:

Canadian Coastguard

We will press for a Canadian coastguard.

They have been pressing and we are still waiting for the coastguard.

I should now like to refer for a few moments to some of the points which have been made by the hon. member for Saint John-Albert. The hon. member questioned the courage of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) in speaking at this time on the maritime provinces. He referred to what he called the 22 years of absolute neglect from the Liberal administration. But just a few moments later, in referring to an editorial in the Saint John Telegraph-Journal of February 9 of this year, he stated that in his own county of Saint John there has been a boom that started in 1950. I would ask the hon. member who was in power here from 1950 to 1957.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I rise on a point of order, the editorial I read this afternoon distinctly stated "the late 1950's".

Mr. Robichaud: I note that the hon. member has rather changed his point.

The hon. member referred to the loan for Beechwood. What did New Brunswick really get in this loan from the federal government to finance the Beechwood project? It is true that the loan of $29,500,000 was made to the province of New Brunswick at a rate of interest of 3.78 per cent. However, at the time the bill was introduced I remember objecting in this house to the fact that the loan was granted for too short a period, namely for eight years only. The facts today show that I was right in objecting to that term of the loan. Only a few months ago the province of New Brunswick was obliged to issue bonds in New York, in the United States, where they are paying close to 6 per cent interest. What for? They are doing it in order to pay back to the federal government the payment of $4,358,983.39 a year which they are bound to pay according to the terms of this loan.

The facts are that the province of New Brunswick would have been better off if in 1956 or early 1957 they had gone ahead on their own and issued 40-year bonds at the current rate of interest which was then in the vicinity of 4.25 per cent or 4.50 per cent and had financed the project on their own in preference to financing it on the terms of the loan made by the federal government. That is the case of Beechwood.

The hon. member for Saint John-Albert referred to the prosperity of his area and he took pride in it. I do not blame him for that. I agree with him that in the Saint John area conditions are probably much better than they are in many other areas of the Atlantic provinces. But what has this government done? What did it have to do with the conditions which exist today in the Saint John area? He himself admitted what is the fact when he gave the list of the private enterprise projects which are at present under way in his own constituency. The prosperity in his area is due not to this government's intervention, not to the policy of this government but to the courage of private enterprise

He referred to new projects by this government and when referring to this matter he had to say, in a very mild manner, that wharves, et cetera were commenced by the Liberals and were completed under the present administration. But I would ask him again what new capital projects of importance have been initiated in the province of New Brunswick or anywhere in the Atlantic provinces since 1957.

Reference has been made this afternoon to Camp Gagetown in the Fredericton area. If conditions have picked up in the Saint John and Fredericton areas it is owing mainly to the construction of Camp Gagetown which was built under the previous administration.

References have also been made to the proposed Prince Edward Island causeway. I know that this was an extremely important project prior to the provincial election in Prince Edward Island last year, just as the Chignecto canal is extremely important now prior to a provincial election in New Brunswick this year. We all know that in the 1958-59 estimates there was a sum of $360,000 for a survey for the Prince Edward Island causeway. An election was coming in Prince Edward Island in the following year. In the 1959-60 estimates there was a sum of $250,000. This year, now that the election is over, this amount has been reduced to $50,000.

We know that the Conservative government is now in power in Prince Edward Island, and this government has been called the causeway party. But after the election was won on the island, what did we hear? We heard from the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker) a statement giving the objections to the construction of the causeway. They were objections which did not exist prior to the September 1 election last year on the island. What were his objections? They were that the cost was much higher than he expected; that the tide was much stronger than anticipated; that the ice was much thicker than he had ever thought; and that it would affect movement of fish through the Northumberland strait. Those were objections which we all knew were there prior to the provincial election. But now that the election is over, now that the causeway cause has worked well, the minister can come out and give these objections.

What do we see now? We see the kind of shemozzle there is between the premier of Prince Edward Island and Premier Flemming of New Brunswick, each wondering which should get priority, whether it would be the causeway or whether it would be the Chignecto canal. However, we can be sure that, owing to the fact that the election is over, the Chignecto canal will likely get priority.

I would like to deal with the amendment which was introduced this afternoon by my colleague, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. We recall that in "The Nation's Business" T.V. series on Wednesday, March 2, the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) said:

> The responsibility of the federal government extends to every part of Canada. We believe in the development of Canadian resources for the benefit of all Canadians and the processing of more and more of these resources in Canada. We shall never be satisfied to see one part of the country develop and another lag behind.

I hope that the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Brooks) will not be all upset and scandalized if I try to picture some of the conditions which do exist in our own province of New Brunswick today. The Prime Minister was right, he may even have been sincere, in saying "We shall never be satisfied to see one part of the country develop and another lag behind." But the question today is the following: What has the present administration done to take care of regional problems, to solve or remove the inequalities of opportunities for Canadians living in the Atlantic provinces? What has the present administration done to implement in full, or even in part, the promises, the solemn pledge, made by the Conservative candidates prior to the 1957 election? The people of the Atlantic provinces were given, as was mentioned just a few minutes ago by the Minister of National Revenue, great hope for the future development of our area by those Atlantic resolutions which were dealt with in detail by the speakers who have preceded me in this debate and to which I referred a few months ago.

The failure of the present government to implement its election promises is clearly shown not only by its omissions in its policy toward the Atlantic provinces but also by its disregard to adopt a national development policy which would ensure and preserve for the Canadian people and future generations of Canadians the control of economic destiny.

I have here a pamphlet which outlines the highlights of Progressive Conservative policy which was published by the Progressive Conservative party of Canada prior to the June 1957 election. On pages 4 and 5 are outlined the five points of the new national policy which would ensure national development, as it says, for the benefit of all. The first paragraph reads as follows:

> National development. To assure economic development in all parts of this country the Conservative party will offer a new national policy founded on a renewed sense of national purpose.

Now that is very clear—"a new national policy founded on a renewed sense of national purpose". It goes on:

Whereas Sir John Macdonald was concerned with opening the west, we shall be concerned with the developments in the northern frontier.

How can we reconcile this statement of the national policy of the Conservative party with the Atlantic charter, which reads:

We emphatically endorse John Diefenbaker's policy calling for a national development program.

There is quite a difference between the program for the Atlantic provinces and the national program of the Conservative party where the Atlantic provinces are not even mentioned.

Further on in the pamphlet are stated the five points of the Conservative policy which reads as follows:

A P-C government will

1. Adopt a national development policy in co-operation with the provinces which will develop our natural resources for the maximum benefit of all parts of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, anyone would support such a policy, but we all know that this policy has not been implemented by the actions of the present government.

2. Encourage more processing of Canada's resources in Canada.

What has this government done to encourage the processing of Canada's resources in Canada? In my own constituency of Gloucester where we have huge deposits of zinc and lead which have been dormant since March 31, 1958, a day which is familiar to hon. members on the government side, an announcement was made a few weeks ago that those minerals will be transported to Belgium in order to be processed, to be smelted. I wonder if this is to encourage the development of our natural resources in Canada.

3. Correct the present unfavourable trade balances.

I do not have to elaborate on that because we know what the unfavourable trade balance has been in the last two years, over $1.5 billion.

4. Foster wider financial participation by Canadians in the development of our resources.

Here again we know that the actions of the present government in this instance are almost negligible.

5. Promote greater opportunity and employment for a steadily increasing population.

If I were discussing the unemployment situation in detail at this time I know I would be called to order, but we must all admit that now, even after the snow has gone and after the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) in his budget speech said that unemployment would go with the snow, the snow is gone and unemployment is still at an all-time high in this country.

What is the economic position of the Atlantic provinces after three years of Conservative government in Ottawa? I regret that on this point I cannot agree with the Minister of National Revenue. Where are the improvements promised by the present Prime Minister and by the Conservative candidates as outlined in their Atlantic resolutions? What is the situation in my own province of New Brunswick?

We all know that the number of manufacturing establishments in New Brunswick, which had risen from 889 in 1945 to 1,077 in 1952 had decreased to 975 in 1958 after six years of Tory administration in our own province. We know that notwithstanding the promises made by the present government the number of registrations for jobs in the Atlantic region now exceeds 125,000. In my own constituency of Gloucester over 40 per cent of the labour force is today without a job and a large number of those unemployed have exhausted their unemployment insurance stamps and are without unemployment insurance benefits.

As long as I am Prime Minister, this government will not rest while one Canadian remains out of work. No one will be allowed to suffer.

Those are the well-known words of the Prime Minister. I would ask through you, Mr. Speaker, to the Right Hon. Prime Minister, what about those 840,000 Canadians today seeking jobs, a number of them suffering from hunger and privation? In my own constituency of Gloucester I know of hundreds of children who have to attend school without proper food and in many cases without adequate clothing.

An hon. Member: Do they pay family allowances there?

Mr. Robichaud: Yes, they do pay family allowances and if it were not for those family allowances and other social securities introduced by the Liberal administration those poor children would be starving today. I would ask the Prime Minister to come into my province, in my constituency of Gloucester, to come up to Sormany, Val Doucet, St. Sauveur and many other villages in my constituency, and see the misery and hardship which exists today after three years of Conservative administration. If it were not for social security benefits those poor children would be starving to death.

I do not share the views of some hon. members on the government side who take some satisfaction from the fact that such a large number of our unemployed are able to qualify for unemployment insurance benefits during the winter months.

Mr. Ricard: You are rejoicing about it.

Mr. Robichaud: No. I am one who views with great fear and anxiety the perilous state of the unemployment insurance fund. The sum of $917 million to the credit of the fund when the present government took over had shrunk to $359 million on March 31 and will be in the vicinity of $300 million or less by the end of May this year. This decline took place in spite of the 30 per cent increase in contributions which has now been in effect for the last eight months.

With seasonal unemployment at such a high level how can the government justify its present advertising policy abroad which was referred to in this house a few weeks ago? How can the government justify its advertising such as appeared in the Belfast Telegraph of December 6, 1959? An advertisement in that newspaper read:

> Share in Canada's great future—
> Immediate opportunities—
> Assisted passage loans (interest free) can be arranged as required.

This advertisement appeared in the Belfast Telegraph December 6, 1959 at a time when there were over 800,000 unemployed in Canada. Notwithstanding this fact the government was advertising job openings in Canada in these words:

> Immediate opportunities for—
> Bakers, bookkeepers, bricklayers, carpenters and joiners, cooks, farmers, farm workers, furniture upholsterers, hairdressers, motor mechanics, repair men, painters, plasterers, mechanic repairmen, salesmen and shop assistants—

—and others. If such immediate opportunities are available the maritime papers, I am convinced, would offer free advertising space for such jobs as I have just referred to. If the government would put the same ad in the Atlantic provinces newspapers I know that it would get all the bricklayers, carpenters and other skilled workers it needs right here in Canada.

I recently received a letter from one of my own constituents in which he asked if I could lend him $50 so he could go to Seven Islands and get a job. I did not have $50 to lend him but if I had been convinced that he had a job to go to I would have gladly borrowed the money and loaned it to him so he could have found work. The government is prepared to make interest-free loans to assist in the passage of immigrants to Canada. Why does the government not offer the same thing in Canada? Why does the government not offer to pay the passage or transportation costs of workers to areas where employment is available in Canada?

If the time has come for a change in the human outlook to improve the world we live in, the time has also come for the redeployment of some part of the huge defence expenditure this country has been called upon to undertake in order to maintain its enviable position as one of the leading nations of the world. I ask the government what steps or new measures have been introduced to take care of eventual reductions in defence expenditures, particularly as they may affect the Atlantic provinces? Reference was made to that this afternoon. Has not this government learned from its experience with the Arrow? Has it not taken a lesson from its failure to act in connection with the situation at Elliot Lake? Is not the government ashamed of its failure to provide adequate assistance to the population of Springhill following the unfortunate calamity of October, 1958? The people of Springhill deserved much more than the establishment in the area of a penal institution.

This government has in mind the reduction of defence expenditures. Again I ask the members of this government, particularly the four cabinet ministers from the Atlantic provinces—three with responsibility and one without responsibility—what will happen to the city of Halifax when defence establishments curtail their operations? Again I ask what provisions are being made by this government to rectify the disparity which exists in the Atlantic area and which the Atlantic resolutions, it was promised, would help?

This is the time to establish a capital projects commission as we in the opposition have been suggesting for some time. The people of the Atlantic provinces are fed up with promises, fed up with hope and vision. What they want is action and they want it now and not tomorrow. A capital projects commission for the Atlantic provinces, we know, will not suffice in itself. It must be supplemented by a tax incentive program similar to the measures introduced in England and in Belgium where they are being used to attract industries to areas hard hit by the closing of existing industries.

How can this government and the Prime Minister justify their position toward the Atlantic provinces when, at a time of unprecedented unemployment, public works projects are being drastically reduced as so obviously shown by the estimates for the current fiscal year? As I said in this house only a few weeks ago, the estimates for harbour improvements alone are cut by $3 million in Nova Scotia and by $2.5 million in New Brunswick. What major capital project was initiated in the Atlantic provinces since this government took office two years ago? Where is the $1,800 million public works program that was supposed to take care of the unemployment situation? It has remained in the vision stage and our unemployed are given the hope—yes, the hope—of better days to come, the hope that some day, the sooner the better, a Liberal government will again take over the administration of the affairs of this country.

The people of the Atlantic provinces have not forgotten the Atlantic resolutions. They were given the hope of better times and more employment. What did they get? The highest unemployment rate on record.

The hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Bell) said this afternoon that the amendment introduced by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate went further than the Atlantic resolutions.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): No, no.

Mr. Robichaud: I ask hon. members on the government side from the Atlantic provinces how they can vote against a motion that calls for the establishment of an Atlantic capital projects program for the purpose of assuring the financing of projects essential to the economic development of the Atlantic provinces?

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, the hon. member has included everything in that amendment except the kitchen sink.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has just confirmed what I mentioned his having said this afternoon. I challenge every hon. member on the government side and particularly those from the Atlantic provinces to vote against the second point in our amendment which calls for:

> The provision of special fiscal incentives to private enterprise for the purpose of encouraging industrial growth and the processing of natural resources in the Atlantic provinces.

I challenge them to vote against the third point of our amendment which reads as follows:

> The institution of an immediate inquiry to determine the effects of national monetary, fiscal and economic policies on the development of the Atlantic provinces and to make recommendations on desirable changes in the application of such policies for the benefit of the Atlantic provinces.

Before voting against this part of the amendment, I invite hon. members opposite to contact Premier Stanfield and Premier Flemming of New Brunswick. Here is point No. 4 of our amendment:

> The adjustment of freight rates and the provision of transportation facilities to overcome the handicaps of the geographic position of the Atlantic provinces.

We had in our amendment, Mr. Speaker, the four points which are mentioned almost word for word in the Atlantic charter, and the basis used by the present members of the government from the Atlantic provinces in their plea to the electors of their respective constituencies before the general election. I ask again, Mr. Speaker, can they vote against such an amendment?

In concluding my remarks I would suggest that a new APEC be formed. We know of the good work which has been done by the Atlantic provinces economic council; but if this government cannot find a solution for the Atlantic provinces, then I would suggest that an Atlantic provinces economic commission be appointed, having on its membership the members of the present Atlantic provinces economic council, representatives of the provincial governments, representatives of the different municipalities and federal officials. Such a commission, be it a royal commission if the government so desires, could make straightforward recommendations to the government which it would have to follow. Such a request of the Atlantic provinces cannot be denied.

We are not asking for hand-outs. The central provinces and the western provinces know what we of the Atlantic provinces need. Just a week ago I was visiting one of my constituents and I noticed that the car at his door was manufactured in Ontario. When I opened the door I noticed that the door knob came from Peterborough. When I walked into his house I saw that the carpet came from Ontario, the furniture came from Quebec. When I went into his kitchen I saw that the washing machine, the refrigerator, the toaster and everything were manufactured in Quebec or Ontario.

Mr. McGrath: How about the lawnmower?

Mr. Robichaud: The lawnmower was certainly not fabricated in the Atlantic provinces. The cereals came from western Canada. Even the meat came not from the Atlantic provinces but from some of the other provinces.

In the Atlantic provinces we have an outlet of 1.5 million people to offer to the central provinces. We are an outlet for the central provinces. When we ask to be considered we know that we have to pay additional freight rates in order to get those goods. In return, what do the central provinces buy from us? Our pulp and paper are exported to the United States. Seventy five per cent to 80 per cent of our fish production is exported to the United States or to South America.

I again emphasize the fact that we are not asking for hand-outs; we are just asking for the rights of the people of the Atlantic provinces.

Mr. E. L. Morris (Parliamentary Secretary to the Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, whenever the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) makes a speech in Newfoundland—

An hon. Member: A rare occasion.

Mr. Morris: —it is customary for the chairman of the evening to invite the audience to rise and to sing: "Jack was every inch a sailor". This practice has diminished somewhat in recent years since his schooner, the Millie Ford, which foundered in a breeze and came up hard on the shore, took him out of the nautical business. This afternoon, in listening to his dissertation in the house—and I shall have something to say about it—I was reminded of the first two lines of this memorable Newfoundland anthem, "Jack was every inch a sailor". You will recall it goes like this:

It was 25 or 30 years since Jack first saw the light,
He came into this world of woe one dark and stormy night.

We have witnessed today a very remarkable performance. Let us be quite clear on what it is we are asked to observe today. What we have heard from the opposition today have been very clearly provincial election campaign speeches. I for one say that this is a misuse of the time of the House of Commons at this point in its proceedings.

Mr. Robichaud: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Morris: Since my time will run out at the end of this sitting, I wonder whether I might go on? Therefore, audacity is certainly not lost in this realm. Here we have a group of embittered, lost souls, cast adrift in two federal elections, cast out by the Atlantic provinces, all but a shattered remnant cast out. They come in here tonight and they say, "What have you done?"

Mr. Pickersgill: What have you done?

Mr. Morris: I wonder whether the hon. gentleman from Bonavista-Twillingate is aware of the little mannerism he has recently adopted in the house which I for one find—

Mr. Robichaud: He is not against the Chignecto canal.

Mr. Morris: —not very impressive; that is, this mannerism. Whenever we on this side of the house interject something with which he is not presently inclined to deal or capable of dealing with, he turns to us and refers to us as young members, or some such phrase, or "when you have been here as long as I have been here", and so on. This afternoon he referred to the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Bell) as a young man. It turned out, of course, that the hon. member for Saint John-Albert had not made the interjection; it was made by the hon. member for Prince (Mr. Phillips).

Mr. Pickersgill: I was not confused about it at all.

Mr. Morris: I have long since stopped looking for gems from that corner of the house.

I looked up the Canadian Parliamentary Guide during the supper recess to find out some of the antecedents, the genealogy of this self-appointed champion of the Atlantic provinces; born in Ontario,—

Mr. Pickersgill: That is correct.

Mr. Morris: —educated in Winnipeg, married to a British Columbian, sprung into the Atlantic provinces on the 12th day of June, 1953, after a long career under that government. He had all that night and part of the next morning, when the house was dissolved and an election called. So we get in the house repetitious views on the Atlantic provinces from a man who was himself imposed upon his constituency.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, with the greatest possible reluctance I raise a question of privilege. I was elected by my constituents on three occasions. On the first occasion I got 80 per cent of the vote; on the second occasion, 87 per cent; and on the third occasion I got more additional votes than my opponents got votes. I was not imposed at all; I was elected, and I was elected by as substantial a majority as any member in this house.

Mr. Morris: Of course, Mr. Speaker, this is typical of the Liberal zeal for parliamentary practice. There is no point of order at all.

Mr. Pickersgill: I said it was a question of privilege.

Mr. Morris: The point I make is this. The hon. gentleman may ask me to withdraw if what I say is incorrect, but I am of the opinion that not since June 12, 1953, when he was appointed, has a convention been held among his followers in his contituency. If that is incorrect he can ask me to withdraw.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Forgie: You cannot make a silk purse out of a sow's ear.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I would ask the hon. member for Halifax to come back to the subject matter.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I am going to raise a point of order. Since the hon. member for Halifax has lectured us on parliamentary procedure, I do raise a point of order seriously. I have examined carefully the C.C.F. subamendment as well as the amendment I moved and I find nothing in them that has anything to do with my career before I came into the house. Interesting though it is—

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Your qualifications are very interesting.

Mr. Pickersgill: —and flattered though I am to have all this attention bestowed upon me, I think it would be more in keeping with the rules of the house if the hon. gentleman would not seek so obviously to evade debating this important resolution which sets out the Tory policy on which he was elected.

Mr. Morris: Mr. Speaker, if hon. gentlemen opposite will contain themselves long enough I will get to the subject matter of the amendment. We have had a remarkable performance in the provincial campaign field from gentlemen who make a habit of ridiculing us on this side about the vision and whose own vision is limited by the green carpeting down the centre of two legislative assemblies, one in Fredericton and one in Halifax. That is the vision of their party.

Mr. Forgie: I have a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the hon. member how he would know what an hon. gentleman would be like.

Mr. Morris: The hon. gentleman's friends in the house on that side were making such a noise in their enthusiasm for his interesting interjection that I could not possibly hear it.

Mr. Forgie: No, you would not answer it.

Mr. Morris: We have had today a further demonstration of the self-dictated piety of opposition members about the Atlantic resolutions. This is a carefully nurtured propagandist weapon in connection with which they always say before mentioning these resolutions, "Of course, Conservative members will not mind repetition of these Atlantic resolutions". This is intended to inculcate among unsuspecting people of the country the idea that we have something to be ashamed of. Let this be perfectly clear. The Atlantic resolutions to which I signed my name—I notice that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate smiles but I find this a very serious subject—were in my view the most high-minded statement of public purpose by devoted young men in contemporary Canadian political history. The resolutions were and are and will remain a beacon of light after 20 years of darkness for the people of the Atlantic provinces.

I have said before, and will say as long as the electorate and breath allow me, that the Liberal party is doing the Atlantic provinces great harm by insolently repeating over and over again the most depressingly black picture which they can manage to portray of the Atlantic provinces. What are the facts?

Mr. Deschatelets: Unemployment.

Mr. Morris: In the publication, Private and Public Investment in Canada, Outlook for 1960, Regional Investment, issued by the Department of Trade and Commerce, the investment intentions of the province of Nova Scotia are given as these. Total investment intentions of primary industry and the construction industry, manufacturing, utilities, trade, finance and commercial services, housing, institutional services and government departments are given as $184.2 million in 1958, $205,800,000 in 1959 and $219,500,000 in 1960. What is backward about that?

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Good intentions.

Mr. Morris: If you go forward the opposition says you are going backwards. The total of all capital and repair expenditures in 1958 was $258,400,000, in 1959, $284 million and in 1960, $299.5 million. We have here the highest capital intentions of any year in Nova Scotia's history, which betokens the degree of optimistic faith our people have in the province of Nova Scotia.

I am sure that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, who introduced the amendment, will not say that I am out of order if I mention his beautiful constituency, the entrance to Notre Dame bay and the port of Twillingate. In listening to him this afternoon. I thought that the way you get into Twillingate is between two dangerous headlands. One is called Hell's gate and the other is called Paradise and down the middle is Twillingate. We have to be very careful going down the middle of the remarks which we heard this afternoon.

Let us contrast the health and welfare programs in Nova Scotia with those of the last year of Liberal rule, 1956. The province now pays the cost of the care of all tubercular mentally ill people. Because of federal financial assistance the province is able to pay one third of the operating cost of municipal hospitals for the mentally ill which meet the minimum and desirable standards of professional practice. The province has now agreed to raise its share of these costs to one half. In 1956 the Liberal government paid nothing. Already half of the mentally ill under municipal care are in hospitals which have qualified for provincial assistance.

The province is able now, because of its financial situation, to supply helpful new drugs to municipal institutions. Psychiatric clinics have been opened. They had to be opened. More people became mentally ill under the Liberal government than ever before in our history. Over $3 million has been spent to improve the Nova Scotia hospital. A new nurses' residence is to be built. The hospital plan has been instituted and outpatients' service has already been expanded.

There is a shortage of hospital beds in Nova Scotia today because in the years from 1951 to 1956 the Liberal government of Nova Scotia discontinued matching federal grants for new hospital bed construction. The consequence was that nothing could be given, and that brought new hospital construction virtually to a halt. One of the first things the government of the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker did on assuming office was to increase the federal grant to $2,000, and the Stanfield government put up an extra $3,000, so that the Conservatives, who we are told have no regard for the average human being, made possible grants of $5,000 for every new hospital bed in Nova Scotia.

But hon. gentlemen will recall that as early as 1919 the government of Mackenzie King promised hospital insurance in this country, and yet 37 years later a Liberal government in Nova Scotia was not paying anything for new hospital beds.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Morris: We now have an extension to the Halifax infirmary because of the zeal and vision of the Sisters of Charity. A $8 million treatment centre is being planned for the Victoria general hospital, a provincial institution. A contract has been let for a new hospital at Yarmouth. In Nova Scotia, the local Liberals tried to diminish the fact that the provincial government concluded an agreement for a chemical pulpmill on the strait of Canso costing $40 million. The Liberal members say, "We wanted the pulpmill, but we did not want them to take any land on which to build it."

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order; I must say that the hon. member is worrying me with his remarks now. I think he is straying a little too far from the motion before the house. The terms of the motion are very wide indeed, but I think there has to be a relationship between his remarks and federal policies or federal administration.

Mr. Morris: I, of course, bow immediately to your ruling. I was tempted to cite those things because the last gentleman who spoke dwelt at great length on his own constituency. At least I am talking about provincial government. However, if the rules are such that I must refer to federal activities, let me refer to the federal activities in my own riding which has been mentioned. I noticed a great deal of concern about Halifax in the house today. For instance, there was the repetitious Liberal argument, how will disarmament affect Halifax? One wonders whether this party, devoted to peace, is interested in disarmament as a means of contributing to the spiritual development of man or as a means of trying to embarrass the Conservatives. I am not afraid of disarmament, not in Halifax or anywhere in the world.

Let us look at what has taken place in a replica area of the maritime provinces under this government. In the city of Halifax we are completing a $4.5 million addition to the Nova Scotian hotel, promised by the Liberals for 20 years. We bailed out the bankrupt contractor of the former Liberal administration and completed the Ralston building. We have nearly completed a $1.5 million Bank of Canada agency building. Tenders have been called for a major addition to the federal building in Halifax. Work is already under way on a quarter of a million dollar addition to the federal building at Dartmouth. The Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Comtois), who is sometimes asked, what are you doing for the maritime provinces, has helped us to secure a $6 million oceanographic research station near Halifax. Tenders have been called for the approaches and for the piers and jetties for that great institute.

There has been an investment of $4.5 million in the Mulgrave park housing development; that construction job is already under way and will shortly be joined by another public housing development. A $16 million federal investment, commenced by the former administration and added to and improved by this administration for the Halifax international airport, is shortly to come to fruition with operational flying to commence on July 14. We have put up numerous new buildings in defence installations such as H.M.C. Dockyard, Shearwater, Beaver Bank, and a naval armament depot. The Fairey Aviation Company, one month ago, had the highest employment in its history at Eastern passage, largely because of the federal government's procurement practices. The Halifax shipyard in recent months has incurred the same fate as shipyards throughout the world. However, it now faces a period in which re-employment will take place as a new destroyer escort and a new Department of Transport ferry will be in the slips for construction. We now have four new industries in the industrial estates park at Woodside.

Not all of our people are employed. The hon. gentleman who preceded me talked about a reduction in the amount of money for harbours and rivers. There are 86 fishermen's wharves, public wharves, in my constituency, and 59 of these have had to be repaired in the last three years. Some of these were in despicable shape. As recently as this morning we had to call tenders to remove the outside end of one at Sheet Harbour where the Liberals had helpfully taken out the crib which lay between the outside end and the shore. How can fishermen use a wharf which is wharf here, the open water, and then shore line? I suppose it was built by one of their friends.

If the rules of the house, Mr. Speaker, had been interpreted more generously I might have had an opportunity to refer here to some remarks made about Liberal leaders in the Atlantic provinces. Mr. Hicks says that he would like to come up here and have a heart to heart, man to man talk with Mr. Diefenbaker. The man with whom he should have had the heart to heart talk was Louis St. Laurent, or is it possible that he did?

The present federal administration pays the province of Nova Scotia over $10 million more than did the previous Liberal government. I walked into this house tonight, as one of the two members for Halifax, to say how grateful my people are for the fact that this new money is coming into my riding and into the ridings of the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Crouse) and the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare (Mr. Legere), and all the other great constituencies in Nova Scotia. These additional federal moneys have made possible new schools, new roads, new housing and a new life of hope for our people.

I want to say this: The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has had a little less than seven years of durability in the Atlantic provinces. The rest of us in the Atlantic area do not always regard age as synonymous with wisdom, but it is certainly a good primary basis. Some of us have been there a few years longer. Perhaps the hon. gentleman has not been a resident of Newfoundland long enough to know some of the delightful phrases. One of them that I like, for obvious reasons, is a saying they have in Newfoundland, "It is not every day that Morris kills a cow". This means to say that it is not every day that you get an opportunity to tell what is in your heart, and when you get it, tell it. There is another classic one, "Your tauts are too far aft". The word "taut" is Newfoundland for the word "thwart". It means the cross seat in the boat. When your tauts are too far aft, it means you are so mixed up that your opinions are not worth listening to.

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): I had an opportunity to listen to the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Morris) for only a short while, Mr. Speaker, but what little I heard convinced me that his thwart is far too far aft. He asked for that. He chose the simile himself. If I were in the boat with my hon. friend, I think I would keep him as far aft as possible. In fact, I think I would put him overboard and tow him along.

I rose to support the amendment made by my colleague the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill). I think it was Lincoln who said that no nation can survive half slave and half free. I believe that statement is true in an economic sense as well. The problem of the Atlantic provinces is not a regional one; it is a national one. Just as no nation can exist half slave and half free, so also a nation like Canada cannot exist if one region is condemned to be permanently hewers of wood and drawers of water for another part. Canada belongs to all Canadians. Every Canadian, no matter in what part of Canada he lives, is entitled first of all to equality of opportunity and, second, to the enjoyment of a minimum level of public services.

The problem of the Atlantic provinces has not come about as a result of an economic accident. The position in which the Atlantic provinces find themselves today can be traced directly to three main causes. In the first place, it is a direct result of the step the maritime provinces or rather—I think I can include Newfoundland and say this—the Atlantic provinces took when they joined with the central provinces to make the nation of Canada.

In the second place, it is the result of the failure of the central provinces to live up to their part of the bargain; their part of the conditions undertaken; or their part of the terms of the union.

In the third place, it is the result of federal policies which have been developed since confederation mainly to suit the economic conditions of the central provinces. If the maritime provinces had chosen not to join with the central provinces but to federate among themselves and to form a sort of Atlantic union and if they had survived as a political and geographic unit, as I think was quite probable, there is no doubt that today they would be far better off than they are at the present time and that they could very well be as prosperous as other parts of Canada.

Prior to confederation the Atlantic provinces were far better off than were the central provinces. They had lower taxes. They had very small provincial debts. Their prosperity was due mainly to their own enterprise and initiative but also to the external trade which was a natural development of their position on the Atlantic seaboard. Their very low tariffs enabled them to trade in the world markets and to sell their own products, to carry them in their own bottoms to all parts of the world and to buy necessities from other countries at the lowest cost. That sort of situation encouraged the shipping industry and it was the shipping industry which produced the greatest revenue to the maritime provinces. The shipping industry, of course, is allied with the shipbuilding industry and that afforded them on outlet by means of which to utilize their forests and skills in shipbuilding and their skills which they developed in managing and sailing ships to every part of the world. They were able to turn all this to very good account financially.

There was great scope for the small enterpriser who was not hampered too much with tight money and who was free to produce any product he could sell. He knew that he could produce it at a low cost, that he could sell it at a low cost and that he could usually find a very good market for it.

When they joined up with the central provinces to form Canada the maritime provinces lost those great advantages. Instead of their own tariffs which could be suited to their own particular needs and to the needs of their own particular industries they became the victims of tariffs which were set up mainly for the protection of industry in the central provinces.

In other words, they became a captive market to the central provinces and that is the very identical situation in which Newfoundland finds itself today. Under that situation when they were forced to buy in the domestic market it was natural that the external trade, their great source of prosperity, would decline, and along with that decline in trade there must of necessity come a decline in the shipping industry and in the shipbuilding industry.

Part of the inducement held out to the maritimes to join with the central provinces was that they would ship their products through maritime ports, but after confederation this did not happen. The central provinces still continued to ship their goods through the United States ports of Boston and New York. They did not ship to Halifax and Saint John as had been promised. The great emporiums and manufacturing centres which had been envisioned as springing up on the sea coast of the Atlantic provinces did not materialize. At that time they had thought that as the result of confederation the maritime ports would gradually take on the same function as the United States ports in the state of Maine and the state of Massachusetts which had become the manufacturing centres for the hinterland. But this did not happen. The promised railway which was to link them up with Montreal was ten years in coming, and when it did come, as the hon. Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) pointed out this evening, it was built for military purposes and followed a route determined by military requirements rather than by economic considerations.

As a result of all this, maritime industries have been handicapped by excessive transportation costs, and instead of being the most prosperous part of Canada they have now become something akin to the poorhouse of Canada. In late years they have found themselves in the position of having to accept handouts in various forms, like tax rentals, stabilization grants, subventions and other forms of payments.

Mr. Phillips: Who started the tax rentals?

Mr. Carter: I am not worrying about who started them, I am referring to them as a condition resulting from the failure to live up to the obligations undertaken which were accepted at the time they became part of Canada.

Now although they have suffered those handicaps they have still seen their taxes used to build great national projects like the St. Lawrence seaway, which will be of great benefit to the central provinces but has not proved to date to be of any great benefit to the maritimes. We hope that the time will come when that condition will change, but experience to date has not tended to give very much encouragement.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) paid great tribute this afternoon to the contributions which the people of the maritimes have made to the development of the rest of Canada. In fact, without the maritimes there could never have been any Canadian nation. The central provinces were too vulnerable to exist by themselves and would certainly have become a part of the United States economy many years ago. Since then the maritime provinces have for many years been bearing almost alone the full cost of making Canada a nation and enabling Canada to exist as a nation. That cost should not be shared by the maritime provinces alone. It is cost that properly belongs to all Canadians and to all parts of Canada.

Therefore the payments which have been made to the Atlantic provinces should be viewed in that light, not as handouts or as generous gifts but as a national obligation. In fact, I think one could almost use the word restitution.

We cannot begin to cure the ills of the Atlantic provinces without understanding the causes and either removing them or offsetting their effect. The Atlantic charter—I mean the political one in 1957, not the historic Atlantic charter—was merely a statement of goals. But what is needed is a planned policy to implement these goals, such as some sort of five-year or three-year program or some other fixed period of priorities and progressive development.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: Before you leave the chair, sir, I wonder if the house leader could give us some idea of the business for Wednesday, Thursday and Friday, if it is at all possible, for convenience in arranging for speakers in debate.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, for Wednesday the main item will be the second reading of Bill C-56, an act to amend the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act. If that is completed, budget resolutions will follow. I cannot give the items for Thursday and Friday tonight.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

LABOUR FORCE SURVEYS, INDIAN RESERVES

Question No. 281—Mr. Howard:

1. Are any labour force surveys being conducted among Indians?
2. If so, which reserves or bands are affected by such surveys?
3. What are the results and/or recommendations in the case of each reserve or band?

Answer by: Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration):

1. Yes. Attention has been given to the development of labour force surveys in a number of regions, particularly during this past winter, as a means of facilitating the placement of Indians, both in seasonal and permanent employment. Additional surveys will follow.

2. Surveys have been undertaken or are under way as follows:

British Columbia: Nanaimo, Halalt, Chemainus, Cowishan and Nanoose Bands.

Alberta: Saddle Lake, Good Fish, Keeheewin, Cold Lake, and Frog Lake bands.

Manitoba: Long Plains, Gamblers, Keeseekoowenin, Waywayseecappo, Swan Lake, Rolling River, Birdtail Sioux, Oak River, Oak Lake, Peguis, Fisher River, Lake Manitoba, Lake St. Martin, Fairford, Little Saskatcheewan, Jackhead, Sandy Bay, and Valley River bands.

Northern Ontario: Moose band.

Southern Ontario: Golden Lake, Oneidas of the Thames, Chippewas of the Thames, and the Munceys of the Thames bands.

Quebec: Pointe Bleue, Oka, Pierreville, Seven Islands, Schefferville, Bersimis, Caughnawaga, Temiskaming, Amos, and young Indian people at Restigouche.

3. In view of the fact that these surveys have in the main been undertaken this winter, it will be some time before the full effects can be known.

INDUSTRIALIZATION AND MECHANIZATION STUDY, INDIANS

Question No. 282—Mr. Howard:

1. Has any study been made of industrialization and mechanization as such things affect Indians?
2. If so, what are the results and recommendations of such study?
3. Which department participated in this study?

Answer by: Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration):

1. Yes. The Department of Citizenship and Immigration recently commissioned the University of British Columbia to undertake a comprehensive study of the Indians of British Columbia. The report on this study by Messrs. Hawthorn, Belshaw and Jamieson included reference to the effects on Indians of industrialization and mechanization. The department also sponsored a study of the integration of the Indians in the Red Lake mining district of northwestern Ontario. The effects of industrialization and mechanization have been reviewed at two national conferences of Indian superintendents, at regional conferences of field staff, and at meetings of specialists. These effects are recognized to be of prime importance, and as such are given full consideration in the daily operation and the planning of the department.

In addition to studies conducted by the department this subject was dealt with in a report on the socio-economic study of people of Indian descent in Manitoba undertaken by the Manitoba department of agriculture and immigration in 1956.

2. The recommendations in the Hawthorn report, and the conclusions reached in other studies cover a great number of specific points in a wide variety of circumstances. The question can therefore be answered only in a general way. It is recognized that industrialization has created many problems for Indians. If they are to have greater opportunities to participate in the Canadian economy, the two chief means of accomplishing this are through expansion of academic and vocational education and increased assistance in finding employment in industry.

In recent years a greatly expanded academic and vocational program has been developed within the Indian affairs branch to prepare Indians for employment. With the appointment of specialist staff, urban placement programs have been introduced in all regions, and rural employment measures are being organized at the regional and agency levels, in co-operation with national employment service, immigration branch, other government departments and agencies, as well as unions and employers.

Greater emphasis has been given in this period of transition to programs of community and social development and principles of self-help including substantially increased expenditures for Indian houses to improve living conditions on reserves.

DEFENCE EXPENDITURES

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. G. E. Halpenny (London) presented the first report of the special committee on defence expenditures, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

ATOMIC ENERGY

NUCLEAR TESTS—PRESENTATION OF CANADIAN VIEW AT SUMMIT CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Acting Prime Minister. In view of press reports from Paris, will the government make known to the United Kingdom, the United States and France its view that the ban on nuclear tests should be discussed and, if possible, decided at the forthcoming summit conference?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Leader of the Opposition for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question. I have not seen the press reports to which the hon. gentleman refers. However, sir, it is well known that disarmament is to be an important item on the agenda of the summit meetings, and there is obviously a close connection between the question of the discontinuance of nuclear tests and disarmament.

On the question of nuclear tests, the policy of the Canadian government has been made very clear, both in public and in private, to our allies, including the countries to which the hon. gentleman referred in his question, on many previous occasions. Therefore I do not think there can be any doubt in the minds of any of our allies as to the government's firm opposition to the continuance of such tests.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NORTH BAY—CONTINUATION OF WORK ON BOMARC SITE AND SAGE CENTRE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the understandable confusion at the moment and, I might add, the genuine concern of the people of my area, can the minister say, first, whether work will be proceeded with as planned at the Bomarc site near North Bay? Second, regardless of the success or failure of the Bomarc, will the control project, which for security reasons is referred to as the defence installation at Trout lake, be continued without interruption?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): On December 14 last, Mr. Speaker, a contract for some $3 million was let for the construction of the Bomarc site at North Bay. To date something over $427,000 has already been spent. It is not the intention of the government at the present time to cancel that contract. Work is proceeding and will continue to proceed until the government of the United States inform us of any change of program they may suggest in connection with the Bomarc development and the air defence plans for the defence of this continent.

Regarding the other installation which has been referred to, as the hon. gentleman said, as a defence installation, the purpose of that has not been declared for security reasons, but I see no reason why it could not now be announced that that is a SAGE communication centre. The SAGE communication system is designed not only to control the Bomarc but to control interceptors or any other weapons which are being used in the air defence system. It is of assistance in the identification and tracking of friendly and hostile aircraft, and may be described as a centre for air battle management and air surveillance. So, quite irrespective of what is the final decision regarding the Bomarc program, the SAGE program near North Bay will continue according to the present plans of the government.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of National Defence. In view of his reply that there will be no change in the Canadian program until the United States government has declared its position, continued, confirmed or changed, then may I ask the minister whether the government of Canada, since the announcement of the congressional committee on Friday last, has taken any steps whatever to ascertain what is the position of the government of the United States with regard to this matter at this time.

Mr. Pearkes: Yes, Mr. Speaker; I was speaking to the assistant secretary of defence this morning at 10 o'clock and was informed by him what are the intentions of the government of the United States.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Will the minister tell the house the intentions of the United States, as given to him this morning?

Mr. Pearkes: I do not think that would be proper.

BOMARC MISSILE—REPORTED STATEMENT BY CHAIRMAN OF U.S. SUBCOMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence. Has the minister's attention been drawn to the statement—and if so has he any views to express to the house on it—of the chairman of the United States House of Representatives subcommittee on military appropriations that "if the Canadian government starts putting pressure through the Senate foreign relations committee or the executive branch we may, after all, have to spend money on this missile in which we have no confidence at all"?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, that was the opinion expressed by the gentleman referred to. Of course it is ridiculous to think that the Canadian government is putting any pressure on the United States government in this respect. The virtue of the Bomarc and the ultimate decision as to whether it is included in the air defence inventory of this continent will depend entirely upon the military worthiness of the weapon.

BOMARC MISSILE—INQUIRY AS TO INTERGOVERNMENTAL AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of official denials in Washington that there was any agreement between the two governments regarding the implementation of the Bomarc program, does the minister still believe that the cancellation of this program by the United States government would be a breach of an intergovernmental agreement?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Most certainly there was an intergovernmental agreement, and the cancellation of the Bomarc program without consultation with the dominion government would be a breach of that agreement. That is recognized in government circles in the United States.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): A supplementary question. Did the minister, when he was speaking to Washington this morning, indicate any preference in respect to the Canadian attitude as to whether the Bomarc program should be continued?

Mr. Pearkes: No, Mr. Speaker.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

MIGRATORY BIRDS—INQUIRY AS TO PROTECTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): In view of the interest of many Canadians in the conservation of wildlife and our forests, can the minister report to the house what effect his official noisemakers are having in the scaring of blue herons out of Mr. Elmhurst's woods?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): I will have inquiries made and inform the hon. member of the degree of success. If they are not having sufficient success I can recommend certain people who will do a very good job.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

NEWFOUNDLAND—REPORTED DISCUSSION RESPECTING APPOINTMENT OF FOURTH JUDGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. McGrath (St. John's East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice, notice of which was given to him. Has the minister's attention been drawn to a statement made by Premier Smallwood in the Newfoundland house of assembly on April 25, in which Mr. Smallwood gives a summary of a conversation he says he had with the Minister of Justice last year on the subject of the proclamation of the Newfoundland legislation creating the position of a fourth judge in that province?

Second, was there such a conversation and, if so, did the minister decline to give an assurance regarding Newfoundland traditions, as alleged by Mr. Smallwood?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Smallwood—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I apologize for any unintentional discourtesy. Mr. Smallwood and I did have a conversation on this matter in his office, in June of last year, I think. Mr. Smallwood is an interesting man and it was an interesting and informal conversation, but it did not really go at all in the way or to the effect that he now seeks to convey.

There was no discussion of "traditions" in the sense in which ordinary people would understand that word. What actually happened was that Mr. Smallwood raised a number of specific points and made clear to me a number of his own views on them as to particular tests that should be applied in determining the qualifications of any person for appointment to this position. What he asked for was an assurance that the government of Canada would agree to accept his views as to these qualifications in making the appointment. He said that if we would give him this assurance he would call a cabinet meeting at once and proclaim the Newfoundland act.

I told Mr. Smallwood that in making appointments to the bench the government of Canada accepts no such restrictions as he sought to impose, and that I declined to enter into the improper bargain which he asked me to make. I simply told him that the government of Canada was ready, as soon as he proclaimed his act, to consider immediately the appointment of the best qualified man.

That is still our position today. We do not enter into bargains with respect to judicial appointments.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is there any legislation of this parliament that would permit the minister to recommend such an appointment?

Mr. Fulton: Not at the moment, Mr. Speaker.

TRADE

STATEMENT BY MINISTER RESPECTING NEWSPAPER ARTICLE ON INTERVIEW

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce in two parts, stemming from statements in the morning press today by a Mr. Goldberg which say that the minister's review of his interviews with Mr. Goldberg in Moscow, given in this house last week, deformed the facts. First, has the minister any comment on this commentary upon the statement he gave us? Second, has he considered moving in this house to have Mr. Goldberg or the senior representative of the Associated Press in this country called before the bar of the house to explain his reflections upon the minister's veracity?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have not given consideration to the second suggestion as yet. With regard to the first part of the hon. member's question, I have seen the article to which reference is made. The account I saw in the Gazette was largely a reprint of the statements which I declared on Monday to be false, and I so declare again.

I notice there is very little comment by Mr. Goldberg except the flat statement that I have been incorrect in what I have said. The rest of it is a somewhat garbled account, in my opinion, as to statements which have already been dealt with. I had rather wondered why, if there was to be a reprint of this statement, a reprint of my statement might not have been made at the same time.

I notice that the correspondent, Mr. Goldberg, was misquoted in his original dispatch. This is, of course, a calamity. The word "if" was altered to "and" through a transmission error between Moscow and the Associated Press office in New York. I sympathize with him in the misquotation which occurred.

I notice that at the request of the Canadian Press, the Associated Press checked Goldberg on the accuracy of his original statement at the time; they were able to get in touch with him, and apparently he was able to reply. I notice that in the article, in justice to Mr. Goldberg, "the following facts have to be made known", and the following facts are a reprint of the original article.

I notice that Mr. Goldberg has had 27 years' experience. By inference I have had none. I notice that he was stationed in Paris, in Prague and at the United Nations; he has been abroad. I was stationed abroad for six years in France, Belgium, the Netherlands, Germany and the United Kingdom. Mr. Goldberg's opinion is to be relied upon, apparently, because he was a war correspondent. I never had that privilege, Mr. Speaker. I was not a war correspondent. Many of them saw considerable danger in the course of their activities. My experience, unfortunately, was limited to just 20 battles.

I notice that in this article Mr. Goldberg attempts to implicate a distinguished civil servant, and accuses him of levity in the course of the discussion on uranium. The discussion on uranium consisted of one question. The distinguished civil servant is a very competent civil servant, Mr. Warren, assistant deputy minister of the Department of Trade and Commerce. He was not a war correspondent; he was just an officer in the Royal Canadian Navy who underwent as much danger and extreme hazards as any person in the Canadian navy.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Goldberg has left unexplained four things; the motive for his question; his original dispatch, which any reasonable person would assume was such to cause international trouble. He has left unexplained the fact that he asked no questions at the press conference; and he has left unexplained his reference to Blind River uranium, which is an uncommon expression nowadays because we speak of Elliot Lake, Bancroft, Beaverlodge and Northwest Territories. I have noted the report in the paper, and I stand by my statement of Monday.

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): May I ask a supplementary question of the minister. Could the minister tell the house how many times since 1957 he has complained of being misquoted?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member is asking a question which is intended to be argumentative rather than one seeking information.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, in his statement of privilege last week the minister expressed surprise that no Canadian newspaper had tried to get in touch with him. Has it been brought to his attention that two Canadian newspapers did try to get in touch with him in Moscow and were unable to contact him?

Mr. Churchill: I received a note from the press gallery the day I spoke saying that some hours had been spent trying to get in contact with me in Moscow. I also received a telegram to the effect that a phone call was put through to Moscow, but a reply came back that the Canadian embassy was closed.

The Canadian embassy is never without someone in the building. The upper part is occupied by the ambassador, and the lower part is comprised of offices; when the staff is absent there is a security guard in attendance at all times, and he answers the phone in an emergency. During the period in question, which according to the telegram I received was from eight o'clock on Saturday morning onward, which would be three o'clock Moscow time, I was in the hotel and could have been reached there had the operator got through. There was no question about my not being accessible. Mr. Goldberg was.

URANIUM—COMPETITION FROM AUSTRALIA—INCREASED U.S. PRODUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether he is now in a position to answer the questions asked him on April 29 concerning uranium.

[Mr. Churchill.]

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yes, Mr. Speaker. These questions were asked during my absence on April 29. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) inquired about certain reports concerning action being proposed in Australia. These reports in the press have been noted, to the effect that the government of Australia has had proposed to it financial assistance to the uranium industry in that country either through subsidies or by stockpiling.

I have no indication that any action has been taken on that proposal. In view of the relatively high cost of Australian uranium production it is doubtful whether such financial assistance, if forthcoming, would make Australian uranium seriously competitive with that of the lower cost Canadian producers.

Then on the same day the hon. member for Ottawa West drew attention to the increase in production of uranium in the United States. During the calendar year 1959 the production of Canadian uranium was less than the production of the United States of America by some 500 tons. It is expected that the United States production will rise further during 1960, because certain mines are only now reaching their contract output.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

ST. CLAIR RIVER—AWARD OF CONTRACT FOR CUT-OFF BY U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister comment on a report that a large contract has been awarded by the United States corps of engineers for construction of a new cut-off channel at the southeast bend in the St. Clair river, being part of a larger project in connection with the St. Lawrence seaway?

Would the minister also explain why, although this particular phase of the over-all project is located entirely in Canada, the contract should have been awarded by the United States corps of engineers?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question shortly before I entered the house.

I have not seen the article in question, but I have had officials of my department check into it. They have been in touch with the Department of External Affairs, who have advised us as follows. In the reach of the St. Clair river to which the hon. member has referred, an intergovernmental agreement was worked out whereby the improved channel would be financed by funds appropriated by the United States congress. The work on this channel was to be shared between Canada and the United States, Canadian and United States contractors being given equal opportunity to bid, and Canadian and United States labour being employed as equally as possible.

When bids were called about two months ago, two contractors, one Canadian and one from the United States, submitted bids. They were accepted, and these two contractors will presumably be hiring workers from their respective countries so that the provisions of the agreement worked out between the governments whereby Canadian and United States labour will be employed in approximately equal numbers may be fulfilled.

The maintenance of this channel will be the responsibility of the Canadian government.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

REPORTED DUMPING OF USED U.S. CONSTRUCTION EQUIPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of Defence Production. I have not given the hon. gentleman notice, but perhaps he can take this as notice if he desires. I should like to know whether the minister has seen an article which appeared in this morning's Gazette entitled "Dumping by U.S. Charged" which implies that millions of dollars worth of second hand United States construction equipment is being dumped in Canada with the sanction of the federal government.

Have representations been made to the minister against this action, as stated in the article, and has the hon. gentleman any comment to make thereon?

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Laurier should know that sales of United States equipment have been going on for several years. Representations have been made with a view to the cancellation of the agreement under which these imports have been possible. I have been interested in this problem, and I do not think anybody approves of the dumping of used construction material on the Canadian market. On the other hand, while I was considering this brief, small contractors and municipal contractors as well as local municipalities, presented their views to the effect that it is to their advantage that this construction machinery be sold by crown assets to different municipalities in Canada. At the moment I am comparing the two briefs, one by this equipment company and the other by the municipalities and small contractors, and a decision will soon be reached by the government.

As I read the article, the Minister of Defence Production is said to have done a turn-about. There is no turn-about in this question, as the question has not been brought to the government. We are waiting for the preparation of the memorandum by small contractors, and especially municipal contractors.

IMMIGRATION

INQUIRY AS TO POLICY RESPECTING FARM WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. In the absence of the minister I direct the question to her parliamentary secretary. My question arises out of newspaper reports to the effect that a new immigration policy has been initiated which will enable young farmers from the Netherlands, Belgium and France to come to Canada to work on Canadian farms. Can the minister inform the house whether the same policy will apply to sons of farmers of other countries such as Greece, Poland, Italy, Yugoslavia, or any other country wishing to participate in this scheme?

Mr. John Charlton (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to take this question as notice and bring it to the minister's attention on her return.

PENITENTIARIES

ST. VINCENT DE PAUL—STATEMENT ON REPORTED SLAYING OF INMATE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Yesterday the hon. member for Skeena asked me a supplementary question in connection with the death of an inmate at St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary on Sunday. His supplementary question was a request for information as to where the physician was at the time the man fell and where he had to be called from.

I am advised that the doctor at St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary is Dr. Lefebvre. He lives on Jean-Talon street in Montreal and is employed on a full time basis by the penitentiary. I am further advised that Dr. Lefebvre was called by the penitentiary between 10.15 and 10.20 a.m. on Sunday, May 1, and that he was informed that the penitentiary officials thought the inmate was already dead. He left immediately for the penitentiary, where he arrived between 10.40 and 10.45 a.m. In the meantime the inmate had been carried to the penitentiary hospital and had been looked after by the attendants and nurses. The death certificate was signed by the doctor at 10.50.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REQUEST FOR COMMENT ON REPORTED REMARKS OF PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder if I can ask the Minister of Labour whether he was consulted by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) before he made the statement attributed to him in his speech before the Canadian chamber of commerce in London that "this year will be a good year; we shall be able to welcome and absorb into employment many tens of thousands of immigrants"? If so, does the minister not think he should try first to absorb into employment the hundreds of thousands of Canadian unemployed?

Mr. Grafftey: That is a nice speech, but it is really not a question.

Mr. Speaker: The latter part of the question was undoubtedly asked for the purpose of argument. I am not sure about the earlier part, whether it is a suitable question to ask the minister, whether he was consulted by the Prime Minister before he made the statement.

Mr. Pickersgill: I will be glad to ask the minister whether he concurs in that view.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is one of the greatest prime ministers this country has ever had, and he is a person who has his finger on the pulse of the whole economy.

ALBERTA—REPORTED PROTEST AGAINST RAILWAY EMPLOYMENT CONDITIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has he been able to obtain the information concerning the question I asked the Prime Minister, which question was referred to him and which he said he would take up with Canadian National Railways, in connection with the protest of the Alberta lodge against the abolition of railway sections in that province?

[Mr. Fulton.]

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I passed that question along to the management of Canadian National Railways, and I have not had a report from them since that time.

[Later:]

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport apropos of the matter about which I asked him a moment ago. Since I posed the question to him another letter addressed to the Prime Minister has come to my attention. The effect of this letter is that instead of the abolition of 10 miles of section it is now proposed to abolish from 12 to 25 miles of section in the area referred to in the earlier letter and in the further letter to the Prime Minister. When the minister inquires of the officers of Canadian National Railways, could he get information on this additional matter as well?

Mr. Hees: I will be glad to do so.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO AUTHORIZATION OF LOANS TO FUND

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister, one of the greatest acting prime ministers Canada has ever had—

Mr. Argue: The question comes from one of the greatest actors Canada has ever had.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The question unfortunately relates not to the high office of prime minister but to the important—in terms of prestige and status not as important —office of Minister of Finance—

Mr. Grafftey: Question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In view of the fact that as of March 31 the unemployment insurance fund had reached the alarmingly low figure of $359 million, can the Minister of Finance say whether he has, under the Unemployment Insurance Act, authorized any loans whatsoever by any agency of the government of Canada or otherwise to the unemployment insurance commission?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): In thanking the hon. gentleman for his most generous and touching allusion, in reply may I say I recognize that I am replying to one of the greatest parliamentarians to have represented the riding of Essex East in the last five years.

Mr. Pickersgill: You could have been generous and said 25.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The loans of which he is aware, which were made to the unemployment insurance commission by the Minister of Finance in the fiscal year 1958-59, were repaid in due course, and there is no such indebtedness at the present time. Under the law, Mr. Speaker, I am required at the close of the fiscal year, when I bring in the budget, to report any loans that may be outstanding. If my hon. friend will do me the honour of examining the budget speech closely, and the white paper, he will find no loans outstanding.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will the Minister of Finance say whether any recommendation is now on his desk from the investment committee suggesting that such a loan should be extended by the Bank of Canada to the unemployment insurance commission?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I have two desks. When I left my office in the Confederation building at 10.20 a.m. this morning that desk was clear. When I left my office in the parliament buildings to come into the chamber at 2.30 p.m. that desk was clear.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Did I correctly understand the Minister of Finance, who has such a clear desk, to say that it was his obligation to report those loans in his budget speech? If so, can the minister tell us why he failed to do so last year?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the law was punctiliously complied with. The hon. gentleman will see the full report of loans outstanding at the end of the fiscal year. He understands, I am sure, that the fiscal year ends March 31st.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

UPLANDS, ONTARIO—REPORTED TOWING AWAY OF AUTOMOBILES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Is the minister aware of a legal suit against the commanding officer at Uplands airport in relation to the towing away or removal of 30 automobiles owned by air force personnel on that station? I understand that the notice was sent out on April 22.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Peters: Will the minister inform the house whether an investigation is contemplated to ascertain if the commanding officer, Group Captain Mussells, exceeded his authority in disposing of the automobiles belonging to air force personnel at Uplands in this disgraceful manner?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): I have no information on this matter. This is the first time it has been brought to my attention. I will be very pleased to look into it.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON BOMBER CRASH NEAR MILWAUKEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Does the minister have any report for the house in respect of the very tragic crash of the R.C.A.F. Mitchell bomber?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all hon. members regret the loss of the Mitchell bomber over the week end which resulted in six officers and airmen of the Royal Canadian Air Force losing their lives. I understand that the plane has been located and that part of the wreckage has already been salvaged. Two bodies have been recovered. An investigation is being carried out as to the cause of this tragic accident. I have no detailed report yet of the investigation.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF STUDENTS FROM ST. LAWRENCE UNIVERSITY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister to which I have given him the answer. Is he aware that for more than 10 years students from a United States university have visited parliament each year to observe the workings of our system of democracy, and that students from St. Lawrence University in Canton, New York are now in the gallery with Professor William Willoughby?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of the answer though not of his intention to ask this question. I welcome the question, and I am sure all hon. members welcome the presence in the gallery of these students and their professor from St. Lawrence University in Canton.

GRAIN

SASKATCHEWAN—INQUIRY AS TO EQUALIZATION OF QUOTAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can the minister inform the house whether he was able to have conversations yesterday with representatives of the Canadian wheat board concerning the large proportion of low and inequitable quotas in certain parts of Saskatchewan, and as to what steps are being taken to equalize these quotas by the end of the crop year?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Comerce): Mr. Speaker, I spoke to the Canadian wheat board concerning this subject not yesterday but on Friday, and received an assurance from them that as quickly as possible the quotas will be raised to a six-bushel level across the prairies. The number of points still on low quotas is quite limited, and every effort is being made to bring them into balance.

PRIVILEGE

MR. FISHER—CORRECTION OF STATEMENT MADE IN RAILWAY COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, it has been brought to my attention by the president of Canadian National Railways that before the sessional committee on railways, air lines and shipping, which has completed its deliberations, I uttered a gross misstatement of fact, and I want to put the record straight if I may. At a meeting of the committee I indicated that the former distinguished member for Port Arthur, Right Hon. C. D. Howe, was a director of the Canadian Pacific Railway. This was an error on my part, made through an association he has with a completely different firm. If by that remark I caused any embarrassment to Mr. Howe I should like to take this opportunity of apologizing to him and correcting the record.

NATIONAL REVENUE

MONTREAL—REPORTED PARKING CHARGE FOR CARS OF EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Is the minister aware that in the income tax building in Montreal there is a large room for the parking of employees' cars, and that the department has now decided to charge the employees $10 rent for the parking of their cars?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am unaware of that fact. I do not think the department has control of the rental of public buildings. I would assume that this is a question that probably should be directed to my colleague the Minister of Public Works. All I do is collect money, and I do not charge anybody for the privilege.

Mr. Denis: If the Minister of Public Works heard the question could he answer without my repeating it?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to take the matter under consideration.

SUPPLY

The house resumed, from Monday, May 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Pickersgill, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Regier.

FEDERAL AID TO ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, before calling it ten o'clock last night I had endeavoured to show that the economic ills of the maritime provinces can be directly attributed to three causes. These three causes are, first, the political union between the maritime provinces and the central provinces; second, the failure of the central provinces to carry out certain parts of their agreements included in the terms of union and their tardiness in carrying out other parts of their agreements; third, federal policies since confederation, which have been geared to the political and economic requirements of the central provinces rather than to the economic needs of the maritime provinces.

It did not make economic sense for the maritime provinces to join up politically with central Canada. The channels of trade have always run north and south, and when these channels were changed to an east and west direction the result was that the maritime provinces were placed in an inferior economic position. However, out of loyalty to the British crown and to British traditions, they accepted that inferior position, knowing that it would cost them something financially but not knowing quite how much, and trusting that the central provinces, in good faith, would see to it that this price would be kept to the absolute minimum.

Here, Mr. Speaker, I should like to draw a parallel between the maritime provinces and Newfoundland. If it made poor sense for the maritime provinces to join central Canada, it made even less economic sense for Newfoundland to become a part of Canada. All our production is competitive with mainland Canada. None of our production is complementary to mainland Canada. A celebrated economist pointed out that analogy a few days ago as between Canada and Russia, that Canada and Russia have competitive production. If the maritime provinces made Canada possible, Newfoundland made Canada complete.

Now, had the maritime provinces put dollars before loyalty they would not have joined with the central provinces. They would very likely have formed a union amongst themselves, and quite possibly they might have joined with the United States. Had Newfoundland put dollars first we certainly would not have joined with Canada. We did not have to join with mainland Canada. We had excellent relations with our friends in the United States. They had already established bases in our country, and those bases were making a very big contribution to our economic life. Like every free people we were entitled to self-determination, and if we had been prepared to think only in economic terms our chances of development and prosperity as part of the United States would have been far greater than our chances as part of Canada.

But our loyalty in Newfoundland to the British crown and to British traditions is second to none, and like the maritimes we too were prepared to pay a price. Some hon. members may wonder why I make that statement. You will ask, is not Newfoundland better off now than ever before? The answer is yes, but Newfoundland was better off than ever before in her history before she joined Canada. As part of the United States—if we had made a request and elected to become a state of the United States—we would be eminently better off than we are at the present time.

I remember that when I first came here to parliament in the years 1949 and 1950, many of my colleagues would inquire as to how Newfoundland was getting on as part of Canada. I would say well, we are doing very well but, and as soon as I came to this word "but" I would seldom ever be permitted to go any further. As soon as I said "but" they would interrupt me and say, are you not getting family allowances; are you not getting old age pensions? Certainly we are. Since we are a part of Canada, what would be strange about that? Why would anybody ask that question?

This type of question reveals an attitude that seems to be imbedded in the subconscious minds of mainlanders. One overlooked it because one realized that they meant well and did not realize the type of attitude they were revealing. However, I believe it is worth while to examine the reason for that kind of attitude.

The price paid by the maritimes to become a part of Canada—and I think we can include Newfoundland and say the Atlantic provinces—has become too costly for their economies to support. Their economic position has degenerated. Over the years various ingenious methods have been devised to try to offset that situation to some extent. I have no quarrel with those methods that have been invented. They will have to be continued for many years to come. But I think we must realize that these methods have generated a wrong relationship. They have put the maritime provinces in the position of poor relations who have become permanent pensioners of the rest of Canada. It implies also an unwillingness to recognize the indebtedness of the rest of Canada to the maritime provinces and to Newfoundland, and because of that fact this assistance which is given in various forms is regarded by the people on the mainland of Canada as generosity, as a favour, as something emanating from their big-heartedness rather than something that is justly due.

Mr. Aiken: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Carter: No. Every time you have asked me a question it has been a foolish one. I am not going to be interrupted.

Mr. Grafftey: It is because he cannot answer it.

Mr. Carter: I think the ancient and decrepit member from Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) had better remain quiet.

An hon. Member: That was not smart.

Mr. Grafftey: His vocabulary is very limited.

Mr. Carter: The first step toward curing these ills is a change of attitude and a recognition of the sacrifices made by the Atlantic provinces for a greater cause. Nowhere is that spirit more lacking than toward Newfoundland. We have been constantly reminded in the ten years of union of how much we are getting out of confederation. Never a word has been said publicly, nor has there been an acknowledgement by any official that I know of, as to how much Newfoundland contributed to Canada. That contribution included 150,000 square miles of new territory, rich resources in the Labrador, mineral wealth, hydroelectric power, half a million new citizens, an addition to the domestic market worth $250 million annually, international airports which greatly strengthen the bargaining power of Canada with other countries, various public services including railway services, hotels, public wharves and other public structures.

Last but not least, most important of all is the fact that union with Canada made

Canada a nation in the true and real sense of the word. We cannot appraise that in terms of dollars and cents, but if you want to put a value on it compare Canada with Newfoundland to what Canada would be if Newfoundland and Labrador were a part of the United States. There is never a word of appreciation of what we have given to Canada. The only reference is to the few million dollars received as a hand-out.

We are only human and we like a little appreciation, too. The first requirement, then, if we are going to tackle this problem of the maritimes is a new spirit and a new motive born of a sense of appreciation and a desire to end the disabilities from which the maritimes suffer. This new spirit is needed because it is going to involve sacrifice on the part of the other Canadian provinces. It is their turn now to accept the sacrifice for Canada. This means they may have to scale down the rate of some of their improvements in public services in order to raise the level of those in the maritimes. The economic rehabilitation of the maritime provinces should be a truly national project. It should be not merely a project of the federal government but a national project in the fullest sense of that word, undertaken and motivated by a desire in the hearts of Canadians in the other provinces to see the maritimes achieve economic equality.

This will involve a long term program, and I think this program should be based on two main principles. The first is equality of opportunity. The second principle is that there should be a minimum level of public services for all Canadians. That will require in the maritimes a survey of the existing services to determine what that level should be. Once that level of public services has been determined, then fiscal grants will have to be adjusted to attain that goal over a predetermined period. Equality of opportunity means an opportunity to help us to help ourselves. We do not want to be permanent pensioners existing on hand-outs. We can stand on our own feet. We have the resources which are able to supply us with a reasonable standard of living, but we do not have equality of opportunity at the present time. Tight money, high interest rates, excessive transportation costs, tariff policies and monetary policies all militate against the maritime provinces.

Ways and means must be found to offset those disabilities. The Maritime Freight Rates Act should be restored to its original proportions. Tariff policies should be adjusted to suit the needs of the industries. Tariff policies should be adjusted to provide special incentives to new industry. Tight money can be overcome by the setting up of a development corporation for the rehabilitation of our existing industries and the encouragement of new ones.

All these things are included in this amendment, either expressly or by implication. They have been included in the so-called Atlantic charter to which the Conservative members from the maritimes have subscribed. In view of that fact it is difficult to see how they can vote against this amendment. The blueprint for the Atlantic provinces has been set forth in very great detail in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald and there is no need to elaborate further on that point. All that is necessary is to untie our hands, and we can do the rest.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a correction in a statement made by the hon. member who has just taken his seat.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member who has been speaking has made some misstatement which relates to the hon. member himself, then it would be in order to ask to make a correction.

Mr. Aiken: I was going to ask a question which the hon. member stated was a silly question.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has no reason for rising to comment on a refusal to accept his question. Is the hon. member rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Aiken: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps the hon. member would now permit the question I ask going to ask him.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Speaker, replying to the question of privilege, I have observed on several occasions when I have been making speeches that the hon. member seeks to raise points—

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is no question of privilege. The hon. member has a perfect right to refuse to be interrupted when another hon. member wants to ask a question. I take it that the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka was objecting to the words which were used about him. Is that the question of privilege the hon. member is raising?

Mr. Aiken: Yes, Mr. Speaker, that is the question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has stated his question of privilege. He has no right to ask a question now. The hon. member has concluded his speech. I recognize the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Brooks).

Hon. A. J. Brooks (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy this afternoon to say a few words on this resolution. I do not intend to follow the argument of the hon. member who has just taken his seat, except to say that we in what were formerly called the maritime provinces are very happy and proud indeed to have the province of Newfoundland as one of our associates in the Atlantic area.

We are very happy, too, that at no time in its history did the old colony of Newfoundland show any intention or desire to belong to any other organized nation than those comprising the British empire or the British commonwealth. I can assure the hon. member that if he will go back and read the debates in the House of Commons at the time Newfoundland came into confederation, he will find no stronger advocates for the union than those who were then in opposition and who belonged to the Conservative party. I sometimes feel that we get very little credit for this from Newfoundland, and that we are held out as great opponents of Newfoundland and its prosperity and happiness. I can assure you that this was never the case.

The hon. member did say that Newfoundland has not received very much from confederation.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I did not make that statement; the hon. gentleman must have misunderstood me. I admit what we have received; I do not want there to be any doubt about that.

Mr. Brooks: Then I stand corrected. But I did hear the hon. gentleman say that perhaps we did not give a proper balance to what Newfoundland had contributed to Canada compared with what Newfoundland received from the other parts of Canada.

Mr. Carter: Yes.

Mr. Brooks: I was interested to see the other day a statement by Premier Smallwood to the effect that the day on which Newfoundland entered confederation was one of the greatest days in the history of that province. He was opening, I think, the new provincial building in the city of St. John's.

Mr. Speaker, it has been said that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) has had considerable courage in opening up this matter of the maritime and Atlantic provinces. The subject has already been fairly well discussed by members on both sides of the house. As I listened to the speeches of hon. members on the other side I must say that I found the facts certainly had no resemblance to the material in the speeches made by those hon. members. It has been amusing indeed to listen to these speeches filled with gloomy forebodings about conditions in the different Atlantic provinces. I would recommend to my hon. friends in the opposition that they read some of the leading papers in the maritime provinces, that they read some of the special editions of those papers showing the new industries which are springing up almost weekly at the present time in different parts of those provinces. If I were in my own home town of Sussex this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, as I was invited to be, I would be assisting in opening a new industry. This has become quite characteristic of the different sections of my own province.

The feature about the Atlantic provinces which I am sure is worrying my hon. friends opposite most at the present time is the small number of Liberal representatives in this house from those provinces. There are no Liberal members from Nova Scotia. There are no Liberal members from the province of Prince Edward Island. We have a few from the province of New Brunswick. The three maritime provinces sent three Liberal members here in the last election.

As far as the provincial field is concerned today, all three maritime provinces, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, have Conservative governments. Therefore it is no wonder that on the eve of elections in the two provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, we hear a cry of desperation, as it were, on the part of the few Liberals who are here representing these provinces. Indeed I think it is quite significant, Mr. Speaker, that the attack on this government should come from the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, in the province of Newfoundland, because that province is the last outpost of Liberalism to be found anywhere in this country.

It is true that the maritime provinces have their problems. These are problems which have been accumulating for many years. The hon. member who just took his seat mentioned some of them. Our greatest problem has been that of geography, as everyone knows. After confederation we did not prosper in the maritime provinces as we had hoped to. As the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo says, we might have done better financially if we had thrown in our lot with the United States. But there was no sentiment, at least very little, for that move in those provinces at the time; and I would say, Mr. Speaker, that there is practically none today.

We have received a very great compliment in the resolution, which expresses what they consider is the hope that in three years' time we the government could have and would have overcome the disabilities which our provinces suffered for years since confederation, and most of all the disabilities we suffered at the hands of the Liberal party in this country for 23 years.

The other day the hon. member spoke about the deserts of the maritime provinces and said that we had made our full contribution to the rest of Canada. I do not think there is anyone who can or would doubt that our people have made a tremendous contribution to Canada. In years past they went to all sections. The great west was opened up to a large extent by men from Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. We also bore our share of the responsibility of opening up different parts of what we then called Upper and Lower Canada. So we feel that we have been very deserving as far as this country is concerned.

However, there have been two matters which have particularly reacted against our prosperity. As I mentioned a moment ago, geography was one of the great handicaps to our provinces. The railway situation and transportation was the great problem. The railway and transportation question is still a great problem for us. Shortly after confederation the Intercolonial railway was built, which was supposed to be a great help to our three provinces. I am not going into the history of railroads, but it is sufficient to say that on account of the long hauls the Intercolonial railway did not provide the opportunities we had hoped.

In 1914 it was found that the situation had become practically intolerable as far as transportation was concerned. From 1914 to 1927 the situation went from bad to worse. In 1927, on the recommendation of Sir Rae Duncan, father of the Duncan report, the Maritime Freight Rates Act was brought into being. From 1927 to the present time freight rates have been increasing horizontally across this country, mostly under Liberal governments, I may say, until the situation in the maritime provinces had become absolutely intolerable.

Hon. members opposite ask us, what are you doing about the situation at the present time? Well, a good physician or a good doctor always examines the patient very carefully to find out just what the situation is. The present government has appointed a royal commission to study and report on the situation in the Atlantic provinces. That report has not been brought in as yet, but I am satisfied that when it is brought in this great problem of transportation as far as our part of the country is concerned will receive very careful attention.

May I say that in my opinion the Maritime Freight Rates Act must be brought up to date; it must reflect the benefits to which the Atlantic provinces are entitled. We must not again be neglected for so many years under a transportation system such as we have had in the past if we are really to play a proper part in confederation.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister permit a question? Would he say what government was in office when the Maritime Freight Rates Act was enacted?

Mr. Brooks: Does that make very much difference?

Mr. Pickersgill: It makes a lot of difference to historians.

Mr. Brooks: The Liberal government was in office then, and it was in office for most of the time since, when all the inequalities as a result of the horizontal increases came into effect.

The other great problem which I mentioned a moment ago was that of cheaper power. I have heard hon. members from New Brunswick and other parts sneer at what has been done by this government to assist in the development of power in the province of New Brunswick. Beechwood has been mentioned many times in this house; it was mentioned many times before the present government came into power, and even before the Flemming government came into power in New Brunswick.

The facts are these. For many months the premier of New Brunswick came to Ottawa and asked for assistance in order that power might be produced at Beechwood on the Saint John river. All he got was smiles; no promises. Finally in desperation the premier of New Brunswick, Hon. Hugh John Flemming, determined to take the matter into his own hands and, as we know—this is history now—he borrowed money from banks and wherever he could. He took great chances and displayed great courage. He started Beechwood, and until the present government came to power he received no assistance whatsoever from the federal parliament. After the present government came to power in 1957 a $30 million loan was made to the province to pay for the building of Beechwood, at a low interest rate of 3⅞ per cent.

An hon. Member: In what year?

Mr. Brooks: In 1959.

Mr. Robichaud: Did the minister say 1957?

Mr. Brooks: In 1959. In addition to the assistance the province received toward the construction of Beechwood we also received, as hon. members know, assistance toward the construction of thermal plants, the grid system in New Brunswick and other maritime provinces, and so on. Perhaps I may be allowed to read an extract from a speech made by Hon. Hugh John Flemming in the provincial legislature. This is from the synoptic report. Speaking of Beechwood he had this to say:

Well, Mr. Speaker, the opposition leader does not realize what that loan meant to us. I have spoken in this house many times regarding our many trips to Ottawa between 1953 and 1958 when his party was in power there, in an attempt to secure some encouragement and some financial guarantee of our bonds in order to start the Beechwood project which we knew we needed, or rather would need very soon. We received politeness and courtesy from Mr. St. Laurent—nothing more—and, Mr. Speaker, you cannot start a $30 million project without something more substantial than politeness and courtesy. We finally started the project on our own resources and, Mr. Speaker, that took some faith and courage.

I emphasize that. It did take great faith and courage on the part of the premier of New Brunswick. The report continues:

The official opening was held in June 1955 and the St. Laurent Liberal federal government did share in it. They really did something. Perhaps they deserve some credit. They allowed the Right Hon. Mr. Howe to fly to Presque Isle, Maine, in his aeroplane, drive to Beechwood by motor car, and make a speech. But, Mr. Speaker, as I have said, the Beechwood hydro development project has been a magnificent success.

The report goes on to say, further on:

From the Liberals we received—politeness and courtesy and a speech by Mr. Howe.

From the present Conservative government we received a cheque for $29,500,000 at 3⅞ per cent interest repayable over an eight-year period.

Hon. members can make their own comparisons.

What has happened as a result of this cheap power which we now have in my province? I apologize for speaking mainly about the province of New Brunswick, but the minister from Nova Scotia spoke of his own province yesterday and I think that I might therefore be excused for confining most of my remarks to New Brunswick. What has happened as a result of this cheaper power? I should like to quote from an article in the Saint John Telegraph-Journal of February 9 of this year. The heading is "Plenty of Power for the Whole Area". It goes on to say:

Progress means more industry. More industry means more power, and that is what the greater Saint John in the province of New Brunswick is getting.

That is a direct result of the efforts and the work of the federal government as far as my own province is concerned. Having that federal grant has helped the establishment of an oil refinery near Saint John, a $50 million project which could not and would not have been built if we did not have cheap power as the result of assistance from the dominion government. Another article in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of December 2, 1959 speaks about the railway situation.

Says Fast Rail Service Helping Atlantic Ports

Faster Canadian National Railways services are placing the ports of Halifax and Saint John in a better position to increase their share of Canada's year-round export and import traffic, D. V. Gonder, vice president and general manager for the Atlantic region of the company, told an Atlantic ports day panel in Saint John, New Brunswick, Tuesday.

I have a long list of new enterprises which have sprung up and which are being built around the city of Saint John and in other parts of the province of New Brunswick at the present time. An airport addition contract has been awarded and a larger airport is being built near the city; new homes have set a record, says another article in a Saint John paper. If the people of the province of New Brunswick were discouraged why is it, as someone mentioned the other day, that the population of the province has greatly increased? It does not need me to tell this house that in days gone by we could hardly keep our average population in the maritime provinces on account of the fact that thousands of people left there every year. In the last few years, particularly in the last three years, the population of my province has grown very rapidly because the people of that province are willing to stay in New Brunswick, and they now have faith in their native province.

I am not going to weary the house with any more of these articles and headlines; I have a great many of them here. They all point to one thing, namely that the situation is improving and improving beneficially as far as our province is concerned.

How about primary industries? We heard the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) speak about the coal mines of Nova Scotia which have had a hard time. I know that this federal government has done everything that it is humanly possible for any government to do to assist. I would defy anyone to question that statement; but has the hon. member ever mentioned the coal mines in New Brunswick? Our coal mines have never been in a better position in the last 25 or 30 years than they are at the present time. We are producing about a million tons of coal, which is more than the normal amount we produce. We are not only producing it, Mr. Speaker, we are selling every ton of it and the employment of the miners in the Minto area is kept at a maximum.

So much for coal; I might ask, what assistance are we getting from the federal government? Yesterday, my colleague spoke about the assistance in subventions, which has been a great help to the maritime provinces' coal industry. We also get great assistance in loans from the federal coal board, which has assisted the mining operators in Minto very greatly. There is splendid co-operation between the federal department and the department of mines in the province of New Brunswick.

What about our forests? The production of the forests of the province of New Brunswick is as good as that of any other part of Canada. Our forests are our greatest asset. Most hon. members know that in New Brunswick our spruce trees grow faster than they do in any other part of the world. As I say, it is our greatest asset in New Brunswick. What has happened? Besides the many pulp mills which we already have in New Brunswick there is another pulp mill being built at the present time. There are other people who are interested in pulp mills who are making inquiries with the hope and the intention of building pulp mills in New Brunswick. Why are they coming? They are coming because we have this great raw material; and, second, because we now have electric power which will help them in their operations.

I will not go into the fishing industry to any great extent. My constituency is not a fishing constituency, but I think it is generally understood that the fisheries of the maritime provinces today are in as good a condition as the fisheries of any other part of Canada. As a matter of fact, speaking of the assistance which the federal government is giving, I notice that in 1957, when the Liberal government was in power for the last time, the assistance given the fisheries in New Brunswick amounted to $697,037. Last year, 1959, the assistance given by the Department of Fisheries to the province of New Brunswick amounted to $1,102,040, a difference of over $300,000. This will indicate the great interest which is being taken by that department as far as our fishing industry is concerned.

What about agriculture? I have been in the House of Commons a good many years and I must say that with all our troubles in the maritimes I have heard fewer complaints from the maritimes or from the Atlantic provinces about agriculture than I have heard from any other part of Canada, particularly the west. I am not complaining about that, Mr. Speaker, because I know the west has a terrific problem in its great wheat crop and the matter of selling wheat is one of the biggest problems we have in Canada today or we have had in Canada for a number of years. But we get very few complaints from the agriculturists or the farmers in the maritime provinces. I had letters the other day thanking this government—and thanking me —for the assistance which has been given to the dairy industry in Canada. I have the largest dairy centre in the maritime provinces; I have two large butter factories and my whole constituency is made up mostly of dairy farmers. They are satisfied and pleased with what is being done and has been done by the Department of Agriculture in Ottawa.

If I may I should like to mention some other assistance which has been of great benefit to our province and to the three other Atlantic provinces. I refer to the roads to resources. It is true that the roads to resources program touches every province in Canada except Quebec. The sum of $15 million is to be spent in each province, half by the province and half by the federal government; but I wish to point out that the little province of Prince Edward Island gets the same amount as the province of Ontario. The small province of New Brunswick gets the same amount, namely $7,500,000, as does the province of British Columbia; that is, we are used exactly in the same way.

Hon. members can imagine what $7,500,000 can do in building roads in Prince Edward Island; they can also realize how little it will do for the great province of Ontario. But I wish to point this out. The Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Hamilton) informs me that not one province in Canada except Saskatchewan complained about the smaller maritime provinces being given what might be termed a great advantage in the building of roads to resources compared with larger provinces.

This is a great help to the four Atlantic provinces, particularly to the province of Newfoundland. I happened to be in Newfoundland in 1958 and, as a matter of fact, had been there a number of times. But what has struck me on each visit is how few roads there are in that great province. It has also occurred to me that if the Liberal government, for which party the province of Newfoundland has so much love, had made contributions to Newfoundland when it was in power on anything like the same scale as the present government has in the last three years the road situation in Newfoundland would have been infinitely better.

The federal government has made adjustment grants, for instance, to the four Atlantic provinces amounting to $7,500,000 a year. If the province of Newfoundland had received the same attention from the Liberal government over the 10 years from 1948 to 1958, if that province had received $7,500,000 a year it would have had $75 million to spend on roads and Newfoundland would have had roads instead of horse tracks in many parts of that province.

Let us take the question of public works. Let us take a trip through the province of New Brunswick, as I have done on many occasions. We will start with the northern part of our province. Shortly after this government came into power it authorized the building of a bridge between Campbellton, New Brunswick, and Cross Point in the province of Quebec. My mind goes back 10 or 12 years even longer to the time when former Premier McNair of the province of New Brunswick requested that a bridge be built between these two points. He put up a very strong and just argument but his argument fell on deaf ears. Nothing was done until the Conservative government came into power in 1957 when it was decided that we would give our share of the over $3 million required to build this bridge between Quebec and New Brunswick.

Go to Dalhousie and look at the work we have done in the harbour there. Go to Bathurst in the constituency of the hon. member for Gloucester. Nothing was done about the harbour there for years. The present government has made plans to dredge the harbour and make it a really good harbour. One can go anywhere in the province of New Brunswick and one will find that where the fishermen are concerned the government has been building wharves and breakwaters and assisting the fishermen and others along the coast of New Brunswick in every way.

Then we have Campobello island. For years this island with a population of over 1,200 people has had practically no access to the mainland. The Liberal government was asked for assistance and no assistance was given. At the present time arrangements are being made to build a bridge from Campobello island to Lubec in the state of Maine. Part of the cost is to be paid by the federal government, part by the province of New Brunswick and part by the state of Maine.

I could mention many other undertakings such as the numerous public buildings in the cities and towns which have been built in the very short time that the present government has been in power. Never in the history of the Atlantic provinces, particularly the province of New Brunswick, has so much been done as has been done in the last three years since the Diefenbaker government came into power.

Let us mention finance. When one speaks of giving assistance to the provinces one begins to think of money. Of course, money is the best form of assistance that can be given to any province or any people if you wish to assist them in a practical way. I have mentioned what this government has given. We have given $100 million by way of adjustment grants to be paid to the Atlantic provinces over four years at the rate of $25 million a year. That is $25 million a year over and above what is received by any other province in Canada.

I have mentioned roads to resources and I want to point out the effect this has had on the economy and the budgeting of my province. I remember that for years we were continually going into debt. This year the province of New Brunswick declared a substantial surplus. The province could never have had a surplus if it had not been for the money it received from the federal treasury. In 1957, the last year the Liberal government was in power, the provincial government of New Brunswick received $19,967,729 in unconditional grants but in 1959 the figure was $32,638,620. Surely that tells a story not only to the people of the province of New Brunswick but to all the people of Canada.

When the hon. member for Gloucester spoke yesterday he said that the increase was due to the increase in population. The increase is about $13 million, an increase of more than 33⅓ per cent. Surely no one with common sense would attribute that to an increase in population. It is due to the generosity and desire of the present government to help the province of New Brunswick and the other Atlantic provinces. Since 1952 the net debt of the province has been reduced from $218 per capita to $180 per capita in 1959, the lowest figure in many years. Of course, all these things have been possible because, in addition to receiving assistance from the federal government, we have had a very able government in the province of New Brunswick.

In closing may I repeat that there is no question that we in the Atlantic area have our problems that have not been solved. In the short time it has been in power the present government has done everything in its power to help solve these problems. What is true as to problems in the maritimes is of course also true as to problems in other parts of Canada. The expansion of the Canadian economy this year has been on a vast scale. All parts of Canada have not shared in it equally, but all have shared in it. I have faith that the Atlantic area will grow in economic strength with the rest of Canada. I do not take any pessimistic view, and I believe the future of these regions is a good one. No one who knows its people and areas as I do can entertain any doubts as to the future of the Atlantic provinces.

As I have already said, it has been a recognized aim of federal policy to provide fiscal aid to the Atlantic area. The dominion government is continuing, in many ways, to assist the people of our four provinces to win for themselves a prosperous and secure future.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the minister, but his time has expired.

Mr. Brooks: I just have one more sentence.

Mr. Pearson: Go ahead.

Mr. Brooks: I was saying, just in closing, that for years past the economy and prosperity of the Atlantic provinces had not been in any way comparable to the other provinces of Canada. I believe today we are approaching nearer to it than we ever were before. If I may cut my conclusion real short, Mr. Speaker, then it is needless for me to say it is my intention to vote against the amendment and the subamendment. Yesterday the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) said that it was a vote of non-confidence in the government, and that is exactly what it is. We, in the Atlantic provinces, have confidence in this government. We have every reason to have confidence in it, and we will show our confidence by voting and giving it our support whenever we can.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I feel that the debate that took place yesterday and is taking place today is a very important debate, and a very essential debate in the House of Commons. I was pleased that the official opposition, who have the right under our rules to decide the type of amendment that will be moved as a want of confidence motion, did not yield to the temptation of bringing in a motion on the Bomarc but rather took advantage of this opportunity to introduce a substantial motion that affects a large section of the Canadian nation. If they had introduced a motion on the Bomarc it would have been merely to shoot what is already a dead duck and to attempt to bury, perhaps a few weeks in advance, a weapon which I hope will be given a respectable burial within a short time.

I have not very often spoken on maritime matters, Mr. Speaker, but I have often spoken on grievances affecting a larger part of Canada. Those of us who come from western Canada have felt at times in the past that we have had particular grievances that should be raised. We think so today. We have received some attention from time to time from previous governments, and I think one of the reasons the prairies have received attention from previous governments is that we have had some extended, and sometimes spirited, debates in the House of Commons. The maritime provinces, in my opinion, have a very real grievance. The people of the maritime provinces have failed to share in Canada's prosperity from time to time. Although they came into confederation with a relatively industrialized area, the fortunes of confederation have not been kind to the maritime provinces. I think a debate such as this will be of some benefit in pointing up their real and important problems.

From time to time we hear a good deal about basic human rights and fundamental freedoms. They usually have to do with political rights. They usually have to do with freedom of speech or equality because of race or equality before the law. But I think there is another equality to which the people in a sovereign democracy have a right, and that is their fair share in the resources and in the production of the nation of which they are a part. If that is so, as I believe it is, then the maritime provinces and the people of those provinces have a just grievance against the rest of Canada.

Of course, this is not a situation that developed in 1960. This is not a situation that developed in 22 years of Liberal government which did not give attention to this problem. This is a problem that has been developing for generations. The question today is not so much who is to blame as what is going to be done about this grave problem. Those of us in the C.C.F. movement feel that a planned economy, that an extension of government responsibility and government control, that a vast expansion of directed public funds in regional investment, are absolutely essential. We are certain that if the present economic system is allowed to go uncontrolled, undirected, whether this is done with a Conservative government in power or a Liberal government in power will make no difference whatever but will continue to relegate the people of the maritimes to a position of economic second-class citizens.

We have heard a lot from government members about the situation. If one were to listen to them he would think there was no problem at all, that everything had been solved, that all you had to have was three years of Tory administration and the worries of the maritime provinces had come to an end. The shorter of the members for Halifax —I understand they do not like to be referred to as the senior or junior member—last evening talked about the Atlantic resolutions. He said the resolutions were and are, and will remain, a beacon of light after 20 years of darkness for the people of the Atlantic provinces. It is not a beacon of light the people want; it is not more talk about a vision; it is not some pie in the sky. They want jobs now. They want the government to implement the Atlantic resolutions instead of talking about a beacon of light.

The hon. member went on to say, after giving some economic forecasts about capital and repair expenditures, that we have here the highest capital intentions of any year in Nova Scotia's history. The people of Nova Scotia have been living on intentions for years, good intentions. I do not believe it helps them much that the intentions now come from a Tory government rather than from a Liberal government.

The Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Brooks) made a very interesting speech and, since he is an old friend of mine of many years' standing in the House of Commons, I listened to him with great attention and great respect. However, I detected all through his speech a note of self-satisfaction that all was well. The maritimes had turned the corner and, under a Conservative administration, at long last they were coming into their own. He did not give us the unemployment statistics. He did not tell us why there are more unemployed in the maritimes now than there have been for some years. He did not tell us why the total number of persons in the maritimes with jobs is 449,000, and yet the registrations at the national employment service office total 116,488.

There is widespread and serious unemployment in the maritime provinces about which this government is doing absolutely nothing. The same report shows that in the province of Ontario there are 2,192,000 persons with jobs and 240,668 registrations at the national employment service offices. In Ontario 9.1 persons had jobs for every person registered at the national employment service offices; in the maritimes only 3.85 persons had jobs for every person registered at the national employment service offices. Unemployment in the maritimes is more than twice as serious as in Ontario. If we could take care of the people of the maritimes with nice pious statements and a lot of soothing syrup then they should be well satisfied after listening to members of the government.

Hon. members opposite have not been frank enough to tell us that the problem in the maritimes is still exceedingly serious, that the unemployment situation has deteriorated rather than improved and that relative incomes of people of the maritimes compared with those of other Canadians are disgracefully low.

I have in my hand a portion of the Gordon royal commission report entitled, "Some Regional Aspects of Canada's Economic Development". In table 9 on page 45 the per capita income for the years 1951-55 is shown for the various provinces. I will mention only the incomes of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick as related to the per capita income of Ontario, the province with the highest income. The government has been saying that conditions in the maritimes are improving and that the people there are better off than they were in the past. Conditions were not good back in 1951-55. The per capita income in New Brunswick was $787 compared with a per capita income of $1,448 in Ontario. I have done some arithmetic on this, comparing these figures with the latest figures for per capita income in the provinces in 1958. The per capita income in 1958 in New Brunswick was $919 and in Ontario it was $1,696. How much better off are the people of New Brunswick with respect to income and cash dollars about which the Minister of Veterans Affairs spoke so eloquently?

In 1951-55, according to the report of the Gordon commission, the per capita income in New Brunswick was some 54 per cent of the per capita income in Ontario and under this wonderful Conservative administration about which we have heard so much and after having done such a fine job the people are in exactly the position they were in under the previous administration. Per capita income in New Brunswick is still just 54 per cent of the per capita income in Ontario. Where is the improvement? Where is the great development in the maritimes that has resulted from the Conservative administration? The percentage of per capita income is just as low under the Tories as it was under the Liberals.

What about Nova Scotia? In 1951-55 according to the report Nova Scotia had a per capita income of $880 as compared with $1,448 in Ontario. According to my calculations this works out at 63 per cent. The latest statistics available for 1958 show that the per capita income in Nova Scotia had risen to $1,072 compared with $1,696 in Ontario, still 63 per cent.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question? Is the per capita income per person in the whole population of these provinces or per the working force?

Mr. Argue: The whole population, I take it.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): That makes a difference.

Mr. Argue: My hon. friend may want to look at family statistics and I would appreciate his talking about them but it does not make any difference. I do not think that families under the Conservatives are bigger than they were under the Liberals. My point is that the per capita income in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick as compared with the per capita income in Ontario, the province with the highest income, is just as low under the Tories as it was under the Liberals, yet because the Conservative government is in power they are complacent and say, "All is well; we are doing a fine job". The only recommendation is that the conditions are no worse than they were under the previous administration.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question? Do I understand that while he has pointed out that there has been a substantial increase in per capita income in the maritimes he seems to think this is of no avail whatever because there has also been an increase in Ontario and the percentage of difference is still the same? Now, granted, we would all be pleased if the income in New Brunswick had risen so much more that it had overtaken Ontario, but does the hon. member suggest that that very substantial increase which has taken place is not of great avail in New Brunswick?

Mr. Argue: That is not what we have heard from hon. gentlemen opposite. I am of course glad to see any increase in the per capita income in any part of Canada.

Mr. Bigg: Well, hurray.

Mr. Murphy: How are you getting along in Saskatchewan?

Mr. Argue: I just wish that the Tories were glad of this too instead of bringing in balanced budgets that are balanced on the backs of half a million unemployed or perhaps more.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Murphy: How are you getting along out in Saskatchewan? The hon. gentleman will not answer.

Mr. Argue: The great grievance of the maritimes has been that they have not shared in a proportionate way in the production of the Canadian nation. This grievance remains the same now and in the same proportion as it was under the previous administration. I am convinced that if you allow the present uncontrolled monopolistic dog eat dog system to go unchecked as is the wish of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) the people of the maritimes will continue to be second-class citizens as far as economic standards are concerned. We suggest the time has come for government action. My hon. friends in the Liberal party can beat their breasts about how much they believe in free enterprise but the proof of the pudding is in the eating and free enterprise is in disgrace in this country because it is failing the people of the maritimes, the unemployed and hundreds of other Canadians.

Mr. Murphy: What about Saskatchewan?

Mr. Argue: There is one voice on the government side of the house that has expressed some realization of the difficulties being faced in the maritimes. On February 26 as reported at page 1489 of Hansard this statement was made:

> The economic problems in Restigouche-Madawaska and in the maritime provinces generally were always bad, but when you come along with a policy of tight money conditions become a hundred times worse.

There is a statement from a Conservative member in good standing in the Conservative party who says to the government that things were bad under the Liberals but that now with Tory tight money conditions are one hundred times worse. Mr. Speaker, political recrimination will not help the people of the maritime provinces.

I am glad this motion has been brought forward. I am exceedingly disappointed by the answers of members of the government, because their answers today to the desires of the maritime provinces are one big "No". They do not intend to do any more in the future than they have done in the past, even though the record is that conditions in the maritimes now are as bad, if not worse, as they were under the administration of the former Liberal government.

Mr. Speaker, we think that the time has come for government action and for public funds to be directed into the development of the Atlantic provinces. We suggest that Canadian citizens living in the maritime provinces have a right to share equitably in the production of this country. I would suggest that the government should offer a portfolio to enable members to discover what the duties of the minister are, because we imagine he could handle his portfolio during the normal coffee break, shall we say, in the morning. They might take one of the interested cabinet ministers and make him a minister of a new department, a department of regional and economic development, a department whose specific purpose would be to see that regionally depressed areas such as the maritime provinces, Elliot Lake, Uranium City in Saskatchewan and other areas of the country receive attention from the national government. This calls for money, and here I agree with the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I suggest there should be a capital development budget of at least $1 billion of public funds for development of the economy of depressed areas.

If there are interruptions that this is too much, it is just 3 per cent of the gross national product; it is just 16 per cent of the amount now being spent by way of our national budget; and it is just over 60 per cent of the money now being spent and largely wasted on national defence.

I would suggest that monies can be obtained for a great capital development program; that as it becomes necessary to reduce our defence expenditures the people of the maritime provinces should not be forced to suffer even more but that some large part of these savings should go into the regional development fund. I would suggest that the government should give speedy attention to such things as the Chignecto canal which holds real promise. I would suggest that the government should say what it intends to do about a causeway to Prince Edward Island. I would suggest that the government should take action to help the export industries of the maritime provinces, as well as other exporting industries in Canada such as the forestry industry and the fishing industry, by instituting a system of economic policies which will bring the Canadian dollar into par with the United States dollar and thus bolster Canada's export industry. I think it is national madness for our country to follow a policy which cripples our export industries and puts the nation in hock to foreign investors which this past year amounts to almost $1.5 billion.

I would suggest that there are other great programs for economic development. There should be a start made on an over-all highway program for Canada. The government should not be satisfied with the one highway ribbon that it is helping to promote across our country. I would suggest that for the maritime provinces as for the rest of Canada there should be a great housing development instead of the Tory policy of cutting housing, allowing the slums to remain and failing to take care of the housing needs of Canadians.

I am convinced that at this time more and more people in the maritime provinces are questioning the very tenets of the policies both of the Conservative government and the Liberal party. I hear very interesting and encouraging reports of the support that is coming to the C.C.F. party particularly in the province of Nova Scotia. This debate is bringing the attention of parliament to the needs of the maritime provinces.

There are other ways whereby people can bring to the attention of the government and the Canadian nation their needs. It can be done in provincial elections about which this government was so satisfied when provincial Liberal governments were overturned, and we used to hear so much of that in the house. Action can be taken on a provincial basis and other action can be taken.

I make no apology for the delegation which came from the prairie provinces a year ago to impress upon this government and the Canadian nation in a very vivid way conditions in the prairie provinces which condemned citizens in those areas of our agricultural industry to an inferior position. I think the people of the maritime provinces who have a just cause would be well advised to consider sending large delegations to wait on the government, which is their democratic right, in order to bring to the Canadian nation in a vivid and spectacular way the very important, serious and just grievances which are theirs. Delegations are an excellent method of focusing attention on problems in a democratic country.

Mr. Speaker, in the final analysis the only real solution will come by a very definite, decided and drastic change in the principles operating in our economic society.

Hon. W. J. Browne (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful for the opportunity to speak on this motion today. I tried to recall the different points made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) in opening the debate yesterday. I am not quite sure that he was serious in what he was saying, but he gave me the impression, as I think he must have given others, that he had no great heart in the task he was undertaking.

He selected the Atlantic provinces as the area in which he attempted to show that the Conservative government had failed to carry out its promises which they made before the election of 1957. At this time he took the opportunity to consider our record because of the impending elections in the two provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick which will be held within the next month or so. So he concentrated on that topic, the elections being over in Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island.

Of course, there was not much he could say about Prince Edward Island. He had no complaint about that province because the people themselves had given their verdict in the general election which took place last year and had overturned a Liberal government that had been in office, I think, for over 20 years.

With regard to Newfoundland, I am sure he must have been aware of what the premier of that province said recently. He is quoted as saying that anybody would be foolish to blame the government in Ottawa for the recent recession.

However, the hon. member did manage once more to accuse this government of repudiating the constitution in regard to term 29. I have heard the hon. member say that before, and I resent that statement. The hon. member knows perfectly well that the constitution has not been repudiated, and that we have carried out the recommendation of the McNair commission. We are carrying out that recommendation, and we have provided for a review as was asked for by counsel for the Newfoundland government and by the premier of that government. We are having that review take place before 1962, not three years later as the premier wanted.

He produced then some of the resolutions which were passed by a group of candidates who met in Moncton before the election of 1957, the resolutions which the hon. member called the Atlantic charter. It is important to remember what the circumstances of that meeting were. At that time the hon. member had, I believe, become a member of the government and we were then in opposition. The Progressive Conservative candidates met in Moncton and, actuated by the knowledge that the Atlantic provinces had been neglected for a long period, we considered what methods could best be adopted in order to bring about an improvement. Thus, we set out the objectives at which we should aim.

The complaint of the hon. member and his associates is that we have not attained all these objectives at the present time. Bearing in mind the economic difficulties of the maritime provinces—and these have been set out today by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Carter)—it is not surprising that we have not been able to carry out all our intentions in the short space of three years. I think it is something of which we can be proud that we have been able to do as much as we have. We do not pretend to have solved all the problems; we do not pretend to have all the answers. On the other hand, we are doing all we can, and we have done all we can; we intend to give attention to all these problems as they are brought before us in the proper way.

The mover of this amendment then gave a brief general review under various headings: industry, coal, agriculture, fisheries, roads, transportation, the tourist industry, mining and finance. I do not think he mentioned power, which constituted such an important feature of the contribution made by the Conservative government to the expansion and development which has been taking place in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick during the past three years. I propose, myself, to say a few words about the subjects with which the hon. member dealt, but before I embark on that undertaking I should like to say something which I believe must be obvious to everyone here, namely that the federal government is not responsible for everything which takes place or which does not take place in the Atlantic provinces or any of the other provinces; we cannot interfere in the affairs of the provincial governments even to the slightest degree.

[Mr. Browne (St. John's West).]

The provinces are autonomous and self-governing with regard to everything which is within their own jurisdiction. Nobody should know that better than the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, because in Newfoundland we have the sole Liberal government in Canada today. Surely he does not expect the federal Conservative government to be responsible for the sins and omissions of that government. Neither can the federal government take credit—and we do not take credit—for what is being done of a beneficial nature in the provinces. I recommend to the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) that he read the speech made by the president of the Atlantic provinces economic council contained in the April edition of the Atlantic Advocate. Mr. Arthur Johnson, the president, is the deputy minister of the economic development department, of which Premier Smallwood is the minister in charge. If the hon. member for Gloucester would read that speech I think he would finish up by holding a view different from the one he expressed yesterday. To get the drift of his remarks, I now propose to quote from page 3483 of Hansard what the hon. member said:

> We are not asking for hand-outs. The central provinces and the western provinces know what we of the Atlantic provinces need. Just a week ago I was visiting one of my constituents and I noticed that the car at his door was manufactured in Ontario.

What a crime.

> When I opened the door I noticed that the door knob came from Peterborough.

Just imagine the hon. member getting down to look at the door knob to see where it was made.

> When I walked into the house, I saw that the carpet came from Ontario.

He bent down and picked up the edge of the carpet to see where it was made. And then the hon. member said:

> The furniture came from Quebec.

What is the matter with Quebec?

(Translation):

Is it not a fact that the member can speak French and is known to speak French? But he has nothing against Quebec people working in furniture factories.

(Text):

The quotation continues:

> When I went into the kitchen I saw that the washing machine, the refrigerator, the toaster and everything were manufactured in Quebec and Ontario.

I draw the attention of the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, who prides himself on being a free trader, to the attitude of the hon. member for Gloucester.

Mr. Robichaud: Keep on reading.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The next thing was an interruption, "What about the lawnmower?" Instead of continuing to read let me just tell hon. members what I had for lunch in the parliamentary restaurant. I had apple juice from the Annapolis valley; I had smoked codfish from Halifax and potatoes from Prince Edward Island or New Brunswick. This is evidence of the trade which is taking place between the different provinces, and I see no reason why the hon. gentleman should be excited. If he would look at his watch he will probably find that it was made in Switzerland. What a terrible thing, to be wearing an import from an European country. The hon. gentleman surely cannot hold us responsible for what this friend of his—this imaginary friend, I suggest—has in his home. I may say that when I went home I looked at the stove in our kitchen and saw it was manufactured in Sackville, New Brunswick. So they do have manufactures down there, or at least, it had been manufactured since the Conservatives came into office.

Does the hon. member want us to tell the people of New Brunswick where they should buy their things, or does he want the federal government to go down there and make the things for them? Does he want us to tell the provincial governments what they should make or import? What is the point of that argument? As I gathered, it is that the central provinces are manufacturing goods which are bought in the east, and that the people here should buy things in return. They certainly do buy produce, and anything else they can get which is supplied to them.

The former Liberal government was aware in 1956, as the secret report informed us, that there was to be a recession, and it did come to a head in 1957. Everyone in this house is aware, or should be, of the drastic measures which have been taken by this government to offset the effects of that recession. Our chief contribution to overcoming the effects of that period was in the field of housing, and the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), who makes these grandiloquent speeches and is so generous in distributing millions—I see he has left the house—failed to mention that we spent $1 billion on housing. He did not give us any credit for that. One billion dollars spent in three years is not peanuts. It is a considerable amount of money and, surely, the hon. member should give us some credit for doing what he himself has been advocating. This financial aid resulted in great numbers of houses being built and great numbers of people finding employment during a very difficult time.

I wish only to mention a few of the other things we did. For example, in the field of social security we increased old age pensions to $55—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And took it away by increasing taxes.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Taxation did not go higher than it was under the previous government. We increased welfare payments, grants to hospitals and certain payments to veterans. I am sure the hon. gentleman from Essex East will be interested in this. We have put the hospital insurance program into effect.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will my hon. friend, who is a very fair minded member, not agree that the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act was introduced in this house in 1957 by the St. Laurent government?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I agree that the Liberal government had some very good ideas but they did not put them into effect; it was left to us to put them into effect.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask my hon. friend a second question which I am sure he will be anxious to answer. Is it not a fact that every single act of social welfare in this country on federal account was placed on the statute books by a Liberal government?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I do not agree with that, but if I were to agree to it I would have to go a little into history because you might say that all the social security measures have developed in the last, say, 25 or 30 years, since the great depression that began in 1929.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): They were put on the statute books by Mackenzie King and St. Laurent.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Yes; I think Mr. Bennett had something to do with some of the social security measures.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Not one.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): If the Liberal government had never been in office those measures would have been introduced.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Not one.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I want to repeat that if the Liberal government had not been in office, if it had been a Conservative government, those measures would have been introduced into this country the same as they were introduced in Great Britain by a Conservative government. The social security measures under Lord Beveridge were introduced—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend knows that the first old age pension act and the first health insurance act—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am asking a question. The first old age pension act and the first health insurance act were introduced by a Liberal government.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): No. My hon. and learned friend knows very well that there was no comparison between the earlier measures and the social securities introduced after Lord Beveridge's report. The point I want to make is this. All those measures have contributed in a substantial degree to the financial and economic improvement of those provinces. You could not have the financial improvement that did take place without having those social security measures, and they have been particularly beneficial in the Atlantic provinces, and more particularly, I suppose, in Newfoundland.

In Newfoundland, for example, the federal contribution for hospital insurance went as high as 64 per cent; 64 per cent was paid for by the federal government; I think it is down to 63 per cent now. In Nova Scotia it amounted to 55 per cent; and in New Brunswick 54 per cent.

As was pointed out by my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan), we provided $7,500,000 to each province for the building of roads to resources. This amounts to $30 million in the four maritime provinces. If each of the 10 provinces gets $7,500,000, it would amount to $75 million; therefore, the four Atlantic provinces get 40 per cent, but they have only 10 per cent of the population. I think this must be regarded as a special favour, if you like, or, certainly, a gesture of interest in the welfare of the people of the Atlantic provinces.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate made reference to the plan proposed by the Liberal leader in Nova Scotia at the federal-provincial conference in 1955. He pointed out the Liberal government in 1956 had made concessions to the people all over Canada, in all the provinces, of about $106 million, and that the maritime provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island had benefited by about $9 million a year.

Then, the hon. member made reference to the question of agriculture, and he referred to agriculture in his own riding. I do not have much knowledge of the small settlements in his riding where agriculture assumes some local importance, but I think he will admit that if agriculture declined in Newfoundland it has been due particularly to the impact of confederation, bearing in mind that the former Liberal government at Ottawa subsidized a vessel, jointly with the government of Prince Edward Island, for the shipping of agricultural produce to Newfoundland. I think he will agree that it was very difficult for the farmers of Newfoundland to carry on their industry after confederation.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the minister permit a question?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The industry is at its lowest ebb today.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister say a subsidy is not being given by the present government to a vessel for the precise purpose that he mentioned?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Yes, but it was started by the Liberal government. The Liberal government likes to take credit for the things it started, so we will give it credit now. It is being partly paid by the Conservative government of Prince Edward Island at the present time but that, too, was started by a Liberal government.

However, there are some important farms in Newfoundland. I would draw the attention of hon. members to the great farm that is owned by the premier of Newfoundland on Roche's line. I would like the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate to tell us something about it, because I believe he had the privilege of spending a night there as the guest of the distinguished squire who presides over that magnificent farm. It is supposed to have the greatest number of cattle on any farm in eastern Canada, and I think the number of chickens there—some of them have come home to roost—goes into the many thousands.

Mr. Pickersgill: They come home to roost every night, you know.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): They will come home to roost eventually for the premier of Newfoundland.

I do not know why the hon. member referred to farming because I have always been under the impression that farming has been successfully practised in the maritime provinces. They have large areas of fine agricultural land, and the produce from Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick is famous. We in Newfoundland, of course, have been accustomed all our lives to buying produce from those places. I know they come on the market here as well.

Then he referred to fisheries and he regretted the preponderance of our fish finding its way to the United States market as fresh frozen fish.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sure the hon. gentleman—

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): He did not say it in so many words.

Mr. Pickersgill: I certainly do not regret it; I regret we do not sell more there.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The hon. member spoke about the large quantities of fresh fish exported to the markets as if it was something to be regretted.

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not speak that way.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): He knows that during the past 40 years, since the first world war, the countries of Europe which used to purchase large quantities of our salt fish have gone into building fleets of their own and catching their own fish. Spain, Portugal and Italy particularly send out large fleets every year to the Grand Banks and catch their own fish and salt and cure it for their people.

The policy of the Newfoundland government in regard to fisheries was to finance the building of large fresh fish plants and the fresh fish plant operators were able to borrow the money from the government of Newfoundland, as high as $5 million, to help them establish those industries, so that great financial assistance given by the government of Newfoundland resulted in an incentive to the production of fresh fish.

Then, again, the recruiting for United States bases construction of large numbers of our people who live along the long extended coast line of thousands of miles around the island took place. They were drawn away from the fishery and went to work as labourers, carpenters and carpenters' helpers, and at other work. It was the policy of the government to take 10,000 men out of the fishing boats. Their fishing gear went to ruin, and not so many of them are engaged in fishing today as formerly. Those who are engaged in it are engaged mostly in catching fresh fish which they sell to the fresh fish plants; or partly making fish which they sell at times to fish buyers who come to Newfoundland from Nova Scotia. But our government at Ottawa has also given assistance to the fisheries. The hon. member knew about that but he did not say anything about it. Last year we built 20 community stages in Newfoundland and a good many of them were in the hon. gentleman's own riding.

Mr. McGrath: Over half of them.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): He did not make any reference to the assistance given to the fisheries by the government. We have reorganized the bait services. I do not think our fishermen will be able to complain of a shortage of bait as they were able to in the past. Anybody who knows anything about the Newfoundland fisheries knows how important is the question of bait supply. The federal government has gone out of its way to implement the report of the Newfoundland royal commission on the fisheries of the southwest coast. The hon. member for Burin-Burgeo must be aware of the several expensive wharves that have been built or are being built to assist the Newfoundland government solve the problem of the fishermen of the southwest coast.

Again, we have built a new ferry for service between Portugal Cove and Bell island. We have built two new icebreakers and new government steamers. The St. John's harbour development, which was one of those projects thought about by the former Liberal government and put on the shelf, is being carried out by the present Conservative government. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate complimented his colleague, the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Granger), on the speech he made recently regarding the fisheries of Labrador. But if I am right I think the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador was advocating a return to the Labrador fishery. He can correct me if I am wrong but I think that is what he recommended. I should like to draw to his attention the fact that in 1951 a former minister of fisheries, Mr. Mayhew, put the kibosh on the Labrador fishery when he said that no further support would be given under the Fisheries Prices Support Act to fishermen fishing on the Labrador. There is not much use in anybody going in for that unless that decision is changed and I do not think the fishermen of Newfoundland have gone to Labrador to anything like the same extent since that was done.

The mover of the amendment did have a good word to say about the pulp and paper industry, especially in Newfoundland where it is booming. I do not know whether he made any reference to the new pulp mill being built in Nova Scotia which will cost $45 million. That has always been regarded in Newfoundland as the high water mark of government accomplishment. It will mean a great boon to that part of Nova Scotia where the mill is going to be built.

On the subject of mining the hon. member acknowledged the remarkable expansion and development taking place at Carol lake and to take place before long, I hope, at lake Wabush. This Labrador-Quebec mineralized area is in for a tremendous boom and the results of the expansion in employment will be felt in many other parts of Canada as well.

With regard to transportation, a problem that has agitated the business people in the Atlantic provinces and the federal government as well as the governments of the maritime provinces, we have appointed a royal commission which is now investigating the transportation problems of all parts of Canada and more particularly those of the Atlantic provinces. I hope that the commission will be able to bring in a report which we can implement and which will be of benefit to business people and people generally in these provinces.

My colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, referred to the subject of coal, a subject to which the hon. member for Gloucester has constantly referred. Notwithstanding the sweeping expansion of oil and gas distribution in the last few years which has been phenomenal—I do not know whether people realize how much domestic consumers have taken to using gas and oil—and the decline in consumption of coal by 50 per cent, the amount of coal mined in Nova Scotia last year increased over the previous year. We have given annual subventions to the coal industry of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick since we have been in office. Last year we gave nearly $14 million and in the estimates this year there is provision for the same amount. I wish the hon. member for Gloucester would get out his pencil, write down all these figures, add them up and see if they are not an indication of the interest that the government has taken in the welfare of the people of the maritime provinces.

Mr. Robichaud: Production is still going down.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to refer to the amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) and point out to him that the steel industry of Nova Scotia is one of the oldest industries in Canada. We in Newfoundland have a particular interest in the Nova Scotia steel industry. Many of our people work there. I suppose there are as many people from Newfoundland in Sydney and Glace Bay as there are from any other part of Canada. We supply the iron ore that is used in the manufacture of steel. We supply the limestone from Aguathuna in the Port au Port region of Newfoundland in the constituency of Humber-St. George's. We make a tremendous contribution to the manufacture of steel in Nova Scotia and therefore we are vitally interested in seing the steel industry of Nova Scotia retain and, if possible, increase its importance.

But the hon. member must know, as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) knows, that there has been a rapid expansion in the steel industry, notably at Sault Ste. Marie and Hamilton. Only this morning there was an item in the paper that the premier of Quebec had attended a ceremony yesterday to mark the coming into existence of a new mill for making steel pipe. The fact that there is such tremendous production of iron ore in the province of Quebec and also in the Labrador part of the province of Newfoundland and such cheap transportation from Seven Islands to the area below Montreal makes me believe quite strongly that a big steel industry is going to come into being in the province of Quebec. I believe that the prediction made by the premier of Quebec is going to be fulfilled.

Mr. Chevrier: It was made years ago.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Yes, but it does not lose anything in the repetition.

Mr. Chevrier: Perhaps not.

Mr. Pearson: It does not help Cape Breton very much.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): It is coming to fruition now and I am sure the hon. member must wish it as much as I do.

Mr. Chevrier: I have been saying it was coming for years.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Despite the undoubted and tremendous progress in the steel industry, which was given great impetus last year because of the strike in the steel mills of the United States, we cannot possibly manufacture all the iron ore that we produce. We just cannot do it. Next year we will probably be producing 20 to 30 million tons in the Labrador-Quebec area alone. Then we have Bell island and Steep Rock and there are other mines coming into production in different parts of Canada. We must export ore. We should be grateful that we have near us in the New York-Pittsburgh area great steel mills that can take all the ore we can produce. This will mean employment for the miners and for those in the service enterprises who supply the workers, for the railways and the steamers that operate to bring the ore to this great steel market in the United States.

I find that all the C.C.F. members are nothing if not generous with money. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam said that his program would cost $500 million. His leader doubled that and made it $1 billion. I say to the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, where would he get the $500 million in the first place and what would he do with it when he got it? He did not elaborate on that at all. He gets up, and his leader does the same, and with this offhand generosity distributes this money.

We have been criticized and badgered because of our few—no, I will not say few, I will say something else—because we had a deficit this year of $400 million. Last year, we had a bigger deficit. We are badgered, we are criticized and told we are not running things right. If we do not have a deficit, we have to increase taxes. This government could increase taxes and get the money to pay for these things. Who is in favour of increasing taxes?

An hon. Member: The C.C.F.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Yes, so long as they increase the taxes for somebody else. They have no interest in business. They are not in favour of private business at all. I do not want to get into that subject at all, but all they have to do is look at the United States, the richest country in the world, and think that the people achieved their tremendous prosperity through private enterprise. How they can seriously stand up for state ownership is more than I can understand. You can only have successful state ownership when you have communism as you have in Russia and the countries behind the iron curtain. The sooner those hon. members realize that—perhaps they do realize it—the better. He spoke about $500 million as a modest beginning. I suppose his leader has gone a step further and made it $1 billion, and if any other hon. members speak the whole revenue will be gone out in that sort of thing.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate had a good word to say about the financial assistance that we provided in 1958 for the Atlantic provinces. The hon. member for Gloucester and the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. McWilliam) even damned it with faint praise. Well, they could not say anything else. This $7.5 million which is going to Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Newfoundland and the $2.5 million for Prince Edward Island, making a total of $25 million, will be paid for four years. This will amount to $100 million in four years. These payments have been of tremendous importance to these provinces. We can hardly begin to think of all the benefits that have come to those provinces, in which there are only one and one-third million people, from the expenditure of $25 million a year.

Let me point this out—I do not know whether it is discouraging to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate—several times the hon. member referred to the desirability of finishing the trans-Canada highway, especially in Newfoundland. His party had a program whereby the Liberals, if they had been elected, would build the trans-Canada highway. Let me point this out—

Mr. Pickersgill: That is not right; we would pay 90 per cent of the cost.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Ninety per cent of the cost. I am going to show the hon. member how the trans-Canada highway in Newfoundland could have been built twice over if the government of that province had been really a sensible government. In the first place, they put $30 million into secondary industries, with the help of German industrialists, most of which went down the drain and from which not one cent ever came back. After all, if $30 million had been spent on the trans-Canada highway, the trans-Canada highway would be an accomplished fact now.

Then, if the government of Newfoundland took the $7.5 million we have been giving them for the past two years, and will give them for the next two years, and spent that on the trans-Canada highway, we would have a trans-Canada highway by 1962. Then we would be able to talk about a tourist industry. The tourists do not want to go to a place where the roads are dusty when it is dry and muddy when it is wet. The tourists want to drive on good roads; that is the first essential for a tourist industry. This would have been a sensible and sound undertaking, and would have brought thousands of tourists to the province of Newfoundland. After all, this year in Newfoundland, this very month, we are celebrating the 350th anniversary of the first colony of the British empire. Three hundred and fifty years ago John Guy, an alderman from Bristol, came out to Newfoundland and made a settlement at Cupids. There was, thus, the first British colony at Conception bay 350 years ago.

This would have been a great time to have our trans-Canada highway. We have other places of historic interest such as cape Bonavista, the first place seen by John Cabot, and Placentia, where the French priests and the French soldiers lived at one time, as well as Ferryland. Both these latter places are in my own constituency. Newfoundland is a most interesting, and certainly the oldest part of Canada. Thousands of tourists, not only from Newfoundland but from the United States would be happy to visit Newfoundland if the trans-Canada highway were built.

I should like to speak of the assistance we have given to the Atlantic provinces for the construction and improvement of their power projects. The previous government also dillied and dallied with this idea and did nothing about it. As the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Brooks) explained this afternoon—

Mr. Pickersgill: That is not correct.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Oh, they sent Mr. Howe down to officiate at the opening, but they gave no financial assistance to the Beechwood project. We lent them money to pay off debts at the bank that the government had incurred. We provided $13 million in the last three years for subventions on coal, partly used for the production of electricity. We have provided over $10 million for the building of steam power plants and the erection of transmission lines in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. I do not know how many members are aware of this, but we made an offer to Newfoundland to build transmission lines from Bay d'Espoir to Grand Falls at a cost of $11 million and give the Newfoundland government 40 years in which to pay off this substantial loan. So, I think we have provided innumerable benefits to the Atlantic provinces.

People like my hon. friend from Burin-Burgeo seem to think there is something improper or indecent in talking about what the government has done to assist these provinces. When we are challenged like this there is nothing else for us to do except point out the things we have done. I have here a report of the power commission of New Brunswick for the year ending March 31, 1959. I should like to give two or three figures from this statement of their operations for the previous year. This statement shows that the kilowatt capacity at March 31, 1957 was 132,575 kilowatts; at the end of March, 1959, it had risen to 204,525, that is an increase of over 55 per cent. The total generation of kilowatts had increased from 606 million to 754 million, an increase of 25 per cent. The total energy distributed increased from 534 million to 676 million. There was a substantial increase in the sale of electrical energy in the province of New Brunswick. In a time of depression, that could not happen. The number of retail customers increased from 75,316 at the end of March, 1957 to 82,655, an increase of 7,300 in two years.

Mr. Speaker: Order; I am sorry to interrupt the minister but I must inform him that his time has expired.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to add just one sentence?

Mr. Speaker: Does the house give unanimous consent?

[Mr. Browne (St. John's West).]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): There is just one sentence to which I wish to refer, a statement made by Mr. Arthur Johnson, president of APEC who said that the effect of this assistance to the Atlantic provinces resulted in a minimum saving of more than $60 million.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in rising to participate in this debate on the problems of the Atlantic provinces I feel an especial pleasure in following my friend the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Browne) because, among other things, it gives me an opportunity to wish him well and send him our congratulations on his birthday. I do so with the greater pleasure because he is exactly ten days younger than I am and I hope that I look and act as youthful and vigorous as he does.

Mr. Speaker, we have been discussing this problem in a way which I think makes it quite clear, whatever side of the house we are on, that there is with us now and indeed there has been for a long time the problem of economic underdevelopment in this part of our country. The problem of the development of new areas, Arctic areas and others if you like, is an important one and we all want to see that proceeded with. But it is of equal if not of greater importance that we should redevelop those areas of Canada whose people have in the past contributed so much to our country but who have through no fault of their own been forced to lag behind in the march of national progress, perhaps so far as material things are concerned.

This need for redevelopment is great. It is a most urgent problem of public policy. There has been progress made in this respect in the last few decades but in spite of that progress average incomes in those parts of Canada are still well behind those in the rest of Canada. A wide and persistent gap remains and as long as it does remain it constitutes a strain, as it is bound to, on the kind of complete national unity we want. As long as it remains there is bound to be a regional problem.

The rate of economic progress in the three maritime provinces between 1926 and 1955—and I quote the figures of the Gordon commission on this point—show that personal income in constant dollars during that period—and it is a considerable period—increased by 94 per cent while in the six other provinces it increased by only 80 per cent. In other words the rate of increase was greater in the maritimes during those years but nevertheless in 1955 in that part of Canada personal income was 37 per cent below that in the rest of the country and the average family income was 31 per cent below the rest of the country. Therefore a faster rate of growth is essential in the Atlantic provinces if the gap to which I referred is going to be closed and if those provinces are going to catch up with the rest of the country in economic and material development.

From 1956 to 1958 the figures show that that gap is not being closed. The per capita income in 1958 again in constant dollars was up, I will admit, in Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia but it was down in New Brunswick. The average income in 1958 as compared with the Canadian average as a whole was below the national average by $482. That is the average income in the Atlantic provinces compared with the average income in the country as a whole.

Although there has been some improvement over recent years there has not been enough improvement and the improvement such as it has been is largely due to transfer payments from the federal government; as has already been pointed out in this discussion. These payments account for nearly one quarter of the increase in personal per capita income in the maritime provinces since 1926. Indeed, in 1958, the last year for which I have figures, the transfer payments to the Atlantic provinces made up 16.3 per cent of the total personal income in the Atlantic area. Total personal income amounted in that year to $1,731 million of which $283 million came from transfer payments from the federal government.

These payments are useful and indeed they are essential to the welfare of those provinces. No one regrets for a minute that they should have been received especially in the Atlantic provinces which over the years have made their own transfer payments of another kind to the rest of Canada. We are all the beneficiaries of that kind of transfer, inside this house and outside of it. While no one regrets these payments and are glad they have been made something else is required to reduce this disproportionate reliance on government transfers. That something else, of course, must be new capital investment.

In so far as that kind of capital investment is taking place in the Atlantic provinces—and there have been examples of it given in this discussion—we all rejoice but notwithstanding the remarks just made by my hon. friend it has not happened in any significant way or to a degree that has had any significant effect in closing this gap. The official figures prove that.

In 1953 the proportion of Canada's total capital outlays made in the Atlantic region were 6.2 per cent. In 1960, the current year, investment intentions from the recent report of the department on that subject show that that figure is expected to be 6.4 per cent. That is very little increase indeed and not nearly enough to bring about the expansion which we all would like to see brought about. Indeed, there are signs that point to a weakening of industrial economy rather than an expansion such as is necessary to increase income and close the gap with the rest of Canada.

In Nova Scotia and New Brunswick between 1956 and 1959 industrial employment has decreased by 8.4 index points for New Brunswick and 5.4 index points for Nova Scotia. It is up in Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island but the base from which to advance there is a very low one indeed.

One feature that has been referred to by nearly every hon. member who has taken part in this debate and one which, notwithstanding what was said by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) last night, must cause great anxiety is the declining coal production in Nova Scotia. In 1957 the monthly average production was 474,000 tons and in 1959 it was 365,000 tons. Total production for the year through which we have just passed was 4,380,000 tons although the Minister of National Revenue put on the record the figure of 5,806,000 tons which does not correspond with any official figures we have been able to secure. It would be interesting to find out where the hon. gentleman got that figure of production because it is not the figure that appears in the federal statistics nor the one given to the Rand commission by the Nova Scotia bureau of mines. The official figures show a decrease of 23 per cent or 1.3 million tons in this two-year period.

So, Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding certain hopeful signs there are indications that more will have to be done if this gap is to be filled. These signs do reflect a serious problem which we are presenting to this house in the motion before it. I suggest that development of the Atlantic region which is embodied in this motion is a main problem of public policy at this time, as it has indeed been a main subject of public pronouncements by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and members of his government.

The Prime Minister talks a great deal about development. No one quarrels with the talk providing the facts justify the talk. But I ask, is this development occurring in the Atlantic provinces at this time? Basic to this development—and I refer to what the minister who has just sat down has said—is the situation in regard to power. On March 3 over the television network the Prime Minister has this to say on this matter. I am quoting his text:

The next point—

He was talking about development.

—was a ten-year plan for the development of thermal power plants in the Atlantic provinces. This has already been provided for by legislation. The Atlantic Provinces Power Development Act has been on the statute books for two years and has resulted in immediate savings of some $20 million in power costs to the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

Mr. Speaker, that figure of $20 million saving is grossly inaccurate and therefore misleading, I shall have no difficulty in showing that by the official figures which we have received from answers made by the minister himself to questions from this side of the house.

I wish I had time to trace the origins of this very important statute, the Atlantic Provinces Power Development Act, which is the foundation upon which power development will have to take place in the Atlantic provinces. The proposal for a power program for the Atlantic region in the form in which it was later implemented was made on March 4, 1957 by Mr. Harris in his budget speech. As some hon. members will remember, he then made an offer which would have provided for the construction and operation of thermal plants and transmission lines by the federal government; the rental of these lines and the sale of power at cost to provincial electric systems; and the acquisition of plants and other facilities by the provinces at any time on payment of their amortized cost. That proposal, as hon. members know, grew out of a carefully conducted study by the dominion coal board through Professor Christie of John Hopkins University. Later in that session the minister of northern affairs and national resources, Mr. Lesage, made it quite clear that in carrying out this program the government of the day intended to make coal competitive with oil in the construction of these thermal plants.

Mr. Speaker, all these ideas were embodied, with one important exception, and I think in the wrong direction, in the Atlantic Provinces Power Development Act which was introduced by this government and passed on, I think, January 15, 1958. So that this phase of so-called national development, the national development program, which on March 3 the Prime Minister claimed for himself and his government, was borrowed from Liberal proposals with one change, which I think was a change in the wrong direction. In piloting this bill through the House of Commons, the minister of northern affairs had this to say:

For the purposes of the two fiscal years now in contemplation,—

That is, the years 1957-58 and 1958-59.

—a total of $12,700,000 for construction of plants and transmission lines will certainly be required.

The minister then gave the house his vision of the future power construction program right up to 1967. This must be the ten-year program the Prime Minister was talking about in his broadcast, for Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Relying presumably upon estimates which were prepared for him by the Montreal Engineering Company, in this program, as he put it before this house at that time, the present minister visualized two plants for New Brunswick and eight plants for Nova Scotia at a cost of about $105 million. That statement will be found at pages 3037 and 3038 of Hansard for January 8, 1958.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us look at the realization of this particular vision. To date, for three, not for two years the money spent by the federal government on the power construction program—I get this information from Hansard from questions addressed to ministers—was $7,700,000, which is $5 million less than the minister forecast for two years. Yet the Minister of National Revenue—I am sorry he is not in his seat at the moment—said last night that $12 million had been spent already on this program. That statement appears in Hansard and I would like to know where he got that figure when his own colleague gave us a figure of $7.7 million. Of this $7.7 million, $5 million was spent on transmission lines and most of the rest on assisting the rehabilitation of the plant at Trenton in Nova Scotia.

For 1960-61, the current year, the estimates which have been laid before the house show that $4,900,000 have been appropriated for advances under this power act. That is less than last year. Yet the Minister of National Revenue said, as reported on page 3475 of Hansard, that in this current year $13 million had been pledged.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): That is for subventions on coal.

Mr. Pearson: With great respect, that is not what the minister said last night. He was talking about advances under the act. If only $4.9 million is included in the estimates I would like to get the source from which the rest of it has been pledged. But even using the ministers own figures, they seem to me to be demonstrably inaccurate.

What about the $105 million program we were told about in 1958? What about the two thermal plants proposed for New Brunswick? One, of course, is being built and it should be of great assistance to the province. It is at East Saint John but it is being financed by the provincial government without federal assistance. What about the eight proposed plants for Nova Scotia? There is not one new plant; but assistance, as I have already indicated, was given to increase the capacity of an existing plant at Trenton, Nova Scotia.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding what has been previously said in this house and outside the house, no new thermal power plants are being built in the Atlantic provinces by the present government, and I ask why. The answer seems to me to be quite obvious. It is because no formula has been found by this government to provide for the burning of coal in these plants which the minister said was a condition for federal financial assistance. At the East Saint John, New Brunswick, plant the New Brunswick power commission claimed that oil would save half a million dollars a year. I am not criticizing this decision of the New Brunswick government in any respect because, under the circumstances, they perhaps had no alternative; and as the premier of New Brunswick made quite clear to the Rand commission, oil would be used. That decision, Mr. Speaker, underlines the weakness of the thermal power program put forward by this government.

It seems to me to underline the fact that our formula would have been a more satisfactory one for the Atlantic provinces, because we pledged ourselves as a government to make coal competitive with any other fuel in the production of electricity. That was made perfectly clear, and it was stated categorically by the former minister of public works—the minister from Nova Scotia—in June, 1957. Yet the Prime Minister will not give this house a similar assurance about the East Saint John thermal plant. The result is what we know.

In the face of this attitude, the Prime Minister now claims savings of $20 million in power costs to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick in two years. The Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Hamilton) has given a figure which does not agree with the Prime Minister's. It is in excess of the actual figure, but he only claims some $9.5 million. We put some questions to the minister in order to ascertain the figures on this point as will be found on pages 2345 and 2346 of Hansard of March 23. According to the minister's answers, the figures were $7.71 million for capital construction and $1.88 million for assistance by way of subventions. That is a far cry from the $20 million mentioned by the Prime Minister in his broadcast. In any event, how can the minister call an advance of $7.71 million "immediate savings in power costs" when any such advances will be paid back by the provinces, plus interest and service charges. The minister himself boasted when speaking in the House of Commons on January 8, 1958, as may be found on page 3038 of Hansard:

> —the amounts of money expended on the construction program will all be refunded with interest, so that this phase of the program is self-liquidating.

Five days later the right hon. gentleman said the construction would involve "no loss whatever to the federal treasury". So the only economy that could possibly be effected is through borrowing from the federal government rather than elsewhere. When we tried to find out by questions where the money for subventions went, and did what we could to find out what savings were involved, we were not able to get that information; we were told it had all gone to the provincial power commission which acted as the agent of the federal government in this matter.

There is something else I should like to deal with, because it is of great importance to the development of the Atlantic provinces. It was touched on by my hon. friend who has just sat down, and it has to do with monetary policy and its effect on the development of the Atlantic region. This is a matter of intense interest to the provincial governments, an interest which has been stimulated and increased as a result of the tight money policy of the present government, and high interest rates.

Over the last two years the provincial governments of the Atlantic region, three of which are supposed to be on such friendly and co-operative terms with the federal government, have been trying at every possible opportunity to get the federal government at least to investigate the effect of monetary policy on regional development. They have pleaded more than once for a more flexible application of monetary policy, and some of them have suggested in their statements that perhaps there might be a differential rate of interest for the Atlantic provinces to take care of their needs. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) has stated categorically that this could not be done, and I am not going to quarrel with that financial opinion. Surely, however, there is no justification for the minister's refusal of the repeated requests of the premiers of the Atlantic provinces for an investigation of this matter. The evidence seems clear that the request has been made. The premiers, having found the Minister of Finance completely unresponsive, have decided to go it on their own, and the premier of Nova Scotia, speaking recently in the house of assembly in Halifax, summed up the position by saying:

> We had come to the conclusion we could not make any progress in this field—make any progress with the Minister of Finance and his officials—by requesting that something be done, so we were convinced that we would have to document our request with the opinion of a recognized authority in this field.

In the face of this attitude of the Minister of Finance they have taken steps to investigate this matter on a provincial basis. Perhaps, as a result of that investigation, something worth while may be discovered. This is a matter surely, where the federal government could have co-operated when they were first asked to do so by the provincial governments.

I am not suggesting that the Minister of Finance should take any position at this time as to what might be done, but I do suggest—and my suggestion has been supported by the financial editor of the Montreal Gazette—that an investigation should be made. As the editor of the Gazette said—and I quote from his column which appeared, I think, on April 8, 1960:

> All (areas) are affected by the expansion or contraction of the money supply. What is wanted are measures which restrain those areas or those industries which require restraint without hurting those which do not.

Then, later:

> If it is impossible with present procedures, the maritimes not unreasonably argue, the procedures should be changed.

If the Atlantic provinces now feel that national monetary policy is being applied unfairly to them, not only, perhaps, in the sphere of interest rates but in the availability of money at a fixed rate for the Atlantic provinces; if they feel that—and they do feel it—that will add to their problems; it will add to the grievances of the area, and it is going to make the national application of monetary policy more difficult. I suggest, therefore, that the federal government should have co-operated wholeheartedly with the Atlantic provinces in the kind of examination which was sought. The considerations which I have just mentioned, together with a good many others, surely support the desirability of an inquiry to study this phase of monetary policy with the object of assessing the adverse effects on the Atlantic region of present monetary policy and, perhaps, to relieve any such adverse effects. A study of this kind in which the federal government participated together with the Atlantic provinces would surely have a better chance of making the most constructive kind of recommendations. If this is now to be done on a provincial basis, it could be better done on a joint co-operative basis.

Mr. Macdonnell: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? I understood him to say that the maritime provinces were seeking an expert opinion which would support regional differences. Have they already secured such an opinion, or are they still seeking it?

Mr. Pearson: They asked a distinguished British economist, Sir Oliver Franks, to undertake the work but I understand through the press that he regretfully replied that he could not take on the job. They are, no doubt, trying to get an equally distinguished expert to do it in the hope that they may find some solution to this problem.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Pearson: I had been attempting to analyse some of the problems of the Atlantic region. I come now to the more important question, what to do about it. The arguments on that, in part at least, are found in the amendment, on which we shall shortly be voting, moved by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate which calls for a comprehensive and planned program of federal assistance for the Atlantic provinces. The amendment then recites a number of elements which, in our view, ought to be considered at the earliest possible time as part of such a comprehensive and planned program. I emphasize the words "planned" and "comprehensive" as opposed to ad hoc, unrelated and temporary expedients.

This emphasis that I venture to place on planning and co-ordination received strong support from the Halifax Chronicle-Herald in an admirable discussion of Atlantic problems and plans in an article entitled "A Blueprint for Atlantic Advance". I might quote one sentence from that blueprint, Mr. Speaker:

> —ad hoc provisions ... do not provide the solution to the basic economic problem which confronts the Atlantic region of Canada with such magnitude today.

I know that to inaugurate any program of this kind the Canadian people as a whole would willingly accept obligations that might follow from such a program, provided that the public funds in question were spent constructively and in ways which would improve facilities and stimulate income and employment. My own view on this has been made known already in this session, when I said that the wealthier parts of this country will have to accept obligations, perhaps in a way they have not in the past, to the economically weaker and less developed parts of the country and to help solve their special problems.

The Canso causeway is a prototype of this kind of planned, creative project. This program would require special capital assistance for the Atlantic provinces, a capital assistance program which should not be regarded in any sense as a handout but as a constructive method of balancing in that area what has been done in other regions of Canada. In fact, it would help balance at least, federal programs in other parts of Canada such as the St. Lawrence seaway and the trans-Canada pipe line which, when they are carried out—and some of them have been—will certainly help other regions more than they will help the Atlantic provinces.

Moreover, it seems to me it would be desirable to establish special administrative arrangements to operate such an Atlantic capital projects program. I should like to suggest for consideration that the industrial development bank should be used for this special regional purpose, even if it might require an amendment to the legislation setting up that bank.

Certainly the establishment of more secondary industries in the Atlantic provinces is essential, although we know in the past this has been hindered, first, by transportation costs and the difficulties arising from those costs and second, because of the fact that the market—although it is growing—is not big enough to absorb the present products of those regions. Because of the desirability of this new expansion we are obliged then to seek new means and not merely try to improve on the old methods that we have been following in the past.

Among the new means which we advocate in this amendment are the provision of fiscal incentives to encourage new industries to establish in areas where old industries are declining. This method would be fully justified in the coal areas of Nova Scotia for the purpose of easing the social and economic impact of changes, when they have to take place of reduced production, if it has to take place, and of cut-backs and of mine closures. Even if a solution—perhaps from the recommendations of the Rand commission—can be found that will increase or at least stabilize coal production, nevertheless it will remain essential to devise measures to expand and diversify employment opportunities not only in those coal areas but throughout the Atlantic provinces generally. That is why we make in our amendment two suggestions, namely the capital projects program which I mentioned, and the provision of fiscal incentives to new industries, which I think should be considered now by this government.

It would be wrong to rely entirely on accelerated development of existing resources or on stimulation of secondary industries. Great benefits to the Atlantic provinces would accrue economically from the discovery of entirely new and presently unknown resources, as was pointed out in the Gordon commission report a few years ago. That is a more long term endeavour, but it certainly in our view should not be neglected.

Therefore we advocate the intensification of federal activity in this field to complete our knowledge, which is not now complete, of the resources of the Atlantic area. As a party we made a policy statement on this matter in 1958 and perhaps I can put it on record. It is as follows:

> The Liberal party, with a view to accelerating the economic development of the Atlantic provinces stands for a policy of special federal effort to explore, survey, map, measure and make generally available up-to-date knowledge of the natural resources of the Atlantic provinces, so as to bring about speedier maximum use of the natural wealth of the Atlantic area, thereby raising the standard of prosperity in that part of Canada.

In addition, we attach at this time great importance to measures leading to a more efficient use of land. A principal cause of lower income levels is the relatively larger number of persons engaged in subsistence farming, fishing and logging. The low incomes prevailing in such subsistence occupations depress the average earnings in the whole area. A report attached to the Gordon commission, entitled "Some regional aspects of Canada's economic development" points out:

> If these sectors of the Atlantic regional economy are eliminated for purposes of calculation, the disparity in average annual earnings is lessened considerably . . . annual earnings in the primary aspects of farming, fishing and forestry were about 50 per cent of the Ontario average.

Therefore, a more efficient use of these basic land resources would be a direct method of increasing standards of living in that area; and I believe that the successful prosecution of this objective should receive much greater governmental attention than it has.

These are some of the things which we put in the amendment which is now before the house. Very often when we on this side speak we are asked the question from the other side, "what would you do?" Well these are the measures that we would support in any program to strengthen the economy of the Atlantic provinces and improve income levels:

1. A capital projects program.

2. Fiscal incentives to stimulate private enterprise.

3. New efforts to discover new resources in the Atlantic provinces.

4. A more efficient use of land resources.

5. An inquiry into the regional effects of national, fiscal, monetary and economic policies.

6. Adjustments in freight rates and improvement of transportation facilities.

That is what we would do, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Why in 22 years did hon. gentlemen opposite do nothing?

Mr. Pearson: In 22 years we did a great many other things. The record stands and the record cannot be altered by the intervention of my hon. friend.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pearson: My hon. friends seem a little disturbed. Maybe they will be a little more disturbed when they have to vote.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is when it will hurt.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I remind hon. members that the vote has not been called and the hon. gentleman who has the floor has not finished his speech.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I gave the figures for Atlantic provinces development and expansion from 1925 to 1955 this afternoon and from 1956 to 1959. When hon. gentlemen opposite ask, what would you do now, this is what we would do now, and I ask them how are they going to vote tonight?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. Members: Closure, closure, closure.

An hon. Member: A new form of closure.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sure hon. members do not want to prevent the Minister of Finance from using the few minutes remaining.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Hon. Donald Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, everything that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) has said about what his party would like to do now is an indictment of what his party failed to do when in office. This has been, from the lips of the Leader of the Opposition, the most telling indictment of Liberal inaction, indifference and neglect of the Atlantic area when they were in office that we have yet heard in this house.

Mr. Pickersgill: What are you going to do?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The Leader of the Opposition was asked a moment ago what he and his colleagues of the former administration had done in 22 years and he could not find an answer. I will help him, Mr. Speaker. I will tell him that in the 22 years that he and his colleagues were in office—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We gave good government.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —they did very little to meet the needs of the Atlantic area. The present government has done far more in three years than our predecessors did in all their 22 years in office.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being 8.15 o'clock p.m. it is my duty, pursuant to section 4 (d) of Standing Order 56, to interrupt these proceedings and put forthwith the question on any amendment before the house.

The house divided on the amendment to the amendment (Mr. Regier) which was negatived on the following division:

HOUSING—SUGGESTED INCREASE IN 1960 PROGRAM

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): I rise on a grievance. I should like to raise a matter which has caused widespread concern throughout the country during the past few weeks, and understandably so. I am referring to the situation caused by the apparent failure of the government's housing program for 1960.

[Mr. Speaker.]

When housing legislation came before us for discussion in this chamber in February and March of this year we were told by the minister responsible that the government planned to reduce housebuilding in 1960 as compared with 1959 and 1958. At that time the minister said the government's objective was 125,000 starts in 1960 as compared with 141,000 in 1959 and 164,000 in 1958. Some of us on this side of the house tried to point out that because of the tight money and high interest rates caused by government fiscal and monetary policy it would be unlikely that more than 100,000 starts would be made in 1960.

It is not my intention to repeat here arguments which were used at that time. It is common knowledge that the government, through its conversion loan of 1958 and its huge deficits, boosted interest rates to unprecedented levels for government borrowings which, in turn, boosted interest rates on all borrowing for building operations. The results of this policy, which led to higher interest rates, have had the effect of knocking the banks completely out of house building. Only 19 loans were made by the chartered banks in the first quarter of 1960 as compared with 3,327 in the first quarter of 1959. Government policy, resulting as it has in higher interest rates throughout the economy, has also had a most detrimental effect on lending for house building by the approved lenders—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Would the hon. member permit a question? In view of what he has said about the reduced number of loans made by the chartered banks, may I ask if he would approve or propose that the present ceiling of 6 per cent on the interest chargeable by the banks, as imposed by the Bank Act, be raised with a view to inducing the banks to participate more largely in lending under the National Housing Act?

Mr. Garland: I am delighted to reply to the Minister of Finance. I certainly did not recommend such a course during the extensive debate on housing which took place in this house earlier this year, nor do I now.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if before the hon. member goes further he would indicate the exact nature of the grievance which he is raising. I ask him to do so because we have had a debate in this house on Bill No. C-53, an act to amend the National Housing Act, which dealt in a fairly general way with the federal housing program, and I do not want the hon. member to initiate a grievance which might constitute a repetition of that debate.

I take it he has some specific grievance, or narrower point than was raised in the debate on the bill. If he would state what it is it would help to limit the scope of the debate.

Mr. Garland: Yes, I am referring to a situation which has become apparent since the debate on housing took place, namely the failure of the government in my opinion to carry out the will of parliament by using moneys already approved by this parliament for housing. It is a matter of degree, but I think my point is well taken and I should like to develop it.

Mr. Speaker: If I understand the hon. member correctly he is complaining about the administration of the act which was extended and amplified this session.

Mr. Garland: I should like to point out that in the first quarter of 1960 the approved lenders made 1,780 loans as compared with 5,881 loans in the first quarter of 1959. This represents a decrease of approximately 70 per cent. Under these circumstances it is understandable that housing starts were down at the end of the first quarter of this year in excess of 45 per cent in areas over 5,000. Then, to add insult to injury, we have the government's announced policy of reducing their direct lending in 1960 to only half the amount of direct lending done in 1959. Direct lending has been further curtailed, of course—

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member be good enough to raise his voice as he makes his speech.

Mr. McIlraith: Strike above the belt.

Mr. Walker: I cannot hear a word he says. This may not be a matter of importance, but could he raise his voice so I can hear him?

Mr. Garland: I do not think that is an appropriate comment, Mr. Speaker, but I shall retain any comment for a future occasion. I was pointing out that the direct lending has been further curtailed by restrictions imposed by this government in respect of persons earning more than $5,000 per annum, with minor allowances depending upon the size of the family. In my opinion, this wage ceiling restriction is a gimmick developed to do two things: first, to create the impression that something is to be done for the little man; and, second, to make it more difficult for Canadians generally to qualify for a direct loan.

Actually the little man who really needs assistance will get precious little out of this government's 1960 housing program, a housing program which is deliberately restrictive and which can have only one effect, namely that of increasing the cost of housing.

In an earlier debate we covered the detrimental effect, particularly to the medium and lower wage earners, that these high interest rates are having on the cost of housing. Even under the National Housing Act it is estimated that at 6¾ per cent a house buyer will pay out more in interest than in principal on a 20-year mortgage for the first time since the National Housing Act came into existence.

Several weeks have passed since the housing debate took place. Results clearly show that the doubts expressed by some of us as to the adequacy of the government's housing program for 1960 were well founded. I feel sure this drastic fall-off in housing starts must concern all hon. members in this house. I find it difficult to understand the government's apparent determination to stick stubbornly to their announced policy of restricting housebuilding in 1960. There is widespread dissatisfaction with the present housing situation. It is now becoming abundantly clear with each passing month that the government must re-assess the situation. It must face up to the fact that its own fiscal and monetary policies over the past three years have contributed greatly to the present unsatisfactory situation. As a result, it must increase the amount of direct lending it is prepared to make this year beyond the announced $150 million to $175 million, which is only half the amount of direct lending done in 1959. Unless the government is prepared to increase the amount of direct lending, housing starts will fall well below 100,000 in 1960.

It is difficult to understand the government's thinking on this subject at the present time and their stubborn refusal to face up to the situation. This government must be aware of the beneficial effect house construction has on the entire economy. In fact, on this subject. I would like to refer to a statement made in this house on February 4, 1959, by the then minister of public works when he was dealing with the subject of employment resulting from house construction, as reported at page 684 of Hansard. He was referring to the completions in 1958, which numbered 146,686. I should like to quote what the minister had to say. These are the minister's words:

> As I pointed out, one of the main objectives was to help create employment by this housing policy. There can be no doubt but that housebuilding in 1958 has set the pace for all activities in Canada. It has been in the forefront of the economic activity in Canada. We estimate that during the year there were probably 200,000 man-years of employment provided by on-site construction alone. This means about 400,000 jobs because it takes about six months to build a home.
> Then, in addition, there have been all the jobs more remotely involved in the construction of housing units of various kinds. For example, there is the ground servicing of the land, the production, handling and transportation of building materials, bringing the total to about 400,000 man-year jobs. There are, as well, the men employed in getting out the logs, lumbering, the making of furniture and the equipment which goes into a home.

The minister continued with a reference to a statement made at that time by the vice president of Simpson-Sears. He is quoted as saying:

That these new homes represent a potential demand for furnishings and equipment estimated at $1,700 to $2,000 per house.

Mr. Walker: I am not blaming the hon. member but I cannot hear a word he is saying. Usually he is so fluent and sonorous. Can he speak up?

Mr. Garland: I am reading from 1959 Hansard, a statement by the former minister of public works.

Mr. Walker: I am not complaining about what you are reading; I should like to hear what you are saying.

Mr. Speaker: May I suggest that with the leave of the house the hon. member could speak from the seat behind and he would then have a microphone in front of him. There is some difficulty in hearing him.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hon. gentlemen ought to keep quiet.

Mr. Garland: Mr. Speaker, in the light of this statement by a senior member of this government that the construction of 146,000 houses created 400,000 jobs, quite apart from the other businesses referred to such as the supplying of lumber, furniture, appliances and so forth, what possible justification can there be for this government to sit on its hands with hundreds of thousands of our people unemployed. Statistics show that in no field is there greater unemployment than among residential construction workers. Yet the government sits there day in and day out, like one of Dickens' characters, hoping that something will turn up.

All winter the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) kept telling us, "Do it now, don't wait for spring". A month ago, during the budget presentation, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) urged us, "Don't worry now, wait until spring". The time for action by this government in respect of the 1960 housing program is long overdue. Here we have the government, by its own statement, having within its power the ability to create an extra 200,000 jobs, and yet stubbornly refusing to do so.

Parliament has already approved $500 million for direct lending to bolster the housing program, yet this government refuses to act. Its refusal leaves one with only one conclusion, namely that they are holding the bulk of these millions approved by parliament to be poured into the economy prior to the next general election. This sort of action on the part of a national government, if true, is deplorable and certainly by their actions they are leaving themselves open to this criticism.

If there are other reasons why the government is refusing to use these dollars, let them come forward and say so. Actually, while they propose lending $150 million to $175 million this year, the government will be receiving an estimated $110 million in interest and mortgage payments. This means, of course, that while the fund is not a revolving one, the additional net lending proposed will be only $40 million to $65 million.

During the housing debate much was said about the 82,000 units carried over from last year which remained to be completed. The National House Builders Association release, as far back as April 4, estimated that no more than 10 per cent of the labour required to complete these 82,000 units remained to be done. It is obvious to all of us that loans being applied for now, with the usual administrative time lag, will not result in any real employment for several weeks or even months.

In view of these circumstances, I think the government should act now. With their many experts I am sure they are very much aware of the causes and results of this bogging down of house construction in 1960. In the light of present circumstances I think they should re-assess the situation at once and show the public that they are determined that the rate of house construction will be increased so as to ensure the provision of adequate housing for our people and to show the Canadian people that they, the government, are aware of the relationship between the number of Canadians unemployed and the rate of house construction in Canada.

There are many aspects of housing that could and perhaps should be dealt with at this time. There are internal problems within the industry itself which add to builders' costs and are simply passed along to the buyer. I believe the government has a responsibility to prevent violent fluctuations in the industry that result in a higher cost for houses. However, as I have indicated, we have had a rather extensive debate on housing earlier this year.

I will close by reminding hon. members that housing starts have averaged 138,000 yearly for the past five years. The government has set 125,000 as this year's objective. Results to date clearly indicate that this minimum objective of the government will not be met. The need for proper housing remains great among many of our people. Great quantities of building materials lie waiting in inventory. Residential construction workers stand by unemployed and waiting. Surely the house construction industry and hundreds of thousands of our people do not have to stand by waiting for a sag in the Canadian economy that might have the effect of making more mortgage money available for houses. I believe that human need should have priority and I do not believe there is any justification for the government sitting around with almost $500 million up its sleeve while our unemployed walk the streets.

Mr. M. D. Morton (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, may I add a few words to what the hon. member has said with respect to housing. The grievance he has raised is that the activity of the housing industry across Canada has slackened, and I know that this has affected my riding particularly because many construction workers live in my riding and they are finding difficulty in obtaining employment. However, the grievance that the hon. member has raised is that the situation is entirely the fault of the government. I should like to raise the point that perhaps there is something more than the government involved.

Hon. members will recall that in 1957, when $250 million was available for housing under statutory provision, the Liberal government used only $100 million. There was still on the books at that time the right to use $150 million. At that time there was a slackening in the housing program across Canada and as a result there was unemployment in my riding. But what has happened since then? The government has pumped nine times as much money into the housing industry as a sort of primer to get the water flowing, so to speak, to get money flowing into housing programs.

Having spent that amount of money on housing and having increased the housing starts, it was hoped that the legitimate financial institutions across the country would assume their social obligations and get into the lending field. That did not happen. Today, with interest rates higher than they were before, these financial institutions are not supporting house construction by providing the mortgage money required. Is the government to blame for that?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes.

Mr. Morton: How? Interest rates have increased and they should find it more desirable to get into this field. If we are to say that the government is at fault, are we to say that from now on the government must assume direct responsibility for financing all housing construction throughout the country? If we have reached that stage in our country, it is a condemnation of private industry. I believe that these financial institutions have been developed for a purpose going beyond merely investing in government bonds and clipping the coupons.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Speaker, I should like to raise a point of order at this time. As I understand the rules, the grievance period is designed to afford an opportunity to speak to members who have grievances to lodge against the government. The hon. member—I know this has happened before but only on rare occasions—by occupying a part of the grievance period is in effect coming to the defence of the government, thereby denying the intent of the grievance period to other members of the house.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, surely this is a most far fetched viewpoint. Under our rules, on a motion to resolve the house into committee of supply the grievance period lasts the entire two days, and it is surely a new exposition of the rules with regard to airing grievances that the speeches must all come from the opposition and that no opportunity should be given to the government side to reply. I would respectfully suggest, Mr. Speaker, that not only is there no merit in the point of order taken by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam but it is a blatant denial of the right of free speech to government supporters in the house.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to say a word on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam. In the first place, I think the minister has completely perverted the statement that the hon. member made. There was no suggestion by the hon. member that any member anywhere in the house could not support a grievance or raise a grievance. In the British house members of parliament on the government side frequently do raise grievances against the government, and it might be a good thing if it happened here once in a while too.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): The hon. member for Acadia did so a while ago.

Mr. Pickersgill: The point is that it has always been a tradition of the house in the grievance period after the amendments have been dealt with for those people who wish to support a grievance to speak and then for a member of the government, not a supporter of the government, to reply. Since under the new rules two days are devoted to supply motions, I think the hon. member is quite right that this period after the voting was designed for the airing of grievances and that it should not be preempted by hon. members making speeches in defence of the government.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Another lecture.

Mr. Speaker: The practice in dealing with grievances after the amendments have been disposed of has been to speak to one grievance at a time, and I would not deny any member in the house the right to speak to the matter before the house. In recognizing an hon. member I do not know whether he is going to speak for or against the proposition. However, if he keeps on the same subject it seems to me he is within the rules and that a member who disagrees with the point of view raised by a member speaking to a grievance is just as much entitled to speak as any member who wants to support a grievance.

Mr. Morton: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have not had the long experience in the house that some hon. members across the way have had. I understood that the grievance raised had to do with housing, the fact that we have not had as many housing starts as in the past and the fact that there is more unemployment in the construction industry that we had envisaged. I had not realized in my short period in the house that all grievances had to be directed against the government rather than having to do with conditions that prevail. I might add that some private members, especially on the government side, have a grievance with respect to the attempt by certain members of the opposition to deny us the opportunity to speak if we want to.

Mr. Howard: What about your own whip?

Mr. Morton: Our own whip is not as difficult as some people in the opposition.

Mr. Howard: But he is difficult.

Mr. Morton: No, he is not. If I may get back to the grievance which was raised, I should like to emphasize my point that the government has been pouring more money into housing in the last two years than was done by the former administration. It has poured nine times as much into housing as the former government and yet when the government has withdrawn some support it finds that the ordinary lending institutions have not assumed their responsibility. When we find the government continually pouring large amounts of money into an industry, I think it is time we examined the situation instead of just saying this is another problem for the government. In so far as this and other problems are concerned, if somebody cannot solve them we all too frequently hear it said, let the government do it.

I think this problem goes deeper than that. We have seen the government pouring money into housing, but we have not been able to induce the regular lending institutions to enter the field and take their rightful place. I think the hon. member was quite right in raising this question. I merely point out that, in my opinion, something more than the government continually pouring money into housing is needed. We must get back where the lending institutions will perform the function for which they were organized.

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): I should like to say a few words about this particular grievance. Before I make the remarks I had intended I should like to say that I am very pleased to find that the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Morton) is finally recognizing there is something basically wrong with this society of ours, something which goes deeper than appears on the surface. I hope the hon. member will go a little bit further in his studies and come to the same conclusion I have in regard to this society of ours.

The grievance before the house at the present time has to do with the failure of the government to implement the provisions of the housing act which was passed in this house some few weeks ago. During the Easter recess I had an opportunity of visiting my riding and discussing this housing situation with a number of people. I must say that the present action, or total lack of action, on the part of the government is causing some concern. I found that this lack of action was spreading consternation amongst the builders in my riding. I talked with one builder who planned to construct 100 homes this year but because of the lack of available funds he has had to cancel the whole project.

Now some two or three weeks ago I had occasion in this house to read a letter from a disillusioned former supporter of this government. As I went around my riding during the last two or three weeks I found that there were quite a number of former supporters of this government who had joined the ranks of the disillusioned. Not too long ago I attended a meeting of the northeastern Ontario development association in which the civic leaders from all the northeastern parts of Ontario took part. They were meeting to try to find how they could develop that particular section of northern Ontario. They discussed various ways and means, but each and every amendment they discussed crashed on the same rocks. How was the money going to be made available? How were they going to get the money for the construction of homes, for small industries and so forth? This is something that is very keenly felt in that area right now because for some 18 or 20 years the Porcupine camp was at a standstill. It has only been within the last two years or so that the camp has started to come alive. In fact, during the last two years there was more construction in the Timmins area than there had been in the previous 20 years.

Mr. Henderson: And under Conservative rule.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Unfortunately this hope that came into being in that area has come to a sorry halt this year. Everybody with whom I talked wanted to know what the trouble was. They were of the opinion that $500 million had been made available for housing and wanted to know why that money was not available. When I told them that the government's stated intention was to use only a very small portion of that money they asked the same question that I asked in the house. Unfortunately, whether or not it was for the same reason, they did not get an answer. I did not know the answer because I was not able to find out in the house.

I would suggest, and this is just my personal opinion as a result of talking to a number of people over the last few weeks, that if the government does not care about the public or about the unemployed in this particular field, then they had better start to care about their own future. This unfortunate situation in the construction field seems to have started the moment the former minister of public works left that office. I do not know whether or not there is any connection between the two events. It seemed, when the present Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green) was minister of public works he was the only minister in the cabinet who was really doing a job. When we take a good look at the housing situation today, even though the international situation may be serious, I think that for the good of this country we had better call him back to his job at public works.

Mr. R. M. T. McDonald (Hamilton South): I should like to make a few comments on this grievance. I cannot agree with the Liberal or C.C.F. members, but there is one point upon which I must commend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker). I refer to limited dividend mortgage money. Some few years ago the Liberal party started this Liberal dividend provision and from 1946 to 1957 they put $58 million into limited dividend projects. From June 10, 1957 until December 31, 1959 this government put $115 million into this market, and I think they should be commended for their action.

Suggested Increase in Housing Program

However, I am a little disturbed at the amount of loans that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is allowing private enterprise in their efforts to help the people in the income bracket below $3,600 to finance housing projects. Before the private investor had to put up 10 per cent of his own money and the government provided the remaining 90 per cent. The private investor was allowed to make 5 per cent on his money. A lot of private lenders went into this type of project, even though they might have purchased government bonds. They were shouldering their responsibilities. I would hope the Minister of Public Works would look at this provision a little more closely in the future. In 1957 the minister of finance, Walter Harris, had a little report on housing and I should like to quote from that report:

> Housing construction is expected to drop fairly markedly below the high levels of the two previous years.

This statement was made just before the election and the two cups of coffee budget. We did not hear of the great Liberal party pouring money into the housing market to help the builders of the country. If this government had not put $150 million into the housing market in July, 1957, 75 per cent of the small builders in this country would have been bankrupt. It was the direct responsibility of the Liberal party before the budget of March, 1957 when they knew the condition of the housing industry in the country and failed to meet their responsibility. They must accept the responsibility for their failure to take action.

This government has done a lot in the housing field in the past three years and more remains to be done.

Mr. Speaker: In view of the fact that the hon. member is dealing with the past, may I remind the house that this is a narrow subject with which we are dealing. This grievance relates to the administration of the housing act passed and amended by parliament this year. It does not deal with the past but with the present, as I understand the grievance. I think more hon. members will have an opportunity to speak if the discussion is kept to that narrow range.

Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South): Thank you for calling me to order, Mr. Speaker. I hope I can get back on the track. This government raised the amount of insured N.H.A. moneys from $4 million to $6 million. Unlike the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Morton) I am a little concerned about the inactivity of the lending institutions in the country who make available money at 6¾ per cent. It is all well and good, as indicated before, to say that they can collect bonds and get quite a bit of money, but it is the people's money that the banks and lending institutions have. It is up to them to take a long range view at future housing and construction in Canada. I think it is about time they shouldered a little bit more responsibility in this field.

When speaking in this house a few months ago on the subject of housing I indicated that the government should get out of the direct lending business. I feel this is something the government should do in a long range program. They should stay in the field of insured N.H.A. lending but it is the responsibility of banks, trust companies and other financial institutions in a private enterprise system to be active in direct lending. I do not say the government should get out of this type of business immediately but should stay in it until the rough period is over and then get out. The lending institutions should take a longer ranged view and possibly shoulder their responsibilities more adequately.

I think that the present Minister of Public Works is attempting to meet his responsibilities squarely. I know that I have had complaints, but then we have complaints about everything. I have no doubt that hon. members opposite received complaints too when they sat on the government side of the house. I believe that the minister has put forward a direct policy. I am sure he has not had too many complaints because the people have accepted this. The builders are in a bad way, it is true, but it is due to the high cost of land and the lack of services. One could name a thousand other reasons. I am sure that the minister and this government will take the proper action that is necessary to help the Canadian housing industry and will not do what the Liberals did in March of 1957.

Mr. O. J. Godin (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, among the many grievances which the Canadian people have against the present government undoubtedly one of the most fiercely debated throughout the country is the present administration of the housing act. As you stated, Mr. Speaker, we recently amended this act and following these amendments regulations were passed and directions given as to the future administration of the legislation.

Throughout Canada and more specifically in my area of northern Canada it has been found that the administration of the act works a hardship in many cases. If there was ever a project which had social significance in this country it was the housing project promoted by the former government over a period of many years. The hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Garland) has adduced enlightening statistics which indicate that home construction has been reduced by 45 per cent under the administration of the present government. This is due to many causes but the fault rests primarily with the government. The reasons arise in large part from the regulations put into effect following the amendments of 1960.

Another reason why this grievance is exceedingly important to the people of Canada is because the unemployment situation has been aggravated by and reflects a falling off of residential home construction. This has affected my area wherein we have prosperous mines. Unemployment there has doubled between March of 1958 and March of 1960. I dare say that approximately 80 per cent of those who find themselves in the doubled numbers of unemployed in my area were employed in the construction industry. Construction activity in northern Ontario has decreased at a serious rate.

For the two reasons I have advanced I am sure that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) and the government as a whole will listen to the voices of hon. members who have spoken in this debate and will bring about certain changes in the recently imposed regulations which have brought about the disaster to which I referred. I am not alone in drawing this matter to the attention of the government. This trend has been observed and commented upon by several hon. members and many alert citizens.

I would like to quote from a newspaper article containing a report of a recent meeting between northern Ontario municipalities to discuss this grave problem of home construction and its effect on the economic situation of various areas. Unfortunately the article happened to be written in French but of course with the translation system with which we are favoured all hon. members will be able to follow. This article appeared in the newspaper Le Devoir and reads:

(Translation):

Allow me to quote from an article which appeared in Le Droit for April 29, under the following heading:

Sudbury files the same application as Kapuskasing.

And the article goes on to say:

Unless certain changes are made in the National Housing Act, heavy losses are in the offing for the building industry in the Sudbury area.

Tuesday night, the Sudbury city council unanimously passed a resolution urging the federal government to raise by $1,000 the salary ceiling for qualifying for mortgage loans through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

(Text):

This action by members of municipalities in northern Ontario clearly illustrates the impasse which the housing industry has reached there. Housing has been reduced by 45 per cent. The statistics reveal drastic declines. I am sure this government will assume some responsibility in this important field and give an incentive to the housing industry.

One problem created by the new regulations is the maximum salary figure of $5,000 in relation to obtaining direct loans. Miners are confronted with a problem with respect to the bonuses they receive from time to time. These bonuses vary greatly in relation to certain jobs in the mining industry. A miner therefore has to report that he receives a variable income which will fluctuate widely from year to year.

In the mining industry you have workers in the mines and smelters. Let us assume that a smelter worker earning between $4,400 and $4,500 obtains a loan from this government assist in securing a home for himself and his family. But a miner, a mucker as we call him in the district of Sudbury, who works just a few miles away and who is considered for every purpose on the same social level as the furnace puncher or smelter man, if he is making $5,100 he cannot obtain from the government the service which his fellow workers can obtain. That is because his pay is slightly more than the others, possibly because his work is more dangerous or is heavier. We have set ways and means to enable a person in this country to obtain the service of this government at a figure of $5,000, and I say this is wrong.

Further, I realize that we have been called repeaters, but for 15 or 20 years it has been repeated to me that the cost of living in northern Ontario is higher than elsewhere. That is true because of the cost of transportation of materials and goods, and it is also true for other various reasons. The cost of public works is much more in northern Ontario than in other places in Canada and the province of Ontario because the cost of living is much higher. Therefore the pay must follow the cost of living in some way and we find a rather fair rate of wages in northern Ontario. So that this system of using a level of $5,000 creates a situation in this province and elsewhere in Canada where the salary of a regional director of a company of some major store, for instance, in one area is, say, $4,800 and therefore this person under the regulations can obtain a service from the government which provides a loan so he can build a home. In my riding a worker, not a district manager of a store but a worker, cannot get a loan under the regulations of this government and for this reason it is obvious he has a grievance owing to the most harsh and difficult situation in the area I represent.

Suggested Increase in Housing Program

We have seen other statutes being administered with variations from area to area. We see this in the laws of the federal government and in the industrial standards act of the province of Ontario where minimum wages are zoned by areas. The minimum standards act of Ontario does not declare the same minimum wage for northern Ontario as it does for some other sections of that province.

To be fair to all these people in Canada who are on the same social level but possibly do not receive the same pay cheque on Saturdays on account of the region in which they live and on account of the cost of living in their respective area, I would like to say that they find themselves in a position where they cannot obtain this government service and that they have a clear grievance against this government. The government has introduced an absolute arbitrary figure with which they distinguish between the citizens who can obtain the service of this government and the citizens who can not. In taking such an arbitrary figure they have created in my area especially, great disadvantages.

I have a letter here which I think should convince the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker). I have received information through a letter which is in the form of a petition. It is not from an ordinary citizen in my riding but it comes through the committee of the unemployment insurance commission in my area. Hon. members know that the unemployment insurance commission has a committee which studies ways and means of putting men to work. Here we have this government after passing this new legislation being criticized by sections of the administration of this country and by sections of the unemployment insurance commission, the committee of which meets with laymen to discuss ways and means of putting men to work. I would like to quote a paragraph of this letter for the benefit of the Minister of Public Works. The letter is on the letterhead of the unemployment insurance commission, national employment service, and the address is 152 Elm street east, Sudbury, Ontario. Apparently they had passed a resolution at the meeting of this committee, and one paragraph of this letter reads as follows:

> —to petition the federal government to eliminate the premium and bonus factors from the maximum income level required to qualify for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation loans and that they consider basic pay only.

I am sure the Minister of Public Works has received many directions or demands similar to this one.

As I sit down, Mr. Speaker, I trust that this government through the Minister of

Suggested Increase in Housing Program

Public Works will immediately consider the plea of the people of my area and the people of northern Ontario, and all the people in these other regions who are definitely faced with a problem to meet this arbitrary figure to enable them to obtain the services of this government, and if the government would sit down and consider the falling statistics relating to housing in Canada and the rising statistics relating to unemployment they would bring about remedies to eliminate this arbitrary legislation which they have placed in the administration of this country.

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I have ten minutes in which to reply and I would like to say in reply to the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Garland) that his figures do not include any loans made by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation because they covered the first three months of the year, and as such of course they are greatly down on the average for last year. If the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation loans had been included in the estimate of 73,000 starts for the year 1960, then we would have had 15,000 more starts added to that. If the areas under 5,000 population had been taken into consideration we would have had average figures of 125,000 starts for this year.

I do appreciate what hon. members have said, that there are a great many aggravating situations resulting from the necessity of placing a ceiling on the loans; in other words, to determine by income those who will get loans. But let me first deal very briefly with unemployment. I can assure you that so far our housing policy has done nothing but improve the situation of employment. At the beginning of this year there were 82,000 homes in the process of construction, and as the hon. member will see by looking at the figures, the highlights, up to the end of March there were 22,000 homes completed in the dominion all of which created employment. Employment will fall off so far as home building is concerned pretty soon, but in the meantime the predictions are, according to one of the most authoritative journals, the Canadian Bank of Commerce journal, that the only significant decline in construction this year would seem to be that of housing. Other construction, as we have heard predicted, could be substantially up.

It is a very easy thing to keep on pumping one third of a billion dollars a year into the economy. I would be a popular minister with the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin) if I repeated that performance every year. We have pumped into housing in less than three years nearly $1 billion with the result that we made the market a most difficult market in which to borrow money because of the tremendous borrowings necessary to finance housing. In other words, we helped to spoil the lending market. In addition to this, we are now out of the recession and on our way back to prosperity and, as hon. members will see as the weeks go by, unemployment figures will go down in a very radical way. Therefore, where would we find help in the event of another recession?

We should not be able to go back to housing in the same way as we could in 1957. If there was ever a year, as we come out of the recession and as the construction figures in every other part of our economy go up, this is the year to cut back on our housing. I admit that I share the disappointment of other hon. members that the banks have not participated in the program. Last year we had 15,000 loans from this source; this year, so far, they have not provided 25 loans. Of course, the figure of 15,000 was for the whole of the year. However, we have put the question to hon. members of the opposition: would you allow the interest rate to be raised to 6¾ per cent in order to bring the banks back into this field? The answer has always been, no. Therefore this is a situation which it is difficult to improve on.

Mr. McIlraith: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Walker: At the end of my speech.

The builders have not had any loans thus far from us. Never in the years 1958, or 1959, have the builders received anything by way of loans from the government of Canada except by way of winter works loans, and that does not happen until the fall. Thus the complaint that the builders are not getting money from us in the spring is not well founded.

It is true we have cut our program from $337 million to $175 million which will enable us to have between 17,000 and 18,000 starts. So great is the demand for direct government loans that we have been forced to find some way of letting out these loans, and the fairest way is to help those who need help most, namely the man of small income and his family. Even with a ceiling of $5,000 for the ordinary man with two children, $5,200 for the man with three children, $5,400 for the man with four children and $5,600 for the man with five children, we are going to have a hard time making this $175 million last. The demand for loans from us is tremendous. We were only open for business from April 6, but we have already received 2,000 applications, and it is going to be difficult to make the money last to the end of the year. If we were to raise the ceiling to $6,000—and no one would like that better than I would; I hate to hear complaints from the hon. member from Nickel Belt (Mr. Godin) and other members, because I know perfectly well that because of the necessity of letting our money out in this limited way certain people are suffering—if we were to raise this ceiling to $6,000 at the present time we would run out of money by the end of June, because it is a fact that the banks are not in this program.

Mr. Godin: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Walker: When I am through. The banks are not in it. They have completely dropped out, and the approved lenders have been very slow in getting in. However, we expect that the conventional lenders will be back just as they were before, and it will please hon. members to know that although I cannot be exact about anything I am going to suggest that the figures I gave several months ago will, even without the banks, be almost achieved this year; that is 85,000 conventional loans or non-N.H.A. loans; 20,000 loans from approved lenders, because as the weeks go by the approved lenders are getting back into the market and we are still hopeful we shall get 20,000 starts from the approved lenders. Thus one arrives at a figure of 105,000 starts. Added to that there are 15,000 starts by way of direct housing loans, and 3,000 starts on limited dividend projects, making another 18,000 and completing a total for this year of 123,000 as compared with my earlier prediction of 125,000.

So to my friends of faint hope may I say: consider, with us, the problem we have to face. Do hon. members opposite want the government to go on lending one third of a billion dollars a year, bearing in mind the difficulty there is in getting money and the fact that money raised by the government means the exclusion of other people from the means of borrowing? We are trying to do the best we can. We are trying to hand out our money to the people who need it most, and if we had more money we would lend it to people in higher income brackets. Let us not be fainthearted. The approved lenders who did not have this matter to consider until the spring are now getting back into the market. For our part we are going to lend every cent we have to those people with incomes of $5,000 or less, and before the end of the year hon. members may be better pleased than they are at the present time. I can also predict that the construction figures in which we are all so vitally interested will be as high, if not higher than in any other commensurable year with respect to everything else except housing, and that will take up some of the slack which the slight falling off in housing may cause.

Mr. Godin: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question? In stating that he would like to be fair, has the minister given any consideration to establishing a scale for maximum earnings which would vary according to areas and in that way be definitely fair?

Mr. Walker: That is a very good suggestion. There is a very great variation, particularly in the Nickel Belt where they get such big bonuses. We would like to help them there, and we are saying to the approved lenders: it is your duty to lend up there; you cannot lose; these are wonderful people; you get 6¾ per cent on the aggregate loan; it is a sure thing. We anticipate that the approved lenders will do business in the hon. member's area and make more loans. At the present time while we have this policy we are bound to take care of the people whose income is $5,000 or less. Does that answer the question?

Mr. Garland: Would the minister permit a further question? I was wondering on what basis he gives the house the figure of 85,000 starts outside N.H.A. lending. What figures has he to substantiate that estimate?

Mr. Walker: The figures we had last year, what we called conventional loans. Conventional loans are money that comes from all other sources—85,000—and we thought that will be reached again this year, particularly since the banks are out of the market. They made possible 15,000 starts at a reduced rate, and surely the conventional lenders at 7¼ per cent and so on will be able to take up a great deal of the bank slack. We might have more than 85,000, but I cannot anticipate that.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee, Mr. McGee in the chair.

The estimates of the following departments were first taken up and entered for consideration:

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

General administration—

164. Departmental administration, including a grant of $10,000 to Frontier College and the expenses of the international labour conferences, $1,118,255.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND TECHNICAL SURVEYS

Departmental administration—

187. Administration, operation and maintenance, $860,962.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

Customs and excise divisions—

258. General administration, $4,807,852.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the leader of the house what the business is to be tomorrow and the rest of the week?

Mr. Churchill: For tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, a continuation of the debate on second reading of Bill No. C-56, to amend the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act, followed by the budget resolutions, followed by the estimates of the Department of Agriculture, which will be called first on Friday.

Mr. Chevrier: Then, we will be on Bill No. C-56 tomorrow and Thursday unless it is completed, and then we will go on to the budget resolutions.

Mr. Churchill: That is right.

Mr. Winch: Can the house leader give us any information yet as to when the promised day is going to be forthcoming for a continuation of the debate on the abolition of capital punishment?

Mr. Churchill: I cannot give that date tonight, but I will as soon as a decision has been reached.

At 10.02 o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

D.B.S. LISTING OF RETAIL SALES, ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Question No. 307—Mr. McWilliam:

1. Does the dominion bureau of statistics list the Atlantic provinces separately in connection with estimates of retail sales for intercensal periods?
2. If not, does the department intend to list these provinces separately?

Answer by: Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce):

1 and 2. Yes. The dominion bureau of statistics publishes separate estimates of retail sales for each Atlantic province. Publication began for such separate estimates in 1957 on an annual basis. Publication of monthly estimates began in January 1960. Estimates are given for total retail sales and for retail trade groups where information can be released under the terms of the Statistics Act.

Answer by: Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence):

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, May 4, 1960

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. HOWARD—REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN OTTAWA "CITIZEN"

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to raise a question of privilege relating to an article in the Ottawa Citizen under date of May 3, and in the column entitled "Parliament" by Norman Campbell and Greg Connolley. One of the paragraphs relating to the question of divorce reads as follows:

Current C.C.F. blockade of divorce bills will continue perhaps for a while yet but the stalling of these bills will be called off before the session ends.

I should like to point out that this is not in accordance with the facts, Mr. Speaker.

STARRED QUESTIONS

D.E.W. LINE—HELICOPTER CONTRACTS

Question No. 133—Mr. Chevrier:

What aircraft companies had contracts to fly helicopters in connection with the construction and supply of the D.E.W. line?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): The contracts involved were either contracts with the United States military authorities or with contractors employed by the United States military authorities, and were not Canadian government contracts. However, it is my understanding that both Kenting Helicopters and Okanagan Helicopters were employed in this connection.

AUTAIR HELICOPTER SERVICES—FINANCIAL RESPONSIBILITY

Question No. 134—Mr. Chevrier:

Is Autair Helicopter Services Limited flying aircraft without having filed proof of financial responsibility with the air transport board?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): On April 13 the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) directed a specific inquiry to me regarding the subject matter of this question. I dealt with the matter fully, and as the hon. member for Laurier was in the house at the time I can only assume the particular question and answer have slipped his memory. Accordingly I would refer him to page 3199 of Hansard of the above date.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

DISALLOWANCE OF LABOUR LEGISLATION, NFLD.

Motion No. 93—Mr. Winch:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged, during the past 12 months, between the federal government, or any agency or branch thereof, and the province of Newfoundland, dealing with disallowance or otherwise of labour legislation passed by the legislature of Newfoundland; together with any order in council disposing of the matter, and a copy of any report by the Minister of Justice on which such order was based.

He said: This motion has been reworded in accordance with your request, Mr. Speaker, as a result of our discussion the other day.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Yes. This motion is acceptable, subject to the usual understanding that the government of the province of Newfoundland be approached in order to see whether they have any objection to tabling the intergovernmental correspondence.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the limitation expressed by the minister, is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

SECTION 64, INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS AND DISPUTES INVESTIGATION ACT

Motion No. 95—Mr. Howard:

For a copy of all orders in council made since January 1, 1950, which altered the remuneration payable under section 64 of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): This motion is acceptable, Mr. Speaker.

Motion agreed to.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

REPORTED STATEMENTS ON APARTHEID BY PRIME MINISTER AND SOUTH AFRICAN REPRESENTATIVE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask a question of the Acting Prime Minister. I am sorry I was not able to give him notice of this question, information concerning which came to my attention just at one o'clock. I should like to ask whether he can resolve the apparent contradiction between the statement attributed to the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) in London that he had made clear yesterday to Mr. Louw, the South African representative at the conference, the views of Canada with regard to apartheid, and the statement attributed to Mr. Louw today in reply to a question at a press conference that he did not hear the Canadian views from the Canadian Prime Minister.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Acting Prime Minister): I am not aware of the press statement attributed to Mr. Louw, but I shall be glad to make inquiries with regard to it. If the Prime Minister was correctly reported I am perfectly sure his statement is incontestable.

Mr. Robichaud: It depends on what minister it is.

ATOMIC ENERGY

NUCLEAR TESTS—REPORTED AGREEMENT RESPECTING UNDERGROUND EXPLOSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I wish to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister or perhaps more appropriately to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the minister anything to report or any comment to make on the extremely hopeful report from Geneva that Russia agreed today to participate with Britain and the United States in a strictly limited number of joint underground nuclear tests in order to perfect a system for detecting such explosions?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): I do not think there is any comment I can make at this time except to say that we are encouraged by the reports that have been received. If after studying the context of the communiques I find that there appears to be anything further I should convey to the house, I shall be glad to do it.

ROYAL CANADIAN NAVY

CONGRATULATIONS ON FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. L. Morris (Halifax): In the absence from the chamber of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes) and the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sevigny), may I ask the parliamentary secretary whether, on the 50th anniversary today of the establishment of the Royal Canadian Navy, he has a message of congratulation for the gallant men and ships of the fleet?

Mr. Egan Chambers (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence): The minister is attending ceremonies on the west coast in connection with this anniversary.

Fifty years ago today royal assent was given to the naval service bill after one of the more memorable debates in the history of this house. This was one more step in Canada's emergence as an independent nation ready to take her share of the responsibilities that devolve upon nations. Canadian seamen and Canadian ships fought gallantly in two world wars and in Korea. Today the Royal Canadian Navy, with a strength of 20,000 men and women and 62 warships, is stronger than ever before in peacetime. This strength is employed today, as it always has been, in the preservation of peace and freedom.

Mr. Speaker, I know that hon. members would like to join me in paying tribute to the officers and men of today's Royal Canadian Navy, and to those who have gone before them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR OPENING OF TOURIST OFFICE IN SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. This question I raise is important to the tourist council of British Columbia, chambers of commerce and others because of the nearness of summer.

In view of the need for the widest possible dissemination of information in the United States with respect to the recreational opportunities provided in Canada for tourists, and in view of the representations made to the minister by the British Columbia tourist council urging the establishment of a Canadian government tourist office in San Francisco, would the minister inform the house whether it is the government's intention to establish a Canadian government tourist office in San Francisco?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and Natural Resources): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. At the present time there are government tourist offices in the cities of Chicago and New York. The proposal to set up an office in San Francisco was made in the standing committee on mines, forests and waters of last year, along with recommendations for facilities in three other cities. The government looked at all these recommendations and did accept the proposition that increased efforts had to be made to attract tourists from the United States into Canada, and therefore increased the amount of money available to this branch of the department.

But in the priorities we had to work out, the best method of getting more for our money was the test. We decided it should be through direct advertising so as to have an impact effect on the United States markets. In the efforts to get at certain other sections of the market we had to decide that San Francisco could not be provided with an office at this time. Therefore there will not be any office opened this year in San Francisco.

Mr. Howard: As a supplementary question, can I ask the minister whether it is not a fact that treasury board rejected this proposal?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The government had this matter under consideration, and treasury board is still part of the government.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

PUBLICITY RESPECTING STAMP COMMEMORATING BATTLE OF LONG SAULT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Augustin Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Parliamentary Assistant to the Postmaster General. In doing so I would like to ask him to take advantage of the simultaneous translation system.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, on May 19 the Postmaster General will issue a new stamp commemorating the 300th anniversary of the battle of Long Sault.

I should like to ask the postmaster general's parliamentary secretary why the publicity about this event was issued in English only.

I belong to no separatist movement in Quebec, or to any other lodge in this country, but I would like to know why that publicity was made in English only.

(Text):

Mr. E. L. Morris (Parliamentary Secretary to the Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware that any publicity has been issued in only one language. I shall therefore take the question as notice in connection with the Dollard des Ormeaux stamp and give an answer tomorrow.

TRANSPORT

D.E.W. LINE—ALLEGED CONTRADICTION IN STATEMENTS ON HELICOPTER SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. In the light of the answer the Minister of Transport has given today to question 133 in my name on the order paper, to the effect that the only Canadian companies which had helicopter work on the D.E.W. line were Spartan and Okanagan, I should like to ask the minister how he can reconcile that reply with the statement he made in the house to the effect that Autair Helicopter Services had had work on the D.E.W. line?

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): I must have been misinterpreted or misquoted. What I did want to say, declare or state was that the most important thing in operating a helicopter service was to have pilots who had experience in the north, and information which I had at that time, and which I still have, is that the pilots of Autair helicopters have full experience in D.E.W. line operation.

Mr. Chevrier: A supplementary question. Did not the minister actually state that they had had a contract for work on the D.E.W. line? Does the minister want to revise his statement in the light of the answer given by the Minister of Transport?

Mr. Comtois: I will have to look at the whole file and get the information.

Some hon. Members: Look at Hansard.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport, and ask him whether it is a fact that Autair Helicopter Services Limited have sold their company to another helicopter corporation?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I have no idea, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to ask a supplementary question. Will the minister inquire and tell the house the result of his inquiry?

Mr. Hees: I shall be very glad to do so. However, I am sure the hon. member knows all about it if a sale has been made. He is thrashing an old dead horse and trying to make an issue out of it.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

COLOMBO PLAN—REPORTED DELAY IN CONSTRUCTION OF INDIAN REACTOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to ask the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs—and may I express the pleasure of all the people of British Columbia that at long last the hon. gentleman's abilities have been recognized—the following question. In view of an article appearing in the magazine Modern Car Engineering and an article in the Ottawa Citizen of April 23 written by Mr. Lynch, would the minister inform the house whether it is a fact that we are two years behind in the construction of the atomic research reactor being provided to India under the Colombo plan because of the so-called bungling of Canadians? If so, can the minister explain the reason for being so far behind schedule?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): I thank the hon. gentleman for having given me notice of this question about alleged delays in the construction of the atomic research reactor being provided to India by Canada under the Colombo plan.

In view of recent reports in the daily press and elsewhere about this reactor, I wish to take this opportunity to assure the house that in so far as there have been any delays in relation to the original target date, which in the very nature of things could be no more than an estimate, these are in no way attributable to any bungling by either Canadian or Indian participants in this worth-while project. Any delays that were experienced—and these have long since been completely overcome—were due to the complex nature of the project and the unusual type of structure involved.

I might mention also that this project is now very close to completion and, in fact, the plant is expected to be activated within a matter of weeks. We have been assured by the Indian authorities that they are in all respects fully and completely satisfied with the co-operation they have received from Canada in connection with this project.

AGRICULTURE

MILK AND BUTTER—INQUIRY RESPECTING SUPPORT PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has the minister made any change in the method of paying the subsidy of 25 cents per hundredweight for milk to be used for industrial purposes?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker. I do not know to what the hon. member refers when he says "for industrial purposes". There is a subsidy of 25 cents a hundredweight on milk which goes into manufacture of any kind, whether cheese, butter or some other product.

[Mr. Regier.]

Mr. Boulanger: I should like to ask the minister if he can tell us at what price the stabilization board is going to purchase first grade butter, grade 39-92?

Mr. Harkness: I made an announcement in connection with the dairy support program some time ago, at which time I stated that butter, grade 40-93, would be purchased at the support price of 64 cents. I think we will be purchasing the next grading, which is 39-92, at 63 cents.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is that not in fact a drop of 1 cent a pound in the floor price on butter graded at 39-92?

Mr. Harkness: As far as the purchase of butter is concerned, we are following the principle of paying the highest price for the highest quality product the same system that prevails so far as all other products are concerned.

Mr. Argue: As a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I remind hon. members who are so interested in butter that the agricultural estimates are the next to be considered and it seems to me that would be an appropriate time to argue the question.

Mr. Argue: No argument; I just wanted the minister to admit that he had lowered the price.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

CORRECTION OF STATEMENT RESPECTING AUTHORIZATION OF LOANS TO FUND

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Essex East asked me several questions concerning advances to the unemployment insurance commission, precisely, "loans by any agency of the government of Canada or otherwise to the unemployment insurance commission". I gave information about the position in the fiscal year 1958-59. I gave the position at the close of the fiscal year 1959-60 as well. But I went further and erred in saying there is no such indebtedness at the present time, and for this I wish to express my regret.

I find on inquiry that since the close of the fiscal year—indeed, in the past fortnight—there have been three loans extended to the commission, aggregating $19 million. The particulars are as follows: April 19, $4 million; April 25, $12 million; April 29, $3 million. These were made in accordance with authority contained in order in council P.C. 1960-70 dated January 19, 1960.

The hon. member went on then to ask whether any recommendation was on my desk from the investment committee suggesting that such a loan should be extended by the Bank of Canada to the unemployment insurance commission. Here I think the hon. member's intelligence system in the unemployment insurance commission got a little ahead of itself. I am told that not yesterday but today a requisition arrived on the desk of the—

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The Acting Prime Minister, whom I designated yesterday as the best Acting Prime Minister this country has ever had, obviously was not deserving of the tribute I paid to him because of the very grave mistake he made yesterday. The hon. gentleman said that I had some previous advice as to the situation from some outside source. That is a serious charge which I deny, and which I ask the Acting Prime Minister to withdraw at once if he wishes to deserve the designation that he is the best Acting Prime Minister we have had.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, you know how ardently I have studied to deserve some but by no means all of the epithets directed at me by the hon. member for Essex East. If he does not greatly mind I think I will continue to be discriminating in those I seek to deserve and those I may seek not to deserve.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will the hon. gentleman deal with the point I raised?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): However, I do not think I said what the hon. member has now attributed to me. What I indicated was that his intelligence system in this quarter had got a little ahead of itself. The hon. gentleman asked if I had received on my desk yesterday a certain recommendation. I was proceeding to say in amplification of the negative answer I gave to his question in that respect yesterday that there arrived this morning on the desk of the deputy minister of finance a requisition in connection with anticipated further loans that would be required by the commission during the month of May.

Perhaps I may offer this to him to be checked against his own sources of information in this respect. I may say the commission has indicated that it anticipates a need of further advances amounting to $19 million for the month of May, and it expects that by the month of June it will have reached the point again where receipts and disbursements will be in balance and no further loans or advances will be required.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Minister of Finance a further question, now that we have had an elucidation of facts which were denied this house yesterday because obviously the Minister of Finance did not have the information which under the act he must have.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I know hon. members do not like the fact that their Acting Prime Minister has been shown to be most careless.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will the Acting Prime Minister, or rather the Minister of Finance, advise the house whether he was aware before yesterday afternoon or this morning that loans in the amount of $19 million had been made to the unemployment insurance commission, and had he as Minister of Finance participated in the discussions leading to the authorization of such loans by the Bank of Canada?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman should not require to be told that if I had been aware of these specific loans my answer yesterday would have been in different form. The minister is required under the law to report to the house on loans outstanding at the close of the fiscal year. I drew attention yesterday to that fact and pointed out that the hon. member, if he would look at the budget speech, would find no loans outstanding.

He asks me about these specific loans. Obviously I was not aware yesterday afternoon of these specific advances but, in pursuance of the authority in the order in council to which I have already referred, I did authorize advances to be made on application. These had not been reported to me, the reason being the absence of the deputy minister of finance; otherwise they would have been brought to my attention. But the authority was there and had been given some time ago. If the hon. member is going to expect detailed answers of this kind from now on, I might as well tell him right now that he is going to have to put his questions on the order paper and then he will have his answers.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chevrier: A new Speaker.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member has a point of order or privilege or if he wishes to ask a question I will hear him, but otherwise there is no justification for further comment on the matter.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have a question, but before putting the question I wish to raise a question of privilege. The Minister of Finance has just been allowed to say, by way of a threat to me—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —that from now on he does not propose to give answers unless he is satisfied as to the circumstances and conditions under which the questions are put.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member has stated his question of privilege I have no difficulty in dealing with it, but if he is about to amplify it I will hear him.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have not stated it; you rose while I was stating it. The attitude taken by the Minister of Finance in saying that he does not propose to give answers is not one within his rights. Surely that is a matter for the Speaker to determine. It is a violation of the rights of parliament—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —to say, in the threatening way in which he did today, that he does not propose to give answers simply because yesterday and today he was caught off base.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): You got caught stealing a base.

Mr. Speaker: Order. No doubt feelings may be aroused by exchanges such as the one that has taken place, but it is the privilege of the minister who is asked a question at any time to take it as notice. Whether a warning in advance that he will take a certain kind of question as notice, which is what the hon. member complains of, is a breach of privilege is very doubtful. I really see no question of privilege.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Minister of Finance whether when he made his budget speech he was aware of the fact that he had authorized or was considering the authorization of loans to the unemployment insurance commission? If so, why was that information, in accordance with the standards he laid down yesterday, not contained in the budget speech? Why does he continue for a second time to violate the principles of budget making?

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, implicit in that question is a series of false statements.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There were no loans outstanding at the date of the budget, at the close of the fiscal year, and that fact was reported to the house.

Mr. Benidickson: Commitments?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There were no commitments. There was an authorization, but there was nothing outstanding.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is no reference in the provisions in relation to reports of this kind concerning authorizations by order in council. What is required to be reported consists of loans outstanding, and there were no loans outstanding. I do trust that the hon. member will be able to register that fact clearly and will not seek to clothe the facts with an aura of cloud and eyewash.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Minister of Finance whether it is not a fact that had it not been for this question the house would not have known about this $19 million in loans?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, that suggestion is utterly nonsensical. All that any member needs to do to obtain information at any time is to put a question on the order paper, and he can have the date of the advance and the date of repayment. We had all this last year. This matinee performance this afternoon will not carry any conviction to anyone who was in the house last year and who remembers the show then put on by the hon. member for Essex East.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You have been caught out very seriously.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I suggest to the Minister of Finance, to the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member whom I see rising to ask a supplementary question that this discussion is going far beyond what is proper.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege affecting all hon. members of the opposition. I quite agree with Your Honour that this matter has gone quite far beyond—

An hon. Member: Sit down then.

Mr. Pickersgill: —a question on the orders of the day. The Acting Prime Minister in reply to the question of the hon. member for Essex East, made a reference to the intelligence system of the hon. gentleman in the unemployment insurance commission, thus casting a slur upon every employee of the unemployment insurance commission. I suggest to you, sir, that it is thoroughly unbecoming conduct for a gentleman who very temporarily is Acting Prime Minister to cast such a reflection.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

An hon. Member: Can he not defend himself?

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me that the question of privilege, if there is one, relates to the duty of the house to protect the good name of the civil servants. It is not a question of any privilege of the house; it is a question of the propriety of discussing the conduct of civil servants. I am not sure exactly what is complained of, but if there are some words which the hon. member asserts go beyond what should be said about the civil service perhaps he would so indicate.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, I think there are, sir. What I was complaining about was the insinuation made by the Acting Prime Minister that questions properly asked of the government at this time were not asked in good faith by the hon. members concerned. It seems to me that is casting a reflection, and if the Acting Prime Minister cannot substantiate it he should apologize.

Mr. Speaker: I have heard all the discussion, of course, and I did not hear anything which was a reflection on the good faith of any member of the house in connection with any question he asked. In respect to the alleged insinuation about the civil service, if the Minister of Finance wishes to say anything about what he had in mind, what he was intending to say, I would be glad if he would clear up that point.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On the point just now raised by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, it is obvious that he quite misapprehended what has been said by me. I did not suggest for one minute that the hon. member for Essex East did not ask his questions in good faith. I intimated, however, that I thought he had based his question on premature intelligence.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I rise again on a question of privilege. I would ask Your Honour to regard carefully the attempt by the Minister of Finance to violate the rules of this house and your own direction. I stated that my question was not based on any information that had been handed to me by anyone in the public service. The Minister of Finance now proceeds to repeat that that was the case. I have denied it, and under the rules of this house the Minister of Finance must accept my statement unreservedly. I submit to you, with great respect and confidence, that the minister ought to be asked to take this position forthwith.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Perhaps the matter might be disposed of in this way on the question of privilege. The Minister of Finance has made it clear that he felt the hon. member for Essex East had based his question on premature intelligence. The hon. member objects to that. Perhaps the matter could be therefore disposed of if the Minister of Finance were to modify his statement to say the question was based on immature intelligence.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sure every member of the house, including the Minister of Finance, will accept the statement the hon. member for Essex East made earlier, and which he has just now repeated. As to the reflections on the civil service, they are of such a vague and inferential character that I think the matter might well be disposed of.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No; I ask you to ask the Minister of Finance to withdraw that statement.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has asked for a withdrawal, but I assume that the Minister of Finance accepts his statement. If the minister wishes him to affirm it I will ask him to do so.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I accept unreservedly those portions of the statement made by the hon. gentleman in which he has disclaimed intelligence from someone in relation to the questions. I made no reference to anything but the source of his intelligence in relation to the receipt in my office of a recommendation from the investment committee. I think I have made my position quite clear in that respect.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I regret to say that is not satisfactory.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. gentleman is now saying that with regard to the question put to him yesterday as to whether or not there was information in his office involving the recommendation for a loan—I say that question was put by me without any suggestion from anyone inside or outside of the public service—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —and the hon. gentleman has left another impression which he should be asked to withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member asserts that he had no information from a civil service source, from which it may be implied he got information, then I am sure the Minister of Finance will accept that statement. I would ask him to do so. In doing so, however, I have this difficulty, that I have not been as sure as the hon. member for Essex East that there was that imputation.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not propose, unless you ask me to do so, to let this matter rest. It is a serious matter.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Minister of Finance must not be allowed to take this matter as a laughing matter, because it is not. He ought to be asked to withdraw that imputation unreservedly and without hesitation.

Mr. Speaker: I think perhaps we are making a great deal out of this unnecessarily. I do, though, appreciate the susceptibilities of the hon. member for Essex East, when he wishes to be cleared of the imputation he has taken, and I hope the Minister of Finance will clear him of that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have cleared him of many things, Mr. Speaker, and sometimes also of pompousness.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Can the minister say when he expects that these loans will be repaid?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): During the course of the following months, I pointed out, it is expected that receipts and disbursements will come into balance, and repayment would follow when receipts, during the summer months, normally exceed disbursements.

Mr. Hellyer: May I ask a supplementary question. Is this principle of financing by loans rather than requiring the unemployment insurance commission to sell its securities a part of the government's fiscal and monetary policy?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We were over this at some considerable length in the debates last session, as you will recall, sir. I may point out that the commission, exercising the rights conferred upon it by statute, has sold certain of its security holdings and has also applied to the Minister of Finance for loans, which were authorized in accordance with the terms of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Mr. Hellyer: These were authorized without your knowledge?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not at all; these were authorized by the governor in council on the recommendation of the minister.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Might I ask the minister if he would inform us as to the rate of interest the government of Canada charges the unemployment insurance commission on these loans, and also the rate of interest the government of Canada pays to the unemployment insurance commission on its investments in the securities of the government of Canada?

Mr. Speaker: This matter has been pursued at great length, and the search for statistical information might very properly be made through the order paper. Then we might proceed to the next order of business.

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): May I direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the fact that in the last three years the unemployment insurance fund has declined from $917 million to $359 million at the end of March, and probably will be $300 million at the end of this year, can the minister inform the house if he intends to introduce legislation during the present session to protect this fund?

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, but I cannot recognize any further supplementaries on this subject. It has been debated at inordinate length, and if hon. members wish to further debate this matter they will have to do so at the proper time.

Mr. Robichaud: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Robichaud: I rise on a point of order as is my right as a member of parliament.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Robichaud: My question was not a supplementary question. It had nothing to do with the loan, but it had to do with the fund. I was asking the Minister of Labour whether he intends to introduce legislation during the present session to protect this fund, which is facing depletion.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): No, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the Minister of Finance if he will table the orders in council for the present financial year authorizing loans to the unemployment insurance commission?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There are none for the present fiscal year.

Mr. Pearson: I have a supplementary question. Will the minister table the orders in council authorizing the loans about which he has given information to the house today?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Certainly.

INQUIRY AS TO EXTENSION OF SEASONAL BENEFITS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. I understand that last week the minister had a meeting with representatives of the British Columbia federation of labour. As a result of discussion of the situation in British Columbia, may I ask whether it is his intention to introduce any changes in order to continue seasonal benefits after May 15?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): I had the pleasure of meeting the representatives of the British Columbia federation of labour in Montreal during the Canadian Labour Congress convention. I must say I met with them for nearly an hour, and I was impressed with the moderation of their approach and the understanding and appreciation they showed of the federal government's position in these matters. However, it is not the government's intention to extend the seasonal benefits at this time.

Mr. Winch: I have a supplementary question to ask. In view of the minister's statement, may I ask him what the unemployed in British Columbia are supposed to do after May 15?

An hon. Member: You asked that the other day.

Mr. Winch: And I did not get any answer. Can I get one now?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member cannot expect on the orders of the day an answer to such a broad question.

Mr. Winch: This is a matter of great concern. Within 12 days the seasonal benefits end. Is this not a matter of importance on the orders of the day?

Mr. Speaker: I am not suggesting it is not a matter of importance. If the minister feels he can answer it I will allow him to do so. I would remind the hon. member that we have debated the employment question for at least ten days during this session.

Mr. Starr: Seasonal benefits were in effect at all times, up until the fall of 1957, from January 1 to April 15. This government took action to extend those seasonal benefits from December 1 to May 15. In those days when seasonal benefits ended on May 15 there was never any prolongation, and the situation was exactly the same as it is now affecting seasonal employment.

Mr. Benidickson: Unemployment was never like this.

[Later:]

Mr. Winch: I should like to direct another question to the Minister of Labour; I do so in view of the fact that seasonal benefits end on May 15. Will the minister file with this house a copy of any contractual arrangement between the federal government and British Columbia on the payment of assistance for the employable unemployed, and any regulations with regard thereto?

Mr. Starr: That matter does not come within my department, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Winch: I thought it did come within the minister's department. May I ask that this question be referred to whichever department it comes under?

Mr. Speaker: May I suggest that there is a procedure for securing the production of documents which would be more appropriate than asking questions on orders of the day.

Mr. Winch: I do so because of the fact that the seasonal benefits end within 12 days. If it is not the responsibility of the Minister of Labour, I would ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether that document will be filed.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I did not quite get the implication of the question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I think the question might properly be put on the order paper, or be made a motion for the production of papers.

IMMIGRATION

STATEMENT AS TO POLICY RESPECTING FARM WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): May I reply to a question which was asked yesterday by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Badanai). First of all, I may say that the policy referred to as the new policy is not new; it has been in effect for several years now. As a matter of fact this is the third season during which farmers' sons from Holland will come to Canada to accept employment on farms here for the farming season. It will be the first year for farmers' sons from Belgium. We expect there will be some sort of arrangement for France, but it has not yet been completed. Any similar proposal which is formally presented to my department will be given full consideration.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

INQUIRY AS TO CONTRACTS WITH PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Is the minister considering a request of several provinces that greater guarantees be put into R.C.M.P. contracts to ensure that R.C.M.P. reinforcements are dispatched into a province when that province says it has an emergency?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): The minister has had no such request from several provinces or I should say I have had no such request from several provinces as was inaccurately alleged by the hon. member, and am therefore not considering a request because I have not received one.

Mr. Fisher: I was not alleging anything. I just asked a question. The minister has considerable crust to accuse—

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is a certain amount of touchiness on both sides of the house today. I suggest that when an hon. member frames a question which implies a set of facts, he takes responsibility for asserting that set of facts.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I ask the minister a supplementary question. Is the minister or are his officials conferring at the present time with representatives of the provinces that have contracts with the R.C.M.P.? If so, are all the provinces represented?

Mr. Fulton: The answer to both parts of the question is yes.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REQUEST FOR COMMENT ON REPORTED REMARKS OF PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonvista-Twillingate): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. May I ask the hon. lady whether her attention has been drawn to a statement the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) is supposed to have made or is reported to have made before the Canadian chamber of commerce in London that this year we shall be able to welcome and absorb into employment many tens of thousands of immigrants. If the hon. lady agrees with that view, will she consider making public the occupations in which these immigrants could be absorbed, so that Canadians may also have an opportunity of seeking that employment?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I believe that last year I sent to the hon. member a copy of papers from my department which listed employment opportunities in all sections of Canada. I shall be glad to make the same information available to him this year.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to ask a supplementary question. Will the hon. lady put that information in simple, straightforward form so that the kind of persons who are seeking employment in this country—of whom there are hundreds of thousands—can understand it readily?

Mrs. Fairclough: The information is, of course, of a very voluminous nature. The implication my hon. friend has left is that it is not easily absorbed, but after all, he is a very literate person, and I would think that he would be able to digest it.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the hon. lady did not quite understand my question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think everybody understood the hon. member's question. I suggest that he take a leaf out of the book of the hon. member for Halifax and not only ask the question but give the answer.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would be very happy to do that. I suggest that the hon. lady prepare a list of the occupations and the places where there were employment opportunities available—

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Mr. Pickersgill: —in a simple form which those seeking employment could understand.

Mr. Speaker: Does the Minister of Justice have a point of order?

An hon. Member: Not now.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

EXPROPRIATION ACT—INQUIRY AS TO REVISION THIS SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. T. Richard (Ottawa East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice. Does the minister intend to introduce a bill this session to revise the Expropriation Act?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, no final decision has been reached on that point.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I ask the Minister of Justice whether he agrees with the view expressed by his colleague the Solicitor General, that any law passed by this parliament which is not acceptable to all the provinces is unconstitutional?

Mr. Fulton: I am not aware of the basis of the assertion made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate—

Mr. Chevrier: Read Hansard.

Mr. Fulton: —and therefore I have no answer to give to that question.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL TAX-SHARING ARRANGEMENTS ACT

ALTERNATIVE ARRANGEMENTS FOR UNIVERSITY GRANTS—EXTENSION OF INDIVIDUAL INCOME TAX RATE

The house resumed, from Tuesday, April 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) for the second reading of Bill No. C-56, to amend the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act.

Mr. Speaker: In recognizing the hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Roberge), I should advise him that according to our records he has but one minute remaining.

(Translation):

Mr. Gabriel Roberge (Megantic): When we adjourned on April 26 last, I was saying that the Liberal formula for university grants was perfectly in accord with the constitution. However, a group of Quebec Conservatives and the Solicitor General (Mr. Balcer) were holding to the view that the Liberal formula was anti-constitutional.

Now, under this bill that system of distribution remains the same because nine provinces are said to find it satisfactory. But it has been said that the province of Quebec considers it contrary to the constitution.

Mr. Speaker, there is only one British North America Act and one constitution for the whole country.

How could the St. Laurent formula be in accord with the B.N.A. Act in nine provinces and not so in one of them? And how can the Conservatives, without being inconsistent themselves, support a bill which preserves that formula?

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

(Translation):

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, on April 13, 1959, and on April 1, 1960, I had the opportunity to express my views in this house on the exclusive rights of the provinces in the matter of education.

Today, I should like to add a few remarks to express the satisfaction felt by the people of Sherbrooke over that new method of financing Canadian universities, and to say a word too about the contradictory and opportunist attitude of the Liberals with regard to this matter. Finally, I will admit that Bill C-56 constitutes an important step towards the gradual return to the provinces of their taxation powers, which will allow them, after having been placed under an economic trusteeship under the Liberal regime, to gradually recover, under the Conservative administration, their constitutional majority and responsibility.

Mr. Speaker, the people of Sherbrooke, the electors, both men and women, whom I represent, the population of the eastern townships or Estrie, are particularly interested in that part of the project which regards the financing of universities.

You are no doubt aware that, since 1954, Sherbrooke has its own university which is an addition to the other Quebec universities, Laval, Montreal, McGill, Bishop, Sir George Williams.

In fact, on January 12, 1954, a bill for the establishment and recognition of the University of Sherbrooke was put on the order paper of the Quebec legislative assembly.

Two weeks later, the same month, the bill was unanimously adopted by the Quebec legislative assembly.

On March 5, 1954, the lieutenant governor of the province of Quebec signed the act, and on November 21, 1957, a Roman decree set up, under canon law, the Catholic University of Sherbrooke.

May I, Mr. Speaker, rapidly mention the names of a few pioneers and founders of that new Canadian university.

There are, first of all, His Excellency Msgr. Georges Cabana, and Msgrs. Maurice Vincent, Irenee Pinard, Napoleon Pepin, Maurice O'Bready; Canons Damien Lessard and Roger Maltais, and the Rev. Fathers Romeo Leroux, Arthur Audet and Paul-Emile D'Arcy.

As to the laymen, I might refer to the Hon. Johnny Bourque, minister of finance of the province of Quebec, who, in 1954, promoted the bill in favour of the Sherbrooke university, Albert LeBlanc, Q.C., bâtonnier of the Quebec bar, Mr. Armand Crepeau, who infused into the faculty of science all his devotion and efficiency, and who died in harness last year.

There were also Messrs. Jacques Lemieux and Gaetan Cote, Charles-Emile Belanger, Paul Desruisseaux, Q.C., president of La Tribune Ltd., Dr. Rosario Cousineau, and many other citizens of Sherbrooke and vicinity.

At present the new university has four faculties: law, commerce, science and arts. On December 1, 1959, 3,719 men and women students were registered at Sherbrooke university. That is to say, Mr. Speaker, that the people of Sherbrooke and the eastern townships are considerably interested in this legislation because it provides new methods of financing Canadian universities.

When the resolution introduced on April 1 last was discussed, and the debate on second reading of the bill started in this house on April 26, I was astounded by the contradictory and opportunist attitude of the Liberals. Those very people who had built up the pyre to burn provincial rights rose in this house and tried to put out the flames they had fanned. They launched superficially sincere protests. In so short a period, that is since June 10, 1957, we shall have heard the opposition break into the most contradictory songs and intone the most discordant choruses.

Why, Mr. Speaker, does the situation in the educational field, and in others, now reveal itself to be and remain so complicated and difficult to solve? The answer is easy. It is because the Liberals, when they were in power, administered this country, especially since the last world war, in a halting, anti-constitutional and exaggeratedly centralizing way.

What exactly has happened during the last 16 years of Liberal rule? At the start of the last world war, the Liberal minister of finance, Mr. Ilsley, asked the provinces to lease to Ottawa, for war purposes, powers and fields of taxation so that Canada might meet new and urgent needs in the world conflict. Promise was then made to the provinces that those provincial taxes would be handed back to them after the war.

We only have to refer to a resolution on page 1523 of Hansard of 1942 to get the terms of those requirements and promises.

[Mr. Allard.]

An hon. Member: Of what year?

Mr. Allard: 1942.

That motion was as follows:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize the governor in council to enter into agreements with the provinces respecting the vacation by them of the personal income and corporation tax fields for the duration of the war and to provide compensation therefor, and fiscal need subsidies in the case of certain provinces, annually during the term of the agreement.

But after 1945, contrary to their promise, the Liberals maintained their control over immense sources of income, thus centralizing in Ottawa provincial powers and taxes. In 1956, while they were still in office, the Liberals, through their policy, had managed to centralize in Ottawa 77 per cent of all Canadian taxes, while in 1939, they were getting but 42.2 per cent.

Thus they gradually starved out the provinces and set up that Liberal policy of "Believe or die"; "Give in or die".

Such offhand manner on the part of the Liberals plunged the whole country into deep concern, to such an extent that some sincere and patriotic Liberals denounced their own party. Hon. members should recall part of a statement made in 1952, here in Ottawa, in the other place, by the hon. Liberal Senator Jacob Nicol, as recorded on page 527 of the debates of the Senate:

> If you borrow a thing and keep it permanently, it is not borrowing it is stealing; and the right of taxation is being stolen from the provinces.

If I were allowed to address myself directly to the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) who used to live in the province of Ontario, I would tell him: "You were a member of the Liberal administration which stole the rights of the provinces in general and the rights of the province of Quebec in particular." And still today, Mr. Speaker, if the former member for Montmagny-L'Islet, the Hon. Jean Lesage, had not left his federal seat to roam about temporarily in the province of Quebec, if he were here in the house, I would tell him: "While you were in Ottawa, while you were a member of the Liberal administration, you co-operated with that Liberal administration which stole the rights of the provinces in general and those of the province of Quebec in particular".

In order to spend the amounts of money which they had secured, and with which they did not want to part, the Liberals interfered in provincial fields such as education which, under section 93 of the Canadian constitution, belongs exclusively to the provinces.

By short changing the provinces, the Liberal party had also short changed the universities. All they could do was either accept grants from Ottawa or else go bankrupt. In 1951 all Canadian universities fell for it and were financially compelled to accept Liberal grants. But from 1952 on, Quebec universities became wise to the fact that the Liberals were out to sacrifice the higher principle of exclusive provincial jurisdiction in the field of education and turned down those grants.

That is how the Liberal party, while preaching national unity, introduced legislation aimed at short changing the provinces, at creating differences among them and at confusing Canadian opinion on many issues.

And the same Liberal supporters, now very few in Ottawa and fighting a losing battle in Quebec with Mr. Jean Lesage, would have the present Conservative government solve, within a few short years, the complicated problems created by their own party.

That is indeed a contradictory attitude, lacking in consistency and in sincerity of intentions.

If the Liberals are to vote against Bill C-56 because some of its provisions are allegedly unconstitutional, how can they reconcile their attitude with their dictatorial interference in the field of education when they were in power in 1951 and later on? If, on the other hand, they support the bill, they will be admitting that it is an improvement on their too rigid administration.

Personally I will support the bill, but with certain reservations.

As I said earlier, the alternative formula implied in this bill with regard to grants to universities is an important step toward the gradual return to the provinces of their fields of taxation and of the possibility of application of their constitutional responsibilities. From now on, the provinces, and particularly Quebec, will be able to recover additional revenues and make direct grants to their own universities.

Of course, the bill still includes some restrictions. But we are under the impression that the tide has turned and that, in coming years, this government will make the adjustments which will enable the provinces that wish to do so, to exercise their exclusive jurisdiction in the field of education and grants to education.

Bill C-56 also offers a quite comforting novelty to those who believe that the Canadian constitution still has meaning, for it suggests to legislators that they make basic adjustments in the fiscal agreements system and prevent the central government from interfering further in the financing of education at all levels.

However, I will have a request to make to the Minister of Finance when this bill is taken up in committee of the whole. But could the minister consider right now the possibility of amending section 9A (b) (ii) by replacing the expression:

—satisfactory arrangements exist in the opinion of the minister—

by the following expression:

—satisfactory arrangements, at the knowledge of the minister.

It is true that the act on which this bill is based already gives the Minister of Finance exorbitant powers. Nevertheless it is distasteful that the federal minister should act as arbitrator and be the only one to have a say on the value of the said agreements.

I understand that the minister finds himself in a difficult position because he has to deal with a matter that has been complicated by the Liberals and imbued with their centralizing spirit. That is why we are building high hopes on the forthcoming federal-provincial conference next summer, and on the new legislation that will be passed when the agreements come to an end in 1962.

In conclusion, I shall again state the views I expressed several times in this house and more particularly on April 13, 1959.

There is no doubt that the Canadian economy has developed to a great extent since 1867. We now have a federal government and ten provincial governments.

Almost every one of those governments has the feeling of being sort of strait-jacketed by the vagueness of certain sections of the Canadian constitution whenever they attempt to proceed in various economic areas.

It is then my humble opinion that in order to allow all Canadians to take advantage clearly of our economic development in 1960 and thereafter, the constitution should be amended, with the agreement of all parties interested, in so far as our material problems are concerned.

To amend should here be understood as meaning to elucidate, to particularize, to clearly determine and to adjust to current needs and economic conditions. That should not entail any surrendering or forsaking of rights. One only has to think of the regulations governing the hospitalization insurance scheme or the trans-Canada highway.

But our constitution is quite clear in one respect, that of education which has been left entirely to the provinces under section 93 of the British North America Act.

Let the central government mind its own business and leave the provinces to their responsibilities. Let us not try to control everything here.

We have enough problems to solve, at both the national and international levels, to keep us busy all the time. Need I say, incidentally, that a very important Canadian industry which exists in my area, the textile industry, for example, faces many difficulties on account of the tide of foreign importations. American industries sold 6 million yards of cotton goods more than did Canadian industries on our own market in 1959. During that year—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Allard: —imports of Japanese textiles went up 56 per cent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Allard: Well, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I call the hon. member's attention to the fact that this bill has nothing to do with the textile industry?

Mr. Allard: Mr. Speaker, my sole reason for referring to that industry was to dispel some of the chronic confusion of opposition members. In closing, I was pointing out that here in Ottawa there are many problems, both national and international, that ought to be solved, and that is one of those we should solve by strong and vigorous action.

If we only stick to our own responsibilities, national understanding will be increased and all areas in Canada will be blessed with a balanced progress.

Mr. Augustin Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, may I first thank my hon. colleague from Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Johnson) who, for once, appears to be of a sensible disposition, that is to say in favour of common sense.

Mr. Johnson: I get a kick out of listening to you.

Mr. Tremblay: He was looking at me when he said that.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): As I rise to speak on this bill, Mr. Speaker, I need not go into details about the background of the legislation that brought about grants to universities. Like all my colleagues and the other members, I listened to the very plain, accurate and sensible speech delivered by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier).

Mr. Johnson: May I refrain from demonstrating this time?

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): There is no possible doubt, Mr. Speaker, that the Liberal party was and still is in favour of assistance to universities in this country.

It is important that this be very clear in the minds of all members of this house.

I need not insist on the reasons since we have the Statutes of Canada to prove it. Was it not the Hon. Mr. St. Laurent who introduced both the legislation and the formula allowing the payment of grants to universities through the Canadian conference of universities?

Furthermore, I need not praise the Canadian system of higher education. However, I would like to say that Canadian universities train those who will be called upon to play a leading part in the national field. Our universities also have to train our representatives abroad, the officers of our three armed services, our research scientists, etc.

In all sectors of our national economy, university graduates often exert their influence outside the province in which they have pursued their studies. Graduates from Quebec as well as from Ontario, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and the other provinces are to be found everywhere in our country and abroad. The part universities play, in our country as well as in the other countries, is of national importance. It is therefore essential that professors should receive the salary they deserve in view of the position which is theirs in the education and training of Canadian youth.

The formula submitted to Canadian parliament by the Right Hon. Mr. St. Laurent constituted only an assistance to our universities without necessarily implying control in the fields of education and administration of our universities.

The Canadian conference of universities—its name has changed since—is composed of representatives of all universities in our country, and if the Quebec government saw fit, during the fiscal year 1951-52, to accept university grants, it was one of the best proofs that those grants did not mean that federal authorities had control over the curricula or the administration of our institutions of higher learning. In proof of this, I shall quote a statement by Mr. Duplessis himself, which was published in Le Devoir of November 22, 1952:

Mr. Duplessis stated at that time that the government had taken all steps necessary to insure that provincial autonomy be respected in this matter.

He was referring at the time to the agreement between the Quebec government and the federal government with respect to federal grants to universities for the fiscal year 1951-1952.

Here is the rest of the quotation.

He did not say exactly how—

That is, he did not say exactly how autonomy had been respected but he stated—

Mr. Tremblay: Why did he reject them later on?

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe):

—but he stated that in the fiscal year during which federal grants to universities had been accepted:

let provincial autonomy be respected—

Mr. Tremblay: Why did he reject them later on?

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): You know as well as I do that it is because at various periods in our history, we have had elections.

Mr. Tremblay: Answer my question.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I would not want to make a political speech, but if the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Tremblay) keeps on asking me questions, I will be compelled to meet him on his own ground which is not higher than himself.

The federal grants to universities were decided upon—

Mr. Tremblay: You do not recall Union Nationale.

Mr. Johnson: May I—

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, may I have the floor?

The hon. members for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Johnson) and for Roberval (Mr. Tremblay) will have the opportunity—I hope they will take advantage of it—to state their views when I have concluded my remarks.

Mr. Speaker, the Massey commission was appointed by the St. Laurent government to examine the development of sciences, arts and letters in this country. Representatives from all Canadian universities were called upon by the commission to present briefs and express their ideas on federal aid to universities.

At one point some words spoken by His Excellency, Msgr. Ferdinand Vandry, rector of Laval University, were mentioned in this house. In turn, I would like to repeat here what His Excellency Msgr. Ferdinand Vandry, rector of Laval University told the Massey commission when it sat in Quebec. I shall quote the very words of the Laval University brief and of Msgr. Vandry himself:

French universities in the province of Quebec certainly need financial help from the federal and provincial governments, to develop, as it would be appropriate, the teaching of sciences, arts and letters.

McGill University—just to mention another university in our province—presented on November 4, 1953 a brief to the Tremblay commission, and I would like to quote one paragraph which refers to the constitutional nature of federal grants to universities. I quote:

There is no proof whatsoever that federal university grants are, in any way, encroaching on the autonomy where those universities are located—

Mr. Tremblay: That proves nothing.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): I hope that the paragraphs—

Mr. Tremblay: That is no proof at all.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I hope that Msgr. Vandry's words do prove something.

Mr. Tremblay: Msgr. Vandry made another statement.

Mr. J. A. Habel (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I call upon your good sense to calm these people.

Mr. Habel: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I deem it my duty to draw your attention to the fact that the interruptions of the hon. member for Roberval reveal that if great men did come out of our universities, there came out also learned idiots.

Mr. Maurice Johnson (Chambly-Rouville): Mr. Speaker, on the point of order—

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word about the point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I do not think it is necessary to carry on this discussion any further, because the point of order raised by the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Habel) is irregular. He simply took the opportunity to make a remark.

I thought he would raise the matter of interruptions in his point of order. The rules of the house provide that hon. members may not interrupt the one who has the floor, and may ask him questions only after having asked him permission and having obtained it.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I should like to go on with my remarks about the point of order raised by the hon. member for Cochrane, or if you are of the opinion that the point of order is irregular, I should like to raise a point of order myself, to draw your attention to the fact that during the debate on the resolution which preceded this bill we have seen the same attitude, about the interruptions, on the part of the Conservative members from the province of Quebec who, apparently, do not like what we, on this side of the house, say.

I believe, as you said earlier, that if the hon. members have some questions to ask, they should first ask permission to the member who has the floor; otherwise, they should cease their interruptions because we will adopt the same attitude when they speak. I am sure that you will readily see the merits of the point of order, because if this practice goes on, there will not be in the continuation of this debate the order and discipline that, I am sure, you would wish to have.

Mr. Johnson: Mr. Speaker, on the matter of the point of order—

Mr. J. N. Tremblay (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I merely wish to point out that the remarks that have been made during the speech of the hon. member for Lapointe were not political at all. They are familiar interruptions which are merely aimed at pointing out certain deficiencies in his speech. And the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) has, as usual, taken advantage of it to play mean politics.

Mr. Johnson: Mr. Speaker, perhaps we might solve this difficulty if the hon. member for Lapointe would agree to answer our questions or to give us the exact references when he quotes, for instance, Msgr. Vandry or the rector of McGill University.

The only interruptions I made during the speech of the hon. member for Lapointe were meant as approvals because I am always pleased to hear him—

Mr. Tremblay: So am I.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Johnson: I am always pleased to hear him and listen to him. However, I have decided to withdraw my approvals when he wanted to pay undeserved compliments to the hon. member for Laurier.

If the hon. member for Lapointe would only agree to give us the correct references, I am sure the interruptions would cease.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Chambly-Rouville has raised another point of order, but I can only take up one at a time. However, I do not think I need repeat what I said a moment ago, before the hon. member for Laurier raised this point. The rules are quite clear. A member who has the floor should not be interrupted. Permission can be asked to put a question to him, but it is his privilege to refuse to grant that permission. I ask the co-operation of all members for the orderly conduct of our debates.

I recognize the hon. member for Lapointe.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, this will probably be news to my hon. friend from Chambly-Rouville, but if he cares to read the brief submitted to the Massey commission by Laval University, he would find the very wording of the statement I have just made for the record.

Mr. Johnson: On what page?

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): I sometimes wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether the Conservative members from Quebec are too lazy to read the briefs that were submitted. I read them, but I am not going to give him the reference, as I am sure that he would learn a great deal if he took the trouble of reading them.

Mr. Tremblay: I read them over and over again.

Mr. Johnson: All I wanted to obtain from the hon. member from Lapointe (Mr. Brassard) was the exact reference of his quotation.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): You will find it in the brief.

Mr. Johnson: That I know; I read it in connection with the Tremblay commission in 1954.

But Mr. Speaker, I will not accept any suggestion that I have not read the brief or that Conservative members are too lazy to read such briefs and keep up to date.

It is time the member for Lapointe gave a loyal answer to our questions.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): If there are people in this house who cannot give me a lesson of loyalty, they are the Conservative members from Quebec. The best proof that the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Johnson) did not read the brief I mentioned is the fact that he said that it was submitted to the Tremblay commission, whereas it was, in fact, submitted to the Massey commission.

We have heard many speeches—

Mr. Johnson: I never made the statement attributed to me by the hon. member for Lapointe.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, is this an attempt to apply closure?

Mr. Balcer: Tell the truth.

Mr. Bourget: Don't you dare talk about the truth.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville raising a point of order or a question of privilege?

An hon. Member: Of privilege or of whim?

Mr. Johnson: I did not say that I had studied the brief submitted to the Tremblay commission. I said that I had studied the brief for the purpose of the Tremblay commission. That is different and I ask the hon. member to withdraw his statement.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): I will not; when you read Hansard tomorrow, you will see that I was right. I have a speech to make here, Mr. Speaker; I wonder if this is some kind of a gag they are trying to force on me—

Mr. Johnson: You are not important enough for that.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): I shall not say what I have in mind. During the debate on this legislation, we heard, among others, a speech by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Dorion).

Before saying what I think of his remarks, may I say that I have great regard and admiration for the hon. member for Bellechasse. I admire him very much and I think that what has been written about him in a certain Montreal weekly is downright disgusting.

If there is a Conservative member from Quebec who would deserve to be a cabinet member, it is the hon. member for Bellechasse, and I say this even though I do not share his political views.

At the outset of his speech on this legislation, the hon. member said—and, for the information of the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville, this quotation may be found on page 14 of the appendix to Hansard of April 26, 1960:

> In consequence—though it may displease those who do not share my opinion, and with all due respect for the views of others—I want to confirm once more, at the very beginning of my remarks, that federal grants to our institutions of higher learning in this country are obviously inconsistent with the imperative principles of our constitution and contrary to the rights, powers and obligations which are an exclusively provincial field.

In short, the hon. member for Bellechasse told us, in a somewhat mitigated form, that federal grants to universities are unconstitutional.

This bill contains Mr. St. Laurent's formula, a formula, as you well know, Mr. Speaker, that did not impose any condition on the provinces nor on the universities. On the other hand, the present legislation, in addition to the St. Laurent formula, contains certain conditions.

In the first place, it is the federal government that is telling the Quebec and other provincial governments who want to take advantage of that legislation how a tax can be levied by a province for a provincial purpose.

In the second place, the federal government itself decides how part of the tax will be used to meet that provincial purpose.

Third, as the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard) pointed out a few moments ago, the Minister of Finance of the federal government is to be the ultimate judge with regard to the distribution and use of that provincial tax, levied within the limits of the jurisdiction of Quebec and other provinces wishing to avail themselves of the act.

The hon. member for Bellechasse also mentioned on several occasions in this house that he had much apprehension with regard to precedent in British law.

Now, in spite of this fear and apprehension, he is still urging his Conservative colleagues from the province of Quebec to support this bill, and for two reasons.

We have inherited a situation created by the former administration, says he—and I repeat, the former administration—and the legislation we are about to accept as a solution, at this time, will only be temporary.

I would have liked to repeat here, Mr. Speaker, the remark made to me by someone who has never had university training, and who was talking to me about the attitude of the hon. member for Bellechasse, but I will tell him about it privately.

The fact remains that the attitude of the Conservative members from the province of Quebec—

Mr. Tremblay: It is a matter of discretion.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): The discretion of the member for Roberval (Mr. Tremblay) is precisely what I am leery about.

Mr. Tremblay: What about your friends—

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): I am amazed, not to say flabbergasted, at the present attitude of the Conservatives from Quebec and of the representatives of the Quebec government.

For years, they made provincial autonomy their battle cry, for obvious political purposes.

It was a mock autonomy, an inactive but convenient autonomy which helped them beg for votes.

The Conservatives from Quebec, at a conference a few months ago, asked, urged, the government to find a formula. Why were they urging the government to find a formula? This is due to the fact that they were feeling out public opinion in our province and discovering that the population had enough of seeing them play politics with a principle such as that of autonomy.

The Conservative government in Ottawa has always proclaimed its respect for our constitution. It developed a formula or rather, according to the press, the former premier of Quebec, Mr. Sauve, for whom I had the greatest respect, submitted a formula verbally —and one can easily understand why the proposal was made verbally.

But, the most astonishing point is that this legislation, as I said a moment ago, not only includes the St. Laurent formula, which the Quebec provincial government rejected absolutely at all times, but even goes a step further in that it compels Quebec to return to Ottawa part of the money to be collected under provincial legislation for provincial purposes, and if it does not compel the province to return the money to Ottawa the federal government will see to it that the compensation is made.

I should say, to use an expression in favour with some Quebec members, that, from the constitutional standpoint, this is one of the most questionable pieces of legislation we have had since confederation.

As soon as the member for Bellechasse (Mr. Dorion) had made his speech, I very politely asked him a question to which he replied also very politely. I would like to remind him of it at this stage. I said, as reported on page 18 of the appendix to Hansard of April 26, 1960:

> Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the hon. member for Bellechasse? If the hon. member for Bellechasse deems it completely constitutional to levy a provincial corporation tax for educational purposes, how can he explain that the federal government should, under the same bill, have the authority to compel the province of Quebec to return a portion of the same tax. Is that provision in the bill not the very contradiction of Mr. Cahan's statement?

The member for Bellechasse replied:

> I am willing to assume that the hon. member has paid close attention to what I said. However, he leaves me with the impression that either I did not make myself clear or he misunderstood me. I rather believe that I was not quite clear.
> At the beginning of my remarks, I very definitely stated that in my opinion the federal government is not allowed under the constitution to subsidize universities. I said that we were faced with an accomplished fact and that we try to evolve a temporary solution through a compromise. That is my view on the bill now before us.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Conservative members from Quebec who will speak after me—and the member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) will certainly be one of them—to tell us if the former premier of Quebec has ever accepted any compromise as far as the provincial autonomy of his province is concerned.

The Hon. Mr. Duplessis is known to have rejected federal university grants, except for one year, as I said a few moments ago. On the other hand, his minister of youth and welfare, the Hon. Paul Sauve, used to accept with open hands subsidies for technical and professional education, and annual grants for the maintenance and administration of his schools. Now, when federal grants were related to the building or installation of schools, they represented up to 50 per cent of the cost.

And when was any minister from Quebec heard telling the people of my province that the building costs of our technical and professional schools had been paid fifty-fifty by the federal government and the government of Quebec? We were always led to believe, as we are being now, that those were princely gifts from the provincial government.

To my mind, Mr. Speaker, saying, when a school or a hospital or any public building is erected in some riding that it is a gift either of the federal or the provincial government, is misleading the people. Indeed, it is not a gift. It is merely a question of providing for the needs of the people where the building will be erected. And that is what I have always admired in our former prime minister; he never said that he was distributing gifts, but: "We are returning to the taxpayers part of the taxes they paid to the federal government".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): What the Hon. Mr. Sauve accepted between 1945 and 1958, i.e. 50 per cent of the construction cost of all technical and professional schools in the province of Quebec, amounts to more than $6 million. Much has been said about autonomy in our province but, meanwhile, words were contradicted by deeds.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): We have heard before of grants to universities, Mr. Speaker, and by others than the federal government. Grants to universities have been awarded by the Quebec government to other institutions of higher learning in other provinces. I do not deny the right of the province of Quebec to help our fellow citizens in the other provinces. But what strikes me, again according to the principle of autonomy of our people in Quebec, is that the same Quebec government has awarded grants to institutions in other provinces. If the government of the province of Quebec had been logical and consistent with its theory on autonomy, it would have awarded those grants to a Quebec patriotic organization which would have handed them out to the interested people in the other provinces. No one would have been able to accuse the province of Quebec of interfering in the educational system of the other provinces, if it had followed that procedure.

Coming back to the agreements now being considered, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words about the correspondence exchanged between the Prime Minister of Canada and the last two premiers—I repeat, the last two premiers—of the province of Quebec. On December 14, 1959, the Hon. Mr. Sauve, in an answer to the Prime Minister of Canada, asked this:

> You are suggesting that the adjustment be made out of the equalization payment. At least I suppose so, because it would be the only way to do it.
> You would oblige me by saying if that is what you have in mind.

Here is what the Prime Minister of Canada answered to the Hon. Mr. Sauve on December 22, 1959:

> The difference between the product of the additional 1 per cent tax exemption and the $1.50 per capita for the population of your province will be adjusted in such a way that the fiscal position of the federal government remains unchanged. In other words, should the 1 per cent tax exemption yield more than $1.50 per capita, as will be the case, the federal government will deduct the amount in excess of equalization payments now being paid to the province of Quebec by the federal treasury in accordance with the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act.
> For instance, if the new formula were applied on the basis of 1959 figures, the federal treasury would lose, and the provincial treasury gain, about $9,250,000 as a result of the change in the corporation tax. On the other hand, university grants based on $1.50 per capita, applied to the province of Quebec, would amount to $7,500,000. The difference of $1,750,000 would be deducted from the equalization payment payable to the province of Quebec which in 1959 will amount to about $67,000,000.

There is another point on which I would like some clarification from the Conservative speakers who will rise after me. The Quebec legislature passed an act to raise from 9 to 10 per cent the corporation income tax before the federal government had introduced its own legislation. The provincial authorities knew at the time what were the three conditions laid down by the federal government concerning the use of provincial income tax.

I am at a loss to understand on the basis of what sincerity the Quebec government failed to mention in its legislation the conditions imposed by the federal government in order to dispose of a grant established by a provincial legislation for a provincial purpose.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, the Quebec provincial legislature as well as the federal authorities, entered into a tacit agreement before the Canadian parliament had expressed its views on the subject.

If this legislation had been introduced under a Liberal administration, with the restrictive clauses it contains, I am sure that Mr. Duplessis and all his supporters would have had a real picnic at the expense of the Liberal administration of the time.

In his speech on the federal grants to universities—and I want to say a few words about the remarks of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Dorion)—the hon. member also expressed the views of a man who had been a student of constitutional law and who, according to him, was one of the most enlightened minds of his days; I mean Mr. Cahan, secretary of state in the Bennett administration. As did the hon. member for Bellechasse, I quote the following:

> The provincial legislature will come to exercise, year by year, the functions of a municipal council which is dependent, in matters of finance, upon the benefactions which it receives from the federal treasury. The dominion government will hold the purse, and financial control will gradually extend to the exercise of legislative and administrative control.

Well, I believe the formula being proposed to us ties in fully with the opinion expressed by the hon. member for Bellechasse, and for the following reason: the province of Quebec will have to reimburse, or the federal government will deduct from the equalization payments, the excess amounts of taxes levied on corporations for provincial purposes.

I would not like to express an opinion neither officially nor off the record on the constitutionality of the federal grants to universities because there are great jurists who hold different views on the matter. But I should like, however, to make a comparison. The special grants of $25 million which the federal government pays to the maritimes are not paid from a special tax levied throughout the country. Those special grants of $25 million are taken out of the federal treasury, like the university grants, as they were under Mr. St. Laurent's formula.

And there is another question I might ask myself about Quebec autonomists. There is, in the Department of Finance, in connection with federal-provincial relations, a municipal grant division. Municipalities, Mr. Speaker, in the eyes of the federal government, do not exist. The federal government does not recognize legally what a municipality is, because municipalities exist only by virtue of a delegation of powers from the provincial governments; and yet, grants are directly made to municipalities; cheques are made to the order of the municipalities. Those cheques are not sent to municipal officials, through the provincial government, they are sent directly to the municipalities of our province, and of all the other provinces of Canada.

How can you explain that the Conservative members from Quebec, who are so deeply concerned with autonomy, have never raised the matter here in the House of Commons?

Mr. Tremblay: Completely beside the point.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): I admit, Mr. Speaker, that for the hon. member for Roberval, that is beside the point. In fact, I am sure of it.

There is another problem on which I should like an explanation, either from the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville, who often does not know what he is talking about, or from the hon. member for Roberval, who never knows what he is talking about.

The bill before us deals with an agreement between the federal Minister of Finance and the Canadian Universities Foundation. The two contracting parties are the Minister of Finance on behalf of the Canadian government, and the Canadian Universities Foundation. What is involved in the bill? The authorities of the federal government are asking the Quebec authorities to abide by an agreement between the Minister of Finance and the Canadian Universities Foundation. They ask that of the authorities of the province of Quebec, who are not parties to that agreement. I should very much like to hear the thoughts of the hon. members for Chambly-Rouville and Roberval, if they are capable of any thoughts, on this particular matter.

Mr. Tremblay: A low type of wit for a protégé of the Union Nationale.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, in going to work for the Quebec government, I never thought I had to sacrifice my freedom of thought for the rest of my life. I never denied having worked in the department of highways for two years. I never denied having received assistance, but I had to work for it. And, once again, I still feel as I did at the time that I was not being committed in my way of thinking for the rest of my life.

When the Canada Council or the federal government make grants the recipient does not have to state whether he is going to be a Liberal or a Conservative for the rest of his life.

As reported in Le Devoir of July 20, the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Flynn) said in this house on July 18, 1959, concerning university grants:

> And, the member went on to ask, even if the former government and the present government always paid out the grants with no strings attached, what guarantee do we have that such will always be the case?

The former administration never attached conditions to the financial aid to universities, but, today we study this bill which sets three essential conditions to the grants which are paid from federal revenue to Quebec universities.

I wonder, Mr. Speaker, how the Conservative members from Quebec will explain their reasoning and, to make sure the hon. members for Roberval and Chambly-Rouville understand what I mean, how will they explain their inconsistency.

Mr. Tremblay: We will ask that for you of the provincial minister of highways.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): No doubt we will witness and quite soon, Mr. Speaker, an event which will enable the people of Quebec to express their opinion.

Mr. Parizeau: We already know the result.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): The member for Lake St. John (Mr. Parizeau) says he already knows the result. I cannot make fun of him right now; I will wait till June 23 to do so.

An hon. Member: He laughs longest who laughs last.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): It is then that will break out the revenge and the justice of people fed up by public men who are in politics only to satisfy their thirst for power.

Before concluding, Mr. Speaker, I want to repeat that the Liberals not only are in favour of grants to universities, but instead of merely saying it, they proved it by positive action. They seldom talked about autonomy in the Canadian House of Commons, but they respected it. What surprises me most in this debate is that the sponsor of this bill did not utter a word yet about the serious problems pointed out by the hon. member for Laurier in his clear and unambiguous speech, and which reflected our doubts and our fears concerning this measure.

Should the Minister of Finance decide to take part in this debate, I hope he will reply in detail to the serious and well-founded objections raised by the hon. member for Laurier.

Mr. Chambers: The Montreal Star did.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, some people say that there is nothing seriously objectionable about this bill. Let me reply right now to the remark just made by the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Chambers), because I also read that article.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that the real objection, the serious objection we have to this bill, is the fact that, by federal legislation, the provincial government is compelled —and I am not referring only to that of Quebec, I refer to any other provincial government of Canada—if it wants to take advantage of that legislation, to hand back to the federal government part of the taxes it intends to levy through some legislation of its own, taxes that are levied for provincial purposes. That is the serious objection we have to this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I repeat that no one in Canada is more in favour of help and assistance to universities than the members of the Liberal party of Canada. I repeat—I am happy to do so because it will never be repeated enough—there are people here to whom it is necessary to repeat that truth before they even begin to understand—

An hon. Member: That is quite apparent.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): They have to be told over and over again before they even begin to understand. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, nowhere in Canada can be found better support for university grants than among the Liberal party. The Liberal administration has proved it, and the Statutes of Canada are there to prove it also.

Mr. Speaker, I am anxious to hear the hon. members for Chambly-Rouville and Roberval tell us, in a way that everybody will understand, what they think of the serious objections to this legislation that were raised by the hon. members for Laurier, Gatineau and other ridings.

Mr. Theogene Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention whatsoever to embark upon an extensive discussion—

Mr. Eudes: What a pity.

Mr. Ricard: —of the legislation now before the house. As a layman, I would like, however, to make a few remarks and say what the people think of this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot help pointing out to you, that since the bill was introduced in this house, Liberal members have tried to make a lot of noise so that people might possibly forget the benefits which will accrue to the people as a result of this bill. After all we must admit that, as a result of talks between members of the federal Conservative party and members of the Union Nationale who make up the provincial government in Quebec, an amount of $25 million held in trust by the Conference of Canadian Universities will now go to the citizens of the province of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, I can understand my friends in the Liberal party looking to the conclusion of our discussion with bitter apprehension, especially as it is taking place when they are getting ready to launch a campaign to help their friends of the provincial Liberal party in view of the election on June 22 next. They knew they would meet with defeat, but after this last minute unkindest cut of all, that defeat will only be more blatant.

Our good friends from the Liberal party were worried about the way the members on the government side were going to act when this legislation was discussed.

Mr. Speaker, this is not the first time that opposition members, particularly Liberal supporters, display worry about us. They were quite worried on June 10, 1957 and March 31, 1958. In my opinion they did not have the least ground for worry.

We came here with very definite duties to perform. During the election campaign we promised to solve the problem of university grants, and we have indeed solved it in the end. We are not so vain as to claim that the bill is perfect, only opposition members, or Liberal party supporters, having any claim to perfection.

As we merely belong to the class of ordinary human beings, we can only do our best and our very best, knowing that past events and those to come on June 22 next will show that we have the fullest support of the province of Quebec, whether Liberal members like it or not.

We have to admit the facts. If my hon. friends opposite must go into mourning, they may be assured of all my sympathy.

At this stage of my remarks, I wish to refer to certain press reports dealing with the matter of assistance to universities.

In the Thursday, March 3, 1960 issue of Le Courrier of St. Hyacinthe, under the heading "Excellent news for universities and colleges", an article read:

> The Hon. Antonio Barrette, Quebec premier, and Yves Prevost, provincial secretary in his cabinet, have just given excellent news to the province of Quebec concerning university and secondary education.
> Speaking in the legislature last Thursday, the premier said he was confident that Quebec universities and colleges would be able to collect the $25 million that have been held for them by the federal government for several years, and that they had been unable to claim for reasons known to everybody.
> "We believe, said Mr. Barrette, that the $25 million in federal grants to our universities will come back to the province".
> He added:
> "As soon as I have received a final answer (from Ottawa) I will be glad to inform the house.

In the same paper, under the title "Political news", it was stated:

> The rights of Quebec concerning universities are recognized.
> Ottawa's offers of grants to the universities of the province will not be renewed, and the federal government recognizes the exclusive rights of Quebec in this field.

Those are a few statements I would ask my Liberal friends to read and reread and meditate, because if there is one person in the province of Quebec whose job is to look after the interests of the province, surely it is its present premier.

Mr. Speaker, before resuming my seat, I should like to quote from a few articles published in L'Enseignement, the official mouthpiece of the Corporation des Instituteurs et Institutrices Catholiques de la Province de Québec. On page 10 and 11 of the March 1960 issue, I find the following headings:

> $2,421,000 grant to normal schools and home economics institutes. Financial freedom for our educational institutions.

And underneath, the following subheadings:

> $20,000,000 to the universities
> $10,000,000 more to school boards
> $6,122,000 to classical colleges
> $340,000 to certain cultural and art societies

And in concluding, and to clear up any doubt which might still be entertained by the Liberal members, I should like to quote the last paragraph of an article which appeared in Le Droit of April 26 and in which Mr. Jean-Marc Poliquin, commenting on Bill C-56, concludes in this way:

> However, one thing remains, and that is that Bill No. C-56 protects an essential right of French Canada. From that viewpoint alone it deserves the support of the Quebec members.

Before resuming my seat, Mr. Speaker, I want to say again that we are not through with the noise coming from the opposition benches, since they have been instructed from higher up to do whatever they could to try and make the people forget that we owe it to the Union Nationale on the one hand and to a Conservative government on the other hand if the question of university grants has been settled to the satisfaction of the people of Quebec after having been outstanding for some ten years, and that $25 million have been handed over all at once, to the institutions of higher learning in the province of Quebec.

Again, I offer my sympathy to my poor friends in the opposition, and I tell them: Give it up as lost.

(Text):

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, there is something significant in this bill that struck us in the C.C.F. Here for the first time, at least in recent history, we have been able to come to an agreement on a very thorny problem in this country. For the first time, apparently, the federal government and the government of the province of Quebec have been able to reach an agreement on one of the most important subjects affecting the citizens of Canada regardless of the province in which they live. I refer to the problem of education.

I recall many times in the past how the Liberals used to pillory a former premier of the province of Quebec, Premier Duplessis. He was the fly in the ointment, the reason why that province would never take advantage of the many proposals put forward by the federal government. It was obvious to many in this country why he would not co-operate. It was more profitable politically to cry wolf in the province of Quebec when it came to any agreement with the federal government. It was also obvious for many years that the Quebec government was far more interested in votes than in agreements with respect to this problem.

We now see another strange phenomenon coming about. We see that we have a new Duplessis growing up in the province of Quebec. I have here a copy of an article taken from the Globe and Mail of April 14, which reads in parts as follows:

> Quebec Liberal leader Jean Lesage said today that he will denounce the current federal-provincial agreement on the financing of university grants if his party takes power at the next general elections.

I do not know if he intends to denounce it only if his party takes power or if he intends to denounce it in any event. As I understand the legislation, it does not ram anything down anybody's throat. It is merely permissive legislation allowing the minister to enter into an agreement with any province that desires to do so. Why denounce the agreement only if the party comes into power? The article continues:

> Mr. Lesage said that the right given in the bill to the federal Minister of Finance to approve any arrangement between the provincial government and the universities constituted a most dangerous precedent in the field of provincial autonomy.

Shades of Duplessis. I have studied this proposal and fail to see how anybody could construe as a dangerous precedent in the field of provincial autonomy the fact that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) has the authority to approve an arrangement between the provincial governments and the universities. Surely this is under provincial jurisdiction. If they reach an agreement who is treading on whose toes if the federal government is authorized to approve it? Another portion of the article reads:

> Mr. Lesage said that this policy of federal-provincial fiscal relations would constitute a major theme of the Liberal campaign during the next two months.
> The Union Nationale will be attacked for not sticking to the autonomist position taken by Duplessis and Sauve in their relations with Ottawa.

Why did we hear the Liberals for so many years attack the position taken by Mr. Duplessis if they are now going to attack his successors for not following the position he took? What kind of monstrous farce is this?

For many years there has been a great game in this country played by politicians. The game consisted of making one political speech in Quebec and a different one in any other province. With the advent of television and the establishment of the C.B.C. in Canada the game is not as easily played as before because speeches of importance are telecast from coast to coast and one cannot indulge in double-talk and give both sides of the picture. This is particularly true with respect to the subject of education.

I submit that for 92 years we have coasted and quibbled with regard to education and I think it is time we stopped. This first agreement on the question is a good starting point and that is why the C.C.F. intends to support the bill on second reading.

I invite hon. members to consider how many qualified students have been denied opportunities for education in years gone by. Why? Because education has been a political football kicked back and forth between the federal and provincial governments each saying it was the responsibility of the other. And because all the provinces could not agree, it was a good way of washing one's hands of the subject. I invite the house to consider the human resources that have been wasted as a result of our washing our hands of this problem.

Of course, we have been very lucky. While we have never tried to meet the problem or provide adequate opportunities for education to our students as they grew up, fortunately our educational system was no worse than the systems in other countries and so we had no real problems to face up to. But times are changing very rapidly. One has only to consider automation to realize that the standards of education which were adequate 10 or 15 years ago are no longer adequate today.

This afternoon we had an exchange between the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mrs. Fairclough) and the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), I believe, with regard to unfilled job applications. I think there is something in what the minister said about many positions being unfilled at this time. Why is this so? Because our workers have not got the educational qualifications to fill them.

What are we doing about it? We are playing petty politics instead of getting on with the job. How many of our students are demanding educational opportunities today while we sit here and kick this matter back and forth? I see that the Quebec election battle is going to be fought on the basis of the same old worn out excuse on which elections in Quebec have been fought for the last number of years. Do we realize, Mr. Speaker, that while we indulge ourselves in these political antics immigrants coming into this country are better qualified to fill jobs than our own people born and raised here? Do we realize that this situation is going to worsen unless we stop bickering and playing petty politics and get on with the job of increasing educational facilities and educational opportunities for our children?

Last but far from least, Mr. Speaker, are we going to sit back and ignore the warnings from behind the iron curtain that were so well put before the house by two members on the government side last year? Can we afford to do this? Are we still going to quibble and play party politics?

The British North America Act sets out very clearly provincial and federal rights with regard to education but unfortunately it does not set out the responsibilities as clearly as it should. It is the responsibility of each province to provide educational facilities and because some provinces are richer than others it is the responsibility of the federal government to see that each province is able to carry out its educational responsibilities. As I said before, in the past there has been no over-all agreement. We have been content to pass the buck back and forth. The attitude has been, anything for an excuse, let us shut our eyes and avoid the inevitable for a few years longer and maybe we can win another election by doing so.

I say that we have a far greater responsibility with regard to this problem. I say that this welcome step is the first step we have seen for a good many years in this field. I say it is time that provincial and federal elected representatives started to place national and human interests ahead of immediate political ambitions. I say it is time that we got on with this welcome first step and go on from here to even greater steps in the future.

(Translation):

Mr. Louis Fortin (Montmagny-L'Islet): Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be brief, because what is well understood can be expressed in few words.

The problem of federal subsidies to universities is one of vital importance in my province, and has been for close to 20 years. It involves, as we all know, an intrusion of the central power into the provincial field. Under section 93 of the B.N.A. Act, only the provincial legislatures have jurisdiction in educational matters. It can be truly said that until the publication of the Massey report on June 1, 1951, the federal government had never committed a constitutional sin in that respect.

The Massey commission, which on the whole did quite a good job, suggested in its report that the federal government should make a financial contribution to the work of universities every year. The commissioners put it that clearly. That was reason enough for the Liberal government of the time to accept this unwarranted suggestion, and shortly after, it started making annual inroads into the field of education.

From that point of view, it can be said that the government which preceded the present government was a second offender and persisted in its constitutional sin. There were ministers in Quebec who defended such a policy. Among them, I would mention the former minister of northern affairs and national resources, Mr. Jean Lesage, who in the meantime has changed his tune and is trying to go into reverse. However, a choice replacement was found in the person of the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) who has been making sudden and occasional T.V. appearances in Quebec. Let me say, however, that I think his national patriotic speeches have a hollow sound: he is a bit like a banjo player in a symphony orchestra.

To set the problem in its proper perspective, it must be remembered that very few countries enjoy the advantages of two cultures. In that respect, Canada is a privileged country.

In fact, because of historic events which have made Canada what it is today, we enjoy French culture with all its beauty, its richness, its dignity and its greatness. At the same time, we enjoy Anglo-Saxon culture in all its beauty, its richness, its dignity and its greatness. Each in their own sphere, French speaking and English speaking Canadians can benefit by developing their cultures whose full flowering can only enrich our national heritage.

To get this full flowering, Quebec universities, which are the guardians of French culture in America, need greater financial assistance. And who could legally give it to them? We find the answer in section 93 of the British North America Act: Only the provincial legislatures, since they have exclusive jurisdiction in the field of education.

I do not think there are right minded people, with the exception, perhaps of the hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Roberge), who would say that universities are not included in this field. If this is a responsibility of provincial legislatures, they need adequate financial means to discharge it. So, what did the Quebec government do in order to be able to give financial assistance to our universities? During its last session, the Quebec legislature raised the corporation income tax by 1 per cent. The sums produced by this increase will enable Quebec universities to receive the financial assistance they are entitled to. The present federal government, always anxious, and may I repeat that, always anxious to respect the autonomy of the provinces, refuses to remain any longer, against the will of the province, in the field of education, and will grant a similar deduction from its own tax. In other words, the federal government is gradually withdrawing from a field which is not its own, and which was invaded in 1951 by the Liberal government.

On behalf of the citizens of Quebec, I commend the present federal government for showing great understanding and an admittedly fair mind.

I know you will realize, Mr. Speaker, that the member for an historic county like Montmagny-L'Islet, wants to pay a disinterested tribute to the man who is now the premier of the province of Quebec and who, today, picks the ripe fruit of the long and difficult struggles led by his illustrious predecessors. Yet, I am sure that, if the Quebec government had formerly been able to count on the comprehension and co-operation of the Liberal government, it could have settled the problem quite as beneficially. Because of its arrogance and stubbornness, the Liberal government found itself, so to speak, in an extremely difficult position. How many great men fought all their lives, and even died, before reaping the fruit of their efforts.

Mr. Speaker, about a week ago, the hon. member for Laurier honoured us with a visit. He spoke on television, in a program entitled: "The Nation's Business". Besides, one finds that he is about the only Liberal member to appear on the French network. I do not blame him for wanting to make himself known among our people but his frequent appearances might suggest that he is somewhat hard to sell.

The last time he appeared on television the hon. member for Laurier told us that Bill No. C-56 was the worst encroachment on provincial autonomy. He said that by this Bill No. C-56 the federal government was saying to the legislature: "You will increase the corporation tax by 1 per cent. The hon. member knows very well that this is not true. If he does not know, let him examine the text of the bill and study it carefully. If he knows that he is not speaking the truth, why does he come to the province of Quebec and say things which are, to say the least, contrary to the truth? The fact is that the Quebec legislature voted its bill increasing the corporation tax without being the least concerned with what the federal government would do. The Hon. Antonio Barrette formally said so in Montreal, on April 19 last. To avoid double taxation and, as I said, out of regard for the autonomy of the provinces, the federal government will grant a 1 per cent deduction on its own tax. I wonder who could criticize it for that?

I listened earlier with great interest to my very good and long time friend, the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Brassard). He said, at one point, that the proof that grants to universities are constitutional and legal is that they were accepted in 1951 by the province of Quebec.

Let me remind him of a minor principle of law that he must have learned when he was a law student in Quebec. He says that in the matter of evidence one must of necessity abide by the principle of preponderance. Correct, the province of Quebec tentatively accepted university grants the first year. However, when the province refused them the following year, and has refused them ever since, the preponderance of evidence is to the effect that it had come to the conclusion that the experiment made in 1951 had not proved to be a useful compromise under those conditions.

I also heard the hon. member exclaiming while speaking about his late protector Mr. Duplessis, that he had never accepted any compromise. Let me tell him that there is one very simple reason why the then premier of Quebec never accepted any compromise; it is because he knew how dangerous it is to compromise oneself with a Liberal government.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, may I tell you that we breathe more freely in our province since the government of Quebec can rely on the comprehension and the co-operation of the federal Conservative government.

The era of liberal arrogance and of the "take it or leave it" attitude of Mr. St. Laurent is now a thing of the past, and we already see on the horizon a future full of splendid promises which will represent a precious contribution to the full achievement of that national unity which we desire and which will enrich our national life and make it worthy of the most noble traditions—as the Prime Minister of Canada stated when General de Gaulle visited our country—of both our mother countries, France and Great Britain.

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Levis): Mr. Speaker, there are two proposals in the bill now before this house. The first one has to do with an increase from 10 to 13 per cent in the provincial share of personal income tax. It will be recalled that the increase came into effect in January 1958 and was announced by wire to the provinces. The object of this bill is to keep the increase in force up to March 31, 1962 or for two more years.

The second proposal concerns arrangements on grants to universities, concerning which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) stated that the amendment is to provide for the payment of grants to universities equivalent to $1.50 per capita in each province.

Let me state forthwith, as did the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) on April 26 last, that I am in favour of the first proposal. However, I think it proper to point out that, since the Conservatives came into power three years ago, nothing was changed in the Federal-Provincial Tax-sharing Arrangements Act, except the 3 per cent increase in private income tax which enables us to say that under the Conservative administration we have autonomy at 3 per cent.

Since June 1957, three federal-provincial conferences have been held, but each of them almost uselessly because every time the premiers and the ministers of finance of the ten provinces went back empty-handed. I am not the only one to make this statement. An editorial in Le Soleil, for October 17, 1959, was entitled:

Useless Conference.

The article reads as follows:

Gathered in Ottawa to discuss with the federal Minister of Finance problems concerning the tax-sharing arrangements, the ministers of finance of the ten provinces of this country and the few premiers who came along with them, went back empty-handed forty eight hours later.

If they had any hopes before entering the conference room, they did not keep them long. Mr. Fleming hastened to tell them they would not be getting anything more because the country's financial situation made it impossible.

The article goes on to say this, and rightly so:

Was it really necessary to disturb all those people? Would it not have been simpler to cancel the conference and to inform each provincial minister of finance by mail to expect nothing more from the federal treasury? In this way, there would have been no loss of time, no wasteful expenditures, no useless travelling.

The representatives of the provinces did not hide their disappointment and their displeasure.

We are being told that another federal-provincial conference has been set for next July, on the 25, 26 and 27. However, judging from past conferences and the statement made by the Minister of Finance on April 26, 1960, as recorded in Hansard page 3278 of that day:

The matters to be submitted to the conference will concern financial relations between the dominion and the provinces in the period following March 31, 1962.

We must therefore conclude that no change will be made in the tax-sharing arrangements between the dominion and the provinces before March 31, 1962.

And yet, Mr. Speaker, that is not what the Conservative party gave us to understand during the electoral campaign of 1957 and 1958. The present Prime Minister said at St. Patrice de Beaurivage, in the province of Quebec, on May 30, 1957, according to a report in the June 1, 1957 issue of the daily newspaper Montréal-Matin, and I quote:

> The head of the Conservative party tackled another serious problem: that of fiscal federal-provincial relations. "Everybody admits", he said, "that relations between Ottawa and the provinces are bad, and that they are not satisfactory either to provincial or to municipal administrations. The federal government is rich, but the provinces and the municipalities are poor, and they cannot continue to assume their responsibilities.
> "To resume the attitude of our party", he stated, "I repeat what I have said at the start of the election campaign: We guarantee provinces and municipalities a greater share of the money raised by taxes.
> We shall thus give provincial governments the means of shouldering their important constitutional responsibilities and of furthering the development of our natural resources."

I might, Mr. Speaker, quote many other statements along this line, made by the Prime Minister and his candidates about fiscal arrangements during the 1957 and 1958 elections; but I think that the one I just mentioned will be enough to show that the Conservatives always acted grandly in their promises but rather poorly when it came to carrying them out.

Is it not pitiful to see a government, which, with the help of its friends in Quebec, organized two campaigns against the fiscal formula of the St. Laurent government, doing absolutely nothing today but modify some figures very slightly, which the Liberals might have done too, as one of the main merits of that formula was the possibility of periodical adjustment of standards according to the needs of the hour.

The greatest sin of the Conservatives is not their present reluctance to solve the fiscal problem; it is the boldness with which, for the sole purpose of grabbing power, they made to the people, in two elections, extravagant promises they are now unable to fulfil.

Nothing is easier to understand than the reason why the Conservative government does not solve the fiscal problem: it is because the Liberals have solved it as much as they could, at the time, and the Conservatives are absolutely unable to find a more efficient and fairer formula than that adopted by the Liberals.

Through work and intelligence, the St. Laurent government had developed a fiscal formula which was severely criticized by his opponents, but will remain in force as long as a better one has not been found, and none is yet in sight.

On this subject, I should like to quote from an article by Gerard Morin, which appeared in Le Droit of Ottawa for July 8, 1959 under the heading: "No new contribution from Duplessis at the conference." This refers to the conference of the committee of Canadian finance ministers and treasurers, held in Ottawa in early July of the same year. I quote:

> It seems that the federal Conservative government, which in principle is friendly to the government of the same party in Quebec, is not an inch closer to an agreement with Mr. Duplessis than the former government. In fact, the Conservatives have made no change in the Liberal doctrine of tax agreements, which the present Quebec government has always described as a centralizing doctrine.
> Mr. Duplessis, in his Monday night press conference boasted of having repeated the same thing he had said for about 15 years in Ottawa, that—

And this is for the information of the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard).

> —that Ottawa was robbing Quebec.
> And to a reporter who asked Mr. Duplessis if he had made constructive suggestions to the conference, he answered with his usual wit: "When someone robs us, nothing is more constructive than to claim back the amount that was robbed."

Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier, those words were said not only at the time of the Liberals, but after the provincial treasurers' conference held early last July. Our Conservative friends, more particularly in Quebec, are therefore—after this last remark of their political idol in July 1959—unable to claim that they have brought about any change in the formula set up by the Liberal party, which they denounced so loudly and which they were to change so quickly. They therefore have to admit their complete failure on that point. It was indeed stated by Lorenzo Paré, parliamentary correspondent of L'Action Catholique, in a report published in that paper on November 26, 1957, the day after the first federal-provincial conference, and I quote:

> If some people still pretended to believe that the coming of the Diefenbaker government would bring about a reversal of fiscal and financial policy in Ottawa, the end of the system of grants to the provinces and a new concept of constitutional relations; the illusion they nurtured would have disappeared yesterday.

Not only does the centralization of the three major taxes remain the basis of federal policies, but those policies are more immediately directed to the fields where provincial jurisdiction was until now undivided.

Mr. Speaker, I do not say that the formula advanced by the Liberal government was perfect and that no changes should be made to it. It should certainly be studied again with a view to improving it and to making it more suitable to the needs and conditions which have changed tremendously since confederation days. But such a complex problem in a country like ours, cannot, to my mind, be solved as long as we do not decide to approach it with an open and constructive mind and acting with reason and frankness. It seems to me, that on such a vital question, we should all have a common ideal, to work for the greatness and advancement of our municipalities, provinces and our country as a whole.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words about the second proposal included in this bill, that is, the one concerning university grants.

It has been pointed out during this debate, and even in previous debates, that, for several years, higher learning in Canada has been faced with a very serious financial situation, which was approaching a state of crisis, in the sense that it could no longer fulfil its role in this field. I think I can say we are unanimous on this point.

Faced with such a situation, the government of Mr. St. Laurent rightly decided to help solve that crisis. Therefore, during the 1951 session, it arranged for the adoption of yearly grants to universities, on the basis of 50 cents per capita. Those federal grants to universities were accepted by all parties then sitting in the house, and afterwards by all provinces. Furthermore, those grants, as we know, are made directly to universities recognized as such by provincial governments.

After allowing the universities of the province of Quebec to accept that assistance for the first year only, the provincial authorities in my province withdrew that permission in 1952, under the pretext that they were afraid it was a first encroachment upon the exclusive jurisdiction of provincial legislatures in the field of education.

All members who were sitting in this house in June 1951, when that assistance was announced and adopted on the thirtieth of the same month, will recall that the leaders of the two major parties, while recognizing the jurisdiction of the provinces in the field of education, admitted that the formula was constitutional. Mr. St. Laurent, in announcing the measure, said this, as recorded on page 4278 of Hansard for June 19, 1951, and I quote:

I might add that in making these recommendations to parliament it is intended to avoid any possible suggestion that we are interfering in any way with the policies respecting education in the respective provinces.

On the thirtieth of the same month, in the discussion on item 690, which dealt with grants to universities, here is what he said, as recorded on page 5021 of Hansard:

What is intended is that all the institutions, authorized by provincial legislatures to grant degrees, would be recognized as of university level

Now here is what the then Conservative leader, Hon. Mr. Drew, had to say, as recorded on page 4278 of Hansard for June 19, 1951:

Mr. Speaker, I am sure hon. members generally will welcome any measure of assistance given in this way to the universities of Canada... on behalf of the party I have the privilege to lead I proposed some time ago that these grants should be made as soon as possible—

Mr. Speaker, I think those words clearly show that there was perfect unanimity on the federal government's right to award grants to universities. As you know, such grants were unconditional and in no way contrary to section 93 of the constitution, which provides that: "In each province, the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education". In voting that estimate, parliament in no way claimed the right to legislate in the field of education, or to determine the curricula or define the school attendance requirements to which their citizens would be subjected.

Nor did it impose a direct tax in the province in order to obtain revenues for school purposes. All the federal government was doing was to offer grants to universities from the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

It seems to me that, under the circumstances, I can join with others, even if I am not known as an authority in this field, in saying—

Mr. Allard: May I ask a question to the hon. member?

Mr. Bourget: I have no objection. I will first finish my speech and, once I am through, I will be glad to answer your question.

Therefore, I can say with many others, without being an expert in constitutional matters, that those federal grants had no effect whatsoever on the autonomy of the universities or the provinces. Besides, it is because of that same right that the federal government makes equalization payments to provincial governments, helps in financing hospital construction, helps in technical and professional education, these latest grants having been accepted by the province of Quebec from 1945 to 1958.

Why then would the grants paid to the universities by the Liberals be bad, while the others I just mentioned are accepted? If the Quebec government believes that those grants which have been paid for nine years, now, are unconstitutional, why did it not challenge their legality before the courts?

This question has to be answered by the Conservative members.

In his speech of last April 26, the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Balcer) said this, as reported at page 1 of the appendix to Hansard of that day:

Besides, why should we have entrusted to provincial governments the exclusive power of looking after education, if the educational system had been the same in all the provinces which were to become members of the confederation?

Well, Mr. Speaker, I think it is agreed that the fathers of confederation placed education under the exclusive control of the provinces, probably with a view to safeguarding both English and French cultures. But to this moment, nobody has shown yet that the federal grants to universities, as conceived by the St. Laurent government, could be a threat either to the French culture or to the English culture, or even to the various religions in Canada.

Let us talk now about the new system proposed by this government. I feel that it would be useless to repeat the sound arguments presented by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) in the remarkable speech he made on that question, last April 26. He made it clear, I think, with references to various legislations and judgments of the Supreme Court of Canada, that certain parts of this bill can constitute the worst interference ever attempted by a federal government into the affairs of a province.

Besides, he is not the only one to entertain such views. I have here an editorial written by Mr. Gerard Filion in the Montreal newspaper Le Devoir of January 16, 1960, which reads as follows:

The Diefenbaker proposal, it should be remembered, is worse in its principle than the Liberal government's formula. That one, at least, set no conditions to universities or to provinces. Money was paid out and that was all. Whereas Mr. Diefenbaker is willing to have the provinces collect a certain amount of money, provided that it be used a certain way and not beyond certain limits.

I also have another item from Quebec's Le Soleil, dated December 18, 1959, which has the following heading:

The Diefenbaker proposal is deemed unacceptable by the Montreal chamber of commerce.

May I now quote a few paragraphs from an item headed:

Direct Interference

Furthermore, it brings about direct interference by the federal government in provincial matters by telling the provinces how they are to use their own tax money. It is, therefore, no uncertain breach of a constitutional principle to which Quebec holds fast.

One could even say that by accepting the method suggested we should be worse off than before. Federal grants to universities at the present time, though questionable from the constitutional standpoint, involve no interference in provincial jurisdiction.

It might well be pointed out at this time that the Conservative party arrived at this solution only after two years and a half in power, and yet its own supporters in this house called it a poor arrangement and an imperfect formula. I rather think that if those involved and all the students in the province had not pressed the government into action and, moreover, if this had not been a provincial election year, the Conservative party would have kept on distributing university grants according to the St. Laurent formula.

I also wonder how the Conservative members from the province of Quebec who consider Mr. St. Laurent's formula as infringing upon provincial autonomy can vote for the bill in which that same formula is included.

In an article written in the newspaper La Presse by its Ottawa correspondent Mr. Amedee Gaudreault on January 25, 1960, I read this:

The bill including the Diefenbaker formula concerning federal grants to universities, after the letter sent by the Hon. Antonio Barrette to the Prime Minister of Canada, is expected to force the 50 federal conservative members from Quebec to do some soul-searching in comparison to which the hesitations and abstentions of last year on the fiscal agreements and the trans-Canada highway will seem trifling.

Mr. Speaker, I find it strange, like many people from the province of Quebec, that Mr. Duplessis' followers in this house can talk about compromise when autonomy is concerned, because Mr. Duplessis always said that he would never permit autonomy to be crucified even on a golden cross.

If for many years the Union Nationale leaders and their friends from the province of Quebec had cast aside petty politics and emotionalism and had shown more common sense and especially more frankness, they would not have to accept today such a humiliating compromise.

I need not point out, Mr. Speaker, in closing my remarks that the Liberals' attitude towards federal grants to universities has not changed.

They are in favor of those grants unconditionally. Whether they are distributed by the Canadian Universities Foundation or, as the member for Laurier suggested, by a provincial council of universities, is of no importance, but I raise serious doubts as to the constitutionality of the formula introduced in this bill.

I hope that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) will clear up the serious doubts raised about the constitutionality of some clauses of this bill.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Will the hon. member vote for the bill or against it?

Mr. Bourget: The Minister of Finance asked the same question of the hon. member for Laurier.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): And I am waiting for an answer.

Mr. Bourget: Be a little patient. He made an altogether intelligent reply—

Mr. Johnson: An altogether absurd reply.

Mr. Chevrier: Just like you, you are absurd yourself.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Will the hon. member answer my question?

Mr. Bourget: The Minister of Finance must note that I put a question to him. He did not answer the hon. member for Laurier.

I shall also tell him this. Remove the doubts about the articles which according to those who know the constitution, seem to give rise to serious objections about the constitutionality of certain sections of this act. Besides, I am not the only one to hold this view. My friend the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard) showed it this afternoon when he spoke on the bill.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You don't know what to answer now.

Mr. Allard: Will the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Bourget: Certainly.

Mr. Allard: If the hon. member for Levis claims that the federal government has a right to subsidize Canadian universities, could he tell the house on what specific sections of the British North America Act he is basing his opinion?

Mr. Bourget: There are not any at all. And the hon. member for Sherbrooke did put this question before. There is no more provision in this regard in the constitution than there is for authorizing equalization payments to the provinces according to the formula adopted and maintained by your government and which was so intelligently established by the Liberal party that was in power before the present government.

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) who today not only shoulders his own responsibilities but also those of Prime Minister. The hon. member realizes that we have a constitution. In contrast with the Liberals, he recognizes that provinces have rights of their own. Moreover, he does much to unite the main elements which constitute our nation and to improve the conditions existing between our central government and provincial governments.

Mr. Speaker, this is not the least surprising, for the Conservative party, under the present leadership of the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker, has done a lot since confederation, and is still doing a lot, in order to ensure a better understanding of provincial rights and to maintain good will between the central government and all provincial governments.

(Text):

It would seem to me that in a day and age when government is becoming larger and larger at all levels, federal, provincial and municipal, and when the government itself at each of these levels is, perhaps, intervening in our daily lives to a greater and greater extent, we in this House of Commons should devote great attention to what are generally described as dominion-provincial relations.

I have not as yet reached the exalted position, which it seems to me some of the hon. members alongside me have reached, of quoting past speeches that I have made in this house, but I would simply like to say that I pointed out during the budget debate that one of the real differences which divide the two main parties in this chamber relates to dominion-provincial relations.

I pointed out in my speech on that occasion that our party places a great deal of emphasis on what is termed, for lack of a better expression, local self-agency. This idea has a universal application to Conservative principles. I fully realize that we cannot import into Canada political doctrines from nations abroad, but we do not all have to be students of history to look at the problems of the Liberals in the United Kingdom and the trouble the opposition had there not so many years ago. I do not intend to embark on a Port Arthur type lecture in this House of Commons. Nevertheless, we realize the trouble the United Kingdom got into at the end of the last century when the Liberals over there tried to centralize affairs in London. Again, I am not suggesting you can import political doctrines, but it would certainly seem to me in the light of modern past experience in this country that the Liberal party, even though hon. members of that party do not like to admit it, have inherited a great deal of the whig's centralizing traditions of the past.

Only the other day the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) was asked down in Washington why the Liberal party was turned out of power. He gave as his answer that the Canadian people became bored with perfection. I am certain that many hon. members on this side of the house at least are going to have a great deal to say about the remark made by the Leader of the Opposition perhaps in a moment of carelessness, outside the borders of this country. Let me reiterate right now: I see nothing that smacks of perfection regarding the Liberal party's attitude and performance in relation to dominion-provincial relations as such.

I well remember during the last session of parliament that the Leader of the Opposition showed notable chagrin and was extremely annoyed when an hon. member on this side of the house brought up the fact that in order to unite this country in a true fashion we had to recognize the fact that various provinces had different attitudes. In other words, the word "diversity" was used. The Leader of the Opposition was highly annoyed that the subject had even come up in the House of Commons. His annoyance was heightened by the fact that we suggested that everybody should recognize the diversity of the provincial elements making up this country from coast to coast. Let him be annoyed and chagrined but the facts are these, that the divide and rule policies and programs carried out by the Liberal party in this house and throughout the country during the past years and that party's centralist tendencies leave absolutely no room for the recognition of provincial diversity. As a matter of fact the centralist tendencies of hon. gentlemen opposite—and this is an important principle to get over and underline during this present debate—tend to dragoon Canadians in the name of uniformity.

I would be the first to admit that during the war years and post-war years we had emergencies and semi-emergencies with their obvious accompanying centralizing effects. We do not have to read many periodicals and indeed we have only to look abroad to see that certain political leaders and statesmen are trying now to create emergency or semi-emergency conditions in order to centralize powers.

The hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) often wonders why I changed my political allegiance. I can only say to the hon. member that I was never one who subscribed very much to the Howe theory of eternal emergency with its centralizing effects, another concept which I think hon. members alongside do not like to have brought up again and again, but I believe the time has come when they have to admit the basic policies that they adopt in relation to the problem of dominion-provincial relations. We know of one hon. member of the other place who mentioned the fact that his party adopted a policy of pragmatism and expediency and this applies to their attitude in this field.

I do not think the Canadian people will ever forget the debt they owe to the opposition of that time for their performance during the emergency powers debate not so many years ago when complete powers forever were asked for in this Canadian House of Commons—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Does my hon. friend remember that on that very occasion the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) disgraced himself to his lasting disadvantage?

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, that is a misstatement—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I see two hon. members standing.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, Your Honour should have been here a while ago to see the circus we had in your absence when hon. members were interrupting from all sides of the house.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I must reply to the effect that the hon. member for Essex East has made another of his famous misstatements of fact with regard to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. member stated the truth.

Mr. Grafftey: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, my veracity has been challenged—

Mr. Chevrier: Oh, no.

Mr. Grafftey: Well, I withdraw the question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. Nevertheless it is interesting for me to note that apart from the present formal debate we are having in this House of Commons, it is usually the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate

(Mr. Pickersgill) who sallies forth into the waters of dominion-provincial relations. I have noticed that not too many of the hon. members on the front benches of the official opposition—not even the hon. member for Essex East with his usual expertise—has ventured forth into these waters.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member for Essex East has been sick.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think he is still sick.

Mr. Grafftey: I believe it was during the resolution stage of this debate that the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis) brought the following set of facts to the attention of hon. members of this house. He said that when the Liberal party was in power and was advocating the acceptance by the provinces of university grants all hon. members supporting the party of which I am a member said they were no good and that this should not be done. Today the hon. member claims that the present government made up of hon. members of the Progressive Conservative party is advocating the acceptance by the provinces of university grants and now we say they are all right. To a large extent the statement made by the hon. member is correct because during the time of the Liberal reign they tried to superimpose their will on the provinces with a take it or leave it attitude. There was no acceptance method worked out through consultation with the provinces. Just as they forgot the people of the country, they forgot the necessity of consultation on questions of this real and grave importance. Today the difference is that an acceptable method has been worked out by consultation with the provinces—

Mr. Pickersgill: By telegram.

Mr. Grafftey: —by a party that realizes the provinces have their constitutional rights. That is the difference, Mr. Speaker. For that reason I will admit that a lot of what was said by the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville was correct, but I want to tell the hon. member why today we are in essence supporting this bill as opposed to the attitude we took while in opposition.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is because you have a strong whip.

Mr. Grafftey: We have a very excellent whip, Mr. Speaker, who is appreciated and enjoyed by all hon. members of this party of which I am a member. I suggest he perhaps does not use the same dragooning techniques that characterized some of the whips of the previous Liberal administration because I understand that in past days the backbench members of the Liberal party in this house were not too much encouraged by Mr. Howe to get up and express themselves to any extent.

Mr. Pickersgill: How many dissenters are there in the hon. member's party now?

Mr. Grafftey: Pardon?

Mr. Pickersgill: I asked the hon. gentleman, Mr. Speaker, if he would name the dissenters there are in his party right now, apart from the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Van Horne) who has been practically kicked out of the door.

Mr. Grafftey: We are a united team, Mr. Speaker, going ahead together in the best interests of our country. May I call it six o'clock?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I inquire what the business is for tomorrow and Friday? I understand it was announced yesterday and I presume there is no change but I wonder if the house leader would be good enough to indicate what we might be doing next week.

Mr. Churchill: Next week's program, Mr. Speaker, I think could be more properly announced tomorrow night. For tomorrow, Thursday, this debate will continue. If it is terminated we will take the budget resolutions. On Friday we will take the estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Winch: May I ask whether since last night any consideration has been given as to when the debate on the abolition of capital punishment will continue?

Mr. Churchill: The date will be announced in due course.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, May 5, 1960

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

THE LATE WILLIAM L. HOUCK

TRIBUTES TO DECEASED MEMBER FOR NIAGARA FALLS

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, all hon. members of this house have been deeply saddened by the news that since we rose last evening death has claimed one of the members of this house, namely William Limburg Houck, the late member for Niagara Falls.

Every one of us recognizes that in the death of Mr. Houck this country has lost a devoted public servant who in his service in this chamber was always animated by the highest purposes. He entered this chamber in 1953 and was re-elected at the general elections of 1957 and 1958. It is no exaggeration to say that he was one of the most popular and most respected members of this house. This parliament is much the poorer for his passing.

The country has likewise suffered a loss in other respects. The late Mr. Houck was not born in Canada. He had come to this country from the United States. He was educated in that country, and was a graduate of Cornell. He settled in the city of Niagara Falls and over the years had rendered distinguished service not only in his community but in the province of his adoption. He was elected to the Ontario legislature for that riding in 1934 and served as an elected member in the legislature until 1943. From 1937 to 1943 he was a minister without portfolio in the Ontario government and vice-chairman of the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario.

In his community also he enlarged his service in the years from 1947 to 1950 when he served as mayor of the city of Niagara Falls. His community, the province, the country and this parliament have suffered a loss that all of us will feel very keenly.

May I be forgiven one personal remark, Mr. Speaker. I had known Mr. Houck personally for many years, and I think I can say that there existed between us a bond of warm, personal friendship. I am sure there are many other hon. members who had the same warm, personal feeling toward Mr. Houck and who had enjoyed something of the warmth of his friendship and his delightful personal attributes, including his ever-manifest kindness. All of us in that respect are conscious of our personal loss.

On behalf of the government, Mr. Speaker, I extend to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) our special condolences on the loss he has suffered, and I doubt not that I speak for all hon. members of this house, indeed for the Canadian people, in extending to the widow and daughter of our late and highly esteemed member our sincere sympathy in the crushing loss which has fallen upon them.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the members of our party and on my own behalf I would like to thank the Acting Prime Minister for what he has said, and to express to him our appreciation of the way he has said it.

Our hearts, Mr. Speaker, are heavy and sad on this bright and sunny spring day because we have all lost a very dear friend. As the Acting Prime Minister has said, Bill Houck was a man whose whole adult life was spent in public service to his city; and we in the house remember how he loved his city, Niagara Falls, and how impossible it was for him to make a speech in this house on any subject without bringing Niagara Falls into it. He devoted himself to his city, to his province and to his country; not the country of his birth, as the Acting Prime Minister has said, but the country of his choice. He included in this service—and he himself would put it very high in service—the promotion of friendship and good neighbourliness between his two countries.

Because of his service Bill Houck was greatly admired and respected, and because of himself he was greatly loved. Few men have had more friends, and no man has deserved them more. In political life he was a loyal and devoted member of his party. You could always count on him; but he was no narrow partisan, and his friendly feelings recognized no party line. That, of course, is the way it should be. His interests were as broad and deep as his friendships, and he was always anxious to help in any good cause. He will be greatly missed for a very long time, and will not be forgotten by those who had the great privilege of his friendship.

The late W. L. Houck

Mr. Speaker, I join the Acting Prime Minister in extending to Mrs. Houck, whose quiet and deep affection and loyal and unselfish support sustained him over so many years, and to his family our most heartfelt sympathy in their great loss.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, this is one of those sad and difficult occasions which come far too frequently to the House of Commons. We have lost a member of this house who was truly beloved by all hon. members in all parts. This man was exceedingly kind in all his relations with members of his own party and with members of other parties in this house. His was a life of unselfish and devoted service to his country, service which ranged from the municipal level as mayor of Niagara Falls and a long and distinguished service in the Ontario legislature to distinguished service over a number of years in the Canadian House of Commons.

It was my privilege—and I feel the better for it, because of my experience—to be among the delegation from this house which went to Washington last year and which included Bill Houck among its members. During that occasion we came to know one another better. We saw him during all the discussions putting forward very sincerely, very conscientiously and very ably the Canadian point of view.

We extend to Mrs. Houck, to her daughter, and to the leader and members of the Liberal party our sincere sympathy. Canada today lost a very distinguished citizen.

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I join our leaders in paying tribute to the memory of a deskmate, a good neighbour and a true friend.

Bill Houck gave many years of his life to public service and, as has been said, he served his area well. He served it with distinction and great ability as mayor of Niagara Falls, then as a member of the Ontario legislature and latterly as a member of this House of Commons. Because of his great interest in power development it was very natural that he should be appointed as minister to represent the hydro electric power commission in a former government of Ontario. Born in the United States and graduated from a university there, he was always very loyal to his adopted country and to our institutions. He was possessed of those fine qualities which made him a friend to everyone.

We all deeply mourn his passing, and I join with all hon. members here in sending condolences to Mrs. Houck and her family.

Mr. J. M. Forgie (Renfrew North): May I be allowed to say a few words on this mournful occasion. I am sure it came as a shock to everyone in this house to hear that Bill Houck had passed away early this morning. We came into the house together in 1953 and shared the same office until his recent illness.

Bill had no enemies; he was gracious, unselfish, kind, no matter whether it was in his private life or in his political life during which he gave commendable service on three levels as has been already stated. May I take this opportunity of expressing my deepest sympathy to Mrs. Houck and the family in this irreparable loss.

Mr. G. H. Doucett (Lanark): I should like very much to associate myself with those hon. members who have expressed their very deep sympathy in the loss of the late member for Niagara Falls. I had the pleasure of being associated with him over many years in the Ontario legislature and again here in the House of Commons. I can only corroborate those words which were so well spoken by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan) and others as to Mr. Houck's outstanding qualities of citizenship and the efforts he put forth while serving as minister without portfolio in the Ontario legislature to co-operate with each and every member of that body.

Mr. John Smith (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, I would be remiss if at this time I did not rise on behalf of the people of my constituency to express my own personal regret and also the regret of my people at the passing of Bill Houck. Bill's riding was very close to mine. He was a very great personal friend of mine and also an active supporter of the interests of the Niagara peninsula. At this time on behalf of the people of Lincoln county I pay tribute to Mr. Houck and extend my sympathy and that of my constituents to his family and friends.

Mr. L. E. Cardiff (Huron): Mr. Speaker, as one of the older members of the house I wish to join with the other hon. members who have spoken and express my sincere sympathy not only to hon. members of the opposition party but to the rest of the House of Commons at the passing of Bill Houck. He came into the house a few years after I did. I have been his warm friend as he has been mine for many years. I am sure all hon. members of the house will miss him very much. At this time I should like to extend my sympathy to his wife and daughter.

(Translation):

Mr. Theogene Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, may I, on behalf of the members from the province of Quebec, join with all my colleagues who rose in expressing their regret at the passing of my friend Bill Houck. It was given to all of us, at one time or another, to appreciate his many qualities and, above all, his kindliness. I wish to express the sadness felt by all members from Quebec in this bereavement.

TRADE

TABLING OF LETTERS RESPECTING VOLUNTARY LIMITATION OF JAPANESE EXPORTS TO CANADA

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table copies of three letters which I have today received from the ambassador of Japan informing me of certain voluntary export limitations which the Japanese government has decided to impose on shipments to Canada of textile products and stainless steel flatware during the year 1960. The letters themselves are self-explanatory. I would ask the house to give consent to have these letters printed as an appendix to Hansard, if such is the wish of hon. members for their convenience.

If I may I should like to make a few brief explanatory comments explaining the significance of these arrangements, in view of the number of questions that have been put to me in the house from time to time recently by hon. members.

The first letter sets out in detail the arrangements for 1960 in respect of textile products. I can describe these arrangements under four headings. Items 6 to 11, covering cotton fabrics and various cotton products, have been subject to Japanese export restraint for several years now, and it will be observed that for these items the arrangements generally provide for a moderate and orderly increase for the year 1960 as compared with shipments in 1959. There are several exceptions to this, and these occur in the garment items which are particularly sensitive by virtue of the flooding situation which occurred during 1959 for similar items made of spun rayon.

The second category, items 1 to 4, consists of made-up goods of spun rayon which were first brought under export control during 1959. Hon. members will recall that in these items very large increases in Japanese shipments occurred during the year 1959, which created in fact a situation of flooding. For these items the 1960 quota levels are based on the shipments during 1958, and represent a significant decrease from the excessively high levels of 1959.

The third category includes items 5, 12, 13, 14, 15 and 16, for which controls on shipments to Canada are being introduced for the first time. For these products the quota levels are based on 1959 shipments, plus an orderly increase; with the exception of cotton sheets, in respect of which, because of the very large increase in 1959, there will be no change from the level of that year.

The fourth category consists of other secondary textile products on which the Japanese government maintains voluntary controls. Some of these are subject to individual quota control, while others are subject to a general licensing control. The Japanese government has not indicated precise quantitative limits on the shipments of these products to Canada, but it will be observed that in the letter we have been given an undertaking that 1960 shipments will provide for moderate and orderly expansion.

I should also point out that for several categories of garments the former quota groups have been divided into subquotas in order to avoid undue concentration on particular sensitive products.

I should like to say to the house on this occasion that I share the hope expressed by the ambassador of Japan that these controls should effectively preclude any further flooding in textiles, and that Japan in taking these self-restraining measures has helped to pave the way for the further expansion of two-way trade between Canada and Japan on an orderly basis to the mutual benefit of both countries.

May I turn now to make a brief comment on the second letter, which deals with stainless steel flatware. The increases in Japanese shipments of flatware which have occurred in the past few years have been unusually large. The Japanese government has now decided to establish a voluntary control for 1960 which is substantially below the 1959 level of shipments.

The third letter is entirely self-explanatory. It simply reiterates the concern of the Japanese government that a situation should not arise in which third countries are able to expand their sales to Canada by virtue of the fact that Japan has undertaken to limit her shipments of the products concerned.

Finally, I should like to say that consultations are continuing with representatives of the Japanese government concerning the need for export restraints on other products. These include hardwood plywood, rubber-soled canvas and waterproofed footwear, plastic rainwear and several other products.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Acting Prime Minister's announcement is a good one, dealing as it does with trade between Canada and Japan, in view of the fact that Japan is one of our largest and most important markets and becoming, we hope, larger and even more important.

Limitation of Japanese Exports to Canada

In so far as steps have been taken or can be taken to protect our own producers against dumping or unfair competition, there can be no argument against those steps; but, Mr. Speaker, if the Japanese government, by actions which it terms voluntary but which are taken under pressure, adopts policies which create resentment in Japan as being unfair, then if counter action is taken in Japan we in this country would suffer a great deal more than the Japanese would suffer because of the nature of the trade.

We will study these letters. I want to make clear we are not objecting to any steps that can be taken to protect Canadian industries against unfair competition and dumping, but we have to be very careful in connection with action taken against one of our largest customers.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I think the documents that have been referred to by the Acting Prime Minister demonstrate at least one point, namely that inevitably there has to be a measure of planning in respect to international trade. I thank the minister for having sent over copies of these documents, but I do regret that I received them only about midway in his own statement. It would have been much more helpful, Mr. Speaker, if it had been possible to have these documents at least some time beforehand.

We in the C.C.F. think the government's policy in regard to international trade in general should be one of expanding trade. We think that in the days ahead there must be a tremendous expansion in Canadian trade and in world trade, and we feel that the future role of Canada lies in the direction of taking steps to remove trade barriers. However, we are mindful of some of the difficulties experienced by the industries affected by importations of certain goods. We have sympathy for the workers who are on the streets, who have been displaced. We feel that action which is taken against the dumping of goods into this country is something that is necessary.

We do feel, and feel very strongly, that even with a system of planned trade there is room both for a large increase in exports and for a substantial domestic industry with full employment, which we do not now enjoy.

Mr. Speaker: May I ask the house whether it gives unanimous consent to the printing of the documents tabled by the Acting Prime Minister?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[For text of documents referred to, see appendix.]

[Mr. Pearson.]

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. It arises out of the letters he tabled a moment ago in connection with the quota arrangements made between Canada and Japan. As the minister read the letters two questions came to my mind. The first was this. What happens if the quota is exceeded? I understand that under an earlier arrangement, which was far more flexible than this one, the quota with regard to certain of the goods, particularly textiles, was exceeded. Thus, the question I should like to put is, what happens between the two countries if the quotas mentioned in the letter are exceeded, having regard to the item concerning textiles?

The second question is, are the dumping duties superseded by these letters?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): The answer to the first question is that if these quotas were to be exceeded the Canadian government would be entirely free at any time to invoke those provisions of the 1954 treaty of commerce between Canada and Japan under which the Canadian government possesses the right to apply special valuations for duty purposes on imports from Japan. The hon. member will recall the clause, which was written into the agreement by the former government.

I think the second question asked by the hon. gentleman may best be answered by drawing his attention to the final paragraph of the letter from the Japanese ambassador concerning the quantitative restrictions on exports of textiles to Canada. It reads:

In communicating this information to you, I assume that in respect of products listed in the annex to this letter, for which firm quantities are specified, Canada will not, during the year 1960, invoke the provisions of article XIX of the GATT or of the exchange of letters which accompanied the agreement of commerce of 1954 between Canada and Japan.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO DISTRIBUTION OF SCHOLARSHIPS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, or, in his absence, to his parliamentary assistant.

Does the minister have any knowledge of a statement by Mr. Paul Toupin, director of the scholarships division of the Canada

Council, as reported in La Presse of May 4, with regard to commonwealth scholarships, indicating that Laval and Montreal universities will get no part of the million dollars or more to be granted by the Canadian government to 100 or 200 students?

In this statement Mr. Toupin vigorously protests against that injustice.

Can the minister say whether or not the assertion is true, and what action is being considered by the government to correct that situation at once?

(Text):

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs is participating today in a meeting with representatives of the provinces. Notice of the question put by the hon. member for Laurier reached me just before coming into the house.

Mr. Chevrier: I sent it early this morning.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I say that I am not aware on what information the statement to which the hon. member refers purports to be based, but I can assure him that in so far as the commonwealth scholarship program is concerned it is inaccurate to say that the universities of Laval and Montreal will not draw any scholarship holders who qualify for awards under this plan.

The plan provides for what are called inward and outward awards. Those offered by the government of Canada are inward, that is, for students from other commonwealth countries to come to Canada to pursue their studies. It is anticipated that in this category about 100 awards will be made this year and 200 in each of the subsequent years. I understand that from the applications already submitted for this type of award, through selection committees in other countries, a preliminary selection has already been made by the Canadian committee, and that it is quite probable that several of the successful candidates will pursue their studies at Laval, at the University of Montreal and also at the University of Ottawa.

In the case of inward awards, there are no payments made to Canadian universities except nominal amounts to cover actual administrative expenses. The scholar pays his own tuition fee from the amount of his grant.

With regard to outward scholarships, students from any university in Canada are eligible to apply, subject to the conditions agreed upon at the Oxford conference in the summer of 1959 and taking into account the requirements of the governments of the countries offering the scholarships. These governments are responsible for deciding on the number of awards offered to Canadian students and for the payments to successful Canadian candidates. The final selection rests with those committees, but I am sure there is every reason to expect that candidates from the two universities mentioned by the hon. member are as likely to win awards as are candidates from other universities in Canada.

REPORTED STATEMENTS ON APARTHEID BY PRIME MINISTER AND SOUTH AFRICAN REPRESENTATIVE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Leader of the Opposition put to me this question, as reported at page 3537 of Hansard:

> I should like to ask whether he can resolve the apparent contradiction between the statement attributed to the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) in London that he had made clear yesterday to Mr. Louw, the South African representative at the conference, the views of Canada with regard to apartheid, and the statement attributed to Mr. Louw today in reply to a question at a press conference that he did not hear the Canadian views from the Canadian Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker, I was in telephone conversation with the Prime Minister last evening. He confirmed the newspaper reports that he had shortly after his arrival in London held a lengthy conference with Mr. Louw, at which he put before Mr. Louw very clearly and comprehensively the strong views entertained by the Canadian people and the Canadian government in reference to the policy of apartheid.

So far as the statement attributed to Mr. Louw in the press is concerned, I am informed that this press statement was drawn to the attention of Mr. Louw since it was raised in this house by the Leader of the Opposition yesterday afternoon. I am informed that Mr. Louw has stated that the statement attributed to him in the press was not correct, and that he simply said that it was not a matter for him to reveal what any other prime minister has said to him in conversation. I gather that the substance of what Mr. Louw had intended to convey in the statement he made to the press was that there had been no public discussion or any discussion at the formal meetings of the conference of prime ministers on the subject, but he did not intend to convey any suggestion that he had not been fully acquainted with or that he did not understand the views of Canada as a result of the talk with the Prime Minister of Canada.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REQUEST FOR COMMENT ON WINNING OF OHIO STATE AWARDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, as a member of the socialist sector of the opposition I wish to address a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Has the minister's attention been drawn to the news item in this morning's Globe and Mail to the effect the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation won most of the radio honours, and nosed out the United States Columbia Broadcasting System in television prizes, in the 1960 Ohio state awards announced last night? Would the minister care to comment on the success of this Canadian publicly owned corporation in competition with United States free enterprise?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, my attention was not drawn to this. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, with its usual modesty, had not mentioned these honours, and I was not aware of them until the hon. member sent me a copy of the newspaper. Hon. members who are interested will find the report on page 10 of this morning's Globe and Mail, and possibly in other newspapers as well.

This is, of course, in keeping with the record the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has established, not because it is a publicly owned organization, Mr. Speaker, but because it had attracted to it many people who have been associated with private business and because it is most efficiently run.

I think this can be said, without prolonging the matter, that the Ohio state awards are recognized as among the leading awards in North America. It is a great tribute to the corporation that it has succeeded in winning so many awards. I note that, according to one paragraph, of the 32 first awards and honourable mentions for cultural, public service and educational programming, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation won 18. The record is one of which we are all proud, and is in keeping with the record which has been established by this corporation on many occasions in the past.

ROYAL WEDDING—INQUIRY AS TO USE OF JET PLANES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Can the minister inform the house whether it is a fact that the C.B.C. proposes to send not one but two jet planes to bring pictures of Princess Margaret's wedding back to Canada so they can be shown on the same day? If so, can he say approximately how much that will cost?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): I have no knowledge of that matter whatsoever, but I will inquire of the C.B.C.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE FAIR

REPORTED REJECTION OF INVITATION BY MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): I wonder whether the Acting Prime Minister would care to make any comment on the report that Montreal was not chosen as the site of the world exposition in 1967, and whether the government has any alternative plans in mind for the centenary.

Mr. Speaker: I did not hear clearly whether the hon. member is asking a question to the effect that "if" Montreal is not chosen, what would be the government's plan?

Mr. Cardin: No, Mr. Speaker, I was asking whether the Acting Prime Minister had any comments to make following a report that Montreal was not chosen as the site.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, no official report has been received as yet. I am aware of a radio report which may be the source of the hon. member's information, but that is all the information I have had on the subject to date. However, I do expect that in the course of the day there will be an official report from the government's representatives in Paris, and whenever it is received, if the house will permit me to revert to motions at that time, I shall be glad to give the information to the house.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CHEVRIER—CORRECTION OF STATEMENT IN DEBATE ON MAY 4

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I rise on a question of privilege, and it concerns a point which arose out of an answer made by the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys yesterday, when I indicated in my question that the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys had stated that a contract had been given to Autair Helicopters on the D.E.W. line.

I was mistaken. On looking over the statement made by the minister I find that I was unfair to him. I have read it over carefully. What the minister did in fact refer to was that pilots of that company had experience on the D.E.W. line. I have information, of course, to the contrary; none the less, I think I was perhaps doing an injustice to the minister, and I want to apologize to him.

HOUSING

C.M.H.C.—REPORTED FAILURE TO RECOGNIZE STANDARDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Can the minister explain to the house why Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation does not recognize the standards of the Canadian Standards Association and the Canadian Gas Association?

Mr. Speaker: Did the hon. member give notice of his question?

Mr. Regier: Yes.

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): I shall be glad to accept this as notice.

[Later:]

Mr. Walker: A few moments ago the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam asked the following question:

> Can the minister explain to the house why Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation does not recognize the standards of the Canadian Standards Association and the Canadian Gas Association?

May I reply as follows. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation does recognize the standards of the Canadian Standards Association and the Canadian Gas Association. The corporation is represented on some 40 committees of the Canadian Standards Association.

ATOMIC ENERGY

REPORTED PLAN BY U.S. TO SET OFF NUCLEAR DEVICES NEAR ALASKA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct to the Acting Prime Minister a question notice of which was sent to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs. Does the minister care to comment on the report that the United States atomic energy commission has plans to set off four nuclear devices in the coastal area of Alaska? Has the Canadian government been informed of any such plan? Will Canada oppose such explosions prior to the conclusion of the proposed international agreement on nuclear testing?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Acting Prime Minister): Notice of this question given by the hon. member reached me just prior to coming into the house. I am going to suggest with respect to this question that the answer might wait until Monday's sitting. By that time the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green) will have returned from Europe, and I think it more appropriate that the answer to this question come from him personally.

TRADE

WHEAT—REPRESENTATIONS TO U.S. RESPECTING AGREEMENT WITH INDIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce concerning the surplus wheat agreement entered into by the United States and India yesterday. My question is this. Has the Canadian government, either through formal channels or informally, and either verbally or in writing, made any representations to the United States regarding this agreement?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Perhaps the hon. member's question might be answered by this summary of what has taken place.

In accordance with established procedures, both bilaterally with the United States and by the wheat utilization committee, we have been informed and consulted well in advance by the United States authorities regarding the P.L. 480 agreement with India which was concluded yesterday in Washington, D.C.

This agreement involves the supply of 3 million tons of U.S. wheat per year for four years to meet immediate consumption needs in India. In order to safeguard the commercial marketing interests of other wheat exporting countries, the Indian government has undertaken to purchase on commercial terms not less than 400,000 tons of wheat per year. This commercial quota is open to all wheat exporting countries, and is subject to review annually in the light of India's foreign exchange position. The agreement also provides for the supply of 1 million tons of U.S. wheat and 250,000 tons of U.S. rice per year for four years for a food reserve in India, details of which will be negotiated later in the light of the report of the wheat utilization committee mission to the Far East.

In view of the commercial quota of 400,000 tons, which represents a realistic assessment of what India's foreign exchange position will permit, and the fact that the arrangements for the supply of wheat and rice for the food reserve will take full account of the discussions at the next meeting of the wheat utilization committee, we feel that these provide ample safeguards for Canada's commercial interests. For these reasons we expressed no objection to the United States authorities in respect of this agreement, and indeed we extended our appreciation to them for giving us full and early opportunity for consultations.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to ask a supplementary question. Can the minister say whether the Canadian government has given any consideration to similar credit sales by Canada? Does not the minister believe that credit sales of this magnitude would go a long way toward clearing up Canada's wheat surplus?

Mr. Churchill: Credit sales of this magnitude certainly would go a long way toward clearing up Canada's surplus position in wheat, but we are hardly able to conduct our affairs on the same basis as the United States, because we have not the same financial resources. However, in the past we have extended wheat to India on a loan basis. That was done in the years 1957 and 1958, and we have made substantial gifts of wheat and flour to the Colombo plan countries. On the basis of those gifts, rupees have been set up in what are called counterpart funds, and that money is then used by the local governments for improvements within their country.

Mr. Argue: I should like to ask a further supplementary question. Does the current deduction in Canada's credit sales or gifts of wheat to which the minister referred, as compared to 1957, indicate that Canada is abandoning what was a worth-while policy?

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member is drawing conclusions that are not warranted. Our policy continues. It was a bit unfortunate that Mr. Patil was unable through illness to be present here today. We intended to carry on negotiations with him concerning the needs of India for supplies of food.

[Later:]

Mr. McIlraith: I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In his statement he said that the 400,000 tons of wheat per year which India has undertaken to purchase through commercial channels represented a realistic appreciation of the exchange she had available. Is he able to tell us what it represents in relation to the purchase of wheat in the last year or two?

[Mr. Churchill.]

Mr. Churchill: I would have to get the information on that matter rather than rely of memory, and I will do that for the hon. member.

TRANSPORT

AUTAIR HELICOPTERS LIMITED—REPORTED SALE OF COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Yesterday the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) asked whether it is a fact that Autair Helicopters Limited have sold their company to another organization.

I have been advised by the air transport board that an offer has been made by another company to purchase the assets of Autair Helicopters Limited, this purchase being subject to the approval of the air transport board.

NATIONAL REVENUE

MONTREAL—STATEMENT ON REPORTED PARKING CHARGE FOR CARS OF EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): On May 3 the hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Denis) asked this question:

> Is the minister aware that in the income tax building in Montreal there is a large room for the parking of employees' cars, and that the department has now decided to charge the employees $10 rent for the parking of their cars?

The answer, Mr. Speaker, is yes; this garage is for the use of crown owned vehicles and privately owned vehicles of employees, but no charge is being made for parking privileges in this space.

FINANCE

REPORTED STATEMENT BY PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY RESPECTING LENDING INSTITUTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance. Does the minister intend to comment upon the reported statement by his parliamentary secretary that Canada's lending institutions have "abdicated their social responsibility"?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): The statement to which the hon. member has made reference was made by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) who is, I am very proud to say, parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance. It was made at a meeting in the riding of Carleton on May 2, earlier this week. It was not made in the course of a prepared speech; it was a statement made in reply to questions which were put to the hon. member at a public meeting.

I do not know whether the hon. member is asking me if I have any association with the statement. The hon. member for Carleton of course is quite at liberty, in his capacity as member for that riding, to express his views on public questions. I may say that the views which were attributed to him and the report in the Citizen of May 3 concerning the answer given by the hon. member for Carleton are quite in line with views expressed in this house by other hon. members on Tuesday evening in the discussion of the supply motion.

Mr. Fisher: I have a supplementary question, and it is this. It is on the question of ministerial spill-over in terms of responsibility on the part of parliamentary secretaries. How does the minister conceive that responsibility?

Mr. Speaker: I find it difficult to understand the hon. member's question. Unless he can make it clear I do not think I can allow it.

Mr. Fisher: Then may I put it in this way. I am asking the minister if this is a case where the member was speaking purely as a member of parliament for his constituency and not as a parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Speaker: As I understood the first answer, it clearly dealt with the point the hon. member is now raising.

Mr. Garland: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Pickersgill: I have a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. I would like to ask—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I understand the hon. member for Nipissing has a supplementary question.

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Finance whether he agrees with the statement made by his parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, my colleague the Minister of Public Works dealt with this subject very clearly in his remarks on Tuesday evening in reply to various speeches that had been made in the house in the discussion of the supply motion. Views expressed were that the approved lending institutions under the National Housing Act are regarded as having some responsibility in relation to the housing problem. They have a certain status under the act; and the efforts of my colleague, as he reported to the house on Tuesday evening, have been directed toward urging these approved lending institutions to enlarge their participation, their investments, in mortgage loans under the National Housing Act.

I think it is a matter of gratification to all hon. members, and a matter for congratulation to my colleague the Minister of Public Works, that his efforts in that regard are being attended with such evident success.

Mr. Garland: Mr. Speaker, do I take the minister's reply to mean that he is in agreement with the statement made by his parliamentary secretary?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is entitled to draw any conclusion he thinks appropriate.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question to the Minister of Finance was this. Was this a preview of the Tory planned economy?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The minister would doubtless like to answer the question, but it seems to me it is an improper one. So far as I am aware the Minister of Finance has not as part of his public administrative responsibility the—whatever it was the hon. member asked.

Mr. Pickersgill: I quite agree with you, sir.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

PUBLICITY RESPECTING STAMP COMMEMORATING BATTLE OF LONG SAULT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. L. Morris (Parliamentary Secretary to the Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Brassard) asked me a question concerning a commemorative stamp, and in doing so suggested that I take advantage of the simultaneous translation system. I hope, if I endeavour to answer in the language of the question, it will not be necessary for him to do so.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Lapointe asked me yesterday for what reasons the publicity respecting the Dollard des Ormeaux commemorative stamp was issued only in English.

I answered him that I was unaware that any publicity had been issued in one language only, but that I would inquire and give him full particulars today.

The publicity concerning this stamp, which will be issued in both languages on May 19, was made, as I said yesterday, in French and in English, according to the now current practice in the Post Office Department.

Inquiries of the Ministry

I have sent the hon. member several copies of the press releases which were issued in both languages, showing that they were issued simultaneously at 10 a.m. March 24, as well as copies of press reports from 37 French-language papers on this matter.

The hon. member was probably referring to an order form distributed on request to 11,000 stamp collectors across the world, including 800 forms in French. Translation was somewhat delayed, but distribution will be completed today.

Mr. Augustin Brassard (Lapointe): I have no question, Mr. Speaker; I merely wish to thank and congratulate the parliamentary secretary to the Postmaster General.

(Text):

NEWFOUNDLAND—REQUEST FOR STAMP TO COMMEMORATE FOUNDING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): I should like to ask a question of the Postmaster General. In his absence perhaps I might direct it to the Acting Postmaster General.

In view of the fact that the first colony of the British empire was founded by John Guy 350 years ago in Cupids, Conception Bay, would the minister advise whether he has given consideration to commemorating same by a special postage stamp?

Mr. E. L. Morris (Parliamentary Secretary to the Postmaster General): I will answer this question as parliamentary secretary. The hon. member for St. John's West and the hon. member for St. John's East have also asked me a similar question today. The answer is that the Postmaster General will give consideration to the issuance of such a commemorative stamp and I shall be glad to inform all three hon. members as soon as a decision is taken.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO AUTHORITY FOR REPAYMENT PROVISION RESPECTING LOANS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Finance if he will be good enough to advise the house under what authority, with regard to loans by the Bank of Canada to the unemployment insurance commission, it is provided in the order in council of January 19 that the loans be repaid from the proceeds of the sale of government of Canada direct and guaranteed bonds at the sole discretion of the Minister of Finance.

[Mr. Morris.]

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in that mass of verbiage I have not yet distinguished the question, and I would ask the hon. member to state it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I would be very glad to assist the Minister of Finance who obviously, because of his prime ministerial obligations, has not been able to attend to his responsibilities as Minister of Finance. The order in council tabled yesterday provides that the loans be repaid from the proceeds—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I did not ask the hon. gentleman to read the whole order in council. I asked him to put his question briefly and to the point, in accordance with the rules.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Minister of Finance, who is acquiring a facility that is characteristic only of prime ministers, will perhaps allow me to put the question as I wish; that is, to ask him what is his authority for having in this order in council the following condition, that the loans be repaid from the proceeds of the sale of government of Canada direct and guaranteed bonds at the sole discretion of the Minister of Finance. Why does the Minister of Finance disregard the act? Why does he disregard the order of the investment committee?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has put his question; he need not argue it now.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The authority, Mr. Speaker, is an enactment of this parliament, namely, the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. Will the minister indicate what section of the act provides that this kind of condition is to apply at the sole discretion of the Minister of Finance and not the investment committee?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have not the act here, but my recollection is that the section is No. 20 or thereabouts. In any event, it is the section to which I drew the attention of the hon. gentleman last year when he was bringing up this same subject, as he did in such an irrelevant and discursive way on so many occasions.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I suggest to the Minister of Finance—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: That is not a usual prefix for a supplementary question. I hope the hon. member is not going to attempt to resume a debate which was concluded yesterday.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What I am resuming now is a matter which affects the rights—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —the rights of all hon. members, arising out of the assumption by the Minister of Finance of an authority—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member will ask his supplementary question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I was simply dealing with your own intervention, Mr. Speaker. You asked me a question, and I was replying to it. Will the Minister of Finance tell this house upon what authority he has authorized an order in council to be passed saying that the loans are to be repaid at the sole discretion of the Minister of Finance? What section of the act gives him that authority? I say to him that there is no such authority.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If I may extract the question from the speech which has been delivered by the hon. gentleman, including all his errors in the interpretation of the statute law, may I say that when he asks me on what authority I permitted an order in council to be passed in this form it is necessary to point out to him that under a democratic government the Minister of Finance does not permit the cabinet to pass orders in council. The cabinet, in the exercise of the authority conferred upon it by this parliament under the Unemployment Insurance Act, makes orders in council as it sees fit in accordance with the act, on certain recommendations. In this case the order in council follows a recommendation, and follows it very properly. There are precedents for orders in council in this form, and I commend to the hon. gentleman a better understanding of the processes of true democratic government.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Since this matter is so important I put another question to the Minister of Finance. Will the hon. gentleman indicate in precise language what authority exists in any statute of this parliament whereby such loans under such conditions are to be repaid, not at the instance of the investment committee or of the unemployment insurance commission, but solely at the discretion of the present Minister of Finance, on behalf of an all-powerful and omniscient government?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am sorry, but I have not a copy of the Unemployment Insurance Act here. If the hon. gentleman had given me notice of his question I should have been very pleased to bring a copy of the act with me. I do not profess to recall all the provisions of the act in precise terms from memory, but I can assure the hon. member that the act authorizes loans on terms and conditions, and the proper term and condition here was one calling for a repayment at the instance of the minister who, under the statute, and under the order in council promulgated under the terms of the statute, makes the loan. The loan is repayable under the statute to the Minister of Finance, who is the minister who makes the loan, in accordance with the authority I have described.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Ridiculous.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What could be more natural than that the order in council should make provision for repayment to the Minister of Finance under terms and conditions properly appointed for that purpose?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Out of trust funds?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. gentleman asks why provision is not made for repayment at the instance of the investment committee. How ludicrous. The investment committee, in this case, acts for the borrower. Once again the hon. gentleman has got it all mixed up.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is the way the minister treats trust funds.

Mr. Hees: Stick to the pitchfork and give up the pen, Paul.

Mr. Pearson: That should go in Hansard; it is worthy of a minister.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ELLIOT LAKE—INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce when he expects to be in a position to announce to the house the federal program of assistance to Elliot Lake.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): An announcement concerning such assistance as may be rendered to Elliot Lake by the federal government will be made tomorrow.

BELL ISLAND, NFLD.—VOCATIONAL TRAINING FOR UNEMPLOYED MINERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. McGrath (St. John's East): I have a question for the Minister of Labour. Can the minister state whether the government has received any positive reply to the offer of the federal government, made in a letter from the Minister of Labour to the premier of Newfoundland in October of 1959, with regard to the establishment of a vocational training program for unemployed miners in Bell island, Newfoundland?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): I know the deep and continuing interest which the hon. member for St. John's East has in this question, and I can only inform him that up to the present the matter is still being considered by the government of Newfoundland.

Mr. McGrath: A supplementary question. Would the minister prevail upon the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) to use his good offices and persuade the premier of Newfoundland to get this program going?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think it is unnecessary to comment on that question.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I was rising to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Are persons who are unemployed and in receipt of unemployment insurance benefits permitted to receive such benefits while attending vocational training courses?

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member telephoned my office and advised us of his intention to ask this question. The situation is simply this. Under schedule "M" of the vocational training agreement with the provinces, unemployed persons who are registered with the national employment service may be directed to approved training courses and may continue to receive the benefits to which they are entitled by their contributions while attending such courses. This is done in the case of persons for whom no immediate employment is available and who have good prospects of obtaining employment after following such courses.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, could I ask the hon. gentleman a supplementary question. Would that apply to the miners of Bell island?

Mr. Starr: Under the terms of reference, I think so.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am asking the minister if it does apply to the miners of Bell island at the present time.

Mr. Starr: If a training school is established on Bell island and the miners are directed by the local employment office to take these courses, and if their contributions are sufficient to permit them to draw benefits, then of course it would apply.

[Mr. McGrath.]

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister see that the hon. member for St. John's East is informed of the correct facts so he can pass them on to his constituents?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

REQUEST FOR COMMENT ON REPORTED REMARKS OF PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the Acting Prime Minister whether when the Prime Minister said in London that "this year we shall be able to welcome and absorb into employment many tens of thousands of immigrants to Canada" he was making a considered statement of government policy or whether this was merely another vision.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister of Canada always makes considered statements of a kind which I hope will be a model to hon. members, including the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

UPLANDS, ONTARIO—REPORTED TOWING AWAY OF AUTOMOBILES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Acting Minister of National Defence. In view of the statement made by the minister during the week on the investigation at Uplands, is the acting minister in a position to make a report?

Mr. Egan Chambers (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, a brief answer to the hon. member's question is that no legal suit has been taken against the commanding officer.

The problem of abandoned and derelict automobiles on service property is not a new one. In this case orders were promulgated in March and April that parking stickers would not be issued to cars not equipped with 1960 license plates. In early April a survey was made of the parking lots on the station, and a number of vehicles lacking 1960 license plates appeared to have been abandoned by their owners. On the 22nd April some 25 automobiles were removed, some to nearby service stations and others which were in very poor condition to the R.C.A.F. dump. While the dump is well posted, indicating that it is out of bounds to trespassers, unauthorized persons did gain entry and removed some parts of these vehicles. I understand the Ottawa city police are presently investigating.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL TAX-SHARING ARRANGEMENTS ACT

ALTERNATIVE ARRANGEMENTS FOR UNIVERSITY GRANTS—EXTENSION OF INDIVIDUAL INCOME TAX RATE

The house resumed, from Wednesday, May 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) for the second reading of Bill No. C-56, to amend the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act.

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, before six o'clock yesterday I was talking not so much about party doctrine —because I should like to emphasize that unlike my hon. friends alongside, the party which I support is not hidebound by doctrine —but rather was attempting to point out some principles which guide the party which I support in relation to the subject of dominion-provincial relations.

I pointed out the fact that one of the real reasons why a workable agreement has been brought about between the federal government and the provinces in relation to the subject before us today is that our party, in an atmosphere of good will, has produced an acceptable method. I pointed out that one of the principles our party has always adhered to since its inception, and one of the ideas it has always strongly upheld, is a high regard for local self-agency. I feel this should be emphasized, because I am now talking about the party principles which have guided, perhaps, the two major parties in our country since confederation.

I feel, moreover, that in normal times the Liberal party has adopted centralist principles which do not lend themselves to solving problems of this type. I am sure that today the Liberal party finds itself on the horns of a Hamlet type "to be or not to be" dilemma, and is confronted with a situation in which the Leader of the Opposition is prone to say, "on the one hand" or "on the other hand".

I know I will be accused of asking the traditional question, "How are you going to vote?" But I do ask my Liberal friends how they are going to vote on the bill. On the one hand they must realize that if they vote against it they will be depriving the universities of the province of Quebec of the moneys that will be granted to them under this legislation, and they know they will be voting against a workable method which has been brought about after consultation between this government and the various governments of the provinces. They know this is the case.

On the other hand I asked myself the question, "How are they possibly going to support this bill after days and days of talking against so many principles which are inherent in it?" I am sure these questions have occurred to the Leader of the Opposition and the supporters who sit behind him, and I repeat that they find themselves on the horns of their traditional Hamlet type "to be or not to be" dilemma.

I now want to go further down the chamber and discuss the attitude of the C.C.F. toward this legislation. I have always known that even after having deserted most of their nationalization policies this party supports a degree of centralization which does not lend itself well to enhancing a good atmosphere in relation to dominion-provincial relations. But now we have another spokesman for the C.C.F., who made in this chamber not long ago what I can only term as one of the most unfortunate speeches to which I have listened since, as a young man, I entered the field of politics.

I ask the Leader of the C.C.F. today this question. When the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) spoke on this bill in this House of Commons, was he speaking for his party; or was he possibly speaking for the new party that—I hear an interruption from behind the curtain which is highly unparliamentary. I ask this question; it has to be answered. Will the leader of the C.C.F. party say that when the hon. member for Port Arthur spoke on this bill he was speaking as the spokesman for his party or for the new party they think they formed recently?

I reiterate, sir, that I know the hon. member, as he so often does, made a speech, and he hopes that some of us will give him the attention he wants. I have actually spoken to my confreres on both sides of the house, and a lot of them feel the silent treatment for him is the best thing, but I propose to give him and his speech a little attention.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I cannot help wondering how a man who has seldom set foot in the province of Quebec can discuss any aspect of our affairs as though he was an old hand at it, as he has been doing in this house. I must point out that his speech was no help to national unity or to mutual understanding between the various provinces and the central government. As always the hon. member failed to convey the true feeling of the population in my province.

(Text):

Sir, I called his speech an unfortunate one. As I listened to the hon. member for Port Arthur speak on this bill, sir, I could not help but say to myself that true intellectualism is never paraded, but it is made of humbler stuff. I am asking a very simple question basically—maybe it is almost too simple, but after listening to the hon. member for Port Arthur I cannot help but ask, has he ever read the British North America Act? Does he realize that under section 92 education is given to the provinces and that therefore it is a provincial responsibility?

But no, sir; with his chip on the shoulder of intellectualism he does not realize that life is more than an intellectual proposition. He spoke about things in my province which are deeply felt and deeply believed in. For a man who has very rarely visited Quebec he gave us quite a dissertation on a few of the things that were troubling him. When I was listening to him I could not help but wish that he would use this place more often as a debating chamber rather than a lecture hall, carrying the intellectual load of this house on his massive shoulders. At any rate, I can assure the hon. member for Port Arthur that the English-speaking minority of my province enjoy the fullest and most complete rights. I should like to state that speeches such as his completely misrepresent the spirit of Canadianism which is being fostered by the Prime Minister of this country.

Speeches of this sort do not help national unity as we see it on this side of the house; in fact they hurt it. Sometimes it is very hard to deal with speeches like this; but, sir, did you notice one thing during the speech of the hon. member for Port Arthur? There were subtle influences, sir, subtle innuendos. In his very bland, offhand way he said every member of this house had a bipartisan approach to that expression which we call national unity. He said every member in every party in this house had a bipartisan approach to national unity, and then what did he come up with? He came up with more innuendos in his speech. He went on to imply that my party had taken an entirely different attitude toward French-speaking Canadians and the province of Quebec. This is just another example of the divide and rule technique; and if you think the divide and rule boys alongside me in this house are bad, you should see them on the hustings. There they are much worse; it is just terrible.

In his speech in this house the hon. member for Port Arthur spoke about the speaker who had preceded him. He said he felt the speaker who preceded him on this bill put a narrow and selfish interpretation on the constitution. I ask the hon. member for Port Arthur to be more specific in his criticism of the speaker who preceded him. Perhaps the interpretation the other speaker put on the constitution just happened to be different from the interpretation of the hon. member for Port Arthur. But, sir, is that not the typical socialist attitude toward public opinion? They say, "You might not like the medicine; it has not been popularly accepted, but by golly you are swallowing it anyway, whether you like it or not." That is the sort of disregard for public acceptance of principle that they have, sir.

Then the hon. member for Port Arthur talked about what he called the Churchill thesis. Let us be very clear about this, sir. I noticed that he did not go into this subject in very great detail, because he knew that details would show up his innuendoes for what they were. Let me tell the house that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) never implied that it would be desirable for the majority party in this house not to have a strong contingent from Quebec. That is the type of divide and rule—

Mr. Pickersgill: Misquoted again.

Mr. Grafftey: The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has now joined the divide and rule brigade. I knew he supported divide and rule in regard to his own province, but now he is joining it on a coast to coast basis.

Let me say this, Mr. Speaker. The inference does not stand up very well when the facts are known, and I put them on the record now. The hon. member for Port Arthur made the following statement: "It really did not need its Quebec supporters." He was there referring to the Progressive Conservative party. Well, in all solemnity I can only say I do not share the views of the hon. member for Port Arthur on national unity, and I do not think very many hon. members in this house share them. An utterance such as this in his speech was not worthy of the hon. member. I know he will shrug it off with his usual—you know what I mean—smile. The fact is, he is on the record; he said it. How is he going to answer it?

This sort of bland intellectualism is fine, sir, but he is on the record. He then went on to suggest that spokesmen for the province of Quebec and the authorities in the province of Quebec have tried to veto things that were acceptable to the rest of Canada. Let us also keep that record straight, sir. Never have spokesmen from the province of Quebec, never have the authorities of Quebec, attempted to impose their views on other provinces in the Dominion of Canada.

He talked about the citizens of my province having a conceit, a superiority complex, about the spirit of Canadianism. How utterly ridiculous. In fact I am at a complete loss for words with which to reply to such a statement. Let me say this.

Mr. Winch: That will be something, when you are at a loss for words.

Mr. Grafftey: I can only say that the citizens of my province support that spirit of Canadianism which we have under the leadership of the present Prime Minister, a Canadianism which is not conceited and which does not reflect a superiority complex. I do not want to go into that remark any further, but I think—in fact, I am sure—that all hon. members recognize it just for what it is.

At page 2825 of Hansard the hon. member spoke very generally about the federal government and education. I have read his remarks 10, 11, 12 times and I cannot make head or tail of what he meant. It is not clear to me, and I am sure it is going to have to be much clearer. Certainly, if he is the spokesman for the C.C.F. party, that opinion will have to be much clearer before that party can come up with anything like an acceptable method in connection with dominion-provincial relations and the question we are discussing today.

Toward the end of his speech, the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) said, we are not Quebecers, we are Canadians. I suppose this is what we might call good "bull session" talk, but how ridiculous it sounded on the floor of this house. Now, sir, when I am talking about local pride and self-agency, I am talking about a principle in which the Conservative party believes. Can I not be a loyal citizen of my village of the eastern townships and of the province of Quebec, and at the same time be a good Canadian? I have met a lot of loyal members from the great province of Ontario. Is the hon. member for Port Arthur not proud of the fact he is from Ontario, just as some members are proud they are westerners and just as other members are proud they are maritimers? How ridiculous that statement is. Surely, the love and affection we have for our families and our immediate locale is a part, the seed as it were of our broader public affections. I can imagine the hon. member for Port Arthur going to New York, to the United Nations, and saying, I am not a Canadian. It seems to me that "the one world attitude" does not thus dictate.

He really rose to great heights in talking about the Canadian constitution and dominion-provincial relations in general. Then, you know what he did, Mr. Speaker, he quoted at length from Professor Lamontagne. I can only tell all hon. members that they need only look at the last election results in the constituency in which Professor Lamontagne ran to see the reception his views on the constitution were accorded in my province. In any event, the hon. member for Port Arthur held him up as an expert.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me state this: Today, the party which I have supported, the party which forms the government of this country, is adhering to its time proven principles. The party of confederation realizes that we have a constitution, that the constitution is more than a piece of paper; by realizing that the provinces have their rights, the party which I support is ushering in a new era of dominion-provincial relations which will enhance that Canadianism on which a greater and more unified Canada will be built.

(Translation):

Mr. Jean-Paul Racine (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, as I am not an expert in constitutional law, I had not intended to take part in this debate, but after listening to the Solicitor General (Mr. Balcer) I don't think anyone has to be much of a jurist to speak as he did.

His remarks were more in the nature of a tribute of appreciation to the provincial party responsible for his own election; they threw very little light on some points of the constitution.

University grants were established by the government at the request of the universities themselves and following the Massey commission report in 1950, because the universities were in financial difficulty. The St. Laurent government took action on the request at the time of the 1951-52 budget and at that time the house unanimously approved the measure.

In 1956 Mr. St. Laurent amended the act to provide that the funds would accumulate if some universities temporarily refused the grants.

That amendment, like the annual payments into the fund, was unanimously approved by the house. Thanks to the foresight of Mr. St. Laurent's administration, it is now possible for Quebec universities to recover those $25 million of which they have been deprived for the last eight years because of the malady which had been afflicting the leader of the Union Nationale, an autonomy obsession, as the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Fortin) said in Winnipeg.

Those university grants were not a mere whim on the part of the former Liberal government; for in the Massey report of 1950 we read the following:

> The development of our country from every point of view is dependent upon our ensuring that through adequate training our ablest young people are equipped to carry out the tasks which they will be called upon to perform. Because of their financial circumstances, however, many of those potentially capable of playing an important role in the nation's development are unable, under present conditions, to get the necessary education. A national system of scholarships at all university levels is therefore necessary in our country, and it must be founded upon adequate federal aid for the education of our ablest young men and women.

That same quotation may be found in the 1958 brief on government assistance to education.

First among those who recognized the practical measures designed to implement the recommendations of the Massey commission was Mr. St. Laurent himself, one of the public men most likely to inspire popular confidence, because of his obvious sincerity, of his dislike for opportunists and his recognized competence in constitutional law. Thus were grants distributed through the Canadian Universities Foundation to all universities of Canada during the fiscal year 1951-52.

But, afterwards, the Quebec Union Nationale government denied the universities the right to accept those grants offered through the conference, alleging that they were unconstitutional.

For eight years, the Union Nationale government took no apparent step or failed to submit any proposal to solve the problem, if problem there was. It is only on October 16, 1959, that Mr. Sauve, on behalf of the Quebec government, opened discussions with the federal government in order to come to an agreement and to recover the aforesaid $25 million, which has led to the bill now under review.

By virtue of this bill, Ottawa assumes the right to determine the amount of income a province may take out of a provincial tax levied for provincial purposes. Moreover, the federal government assumes as a matter of course the right to recover from equalization payments, any surplus yielded by the new provincial tax in lieu of federal university grants. Finally, the federal Minister of Finance reserves the right to decide whether arrangements made between provincial authorities and universities are satisfactory.

While speaking of the grant system introduced during the financial year 1951-52, the Solicitor General stated, and this is from page 3288 of Hansard for April 26:

—any legislation which finds its place in only nine provinces out of ten and is not acceptable to the tenth province leaves a very grave doubt as to its constitutionality.

Therefore, what the Solicitor General and his Tory friends from Quebec described at one time as unconstitutional must have become a matter admitting of no categorical answer because he himself admits that it is a doubtful one.

If that is the case, why did the Quebec government, the Union Nationale and the Solicitor General fail to refer the matter to the supreme court? That would have been the best way to show they really meant to give financial assistance to universities.

It would be certainly interesting to hear the Solicitor General's reply to that question.

Incidentally, as I am not a lawyer, mine is only a layman's knowledge of the matter—

An hon. Member: We can see that.

Mr. Racine: —and because of the Solicitor General's expressed doubt regarding the question of constitutionality, I would much rather approve the attitude of a man of recognized experience and ability, like the former prime minister, Mr. St. Laurent.

This legislation, designed to replace the former one, is a direct encroachment upon an exclusively provincial field by the federal government.

To use an expression preempted by the Union Nationale, I would say that, never since confederation, had a federal government had the audacity to invade in such direct fashion the administrative jurisdiction of a province.

Never has a federal government dictated to a province how it should spend its budget; yet such will be the result of this.

The federal government is telling the provinces to raise the income tax on corporations from 9 to 10 per cent and to spend the extra revenue on grants. However, if the yield of that tax exceeds $1.50 per capita, the said province is required under this act to hand over the balance to the federal government.

This Tory measure, I repeat, is direct interference in the administration of provincial affairs. And this is the kind of measure which has the approval of that so called autonomist, the Solicitor General, as evidenced by page 3287 of Hansard for April 26, 1960, where he said:

I am happy and proud, as a Conservative cabinet minister and as a member from Quebec, to be able to say we have contributed to this worthy cause by finding a solution to the problem of financial aid to universities.

That worthy cause referred to by the Solicitor General is an encroachment, a violation, and a backward step, to use the terms of Montreal's La Presse.

Refusing to betray the past of the Union Nationale, the Conservative members of the house prefer to betray the rights of the province.

Mr. Tremblay: What are you saying?

Mr. Racine: To them, whether here or in Quebec, the only thing that counts is power, even at the cost of depriving some of our young people of a university education, when parents earn too little to pay tuition fees that are too high for most families in the working classes.

Just to prove my point, let me refer to a table prepared in 1956 by the National Federation of Canadian University Students, on the basis of information contained in reports submitted to the Tremblay commission by Laval University, Montreal university and the Federation des Colleges classiques de la province de Québec.

The most striking feature, in my opinion, is that 41.2 per cent—therefore almost half—of those students come from the wealthiest social classes which, in the province, form only 10.4 per cent of the working population.

In other words, the children of 89.6 per cent of the population have available for them only a little more than half the university capacity.

During the present debate, the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Lafreniere) mentioned, as reported on page 9 of the appendix to Hansard for April 26, that during the period when the provincial government would not accept federal grants, universities had been treated generously since they had been receiving grants from the provincial government. And he went on to say:

> To the figures I then mentioned I now wish to add that, since 1945, the Quebec government has paid to universities in my province the substantial amount of $112,036,297.38.

I do not challenge those figures given by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency; he will however not deny, I hope, that those provincial discretionary grants were derived from the taxes paid to the province by Quebec taxpayers.

Nor will he deny that, since the fiscal year 1951-52, the Quebec citizen has been paying a double tax for this purpose, that paid to the provincial government for university grants, and the one paid to the federal government for grants to universities of all the provinces, except Quebec.

Nor can he deny that, if Quebec had cooperated and made constructive suggestions, the amounts spent by the provincial government to replace the federal grants would have been used, over the last eight years, as a provincial scholarships fund, so as to assist the sons of 89.6 per cent of the Quebec population made up for the most part of workers and farmers, who now account for barely more than half the university registrations.

It is not unfair to assume that, had it not been for the negative attitude of the Union Nationale government, many farmers' and workers' sons could have entered university through an altogether different policy of the Quebec government.

And I am not alone in thinking that the Quebec government's policy was one of no compromise.

I refer now to Hansard for April 13, 1959, at page 2649, to quote a statement made by the Conservative member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard) about grants to universities:

> That is why if the Quebec government cares to offer a suggestion, to make an official proposal, an appropriate and constructive one, I am positive that this government will consider it with great care and that, eventually, a decent solution will be found in this field.

This is hardly what the Union Nationale government has been doing for eight years.

They preferred to stick to their policy of no compromise; to ride their hobbyhorse of autonomy, a rickety one at that, by the Solicitor General's own admission, as far as the Liberal formula is concerned. However, I must admit, Mr. Speaker, that while this horse paid off plenty at the pari mutuel, in other words was of great help in winning provincial elections, it has handicapped a whole generation of workers' and farmers' sons who could have been helped by the province to the extent of the grants paid by their parents to the central government.

The universities themselves would have been only too happy, in view of their great need, to accept the grants established by the St. Laurent government.

Let me refer to Le Devoir for March 28, 1959 and read a few lines under the heading:

> Federal grants must be recovered for Quebec universities
> The University of Montreal alumni association and the federation of the Quebec junior boards of trade have again noisily taken up the moot question of education. Both groups call for immediate and positive steps to recover the substantial federal grants that universities and other educational institutions are unable to collect at the very time when their financial plight causes the deepest concern.
> But, as was to be expected, Mr. Duplessis cold shoulders such initiatives and is not shy about deploring what he terms university "megalomania".

Two general solutions are suggested: (a) Alumni of the University of Montreal are planning to set up a federation, grouping graduates of all universities in the province, which would become, in Quebec, the counterpart of the Canadian Universities Foundation and could undertake the management and equitable distribution of federal grants. (b) The federation of junior boards of trade proposes, in its brief submitted to Mr. Duplessis, the setting up of a provincial commission on universities and colleges, which would be responsible for the fair distribution of federal and provincial grants.

The suggestions made at the time by those organizations are substantially the same, we have to admit, as those proposed by the Hon. Jean Lesage and the provincial Liberal party. The hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin) stated yesterday that the Hon. Jean Lesage was a new Duplessis.

In making such a statement the hon. member does not know that the Hon. Mr. Lesage was a member of the Liberal government which instituted those university grants, thus recognizing the needs of those institutions.

Nor, assuredly, has he taken a good look at the provisions of this bill, which constitutes a direct encroachment on the administration of provincial affairs.

Mr. Duplessis was denying universities the right to receive the grants entrusted by the federal government to the Canadian Universities Foundation which, itself, was handing them over to the universities, without any strings attached.

This bill allows for the payment of these grants providing the Minister of Finance controls the province and the amounts paid to the universities, and those are the very conditions which are unacceptable and Mr. Lesage is absolutely right in refusing them, as he expresses the public opinion prevailing in the province.

Going back to the same item of Le Devoir which I quoted a while ago, I note that the universities were not always free to state their acceptance of the federal grants.

It is our purpose to act as a buffer, said Mr. Langlois. We want the universities dissociated from the provincial government and we want somehow to express what the universities are not free to say.

Facts show, added Mr. Tellier, that university authorities in Quebec are not willing to speak and whenever they do the opinion uttered is contrary to that expressed off the record.

Mr. Simon Langlois, whom I just quoted, was the second vice president of the Montreal university alumni association, and promotor of the plan is Mr. Claude Tellier.

[Mr. Racine.]

Some Tory members from Quebec set themselves up as the true defenders of provincial autonomy, under the delusion that the Conservative government is the sole guardian of provincial autonomy.

That is why Mr. Andre Laurendeau wrote in Le Devoir for September 9:

First of all, the Diefenbaker government, far from reversing its predecessors' policy, is giving it increased momentum: Canadian universities will receive an additional $8½ million from Ottawa... The first startling fact is the attitude of the central government. During the elections, the Quebec partisans of Mr. Diefenbaker described him as a fierce autonomist. Well, what is he doing in the vital field of education? Precisely what Mr. St. Laurent had done after the Massey report. Consequently, the Quebec Conservatives voted in favour of legislation which had been partly promoted by the Rev. Father George H. Levesque, o.p., a former colleague of Mr. Massey's. What a strange turn of events—

The present legislation proves that the Conservatives want to encroach upon provincial administration, and it is revolting to see all Quebec Conservative members of the Duplessis school now oppose what they have preached in the past. They will vote for a formula of interference in the provincial field, whereas the one they criticized, though doubtful according to the Solicitor General seemed to us Liberals to have no strings attached and to involve no encroachment upon the academic field, since the federal government was making those grants through the Canadian Universities Foundation.

Conservative members from Quebec tried, as they are doing now, to praise the provincial government's action with regard to our people. Now, if we refer to a report by Mr. Paul Doyon published in October 1958, in Le Devoir, we find that while those grants were being rejected for doubtful reasons, we were lagging behind the other provinces.

Further on, the article says that the University of Montreal received 36 per cent of its budget from the provincial government.

We can therefore see that the effort made by the Quebec government failed to equal the assistance received by universities in other provinces, because according to the same report, while, for instance, the University of Montreal was receiving 36 per cent of its budget in grants, universities in Ontario were getting 42.27 per cent, when federal assistance was added to provincial grants.

The people of Quebec will certainly realize that the position taken by the Union Nationale and by Ottawa Conservatives always had and still has no other purpose than to make political capital at the expense of common sense.

So as to define exactly the Conservative position when they profess a genuine wish for autonomy, I should like to quote a few paragraphs from the writings of a public relations man for the Union Nationale and the Conservative party.

That man, a teller of tales about Quebec, said this when dealing with the Quebec Conservatives in a Montreal weekly dated April 30, 1960.

> Never in our parliamentary history has the province of Quebec been so little defended by its federal members.
> Never was such a weak delegation sent to Ottawa. It will be remembered that, even at the time of Bennett, the Quebec section of the Conservative party was pathetic. And little wonder, for what Quebec member of parliament, whether a minister, a parliamentary assistant or a private member, can boast of having achieved anything worth while?

About the cabinet ministers' lack of influence the item adds:

> No, wonder, then, that French-Canadian members have no influence on the government. Prime Minister Diefenbaker has a solid background as a centralizer and an imperialist.

Concerning provincial autonomy the author has this to say:

> As for the vital question of provincial autonomy, the Conservative government did not remedy any of the encroachments made by the Liberal government.

Of course, as a publicist for the Union Nationale, the writer is tearing into the Liberal party.

Yet in closing, he refers to the record of the Conservatives in Ottawa, and tells them they will not last out their five years.

The Conservatives are now adoring what they had been denouncing for ten years, and they are prepared to accept this unconstitutional formula and to support it with explanations that are rather lame, to say the least.

You, present Conservative members from Quebec, you, supporters of the Union Nationale, you are being inconsistent; you are bartering the rights of the province for a mess of potage.

Mr. Noel Drouin (Dorchester): Mr. Speaker, I am happy and proud, as a member from the province of Quebec, to take the floor in this house in wholehearted support of this bill. The problem of federal assistance to Quebec universities is one which, for several years, has been causing concern among our French-speaking fellow citizens.

It is a problem which is now hard to solve. However, during the last federal election, the Conservative party had promised the people of Quebec to solve it. We made that promise and we have fulfilled it. It was a nasty problem, and the solution was not an easy one, but, thanks to the good will of the Quebec provincial government and of the federal government, a happy formula was found. The formula which the then government had proposed was unacceptable. Constituting as it did a direct encroachment upon the most sacred rights of the province of Quebec, it was rejected by the government of that province, by the universities, and by the people themselves. It was legislation that could only harm national unity and jeopardize the friendship which exists between the two great races.

I have no hesitation in saying that while the then government had realized the serious problem which our teachers had to face, the former government thought it could settle everything without taking into account Canadian historical and political realities, that is to say, respect for the rights of both sides. It even tried to make us believe that the province of Quebec was a province like the others. Mr. Speaker, I do say and believe on the basis of history and of the rights which were granted to us, that the province of Quebec is not a province like the others, and this belief goes back to the treaty of Paris, which was an inspiration for the fathers of confederation.

While the tide of battle had made us losers on the Plains of Abraham, we got more honourable terms under the treaty of Paris, whereby France yielded Canada to Great Britain, which, in return, swore on the honour of the imperial crown to respect the traditions, religion and language of French-speaking Canadians in Canada.

Unfortunately, this promising treaty did not bring peace to the country. For close to a hundred years, Canada was in a turmoil, and rights were violated on both sides; it was practically impossible to organize education in a reasonably satisfactory way, or promote prosperity in the country.

Need I again recall in this house that, in 1867, men of good will and of great ability, energy and vision, namely Sir John A. Macdonald and Cartier, gave to the Canadian nation that sacred document, the constitution, under which the powers were divided between the central government and the governments of the provinces, the latter being allowed to elect a government responsible for shaping its internal policies on the basis of the language, customs and traditions of its people.

That is why its terms are clear and in the constitution can be interpreted in only one way when it deals with education. It is clearly said that this field exclusively belongs to the provinces. If this document brought peace in 1867 and allowed two great races to live side by side, why would it be necessary to amend it in 1960, at the very moment when Canada is showing the whole world an example of harmonious and prosperous coexistence.

No one will venture to deny that the British North America Act is a modus vivendi between French-speaking and English-speaking Canadians. The government at the time, in drafting its formula, had looked the other way to avoid seeing the vivid historical realities of the province of Quebec, with the result that, while the English provinces could receive moneys collected by Ottawa to assist universities, the population of Quebec was taxed like the others but its universities were forced to refuse the gifts from the central power.

There was amazement, outside the province of Quebec, at the fact that year after year the leaders of that province were turning down the gifts proferred by the central power. Our opponents even said that we were backward, bunglers and anti-Canadian. I am even prepared to believe that they are responsible for the ungracious remarks made about us by the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher), when he said that, when he comes into the province of Quebec, he encounters only a feeling of hostility. I invite him to come over and see me, and I will give him a taste of French hospitality on the very soil where the finest pages of the glorious history of Canada were written and lived.

Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is the first leader of a Canadian government to recognize that the French language and its related culture are a part of the basic freedoms whose survival it is important to guarantee.

We, from the province of Quebec, realize that people in the other provinces are satisfied with the system which has been in effect so far, but we are offering a compromise which enables a province such as Quebec to grant its universities the advantages it has been forced to deny to them because of its respect for autonomy and constitution. Indeed this formula was not easy to find; it was the subject of much controversy. It is not perfect yet, but thanks to the genius of the Minister of Finance and to the clear-mindedness of the premiers of the province of Quebec—and I want to pay at this time a tribute to Messrs. Duplessis, Sauve and Barrette—this solution has become practicable by way of an increase of the provincial tax on business concerns, which can be deducted from the federal tax, a formula which Mr. Lesage always opposed and fought when he was a minister in the Liberal government.

I have no hesitation in saying that this bill is the best way to solve the problem which brought about a crisis for which the Liberals are largely responsible. That formula enables the province of Quebec to regain its place among the other provinces within the confederation. It enables Quebec universities to prosper in the same way as all the others in Canada. The formula remedies a defect, whatever might be said by Mr. Lesage—who has suddendly become the fiercest autonomist, though it is known that the same gentleman suggested that things be left to the Canadian Universities Foundation which should arbitrate each case.

Mr. Lesage is now burning what he worshipped yesterday, though he had actively participated in creating the precedent which is at the very source of the difficulties we are trying to solve. Mr. Lesage seems to have a singularly short memory. He was a cabinet member in the Liberal government when chapter 29, 4-5 Elizabeth II was passed in 1956. Let him carefully go over the provisions of that act and he will see what vast powers are vested in the Minister of Finance.

What strikes me in this bill is that the minister will no longer have his say on the structure of institutions of higher learning, nor on the requirements for entitlement to grants. It will no longer rest with him to define the terms, as was decided by Mr. Lesage and his friends in 1952.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that those things needed to be told in this house so that the province of Quebec might be considered as it should be.

As for the bill under discussion, I might say, in short, that the present government has agreed to withdraw from a taxation field so that the provincial government may itself collect the moneys to be paid to universities. May I add that universities are the very basis of a nation's development and that they should be allowed to grow in accordance with their healthiest and jealously guarded traditions.

Such, Mr. Speaker, was the honourable action of this government, and I am certain that Canadians will feel proud because everyone will progress towards his noblest aims.

(Text):

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): This bill to which we are now giving second reading does two things, and in doing them embodies two principles; and we are dealing, on second reading, with principles. In the first place, it seeks to continue for two more years the modification of the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act by which an extra 3 per cent of the federal personal income tax is either paid to or abated in a province under legislation initiated by a Liberal government and passed in this parliament in 1956. That is, it increases the amount of personal income tax available to the provinces under Liberal legislation and increases correspondingly equalization payments.

We on this side are proud of the fact that through this equalization payments principle we have made this law, passed in 1956, a main buttress of the financial strength and the financial autonomy of all the provinces of Canada. Indeed, in all but the richest provinces it is indispensable for that purpose.

Through the equalization principle embodied in this legislation we have made it possible for all the provinces in Canada to provide on a roughly equal basis the essential services which, under the constitution, the provinces alone can provide and which must be provided if there is to be national unity under a federal system.

Naturally we do not intend to oppose or even appear to oppose this principle in legislation designed to continue and, to some small degree, to ameliorate the tax-sharing and equalization principle which was established, despite Conservative opposition, by parliament in 1956.

We have noticed with considerable interest and, indeed, with some satisfaction, that the Conservative premier of Manitoba in his recent budget speech stressed the vital importance to his province of the maintenance of this principle of equalization. We agree with it. We on this side of the house will oppose any weakening of that principle. We will oppose it in this house and outside the house. For that reason we have noted with some concern the statement made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) on April 26 in this debate which is recorded on page 3278 of Hansard. In that statement the minister took some credit for, indeed he boasted that the government has honoured the legislation introduced by a government representing this party in the House of Commons, the legislation re tax-sharing—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, the agreements entered into under it.

Mr. Pearson: Very well, the agreements entered into under the legislation. By implication the minister is taking credit because the government has not repudiated the legislation which made those agreements possible. That is quite a change from the position taken in 1957 during the election campaign when one of the first things government members said they were going to do, we were told, was to replace this kind of legislation with a new deal in federal-provincial taxation arrangements.

Having failed to carry out that promise the minister now makes a virtue out of honouring the agreements contracted under that legislation, this is, to say the least, a somewhat illogical position.

Our concern arises, however, over the minister's suggestion in the statement to which I have referred that some different kind of arrangement might come into effect after March 31, 1962 as a result of the deliberations of the forthcoming dominion-provincial conference. I want to make it absolutely clear that as far as the Liberal opposition is concerned, we do not believe that there is any adequate substitute for equalization and we do not believe there should be any weakening whatever of that principle. That does not mean, however, that the present arrangements could not be modified in details or that if we were in office we would not propose certain modifications based on experience without interfering with the principle involved, the principle of equalization.

Hon. members opposite when they were in opposition advocated a system of allocation of tax fields as opposed to the principle of equalization as my hon. friend the Minister of Finance will well remember when he served in this house under the Hon. George Drew. We do not believe that any system of allocation of tax fields alone will provide sufficient revenues to the less wealthy provinces or those provinces with a smaller tax base which will enable them adequately to discharge the functions given to them under our constitution.

We, the Liberals, continue to believe that if the provinces are to have meaningful autonomy—autonomy that really means what it should mean—they must be assured of sufficient revenues to provide approximately equal services to Canadian citizens right across our country. We feel, therefore, that the Minister of Finance in closing this debate should tell the house whether the government still advocates substituting for tax-sharing and equalization the kind of allocation of tax fields which he and hon. members of his party talked about when they were in opposition or whether they consider themselves bound by the assurance given by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) in the province of Manitoba during the election campaign of 1957 that a Conservative government would maintain the principle of equalization in federal-provincial fiscal relations.

This is a perfectly clear and straightforward issue on which the people of this country and their representatives here in parliament are entitled to know the position of the government. If there is any doubt whether this government intends to maintain the principle of full equalization, that doubt should now be removed. Meanwhile, the present bill if it is passed will assure the continuance of the Liberal policy of tax-sharing and equalization as already modified since 1958, from year to year, by the present government. It will continue it for a further two years. Because we believe it is in the national interest to do this and because indeed we are the initiators of this principle in legislation, naturally we intend to support the second reading of a bill which embodies this principle. How could we do otherwise?

But there is another principle in this bill and it deals with federal grants to universities. The principle here is simply whether the federal government should help in this regard. The principle is not the formula or the method of doing it though, of course, that might make the application of the principle either impracticable or undesirable, or both. This principle of federal aid to universities was, of course, laid down by legislation introduced in this house by a Liberal government in 1951 and, as has already been pointed out more than once in this debate, passed unanimously. We still, of course, strongly believe in this principle just as we are more convinced than ever, even more than we were in 1951, that higher education in this country needs federal aid which should be available to every university in every province. The need is now demonstrably greater than it has ever been and so here again we will support the principle of the bill although we do object to certain provisions, as my friend the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) and other hon. members on this side have made clear, and as we shall again make perfectly clear in committee. To take any other stand on second reading which deals with principle would be contradicting our whole previous position as indeed some of my hon. friends opposite will be doing to theirs if they support the bill.

[Mr. Pearson.]

This bill seeks to place university grants which have been paid up until now by virtue of the annual Appropriation Acts—and it is well to remember and emphasize this as has already been done in this debate—under statutory authority. It will enshrine them in legislation which will continue for two years under an amendment to the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act while seeking to provide a statutory authority for the university grants instituted by the government of Mr. St. Laurent. We must not forget that. Whatever happens to the alternative, this particular formula remains now in the legislation.

But the bill also seeks to provide an alternative method of making federal financial assistance available to the universities within any province in which the provincial government desires to adopt it and makes the necessary arrangements for that purpose, with the federal government.

We should recall, as I have already done, Mr. Speaker, that grants to universities under the existing formula were approved by all members of the house in 1951 and not a single member of the house, including a single member of the opposition at that time, opposed that bill.

Mr. Balcer: There was no vote.

Mr. Pearson: Not a single member of the opposition opposed the bill. It was open to any member of the opposition who objected to the bill to get up and vote, and not a single member did that, not even the present Solicitor General (Mr. Balcer).

Mr. Chevrier: He did not say a word.

Mr. Pearson: When a bill of this kind passes through the house without a vote it passes through the house unanimously. Any member opposing the bill can get up and oppose it and call for a vote. At that time in the debate no question of constitutionality was raised by my hon. friends opposite, including the Solicitor General. At that time this particular formula was accepted in the house. It was approved by all the provinces, including Quebec, and it was approved by all universities that were to benefit from it, most of whom have already benefited from it and before long perhaps they will all benefit from this formula because of the amounts that have accumulated under it.

Only later was there a change of heart in Quebec; only later, in 1957, was that change reflected in this house in a shadowy kind of way by the present Solicitor General but by no one else on the treasury benches. Even during this particular debate, in so far as we can gather from what has been said and what has not been said, no member of the treasury benches except the Solicitor General challenges the constitutionality of our formula. The Solicitor General admits this. Nevertheless, in spite of what has been said by some of his colleagues and what they have not said, he thinks—and he has, of course, the right to think, and some of the Conservatives from Quebec in this house also think—that this provision, which has been in existence now for some years, is against the constitution. It is against the constitution, even though they will vote for it, presumably, when this bill comes up for a vote.

Mr. Balcer: It applies to all provinces; yours applied to only nine.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, indeed, it applies to all provinces but, according to the Solicitor General, it is only unconstitutional in its application to Quebec. It is quite valid and constitutional so far as the rest of Canada is concerned.

Mr. Chevrier: That is a new doctrine.

Mr. Pearson: Therefore, the Solicitor General will vote for it under this new, this amazing, this really revolutionary doctrine of the divisibility of the constitution.

Mr. Balcer: May I ask a question?

Mr. Pearson: Yes.

Mr. Balcer: Does the Leader of the Opposition call legislation that is absolutely unacceptable to one province good legislation?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I will come to that later. Of course, we want legislation to apply and to be acceptable to all provinces.

Mr. Balcer: So do I.

Mr. Pearson: I am not dealing with that; I am dealing with the Solicitor General's point that this provision is now unconstitutional but the rest of the legislation, including the formula which his government is introducing, is constitutional, also that the part that he considers unconstitutional in its application to Quebec is perfectly valid in its application to the rest of the country. What kind of constitutional doctrine is that? I call it the divisibility of the constitution and it is something new in constitutional law. If we take that doctrine seriously, then indeed this country would be in danger of tragic disunity, almost of Balkanization; where we could have a constitution divisible in this way in order to make parts of legislation acceptable to one part of Canada which are not acceptable to other parts of Canada and put them all in the same bill. Surely no one wants that kind of disunity, that kind of Balkanization, as I have called it. I am sure no one in this house wants that but this disunifying idea—and that is certainly what it is—we can oppose and we can oppose it strongly without coming into conflict with another essential view which we hold that there must be full and unreserved recognition of every provincial right under the constitution.

Mr. Ricard: That is contrary to what you have been preaching all the time.

Mr. Pearson: My hon. friend may reserve his speech for a subsequent occasion unless he has an intelligent question to ask me which I will do my best to answer.

This is not inconsistent with the complete, absolute recognition of provincial autonomy within our federal system or, if you like, with diversity in unity, and the necessity for it in our federal system.

Mr. Ricard: You want to deprive Quebec of $25 million.

Mr. Pickersgill: Down, Fido.

Mr. Ricard: Peewee.

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps that intervention will save me from making any other kind of reply to the interjections I am getting.

I go on to say—and this is a serious matter; perhaps my hon. friend will treat it seriously although that may be difficult indeed—that on no other basis can our federalism, our unity and our nation survive. We on this side have been saying this for years; not only saying it for years but acting on it for years.

So far as I am concerned, since I have been the leader of this party—and I have before me statements from speeches which I have made on this subject not only in Quebec but in all parts of Canada—I have insisted that only on that doctrine can our nation survive as a united nation.

Mr. Ricard: You have been preaching another doctrine in the other provinces.

Mr. Speaker: We cannot have a debate within a debate here. We must respect the rights of the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. Pearson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is going to be awfully difficult for my hon. friend, who is so sensitive about this subject, to keep quiet but I hope he will do his best under your admonition.

Under that doctrine there must be no interference, direct or indirect, explicit or implied, with the rights of the provinces, especially in the field of education. I will go further, as indeed I have already gone further outside the house and I have statements here which will verify that. While the rights of all provinces must remain unimpaired, I think it must be admitted by every fair-minded Canadian—and most Canadians are fair-minded—that the province of Quebec has a legitimate and special preoccupation with, and perhaps a special responsibility for the preservation and the strengthening of those rights.

After all, she is the guardian of a culture, of traditions and of a language which are not that of the majority but which should be considered as part of our national heritage by every Canadian, whatever his race, his religion or his language, in whatever province he may live. We will never have complete national unity in Canada until all Canadians accept this position, not as a regrettable necessity but as a positive and unique asset in our national development.

Quebec, therefore, has, and must have in the nature of things, a specialized and recognized concern with education. Nor can it be a source of anything but regret in this house and outside this house when a division occurs between any federal government and any government in Quebec over the validity and acceptability of any step taken or any proposal made by the central government to assist, without any strings attached, the provincial government in the discharge of its responsibilities in the field of higher education. When there is such a difference or such a division, and when it is removed by agreement, all Canadians should be able to rejoice in that removal. But, Mr. Speaker, this means, indeed it must mean that the agreement is a sound and wise one and does not bear within itself the seeds of future trouble and future division.

For that purpose, any formula or any agreement designed to remove any differences and bring about an arrangement must first be applicable in its terms to all provinces so that there will be no unfair discrimination, indeed no discrimination of any kind. Second, it means the arrangement must ensure that it will be used for the purposes intended, and that it is satisfactory for these purposes to the universities as well as to the governments concerned. Third, it must be of undoubted constitutional propriety.

It is on this last ground that we on this side have grave doubts, grave concern, about the alternative formula proposed in this bill. Indeed, we find it very difficult to understand how those who refuse to accept the present arrangement in regard to aid to universities, which, it must not be forgotten remains in the bill, can accept without question or without any misgivings the constitutional propriety of this new formula. I ask, Mr. Speaker, would those who objected in earlier years, and objected so bitterly, to the arrangement we put forward, would they in those years have considered this to be a satisfactory alternative arrangement? To ask the question is to answer it.

Mr. Grafftey: I answered it.

Mr. Pearson: My hon. friend has answered a lot of questions in the house these days. I only regret I was not here to hear his answer on this very important problem. Indeed, he has become, in very short order, the conscience of the house.

The two principles in this bill which I have ventured to mention we strongly support now as we have over the years. As we are now voting on these principles, naturally we will vote for the bill on second reading. When we discuss this bill in committee we will do our best to have the offending section implementing one of these principles removed, and to have it replaced with something better, of permanent and accepted value, something which will not only help to meet the urgent and increasing needs of higher education, which we all admit, but do it in a way which will unite rather than divide us.

(Translation):

Mr. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, the explanatory notes of Bill C-56 provide for alternative arrangements for the payment of grants either by Canada through the Canadian Universities Foundation, or directly by a province to institutions of higher learning, which grants are now paid under the Appropriation Act.

We know that the spirit of the 1953 act, passed by the Liberals, which defined the terms "university", "student", "university graduate", "university level", had not met with the approval of the universities, which since 1952 have been refusing any direct grants, because they rightly claimed that such a formula was a direct encroachment by the federal government on our system of education.

Mr. Speaker, the attitude of university leaders on this question was logical, unequivocal, clear and precise. But the Liberal government, disregarding their attitude, kept on claiming that university grants were constitutional, and by that very fact, kept on imposing upon the province of Quebec a system of grants which was repudiated not only by the government of the province of Quebec but also by the whole population, and on several occasions.

Since 1952, the Liberal government had been applying to Quebec universities the principle of "believe or die", by letting very substantial amounts of money accumulate in the fund of the Canadian Universities Foundation, hoping thereby that some day our universities, being discouraged, would weaken to the point where we would make them accept that centralizing formula.

To be sure, the financial plight of our universities has been such that at one time the matter became a problem of cultural survival on a national scale. Our universities lacked the financial means of paying their professors the same rates of salaries as did universities in other provinces. That is why, for some years we were in the sad position where professors were leaving our Quebec universities to work in other more lucrative fields.

That situation, of course, could not go on indefinitely. In the last election campaign, Conservative members from the province of Quebec had promised the population that they would, with the co-operation of cabinet ministers, seek a more acceptable formula for our universities, one taking into account all cultural and racial factors of the problem, so as to prevent, on the national level, a discrimination which had lasted long enough. The sustained efforts and initiatives of Quebec premiers, implemented by their positive representations, and supported by the understanding of the present cabinet, finally produced results which for the moment are satisfactory and which, I repeat, were accepted by the population of the province of Quebec as a whole. Bill C-56 certainly contains certain imperfections; yet it is, to my mind, a constitutional recognition of the fact that education is an exclusively provincial field under section 93 of the British North America Act.

As we all know, the Quebec provincial government during the last session, passed some legislation to assist our universities, either by increased grants, or by underwriting loans to our universities by means of a consolidated fund, so as to further their development.

I think we should immediately establish a marked distinction by saying that the legislation now before us is not supplementary to other acts passed by the provinces with regard to education. Those are completely different provisions which are not mutually subordinate and they apply in altogether different fields.

In his speech of April 26, 1960, the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) made much of the terms which were allegedly being imposed upon any province wishing to benefit under this legislation. Mr. Speaker, it requires a somewhat fertile and perhaps slightly deranged imagination to see in Bill C-56 facts that do not really exist. We should remember that this is fiscal legislation and that there is no question of a divided jurisdiction.

Now, where does it say in the act that, in order to exercise its jurisdiction on university education, a province must comply with any terms stipulated by this legislation? Clause 9A does not mention any. On the contrary, that section eliminates all terms imposed by the unamended part of the act or by various acts or procedures authorizing the Minister of Finance to decide who will receive grants awarded under the 1951 or 1954 formula. Nobody will find in clause 9A a single word which could lead to believe that the government of Quebec must obtain authorization from Ottawa to proceed with the direct financing of its universities.

On the contrary, we find that there is parallel action on the part of those governments. The first one, i.e. the government of Quebec, passes certain legislation guaranteeing exclusive action on its part with regard to the financing of education at the university level. Whether Bill C-56 is passed or not, it will in no way modify existing conditions in Quebec under the new provincial laws.

The object of this bill does not directly affect university financing. It merely concerns the deduction of certain taxes paid by Quebec corporations to the Quebec government and which are earmarked for university grants according to the province's own free choice.

The yield of the new tax, of which every Quebec corporation is exempt, is in no way limited by this legislation. Indeed, my colleague, the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Dorion), proved it the other day by indicating that Quebec universities will receive $1.75 per capita whereas the 1951 formula, amended in 1958, only provided for $1.50 per capita. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, the present legislation authorizes a province to give more than $1.50 to its universities, if the province so desires.

All Bill C-56 does is to recognize given facts determined exclusively by the province. Instead of perpetuating a confusion which was created by the Liberals in 1951, this government is offering every province the possibility of financing its university education directly by assigning to this purpose an additional 1 per cent of the corporation tax. It can therefore be said that this legislation offers a possibility of flexible administration which could not be found in the rigid provisions of the 1951 act which forced the provinces to accept federal grants or to deprive their institutions of higher learning of such grants. As I said, the theory of "believe or die" was contained in the 1951 formula which imposed those terms, whereas the one provided under clause 9A eliminates them and replaces them by an option.

However, we must admit that the federal government, under the statutes, cannot give grants to universities nor allow any deduction higher than the amount provided under those statutes. This is no longer a matter of education but of taxation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what, exactly, is provided in the fiscal arrangements act? Any provincial income tax, or corporation or succession duties tax, will be subject to an exemption of so much per cent, according to the tax in question.

Bill C-56 exempts Quebec corporations of the whole additional 1 per cent which they will have to pay under freely imposed provincial legislation. It could just as easily have exempted that provincial tax up to the extent of $1.50 per capita only, or about 0.8 per cent.

In adjusting its equalization payments, either upwards or downwards, according to what the province will get, Bill C-56 follows exactly the same principle under which, in its other sections, it exempts provincial tax in a given proportion.

Unless the tax-sharing arrangements act is considered as absolutely unconstitutional, we must admit that the federal government has just as much right to adjust its equalization payment by setting a maximum amount as it can by a maximum deductibility percentage.

Besides, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Laurier was the first one to give us an example of such procedure. He was a member of the cabinet—and so was Mr. Lesage—which did not recognize the 1 per cent Quebec corporation as deductible. As this provincial tax, held non-deductible by the Liberal government, yields a few million dollars a year, the federal treasury has always deducted the amount of that provincial tax from its equalization payments.

[Mr. Asselin.]

I wonder if, like the hon. member for Laurier, we are not inclined to recognize as a debt to the federal government the equivalent of a provincial tax.

If it is fair and constitutional to deduct the income derived from the Quebec corporation tax from equalization payments due to Quebec, it is as fair and constitutional to deduct from those same equalization payments any amount levied by Quebec in addition to what the federal government is authorized, by statute, to earmark for university education.

I believe that on this question the hon. member for Laurier is in a dilemma. Either he must admit that he has unfairly treated Quebec under the fiscal arrangements act adopted by the government of which he was a member, or else he must admit that his fine distinctions do not hold good, that his argument is completely reversed, and his whole speech of April 26 last was merely designed to confuse a very clear issue.

The attitude of the federal government towards a problem which has long held the attention of Quebec taxpayers, shows that this government has taken a serious step, and is giving some indication that it will be ready, when circumstances permit, to gradually withdraw from the provincial taxation field and thus respect the Canadian constitution.

Therefore, in my opinion, as evidence of its recognition of the fundamental principle that the province is exclusively responsible for education, this government has not required, in order to grant that deductibility, that the province of Quebec first sign an agreement with the federal government in order that the taxpayers of that province might be in a position to take advantage of that 1 per cent exemption on corporation tax.

Mr. Speaker, in the last debate on this matter, we witnessed a flagrant contradiction in the attitude of the Liberals on this problem. It is particularly hard to reconcile the moving appeal of the hon. member for Laurier against what he terms an encroachment on the autonomy of the provinces, with the centralizing views that the Liberal government always displayed on this most important matter of education.

In support of his arguments on what he described as respect for the autonomy of the provinces, the hon. member for Laurier quoted from a decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in the case of the Attorney General of Nova Scotia et al versus the Attorney General of Canada et al. He particularly drew the house's attention to the following excerpt, and I quote:

Neither the parliament of Canada nor the legislature of any province can delegate one to the other (to be exercised by that other as a parliament or legislature, as the case may be) any of the legislative authority respectively conferred upon them by the British North America Act and especially by sections 91 and 92 thereof.

He also quoted from page 391, in which Mr. Justice Estey, among other things, had this to say, and I quote:

Moreover, the provisions of the British North America Act contemplate these legislative bodies will, at all times, in the exercise of their sovereign jurisdiction, act as principals. There is no express provision nor is there any other provision under which it could be reasonably implied that these bodies were intended to act as agents one for the other.

In a word, Mr. Speaker, the conclusion is that the federal government cannot rent to the provinces its taxation rights, no more than the provinces can rent their own taxation fields to the federal government.

The Conservatives have always supported this principle and reaffirmed that the theory of the fiscal agreements made by the Liberal government with the provinces was a rental of powers and, consequently, that those fiscal agreements were illegal and unconstitutional.

When he quoted that excerpt from this decision of the supreme court, the hon. member for Laurier condemned the whole theory of fiscal arrangements with the provinces entered into by his government since 1940, and it would be ill-advised for him now to lead us to believe they respect autonomy when his government took the liberty for so long of sabotaging the whole fiscal system clearly established by the Canadian constitution.

Besides, Mr. Speaker, nearly all newspapers of the province of Quebec have criticized the hon. member for Laurier for his failure to use this autonomist argument at the right time when he was a minister in the Liberal government.

Mr. Tremblay: He was not in Quebec at the time.

Mr. Asselin: We wonder, Mr. Speaker, if the autonomist speeches the Liberals are making today are not inspired by their regrets for the things they neglected to do in the past to safeguard the Canadian constitution, or if they are allowing themselves to be carried away by the electoral considerations which have been set forth for some time by the Liberal leader in the province of Quebec.

However, the Liberal opposition members should remember that the province of Quebec does not believe in this time-serving argument they cling to while all their past actions have been a continual challenge to it, when they wanted the taxpayers of the province of Quebec to admit that their legislation concerning fiscal arrangements was constitutional.

Mr. Speaker, the bill under study has also a provisional aspect. In fact, as we all know, in 1962 there will be a complete revision of the whole fiscal system established between the provinces and the federal government by the Liberals. Even if this bill is less than perfect, it remains that we have only two years to experience its constitutional effects and, in 1962, the authorities concerned will be free to accept it permanently or to reject it if its constitutionality is seriously questioned.

The Conservative party has taken a serious step, Mr. Speaker, and deserves to be thanked for it.

It is an acceptable solution and is worth taking the risk, if any, up to 1962.

Mr. Speaker, I think we should ask ourselves what is the solution put forward by the Liberals to avoid this so-called encroachment upon the autonomy of the provinces.

In all the speeches made by Liberal members, no exact solution was indicated. They apparently persisted in returning to the old Liberal formula. As a matter of fact, the hon. member for Laurier, in his closing remarks, pointed to this more clearly than the others had done. He was quite right in replying to the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) that: "The poison is in the tail"; in cauda venenum, is what he replied to the hon. member for Port Arthur when the latter stung him by suggesting that the purpose of his speech was to help Jean Lesage, who was trying to make this bill an election issue.

If we carefully go over the conclusions of the speech of the hon. member for Laurier, on page 3284 of Hansard for April 26, 1960, we can immediately see that the poison is indeed, in the tail end of his speech. Here is what the hon. member said:

—we are also in favour of the university grants paid out of the federal treasury, which were started by a Liberal government, and distributed through the Canadian Universities Foundation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is precisely that formula that was rejected on several occasions by the province of Quebec, because it was regarded as a direct intrusion of the federal government in the field of university education.

Whether the federal government gives money to the universities directly or through the Canadian Universities Foundation, the taxpayers of the province of Quebec have never accepted this formula; first, because it is not in accordance with our constitution, and also because it cannot meet our cultural and ethnic needs.

The Liberal party does not offer any other alternative; even today, it wants to hang on to its centralizing doctrine though Quebec authorities condemned it on several occasions.

Some Liberal members also complained that no positive offer had been made to change the financial position of universities, similar to those made to the Conservative government. It was useless to formulate any, as even today, the hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Roberge), following in the footsteps of the hon. member for Laurier, vigorously again stated that the only possible solution to help finance universities are direct grants to those institutions paid out of the federal treasury. Where can we find consistency among those members?

Whereas, those same members used to denounce the rigid attitude of the Quebec premier, Mr. Duplessis, on the very controversial question of university grants; whereas they liked to repeat that the province of Quebec was like any other province and took great pains to have the Liberal university grants system recognized as constitutional they are, Mr. Speaker, brazenly burning today what they formerly reverently worshipped.

The autonomist doctrine of Mr. Duplessis which was formerly absurd according to some hon. members, is today the leading argument advanced by the Liberals to state that this bill represents an encroachment upon provincial autonomy. Never, at any time, have the Liberal party been the defender of provincial autonomy in this house. Today, it borrows that expression to serve the political interest, and arguments of a member who sat in this house with the reputation of being in favour of centralization, of a representative who took pleasure in wilfully denouncing the justified claims of the province of Quebec in this field.

But today that former member, Mr. Speaker, is the Liberal leader in the province of Quebec and he was obliged to shed his skin, because he has to please the voters in that province if he wants to sit one day in the Quebec legislature. But, Mr. Speaker, we must remember that the province of Quebec is not composed of misled but of comprehensive and grateful people who have, on various occasions, seen through the actions of the Liberal party when that party had a chance to solve the problem just as the Conservatives finally did.

Of course, the Liberal opposition is disappointed. During the last election, they challenged the Conservative members with regard to the absolute impossibility of settling our university problem. But, thanks to the understanding of the Conservative government and of the Minister of Finance, and in accordance with the promises made by the Prime Minister of this country (Mr. Diefenbaker) in the city of Quebec during the 1958 campaign, all Canadians, whatever their origin, their language and their religion, will be equal partners in a free democratic country.

It is no surprise that in view of that discriminatory situation that the province of Quebec had been exposed to for a number of years with regard to grants to universities, the Prime Minister and the members of the cabinet have been able to find a temporary formula that is acceptable to the authorities of the province of Quebec. This realistic compromise, as it was described by the Solicitor General (Mr. Balcer) on April 26 last, will have healthy results. To mention only a few, let me quote from an article by Clement Brown, parliamentary correspondent for Le Devoir, who wrote on April 28 last:

> The logic of the absurd or insoluble problem: What will be the effect of the Fleming bill? The first, and most obvious, is on the credit side: it stops, at least for a time, any collective pressure for additional interventions by Ottawa in the field of education financing.
> The second effect of the Fleming bill is to assure to the province of Quebec the exercise of its exclusive jurisdiction in the field of education and educational grants. That positive result in the constitutional field is offset by serious restrictions, not on a taxation right, but on the yield of a particular tax.

And further down, he went on to say:

> Another result of the Fleming bill is that it opens the door to the dislocation of the fiscal agreement system, in the sense that it makes their provisions more flexible. The provinces can exercise their fiscal jurisdiction, but only on the precise scale provided for by the deductibility clause. That looks to us like a step forward, because it allows the provinces to achieve a greater awareness of their constitutional responsibilities.

Mr. Speaker, I think this parliamentary correspondent has summarized the whole situation in a nutshell; there is no need to go into further detail.

So, I will be proud, as a Conservative member from the province of Quebec, to give wholehearted support to this measure introduced by the Minister of Finance, because, with my colleagues, I am convinced that it will reaffirm to the provinces their exclusive right in the field of education and will also give our universities the means to develop intellectually and culturally, in all fields under their jurisdiction, so they can make a better social and cultural contribution to the whole nation.

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, this bill is a rather complex one. On the one hand, we hear some members say that the former system was unconstitutional and irregular and, on the other hand, we hear experts who claim also that this proposal is unconstitutional and irregular.

But, Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) introduced his resolution he came to the house with a cheerful and even arrogant air, I even believed for one moment, that he was to introduce something which would be so clear, so definite, that not one member in this house could find any fault with it.

He reminded me at that time of Chanteclerc who believed that without his crowing the sun would never rise and that the night would last forever.

As I was recently rereading his Ode to the Rising Sun, I could not help repeating these final lines spoken by Chanticleer:

Je recule, ébloui de me voir moi-même tout vermeil, et d'avoir, moi le coq fait lever le soleil!

That was indeed the impression the Minister of Finance gave me at the time and which he gives us usually when he introduces something in the house.

What did the minister tell us? He dealt at length with grants to universities, as if they were his idea; but everybody knows that grants to universities are a Liberal achievement. In fact, it was the Liberal party which, in 1951, established grants to universities and I remember that when the Conservatives and the Liberals approved it, this legislation was unanimously adopted. But the fact remains that it had been thought up by Mr. St. Laurent, after he discussed it with the authorities of the different provinces.

It is a Liberal legislation we adopted at the time, that we are approving today and that we continue to approve.

Mr. Ricard: But put into force by a Conservative government.

Mr. Caron: We feel that the federal government has not only the right but the duty to assist our institutions of higher learning. That is why, as indicated by previous speakers and particularly the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), we are certainly and without any hesitation going to vote in favour of the principle of the bill providing for assistance by the federal government to our universities and colleges.

The Minister of Finance also said that the 13 per cent personal income tax exemption would be continued, which is nothing new, but merely the continuation of what already existed.

He also mentioned a 1 per cent additional exemption on corporation taxes, limited however to $1.50 per capita. Contrary to what was going on under a Liberal administration, that raises a difficulty. We made grants to universities through an organization of their own choice with no strings attached. They received the money which was distributed on a per capita basis and the universities were free to use it as they pleased.

In this case the federal government allows a deduction of 1 per cent but not exceeding $1.50 per capita and any amount above that must be repaid by the provincial government. In this regard, an act was passed by the government of Quebec during the last session but there was no provision in it for a repayment to the federal authorities. If a provincial government fails to repay the excess amount received the Minister of Finance may deduct an equal amount from the equalization payments due to that province. If that is not unconstitutional I say it is an injustice to the provinces. The province is authorized to collect moneys, but if the amount is too high it must be repaid. In my opinion—I am not a lawyer, I know that I may be corrected if necessary—this is an injustice, because the provincial government levied an additional 1 per cent tax, to the extent of $1.75 per capita of the amount derived from the additional 1 per cent collected by the government.

And the minister thought he had discovered a formula. Everybody knows that it is not him but the Hon. Mr. Sauve who discovered it. It is the Hon. Mr. Sauve who submitted that formula, but it is the Minister of Finance who succeeded in including their restriction that we find irregular and that should be taken out. Even if Mr. Sauve had accepted this restriction, I maintain that it would be unconstitutional just the same because neither the premier nor the government of a province has a right to be guided in its legislation by a government of another province or by the federal government. All our provincial governments are autonomous and have rights, privileges, and responsibilities and they must act accordingly.

That is why the member for Bellechasse (Mr. Dorion) who is a brilliant lawyer, a fine counsel, could not help answering, when the member for Lapointe (Mr. Brassard) asked him what he thought of this aspect of the measure, that it was a compromise; he did not say that it was absolutely perfect legislation which could be accepted as some Conservative members have just said.

Moreover, he added that he was hoping for something better for the future. Thus it was not clear even in the mind of this lawyer and if it was not clear to him who is attempting to rescue the government from its predicament, how could it be clear in the minds of the others who study it objectively in order to pass legislation which would be acceptable to the governments of all the provinces.

Besides, if one accepts this principle as being legal, I understand that should a province refuse to repay the surplus collected, the federal government could reimburse itself from the equalization payments going to Quebec. Do you not see the injustice of this system? If the government of Ontario or the government of British Columbia, who do not get an equalization payment, were to collect the 1 per cent tax, as it is their right to do, and then refuse to repay the surplus to the federal government, the latter would be unable to recover from the equalization payments the amount it claims from these provinces. Where there is a way to recover because there is an equalization payment, only the poor provinces will be compelled to repay. This would come to be if not an illegality, at least a flagrant injustice for the provinces and I maintain that the federal government has no right to take such action.

Furthermore, I am relying mostly on arguments put forward in an authoritative way by the member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) when he quoted from decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada, especially that in the case of the Nova Scotia government versus the attorney general and troops and Cape Breton. These decisions show quite clearly that the provincial governments are not entitled to transfer their powers, even to the federal government, because the federal government in Canada is not supreme. Such was the intention of the fathers of confederation so that the rights of the minorities would be duly respected in each province, and especially the rights of the Quebec majority as regards the rest of Canada. The governments cannot—

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the hon. member.

Mr. Caron: Certainly.

Mr. Pigeon: Does he not think that the Liberal federal government made an enormous mistake when it sought to subsidize the universities, especially when one knows how minorities are treated in certain provinces?

Mr. Caron: Mr. Speaker, I shall come back to this later on. I do not care to answer right now since I must come back to it, but an answer will be given in due course.

Mr. Ricard: It would be too embarrassing just now.

Mr. Caron: Do I still hear the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Ricard)? Hearing him, one would think we were under the Union Nationale in Quebec.

An hon. Member: A parrot's tone?

Mr. Tremblay: Quite an embarrassing question.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Speaker, I also hear the member for Roberval (Mr. Tremblay) who puts in his word. He is used to talking from his seat rather than standing up. When he stands up, he continues to let out a stream of words disorderly arranged trying to express his thought but he never succeeds.

I wonder if I could find some expression fit to describe my hon. friend if I looked up the authors. Oh, here it is: "Le malade imaginaire" (The Imaginary Invalid). But that would not do, for there is nothing imaginary about his ills. Perhaps I could use—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Caron: —"Les précieuses ridicules" (The Romantic Ladies).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I ask the hon. member for Hull to come back to his speech?

Mr. Caron: Mr. Speaker, I intend to come back to my speech, but not to stand for all the interruptions from that fellow—

An hon. Member: He is sick.

Some hon. Members: Oh. oh.

Mr. Caron: —for you could hardly find words to qualify that kind of person in this house.

An hon. Member: The hon. member for Hull is sick.

Mr. Caron: Talking of sick people, there is one there. It shows in his face.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Order.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Speaker, I shall go back to tending my sheep, and let the ram go on his way.

The Conservatives made quite a fuss over the opinions expressed by Mr. Duplessis, not in the first year, but after he had accepted the grants for 1951-52. Then they proceeded to make an issue out of the matter of constitutionality, claiming that education was essentially and at all levels a responsibility of the provincial government. In the meantime, the universities were going bankrupt.

Again recently, that is on April 20, the Solicitor General (Mr. Balcer), assistant to the Minister of Justice, who, in the absence of the Minister of Justice was presumably speaking on behalf of the Minister of Justice, told us some rather astonishing things.

First, Mr. Chairman, who has the floor?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I ask hon. members not to interrupt the member who has the floor? Order.

Mr. Caron: And the Solicitor General made this statement, as recorded on page 3285 of this year's Hansard:

> People outside the French province, wondered when they found that, year after year, Quebec leaders were turning down federal grants. Our opponents went so far as to describe that attitude as "segregationism" but it was the Liberals, with their anti-constitutional formula, who applied a policy of intellectual segregation with regard to Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, could we find a less serious argument? The Liberal government, in 1951, had found a formula to make grants to universities. Universities had asked them and had accepted them; those of Quebec as well as those of all other provinces. The heads of the Quebec universities rejoiced in 1951 when the formula was announced. But who refused it? Did the government in Ottawa refuse to grant to the province of Quebec the advantages which were granted to other provinces? No, the Quebec government placed itself in this segregationist position by refusing the offers made by the federal government.

Later, a little further on the same page, the Solicitor General said:

> At that time the Liberals did not dare to launch a straightforward attack against the Hon. Mr. Duplessis and his autonomist policies. They relieved their feelings by attacking the province of Quebec of which Mr. Duplessis obviously had become the living symbol.

And further yet, he said:

> That attitude of national disunity and misunderstanding on the part of some Canadians with regard to the others, may, in all fairness, scarcely be blamed on the C.C.F. which has never taken root in Quebec—unlike the Liberals who were only maintained in power for 22 years thanks to that province.

Well, Mr. Speaker, to say that we did not dare to criticize the premier of the province of Quebec is absolutely untrue.

He was criticized, strongly criticized by all federal members at least, because of his uncompromising stand and because he made out of the question of autonomy a political issue which did not exist after all.

Further down the same page, the Solicitor General said this:

> That is why it was unanimously rejected by the government, the universities and the population of Quebec—

It is entirely untrue. The Quebec universities accepted it, requested it, asked for it. But in view of the dictatorial stand of Mr. Duplessis, the authorities of Quebec universities were compelled to refuse because they were secretly threatened with losing the provincial grants.

Mr. Ricard: This is an insult to the Quebec universities.

Mr. Pigeon: You are insulting the universities of Quebec.

Mr. Ricard: This is an insult to the Quebec universities.

Mr. Pigeon: May I ask a question?

Mr. Caron: No, I am not accepting any questions.

Mr. Ricard: You are insulting Quebec universities.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Is the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) speaking to a point of order?

Mr. Pigeon: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I object to the remarks of the hon. member for Hull; I believe that it is an insult to the universities in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have said, time and again, that differences of opinion are not a sufficient reason to rise on a point of order. The hon. member for Hull has the floor.

Mr. Caron: I say and maintain that the universities had accepted the grants because they had asked Mr. St. Laurent for them, and that it was only because of a dictator's threats that the authorities were later forced to refuse them. And today although the bill has not yet been adopted in Ottawa, the universities have accepted and received the $25 million which were lying in Ottawa coffers.

Mr. Tremblay: Prove it.

Mr. Caron: And the Solicitor General added:

> —but we offer an alternative, a realistic compromise allowing a province, such as the province of Quebec, to grant to its university population, the benefits which it was forced to refuse because of its scrupulous respect for the constitution and for autonomy.

Mr. Speaker, the others never referred to an unconstitutional legislation, they never challenged, nor requested the Quebec government to challenge in court the constitutionality of the 1951 act. They made speeches and said it was unconstitutional, but they never took the means to have it decided who was right and who was wrong.

Besides, Mr. Speaker, if we read again the Quebec resolutions, the Charlottetown resolutions and the London resolutions which preceded the signing of the confederation act, and I do not want to go further in this matter because the hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Roberge) dealt with it, we see that the fathers of confederation never intended to seek a safeguard for anything else than primary education. Besides, the 1867 act says it has to do only with primary schools. Here is what we find at section 93 (2):

> All the powers, privileges and duties at the union by law conferred and imposed in Upper Canada on the separate schools and school trustees of the queen's Roman Catholic subjects shall be—

In Canada, at the time of union, they talked about school trustees. Therefore, it is the schools that are under the responsibility of school boards, I mean the primary schools. Secondary schools were added just a few years ago.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

But this does not cover classical colleges and seminaries, at all; they belong to the clergy—independently of the Quebec government—which has established its own curriculum and does not have to seek directives from the Catholic committee of the council of education to tell them what they should teach.

And the universities are independent universities, chartered by the government; they have a completely independent administration, and they too are autonomous. All those institutions are therefore independent, under the law and the constitution.

It is therefore clear that the intention of the fathers of confederation was to protect primary schools, which were under the direction of school boards. Again, that does not cover, in any way, shape or form, institutions of higher learning.

Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that we call it six o'clock?

(Text):

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Speaker, before we adjourned at six o'clock, I was dealing with the views of the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Balcer) and, to my mind, his opinions rather come into direct conflict with those of the other cabinet members. For instance, I do not recall that since 1951 any minister of finance has, even once, maintained that university grants under the formula we established at that time were something irregular and anti-constitutional.

As a matter of fact, Mr. St. Laurent, who was a recognized authority on constitutional law, had studied the question and had come to the conclusion that those grants were not anti-constitutional.

Frankly, Mr. Speaker, I would rather accept the opinion of Mr. St. Laurent than that of the hon. Solicitor General. Indeed, I am not the only one to think so. All present ministers from the province of Quebec who have not spoken on the matter voted to maintain the same principle of university grants.

As I said before six o'clock, institutions of higher learning, such as the seminaries, which are owned by the clergy, the classical colleges and the chartered universities, do not ask the province which subject matters they should teach; and they receive from the provincial government the grants necessary to lessen education costs in our province. That is why it was thought necessary to offer those grants.

The confederation act—I am satisfied on that score and will remain so as long as it has not been proved otherwise beyond all doubt—aimed at protecting the schools under the school boards in order to safeguard the French minority in Quebec at that time.

I am not the only one to think so. Mr. Cyril James, a professional educator, who is remarkably conversant in that field, and is a scholar of repute, said, as reported in the French version of Hansard on pages 544 and 545, as follows:

> There is no control of education, no infringement of provincial autonomy in the grants.
> Neither the members of parliament who voted unanimously for the grant, nor the universities of Canada which were equally unanimous in accepting it, entertained the remotest idea that the federal grant carried any implications of control.
> The possibility of any future danger to provincial rights is obviated by the presence of a provincial representative on the joint federal-provincial commission which administers the grants, it added.

Further down, he went on:

> —"it has never been suggested that in making such gifts, the donors were legislating with respect to education"—
> Similarly, while the Quebec government cannot legislate with regard to education in France, it none the less contributes generously to the Canadian students' house in Paris "and provides equally generous scholarships for students wishing to study in French universities."

Finally, he concluded:

> "It is difficult to see how the legality of such federal grants can be questioned without similarly calling into question a wide variety of governmental practices, provincial as well as federal, which have been part of our accepted tradition for many years."

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, is it not a fact that the province of Quebec, which I congratulated at the time for this action, granted $50,000 to the University of Ottawa, and made other grants to the St. Boniface college and to a university in the maritime provinces? I say it was perfectly entitled to do so; it even had a duty to support French institutions outside the province. However, had permission first been sought from the government of the province to make these grants? No, that was not necessary.

Here is a statement by the Hon. Sidney Smith, the former president of the University of Toronto:

(Text):

> Answering any argument that education is a provincial matter and therefore the federal government should keep out of it, he produced statistics which showed that 20 per cent of the 100,000 living alumni of the University of Toronto are in other provinces. The university is therefore making a national contribution. The same is true of all other Canadian universities.

(Translation):

Therefore, there are interchanges of students between universities, that is to say, there are young people coming from Ontario to Quebec, while others from Quebec go to Ontario, or from Quebec to the maritimes and from the maritimes to Quebec.

The fact is that the whole process is national in character, and the federal government was right in establishing the grants.

When one claims that something is irregular and illegal, one has to prove it. So I suggest to these people who claim that the grants as given under the Liberal formula were illegal, that they still have to prove it.

The thing to do, instead of trying to play politics with this, would have been for the Quebec government to go to the supreme court, which would have decided whether it was regular or irregular, constitutional or unconstitutional.

Besides, Mr. Speaker, it is not the first time that the Ottawa government has been giving grants.

I see here in a report presented by Mr. Enfield, a former member for York-Scarborough as recorded on page 157 of Hansard, that the amounts for education granted by the federal government in various provinces, in Quebec as well as in the other provinces, were as follows:

British Columbia	$2,989,000
Alberta	2,261,000
Saskatchewan	1,862,000
Manitoba	1,437,000
Ontario	7,228,000
Quebec	2,952,000

New Brunswick, as well as all provinces, received grants and accepted them.

That is not something new either. Let us go back over the history of the grants made to the provinces:

In 1913 Sir Robert Borden gave $10 million to the agricultural schools.

In 1919 Sir Robert Borden gave $10 million to assist technical schools.

In 1939 the Right Hon. Mackenzie King had $4,500,000 voted as assistance to youth.

Dominion-Provincial Relations

In 1942 the dominion government voted $51 million under the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act.

In 1951, $7,500,000 were voted as assistance to universities.

The province of Quebec accepted the grants and they were considered as constitutional.

The Solicitor General contends that they are anti-constitutional, but the Minister of Finance deems them constitutional.

Let me add that not one minister from Quebec tried to say that the subsidies granted under the Liberal formula were anti-constitutional.

The Solicitor General also had this to say concerning the bill before the house:

Its purpose is to render constitutional Liberal legislation on assistance to Quebec universities.

And in what way is it attempted to make this legislation constitutional?

Under the Liberal administration there was legislation providing for assistance without any strings attached. Universities were told: "Here are millions of dollars, you may do what you wish with them. This money is yours and you can use it as you see fit". There was no condition.

However, the very same people who refused millions from Ottawa accepted the millions of Mr. Rockefeller, accepted gladly all the millions coming from elsewhere, but the millions given by the Canadian government were refused. It was solely for the purpose of playings politics and the Solicitor General has attempted to play politics with this question of Quebec provincial autonomy that has never existed and does not exist with regard to university grants.

Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General is a lawyer. According to the Statutes of Canada, the Solicitor General is the assistant to the Minister of Justice, and when he made that statement, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) was absent. So, the Solicitor General was speaking as Minister of Justice when he said:

Mr. Speaker any legislation which finds its place in only nine provinces out of ten and is not acceptable to the tenth province leaves a very grave doubt as to its constitutionality.

Mr. Speaker, this legal pearl comes from a lawyer. I am not a lawyer, but when I hear such a statement coming from a lawyer, I wonder if the bar is very proud to have him as a member.

[Mr. Caron.]

Mr. Speaker, the member for Bellechasse (Mr. Dorion) has criticized the principle of federal assistance. He said that the $25 million the Liberals had allowed to accumulate for the province of Quebec were a Tantalus cup which would force the universities to accept them.

Without the intervention of the federal government, the universities of the province of Quebec would still be hard up, and it is because Ottawa intervened to make grants to them that the government of the province of Quebec reconsidered its position and decided to do something to help them.

Mr. Speaker, according to the authorities of these institutions, it is Ottawa which is responsible for that and not the government of Quebec.

And when they talk of a Tantalus cup, what should we think of this attitude of Mr. Duplessis which led the heads of the universities to believe that if they accepted the federal government grants, they would not get any from the provincial government. Oh, Mr. Duplessis did not say it in those words. But it was quite clear, and the universities understood the attitude of the dictator and they refused the grants to please the ruler of the roost in the province of Quebec.

Will the Solicitor General ever understand that for many years the Quebec government has greatly hindered the development of our universities by preventing them, for political motives, not to say for motives of petty politics, to accept the grants offered to them by the federal government?

The hon. member for Gaspe (Mr. English), I think, said that it was a fight between Ottawa and Quebec. That is not true. It was the fight of Quebec against Ottawa. That is all. It was the fight of the Union Nationale party against the Liberal party in Ottawa. And in support of my statement, you will note that since the Conservatives came into power in Ottawa, not one Quebec Conservative has dared criticize the policy of the federal Conservative government. Under the Liberal administration, everything the Liberals did was wrong; today, everything the Conservatives do is right because the Conservatives are in power.

Well, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Speaker, I think that when Mr. Sauve came, he very distinctly changed the situation which existed in Quebec. For instance, he tried to find a way—whether we consider it constitutional or not—of recovering those $25 million which I mentioned a moment ago.

Mr. Duplessis merely said: "No, autonomy forbids it". Mr. Duplessis claimed—

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I must inform him that his time has expired.

(Translation):

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member for Hull allow a question?

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, but the hon. gentleman's time has expired.

(Translation):

Mr. J. N. Tremblay (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, about the speech we just heard, I might say, quoting Montalembert, that in the applause with which it was greeted, it got its reward and punishment. What the other Liberal members had not had the courage to say or had been wise enough to keep silent about, fearing their electors, the hon. gentleman who spoke before me expressed quite plainly with an assurance which is invariably the lot of ignorance and self-conceit.

I only want to quote this: education within the meaning of the B.N.A. Act applies only at the primary level. In that unwise statement you have the substance of Liberal thought on the problem of education in Canada. If the provinces have no jurisdiction in the field of education beyond primary teaching, nothing prevents the conclusion that the central government may look after the other levels. Therefore, there is nothing to prevent it from paying all kinds of grants to secondary colleges and universities under whatever conditions it chooses to impose. This admission is important, at a time when federal and provincial Liberals are about to launch in Quebec their hypocritical autonomist offensive. We thank from the bottom of our heart, the old man from Hull for having told us the true Liberal thinking. His opinions are in full agreement with those already expressed by Mr. Maurice Lamontagne; in fact, the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron) has denounced the autonomy problem, saying it does not exist and that it has never existed. It is a good thing to know. That will have to be said outside this house.

The speech we have just heard—

(Text):

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a point of order. The hon. gentleman attributed the views expressed by my friend the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron) to someone outside of the chamber. I believe that procedure is against the rules.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was going to draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that my friend the hon. member for Hull made his own speech from a few notes whereas it would appear to the average observer that the hon. gentleman who is now making his speech is reading every word of it.

Mr. Ricard: I should also like to say a few words on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill). I just want to add that the hon. member for Hull this afternoon made many statements about things concerning which he did not know anything and the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Tremblay) is refuting them.

Mr. Speaker: I did not hear the allegation made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill). As I understood the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Tremblay), he drew attention to a similarity between what had been said by the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron) and somebody outside the house.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, Mr. Speaker; my point of order was—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is rising on a point of order which I wish to hear.

(Translation):

Mr. Tremblay: As I was saying, Mr. Speaker.

(Text):

Mr. Pickersgill: My point of order was not that, Mr. Speaker. My point of order was that the hon. gentleman who is now addressing the house appears to be reading a document.

Mr. Speaker: That is a point of order, of course. Hon. members know that it is not the usual practice of the house to read a speech verbatim from a previously prepared document and I trust the hon. member for Roberval will observe the practice.

(Translation):

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, I was saying that the hon. member for Hull denied the problem of autonomy when he said, among other things, that the problem has never existed and does not exist.

In that, he was only repeating the anti-autonomist writings of Maurice Lamontagne, who just happens to be the official thinker of the Liberal party. May I add that it was a good thing to know, and that he should be heard outside the house. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that he has been heard in the past.

However, the speech of the hon. member for Hull would have amused me right to the end had it not included such serious insults to the leaders of our universities in Quebec. They have just been accused of knuckling down to every political pressure by refusing federal grants to universities. The member for Hull ascribes to the rectors of our universities some shabby designs and some rather dark preoccupations. He thus insults His Excellency Msgr. Maurice Roy, chancellor of Laval University, as well as all our educators who, after deep reflection, decided to refuse the federal grants because, like former premier Duplessis, they saw in this measure a very dangerous precedent. These words will have to be recalled to the citizens of the province of Quebec, to all alumni of our universities who are justly proud of their alma mater and respectful of the men who taught them in the universities and who gave them, by their integrity, the best examples for their life. So, I want to protest now against the shameful remarks made by the member for Hull and deny categorically that our bishops, our rectors and our educators had surrended to lowly political pressure.

Mr. Speaker, when they started this debate on Bill C-56 and on grants to universities, the Liberals failed to mention the principles which inspire them and which have always led them in their centralizing endeavours.

Those principles, you have them set out on page 239 of the book by Maurice Lamontagne, Canadian Federalism, which, as everyone knows, is the bible of the centralizers.

Mr. Lamontagne wrote this:

> At another level, one might wonder how long it will be possible to deny the federal government the right to play a part in the field of education and culture, when in fact it cannot help intervening.

Those are quite consequential premises which, unfortunately, are absolutely false, based as they are on a postulate which in fact begs the question.

Mr. Lamontagne starts by wondering about the part which the federal government would eventually be called upon to play in the field of education and culture. He seems to contend that the central government is bound to come into that field.

But at this point comes in the postulate on which is based Mr. Lamontagne's argument.

Why is it, in the mind of the official thinker of the Liberal party, that one day the federal government will have—> a right to play a part in the field of education and culture.

Mr. Lamontagne answers straight off: it is because > —in fact it cannot help intervening.

[Mr Tremblay.]

The author of the breviary of centralization who may have some notion of what we call in legal terms the force of precedent, bases his whole argument on a de facto situation which he seems to consider as normal and taken for granted.

He gives examples, and I quote:

> When a government has an exclusive jurisdiction on radio and television and must carry out its responsibilities in the field of the films, how can it be denied the right to concern itself with education and culture?

The illustration is rather badly chosen. Moreover, it concerns facts which will have to be reviewed sooner or later. For when the direct attacks by the central government on the exclusive rights of the provinces in the field of education are repealed once and for all, nothing will prevent the struggle to be continued in those sectors which were too quickly believed to be the responsibility of the central power.

In any case, to mention them in order to justify the federal government looking after the needs of our educational institutions, is to sidestep and try to confuse the issue, because one has not enough courage to face conditions as they are and to ask, as one should, the real questions: "Is the federal government entitled to look after education? And if that responsibility is not under its jurisdiction, why should it try to assume it?

That is how the problem should be put.

We know by now how the Liberal party answered those questions. After having stressed and solemnly stated that education was a provincial field, the spokesmen of that party then made some reservations, more particularly that universities are not within the traditional definition of education. That is a considerable limitation of the educational field and a refusal to admit that, in practice, universities are at the summit of a structure of which they are the ultimate perfect completion.

I would like to quote here part of a brief submitted by the University of Montreal to the Tremblay commission in 1954, which says:

> We do not want any interference in the field of education, and we think that current university grants constitute such interference. In other words, we firmly believe—as we think that everybody else in the province of Quebec does too—that education is and must remain under provincial control and, that university teaching is part of the educational system; and we do not wish that system changed.

In drawing such a distinction between the various education and official academic levels, the Liberals were paving the way to greater encroachments.

But what is a university? Must we see in institutions of higher learning only technical schools for the teaching of practical knowledge in specialized trades and professions? Must we give up the fine and great definition of universities, as understood by the ancients who considered it as the "mother of arts and science, and the source of all education"? Must we not consider any more the university as the ultimate level, the summit where education is being perfected? The Liberal contention knows no limit when it wants to deprive the universities of its basic role of co-ordinator in the field of education. What do those distinctions amount to which have been made between the various levels of education, primary, secondary and superior, if they are not the various floors of a building whose summit is the university, both the summit and the foundation, because it is thanks to it that the education of an organized human community may go on improving and developing.

If help to universities is not help to education, universities must, from now on, be deprived of the role which they have never ceased to play as inspirators in all sectors of science, letters and arts, as a reference point and supreme master. One word only from the former member for Stormont today was sufficient to suppress the main function of universities, which is to preside over the manifold extension of knowledge which, added to directives and necessary guidance constitutes the traditional means of education.

But the Liberals have for long given up definitions. When definitions bother them, they ignore them and say they are not accepted as they used to be. That's what they did with the definition of education: they have restricted its scope at the primary level to justify the encroachment of the federal government upon the field of education because, in fact, assistance to universities, as it is practised today by the central government, covers both the university field proper and the secondary one, if we consider the structure of universities according to the American and Canadian pattern, according to which university begins at the senior matriculation level. And it is here that we realize the glaring ignorance or bad faith of those who state, like the former member for Stormont, that university grants are constitutional.

They ignore definitions as well as the facts they represent since, in this case, they deny the university its ordinary role and traditional function.

They conclude, with assurance, that assistance to universities is the responsibility of the federal government because it is not help to education. How simple it is.

However, the truth is more complex. In the matter of grants to universities, the actions of the Liberals were not taken with such ease and facility. The thinkers on the payroll of the Liberal party had to put forward their greatest intellectual efforts to invent a formula designed to dress up in philosophical language the anti-constitutional manœuvre of the Liberal party.

However, in referring to the subterfuges of the Massey commission, it is easy to see that the Liberals did not immediately find the elegant explanation given to us last year by that new Quebecer, the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), to the effect that the Liberal party favours federal grants to universities because aid to universities is not aid to education. To reach that explanation, it was necessary to set up the now famous distinction between culture and education: and our self-styled philosophers finally settled the question by resorting to fine distinctions, with the help of a man who, though previously an unshakeable autonomist, compromised his "natural inclinations" once he became a royal commissioner, in favour of a thesis which was soon to be used by his political co-religionists to help the federal government meddle in the affairs of the provinces.

I immediately emphasize the contradiction into which the new convert from Laurier threw himself when he made the following statement last year, as recorded in Hansard for July 18, 1959. Having attempted to ascribe to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) an interpretation of the expression "grants to universities", the new Liberal messiah from Quebec expressed the view that the federal government should never consider financing education on the primary and secondary level. He made the following assertion with his usual solemnity when addressing his recently adopted province of Quebec, and I quote:

> As far as I am concerned and I am sure not to be the only one on this side of the house to find myself in this position, I cannot accept that interpretation of federal grants to universities. I cannot accept that interpretation because it would justify federal assistance to secondary and primary schools. I want to make it very clear that I am and always will be strongly opposed to such federal grants.

I bear no grudge against the hon. member for publicly confessing today some feelings that he always managed, with infinite discretion, to keep for himself in the days when he lived outside the province of Quebec. However, I cannot believe he does not realize that the formula of grants to universities put forward by his party involves aid at the secondary level, because if you look at the American form of university organization, such as we find in English language Canadian universities, you find that the university level starts at what corresponds to the matriculation grade for Canadian universities of European type. Thus, faculties of arts in American-type universities correspond, in our own universities, to the higher levels of the humanities. It is easily seen, therefore, that the argument in favour of grants to universities based on a definition of universities is unsound, because the type of university I have just referred to involves both the higher and secondary levels of education.

The former member for Stormont will forgive me if I emphasize the dilemma in which he placed himself. Either he knew nothing about the organization of Quebec universities and, in that case, he did not take essential precautions before voting with his government for legislation authorizing it not only to encroach upon the field of university education, but also the field of secondary education, because, as I have just stated, in American-type universities, students pursue studies which in the province of Quebec in particular, are made in college; or the hon. member was aware of this particular problem of university organization and deliberately accepted to take part in this huge quibble the sole purpose of which was to bring federal power into provincial affairs.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. As I understood the hon. member through the interpretation, he referred to another hon. member as having deliberately acted so as to perpetrate a fraud. I think the hon. member will recognize that the imputation to a member of a deliberate action of that kind is contrary to the practice of this house and I would ask him, if I have correctly understood him, to revise what he has said.

(Translation):

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, I put the question in the form of a dilemma, with no intention whatsoever of imputing motives to the hon. member for Laurier. But after considering the facts, I am forced to wonder, along with the people of the province of Quebec, if the hon. member actually put the problem in the appropriate terms.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, but the explanation the hon. member gives is not satisfactory. He is not entitled to make the assumption that an hon. member's conduct would be of the kind which he has ascribed, and I would ask him to modify what he has said.

(Translation):

Mr. Tremblay: I believe there is a matter of language involved here. I did say, and I repeat, that it seems to me the hon. member for Laurier did not set out the problem as he should have; without crediting him with ulterior motive, I have the right, as a citizen, to wonder if this politician did really put the problem in the terms in which it should be put.

And, Mr. Speaker, if I may continue, I have said that we have every reason to believe that the Liberal members did not quite understand the problem of federal grants to universities. Under the Liberal concept, as evidenced by a speech to which I referred earlier, the hon. member for Laurier said, according to page 6374 of Hansard of July 18, 1959:

> Since they were established in 1951, we have always said that such grants were constitutional.

Please note the force of the expression: "we have always said—" It should be added, Mr. Speaker, that he kept saying it despite the facts, despite history, despite the constitution and the experience acquired since even before the constitution, as was so ably demonstrated by my colleague for Bellechasse (Mr. Dorion). What facts, what authors, what authority can the former member for Stormont and his co-religionists adduce in support of this claim? They initiated unconstitutional measures and, at the same time, they assumed that by crying out that they were right, this would justify them, in the eyes of the public, for violating the principles of the constitution for betraying history and plunging the Canadian confederation into a crisis which now, thanks to the Conservatives, seems to be abating. I have too much respect for the judgment of the Cornwall statesman to believe he relies on the whimsical explanation of the member for Megantic (Mr. Roberge) who claimed, not so long ago, that university education was not under the jurisdiction of the provinces because there were no universities in 1867. He was quite wrong in saying so because Laval University, of which he is no doubt an alumnus, was founded in 1852, and because, no later than 1868, the Quebec government expressed its intention to take its responsibilities not only in the field of higher education, but in that of arts, science and humanities.

The first speech from the throne made at the first session of the legislature of the province of Quebec included the following. I refer to the Journals of the Quebec legislature, volume 1, pages 4 and 5:

> The constitution has entrusted you with great interests and conferred upon you serious duties in the fields of justice, education, civil and municipal organization, public welfare, assistance to sciences, humanities and the arts, public development, including that of our vast forests and very important mines, in the fields of the development of our social resources, of immigration, of colonization, of police, and in general, in the fields of civil legislation and property rights.

And further on, the speech says:

> The development of public education and the culture of science, literature and the arts have, in our times, become not only means of national progress and prosperity, but also, next to religious matters, the clearest manifestation of true civilization.
> In that respect, the former province of Lower Canada has already made efforts which have been rewarded by remarkable success. So, with the commendable ambition of keeping us abreast of other nations, the former government had a survey made of the various educational systems used in Europe together with the literary and scientific institutions of the old world, with a view to introducing into ours what they might still be lacking. This is a serious matter which will soon have to retain the full attention of my government.

The budget speech of that year in the Quebec legislative assembly repeats just about the same thing. Let me quote from page 22 of the special edition of the budget speech delivered by the Hon. Mr. Dunkin on February 14, 1868:

> A total of $392,190 is shown under the heading "Public Education". As I said before, about $25,000 of the total logically belongs to the civil government. And for the purpose of this statement that is where it was placed. I should point out that the balance includes three items, $68,000 for higher education, $4,000 for schools in the poorest municipalities and $2,000 for teachers' old age retirement fund, a total of $74,000 for the 12 months only, for those accounts are to be paid only once a year before the next meeting of the legislature. A new item of $12,000, about which I shall give more details later on, has been introduced for agricultural education.
> There are under the same heading four literary and scientific institutions which receive a customary $3,000; then the usual amount of $2,000 is awarded to the commission on arts and manufactures; which makes a total of $5,000. The agricultural schools of Ste. Anne and l'Assomption receive $1,200 each; which brings grants for the whole agricultural field to a total of $14,400.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, the centralizing undertaking of the Liberals in the field of education has known two stages:

1. Introduction of university grant legislation;

2. Creation of the Canada Council.

The two pieces of legislation could hardly be dissociated, as they are major links in a policy of centralization in the field of education which is, in itself, only one aspect of the general centralizing policy described in Mr. Maurice Lamontagne's book which I mentioned earlier in my remarks.

I shall not recall here the various phases of the patient and astute struggle led by the federal government for the purpose of acquiring the exclusive provincial jurisdiction with regard to education. It might be enough to mention that the authors of the Tremblay commission report mentioned the milestones of that undertaking in book I, pages 95 and following, and in book II, page 227 and following, of that report.

I shall however more particularly mention the name of two members of the Massey commission, the same men whom François-Albert Angers mentioned in his now famous article in L'Action Nationale of November 1951, entitled:

> Two models of irresponsibility: prime minister St. Laurent and commissioner Levesque.

The article mainly denounces the manoeuvres of those two men who were to become the great promoters of the centralization recommended, in matters educational, by the Massey-Levesque commission.

At the time the Liberal party was launching its great centralizing offensive some reasons and justifications had to be found. The views of the province of Quebec were too much feared in those days to state offhand as the new-Quebecer of Stormont did last year that university grants "were in accord with the constitution". They had to proceed with due caution. Pretexts and reasons had to be found which looked intellectual and even scientific.

A distinction was made between culture and education. It was to solve all difficulties and refute every objection. By resorting to that trick, everything which was in some way or other outside the questions specifically discussed in school programs was declared a cultural matter and therefore said to be under federal jurisdiction. Outside a specified zone which was called plain or academic education, a vast field was established, which was labelled the cultural field and comprised everything regarding the improvement of the individual and of society. Such a vast concept had to entail a very wide jurisdiction and what authority was better able to assume responsibility in this respect than the central power?

The concept of the university had to be redefined. Universities, because of the part they played and because of their traditional functions, were supposed to belong to that super zone where central power may freely play.

After having disposed of the academic problem, it was also established that, for all practical purposes, the federal government should have a sovereign right of control with regard to all cultural matters and that such heavy responsibility could hardly be left only to provincial governments.

Therein, precisely, lies the misunderstanding, the error or the fraud. Those who were later on to become, in words if not in deeds, the promoters of a double culture, were forgetting that culture, according to the very definition they were giving of it, requires certain conditions and does not grow out of nothing.

In fact, it presupposes a certain climate, a certain environment. As a matter of fact, it is the result, the product and the most perfect achievement of a whole set of civilization factors.

Of these factors, the most important, the only essential one, is education. How can the advocates of dual culture claim to encourage the expansion and the progress of one culture in particular if they made this one culture subject to rules common to the two and if they seek, through a unified educational system, to cut off this culture from its living and fruitful sources?

Therein lies however the claim of the wise men from the Massey-Levesque commission. While pretending to promote a vaster form of national culture and to help spread French and English cultures, they want the central government to control these cultures and impose standards which, in the long run, would cause the original characteristics of each of these cultures to disappear.

What is, in fact, the objective advocated by the centralizing Liberals? The abolition of provincial sovereignty in matters of education and its transfer to a central power whose action could only be an effort towards levelling control of education at any level by the central power amounts to setting up a bureaucratic system which, to eliminate administrative difficulties, would impose programs that would do away with the destructive aspects of education in each province.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that every Canadian province must be anxious to retain full responsibility for education. Because education, and the system that serves to express distribute and expand it, is a provincial heritage enriched by experience gained over the years, and it illustrates the philosophy and distinctive characteristics of each province.

In the provinces with an English-speaking majority, even though the culture vehicle is the same, that culture takes on the particular characteristics of the province, it reveals a background of tradition, customs and beliefs that perpuate the traditions, beliefs and national customs of those who built the province. Education, the responsibility for which belongs to each particular province, is a sure safeguard for the individual characteristics of every province. It thus goes on developing and enriching a body of traditional wealth, something which could not be done by a unified federal system of education.

What is true of education in provinces with an English-speaking majority is just as true, and even more, with regard to the province of Quebec and to the large French groups distributed across Canada. If French culture is to enjoy the greatest respect—as I am sure it does—as one of the most lively and dynamic cultures of the present day, there must also be a particular respect for the institutions that maintain and develop it in America, all the more so because that culture is an absolutely unique phenomenon in the North American context.

Canada would be all the poorer if French culture, which is one of its original features, should disappear. We have outlived the days when racial quarrels could be rekindled and where any excuse could be used to support the assimilation of one ethnic group by the other. Now is the time for a modus vivendi based on a respect for the facts of history and for the outcome of long political struggles.

It is proper to recall here the principles which guided the fathers of confederation when, after years of fierce and difficult struggles, they realized that both ethnic groups should try to find a modus vivendi whereby each respective group would have every opportunity to grow and develop freely.

Those principles were not discovered overnight; the light came only gradually, after a long search. And when Sir John A. Macdonald suggested a legislative union, it took all the persuasive powers of Georges-Etienne Cartier to convince him that such a form of union would not settle the old problems arising from the irreducible opposition between the two racial groups. Macdonald had to yield to the views of Georges-Etienne Cartier, just as today the Conservative government has yielded to the views of those who favour the strictest autonomy for the provinces.

There are those who will say that our government has not immediately settled the problem. That is true, but it started working on it as soon as it gained power. It sought advice. It made suggestions. It listened to those that were made to it. It was able above all to learn from the facts and, instead of ignoring the province of Quebec, it started negotiations and agreed on a solution. The progress may have been difficult, I agree, but it was marked from the beginning with a persistent good will from which the whole country will now benefit.

This attitude stands in strange contrast with that of the Liberal party. It is useless to recall the heavy past of 1941, 1945, 1949, 1951 and the years preceding June 10, 1957.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I imagine it will surprise no one in the chamber when I say that I do not intend to follow the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Tremblay) in his academic wanderings. Nor do I intend to break the rules of the house, as he did, by attributing his words to someone else. I cannot think that anyone would have any pride of authorship in what the hon. gentleman has said and on reflection I doubt whether even he will. I do think, sir, that the unworthy insinuations that he made about my colleague the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) need no reply. Those of us who have had an opportunity, as have most of us in this house, to compare the conduct and the contribution to the public life of this country of my hon. friend from Laurier and the hon. member for Roberval will draw our own conclusions.

I hope to be able to say what I have to say in an entirely different tone and to deal with the bill before the house and with the arguments that have been put forward, particularly by the Solicitor General of Canada (Mr. Balcer), in respect of one part of this bill and, indeed, in respect of both parts of this bill; but before I do that I do want to make two or three general observations. The first is that it does seem to me that—and it is very natural that this should be so and I am criticizing no one in this house by saying this—because of the much greater emotional and perhaps political interest in the question of university grants—that is, in one province —we in this chamber are losing sight of the fact that the more important of the two aspects of this bill, important though the universities are and important though university grants are, is the maintenance and the extension of the principle of equalization. Without equalization, sir, I would remind the hon. member for Roberval and those associated with him; without the $50 million a year of equalization, or whatever the amount is that is paid by the vote of this parliament out of the treasury of this country into the treasury of the province of Quebec without any strings attached; paid as a result of Liberal legislation which was accepted by the late Mr. Duplessis in the year 1956; without that Liberal legislation, there would be very little autonomy today in the province of Quebec because the treasury would be empty.

Mr. Chambers: Are you running in Quebec, too?

Mr. Pickersgill: This fact should not be forgotten by these gentlemen who are delivering these academic discourses. There would be no university grants from the federal government or the provincial governments if we did not have these equalization payments which have been paid to nine provinces out of the ten. It is true that Ontario does not get any equalization payment because she could stand on her own feet. However, for the province of Quebec, there is $50 million or $60 million which is paid as a result of this act introduced by Mr. St. Laurent and Mr. Harris in 1956, an act which was denounced in this house and voted against by the present occupants of the treasury benches, but which was accepted by Mr. Duplessis.

These are the facts. This is part of our history that hon. gentlemen opposite will find it very difficult to obscure, even to the electors. I want to say something more about this matter of equalization, sir, before I conclude my speech because it is, as I say, very important to some of the other provinces as well as to Quebec.

I should like to say something as well, in view of some of the arguments that have been advanced in this debate so far, but I am not going to put forward any new ones of my own—

Mr. Chambers: You have not got any.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman is quite right, I have not got any new ideas. However, I have the ideas of Mr. St. Laurent and Mr. Harris which are the only ideas that this government can put forward because they have not got any of their own.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): And they were rejected by the people.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am very proud of the fact that Mr. St. Laurent laid such a good foundation that this government, which denounced the foundation when it was being laid, cannot find anything to put in its place and has to continue it. This whole measure amounts to just that, except for one relatively small part, and that relatively small part is, in our opinion, of very doubtful legality.

There would be no university grants about which anybody could argue in this house or in the legislature of Quebec or on the hustings in Quebec if Louis St. Laurent had not been prime minister—

Mr. Ricard: This is false; this is not true. There were some grants long before that. You do not know anything about your history.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Hees: Even your own members are protesting.

Mr. Speaker: Order; some hon. members are becoming so vocal it is impossible for me to hear the speaker who has the floor. I hope I will not have to intervene more forcefully.

Mr. Pickersgill: I regret very much that I have such a feeble voice, and I will do my best to make myself heard.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member is to proceed he must have the attention of the house. A debate cannot be carried on when many members are shouting from both sides of the house.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was saying there would be no federal university grants for us to be debating this evening if Mr. St. Laurent had not, as head of the government, in the year 1951 put an item in the estimates to pay 50 cents a head of the population of each province to the institutions of higher learning in each province, without any strings attached whatever. I might say when that was done Mr. St. Laurent was highly commended for doing it—I am going to use here a term I think I have rarely ever used before about a political opponent—by my hon. friend from Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), for whose honesty and patriotism I have the greatest possible respect. There was not one word from Mr. Drew; there was not one word from the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming); there was not a peep out of the Solicitor General in criticism of university grants at that time.

What is more, when these grants were made they were accepted by all the universities in the province of Quebec through a special commission that was set up at Mr. Duplessis' request, a joint commission composed of the minister of finance of Canada and the minister of finance of Quebec, and they were paid jointly by this commission for one year. Now, why, if it was all right to do it that year, it ceased to be all right in the year 1952 I do not profess to know. I do not intend to intrude in provincial politics by attributing any motives.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: All I say is that it was not the St. Laurent government, and it was not the parliament of Canada, that denied these grants in 1952 to the universities of Quebec.

Mr. Ricard: It was the universities themselves.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the hon. and noisy member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard)—

Mr. Ricard: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: —could make his own speech.

Mr. Ricard: And who knows all about the universities; you do not know anything about them.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am saying that this was the situation at that time. The situation was that in the year 1952 these grants were no longer accepted by the universities of Quebec, but only after the joint commission, which had been set up between the federal and provincial government of Quebec—which was unique and which did not exist in any other province—was dissolved by the government of Quebec and not by the government of Canada.

Mr. Ricard: Because Quebec was not a province like the others.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): I should like to speak to a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order; the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Brassard) is speaking to a point of order.

(Translation):

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I only wish to say that we have listened very carefully while the hon. member for Roberval read his speech.

I am wondering if there is not some misunderstanding about the Canadian House of Commons. I think that certain members here believe that we are in Quebec.

I would like you to maintain order, so that we may hear the speech of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. Ricard: I rise on a point of order.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Before the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot speaks, I may say I am not sure I understand what the precise point of order is that the hon. member raised. Perhaps he could tell me the complaint he raised.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): What I said was this: We listened very carefully and very attentively to the speech delivered by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Tremblay). Since the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) has started his speech he has not been able to make himself heard in this house because of the interruptions from hon. members on the government side.

Mr. Ricard: I should like to say a few words on the same point because the hon. member for Lapointe said a while ago that we were confused as to what was going on in Ottawa and in the legislature of Quebec. I think this is an insult to the province of Quebec and to the members from the province of Quebec because I think if there is one institution in Canada that works for the maintenance of—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

(Translation):

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): I am not aware of having insulted the province of Quebec, although I might have insulted members of the Union Nationale.

An hon. Member: We shall know later.

(Text):

Mr. Ricard: If there is anything that works for the maintenance of order in Canada, it is the government of the province of Quebec. I think it is an insult to the province of Quebec to say such a thing.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member should resume his seat. The hon. member who has just spoken has strayed away a bit from the point of order. The point of order itself is a general one. It is a point of discipline actually. As the hon. member who has the floor has indicated, emotions seem to have been aroused by this debate. No one hon. member and no one section of the house is wholly to blame. I have intervened for the benefit of the hon. member who has the floor and I will do so again if there is further disorder. I ask hon. members kindly to restrain their emotions until their turns come to speak.

Mr. Pickersgill: Having listened to the admiration expressed by the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot for the legislature of Quebec and knowing that there is an opportunity for people to get into that legislature, I think there are some of us in this house who would not mind if he tried to do so.

Mr. Ricard: We would be very successful, too.

Mr. Speaker: One of the difficulties about this debate is that discussion has been altogether too much about the responsibilities and jurisdiction of the legislature of the province of Quebec and not enough about the jurisdiction of this parliament whose bill is before the house.

Mr. Johnson: Will the hon. member permit a small question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly.

Mr. Johnson: I am referring to the statement he made a moment ago to the effect that any people who like to get into that house, implying any Conservative member wishing to be elected to the legislature of the province of Quebec, could do so. Does he intend to imply that anyone who runs as a Union Nationale candidate in the province of Quebec will get elected?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member who just asked the question perhaps did not hear what I have just said.

Mr. Pickersgill: I regret very much not being able to answer the question but I bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

When I was briefly interrupted I was saying that the university grants, which were established by the St. Laurent government and which were accepted by the universities of Quebec from the joint commission of the federal and provincial governments in 1951 or in the fiscal year 1951-52, were not subsequently accepted by those universities after that commission was dissolved by the provincial government. For what reason that was done, I do not know. But from that time onward it was a source of regret to every member of the government of Canada, and to every member to whom I ever talked who supported the government of Canada of that day in this parliament, that a method could not be found of meeting this difficulty.

It is well known that in 1957 a step was taken by the government of that day, again on the initiative of Mr. St. Laurent, to have these grants paid not directly out of the treasury of Canada but by the national conference of Canadian universities or a foundation established by that national conference, in order to remove even the last faint vestige of the suggestion that there was any attempt, direct or indirect, to assert any kind of jurisdiction because these voluntary gifts were made by parliament.

When the equalization payments are accepted by the treasuries of the ten provinces or the nine provinces that accept them and that is every province that is offered them—the only one that does not get one is Ontario; and they are gratefully accepted by all treasuries now, especially by Quebec—I have never heard anyone argue that the provision of those equalization payments is an assertion by this parliament that we have control over the legislature of that province. I have never been able to understand—nor do I think have any of my hon. friends been able to do so—why anyone should have any ground for the view that the payment to a free university in a free country of money voted by the parliament of Canada was anything more than a gift or that in any conceivable way it could exercise any jurisdiction over that university. I do not deny for one minute that such legislative jurisdiction as exists in this country over the universities is vested in the provincial legislatures and in them exclusively. But my idea of a university grant and the idea of every true liberal—and I am not using that word "liberal" with a capital "l"; I am using the word "liberal" with a small "l", the kind of liberalism that would be understood by the hon. member for Greenwood—is that a university should be free, that it should not be under the thumb of any government, federal, provincial or municipal. It was because no man ever respected the liberty or the rights of others in the whole history of this country more than did Louis St. Laurent that it was possible for him to do as he did.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I have not attempted to allocate the blame but I am looking about for the principal offenders. When I find them I shall be obliged to mention names.

Mr. Pickersgill: I had not intended to say this, Mr. Speaker, but I think the time has come when it is very hard for any member sitting on this side of the house not to draw attention to the fact that when hon. gentlemen opposite speak, and particularly the backbenchers opposite, they are allowed to be heard in this house. But when members of the opposition speak with any force at all in this house it becomes increasingly difficult for them to get a hearing—

Mr. Ricard: That is not true.

Mr. Pickersgill: —as any comparison of my speech with that of the hon. member for Roberval who spoke immediately preceding me will, I think, show. Having said that, I do not intend to make further reference to the matter.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. More) rising on a point of order?

Mr. More: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have heard the charges made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) about interruptions. May I say that it is just a week or so ago that the hon. gentleman who is making those charges made 62 interruptions from his seat without rising. I therefore think it ill behooves him to make general charges of that kind.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member who had the floor did not, in my opinion, show the best judgment in making the comments he made, unless he did so by addressing them to the Chair as a point of order. Otherwise he encourages interruptions which are not related to any specific point of order. Hon. members in the house appreciate the problem. This debate has been an extended one and there have been heated arguments. I am sure that all hon. members would like to get it concluded. That objective can be accomplished only if the debate proceeds in an orderly way. I have not attempted to allocate the blame. As a matter of fact, it seems to me that there has been widespread interruption. It is far from my intention to take the role of a scold. However, I ask the co-operation of hon. members throughout the rest of this debate, request that they listen with reasonable attention and that if they wish to interrupt they rise in their places and secure the consent of the Chair or hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. Pickersgill: I must say that I think the hon. member for Regina City had a point.

Mr. Kucherepa: Confession is good for the soul.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was going on to say that in 1957 when this new method of making the payments to the universities was adopted it was adopted not because of the situation in Ontario or in Prince Edward Island or indeed in any other of the nine provinces. It was adopted in the hope that this procedure might remove the difficulty or the susceptibility that was felt by many people—and honestly felt—in the province of Quebec. It is a susceptibility which is very understandable, as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) said this afternoon.

That is the kind of thing which, if we are realistic at all in trying to conduct the affairs of this country on a national basis with fairness to everyone, we have to pay due regard to. We were very disappointed indeed when that device did not have the result that was hoped for. I must say I was pleased, and I said so in the house when this measure was first brought before us by the Minister of Finance at the resolution stage. I said I was pleased, and I think everyone in the country who cares about these things at all was pleased that it appeared that a method had been found to overcome this susceptibility about federal aid to universities.

It so happens that when the bill was finally brought before us and we were able to examine the method by which the present government is seeking to do what Mr. St. Laurent sought by various devices to do we found that there are very grave doubts indeed about whether it conforms with the constitution of Canada which it is our solemn duty in this house to uphold. We have no business to be making laws in this house which are beyond the powers of this parliament if we do so knowingly. When my hon. friend from Laurier, in that magnificent speech he made the other day, pointed out what the difficulties were, he was not for one minute suggesting, nor was anyone on this side of the house suggesting, that we do not want to see this problem solved. After all, these university grants were started by us and we want all the universities in Canada to have them. We are also glad that the Solicitor General is a convert to our view of this matter because he opposed these university grants rather mildly in 1957. He did not actually vote against them but he opposed them.

A good many hon. members who are supporters of our political opponents in the province of Quebec and who opposed us in the 1957 and 1958 elections also attacked these grants and said they would have an end of them when they came into this parliament. Now what have we here before us tonight? We have before us tonight a bill which continues absolutely literatim and verbatim the St. Laurent formula.

Mr. Ricard: That is not true.

Mr. Pickersgill: As a matter of fact we all know that that is the formula that is going to be followed in the case of nine provinces out of ten. So that when the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) says that is not true he evidently has not read the bill because the bill contains, as the Minister of Finance told us in his opening speech very categorically and correctly, a continuation of the existing formula of paying university grants. It also provides a suggested alternative which, in our opinion, is probably beyond the powers of this parliament validly to enact and which, whether it is beyond the powers of this parliament validly to enact or not, certainly interferes in provincial jurisdiction in several respects, and the St. Laurent formula which is also being continued by this bill interferes with it in no respect whatsoever. That is the difference.

What does this bill say? I am not going to read the clauses because the rules do not allow me, but in the general terms in which the minister explained it to us it says that the province could impose a tax of 1 per cent on corporation incomes in addition to the tax that it is now imposing, and that the federal tax will be abated by that 1 per cent if—and it is the "if" that matters—the province pays to the universities grants equal to $1.50 per head according to a scheme that is laid down by an agreement between the Minister of Finance and the universities federation in which that province would not be participating. That is to say, the scheme that is to be followed by the province which accepts this alternative is a scheme that is laid down by an agreement between the Minister of Finance and representatives from the other provinces, but not from that particular province. It is imposed upon them.

Furthermore, it says that if more is collected from the 1 per cent levy than $1.50 per head of the population of the province, the excess has to be paid over to the government of Canada or will be deducted from the payments to the province under this act.

That is palpably and obviously an interference with the performance of the government, and indeed an interference with things which have been done by the legislature of the province. It is an interference laid down by this parliament to be carried out by the Minister of Finance. It makes the Minister of Finance a sort of university dictator in the province that accepts this alternative system. He lays down the rules for that province and that is what happens. That is why my friend, Mr. Lesage, who is the leader of a great political party in the province, has said it is not acceptable.

Members of the government say that they have solved the problem. They have not solved the problem as long as the new scheme is not acceptable to all the people any more than the old one appears to have been. So that the problem is not solved by this legislation even if it were valid, and it does seem to me that our first duty as legislators is to determine whether or not it is valid and to be thoroughly satisfied on that point. That is what we are paid for. That is what we are sent here for. That is our solemn duty in this parliament.

The hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin) made a speech yesterday and I had a lot of sympathy with what he said and I would like to recall one passage to hon. members. As reported at page 3559 of Hansard, he said:

> Here for the first time, at least in recent history, we have been able to come to an agreement on a very thorny problem in this country. For the first time, apparently, the federal governmént and the government of the province of Quebec have been able to reach an agreement on one of the most important subjects affecting the citizens of Canada regardless of the province in which they live. I refer to the problem of education.

I must say that was my first reaction when I heard of this entente. I think that was the first reaction of any person of good will, that if the problem could be solved it would be a good thing for Canada, a good thing for Quebec and for the universities. I say that still and I believe it will be solved. I believe we can find a solution which will be a good thing for Canada, which will be a good thing for Quebec and which will also uphold the constitution of Canada.

The Solicitor General in his speech the other day did express some views with which I find it impossible, sir, to agree. I do not intend to deal with them at length, but the most important statement I think the minister made is to be found at page 3285 of Hansard for April 26 where he said:

(Translation):

In their formula, the Liberals had overlooked historical facts, so vivid in the province of Quebec, with the result that even if English-speaking provinces could obtain the millions collected by Ottawa to provide assistance to universities, the people of Quebec were being taxed like all the others while its universities were compelled to turn down the largesses of the federal government.

(Text):

I should like to ask the Solicitor General to tell us who forced them. Who forced them? Not this parliament; not the government of Canada; not the universities federation. Indeed, there was no force at all.

Mr. Balcer: Respect for the constitution.

Mr. Pickersgill: Then the minister went on to say—and I will continue to quote, unless the minister wants to give his own interpretation about who exerted the force—

(Translation):

People outside the French province, wondered when they found that, year after year, Quebec leaders were turning down federal grants. Our opponents went so far as to describe that attitude as "segregationism" but it was the Liberals, with their anti-constitutional formula, who applied a policy of intellectual segregation with regard to Quebec.

(Text):

I think it would be very wrong for me to discuss the question of whether there was any intellectual segregation forced on Quebec and, if so, by whom. That is not my business, and I do not intend to talk about it. But if this parliament has been enacting unconstitutional laws then it is my business, just as it is the business of the Solicitor General and of the Minister of Finance. I wish to remind you, Mr. Speaker, that the principal legal authority in this house on the day he made this speech—I say this because the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) was away that day —the Acting Minister of Justice told us in his speech that the bill which is now before the house was unconstitutional.

Mr. Balcer: I said, your formula, not ours; we have improved yours.

Mr. Pickersgill: I cannot believe that the Solicitor General of Canada, one of the leading lawyers in the country, has not read the bill before the house, because the St. Laurent formula, as the Minister of Finance told us, is in this bill in its entirety. It is the main thing in the bill, and it is going to be accepted by nine provinces, though an alternative is proposed. But if that formula is unconstitutional it should not be put into the bill by a minister who believes it is unconstitutional and who happens to be one of the legal advisers of the government.

Mr. Balcer: It does not make Quebec a reserve, as you were doing.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think it is incumbent on the Minister of Finance to tell us if he agrees with the view expressed by his legal colleague—his learned colleague—that this bill which the Minister of Finance is asking parliament to accept is unconstitutional.

Mr. Balcer: I never said that.

Mr. Pickersgill: These are the words I read, the precise words of the minister, I do not see how the hon. gentleman can get away from the words he used here.

The same formula is in the item the government brought forward last year, in the Appropriation Act, and the year before that. Does the hon. gentleman mean that for three years he has been bringing forward unconstitutional laws? He says this is an anti-constitutional formula. Well, it was in the Appropriation Act of 1957-58, 1958-59, and 1959-60, besides being in the estimates of 1960-61, to be taken out by this bill if this bill passes.

This is what the principal legal adviser to the government here in the house that day said was unconstitutional. This is a pretty state of affairs. Now that the Minister of Finance has been exalted above his station, and is Acting Prime Minister, I should like him, when he replies, to tell us if this is a new conception of collective responsibility, a new conception of the collective responsibility which a properly constituted government under our British system has for the acts it performs and the measures it brings before parliament. I take this position because here we have the Minister of Finance bringing in a bill, while his colleague, the Solicitor General, tells us that the bill contains provisions which are unconstitutional. This seems to me to be an extraordinary state of affairs.

I wish to turn, now, to another of the legal opinions—no, this was a political opinion—of the Solicitor General. The hon. gentleman to my left laughed a little too soon that time. Here I am reading from Hansard for October 18, 1957. I am reading in English simply because I happen to have the English volume here; I am reading a translation of a question which Mr. Breton, the very distinguished member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm at that time, one of the most learned members in this house—

Mr. Ricard: That is why the people of his riding defeated him.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Breton put the following question to the Solicitor General, as will be found in Hansard on page 129:

> When sitting in the opposition, the hon. Solicitor General, has on various occasions, given expression to the well-known thought that federal subsidies are unconstitutional—

He was referring here not, of course, to university grants, but to the equalization payments which, apparently, the Solicitor General also thought were unconstitutional but which he has joined his colleagues in continuing for three years since he has been a member of the government and which he now wants us to continue still further. Perhaps I was hasty in saying this was not a legal opinion, because the record continues:

> The opinion which he voiced then was shared in every way by the government of the province of Quebec. In view of the proposed federal-provincial meeting on fiscal matters, could he tell us now if he will oppose the subsidies which his government seems to be preparing at this time?

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member in the middle of his quotation, but his time has expired.

(Translation):

Mr. Remi Paul (Berthier-Maskinonge-Delanaudiere): Mr. Speaker, ever since Bill C-56 has been under consideration there has been in this house an election atmosphere created under the guidance of one of the Liberal leaders in Quebec, Mr. Jean Lesage, a nefarious centralizer who has been making the hon. members of Her Majesty's official opposition blind or at least pretending to be.

(Text):

Mr. Pickersgill: I rise on a point of order. The hon. member has made an unwarranted attack upon a member of the Queen's privy council for Canada, using language which, I believe, is contrary to the rules of this house.

(Translation):

Mr. Paul: The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate referred a moment ago to what was said by the brilliant member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm under the Liberals, Mr. Breton.

Well, I want to quote the ex-Liberal member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Lesage) and to comment upon his attitude.

Then, I do not think that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was justified when he interrupted.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker. The hon. member, as I heard the interpretation, referred to a former member of the house and a privy councillor as nefarious. That was the translation. I have forgotten what the additional epithets were. May I remind him that the bill before this house is a bill which has to do with federal action and not provincial action, and that it will not be in order if his purpose is to discuss political figures in the Quebec provincial election. It is not in order to do that. I would ask the hon. member to reconsider the terms which he used.

(Translation):

Mr. Paul: With all due respect, Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw the word "nefarious" to replace it by the word "notorious".

I can understand the concern of Liberal members from Quebec who are sitting in this house and who have put their confidence in the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) who, from time to time, appears on Quebec television—and, he is about the only one who does so—to preach the great Liberal doctrine which, according to him, is the only one able to solve all national problems, and especially to safeguard the autonomy of the provinces, particularly in matters of education.

I intend to speak very briefly about Bill C-56, and far be it from me to consider a legal text to analyse the constitutional implications of section 93 of the British North America Act.

I will simply put a few questions to the Liberal members of the official opposition, in order to judge, by their attitude, of their sincerity in discussing this bill.

Do the Liberals admit that education, at all levels, and under section 93 of the 1867 act, belongs exclusively to the provinces? Section 93 is quite clear on that point. Only the provinces are entitled to legislate in matters of education, which implies, therefore, that they have the exclusive right of levying funds to support schools and universities.

The hon. member for Laurier should give us an explanation of the policy adopted by his party when, on January 9, 1952, order in council P.C. No. 123 defined the terms "students" and "universities" for the purposes of implementing the federal act providing for assistance to universities.

What was the definition given to the term "university level"?

As far as a province is concerned, a program study stage more varied than that which is generally accepted in the provinces as entrance condition to university.

The situation became seriously endangered, and those conditions and terms forced the province of Quebec to refuse the federal grants.

In the province of Quebec, such encroachment on the part of the federal government on the field of education could not be accepted, because universities and affiliated classical colleges are their own masters with regard to their education program and enjoy the fullest autonomy. This freedom of action allows them to retain for our educational system its own distinctive character, which is so much in keeping with the traditions of the people of Quebec.

Considering that Canada has a dual culture, the French culture which is so rich, so beautiful and so noble and the Anglo-Saxon culture which is characterized by its beauty, dignity and richness; considering that educational programs and systems are based on either one or the other of those cultures, depending on the racial groups for which they were meant it was extremely dangerous for the preservation of the French fact, of the French language and of the French culture to agree that the definition of the words "student", "university" and "university level", as set out in order in council No. 123, be the same across the whole country.

It is then that we saw the late Hon. Maurice Duplessis, premier of the province of Quebec, take a strong stand. He fought aggressively for his people and the Almighty recalled him at the top of his glory September last, before he could even reap the profit of the great battles he fought against the centralization of the federal Liberal party, of which were members at the time the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) and the ephemeral leader of the Quebec Liberal party, Mr. Jean Lesage, former member for Montmagny-L'Islet.

And it is those people who today, with regard to Bill C-56, talk about encroachment upon the autonomy of the province of Quebec. The former member for Montmagny-L'Islet is very ill-advised to proclaim himself, in the province of Quebec, the champion of autonomy and education, because he supports today what he criticized formerly, and his sincerity is only equalled by a personal ambition dictated by the proud wish of becoming premier of his province.

There is many a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip as Mr. Jean Lesage won't be long in finding out.

[Mr. Paul.]

Liberal members of this house should put education before petty politics. We must first consider the problem of education if we want our young students, the citizens of tomorrow, to have all the educational facilities which will enable them to play their part in the political life of our country, a highly social part.

The Liberals believed and above all hoped that the Conservative government would fail to find an area of agreement, a solution acceptable to the province of Quebec. The matter of university grants is not definitely solved by the present bill, but it recognizes that the provinces have an absolute right to levy taxes for educational purposes and to be able to discharge the responsibilities devolved upon them by the constitution. The time for the gradual return to the provinces of their taxation fields has come and soon, the present government will give back to the provinces the privilege to exercise their exclusive jurisdiction as regards education and grants to education.

During the last federal elections, the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Diefenbaker) had promised a happy solution to the problem of university grants. The Canadian people and the people of Quebec have trusted him and today the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) by his bill is fulfilling this electoral promise.

I wish to take this opportunity to congratulate the premier of the province of Quebec, the Hon. Antonio Barrette, for the strong stand he has taken in order to help our educational institutions and our universities in the province of Quebec. His government did not care to know what the federal government would do and, without knowing if Ottawa would accept the 1 per cent increase of the corporation tax for educational purposes, enacted a law whose constitutionality is recognized by Bill C-56 introduced by the Minister of Finance.

In order to avoid double taxation and to respect provincial autonomy, the federal government through Bill C-56 grants a deduction of 1 per cent on its own tax. Is that the breach of provincial autonomy mentioned by the member for Laurier and the ex-member for Montmagny-L'Islet? The latter would have done much more for his people had he taken the same stand which he advocates to-day when he was sitting in this house. What will be the attitude of the Liberals concerning Bill C-56? If they vote against the bill, we will come to the conclusion, (1) that they are opposed to the integral maintenance of section 93 of the act of 1867; (2) that they blame the present government for being careful not to encroach upon provincial rights in the field of education; (3) that they blame the province of Quebec for recovering the sum of $25 million to assist higher education in Quebec; (4) that they prefer to help their little friend Jean Lesage than to serve the interests of education; (5) that they were and still are centralizers and continue to promote the "believe or die" or "take it or leave it" policy of the previous prime minister, Mr. St. Laurent; (6) that they have definitely no regard for provincial autonomy.

On the other hand, if they support Bill C-56, we shall conclude, (1) that they were not in earnest when they stated their argument on autonomy; (2), that they attempted to distract the people of Quebec in order to make them forget that the matter of university grants was settled through understanding, co-operation and absolute respect of provincial rights, between the Union Nationale government, on one hand, and the Conservative government, so efficiently headed by the Prime Minister, Mr. John Diefenbaker, on the other hand; (3), that they criticized this bill for five days for publicity purposes to finally approve it out of undue deference to public opinion.

In concluding, on behalf of the population of Berthier-Maskinonge-Delanaudiere, I extend my heartiest congratulations to the Minister of Finance. And on behalf of educators, students, teaching institutions of my riding, I thank you, the Minister of Finance.

I shall support this bill and I vote for it, because it constitutes another step toward peace, harmony and true national unity in everyday life.

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the debate on Bill C-56, which amends the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act.

According to pages 3279 and following of Hansard, the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) made a complete historical survey of the matter of grants to universities, and his masterly speech covered the period from the request for financial assistance of Canadian universities to the Massey commission to the 1956 amendments which doubled those grants and charged the national conference of Canadian universities with their distribution.

I will briefly recall from this historical survey of the question only the essential facts.

In 1950, and everybody knows this, the Canadian universities were in a disastrous financial situation—equivalent to a case of national urgency—which then required immediate solutions. We recall that in 1950, the universities themselves felt it was the duty of the government to help them.

So they explained their urgent needs to the Massey commission. The latter made a report on this matter to the federal government and urged it to revise the credits voted in aid to universities.

In the 1951-52 estimates, the special vote which provided direct grants to universities came from the consolidated revenue fund, not from a direct tax.

I must point out, Mr. Speaker, that those grants at the time were received with eagerness not only by all Canadian universities, but also by all political parties in the house, as well as by the government of the province of Quebec at the time, including the premier.

Those grants to universities initiated in 1951-52 either were constitutional or not.

If they were unconstitutional, why then were they approved without restriction by all political parties, by all provincial governments, including the Union Nationale and Mr. Duplessis?

If, on the other hand, the direct grants to universities were constitutional in 1951 and 1952, according to the Union Nationale and Mr. Duplessis, why did they become unconstitutional for them in later years?

We are all free to draw our own conclusions. My opinion is that in 1952 and 1956, which were election years in the province of Quebec, the Quebec government at the time deemed it expedient to entertain a constitutional myth for purely political purposes, feeling it was much more advantageous to use those expedients than solve the problem of the Canadian universities.

Mr. Speaker, the Conservative members of the province of Quebec were elected, among other reasons, because of formal promises they made to the electors in that province. Our Conservative friends undertook, if elected, to find a formula by which no federal grant would be paid to universities. And now Bill C-56 is before this house.

Not long ago I was reading thoughts by Euripides and I remember this Latin quotation which, I think, applies to this case:

Quos Deus vult perdere prius dementat.

Those whom God wishes to destroy He first deprives of their senses.

Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration is in two parts, one of which is basically wrong, dangerous and anti-constitutional. That part is precisely that which is known as the Diefenbaker section.

On the other hand, there is in Bill C-56 a part that is good, and it is precisely the part taken from the act passed by the Liberal government of Mr. St. Laurent.

Mr. Speaker, may I ask you to call it ten o'clock?

(Text):

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I inquire what the business will be for tomorrow? I wonder whether the house leader can indicate what business we will be taking on Monday and other days of next week.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will consider the estimates of the Department of Agriculture. On Monday we will start with item No. 14 on today's order paper, which is a motion to set up a select committee to consider the procedure of the house. If it is concluded it will be followed on Monday by the budget resolutions.

On Tuesday, we will continue with the debate on Bill No. C-56, to amend the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act. If that is concluded, we would follow with budget resolutions. Tentatively, I am suggesting for Wednesday consideration of a bill to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code, which will appear for first reading on tomorrow's order paper. I think that is as far as I can go at the present time, Mr. Speaker.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWER TO QUESTION

APPENDIX

LETTERS FROM JAPANESE AMBASSADOR RESPECTING EXPORT QUOTAS

EMBASSY OF JAPAN

Room 701, Metcalfe building,
88 Metcalfe street,
Ottawa 4, Ontario, Canada,

April 29, 1960.

The Honourable Donald M. Fleming,
Minister of Finance,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Sir:

As you well know, careful consultations have been going on between the two of us, as well as between the staff of the Canadian departments concerned and my embassy, as to the size of quota to be voluntarily applied by Japan for export to Canada of commodities which might injure or threaten to injure the Canadian producers of such or like products.

I am happy to inform you that as a result of these consultations, my government has decided to apply voluntary export quotas on textile goods as set forth in the annex to this letter for the year 1960.

You are aware that in addition, the Japanese government also maintains voluntary export control on other secondary textile products. These are listed in the final page of the annex. In respect of these items it is the intention of the Japanese government to establish export quotas for the year 1960 which provide for a moderate and orderly expansion on the basis of 1959 shipments.

It is noted that these measures, as set forth in the annex, are taken by the Japanese government on its own accord in order to conform with its established policy of gradual increase of Japanese exports on an orderly basis with a view to avoiding undue injury to the domestic industry of importing countries.

You will also note from the annex that many new items have been included under control and almost all items, at least all important items, of the secondary textile goods—nearly 100 per cent of the total Japanese export to Canada of garments or 77 per cent of secondary textile goods—will be covered by these measures. It is the opinion of my government that these controls will effectively preclude any further flooding in any of these categories of goods.

I take this opportunity to renew my firm belief that by setting up these self-restraining measures, we have been able to pave the way for the further expansion of two-way trade on an orderly basis, to the mutual benefit of both countries.

In communicating this information to you, I assume that in respect of products listed in the annex to this letter, for which firm quantities are specified, Canada will not, during the year 1960, invoke the provisions of article XIX of the GATT or of the exchange of letters which accompanied the agreement of commerce of 1954 between Canada and Japan.

Yours sincerely,

Toru Hagiwara,
Ambassador of Japan.

See pages 3622 and 3623.

Other secondary textile products on which voluntary controls are maintained

1. Woollen sweaters, pullovers and cardigans.
2. Woollen knitted gloves and mittens.
3. Paper caps, paper hats and hat bodies.
4. Silk and silk rayon mixed scarves and mufflers.
5. Rayon gloves and mittens.
6. Bed sheets other than cotton.
7. Bed spreading all fibres.
8. Pillow cases other than cotton.
9. Woollen coats and slacks.

e.g. suits, trousers, skirts, dresses, coats, etc.

The Honourable Donald M. Fleming,
Minister of Finance,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Sir:

As you well know, careful consultations have been going on between the two of us, as well as between the staff of the Canadian departments concerned and my embassy, as to the size of quota to be voluntarily applied by Japan for export to Canada of commodities which might injure or threaten to injure the Canadian producers of such or like products.

I am happy to inform you that as a result of these consultations, my government has decided to apply a voluntary export quota in respect of stainless steel flatware for the year 1960. Total shipments of this product to Canada for the year ending December 31, 1960 will not exceed 1,150,000 dozen pieces.

I understand that Canadian firms are likely to place orders with the Japanese industry to supply approximately 150,000 dozen pieces for the "premium" or "give-away" trade. Accordingly it is expected that as in former years a significant quantity, within the quota, will be absorbed by shipments to supply the "premium" business.

It is noted that this measure is taken by the Japanese government on its own accord in order to conform with its established policy of gradual increase of Japanese exports on an orderly basis with a view to avoiding undue injury to the domestic industry of importing countries.

In communicating this information to you, I assume that in respect of this product Canada will not, during the year 1960, invoke the provisions of article XIX of the GATT or of the exchange of letters which accompanied the agreement of commerce of 1954 between Canada and Japan.

Yours sincerely,

Toru Hagiwara,
Ambassador of Japan.

The Honourable Donald M. Fleming,
Minister of Finance,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir:—

In the course of the consultations respecting Japanese voluntary export restraints I referred on several occasions to the problem of shipments from third countries to Canada of products for which Japan has undertaken self-restraining measures. I would like to take this occasion to remind you once again that the Japanese government attaches the utmost importance to avoiding a situation where third countries are able to expand their sales to Canada of such products by virtue of the fact that Japan has undertaken to limit her shipments. Should it transpire that such diversion of trade were taking place I would assume that your government would take the necessary steps to correct the situation. In any event I would like to reserve the right to raise this point with you again should developments make this necessary.

Yours sincerely,

Toru Hagiwara
Ambassador of Japan.

16	All textile fibres	Bedspreads	600,000 pieces

EXPLANATORY NOTES.

1. With the exception of Item 2, relating to spun rayon coats and slacks, all of the quotas apply to total exports in the 12 month period ending December 31, 1960.

2. The Japanese government will use its best endeavour to urge Japanese producers and exporters so that quota shipments will be spread fairly evenly over the year, with due allowance for the fact that the demand in Canada for some of the quota items is seasonal in nature.

3. Where there is provision for a 10 per cent swing between subquotas, the maximum transfer will be 10 per cent of the subquota to be increased by the transfer. For example, in the case of cotton coats and slacks, the maximum application of the swing provision could result in shipments of (a) trousers 88,000 dozen; other garments 237,000 dozen, or (b) trousers 55,500 dozen; other garments 269,500 dozen.

4. In connection with the 10 per cent swing provision, and also more generally the Japanese government will use its best endeavour to urge Japanese producers and exporters so that there will be no undue concentration on any item within the quota categories.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, May 6, 1960

The house met at 11 a.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. HOWARD—REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN OTTAWA "CITIZEN"

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a question of privilege relating to a column entitled "Parliament" written by Norman Campbell and Greg Connolley in the Ottawa Citizen of Thursday, May 5, which reads in part:

> Meanwhile prospective C.C.F. candidates in the Quebec provincial election are wringing their hands as the blockade is interpreted in the French language press generally as an effort to force divorce courts on Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out that the latter quotation "an effort to force divorce courts on Quebec" is not in accordance with the facts and that that is not our desire at all.

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure whether the hon. member presents a question of privilege. It is a matter of the interpretation of what has transpired in this house.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

Third report of standing committee on railways, air lines and shipping—Mr. Rowe.

Fourth report of standing committee on banking and commerce—Mr. Cathers.

MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS—CONCURRENCE IN EIGHTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax) presented the eighth report of the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

THE BUDGET

TABLING OF AMENDMENTS TO BUDGET RESOLUTIONS

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as indicated by the leader of the house, the budget resolutions will be under discussion in the house next week. There will be the usual few amendments to the budget resolutions to be introduced and may I, following the practice I inaugurated during the last two years, give notice now for the convenience of hon. members of the amendments that I propose to introduce to the budget resolutions when the house is in committee of ways and means. Perhaps if it meets with the wish of hon. members these might be printed in today's Votes and Proceedings.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreeable to the house that these documents be printed in today's Votes and Proceedings?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, there is no objection from us, of course, but I wonder if the minister could give a general idea of the nature of these amendments.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, there is no general idea. These are individual matters. They are not extensive. It is just a matter of giving the house an opportunity to have notice in detail in advance of the discussion next week.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT—CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING MERGERS, MONOPOLIES, ETC.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (for the Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-58 to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FEEDS ACT

PROVISION FOR CONTROL AND REGULATION OF SALE OF FEEDS

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. S-27, to control and regulate the sale of feeds.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

BOMARC MISSILE—REQUEST THAT EXPENDITURES CEASE FOLLOWING U.S. ACTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Now that the United States House of Representatives by a vote of 327 to 3 has eliminated funds for procurement of the Bomarc missile, may I ask the Acting Prime Minister whether he will not stop all expenditures on the Canadian Bomarc program?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Acting Prime Minister): The United States congress as the hon. gentleman well knows, has not concluded with this matter. One house of the congress has dealt with it, and the question is now on its way to the United States Senate. It is to be hoped that the United States Senate will be able to deal with this matter reasonably expeditiously, but in the light of the agreement which was entered into between the two countries it would be improper on our part simply to assume that the United States government is not going to be in a position to carry out its part of the agreement.

We hope this matter will be clarified and cleared up at an early date. I think the house is already aware of the fact that the program, in so far as Canada is concerned in the construction of two bases, is very modest indeed, and that the expenditures on it are merely fractional. Canada, at a relatively tiny expense to herself, has enjoyed the benefit of huge expenditures by the United States on the development of and experiments on this weapon.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Will the Acting Prime Minister suspend the operation immediately until the United States congress and administration have come to a conclusion on this question, in order that not one additional dollar of the taxpayers' money shall be spent unnecessarily?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think I have answered that question, but if there is any doubt at all about my answer, may I remind the hon. member that the expenditures by the Canadian government at the present time on these two sites are, relatively, very tiny indeed. I have given the reasons why we hope for an early conclusion and final decision on this matter and why, in the meantime, the program which we have agreed upon is not one that we, as a government which honours its obligation, are in a position to ignore.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Would the Acting Prime Minister comment on the story in the Globe and Mail that Canada has taken a most unusual course in approaching two United States senators in an effort to help retain the Bomarc program?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): I can answer that question. I think it was last Monday that I gave a definite negative in reply to a similar question. I said I had not approached any United States congressman or senator. Since then I have had no communication with any United States senator or congressman. There is absolutely no truth in the story.

Mr. Hellyer: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister or any hon. member or representative of the government contacted any member of the United States administration in respect to this matter urging that they carry on and complete their commitment?

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Speaker, I have not contacted any member of the United States administration urging them to take any course in this matter. I cannot speak for the other members of the government, but my hon. friend may go around and ask each one.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of National Defence whether in the light of these recent developments referred to by the Leader of the Opposition the minister still has faith in the Bomarc missile.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Speaker, from all the information I have received from the technical people connected with the Bomarc missile I believe that it can be made functional. It might interest the hon. gentleman to know that the administration in the United States are asking that the Bomarc program be restored to the appropriations.

Mr. Hellyer: At the insistence of the Canadian government.

Mr. Pearkes: That is entirely incorrect, Mr. Speaker, and I ask that that remark be withdrawn. Within the last five minutes I have said a number of times that we had not contacted the United States administration in this respect.

Mr. Speaker: If the remark was made it was not made by an hon. member who rose and was recognized. I heard nothing, and with the leave of the house the record might very well take no account of what was said.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, with respect, the hon. member for Trinity while retaining his seat, said at the conclusion of the previous answer these words—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before the Acting Prime Minister proceeds may I say to him that if he proceeds to say what was said I shall not ask to have it excluded from Hansard; but if he wishes to put the matter on record and make it a matter of record he may proceed. I think perhaps that is the only course to follow.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I think the comment should be on the record. I said "At the insistence of the Canadian government". There have been numerous reports from Washington that members of congress, both of the House of Representatives and of the Senate, have been contacted by someone, sources unnamed.

Mr. Hees: I would not be surprised if the sources were members of the Liberal party.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I point out to the hon. gentleman that he is quite out of order in volunteering any such statement.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Acting Prime Minister whether any diplomatic representative of the Canadian government has been instructed to approach the United States government in regard to the decision to be taken in Washington on the Bomarc?

Mr. Pearkes: As far as my department is concerned, Mr. Speaker, the answer is no; they have had no instructions to attempt to influence in any way the decision to be taken there. No remark has been made other than that which I made in the house last week, that if this program were finally cancelled it would not be in keeping with the arrangements which were made. No other remark has been made.

Mr. Pearson: Can the parliamentary secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs say whether any instructions of that kind have gone from external affairs?

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs): To my knowledge, absolutely no, Mr. Speaker.

INQUIRY AS TO DECISION RESPECTING MANNED INTERCEPTORS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the fact that the SAGE computer installation was intended to control both the Bomarc missile and manned interceptors designed for the purpose, and in view of the minister's statement to the house last Tuesday that Canada would proceed with the SAGE computer installation notwithstanding the outcome of the Bomarc, can we conclude that the minister has decided to re-equip our defence squadrons with supersonic manned interceptors?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Such a conclusion would be quite erroneous.

Mr. Hellyer: I should like to ask a supplementary question. Can the minister tell the house what Canadian weapons will be controlled by the SAGE system?

Mr. Pearkes: It is not necessary that any Canadian weapons will be controlled by the SAGE system. We are in partnership with the United States for the defence of the North American continent. The United States have stationed at various points in the United States a large number of interceptor squadrons which should be controlled by the SAGE system whether or not Canada had any interceptors of her own. As I said in the house some time ago, no decision has been reached to re-equip the CF-100 squadrons with any particular aircraft at the present time.

FINANCE

STATEMENTS BY MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS RESPECTING LENDING MARKET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister based upon his approving reference yesterday to statements made here last Tuesday by the Minister of Public Works. My question is, when the Minister of Public Works stated that we helped to spoil the lending market, was he making an official government comment on official government monetary policy?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the statement which I made at that time is self-explanatory. The fact that we borrowed in 1959 one third of a billion dollars in the money markets for one separate item, housing, which was a very great amount of borrowing indeed, did help to make the money market a difficult one in which to borrow money at reasonable rates.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE FAIR

SUGGESTED ALL-CANADIAN FAIR—REJECTION OF INVITATION BY MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact that Canada was not successful in obtaining the world's fair for 1967, will the government give consideration to supporting an all-Canadian fair along the lines proposed by the Toronto Daily Star?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, while regretting the fact that the decision taken yesterday was not favourable to Canada's claim that the international fair of 1967 should be held at Montreal, the house can be assured that the government will take all proper steps to see that Canada's one hundredth birthday is suitably observed.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. Can the Acting Prime Minister say why Canada did not make an attempt to get some of its friendly nations to enter into the discussions in the same manner as the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics?

Mr. Speaker: Order. While I appreciate the hon. member's desire to discuss the matter, it seems to me that he is opening up an argument about something that happened in the past, and it would be better to raise the matter on the estimates or at some other time when a debate would be possible.

Mr. Chevrier: May I respectfully draw Your Honour's attention to the fact that it is not something that happened in the past; it happened yesterday.

Mr. Ricard: What is yesterday?

Mr. Chevrier: I am sure when Your Honour used the word "past" you did not mean the immediate past. Because this is a matter of considerable concern to many of us, and I am sure to the government as well, it seems to me perfectly in order to ask the Acting Prime Minister the reason, if any, why Canada did not move in the same way as the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics did.

Mr. Speaker: In view of what the hon. member says I will revise my view.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the house the government did all that was within its power to persuade the group meeting in Paris in recent days to select Montreal as the site for the 1967 world's fair.

When the hon. member asks me why Canada did not adopt the same tactics that were adopted by a totalitarian country, I can only say that Canada pursued proper tactics, and has not always open to it the kind of methods that are open to a totalitarian government. We proceed by the methods that are open to a democratic government. I assure the house that every effort was made properly to persuade that meeting to choose Montreal as the site for the 1967 world's fair.

The house is aware of the fact that the matter was resolved only after five votes were taken, and the contest was exceedingly close. Austria withdrew several days ago and the issue then became a straight question of choosing Moscow or Montreal. On the first two ballots a two thirds majority was required. The result of the first ballot was 17 for Moscow and 13 for Montreal, and on the second ballot 16 for Moscow and 14 for Montreal. On the remaining ballots a clear majority only was required. The result of the third and fourth ballots was a tie, 15 votes for each side. On the fifth ballot one country changed its vote, and the result was determined in consequence by a vote of 16 for Moscow against 14 for Montreal.

We regret the result but, Mr. Speaker, I wish to leave no doubt in the mind of any hon. member that everything that could properly be done to persuade the group meeting yesterday to select Montreal as the site for the 1967 world fair was done and efficiently done by the two ministers who represented Canada at the meeting.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): In view of developments of recent weeks which bear on the position taken yesterday, did the government at any time, without adopting totalitarian methods, suggest to any of its friends that there were advantages in joining this bureau? The answer is no.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not think it would be appropriate to launch into a detailed review here of what might or might not have been done in relation to any particular country. There were 30 countries represented at this meeting and, as hon. members are aware, certain countries, associated with the Soviet philosophically, had recently joined the group. So far as Canada is concerned, we acted at all times in a straightforward way. We do not profess to be able to control the decisions of other countries. Canada, I think it is our proud boast, does not exercise sway over any satellite countries.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a supplementary question. Will the minister tell the house how many cabinet ministers attended the meeting in Paris?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Two, Mr. Speaker; the Postmaster General and the Associate Minister of National Defence. I think the house will agree that the country was very well represented.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INTRODUCTION THIS SESSION OF TOURIST ESTABLISHMENT LOAN ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Can he tell the house whether the government intends to introduce legislation at this session to implement the request of the Canadian tourist association that a tourist establishment improvement loan act be introduced?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if any such decision were taken at any time by the government it would be indicated to the house in the usual way.

UNITED NATIONS

WORLD REFUGEE YEAR—EXPENDITURE EARMARKED BY CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): May I address a question to the Minister of Finance. Can the minister inform the house as to how much money is earmarked for and will be spent by Canada during world refugee year?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there are two parts to the question, the first of which is capable of an answer. The sum of $600,000 has been provided in the estimates in connection with measures related to world refugee year. It is not possible at this point in the fiscal year, of course, to say precisely what will be actually expended.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It will not all be spent.

SHIPPING

MONTREAL—EFFECT OF COLLISION ON HARBOUR AND SEAWAY OPERATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister tell the house what effect the collision which took place last night in Montreal harbour, resulting in the sinking of one ship, will have upon shipping in the harbour and what effect, if any, it will have upon shipping in the seaway?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for notifying me of his intention to ask this question, but as his notification only arrived in my office at the time the bell summoning members started to ring, I have not got a complete answer. However, I do have a report from the national harbours board which I think will give him the information he requires.

Last night about 10 o'clock the motor ship Polaris downbound through Montreal harbour apparently had some trouble with its rudder. It rammed the Federal Express, which was docked at berth 28. The Federal Express broke loose from its moorings, drifted down river and struck the Thorshope, docked at shed 29. The Thorshope also broke loose and drifted but was immediately anchored. The Federal Express sank off Laurier pier.

The ship is reported lying at the bottom of the river 700 feet off Laurier pier. The S. S. Safeguarder of the Department of Transport is now in Montreal to locate the exact position of the Federal Express and place wreckage buoys. Navigation has to be interrupted until the Federal Express is located, and it is expected that navigation should be resumed by noon.

As far as the national harbours board is aware, there has been no loss of life.

Mr. Chevrier: There was a supplementary question, namely whether this accident would affect the movement of ships through the seaway.

Mr. Hees: I have not the answer to that question. As I say, it is expected that navigation will be resumed by noon.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

LONDON, ONT.—TRANSFER OF CAR SHOPS TO MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport. Can he advise the house if he has received a request from the mayor of London to meet with the mayor and others regarding the decision of the Canadian National Railways to transfer their car shops from London to Montreal?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Yes, I received such a telegram, and I replied to the mayor of London that matters of this kind come 100 per cent under the operational jurisdiction of the management of the Canadian National Railways. I told him that in my opinion a meeting for that reason would not serve any useful purpose, and suggested that he get in touch with the president of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I thank the minister and ask a supplementary question based on a Canadian Press report in yesterday's London Free Press to the effect that the president of the Canadian National Railways said that he was unable to see what useful purpose would be served by such a meeting with him. In view of that report, would the minister be good enough, in the face of this serious problem as far as London is concerned, to ask the president of the Canadian National Railways to meet with the mayor and other interested representatives from London to see if some solution satisfactory to London might be found?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Hees: High officials of the Canadian National Railways have been in London and have examined this situation several times. They re-examined the situation as recently, I believe, as last Monday, at my specific request that it be gone over completely and thoroughly once again. This was done, and I feel sure that if any useful purpose can be served by a further meeting with Mr. Donald Gordon, he will have that meeting. However, I feel that this matter has been very thoroughly investigated by the management of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will the minister be good enough to answer my question and say whether he will ask Mr. Gordon to see the mayor and other interested parties?

Mr. Hees: I will pass along the request made by the hon. member for Essex East.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Thank you very much.

HOUSING

ST. JOHN'S EAST LAND ASSEMBLY PROJECT—REPORTED STATEMENT BY PREMIER SMALLWOOD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. McGrath (St. John's East): I have a question for the Minister of Public Works. Has the minister's attention been drawn to a statement made on May 2 in the Newfoundland house of assembly by Premier Smallwood concerning the land assembly project in St. John's East, wherein the city of St. John's, as agent of the province, would enter into an agreement with the federal government to proceed with this much needed program? If so, does the minister care to make any comment?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): I want to thank the hon. member for St. John's East for giving me notice of the question. In reply may I say that I have had the opportunity to read the newspaper report relating to the statement made by Premier J. R. Smallwood in the Newfoundland house of assembly on Monday, May 2. Premier Smallwood stated:

> The government of Newfoundland has not appointed St. John's as their agent for the proposed land assembly project and the government of Newfoundland have no authority to appoint the city as their agent.

On March 10, 1959, more than a year ago, the province of Newfoundland requested of the dominion government, through its deputy minister of municipal affairs, that the possibility of a land assembly project be investigated with a view to entering into an agreement with the city of St. John's as an agent of the province under section 36 of the National Housing Act. Since this type of arrangement has been used in many other provinces, the federal government was prepared to work with the city of St. John's as an agent of the province.

In accordance with this request the federal government agreed to investigate the proposed project with the city of St. John's. This investigation has now been under way for two months. When the province completes its delegation of authority to the municipality and when the investigation is completed, the formal agreements can then be drawn up if the project is approved by the federal-provincial partners. Surely no more evidence is required that the federal government is prepared to participate in federal-provincial housing projects in Newfoundland.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON GOVERNMENT PLANS FOR SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I should like to address an exploratory question to the house leader. In view of the fact that it appears unlikely that this house can conclude its business by July 1, and in view of the state of uncertainty in which this situation leaves members and their families and the staff and their families with respect to plans for the future, particularly the summer months, can the minister inform the house whether it is the government's intention to make an announcement soon in order to resolve this growing state of psychological disequilibrium?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Nothing would restore us to normal more quickly than active co-operation by the group represented by the hon. member in conducting the essential business of the house with dispatch.

The question is interesting and important, Mr. Speaker. This is the 75th day of this session. Of that time, 39 days have been allocated to debates set under the rules or debates which have been conducted here at the request of the opposition, private members' days and supply motions. Fifteen days have been utilized for the consideration of supply. Of those 15 days, 10 were spent on a discussion of supplementary estimates, 2 days on agriculture and 8 days on labour. The balance of the time, 21 days, has been available for government legislation, and a number of measures have already been passed.

Between now and such time as we might conclude the session—and this is within the hands of the people on the opposite side of the house—we have the legislative program to complete and the consideration of estimates. There are left two supply motions, which will consume four days. The balance of the time then is available for discussion of the matters now on the order paper and the others which will be coming forward very shortly. I think it is within the expectation of the house that we could complete the business by the end of June.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: It depends on an assessment of the measures which appear before the house; and for those items on which the opposition finds it wants to conduct a spirited and lengthy debate, the opportunity is there. There are some items which can be referred to a committee for study, and there are still other items which do not involve lengthy debate.

I hope to consult with representatives on the other side of the house on Monday with regard to the program that remains before us, and perhaps by co-operation we can allocate time in such a way that no one is prohibited from expressing his opinion here and at the same time the business of the house will be speeded up.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I think the house will appreciate the statement the leader of the house has just made on the present position of the session, but I wonder if he will give consideration to telling us whether all the legislation which the government intends to introduce is now on the order paper, whether all of the committees have been established, and what is the proposal from now to the end of the session.

While I realize that the minister said a few moments ago that he will discuss this on Monday, would it not be a good idea to have down on paper what there is which remains to be done over and above what I have already asked?

Mr. Churchill: I think there is great advantage in making clear to everyone in the house the business that is before us, and that is what I have been trying to do during the course of this session. Immediately on the return of the Prime Minister I think it will be possible to lay before the house the projected program for this year. We have on the order paper now, with the addition of these bills which were given first reading this morning, 17 items for consideration. There will be, I think, 12 more items to appear on the order paper, some of them of major importance, some of them of less importance.

Inquiries of the Ministry

IMMIGRATION

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON DEPORTATION OF CHINESE WOMAN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, in view of the decision by the Ontario supreme court yesterday in a case which her department had before the courts, whether the department still intends to persist in its effort to deport this Chinese woman who is the mother of a Canadian citizen, thereby involving either the exile of a citizen of this country or the separation of an infant citizen from its mother.

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I understood, Mr. Speaker, that we were not going to discuss details of these cases in the house, but I would refer my hon. friend to a decision which was given in another case in Montreal which is exactly the opposite of that given in Toronto.

Mr. Pickersgill: On the point of order raised by the hon. lady, since she has raised it—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member probably misunderstood what the minister said. She was replying to a question, not raising a point of order, and indicating why her answer was of the kind it was.

Mr. Pickersgill: Then may I put a supplementary question. Is it still the policy of the hon. lady to deport the parents of infant Canadian citizens from this country?

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Speaker, the implications of that question are too broad to give a simple answer.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, does the hon. lady intend to deport the mother of this Canadian citizen?

Mrs. Fairclough: Yes.

TRADE

WHEAT—STATEMENT RESPECTING COMMERCIAL PURCHASES BY INDIA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Ottawa West asked me a question concerning the commercial purchases of wheat by India in the last year or so.

The information that I have been able to get in the interval is that in the crop year 1958-59 India purchased 29,000 tons of wheat from Australia. Under the present arrangement with the United States, in the crop year 1959-60 it is expected that India will purchase 400,000 tons of wheat; and of this amount India has already made arrangements to purchase 276.4 thousand tons from Australia and 20,000 tons from Canada. Australia has been the main supplier of wheat to India on a commercial basis.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ELLIOT LAKE—STATEMENT ON FEDERAL ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, while I have the floor I might reply to the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition yesterday with regard to Elliot Lake, and outline what the government is doing in that respect.

The problems concerning the Elliot Lake community have been receiving continued and intensive study by the government. Based on the information supplied by various organizations representing Elliot Lake and on investigations conducted on the spot by representatives of the government, plans have been made to examine every aspect of the situation at Elliot Lake with a view to assisting in sustaining the community.

As I mentioned earlier in the house, the problem requires action on a broad front. The community itself is showing commendable effort. The mining companies are engaged in searching for other industries for the area. The government of Ontario over the years has shown a very active interest in the development of the community and is concerting provincial measures to aid in the continued well being of the community. The dominion government also has an interest in the welfare of Elliot Lake.

To further these purposes a committee has been appointed with instructions to consult with the appropriate representatives of the government of Ontario, the mining companies and the community of Elliot Lake. The committee has also been empowered to examine the possibility and feasibility of any projects under federal government jurisdiction that might be considered for location in the Elliot Lake area.

At the present time several proposals involving industrial establishments are being considered. In addition, the Department of National Defence has been making inquiries as to the practicability of establishing a training centre at Elliot Lake. The continuance of as much employment as possible under the circumstances is a major concern, and all factors affecting employment are being reviewed with the mining companies.

Pending the outcome of the consultations and investigations now going on it is not possible to state precisely the type of assistance that may be given to the Elliot Lake area. The committee is actively engaged in attempting to find an acceptable solution to the problem.

Hon. Mr. Macaulay, minister of energy resources in Ontario, has informed me that similar activities are being undertaken by a committee appointed by the government of Ontario, and in conversation with him we have arranged to have a meeting of the two committees at the earliest opportunity.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister if it is not the case, judging from his answer, that the federal program of assistance for Elliot Lake at this time is merely a further examination by the appointment of a committee?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I think that is an unnecessary gloss on the statement I have made. The Minister of National Defence reported to the house just the other day that his department is very actively engaged in assessing the possibility and feasibility of locating a defence training establishment at Elliot Lake. This is going ahead, but a decision cannot be reached overnight or within a few days because of the obligations involved. If this is gone ahead with it will be a very substantial contribution by the dominion government to a very active and important community.

POWER

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL REFUSAL OF LOAN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, could I ask the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources whether the government has declined to make a loan, on the same basis as the loan for the Beechwood project, to the government of Saskatchewan for the power project in connection with the South Saskatchewan development?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): No, Mr. Speaker, the government of Canada has not declined.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister say whether negotiations with that government are still under way?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I think it is understood that the working out of a national power policy takes some time, and the members of the government of Saskatchewan understand the over-all studies which are being made in this regard.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

1. Departmental administration, including advisory committee on agricultural services, $777,657.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Chairman, when I adjourned the debate last Friday I was pointing out that the Minister of Agriculture, in his second speech, made certain accusations concerning the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska. He accused the hon. member of having delivered in this house a purely political speech on agriculture.

I am sure I am not the only one in this house who understands very well why the minister made this accusation. It was much easier for him to make an accusation of that kind than it would have been to try to reply to the very specific charges which were made by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska against the agricultural policies, or lack of policies, of the Minister of Agriculture.

In saying only one or two words about the second speech of the minister I might ask the hon. gentleman why he did not try to deal with a statement of fact which was clearly made by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska, to the effect that the farmers' net income for the year 1959 fell by 7 per cent. The minister might also have attempted to explain to the country and to the house, when he took the floor shortly after half past four, precisely what constitutes the long range program in agriculture about which he talked so much in 1957 and 1958.

There is another reason why the minister should have accused the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska of having made a political speech in this house, and it is this. The hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska reminded the minister and the Prime Minister of their solemn pledges to the Canadian people in the field of agriculture. Nothing has been done to implement those solemn promises, and the nature of what has in fact been done has contributed to the deterioration of the agricultural situation in our country.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, like all hon. members, I heard the speech made last week by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon), and I now want to quote one or two sentences from that speech. As reported on page 7 of the appendix to Hansard for April 29, 1960, the hon. member stated:

> In the province of Quebec, three experimental farms folded up under the former government. Unfortunately, the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger) did not mention those facts to the house.

It is unfortunate that the former government discontinued operation of three experimental farms in the province of Quebec. However, there are other facts that the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, who seems to be particularly careful about accuracy, might have made known to the house.

For instance, he could have told us that, in Quebec, in the last fifteen years, 32,000 farms have been deserted. This is 20 per cent of the province's farm lands. Proof of this statement will be found in Le Soleil for August 13, 1959.

An hon. Member: Is this not the Union Nationale paper?

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Anyone is free to draw his own conclusions.

Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm also stated that sales of margarine in the nine other provinces were very harmful to Quebec agriculture and farmers.

In reply to some of the questions put to him, the hon. member could only say that there was a law against the sale of margarine in Quebec.

The hon. member made a reference to the federal legislation prohibiting imports of American cigarettes. I might point out to him that federal laws are not passed only as padding for statute books. They are enforced, and government representatives see that they are obeyed. When they are not, legal proceedings ensue, and penalties are meted out. But if there is a law against the sale of margarine in Quebec, did the authorities ever take legal action, assess fines or impose jail terms? I submit these few thoughts to the attention of the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm.

Mr. Chairman, I do wish, however, to support the hon. member on one point.

Mr. Johnson: Would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): I shall be pleased to do so when I have completed my remarks.

Mr. Chairman, I do, however, wish to support the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm on one point. He pleaded with the farmers to join the U.C.C. This, I think, was shrewd advice on his part, and I earnestly support his suggestion.

In the report of the Stewart commission which was set up by this government—a most creditable move, in my opinion—it was indicated that the U.C.C. and the co-operatives —probably mostly the co-operatives, as they are more particularly concerned with the economy—had helped narrow the spread between production costs and consumer prices, a problem which was investigated by the Stewart commission.

On the subject of price spreads, I should like, Mr. Chairman, to say a few words about that royal commission. I think the government acted very responsibly in setting it up. I shall indicate later what I think of the commission's recommendations and especially of the attitude adopted by the government later on.

When the Prime Minister announced the creation of that commission in the house on December 10, 1957, he said, as shown on page 2123 of Hansard:

> The chairman will be Dr. Andrew Stewart of Edmonton, president of the University of Alberta, formerly lecturer in agricultural economics at the University of Manitoba and dean of business affairs at the University of Alberta. The other members of the commission will be Mrs. W. R. Walton Jr., of Toronto, a member of the board of directors of the Canadian Association of Consumers since its inception in 1947; Dr. W. M. Drummond of Bristol, Quebec, and Guelph, Ontario, head of the department of agricultural economics of the Ontario Agricultural College; Mr. Howard MacKichan of Halifax, Mr. Romeo Martin of Montreal, Mr. Bernard Couvrette of Montreal and Mr. Cleve Kidd of Toronto.
> The commission is appointed under part I of the Inquiries Act, their powers being to inquire into the extent and the causes of the spread between the prices received by producers of food products of agricultural and fisheries origin and the prices paid by consumers therefor; to determine whether or not such price spreads in general or in particular are fair and reasonable or are excessive, in relation to the services rendered; to make such recommendations as they deem appropriate if any such price spreads are found to be excessive, and to examine the adequacy of price information currently available.
> I mention the personnel, sir, to indicate the high standard of those who have undertaken, at personal sacrifice, to discharge the important responsibilities which will fall on them.

The same day, Mr. Chairman, the Prime Minister tabled a copy of the order in Council appointing the commission. It is said, in paragraph (c), setting out the commission's responsibilities:

> (c) to make such recommendations as they deem appropriate if any such price spreads are found to be excessive;

The commission proceeded with the inquiry and submitted a report. It also made some recommendations to the government. In various cases, it had found that prices were perhaps not unreasonable profits, but of a size that was hard to justify.

May I tell of a case which, I think, deserves immediate government attention. It will be found in volume II, entitled:

> Report of the royal commission on price spreads of food products.

On page 101, table No. 16, we see this:

> Rates of return on investment after taxes.

There is a reference here to:

> Three breakfast food firms—

—together with figures showing their average profits for the years 1949 to 1957.

In 1949, those three unidentified breakfast food firms made a net profit—I would point out that this is after taxes—of:

> 26.4 per cent;
> In 1950, 30.5 per cent;
> In 1951, 25.2 per cent;
> In 1952, 29.8 per cent;
> In 1953, 30.5 per cent;
> In 1954, 28.4 per cent;
> In 1955, 30.2 per cent;
> In 1956, 32.3 per cent;
> In 1957, 29.3 per cent.

which, for the given period makes an average net profit after taxes of 29.2 per cent.

After ascertaining certain facts and conditions in this country, the commission made some recommendations. Among others, it recommended the appointment of a permanent board on prices, productivity and incomes.

Mr. Chairman, I am far from being an advocate of unmitigated socialism. I am not for government interference in all fields of human activity, and I am convinced that the system we have in America is still the best in the world.

However, the fact that we do not want out-and-out socialism is no reason why we should remain blind to the weaknesses of our system.

I believe the best way to avoid extremes is to have the intelligence to see our weaknesses and, above all, the courage to apply a remedy.

I have just pointed out to the house a weakness that I think we should try to correct.

It is precisely because of cases such as those that some of our people want the government to interfere in all fields. But I think that the government should take into serious consideration the recommendation of the royal commission on price spreads of food products and establish a permanent board on prices, productivity and incomes.

Even if the permanent board did nothing more than prevent similar abuses, I think we would have made a great step towards avoiding government interference in all spheres of human activity.

The government must take action respecting such shameless abuses.

What is the good of fine speeches, of talk about human freedom, if we lack the courage to correct the few weaknesses in our system.

The C.C.F. party has made a great many suggestions in the field of agriculture. I admit that several of them were most interesting and appropriate; the same can be said of other fields of human endeavour in our country. But, on the whole, the party's platform seems to give the impression that if the C.C.F. got into power, we would be living in an earthly paradise.

What I don't like about them is that they try to give the Canadian public the impression that if they ever occupy the treasury benches, it will mean the end of all the evils that plague mankind.

Mr. Ricard: It will never be.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): The C.C.F. platform is marvellous, even fascinating to me, but I believe it has come 2,000 years too late. Had it been made known before the fall of Adam and Eve, it would have been a benefit indeed.

I should like to say a few words now about dairy production, especially in Quebec. My colleagues are aware that Quebec produces more than a third of all the milk consumed in Canada.

Canadian farmers derive nearly 40 per cent of all their income from that industry, and for a great many of them, dairying represents 80 per cent of their total income.

It is therefore an important sector of Canadian agriculture, but particularly in the province I represent here with my other Quebec colleagues.

The situation has become critical, for the simple reason that the market is increasing from day to day, and that we have no support price on milk powder.

Sixty two per cent of the milk powder produced in Canada comes from the province of Quebec.

You will all remember that, in February 1960, milk powder was selling at 12 cents a pound. Today, it is down to 7½ or 8 cents.

Canada produces about 170 million pounds of milk powder a year.

We consume about 120 million pounds, so that we have a surplus of a little over 50 million pounds. Now unless the price is supported, there is unfortunately a strong possibility that this milk powder will sell below production costs.

Farm organizations have submitted briefs and demands to the government on this matter. Some organizations have urged and are still urging the government to buy, if not all the surplus, at least between 35 and 40 million pounds of our milk powder surplus. Those associations have suggested a price of 10 cents a pound. This would have the effect of maintaining prices and stabilizing production to some extent.

There is no doubt that the government could also find markets. It is true, admittedly—I want to be candid about this—that this might cost the government about $2½ million or $2 million, or even $3 million, but this surplus might well be given away to the Colombo plan as assistance to certain countries that need it. I think it would be a highly humane measure which would please the countries obtaining this help, though perhaps it would also cause some of my Quebec colleagues to grumble.

Mr. Chairman, before resuming my seat, I should like to make one more suggestion to the government. At the outset of my remarks I commended the government for setting up the royal commission on price spreads of food products. The commission has submitted its report, and I understand that the experts are studying its recommendations. I hope some positive action will come out of the highly appropriate recommendations made by the Stewart commission—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): A commission set up by the previous government.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Chairman, I have another suggestion to make to the government. Many farmers in my constituency—

Mr. Johnson: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I would ask the member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) to refrain from interrupting the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. Boulanger: Start by setting the example.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Chairman, many farmers in my constituency have complained that there is an unaccountable spread between the production costs and sale prices of farm machinery. I was told of some instances, and I would not like to bore my colleagues by repeating them all, but I intend to send the list to the minister. I feel the government should consider the advisability of establishing a commission to investigate this matter and to determine the reasons for that spread between the cost price of farm machinery and their sale price to the farmer.

If the government were to listen to my humble suggestion, one I am making at the recommendation of some farmers in my constituency, I think it would be doing a real service. And I hope the government would then carry out any recommendations that commission might make if it were appointed.

When the minister replies to hon. members, I hope he will tell us whether the government proposes to follow up in the present session one or the other recommendation made by the royal commission on price spreads of food products.

Mr. Chairman, I would not like to conclude my remarks without again asking the Minister of Agriculture to deal somewhat differently than he did during his second speech last Friday, with the arguments advanced by my colleague, the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger).

Like the minister, I myself am not unhandy with irony and sarcasm, but I do not think it is dignified for a minister of the crown to reply in that vein to complaints made by the official critic of the Liberal party in this house. If his had been merely a political speech and had not faithfully pictured the farming situation in Canada, the minister would have been justified in speaking as he did. But as a responsible man—I hope he is—I trust he will at the end of this discussion, or whenever he considers it appropriate to rise, reply in a more complete and dignified manner to the remarks of my colleague, the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska.

(Text):

Mr. Rapp: Mr. Chairman, I welcome this opportunity to speak on the agriculture estimates before the committee at the present time. Since I am a member for a constituency in Saskatchewan, namely Humboldt-Melfort, I feel it is my duty to speak on matters pertaining to agriculture. Also, I would like to take this opportunity to say a few words, since I have just returned from a five-day Canada-United States interparliamentary conference which was held in Washington, D.C.

I must say I received some useful and interesting information on agriculture. We met with our counterparts from the United States Senate and House of Representatives, and discussed problems closely concerned with agriculture. We had a considerably detailed discussion on surplus wheat problems confronting both the United States and Canada. As you are probably aware, Mr. Chairman, Canada and the United States together produce about 20 per cent or 25 per cent of the world production of wheat.

In this connection, in our agricultural industry we have problems in Canada and in the United States which we can call common problems, and one of them is the wheat surplus. Wheat production in Canada and the United States in the past two years has exceeded the domestic consumption plus exports. Because of this there has been an accumulation of huge surpluses. Moreover, wheat surpluses are more likely to be of a long term rather than of a short term nature.

An expression used by a United States congressman was very disturbing to me. He said in no uncertain terms that at the end of this year the United States will be faced with a huge surplus of wheat, and they will likely have to adopt a more liberal approach to the disposal of wheat surpluses. Further, he said that by the end of this year the United States will have about a billion or a billion and a half bushels of surplus wheat on their hands. All this pointed up to a stepped up program, a program that has been ruinous in a way to us in Canada in the past. I refer to the give-away program, the Carter deal, and so on.

In this connection I might say that a few years ago the present government made some strong representations to the United States government and asked them not to dispose of their surplus wheat in our commercial markets. To the remarks of the congressman from Florida I expressed some concern, and pointed out to him that although we are not in a position to suggest methods by which they should dispose of their surplus, we hoped they would not do it in our commercial markets. I also emphasized the point that export wheat means much more to Canada than it does to the United States, because 60 per cent of their wheat production is consumed domestically while Canada consumes only about 25 per cent of her production. Naturally we have to find markets for many more bushels of wheat in our country.

Another comparison can be drawn in this way. Wheat accounts for 20 per cent of cash income from all our farm marketings, while in the United States it accounts for only about 6 per cent. I also brought to the attention of the committee the need for a free world food bank. If we set up such a bank we would be in a position to achieve two purposes; first, to dispose of our wheat surplus and, second, to feed the underdeveloped peoples of the world.

After a two-day session the members of our committee passed a resolution stressing continuous, close consultation in order to avoid damage to other countries' commercial markets. In this connection I should like to say that wheat surpluses in the United States are large but that country, as I have already stated, can resort to give-aways and other methods to dispose of them. We in Canada cannot resort to these methods. The only avenue left to us is to take acreage out of wheat production and thus reduce our surpluses.

There are not many methods by which we can do this. We can put more acreage into edible oilseed production such as soya beans, sunflower seed, rapeseed, and safflower seed. The production of soya beans is restricted by climatic condition and in the western provinces, where most of the wheat is produced, we cannot go into soya bean production.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We have such production in Essex county.

Mr. Rapp: It is very nice to hear the hon. member say that they have it in Essex county. I will deal with soya beans a little later.

The farmers of my constituency are not only good farmers but they are also pioneers in this new industry, the production of rapeseed. They were the earliest producers of rapeseed on a commercial basis in western Canada, and have done a magnificent job in establishing this western grain. When I see statements in the press and hear statements over radio and television that rapeseed will become a major crop in the future or that it is a new crop to watch or that here is an opportunity for a new crop, then I must say that I sense my responsibility to these western farmers and feel it is my duty to speak in the house on behalf of the rapeseed producers. I am doing this in the full knowledge that this new industry is not getting the attention it deserves.

By this I do not mean to say that we in the west are looking for subsidies, deficiency payments or other financial assistance. Far from it. All we are looking for is an opportunity for the rapeseed growers equal to that enjoyed by other grain producers in the west. I know that hon. members have heard me speak on rapeseed quite often and that I have almost become a laughingstock. Let me tell you, Mr. Chairman, that this is not a laughing matter for the western producers. They are aware that they have to take acreage out of the production of wheat, and the only method the farmers of the three western provinces can resort to is to plant rapeseed.

At the beginning of the industry the freight rate structure was the biggest factor in preventing the industry from developing. Over a period of 10 years freight rates were allowed to go up 125 per cent. The rate on rapeseed went as high as 80 cents per hundredweight, while on other grains coming under the Crowsnest pass agreement the rate remained at only 22 to 23½ cents per hundredweight. This situation almost wiped out the rapeseed industry in 1959, and I have statistics here in that regard. In 1958 production in the three prairie provinces amounted to 626,000 acres, while in 1959 it had dropped to 218,000 acres, a drop to almost one third the acreage. Naturally the freight rate structure was a big factor in this drop, and it has also prevented the expansion of this new industry. The situation is very disturbing because we have just been able to introduce rapeseed oil and have it accepted by the edible oil trade. This was a very important decision. There is no reason in the world why carloads of oil could not be sold to the edible oil trade if the rapeseed growers were given proper attention.

The biggest single factor against the use of this oil in Canada is the fact that Canadian crushers are allowed to crush United States soya beans in Canada and thereby by-pass the 20 per cent tariff now in effect on soybean oil. Take note, Mr. Chairman, that there is a 20 per cent tariff on soybean oil but no tariff at all on imported soya beans. Here is what is happening in the crushing industry. On soybean oil imported for edible use there is a 20 per cent tariff while soybeans are allowed entry duty free. In any other type of manufacturing in Canada a tariff is charged on the imported material that goes into the manufacturing. A rebate on that tariff is made to the manufacturer when he exports his goods, but there is no rebate on that part of his production of manufactured goods that is used in Canada. In addition, the manufacturer in Canada who exports to the British commonwealth must use 25 per cent of Canadian product in order that he may export to British commonwealth countries.

This is what is happening in Canada. The Canadian crusher purchases all the Canadian soybeans. He does not use any of those beans for crushing into oil for Canadian consumption. He uses those beans to make up the 25 per cent of Canadian material in the oil and meal that he markets in Great Britain and other favoured nation treaty countries. The soybean oil that he sells in Canada is made almost entirely from United States beans which come in free of duty, and the great bulk of the meal sold in Canada also is made from United States beans that enter duty free. In this way he entirely by-passes the 20 per cent tariff on soybean oil.

If our country is anxious to have a crop of rapeseed grown in western Canada we should immediately take action to see that any United States soya beans used to make oil sold in Canada should pay the 20 per cent tariff. If this were done it would mean that the growers of rapeseed, sunflower seed and safflower seed in Canada would be able to market their products at a little better price than they are getting now, but so far as rapeseed is concerned it would not raise the cost of the finished product by 1 cent. It would only bring the price of rapeseed oil up to the present price of soybean oil in eastern Canada, whereas now we have to sell it at a discount of about 2 cents per pound. One pound of rapeseed oil is equivalent to one pound of soybean oil. If this were done we could depend on a very large crop of rapeseed in western Canada with a reasonable price to the farmer, and at the same time take thousands and thousands of acres out of the production of wheat. I am afraid that if nothing is done the price of rapeseed this year will have to go so low that the industry will be practically wiped out.

Cottonseed oil, peanut oil and corn oil all enter Canada duty free, while on the other hand Canadian rapeseed sold in the United States must pay 1 cent per pound import tax. Since repeseed only sells for about 4 cents a pound, a 1 cent a pound import tax means a great deal to the rapeseed producer. Canadian rapeseed meal entering the United States must pay a duty of $6 per ton while United States soybean meal is allowed to enter Canada duty free.

To illustrate my grievance, I should like to point out that margarine production in Canada in 1959 amounted to 152 million pounds. Preliminary reports show that in the production of margarine the following oils and fats were used: Soybean oil, 76.1 million pounds; cottonseed oil, 9 million pounds; cocoanut oil, 5½ million pounds; palm oil, 10½ million pounds; marine oils, whatever they are, 12.8 million pounds; animal fats, 4.7 million pounds, and other vegetable oils, 4.3 million pounds. Dr. B. M. Craig, a national research council scientist at Saskatoon and a very good friend of mine—he comes from my constituency—has made the statement that only one tenth of the margarine made in Canada is made from oilseeds grown in this country. Most margarine is made from these oils which I have just listed and which all come duty free into Canada from the United States.

As you can see, Mr. Chairman, under these adverse tariff and freight rate conditions the rapeseed industry cannot compete successfully against the cheap American soybeans that are brought into Canada duty free. This situation will eventually wipe out the whole rapeseed industry. Indeed that would be a tragedy for our agricultural industry, since rapeseed can play a very important part in our Canadian economy.

The remarkable change with respect to Canada's place in the world's rapeseed market and the important position which rapeseed may have in the years ahead calls for a good deal of attention to be paid to this valuable oilseed crop. Since 1958 rapeseed has been officially designated an edible oil in Canada. This new step opens up interesting possibilities for the use of rapeseed as a major ingredient in margarine and shortening instead of bringing in United States soybeans and oil duty free. Only a partial shift in this respect would require the planting of several thousand acres to supply the domestic market alone. Quite apart from edible use, however, it has been found that the industrial potentialities of rapeseed are very promising, particularly with respect to the blending of certain special lubricating oils and the production of grease. Everyday use of grease containing rapeseed oil has yielded top results. I should like to make here a statement that I read not so long ago in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix in regard to rapeseed grease that is used now on farm and other vehicles:

> The first carload of a new grease using home-grown rapeseed instead of imported castor oil arrived at federated co-operatives Regina branch April 19.
> Shipments of the grease are already on the way out to co-operative retail outlets served by FCL . . .
> It requires 25 pounds of rapeseed yielding 8-10 pounds of oil to each 100 pounds of grease.

This is indeed a good discovery, and it opens up the use of rapeseed oil in this country. But equally as great possibilities are open for the farmer who produces rapeseed for the export market. The initial development of the rapeseed industry in the prairie provinces in recent years has come largely as a result of the demand of the export market. The largest part of the 1959 crop of rapeseed has been exported to Japan, which is our good customer for agricultural products. Here I should like to give you some statistics from the dominion bureau of statistics. It is stated that our best customer is Italy. Last year we exported to Italy about 100 million pounds of rapeseed oil or rapeseed. The second best customer is Japan, which bought about 81 million pounds of rapeseed; and our third best customer is the Netherlands, which bought 31,620,000 pounds.

During these last three years we lost some good and big customers. For instance, there was Belgium. In 1956 we exported to Belgium about 27 million pounds of rapeseed, and last year only about 1 million pounds. The same thing applies to Switzerland and so on and so forth. However, over the years we increased our export markets from a mere 60 million pounds to 225 million pounds in 1959, indeed a remarkable figure.

Reports that French interests are negotiating for the purchase of a considerable quantity of Canadian rapeseed have heightened Canadian hopes that a somewhat better market might be developed in Europe in the immediate future. A $5 million sale of rapeseed to the French government has been reported in Canadian grain circles. As I say, Canada has emerged from the position of a net importer of rapeseed in 1954 to that of the world's leading exporter, with exports of over 225 million pounds.

Rapeseed could become a major crop in the prairie provinces within the very near future if given the right attention. Oilseed production offers a partial solution to our surplus wheat in the long range view. It is possible that another million acres or one and a half million acres of rapeseed could be produced in the prairie provinces, taking into consideration the domestic consumption and export. This action would mean reducing the wheat surplus by 30 million or 40 million bushels a year, and at the same time it would bring cash money into the pockets of the farmers who go into the production of this edible oilseed. It would also mean a saving of millions of dollars to the Canadian treasury, since there would be much less grain for which storage would be required. In this connection I must say that the statistics show that during the last five years the storage our treasury had to pay amounted to $135 million.

In conclusion I should like to stress again the importance of this crop by means of which it would be possible for our farmers in the west, particularly in Saskatchewan—since Saskatchewan may be called the wheat province of Canada—to take out acreages that would produce wheat and utilize them in producing this edible oilseed.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In the discussion of these estimates I am sure we regret—certainly we on this side of the house do—the inadequate statement made by the minister when he introduced his estimates, I think some time about March 1. His six minute speech on that occasion could hardly be regarded—

Mr. Harkness: Your leader said it was a 15 minute speech.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —as the kind of speech that should be made by a minister administering a department in which some $113 millian are proposed for expenditure; and certainly it was not the kind of speech that one would expect from my good friend the genial Minister of Agriculture in respect of an industry that has reached in this country—as it has, I admit, elsewhere—a very critical stage.

The minister ought, at the earliest opportunity, to face frankly the critical situation that confronts farmers from one end of Canada to the other. I am sure the situation in my own county demonstrates the position in this particular, one to be found from one end of Canada to another. There the farmers are concerned not only about importations from the United States, as we have just learned from the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Rapp); they are concerned about the reduction—for instance, in the case of the tomato growers—of the acreage normally given them by companies such as the Heinz company and others. They are concerned about the closing down of canneries. They are concerned about the inadequate floor prices on some of the commodities under the agricultural prices stabilization act. They are concerned about the failure of the administration to include certain other products under the stabilization act. They are concerned, too, about the indications that the government is bit by bit abandoning or straying away from its original policy of floor prices under the stabilization act and resorting to a system of deficiency payments, as was characterized by its policy announced some months ago with such disastrous results in the case of hogs and eggs.

In my particular area, if I may be local for a moment, the farmers are also concerned about the price they will receive for Ontario grown wheat. The 1960 support price looks to be about $1.36 per bushel f.o.b. truck. The wheat producers board will want the stabilization board, I think, to increase the support price to a more realistic level, which I suggest should not be less than $1.60; that is at harvest to the producer. Not less than that should be done if the minister is going to be able to live up to the general kind of assurances which were given to the farmers in my area, as in other parts of Canada, by such statements as that of the Prime Minister when he said "We will assure the farmer of his fair share of the national income by maintaining a flexible"—and I underline the word flexible—"price support program to ensure an adequate parity for agricultural producers based on a fair price-cost relationship."

To date the stabilization board price has not been of any real value to the Ontario wheat producers; I doubt that the minister would quarrel with this statement. One of these days the minister will be receiving representatives from the Ontario wheat producers, and I will be surprised if they do not ask for an exemption from the mandatory list of grains covered under the act so far as wheat is concerned. The reason for that is that they feel that 80 per cent of the ten-year average seriously affects their chances of getting a better price on the basis of negotiations with the trade. In any event this is a very important matter to farmers in Ontario, in my section of the country, and I hope this further plea to the minister will bring the action which he failed to take last year.

I hope also the minister will be able to indicate today when we may expect a decision as to the floor price on sugar beets. I would be interested in knowing whether the stabilization board has been able to take into account the losses which have attended the sugar beet growers as a result of the award recently made by the arbitrator under the contract between the sugar beet growers in southwestern Ontario and the sugar company at Chatham. The farmers as a result of that award have lost a considerable source of income, and it would seem to me, as the minister did indicate in reply to a question of mine, that in the fixing of the price this year that loss ought to be taken into account.

I would hope also that the minister and the board would take into account the different interests that prevail as between the various sugar beet producing regions of Canada. The return to the sugar beet grower in western Canada last year may have been satisfactory to the sugar beet grower in western Canada but in that part of the country on whose behalf I speak at this moment, there was and is less satisfaction. Instead of having a general price it ought to be possible to have a price which will take into account the interests and concerns of the various regions. Therefore I hope the minister can tell us something about the government's intentions with regard to sugar beets.

I listened with interest to the speech which has just been delivered by the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort. Soybeans, of course, are a very important product in my county and in the neighbouring county of Kent, in the province of Ontario. I have before me a brief which was prepared by the Ontario wheat producers' maketing board, the Ontario soya bean growers' marketing board and the Ontario grain corn producers' association. At page 9 of that brief I note the following:

> The federal deficiency payment program is not designed to bring producers a satisfactory return for their product.
> The wheat board's establishment of floor prices above the government support price exemplified the possibilities of maintaining satisfactory prices through collective action. Even in a year of surplus production as in 1958, no deficiency payment was necessary.
> Soybeans were classified for support price purposes at the request of the soybean board who administered the records and made the distribution of the deficiency payments. Even with the deficiency payment from the federal treasury, growers maintain that price levels are below cost of production plus a fair margin of profit.

The soybean grower in my section of the country is not satisfied with the floor price of soybeans. It was $2.10 a year ago and is $2 now. The principle of averaging the price is such that the declared floor price is not the price which is received by a great many of the farmers. In any event, I can say to the minister that I attended a meeting recently in Tilbury at which farmers from the counties of Kent and Essex were present, and to which all members of parliament of all political parties were invited, where it was declared by this group that they were not satisfied with the price support on soybeans.

The hon. member who has just spoken was right and justified in drawing attention as he did to the importance of soybeans. Soybeans are the major domestic source of edible oils in Canada. The production last year, most of it in southwestern Ontario, totalled 6,649,000 bushels. This was equivalent to the production of about 70 million pounds of edible oil. To make up the deficiency in the supply of edible oils, last year, to carry further the argument of the hon. member who has just spoken, Canada imported from the United States 10,900,000 bushels of soybeans valued at $23,400,000 and 23,500,000 pounds of refined soybean oil worth $3 million. So anything that could be done to meet the situation confronting the soybean growers I think would be not only in their interests but in the interests of such people as the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort, thus indicating the national character of some of these problems in agriculture.

I complained a moment ago about the speech of the minister. I said, and I say again now, that it was not the speech of a minister who fully appreciates the gravity of the situation confronting Canadian agriculture. The minister said nothing about the long range programs of which he, the Prime Minister and others spoke during the time they were asking the people of Canada to give them the opportunity to carry on government in this country. The minister said nothing about the reduction in net farm income in this country; he overlooked the point made by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska that there was a decrease of 7 per cent in the net national farm income in Canada. That 7 per cent represents a serious diminution in the income return of the Canadian agricultural community, and I am going to suggest to the minister that the reduction is in fact greater than 7 per cent. I suggest to him that a careful analysis of the revised figures will show that it is over 10 per cent.

Mr. Harkness: I wonder if the hon. member would allow a question. Has the hon. member taken into account the fact that in 1958 the net income of farmers was up by 20 per cent; that the 7 per cent reduction from 1958 is a 7 per cent reduction on an extremely high rise, and that the net income in 1959 is still more than 12 per cent higher than it was in 1957 when the hon. gentleman was a distinguished member of the government of that day?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister did not ask me a question; he made a speech, and I welcome that, because I think a good discussion is very valuable. I take it you will note, Mr. Speaker, that the minister made a speech and that his remarks will not interfere with the time allotted to me.

All I can say to the minister is this. This statement of his is not new. The fact is that there has been a serious loss of income suffered by Canadian farmers notwithstanding the assurance given by the minister last year, and I say that instead of the actual drop being 7 per cent, careful analysis of the figures will show that it is over 10 per cent. This is not at all consistent with the assurance given by the Prime Minister on April 25, 1957 or the assurance given by the Minister of Agriculture to the farmers of Canada that they would share more equitably in the national income as a result of the price support program which the present government was going to bring in to ensure adequate parity for agricultural producers. That is the point, and I do not think I need resort to many proofs to indicate that what I am saying is felt by farmers generally throughout Canada.

We have the speech on agriculture made by the Prime Minister on March 4, in which he outlined the general principles guiding government policy since he took office. The right hon. gentleman made six points, and he went on to say to the farmers of the west that they would not get the deficiency payments they were asking for but that the government was concerned about doing something satisfactory for western agriculture.

The Minister of Agriculture himself spoke differently. A report appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press of March 18, 1960, as follows:

> Hon. Douglas Harkness, federal agriculture minister, said Thursday he won't present any alternative to the proposed deficiency payment program on wheat, oats, and barley which was turned down by the federal cabinet.
> He says he expects to be asked for an alternative, but he will tell farmers the matter is one for the entire cabinet, and it hasn't been decided yet.

Of course it is a matter for the whole cabinet. The minister says he expects to be asked for an alternative. Surely the government does not need to wait to be asked. It is the responsibility of this government to provide solutions for these situations. The farmers of Canada have put forward suggestions; they have made repeated representations to this government. They wanted to meet the Prime Minister and his government over the Easter recess to discuss some of these alternative plans.

When is this government going to meet the farmers, who are dissatisfied over the lack of action by the government on the request for deficiency payments on the three grains? When is this government going to indicate its willingness to sit down with the farmers to discuss this question? Is the government to have a meeting with these western representatives next week, the week after, or when? Is the government going to give satisfaction with an acreage assistance plan? Or is the situation this, that the government is merely waiting for the farmers themselves to present alternatives? It is no wonder that the Union Farmer in its issue of April, 1960 said:

> What the Prime Minister failed to mention was that no measures had been taken to actually increase farm net income by increasing the cash returns for the products farmers sell.
> If Canadian farmers are to get "their fair share of the national income" as they were promised by Mr. Diefenbaker before and since he took office, it will have to be done in the same manner industry has been and is being assisted by subsidized prices.
> Unless this is done, and done soon, the family farm will disappear, and Canadian farmers will end up as hired men in an industrialized agriculture operated by big business which will then pressure government into giving it protected prices.

The Prime Minister, in the speech to which I have already referred, went on to say:

> With reference to the other matters to which I had intended to direct my attention, I will do so at the very first opportunity which comes to me during discussion of the estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

We all understand why the Prime Minister cannot do that at the present time; he is preoccupied with affairs outside the country. The fact is that we are not being given, either by the head of the government or by the minister responsible, any indication as to what the government intends to do with regard to the representations made by the western farmers in the face of the government's decision not to accede to the proposal for deficiency payments.

Then we have the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, who interests himself in these matters. He was giving an indication to the farmers that if they put forward an agreed assistance plan it might receive the favourable attention of the government.

An hon. Member: One o'clock.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I was speaking before the adjournment of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources who took advantage during Easter week to contact western farmers and to explain government policy with regard to the problems that face agriculture in western Canada. The minister suggested that farmers are not kept informed by their leaders and he sought by the use of that argument to give the impression that what the government had attempted to do for the farmers had not been fully appreciated or understood.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

All sorts of comments have been made about the arguments and statements made by the minister on that occasion. The Western Producer of April 14 perhaps is a sample of the reaction. The Western Producer points out:

> What seems to escape the minister is this: all the farmer has to do is examine his financial position and compare it with that of a few years ago. He finds that position has greatly deteriorated. He didn't need the dominion bureau of statistics to tell him that his net income shrunk another 7 per cent in 1959.

The editorial goes on to point out that the matter to which the minister should have addressed himself was a statement made in Moose Jaw in March of 1958 by the Prime Minister whose words are quoted in this editorial. The Prime Minister said:

> You can rely on this—sympathetic consideration will be given by a Conservative government to the question of western wheat, oats and barley to the end that the returns of the farmer will bear a fair relationship to the costs of production.

That is what the western farmer and farmers generally in Canada are concerned about. That is why they were so disappointed with the government's position on deficiency payments and that is why they are dissatisfied at the failure of the government to present an alternative policy. Until that is done and until the government does give some leadership it does not warrant the confidence which it seeks, and certainly it has brought on itself the displeasure which the farmers of western Canada generally are showing toward the agricultural policies of this government.

On April 13, 1960 the Minister of Agriculture in making an announcement with regard to dairy product prices, as reported at page 3183 of Hansard, said:

> The government has authorized the agricultural stabilization board to continue the present levels of price support for the dairy industry for the period May 1, 1960 to April 30, 1961.

In this declaration greeted with great applause in this house by hon. members sitting behind the minister the minister intentionally or otherwise misled the house because the support price announced on butter will be different from what it was last year.

In proof of my statement I wish to examine the facts in the situation. These have already been touched on in part by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska who has rendered great service in pointing out the weakness and the lack of complete coverage of the minister's statement. With regard to first grade butter, that is scores 94, 93 and 92, last year 1959-60 the price was 64 cents. With regard to first grade butter, scores 94 and 93, for this year 1960-61 the price announced is 64 cents. With regard to score 92, the price is 63 cents. The percentage of first grade butter, scores 94 and 93, represents 30 per cent of the 324 million pounds produced in Canada. Seventy per cent, that is score 92, at one cent less or 63 cents represents $2.5 million that farmers will not receive during the coming year as compared with the previous year.

The minister was in error in saying as he did that the government had decided to continue the present levels of price support for the dairy industry for the period May 1, 1960 to April 30, 1961. This fact has been noted by farm organizations and by farm newspaper editors throughout the country. I do not know why the minister allowed himself to make what I at least characterize as an error. The floor price given last year was not given this year. The minister, I think, owes the committee a careful explanation because of the misinformation which arises out of the initial statement made by him when he made this declaration of policy on April 13.

The problem confronting agriculture is apparent to every hon. member of this committee whether he lives in constituencies which are completely devoted to agriculture or whether he represents only a percentage of farmers in our respective constituencies. I represent here a large group of farmers in my own constituency but we are all members of this committee. We represent everyone in Canada and it must be apparent that agriculture at the present time is in a critical state. No statistical evidence on the part of the minister or anyone else is going to fail to reveal the fact that the farmer's income this year has not held up to levels which the minister anticipated and the situation day by day, month by month, grows worse.

Is the government addressing itself to this problem? Is it not simply going from one palliative to another without courageously facing the issue it said it would resolve if given an opportunity? Hon. gentlemen are now sitting on the ministerial benches. They gave assurances to the Canadian farmers and to the Canadian people as to what they would do. Instead of facing up to this, they now give evidence of a reluctance to meet farm organizations. There can be no excuse for not meeting the farmers with regard to the alternative proposal arising out of the government's failure to accede to the demand for efficiency payments.

The government must give us an assurance now that it does not propose any longer to run away from the principle and the concepts of the Agricultural Prices Support Act to which it dedicated itself, its intentions and policies when it took over the government of this country. We have had a repudiation of that policy by the government's attitude with regard to hogs and eggs. I now ask the minister, are we to see a further withdrawal by the government of its support of the principle involved in the Agricultural Prices Support Act? Are we to wait until this parliament will have prorogued only to learn after we have gone to our constituencies that other agricultural commodities are not to receive the advantage of the offer to purchase principle based on the Agricultural Prices Support Act? Is the government now awaiting for an auspicious moment to indicate that it does not now have faith in the agricultural prices stabilization legislation which it brought in several years ago? There is concern all over this country on the part of farm groups that that is so, and the minister should give a clear indication today as to his intentions in that regard. He should also tell the committee without any equivocation whether the government has an alternative policy to meet the problems arising out of wheat, oats and barley, as suggested by the western farmers.

If the government proposes to do nothing, then it should say so. If the government believes that the policy of assistance per acre is the best arrangement, why does it not say so? Why should the farmers of this country be expected to give leadership when a government is in office that promised to give leadership?

I have before me an article by Ralph Hedlin in the Union Farmer, entitled "More Policy—Less PR and Politics". This article says that the government has with great efficiency looked after its public relations, but that public relations are no substitute for good policy. Then, it says:

> A farmer on the land is not a bit interested in political jockeyings.

I think that is the case. I continue:

> He is interested in a decent standard of living and, in the meantime, the essential minimum of income that will let him get by. If the government cannot implement the deficiency payment proposal, then let's get on with something that they can implement.

Surely that is a reasonable statement, a reasonable commentary and I ask the government to do that very thing.

The Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Smallwood: May I ask the hon. member a question? He has my sympathy when he is speaking on agriculture and I did not want to interrupt him; but at one stage of his speech he mentioned something about the farmers in his particular area receiving $1.36 for their wheat today. Does he realize that the farmers of western Canada are receiving possibly $1.23 today? If the hon. member requests this government to consider paying his farmers $1.60 a bushel, is he really sincere in this because if he is it is no wonder that there are no Liberal members west of the great lakes?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend wants to know whether I am sincere and I certainly am. The two situations are not comparable at all. The hon. member is now saying that the price received by one group of farmers in one section of the country must necessarily govern situations that are not comparable in other parts of the country. For instance, the sugar beet farmers of western Canada received a better price for their product than the sugar beet farmers of central Canada; but that in itself is not necessarily an indication that the other position is wrong.

Mr. Smallwood: I am speaking about wheat.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend is speaking about wheat. He is asking me whether I am sincere. I say to him that when the Ontario wheat producers come to see the minister in the month of May I will be greatly surprised if, in the light of their problem of negotiation with the trade, they do not ask for something along the lines of what I have suggested. The hon. member must recognize this; the plight of the farmer is serious not only in western Canada but in other parts of Canada, and that is why we have supported western Canada—

Mr. Smallwood: Answer my question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —those of us who live in eastern Canada. I would expect the hon. gentleman to rise in his place and support the eastern farmer as well. His problems—

Mr. Smallwood: The hon. member has not answered my question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend has asked me to answer his question. I have answered his question but he does not like the reply—

Mr. Smallwood: The hon. member has not answered it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —any more, I am sure, than will the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Smallwood: Will he answer my question? Why should the eastern farmer receive 40 cents a bushel more than the western farmer?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have answered your question.

[Mr. Smallwood.]

Mr. Danforth: I have listened with a great deal of interest to the last statement of the hon. member for Essex East who, as we all know, is a gentleman farmer. I wish to assure you, Mr. Chairman, that I have followed his career with a great deal of interest for a great many years. I am certainly satisfied that he is and always will be a gentleman but as one who has all his life been engaged in the agricultural industry I have very great doubts that he will ever be a farmer.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): A champion of of the farmer.

Mr. Danforth: I have listened to his remarks today, and they painted a very general picture when they touched on the sore point of agriculture. Certainly, he represents that fine county of Essex where I was born.

I do appreciate the problems of agriculture and the seriousness of the situation with respect to certain commodities that he outlined. I should like to help him in one respect. However, I should like to point out —and I am sure he would wish me to do this—that he overlooked in his discourse today the problem of the burley tobacco growers. This is a crop which is very important in his county and one which faces not only lower prices in 1960 but the problem that the marketing board and the tobacco growers are advocating absolutely no production of burley tobacco whatsoever.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I will admit that that is so.

Mr. Danforth: There is no doubt in anyone's mind that the agricultural industry today faces a very real crisis, and we have heard in the house many representations to the effect that in the past 20 years the agricultural industry has been facing a revolution.

First of all, I should like to deal with the basic changes that this revolution is bringing about; second, I should like to deal with what farmers are doing in the face of those changing conditions; and, third, I should like to recommend what we as a governing body and the government of Canada might attempt to do to aid this serious problem.

Perhaps, for a little background, I might say that after world war II, a time when the major agricultural commodities were operating under ceiling prices, it soon became apparent that there would be scarcities all over the world in all types of manufactured and primary produce. It was evident that all over the world there would be a terrific demand for goods and services, including all agricultural products, and the future looked very bright indeed. But it soon became very apparent to those of us engaged in agriculture that there were other factors at work over which the industry had very little control that would soon place the industry in an almost untenable position.

One of the major factors that caused this change was labour. This is not to be taken in any way as censure of labour or labourers but merely as pointing out what has actually happened. With the terrific demand that developed for consumer goods, naturally there was a great upsurge in industrial expansion to meet this demand, and since we did have a great industrial expansion in this country it soon became apparent that there would be a terrific demand for workers. Since the demand was so great it naturally caused wage rates to rise to a phenomenal degree, and it soon became quite evident to the agricultural industry that it would not be in any position to compete with other industries for its proper share of the labour which is so necessary in the economic production of agricultural products. Since there was this terrific competition and the agricultural industry had to pay more for wages, the cost of production of all agricultural products increased to such a degree that we soon became very much concerned about our ability to compete successfully in world markets.

Agriculture was hurt by labour and the high cost of labour in another way. Increased labour costs resulted in an increase in the cost of all the goods and services that the farmer must use in his business. Since both these factors had the direct result of increasing the cost of farm production, the farmer's costs did rise at a phenomenal rate.

There was one factor too that became apparent so far as labour was concerned. Labour soon became very selective in its desire for work. We in the riding of Kent find ourselves today in the peculiar position of being one region in Canada where, although there are thousands of people registered as unemployed in the country, we are unable to procure the necessary labour today for successful economic farm production. This situation was pointed up very seriously because at one period last summer, when there were literally hundreds registered as unemployed in the constituency of Kent (Ont.) it was absolutely impossible for a farmer to procure any of these registered unemployed regardless of the wage scale. When these workers were solicited to go out to the farms they never even put in an appearance, let alone make any inquiry as to the wages prevailing at that time. I should like to point out, Mr. Chairman, that at this time the farmers in my district were paying wages running from $18 to $25 per day.

The consumers themselves have added to the problems of the agricultural industry because of their increasing demands with respect to the packaging, preparation, grading and freezing of farm commodities. Because we are primary producers, naturally all these extra costs follow the pipe line back so that for the most part they are tacked on to the cost of production of the farmer. By no means do we criticize consumers for their desire for quality and service. The fast pace of life today makes prepackaged goods almost a necessity for the housewife rather than a luxury.

These trends have had a direct result. They have placed farmers in the so-called cost-price squeeze. The farmer pays more for what he buys, receives less for what he sells and is faced with an ever-narrowing margin of profit. May I illustrate my point, Mr. Chairman? The selling price of soya beans has dropped since the war from a high of $3.85 to $4.25 a bushel down to the prevailing price today of $1.85 per bushel. That is the market price. Hon. members will understand that the government makes a deficiency payment to bring the price up to $2 a bushel. During this same period the cost of farm machinery necessary for the production of this crop has in the main doubled or even more, and the cost of farm labour has increased to a greater extent. This causes serious repercussions in the industry.

In my particular area we have a potentiality of almost twice the present production of soya beans. We have a potentiality of twice the production of sugar beets that we are growing at the present time. We could grow more canning crops. All these crops have a high dollar return per acre and with the economy under which we are working in our area, since we lie between industrial centres, we need this higher return per acre in order to operate successfully.

I am sure all hon. members are aware of the small margin of profit available to the farmer today. No one will dispute that as being a fact. That has been the basic reasoning behind all attempts to render financial assistance to this great industry. That is why we have increased the amount of farm loans, why the farm stabilization act was implemented, why we have price supports and the subsidization of prices.

I should like to deal for a moment with the remarks of the hon. member for Essex East about the stabilization act and his advocated price for soya beans. I should like to refer to the meeting at Tilbury which the hon. member attended. As reported in the Chatham News, the hon. member is alleged to have stated:

> The higher price of $2.40 was certainly not unfair especially when the commodity is produced on a small scale.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Did the hon. member say $2.40?

Mr. Danforth: Yes.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend knows that cannot be right because the price is $2 now and was $2.10 last year.

Mr. Danforth: I wish to assure the hon. member that in this quotation—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member is referring to the proposed price?

Mr. Danforth: Yes.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Oh, I am sorry.

Mr. Danforth: The hon. member supported the request for a price of $2.40 a bushel for soya beans.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is right.

Mr. Danforth: Although something like this seems on the face of it to be very justified and it is certainly not my intention to suggest to the farmers that they should take anything less for their commodity, may I point out that just across the border in the United States there is a surplus of over 60 million bushels of soya beans and the floor price there is $1.85. A stabilized price such as has been suggested by the hon. member would therefore cost the government 50 to 55 cents per bushel to subsidize this one industry alone, and I am sure that the taxpayers of this country would take a long look at such action on the part of the government. I point out, Mr. Chairman, that the farmers are not interested in a price of $2.40 or $2 or $2.80. What the farmers are interested in is their margin of profit between their costs and their selling price.

What is to be done and what can we do in these circumstances? I should like to point out that the farmers themselves are taking gigantic steps to meet the situation as it now exists. I resent it vehemently when any hon. member in this house or anywhere else portrays the farm industry as being down on its knees asking for a handout from government. I present the assertion that no industry in this world has been beset through history by so many major and continuing problems and has so successfully and valiantly fought back through the centuries.

What are the farmers doing? We have in this country today—and I am very thankful for it—in our agricultural schools, government departments and experimental farms agricultural technicians who are providing second to none in the world today new varieties, new techniques, new fertilizers, new sprays and new farm machinery and have supplied a service to our industry without parallel in the history of this world. This is not by any means a political bouquet. It is on my part a sincere statement of fact.

Progressive farmers, taking advantage of these services and by the use of new mechanization and specialization, have changed their method of farming from growing six, eight or ten different agricultural products. They have changed their farming to one or two major endeavours and by the use of technical assistance and new machinery and by the time allowed for study and concentration have been able to produce today in Canada, in quantity and quality and at low cost, units to such a degree as would have been thought impossible even three years ago.

I have been on a farm where today I have seen two brothers feed 2,500 head of cattle in 20 minutes, something that would have been thought absolutely impossible ten years ago. I have been on farms where the milking parlours in which cattle have been milked are larger and contain more cattle than did the entire herd of these producers ten years ago. I have seen hogs produced by thousands on farm units. I do not mean commercial establishments; I mean farm units, units farm-owned, farm-operated and farm-managed. I have seen farmers joined together in co-operatives work in harmony in an endeavour by quantity purchases and quantity sales to widen the margin of profit. I have seen them join together in order to approach government and selling agencies with a few voices instead of the many which in too many instances confuse the issues of the day.

The farmer is trying. He is employing every bit of available agricultural and business science to cut his costs, increase his efficiency and make possible a living like that of his fellow man. This is what the farmer is doing. What can we do as a government?

There is no doubt in anyone's mind that the assistance given by this government has been enormous. I was greatly interested to hear the hon. member for Essex East speak about the sugar beet industry, a major portion of which is in my riding and about how bad he felt that the arbitrated prices were less this year than last year. I am certain we have no quarrel in that respect. However, it was our government which placed a floor price of $13 a ton under the sugar beet industry and made possible the retention of this industry of Canada which was in the throes of bankruptcy. I should like to point out to the hon. member that it was the minister of agriculture of his party who, in visiting the sugar beet industry at that time, is alleged to have said that if they could not grow sugar beets at a profit, they should grow something else.

I think we must approach this agricultural problem on a much larger scale, with a much larger endeavour on the part of hon. members and government departments. Men who are engaged in agriculture are no longer satisfied with subsidies or with floor prices. The latter are at best a medicine to get this industry over a present ailment. They are not a feature that will get down to the basic facts troubling this great industry.

There are two things we can do. We can emphasize the experimental work being done to utilize farm products and to find a greater field of use for these products. We were fortunate enough to hear the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort discussing rapeseed this morning and speaking of the oil from this great grain crop being used as a lubricant. This is, in my opinion, one way in which we can expand here at home and abroad the use of our farm products, namely by concentrating on the development of new uses in this ever-changing world.

The other is the extension of world markets. I am sure we all agree that the selling of all products of Canada comes under the Department of Trade and Commerce. However, I should like to deal with what we in agriculture can do to help. The extension or world markets would take away the glut that has constantly hurt us in every aspect of agriculture. This is the old story: take a larger part of world markets. However, I should like to point out that possibly we are not doing it in the right way.

I have reason to believe that we have an opportunity of seizing on more world markets. I refer to the shining example of one man from my constituency making one trip to one country at one time and obtaining, mostly through his own efforts, the sale of nearly $1 million worth of farm products which are now in the process of being shipped out of this country from our constituency and from constituencies across Canada. I should like to point out that we have in our particular riding men in this day going across into the territory of the great neighbour to the south and selling to that country, which has the greatest surplus on earth, farm products, making a sale of farm products to that country. When we can do this, is shows that these markets are there. I think it is time that we developed salesmen in this country with the ability to sell farm products.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is that Mr. Warwick?

An hon. Member: Yes.

Mr. Danforth: What does it mean to sell farm products? We have a reputation for developing farm products second to none, such as wheat, dairy products, meat, sugar, white beans, and livestock. Anything you care to name in the way of agricultural products, we not only produce it but we produce it in high quality. We have in this country thousands of men who have a natural aptitude for salesmanship but who perhaps are not familiar with the aspects of our quality produce. I should like to point out that no longer is it the time perhaps to expect the men in our trade commissions and in our embassies overseas to recognize and to be able to sell successfully quality products of such a nature as those developed on farms today. These men, I point out, should be trained by our Department of Agriculture for this specific task alone and should be paid according to their abilities. If we want good salesmen let us pay good prices. Then with good training we can put them in various countries and then begin to move this great glut which we have today.

It is not impossible to sell in a market that is already crowded. I would like to point out that right in the United States, the greatest producer of automobiles today, it was possible for salesmen in Europe to come into the United States market in 1959 and sell 600,000 automobiles shipped in from Europe. That is the type of salesmanship that I wish to talk about today. This salesmanship is absolutely necessary and I am confident that we will have to come to it eventually.

In my riding today we have a burley tobacco that has been grown every year until this year. And what has happened? Due to lack of sales the growers association is recommending to the farmers that no burley tobacco be grown in their 1960 crop, resulting in the loss of millions of dollars to the farmers in my area. The sale of five, ten or fifteen million pounds of this commodity would have made all the difference in the world. Burley tobacco is not to be confused with flue-cured or cigarette tobacco. It is a heavier quality tobacco grown out of heavier soil and the curing and harvesting methods are far different. The tobacco I speak of is used principally in blends, in pipe tobacco and chewing tobacco.

We have the same thing in the sugar beet industry. Because of world conditions today and lack of sales, in the sugar beet industry in my area contracts are less than half of what they were in 1959. This is a deplorable situation but something we have to face. I have every confidence that if we as a government seek to train men to sell a quality product such as we produce we can find the markets and surely the price would be far less than what the taxpayers of this country are being subjected to because of the countless subsidies and assistance given to the farming industry today.

Mr. Chairman, all too often our sales overseas go through the embassies of the United States and Great Britain. This is a necessity today because of world conditions. But is it preposterous to suggest that contracts which require agricultural produce should pass, not through the embassies of these two great countries but come direct to Canada.

We are an independent country. The world recognizes us for our diplomatic relations and the way we honour our obligations. Is it not time that we began to get a world reputation as traders, and would this not solve our basic problems? This will not be easy and we will meet with many failures. Perhaps today we have not the money to go out and do this on a world wide scale, but may I humbly suggest that if we are unable to do this, then let us take one particular section of the world, let us take one particular commodity of which we have too much, let us take and train men to go out into this district and let us see what we can do.

If we cannot sell there must be a reason. If we are too high in price, maybe we need some form of banking set-up to provide credit to those people who need it. If our quality is not up to that required by these other countries, we should know this because we have the men who can supply the necessary knowledge to provide the necessary quality. If we need different varieties we should find this out. It is only by digging into this problem in a major way that we can ever learn what is necessary for this great industry.

I think the time has come for us to start to plan and to use and develop agriculture as a major industry and a major business. It is time we started to employ business principles in this great industry to restore it to its rightful place among the Canadian industries of today.

(Translation):

Mr. Walker: Another farmer.

(Text):

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to participate in this debate, but my remarks will not be prolonged. However, I do come from a rural riding and I am aware that there are problems in our agricultural communities but although promises have been made that these problems would be solved they have not as yet been solved and the farmers are still waiting for the legislation which will be the cure-all of all these problems.

There is one aspect that I would like to bring to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture, and it is a paragraph to be found in a statement made by the Minister of Agriculture on April 13, 1960 having to do with dairy products. In my riding we have a considerable amount of dairy farming, and the paragraph in question reads as follows:

> In addition, 25 cents per 100 pounds will continue to be paid for whole milk delivered for manufacturing purposes, exclusive of milk from producers who sell a portion of their milk in the fluid bottled milk market.

One would get the impression from reading this particular paragraph that if a farmer produced milk, a quantity of which was to be sold for the manufacture of either butter or cheese in addition to selling milk in the fluid bottled milk market, he would receive the 25 cents on the milk that was sent for manufacturing purposes but would not receive it for the bottled milk. But apparently in practice that is not the case. If a farmer sells one bottle of milk and the rest of his product is sent for manufacturing purposes, not only does he not receive 25 cents for that particular bottle of milk but he does not receive the 25 cents for the balance of the milk sent for manufacturing purposes.

Mr. Chairman, there are two points I would like to make here. First of all, I feel that the statement as made by the minister on April 13 is certainly open to confusion, because the way I read this particular statement, one gets the impression that 25 cents will be paid for all milk that is sent to the manufacturer for making into cheese and butter.

Mr. Harkness: If you read it carefully I think not.

Mr. Cardin: You can read it any way you like but you still get the impression that you do not get the 25 cents for bottled milk, but if you have milk which is sent for manufacturing purposes you will get the 25 cents.

As a matter of fact I have had a considerable number of complaints from farmers in my riding who have had to pay back the amount they received in subventions just because they happened to sell one or two bottles of milk to neighbours on either side. I think that is rather unfortunate, because this particular statement does lead to confusion. I also think it is very unjust that if one farmer or several farmers, as happens to be the case in my riding, should sell a very limited amount of milk in the bottled milk market, then they are not allowed to have the subvention for the greater portion of their milk production. I certainly hope this matter will be cleared up by the minister.

First of all, I suggest the particular paragraph I have in mind should be rewritten so as to clarify the position once and for all. What is far more important still is that payments should be made to farmers in respect of all the milk that is sent for manufacturing purposes without discrimination against any who happen to sell bottled milk. It is my sincere hope that the minister will allow such farmers to benefit from this subvention. I am sure the purpose of this provision was to benefit the farmers, but by reason of this particular regulation any benefit which they may have been intended to receive from this legislation is being completely nullified.

Mr. Nasserden: In rising to speak at the beginning of the agriculture estimates, I think back to the estimates of 1958 and 1959. All of us who sit on the government benches can share some satisfaction in that regard. Any pride we take in the results of the accumulated actions arising out of these estimates should nevertheless be measured with a certain humility. Agriculture and those engaged in agriculture have been neglected during the greater part of this century, and the decline of the industry has been most noticeable and significant in the nation's mind during the past 14 or 15 years.

This situation has been one of the products of our ambition to become a great industrial nation. The neglect of the needs of agriculture and the lack of consideration given our agricultural resources, including the people engaged in that industry, in the years following world war I made the depression of the thirties much more severe for all Canadians. With the passage of the years of world war II Canadians began to talk of a new order that would emerge after the cease of that conflict. No one was more eloquent on that theme than the late Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King. He made the memorable statement that if that new order was not well on the way before the cessation of hostilities we might well look for it in vain. His foresight in that regard mirrored the attitude and future of Liberalism in Canada. You can see where they are today.

The elections of 1949, 1953, 1957 and 1958 gave Canadians a good chance to assess the policies of all parties. The overwhelming results of the 1958 campaign were a tribute to the leadership of the present Prime Minister. But they were much more than that. In the hearts and minds of the Canadian people they were an endorsation of a national policy for Canada. After all, during the war Canadians were prepared to make sacrifices. In the years immediately following Canadians, of necessity, saw the future of this nation drift at the whim of political expediency which saw narrow regional considerations dominate the decisions in our parliament. National policy as such was a stranger in the Canadian parliament.

Today I wish to look at these estimates, and the agricultural industry, and match them to the pressing needs of the Canadian nation. There are several ways of dealing with these estimates. It would appear from reading Hansard and the news and editorial pages of our influential newspapers that the yardstick generally used is cost to the treasury; cost to the taxpayer. There have been a few men who have used a different yardstick, a yardstick considerate of the needs of Canadians in other walks of life. If one follows their search to strengthen Canada's national policy he is compelled to acknowledge that for many years Canadians have neglected to utilize the agricultural economy in such a way as to strengthen and build the general economy of Canada along sound and balanced lines. This can be amply illustrated by a comparison of the population in agriculture, the measure of agricultural production and the share of the national wealth that those engaged in it receive. As long as Canadians allow this situation to continue our national economy will be subject to serious and severe problems in so far as attaining strong industrial communities and stable and improved employment patterns is concerned.

I know there is a widespread view that great nations are industrial nations. I believe most of us will agree that Canada has a great industrial potential. I think most of our people will agree that we have not reached that potential. Indeed, it could be estimated that it will take nearly a quarter of a century, perhaps longer, to realize our ambitions in that regard. The question that must be answered soon is what will happen in the meantime. There is no doubt this immediate period will have a tremendous effect on the lives of all Canadians for years to come.

Last fall I travelled in Ontario, in the province of Quebec, in New Brunswick, in Nova Scotia, in Manitoba and in Saskatchewan. Everywhere I went I found farm people asking the same questions. Everywhere I went I found conditions in rural areas very similar. I was shocked by the lack of attention and encouragement that the agricultural industry has suffered over a long period of years in these areas of Canada. I have reason to believe the same situation has prevailed in other parts of Canada as well. I can tell you, sir, and the members of this committee, that I was impressed with the area of application where the new Farm Credit Corporation could well serve both a social and an economic purpose. The new crop insurance legislation is still to be demonstrated, but here again I saw a need of this legislation in all these provinces.

However, the measure of legislation that can be a most effective instrument to bolster the Canadian economy and eliminate some of its inequities is, of course, the farm stabilization act. If we read the act and its preamble, we see it was designed to stabilize farm income and ensure farm security. Nevertheless, it would seem to me that it has a much greater service to perform. It could very well be a cornerstone—one which has been overlooked too often in the past—upon which this nation can embrace some of those national economic problems which have remained with us for the greater part of this century. To read the farm stabilization act is to think in terms of a balanced agricultural economy. It brings to mind such terms as support prices, deficiency payments and other payments. I think it is fair to say that there has been some measure of disagreement as to the use to which each one of these can be best applied.

There appears to be a great deal of confusion in this regard. That has been so from the time this legislation was first mentioned as possible legislation. Farmers and farm organizations are expressing a confusion of opinion. Then there have been those who have urged the government to try this, that and anything—indeed to try nothing—and it seems to have been their hope that by some process of trial and error or even by default we might find a method that would prove reliable.

These considerations are inconsiderate of the immediate position of farm people and if followed for any period of time will throw the entire stabilization act and program into disrepute. That would be a calamity for the agricultural industry and for the Canadian nation.

It is my opinion that deficiency payments should be more properly called incentive payments and should be used only as an instrument to promote production. They should seldom be used in connection with a commodity in a surplus position unless this commodity commands a ready export market. These incentive payments used judiciously could have a far-reaching effect on the agricultural industry, on farm income and on Canada's trade and dollar balances. For those commodities in surplus position, support prices appear very desirable.

Farm organizations and farmers alike are on record that these support prices should be set at non-incentive levels. The beauty of support prices is that they tend to uphold the entire price structure of a commodity and this is an important consideration in building a healthy agricultural community. It is equally important as an aid in balancing the Canadian economy. Flat payments which more properly might be called deficiency payments can be useful in levelling out those segments of the agricultural economy that cannot be reached successfully with incentive payments or support prices.

Net cost of the operations of the stabilization act for the year ending March 31, 1959 was $15,124,100 for all commodities. The net cost of all support price operations since 1946 has been only $100,073,260.26. The publicity and emphasis given the cost of the program for the period ending March 31, 1959 are to be wondered at. I remember the words of the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska which were disturbing to farmers and farm organizations. One was almost led to believe that it was unreasonable to expend this amount to support agricultural stability and security. Fifteen millions of dollars is less than one dollar per capita to ensure the food supplies of this nation. Looking at this amount in relation to the serious problems facing labour and industry I am inclined to believe that these national problems cannot and will not yield to better days until Canadians are prepared to invest three or four or even seven or eight times the $15 millions paid out under the stabilization act for the year ending March 31, 1959.

Yet there are those who still maintain the ideal situation would be an agricultural industry without these artificial aids. I will not labour you with a recital of the artificial props that have become so much a part of the entire economic and industrial structure of this country. Rather I would say, add to the estimates I have outlined the amounts that could be reasonably justified for the producers of grain in western Canada, who incidentally are producing a product that can be successfully merchandised in world markets, and it might bring the increased estimates to an amount that could be considered a decisive factor in meeting the needs of labour and industry. There are those who have a peanut mentality and they would no doubt still ask for greater action but I see some who have dissenting frowns.

I ask you, sir, to consider that other problem which has been receiving considerable discussion during the present session. Someone has estimated that it will cost the federal treasury millions through payments out of the unemployment insurance benefits fund. Surely this nation would be better served by expending an amount to create a demand for goods and services needed in agricultural communities; a demand that would be shared right down the line through the local small businessman, the wholesaler, the distributor, the manufacturer, and all the way from the farmer on the remotest homestead right back to the industrial employees of the St. Lawrence river basin.

During wartime this nation found it expedient to put every shoulder to the wheel. Surely in peacetime we could be even more productive of the needs of Canadians for employment and the fruits of employment. This cannot and will not be done by allowing as important a segment of the Canadian population as those in agriculture to suffer only a fractional opportunity to meet their neighbours' needs in the industrial and labour fields of this nation.

The farm stabilization act can be a most effective instrument in the Canadian economy. Since 1946 legislation on the books has been used to make returns so disastrous as to chase enough people out of production of any commodity that may be reaching surplus proportions. Balance is thus swung to the other extreme, at the end of a trail strewn with the wrecked and shattered hopes of farm people. It is my belief that there is a better alternative. The use of incentive payments on commodities for which there is a demand and market will change production patterns without such disastrous and ruinous dislocation of individual farm enterprise. Moreover, it is of a more orderly nature and of value not only to the farmer but also to those who handle, warehouse, distribute and merchandise farm products. It can also be argued that incentive payments serve to reward those who are willing to risk investment where it can be used to strengthen and build the Canadian economy.

Then there is that most intriguing matter of defining or deciding just what constitutes surplus in so far as any given commodity is concerned. In the grain business with which I have lived all my life it is considered that Canada needs a carryover of anywhere from 300 to 450 millions of bushels of wheat to service our annual domestic and export markets. It is of course easier to carry grain than perishable products. Last year we had a good example in the dry skim milk market. At one time we were approaching panic. Not too much later our surplus supplies had been absorbed. When you consider that it required only about $8 million to protect the stability of the entire Canadian dairy industry for the greater part of the production in the board's hands from the years 1957-58 and 1958-59, it would be difficult indeed to say that we had any real or dangerous surplus of dairy products.

Another classic example is eggs. Those who were the most enthusiastic advocates of a program to discourage production must, I think, admit that by the time the new deficiency payment program was to start the market had absorbed all, or almost all of those supplies which had been considered surplus.

The prospect of fluctuating egg prices is not one that Canadian consumers would appreciate. These illustrations serve as evidence that the problems of surpluses, while considerable, are not nearly as great as some well informed people try to make out. The associated problems are intriguing and will no doubt be with us for many years. From time to time circumstances may not work out as well as they have so far, and the federal treasury may be called upon to finance sizeable surpluses of some commodities. This will be the exception to the rule if proper use were made of incentive payments and provided that floor prices were set at non-incentive levels. Of course, such a program would require the use of flat or deficiency payments, where required.

If Canada is to become the great industrial nation that her resources justify; if Canadians are to enjoy secure employment in the period leading to that objective, the reality of that objective can be enhanced and hastened by the acceptance of the role of agriculture and the farm stabilization legislation in particular as one of the protective valves in this intervening period that can cushion the needs of labour and industry, both of whom are suffering growing pains that in the years gone by were never cured by dismissing the possibilities that are in the application of sound national policies, recognizing the continued and increasing interdependence and prosperity of both labour and industry with that of agricultural people.

A little over two years ago, when this party came to power, it inherited a legacy of problems which had been shirked by the former administration. That was one of the reasons for the change of government. In almost every field of activity that affects farm people that administration ran headlong and recklessly to the destiny that is theirs today. They allowed freight rates to climb by 120 per cent without any active concern for the national railway problem which is of the utmost importance to people on the prairies and in the maritimes and to others in every part of Canada in every industry, including agriculture. They allowed the freight rate problem, and that of general transportation, to mushroom into a monster, without any active concern as to its effect on the economy of this nation. The people of Canada are watching the present survey which has been authorized and are hoping that as a result of those deliberations, and above the confusion and chaos of the past many years, a national transportation policy may now evolve.

Those who produce grain in western Canada are vitally interested in this question, as are all who depend upon grain production for their livelihood. They expect the government of Canada to respect those long standing agreements which were instrumental in the building of settlements in western Canada and, incidentally, providing this nation with an item of major export significance. Wheat is one of the few commodities that has enjoyed the confidence of the export market over the years.

The economic prospects for Canada in the coming year have been encouraging. In every report that I have read no one has ventured to expect that agriculture will share fully in those economic expectations that have been forecast. Indeed, it can be shown with the use of statistics that farm costs have continued to rise in the face of declining farm income. It is true that there are fewer farmers than there were, but even this fact cannot camouflage the situation in which farm people find themselves, a situation which is calling for greatly increased capital outlay to compete successfully.

The Farm Credit Corporation will prove of benefit to many in this respect; but there are many who cannot qualify. They already have an investment at the present time. They have the experience in their chosen line, and are of an age where change of occupation is not easy, even if they were provided with training for new jobs. They find themselves embarrassed for lack of purchasing power for the very things that can be produced by Canadians in other walks of life who have been laid off their jobs for want of a market. This inequity of income under which the people in agriculture are suffering is an old story in Canada. It has always been the forerunner of rough weather for the rest of the economy.

The government is still comparatively young as governments are known. I should like to think that this government will distinguish itself in the years ahead as one which was ready to blaze new trails of security for all our people in every part of Canada.

In the short period that I have had an opportunity to share with the rest of you this closer look at our national economy I have become prouder than ever to claim the name and occupation of farmer. It would seem to me that this industry, one of the most basic in this nation, stands ready, as it always has, with a contribution to the future of this nation worthy of much more consideration than it has received throughout the long period of years. I ask you all to take a closer look at what the people in agriculture have been able to accomplish despite the obstacles that have hampered their progress. I ask you all to consider what they could do for Canada if given a better opportunity.

[Mr. Nasserden.]

Mr. Rogers: Mr. Chairman, first of all I should like to commend the Minister of Agriculture on his fortitude and his ability to withstand the pressure within and without. After all, this is a pretty tough time for any minister to handle agriculture. I should also like to thank him for the concessions that he has given and the understanding that we will get a few more.

The constituency that I represent is for the most part a progressive, mixed farming district. Supplemented as it is with the oil and forestry industries our problems are not as pronounced as many others. However, I would certainly be remiss in my duty if I did not point out that in common with many other parts of western Canada 1959 was probably one of the poorest years in our history.

While approximately 80 per cent of the crop was threshed last fall, threshing was completed under abnormal and expensive conditions and the grain, as hon. members know, was mostly tough and damp. Further the balance of the crop, which came through the winter much better than expected, has deteriorated considerably. Moreover, quite a section was badly damaged by hail. So in general the agricultural industry is not in too healthy a position.

A certain section of our farmers who are well established in mixed farming, who are engaged in dairying and the cattle industry, are doing comparatively well while on the other hand there are a number of other farmers who are not firmly established and as a consequence are experiencing a very difficult time. The main problem in agriculture, as I see it, stems from the surpluses of grain and the farmers' inability to find markets for wheat. I believe implicitly in the ability of the farmer to compete with the world if he has the market. He therefore finds himself in a very difficult position, right in the middle of the price squeeze. In my humble opinion, Canadians as a whole must accept this situation.

I do not believe for one moment that we can subsidize farm products for export. On the other hand, I believe we must subsidize the products we consume at home. It is not reasonable to expect the farmer to produce products for our domestic use for less than production costs and a fair profit. This is not an easy problem, and most will agree that support prices tend to bring other problems. Be that as it may, I contend that the producer is entitled to a fair price for products consumed in Canada, and I would hope that the matter will eventually be resolved.

As is to be expected, I have had a number of submissions from local farm unions in support of acreage payments. I would therefore urge upon the government, at least until a fixed plan is adopted, that the acreage payment be reinstated. I think it can be said in all honesty after a brief examination of the numerous measures taken by the government to assist agriculture that the government has done a lot. The measures I speak of have been recorded on numerous occasions so it is not my intention at this time to go over them again. For my purposes I should like to discuss the Farm Credit Act.

In brief, this is a two-pronged affair, encompassing as it does (a) the replacement of the Canadian Farm Loan Act and, (b) part III, legislation for young farmers. With reference to (a), the Canadian Farm Loan Act, as hon. members know the ceiling was raised from $15,000 to $20,000 with amortization at 5 per cent interest over 30 years. This continues to serve a need for farmers who have a 50 per cent or better equity in their farms and who wish to convert or extend their operations. In passing, I would indicate that the one main criticism which prevails would be corrected and that the new management will see that a realistic approach is taken to land values as they exist today.

With regard to (b) or part III of the Farm Credit Act, this provides for loans up to $27,500 spread over 30 years at 5 per cent interest to farmers between the ages of 21 and 45. This is commonly known as the package deal and will in my opinion reach down to the source of a common problem. In other words, it will provide the funds to set up an efficient family farm unit and will permit the adjustment of production to favourable market trends.

Its success and impact on the agricultural industry will, of course, depend on its administration. Let me say that we are particularly fortunate to have Brigadier Rutherford as chairman of the corporation. Brigadier Rutherford is well known and has to a large degree been responsible for the publicly acknowledged success with respect to the rehabilitation of veterans on farms. Accordingly, with the integration of the farm credit legislation and the V.L.A. staff there will be 200 trained, experienced and dedicated resident advisers who are well employed throughout the agricultural areas of the country. I think it is most significant to observe that the corporation will provide a pre-counselling service as well as a post-supervisory service.

Both these services are paramount to the success of this forward and far-reaching legislation. To begin with, let us look at the pre-counselling service. What does this mean? It can, of course, mean much or little. For the moment let us visualize a credit adviser, with the aforementioned qualifications, calling on an applicant to assess his whole proposition, that is, the ability of the applicant as a farmer, his family, the production capacity of the farm and the stock and equipment. On the completion of this assessment I can imagine the credit adviser sitting down at the kitchen table with the farmer, his wife and family and as one of a team bringing out the factors for and against the proposition. In the first instance, if the proposition shows the potential for success the matter is comparatively simple. The credit adviser can in a diplomatic manner interject some new ideas into the farmer's plan of operations and recommend the loan. When the loan is approved, he will naturally follow up with the supervisory service required.

The big and most important factor is pre-counselling service where the proposition does not support a loan and, in some instances, it will even be found that the applicant and his wife will have to be told, in as kindly a manner as possible, to get into some other form of livelihood commensurate with their ability. I am sure that the credit adviser will be able to do this on the farm in a manner that will cause very little pain to all concerned.

The question is this: Do we stop there and leave the applicant and his family to their own resources? I must emphasize that this is not good enough. I would on the other hand, contemplate that this counselling service would be continued and if not by the credit adviser by someone else with the time to do so, one who is well versed in welfare work and with direct connections with industry. Yes, above all, it must be someone who is interested in citizenship to the extent that through his counselling and help the applicant and his family will be given a new start in life.

I have been discussing the production side of agriculture, a policy directed to the task of assisting a section of this industry in reorganizing itself into sound economical family farm units so that advantage may be taken of every technological and production line method which will reduce production costs and permit adjustment of production to fit more favourable market trends; and I would hope to follow up at a later date on the marketing side of this question.

In conclusion, I submit that we must as a government and as Canadians maintain our agriculture industry in as healthy a position as possible. Apart from the fact that we must eat, there is no better place to build character than on the farm. A child born on the farm starts out with something to do and he does it. As a consequence, he is self-reliant and is brought up more or less to stand on his own feet. Fortunately for our general economy, they do not all stay on the farm.

Mr. Harkness: I should like to reply briefly to some of the speeches and remarks which have been made here today on the agriculture estimates. The hon. member for Lapointe and the hon. member for Essex East both complained that I did not make a longer speech in introducing these estimates. It came as an agreeable surprise to me to learn that the members of the opposition are so anxious to listen to my voice at length. I should like to point out to them, however, that on January 25, in the throne speech debate, I made a full length speech here in connection with agriculture and general agricultural policy. Again on February 23, which I would point out was just about ten days before the introduction of the agriculture estimates, I made another full length speech in reply to hon. members in the opposition who had introduced to the supply motion an amendment dealing with agriculture. In that connection I dealt with general agricultural policy and general agricultural questions. In view of these two long speeches already along this line, and as I am not one who likes to see endless and useless repetition, I did not think it was desirable to make another long speech of a general nature on agriculture at the time the estimates were introduced.

The hon. member for Lapointe came back to the point which members of the opposition have been so fond of quoting ever since the dominion bureau of statistics figures came out, namely that the net income of farmers dropped 7 per cent in 1959. As I have pointed out on several occasions, what they completely lose sight of is the fact that the net income of farmers in 1958 was up 20 per cent over that of 1957. Hence, when they say that the net income of farmers in 1959 dropped 7 per cent, what they are in effect saying is that the net income of farmers in 1959 is still up over 12 per cent above the net income of farmers in 1957.

There is no doubt that the net income dropped by that amount, in spite of the fact that the gross income was up almost as high as it was in 1958 and was the third highest on record in Canadian history. However, I think we must keep some sense of proportion in regard to this matter. As I say, the members of the opposition should keep in mind the fact that farmers in Canada had a smaller drop in net income by very much than did the farmers across the line in the United States and farmers in most other parts of the world and that we in Canada managed to keep up prices and to keep up farm income to a greater extent than was done in most other parts of the world during a period in which agricultural products of all kinds have been in surplus supply and when prices were going down.

The hon. member for Lapointe went on to say that the minister should have said what long range program we have to improve the position of agriculture. Our long range program has been put before this house by myself, by the Prime Minister and by various other members time after time and I think it is well known to the hon. members of the house. I know it is well known to the farming population of this country. Certainly I do not think it is justifiable for me as minister or for other members to keep on repeating the same thing over and over again.

The hon. member went on to say that there was a serious situation in the dairy industry. I do not know of any serious situation in the dairy industry. Actually the dairy industry has been one of the better off industries as far as agriculture is concerned. The prices of dairy products in Canada are the highest in the world and they are highest by a very considerable degree as compared with those in most of the other dairying countries. The support price for butter in this country, for example, is 64 cents. In the United States it is 57 cents. On the London market at the present time butter is selling for 38 cents a pound. Just those two figures give some measure of the amount of support that Canadian dairy farmers are receiving and of the very high degree of success which the government has had in maintaining the price of dairy products. As I say, we have managed to maintain them at the highest levels of any country in the world and at levels about double the prices that prevail in most of the other dairying countries. That is the serious situation as far as the dairy industry is concerned.

The hon. member for Lapointe went on to say that we should have a support price for dry skim milk and that the lack of this support was a very damaging thing to the dairy industry. I should like to point out to him that a good deal of the trouble which the dairy industry has been experiencing in the last two or three years arose out of the fact that the previous government—the Liberal government—put into effect a completely unrealistic high price for dry skim milk of 17 cents a pound just prior to the 1957 election for purely political purposes. As a result of that price they encouraged a great expansion in the dry skim milk making facilities in this country and a great expansion in dry skim milk manufacture, and thus created the difficulties as far as dry skim milk is concerned and many of the attendant difficulties as far as the whole dairy industry is concerned. In order to restore the dairy industry to health it has been necessary to get rid of this support price on dry skim milk. We have done that by reducing the price gradually and then finally eliminating it some six months ago.

The hon. member went on to talk about the price spreads commission or the Stewart commission which he said—I think aided a bit by the hon. member for Essex East—was established under a Liberal government. The previous Liberal government had absolutely nothing to do with this price spreads commission, of course. I do not think they even thought of such a thing. That a price spreads commission or inquiry would be set up and carried on was one of the election promises which we made and which we promptly carried out after getting into office.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What are you going to do about it? That is the question.

Mr. Harkness: We are going to take the appropriate action that has been recommended by the commission.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Are you going to follow the recommendations of the commission?

Mr. Harkness: As far as possible, yes.

The hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort made a very good speech on rapeseed production. This matter of diversification of crops in western Canada is an extremely important one. I should like to compliment him on his speech and on the interest he has taken in this problem. I should like to point out also that over the past two and a half years I have been making efforts to increase the use of rapeseed in various ways in Canada, particularly with regard to its use in the manufacture of margarine. I managed to persuade one of the margarine manufacturing companies in this country to set up a pilot plant in order to work out procedures and so on for the use of rapeseed in the making of margarine. I trust that in the years ahead a great deal more of the content of margarine manufactured in this country will be from rapeseed oil.

As far as the tariffs on soybeans and the other sources of edible oils are concerned, I was a little surprised to find the hon. member for Essex East apparently supporting the position taken by the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort. I say this because he is one, together with some of the other hon. members along the Liberal front bench who belonged to the previous Liberal government, who should be answering that question, because the previous Liberal government contracted on behalf of Canada not to put any tariffs on soybeans and these other edible oils and bound Canada under the GATT agreements not to do so. Therefore we are in the position that we cannot put any tariffs on these soybeans coming in from the United States and on other edible oils coming into this country unless we give some corresponding advantage to the country concerned.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): All I was asking for was a satisfactory floor price.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member for Essex East indicated he supported—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I want a satisfactory floor price and so do my farmers.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member evidently would like us to put on a very high support price and encourage more United States beans to come into this country as a result of that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I did not say that.

Mr. Harkness: That is apparently what he wants. That is the situation as far as soybeans are concerned. I think Canada made a very bad bargain under the previous Liberal government as far as soybeans and other edible oils are concerned in that at the time they entered into the GATT agreements they did not ensure that there were tariffs on such products. But they did not do that and as a result we are bound at the present time, and in order to put a tariff on them we have to give some corresponding tariff advantage to the country concerned.

The hon. member for Essex East, as usual in his speeches in this house during this session, attempted to paint a general picture of gloom. If one could take all that the hon. member for Essex East says seriously he would be practically crying. We would all need crying towels in this chamber.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is the situation with regard to agriculture; it is critical.

Mr. Harkness: As far as the hon. member is concerned, that is the situation with everything. The picture is as gloomy as it could be with everything; there is nothing right with anything.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Under this government.

Mr. Harkness: So he admits it. In other words, his whole complaint is that he is no longer in a government, and I can understand that. If the present government were to offer the member for Essex East a place in the government overnight, his attitude would change completely and he would think that everything done by the government was just wonderful.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I assure you I would never go into a Conservative government.

Mr. Harkness: Of course, we are talking about complete improbabilities and impossibilities here, but the hon. member recognizes, I think, that his gloom is purely political and is used for political purposes.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I would not agree with that. My sorrow is very genuine.

Mr. Harkness: I know the hon. member's sorrow is genuine that he is not still a member of a government.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is true.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member for Essex East said that the stabilization act has been of no benefit to Ontario wheat growers. This last year the price of Ontario wheat has been well above the support price because there was a short crop last year. That was because there was a great deal of winter killing and as a result of the short crop the price has been good. But the year before last this act was of very considerable benefit to the producers. It put them in the position where they could bargain with the buyers, and the powers that we extended to them under the Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act enabled them to export at a subsidized price a certain amount of wheat to overseas markets and thus enabled the general price for Ontario winter wheat to be kept up to a reasonable level.

The hon. member for Essex East asked about an announcement concerning the sugar beet support program. The representatives of the sugar beet growers have been down here this week, as a matter of fact, holding meetings with the stabilization board. The stabilization board has reported to me that the representatives of the growers went away quite happy as a result of these meetings. The discussion concerned particularly technical details as to how the support price was going to be applied in the three regions where it is applicable, and so forth, and I expect the stabilization board will in the very near future be making a recommendation to the government in regard to the level of support and the way in which they recommend it should be applied.

I might also say that, contrary to the hon. member's statement, the sugar beet growers last year were I think very well satisfied with the deficiency payments which they received from the government, and I have received quite a number of letters of appreciation and thanks from them on account of this payment.

The hon. member went on to say that my statement in regard to the dairy price support for the current year which I made on April 13 had misled the house and that butter scoring 40-93 represents only a small percentage of the butter produced; as a result, in some way the country had been misled.

I think there is no validity to this statement whatever. I stated quite definitely, as reported on page 3183 of Hansard for April 13 last, that:

> The price support for butter during the dairy year May 1, 1960 to April 30, 1961 will be 64 cents per pound for Canada first grade creamery butter scoring 40-93, basis delivery Montreal, with appropriate price differentials for other grades and qualities.

The hon. member seems to take it for granted that we are paying 64 cents a pound for butter delivered to us which scores 40-93, and a lesser price, which I said yesterday, I think, was 63 cents a pound, for butter scoring 39-92, and therefore that means we have reduced the price of butter, and so forth. I should like to point out, to begin with, that we only buy about one quarter of the butter produced in Canada and we sell most of that back again to the trade during the winter months. The great bulk of the butter produced in Canada goes directly into the trade. It does not trade at these prices but at varying prices at different times of the year. If hon. members look at the papers they will see it varies up and down from day to day. What these support prices do is to provide a floor at which we are prepared to buy the surplus packed in wooden boxes and so forth.

The actual situation is that the price of butter fat and the price of butter varies, as I say, up and down. It does not vary very much; it varies depending on the season of the year. I have the figures here for different seasons of the year and I can give as an example, churning cream. The prices paid to producers by plants in terms of cents per pound of butter fat varies, we find, from 65 cents in January at Edmonton to 63 cents, and it kept between those figures in Edmonton right through the year, varying between 63 and 65 cents. Then when we come to Winnipeg it varied from 60 to 66 cents. It varied between those two points throughout the year. I have the figures here for three years.

In London, Ontario, you have the same sort of thing. Hon. members will find that in London, Ontario the figure ranged from 65 cents to 68 cents throughout the year. In Three Rivers it varied from 67 cents to 72 cents at different times throughout the year. In other words, these are not absolutely fixed prices at which all the butter fat and churning cream sells. These are the prices at which we take over the surplus by purchase for resale from time to time later, which constitutes, in recent years, approximately one quarter, or a little less, of the production.

I might say further that the introduction of this distinction between 40-93 and 39-92 butter is something which many of the better dairymen have been asking for many years. This is the same kind of system as is in effect with regard to many other commodities; in other words, the customer pays a higher price for the better quality, and a lower price for a poorer quality. It puts the support of butter on a much sounder, more logical and more reasonable basis than has ever been the case before.

The hon. member for Kent (Ont.) spoke of the difficulty of securing farm labour. I think this is a difficult and increasing problem as far as farmers are concerned. It is one of the great anomalies in the so-called unemployment situation that such situations should arise. I know—because I was down in the hon. member's part of the country—that last year some of the sugar beets were not got up, despite the fact that in the city of Windsor in the constituency of the hon. member for Essex East there were thousands of unemployed. Nevertheless, the farmers could not get anyone to take up these beets.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I hope the minister is not suggesting that our workers are not prepared to work.

Mr. Harkness: I am suggesting there is something seriously wrong with the unemployment figures when a situation of that kind prevails, and a similar situation exists as far as agricultural work is concerned in all the areas of this country. You have farmers desperately trying to hire workers to take up their crops while at the same time there are cities not very far away which allegedly have thousands on the unemployment rolls. It is just not a situation that makes sense or which I can accept as being a true indication of what the unemployment situation is in this country.

The hon. member for Kent (Ont.) also spoke about the sales of agricultural products which have recently been made to Rumania and which were initiated and carried through to a considerable extent by Mr. Ernest Warwick of Blenheim, Ontario. I should like again publicly to express my thanks to Mr. Warwick for the extremely good work he did in this regard. I agree with the hon. member for Kent (Ont.) that we have to use improved methods as far as the sale of a number of farm products is concerned, because there is no doubt that most of them are in a surplus position throughout a large part of the world. These particular sales indicate that a certain amount of progress can be made along these lines if the right people are working on the problem.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is the very question. The right people are not.

Mr. Harkness: We have a lot of the right people and I expect we shall have more of them. Under the hon. gentleman's government, of course, no sales at all were made along these lines.

The hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres spoke of the 25 cents per 100 pounds subsidy on milk for manufacturing purposes. He said confusion exists over this. There has never been any confusion whatever over this policy which was put into effect a little over a year ago. It has always been absolutely clear. It was discussed on its introduction and it has been discussed since on numerous occasions with all the national dairy organizations, and all those concerned with dairying are familiar with the situation. They know what it is. There is no confusion with regard to this matter whatever, and there should not have been any confusion as far as my statement is concerned.

Speaking on April 13—and I quote again from page 3183 of Hansard—I said:

> —twenty five cents per 100 pounds will continue to be paid for whole milk delivered for manufacturing purposes—

Then, later on, you will note this, Mr. Chairman:

> —exclusive of milk from producers who sell a portion of their milk in the fluid, bottled milk market.

I think that is as plain as English can make it. Anybody who sells a portion of his milk in the bottled, fluid market is not entitled to the 25 cents. That has been made absolutely clear, and there should have been no confusion at any time in connection with it.

The reason for that provision is, of course, that by and large the people who sell their milk in the fluid milk market—to the bottled trade—receive much higher prices than those who sell milk for manufacturing purposes. The idea of paying this 25 cents subsidy to those who sell milk for manufacturing purposes is in order to bring about to some extent an equality of price levels and to help to equalize the returns to the dairy farmer who sells to a cheese or butter factory.

The hon. member for Rosthern spoke about support prices. He suggested that support prices should be set at non-incentive levels. All I could say about that is that any attempt to fix a support price at a non-incentive level results in a price which is unacceptable to any farmer; no one is satisfied with it and, furthermore, it does not give any support. In order to have a support price which is effective, it is bound, by the very nature of things, to be an incentive price as far as a considerable number of producers are concerned and, particularly, as far as large integrated operations are concerned. If you set support prices and maintain support for a commodity by means of purchases at a price which is satisfactory to even a small proportion of bona fide farmers you will have provided in many cases—and I am thinking particularly of the poultry industry and the hog industry—a support price which is an incentive to large commercial integrated operations.

That is the very reason why this type of support price by means of purchase is not a practical means and not the best means of support as far as many commodities are concerned. The experience in the United States, particularly as far as wheat, cotton, corn and some other products are concerned, is a good example of the difficulties encountered if you attempt to maintain support by means of purchase. In the case of some commodities you can, but the method is not practical in the case of a large number of commodities; it is just not a practical or possible means of giving support to the bona fide farmer.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Might I ask just one question? Does that mean there is no intention to have a floor price on corn?

Mr. Harkness: It does not mean anything of the kind. Corn has not entered into this discussion so far at all.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister just mentioned corn in the United States.

Mr. Harkness: Yes, in the United States. But so far we have had no support prices for corn in Canada, as the hon. member knows. If we did have a support price for corn in Canada I am quite sure we would have to make it on a deficiency payment method of support the same as for soya beans.

The hon. member for Red Deer made a very useful and interesting speech particularly on farm credit, for which I would like to thank him. I know that he has been very intimately associated in the past with the granting of farm credit and his views on this subject are, I think, very valuable to the committee. I believe with him that through the Farm Credit Act it will be possible to greatly improve general agricultural conditions in Canada.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I would like to take up certain statements made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness), with regard to the price of farm products, and more particularly dairy products, especially when he maintained that prices paid for dairy products in Canada were the highest in the world.

I do not wish to contradict the minister on that, but I must point out to him that the price of farm products means nothing if it is not established in proportion to production costs. When we speak of the sale price of some farm product, we naturally have to know how much it costs, and the minister made no reference to the production cost index.

I mentioned this in my remarks the other day, and I also said that production costs had gone up 16.9 points in the past year. If we compare the price of butter three or four years ago, and even six or seven years ago, and today, we will find that, at 64 cents a pound, the price of that produce today is not higher than when it was 58 cents three years ago. On the contrary, if we apply the same reasoning I just mentioned, butter should sell at 68 cents, in comparison to the 58 cents paid for it three years ago.

The hon. member for Joliette-l'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) made some comparisons and asked questions about the price of butter. The minister told us what butter prices were in Edmonton, Winnipeg, London, and Three Rivers. For instance, he stated that in Edmonton, it was selling at 63 to 65 cents; in Three Rivers, 67 to 72 cents; and, if I understood him rightly, this was for the current year.

I have here an excerpt from the Gazette for May 3, that is, after the price change for farm products was announced, and more particularly for butter. On the Montreal market, the price has fallen since the week of May 3. In the last weeks of March, butter was selling in Montreal at 64 to 66 cents a pound, whereas prices published in the Gazette for May 3 mentioned 63 cents and 65½ cents. Therefore butter prices are down by 1 to 1½ cents since the change in price of farm products was announced. Yet the minister claims that this change has no effect on farm prices.

That is what I wanted to point out for the information of members of the committee and of the Minister of Agriculture, because he does not seem to believe that this change in the price of butter will affect farmers' income, since the government will surely buy the surplus production.

However, I have already stated, as did the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), that 70 per cent of butter production was graded 92. I fail to see how the minister can say that the prices of farm products will not be affected, when a reaction is already apparent on the Montreal market. And I do not doubt that the same thing will occur on other markets.

I should also like to say a few words about the price support policy on butter. The department now requires a producer to secure a registration certificate. That is a new method recently adopted by the department. Now, I am informed by some manufacturers that at the present time about one third of the farmers have not obtained their registration permit, which forces the manufacturer to pay an extra 25 cents per 100 pounds of butter delivered to him, because he does not want to lose his customers.

I am also informed that refunds are being made to the Department of Agriculture, and that these refunds are turned down because the formula is not filled in as the department would like it to be. I must point that if manufacturers are prepared to do this work free, it seems to me the department should consider this attitude on the part of manufacturers, and show better understanding when recommendations are made.

I am also informed that there are farmers today who have two or even three registration certificates. This is due to delay on the part, perhaps of manufacturers or of the department in providing permits to producers, which caused producers to file their request with the manufacturer of their choice, so that, finally, they were getting two permits.

What I am afraid of is that those permits might be transferred to other farmers, as happened in the case of hog breeders. In fact, questions were put on the orders of the day pointing out that some farmers often had two or three permits in their possession, in order to take advantage of deficiency payments on hogs. I am afraid that this will happen again with regard to dairy products.

The Minister of Agriculture also mentioned the 25 cents per hundredweight of milk delivered to manufacturers, who transformed it into butter, cheese and milk powder.

The minister claims that such a policy will not affect the farmers' income. Yet very many farmers in the province of Quebec are not in a position to sell all the fluid milk they produce.

They can sell one fifth of their production and the rest must be delivered to the butter, cheese and milk powder manufacturers. Therefore, the farmer cannot collect the subsidy of 25 cents per hundredweight.

Some farmers are losing $500 to $800 a year that way, and the average farmer is the one who takes the brunt of what I would describe as a segregationist policy.

Refusal of the 25 cents subsidy per hundredweight on milk delivered to a manufacture is contrary to the request made by the U.C.C., the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and the farmers. The things requested are logical and, if granted, would do away with misrepresentation by some producers and avoid trouble to the department.

The minister has announced his policy. I do not think he will change his mind because each time we have made suggestions, he has not seen fit to give them favourable consideration.

Those are the few remarks I wanted to make after the speech of the Minister of Agriculture who, once again, disguises the truth by saying that the farmers' income for 1959 or 1960 will not be affected by his price policy on dairy products.

I would like to add a few words in reply to the member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon), who stated that, in the province of Quebec, there is a law against the sale of margarine. I will read a few lines from that act.

A section of that act does indeed prohibit the sale of margarine in the province of Quebec. We know, however, that some is being sold. The hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm himself said in his remarks, that as much margarine as butter is being sold in the province of Quebec.

Section 6 reads as follows:

In the case of infringement of a provision of this act or of a regulation made thereunder, any dairy product substitute which was the object of such infringement must be seized, with or without a warrant, as well as the container thereof and any vehicle used for its transportation, and the confiscation thereof shall be ordered by the court for the profit of the crown.

The penalty for such an infraction is set at $2. Section 5 reads as follows:

Whosoever infringes any provision of this act or of a regulation made thereunder shall be liable, if the offence relates to the possession, for other purposes than for sale, of a dairy product substitute, to a fine of not less than two dollars nor more than twenty dollars and costs, for the first offence, and to a fine of not less than five dollars nor more than twenty five dollars and costs, for each subsequent offence.

Oddly enough, however, the second paragraph of section 7 reads as follows:

Prosecutions for infringement of this act may be instituted by the crown or by any person previously authorized for such purpose by the Minister of Agriculture; in the latter case, the prosecutors shall be entitled to one half of the fine collected.

Mr. Chairman, this shows clearly that, in the province of Quebec there is an act prohibiting the sale of margarine or butter substitutes. But to prosecute people who sell margarine, permission must first be obtained from the minister of agriculture of the province of Quebec.

It is also known that in Quebec, a butter substitute called "spread" is sold by wholesalers, and inquiry shows that margarine sales in the province of Quebec are controlled by members of the Union Nationale government.

That is, Mr. Chairman, what I wanted to say to the hon. member for Joliette-l'Assomption-Montcalm. If there is an act to this effect in the province of Quebec, it should be applied and the sale of butter substitutes should be prevented.

Mr. Martel: An unfounded charge.

(Text):

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is the minister not going to reply to some of the questions put to him, particularly as to the government's intention of an alternative program, such as acreage assistance? There is a story in today's paper—I am now looking for it—which indicates that the government intends to make an announcement very soon along those lines. If that is the case, can the minister not give us some indication today? If it is not the case, surely we are entitled, on the discussion of the agricultural estimates, to know if the government has any alternative to the proposals made by western farmers over a year ago. It surely is not consistent with good government for the government continually to delay, now over a year, its answer to this request that concerns, not only farmers in all parts of western Canada but every member from western Canada who sits behind the government in this house.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I think all I can say to the hon. member is that he should not believe everything he reads in the papers. He should have learned that by this time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I find the press pretty reliable.

Mr. Harkness: Certainly, what he has read in the paper I do not know anything about. What I would say on this question is that suggestions were made to the effect—I think it has appeared in a considerable number of papers—that the western farm organizations were asked to put in writing any alternative to deficiency payments which they wished to discuss with the Prime Minister and the cabinet, and we would then be very glad to have them come down and discuss the matter with us. Up to date they have not yet put in any alternative.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Does the minister think it is up to the farmers of this country to provide the solutions themselves? I do not know whether they feel the assistance plan is the way by which this problem could be solved. But is it not up to the government itself, in the face of an admitted situation, to provide some plan? It seems to me it is an abdication by this government of its responsibilities when it says to the farmers of western Canada, we will not do anything unless you write us and tell us what particular proposal you have in mind to discuss with us. If that is the position of the government, if that is the final position, as now stated by the Minister of Agriculture, then he has served notice on the farmers of western Canada that they cannot look to get from him and from this government an implementation of the promises which this government gave to them.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, as usual this is an example, of which we have had plenty from the hon. member, of many words meaning little or nothing. The farmers of western Canada and the farm organizations of western Canada I think know extremely well what the situation is. The farm organizations of western Canada had no hesitation, as a matter of fact, in coming down here with demands for deficiency payments. I do not think, when they can agree among themselves on any alternative plan, that they will have any hesitation in coming down here to discuss it with us, but up to date I take it they have not done that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Has the government no plan? That is the question. It is an admitted abdication by the government.

Mr. Harkness: There is no such thing as any abdication or anything else along that line, Mr. Chairman. The government has all kinds of plans but, unlike the previous government, we are not trying to dictate to the farmers as to what plan they should accept, and so forth. We have asked them to bring down an alternative plan and we will be glad to discuss it with them, and we are waiting for them to do that.

2. Information division including a grant in the amount of $26,000 to the agricultural institute of Canada, $638,410.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hon. gentlemen may steamroll, but these are tactics which will not be appreciated. We are a small group and we are going to fight for the rights of parliament.

Mr. Boulanger: There is an increase of $15,000 in this item; can the minister tell us what it is all about?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I am not entirely clear as to what the hon. member means but I can give him some information as to the reason for the increase. As a matter of fact, as far as departmental administration is concerned, which includes the deputy minister, and some of the other chief administrative officers, he will note that the increase is $73,000. It is accounted for largely by increases in salaries, the normal increments that take place and so on. The total number of people in the administration branch has been increased by 10. Some of that increase is due to the transfer of personnel from other branches to the central administration branch in an effort to improve the general administration. That is the explanation of that particular item.

3. Contributions to commonwealth agricultural bureaux in a total amount of £46,384, notwithstanding that payments may exceed or fall short of the equivalent in Canadian dollars, estimated as of December, 1959 which is, $123,516.

Mr. Herridge: Would the minister explain the details of this vote and why there is this small decrease in the amount from last year?

Mr. Harkness: Perhaps I had better explain that the commonwealth agricultural bureaux are a group of organizations in British commonwealth countries operating under a central executive council of representatives of these countries which directs the activities of the bureaux. The main activity is the maintenance of an abstracting service. The commonwealth institute of biological control, which is located in Canada, collects and distributes information on parasites and destructive diseases. I think the hon. member wanted to know why there is a slight decrease. In past years there have been certain lapsing balances, in one year amounting to $2,900, in another year $12,000 and in another year $1,747. It is estimated that the cost this year will be about $2,000 less than last year. The real explanation is that there has been an effort to estimate a little more closely.

Item agreed to.

4. Economics division, $751,838.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I see that the vote for the economics division for 1960-61 is $751,838 compared with $726,986 in the last fiscal year, and I note that 146 additional persons are covered—

Mr. Harkness: No, not 146 additional but 146 all told.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There are 146 all told or an increase of 10. I thank the minister for the correction. I am sure that these are well qualified individuals, but the purpose of employing anyone in the government service is so that they will study plans and make recommendations to the administration with regard to problems in all their aspects that exist in a particular field. I take it that in the economics division there must be individuals to whom have been assigned the task of studying the very problem which engaged the minister and myself a few moments ago namely what should be done to meet the demands of western agriculture. Is there any particular group in this division engaged in considering alternative plans or are we only to have alternative plans based upon suggestions by the farmers of western Canada themselves? The minister says he has no plans.

Mr. Harkness: I did not say that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister said, "The government is waiting for written proposals by the farmers themselves and we have not heard from the farmers". The only conclusion is that unless they hear from the western farmers there will be no policy announced by the government. I say that that is a most unusual statement for a minister to make. In the light of the fact that we are adding 10 persons to the economics division I ask the minister to tell us whether any of these individuals are addressing themselves to alternative proposals to meet the kind of problem which confronted the western farmers when they made the suggestion for deficiency payments? It is not good enough for the minister or the government to say, "We are waiting for a written reply from the farmers of western Canada". That is a most unusual statement and the more often I repeat it the more incensed I become with the fact that it is possible for the government of this country to be so weak in its attitude toward these problems as to bring about the inaction which now characterizes a government that was going to do so much for agriculture.

Well do I remember how the minister, when he sat over here, berated the former administration and how he would have become incensed if the minister of agriculture of that day had dared make the kind of reply which the minister made today. The minister says, "We are not going to do anything for agriculture in the west unless we get a written reply". It is like saying to someone applying for a job, "Send me a letter with your qualifications in writing and if I think they are worth while I will give the matter consideration".

Surely that is not what the Minister of Agriculture should say to the western farmers. He now has these new employees in the economics division. Are any of them going to be employed in providing the government with alternative solutions, solutions which the government now says it is waiting to receive in writing from the farmers of western Canada?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Essex East has given us another of these exhibitions of attempting to make black appear white to which we are becoming very accustomed in this chamber. I would say that what he is incensed about is that we have not, as the previous government to which he belonged would have done, attempted to ram something down the farmers' throats and thus provide a club for the hon. member and his colleagues to beat the government with. That is what he is incensed about.

As a matter of fact, the particular group of people we are now talking about are employed all the time in doing research work on general agricultural economic questions and on specific agricultural questions. One of them, for example, did a study of the tomato situation in British Columbia, and I referred to that when I was replying to the hon. member for Vancouver East the other day. They have done economic studies of practically all phases of agriculture from the marketing point of view, from the production point of view and so on.

With respect to alternative schemes to assist the western farmers, a great deal of work has been done by myself and also by members of the economics branch in working out schemes of different kinds. The hon. member does not need to think for a moment that the government is deficient in schemes of assistance of various kinds which might or could be put into effect. I have had a considerable number of them worked out and different people in this branch have worked on the various implications of them, how they might affect different parts of the country and so on and so forth.

Item agreed to.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): It being five o'clock, the house will now proceed to the consideration of private and public bills, the former having precedence, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15.

PRIVATE BILLS

BRENDA MARY PARDY THACKER

The house in committee on Bill No. SD-42, for the relief of Brenda Mary Pardy Thacker —Mr. McCleave—Mr. Rea in the chair.

Mr. McCleave: A week ago I suggested that if hon. members who have particular complaints with regard to some of these bills would mention the bill specifically by name it would be possible to deal with the non-contentious bills all together, as has been our practice in the past for a great number of years, and then get down to the particular ones on which they wish to speak. It seems to me that this course commends itself. I noticed the other day that we did not linger over the affairs of several insurance companies and pipe line companies but put those bills through in five minutes or ten minutes without very much debate. Perhaps we could allow that procedure to be an example for us this afternoon.

Mr. Howard: With respect to that particular suggestion, Mr. Chairman, may I make a comment or two? I realize that it is a bit out of order but perhaps if you will allow me a second or two and the committee will be generous enough to do that we could deal with this particular point raised by the hon. member for Halifax.

On Friday last a similar request was made and, as you will recall, I then raised other matters that had to be dealt with and that if we were to select those which were to be considered as difficult or ones which required some discussion and agreed to pass the others en bloc and then proceed to the next item on the order paper, we would have to concern ourselves with what happened to the public bills in private hands and so on. Following that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River suggested that perhaps the hon. member for Halifax, before making such a request, should communicate with representatives from the other two parties in an effort to work out some amicable solution. As far as I am concerned, no such specific discussions were held. Until that occurs perhaps we might just as well proceed with the bills today at least as they appear on the order paper and in that order.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, there has been discussion. I think my hon. friend is getting a little bit afield when he makes a statement like that. I had discussion with him only a few moments ago, asking whether it would be possible to take that course; and I am asking now in the chamber whether it is not possible. If he says no, then we go ahead and do as we have been doing in the past.

Mr. Howard: I do not like to refer to private conversations but if the hon. member considers that to be consultation, I think he is under a misapprehension. It is true that out in the corridor he said words to the effect—I do not remember the exact words—"Have you selected any particular bills?" I said no. I think we can probably proceed with them in the order in which they appear.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I think this discussion has gone on far enough. We will now consider Bill No. SD-42.

On clause 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Peters: I should like to say a few words on this bill. As we note from this bill, it is a petition for the relief of a particular lady on the grounds of adultery, granted on the particulars contained in paragraph 6 of the prayer:

6. That on the fifth day of February, 1959, at 9832 Berri Street, Montreal, Richard Thacker committed adultery with one Elsa Banks of 9832 Berri Street, Montreal, Quebec.

This case has been handled again by two very well-known and certainly very highly experienced investigators; namely Mr. Etheridge who has been before us a great number of times and Mr. Brault who has been before the Senate committee on a number of occasions also. Both are experienced. As you read the evidence you wonder whether their experience is not becoming apparent even to those who are not much interested in whether connivance has taken place and arrangements have been made rather than evidence having been obtained in the manner in which it is presented in this particular case. Mr. Ezra Leithman, advocate, of the city of Montreal, appeared of counsel for the petitioner. In this case, as in many other cases, we are obliged to concern ourselves—whether we do it publicly in the House of Commons or privately when we discuss these matters with our own consciences—with the problem of the children and what the result of this particular bill will be having regard to the welfare and the future of those children.

According to the evidence the marriage took place in November of 1945 in the city of Montreal, Quebec. Questions were asked as to the religion of the wife and the husband and documents to indicate that the marriage had taken place were filed as exhibit No. 1. Then submission was made of a photograph, which was filed, indicating the likeness of the husband and the defendant in this particular case. Mr. Leithman begins his questioning of the lady concerned in this case and he asks the following questions:

Q. —do you know where your husband was born?
A. Yes.
Q. Where was he born?
A. In England.

In reading these questions and answers, Mr. Chairman, you will notice that when he asks the complainant in this particular case, "Do you know where your husband was born?" the answer is yes. Would it not be normal for her, if this evidence had not been previously rehearsed or previously discussed, to say where he was born, if she knew. But the questioning goes on:

Q. Where was he born?
A. In England.
Q. And when did he come to Canada?
A. In the spring of 1945.
Q. And you married him in November of 1945?
A. Yes.

In others courts of law it is my contention that that question would not be allowed or that that type of questioning would not be allowed. She is not being asked when they were married. She is being told the date that they were married:

Q. And when did he come to Canada?

That does not constitute a question. It is a statement of fact. I suggest this type of questioning indicates a rehearsal of the process of questioning prior to the actual proceedings before the Senate.

Mr. McCleave: Where ignorance is bliss it is folly to be wise.

Mr. Peters: I do not know. I can only presume that the sponsor does not mean that quotation to apply to a lawyer. This lawyer has been before us a number of times and I imagine he has a few brains and perhaps does know where he is going. I would suggest that he also knows which side of the bread the butter is on and in this particular case I think he probably knows, if this divorce goes through quite easily, that he will get his money without much work on his part. Therefore the type of questioning taking place, while it would not be allowed in other courts of law, is being allowed in the committee at the present time.

Mr. Forgie: May I call the attention of the speaker to the fact that 75 times out of a hundred that question is asked by counsel in divorce actions in the province of Ontario.

Mr. Peters: That may be true but in cases gone by where the question is of importance the chairman always draws it to their attention. I am going only from the education we are receiving in this particular field from the committees which have discussed the matter before us. In each case where the question is a leading question, if it is of importance the chairman always asks that the question be reworded and not framed in such a way as to indicate what the answer is. It would seem to me that a question like, "And you married him in November 1945?" is a statement as well as a question, and I think the only difference might be the inflection of the voice.

Mr. Forgie: The marriage certificate is produced; that is the evidence.

Mr. McCleave: You cannot tell him anything.

Mr. Peters: That may be and it may be sufficient proof. If it is, then I suggest this type of questioning is not necessary and we should so inform the other chamber. It is a very stereotyped question.

In most cases they ask the question, "And when were you married?" In this particular case the question is, "And you married him in November 1945?" That is an indication, in my humble opinion, that these cases are rehearsed. I make that statement having full knowledge of an article which appeared a short time ago in Le Devoir in which a reporter decided to check into some of these cases and when he went to one of these investigating firms—

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, can the hon. member relate that to this particular case?

The Deputy Chairman: I was waiting to see that.

[Mr. Peters.]

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I think not. I do not think I can refer it to this particular case, but the company he went to are an established firm and the part of the investigation—

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, the hon. member says it cannot be related to this case and therefore it should not be discussed during a discussion of this particular case. That is elementary enough under the rules of this chamber.

The Deputy Chairman: The point is well taken. I was wondering whether the hon. member for Timiskaming was trying to make some point out of it but apparently not. I do not see how he can relate it to the bill before us so I will have to ask him to drop it.

Mr. Peters: I will certainly bow to your decision, Mr. Chairman, and I would agree I probably did not draw attention to the reference quickly enough. The reference was going to be that in one particular case where we have both sides of the story the indication is that this is—

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, the hon. member is deliberating flouting the ruling just given by the Chair.

Mr. Peters: I will go on with the questioning.

Q. Is he still living in Montreal?
A. Yes.
Q. Is he steadily employed in Montreal?
A. Yes.
Q. Has he become a naturalized Canadian since he has been in Canada?
A. Yes.

The chairman of the committee continued the questioning on a different line. He asked:

Q. So far as you know, does he intend to remain in Montreal?
A. Yes.

Then counsel continues.

Q. After your marriage to your husband did you live or cohabit with each other as man and wife?
A. Yes.
Q. Are there any children?
A. Yes.
Q. What are their names and ages?
A. Sandra Ellen Thacker, 11, and John Richard Thacker, 7.
Q. When did you and your husband stop living together as man and wife?
A. In the spring of 1957.
Q. Would you explain to the committee just exactly what was the trouble between you and your husband?
A. Well, he became mean to live with, he was not a good father to the children and he was not a good husband. He was out a great deal and he stayed away for days at a time and he was running around. He did not give me enough money to run my home and he was selfish, domineering.
By the chairman (Senator Roebuck):
Q. What age was he at that time, in the spring of 1957?
A. 37.

By Mr. Leithman:

Q. And since May of 1957 did you cohabit with each other?
A. No.
Q. With whom are the children?
A. With me.
Q. Has he contributed to the support of the children?
A. He has done; he gives me $100 a month.
Q. And you have been working?
A. Yes.
Q. Have you any personal knowledge of the alleged misconduct on the part of your husband on the fifth February 1959?
A. No.
Q. Is there any arrangement between you and your husband that you should proceed to Ottawa to make this petition for divorce?
A. No.
Q. Is there any inducement or agreement between you?
A. None whatsoever.
Q. Would you take your husband back?
A. No.

Mr. Chairman, this particular case, as you will notice, in discussing what led up to this petition the conduct of the married couple was discussed, the relationship between them was discussed, but at no time did the committee of the other place go into the problem of a reconciliation. In some cases the Senate suggests that an investigation into reconciliation should be given some consideration. They inquire if social service facilities in the town in question were available, if medical or spiritual advice was sought and with what result. But in this case there is very little said to indicate why this husband was not a good husband. No attempt was made to ascertain if there was a possibility of this couple being brought together again, if not by their own wishes, through the use of agencies set up for that purpose. The answer given was:

Well, he became mean to live with, he was not a good father to the children and he was not a good husband. He was out a great deal and he stayed away for days at a time and he was running around. He did not give me enough to run my home and he was selfish, domineering.

Mr. McCleave: Would the hon. member permit a question. From this extract from the evidence which he has read in full, as he has with other extracts, would he not say that, coupled with the evidence that the husband was living with another woman, there was ground for divorce? He had been living for several years with another woman.

Mr. Peters: To answer the question, in the case of common law alliances I would suggest that this in itself, the stated relationship of common law, should be enough to establish a divorce. However, that is not the case in relationship to our divorce procedure and because of that we have to operate under the terms which the Senate has laid down for itself. We have passed a bill this session which I think will be back before us again or there will be considerable reference to this again. In this particular case it was alleged there was a common law alliance.

We find that the statement of the husband in this situation—and this is borne out by my reading of Power—that a statement based on a common law alliance is not ground for adultery, and if adultery is the only ground for divorce a common law alliance does not legally constitute an adultery charge. I agree with the sponsor of the bill that it should, but it does not necessarily follow.

Mr. Pugh: I wonder if the hon. gentleman would give the page from Power and his quotation on that subject in the context of the rest of the chapter.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am afraid the committee is getting back to the procedures of divorce. We are discussing Bill No. SD-42 and not divorce procedures.

Mr. Pugh: On the point of order, it has been suggested that the evidence presented in this divorce petition is not sufficient to constitute adultery. It is suggested that adultery has not been committed.

Mr. Peters: That is not what I suggested. All I suggested was that Power has indicated that a common law alliance does not necessarily constitute ground for presumption of adultery.

An hon. Member: Page.

Mr. Peters: Unfortunately I do not have the book with me today. I like to quote from that work because it is obviously the most authoritative source, and I shall be quite happy to relate the point to another case later.

Mr. McCleave: Would the hon. member permit a question? Might he not have interpreted Kent Power wrongly in this particular instance?

Mr. Peters: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I was paraphrasing what I think the author said, and I may have misinterpreted some of the legal terms. I stand to be corrected if I am wrong. It is a very big book, and it is all new to me. It is a text book rather than a novel. In this instance I was merely pointing out, not that there might not be grounds for divorce on the basis of the evidence but that many married people may have passed through more difficult periods than were experienced by the couple concerned in this case. The accusation is that the man was running around. It is not substantiated; there is no reference to particulars.

Mr. McCleave: Would the hon. member point out that part of the evidence which says the respondent was running around? Would he name the paragraph and page which would substantiate what he has said?

Mr. Peters: I refer to page 10. Let us read the second sentence:

He was out a good deal. He stayed away for days at a time, and he was running around.

Mr. McCleave: Related to this charge.

Mr. Peters: No, Mr. Chairman, we have not reached the evidence of the detectives. We are discussing the situation as outlined in the questioning in relation to the evidence that the husband was not a good husband. I think this should be clearly pointed out to the committee, because there seems to be some misunderstanding. We are speaking of the marriage in the period from 1945 to the spring of 1957. The question was asked:

Q. When did you and your husband stop living together as man and wife?
A. In the spring of 1957.
Q. Would you explain to the committee exactly what was the trouble between you and your husband?

We are discussing that stage at which we are often assured by the questioner in the other house that some attempt has been made at a reconciliation, or that a reconciliation may be possible. It is true that what took place afterwards as contained in the evidence could be a reason for the wife to be peeved about the whole situation, and the evidence does perhaps indicate grounds for adultery to be assumed. But hon. members may agree with me that provided these other matters could be cleared up, in this case it would only mean the wife overlooking this voyage into a second state of matrimony for it to be possible, if other things were satisfactory at home, for them to forgive and forget. I am not saying the people concerned want to, or that they would, or that they could, but in most cases we have an assurance that there was some indication they attempted to do so.

I point out that this was in 1957, and that the offence which is alleged to have occurred did not take place until February, 1959. Thus we are speaking of that period of two years when in my opinion a reconciliation might have been attempted with satisfactory results.

Mr. Golding went on to discuss the case as it affects the children, and the record appears as follows:

Q. What would be your situation if you should have a divorce? Will your husband continue to pay for the support of the children?
A. I think so.
Q. Your situation will not be different to what it is now?
A. I work and look after my children.
Q. But so far as the children are concerned your situation will not be different to what it is now if he continues to pay?

[Mr. McCleave.]

A. It will be better. I would have peace of mind then.
Q. Yes. But so far as the children are concerned, they will be looked after?
A. Oh yes.

At this juncture I should have liked Senator Golding to have asked whether there had been a settlement in the superior court of Quebec awarding alimony or directing the support of the children. The answers which he received to the questions he did ask seem to me to hinge on a number of unknowns, and I do not think we should make too many inferences when we are handling cases of this nature. In this case we have to infer that the situation as outlined to Senator Golding is, in fact, the position. It remains that we must carry some responsibility for it.

Mr. McCleave: I must rise on a point of order. It has been the ruling of the Chair from time to time in these debates that the question of the children is not a subject for debate here. There may be one or two conspicuous exceptions, but most of us know that there are laws in the province of Quebec, that the province has a civil code and other laws which most adequately look after the rights of the children. I do not see why we should bring into this debate the subject of provincial courts and what they have been doing. The law is there, the legislature passed it, and we should concern ourselves with our own affairs.

The Deputy Chairman: The Chair has made that ruling several times, and I am sure the hon. member for Timiskaming will adhere to it. Discussion of the subject of the children cannot be allowed.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, on the point of order I did not discuss the children nor was it my intention to do so. I was discussing the report the senator had received. I am suggesting that he could have been more definite in his questioning. I will abide by your ruling and not discuss the children. I am interested in what the senator found out. I continue:

Q. Your children are going to school, I presume?
A. Yes.
By Senator Lambert:
Q. How old is the oldest?
A. Eleven.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I cannot allow any further discussion regarding the children at all. It is the right of the committee of the other place to ask such questions but they may not be discussed in this committee.

Mr. Peters: Very well, Mr. Chairman. I continue:

By Senator Farquhar:
Q. Are you working now?
A. I have been working up until two weeks ago.

By Mr. Leithman:

Q. Would you condone your husband's conduct, would you take him back?
A. Never, no.

By The Chairman (Senator Roebuck):

Q. Have you forgiven him?
A. No.
Q. You say you have no personal knowledge of the adultery alleged with—. Did you do anything to bring it about—did you countenance it in any way?
A. No.
Q. It seems too bad to break the marriage at this late date. You say you have not lived together since 1957?
A. Yes, that is right, in the spring.
Q. Before that were you living as man and wife in the normal way?
A. Well, it was not a normal home life, no.

Mr. Broome: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, I do not think that under our rules any hon. member is allowed to read with the extreme length and detail at which the hon. member is reading from the reports of the committee. We are supposed to be debating this bill and not reading irrelevant portions of the record of the committee. I submit he should refer to the evidence and give his own views.

The Deputy Chairman: The evidence of the committee can certainly be used in the house in any way an hon. member wishes to do so. He may read it, discuss it, or refer to it.

Mr. Broome: But, Mr. Chairman, would an hon. member be allowed to read at extreme length without any point to his reading?

The Deputy Chairman: I certainly would not want to rule under any condition that the evidence given in a committee of the other place could not be read or discussed here. I invite the hon. gentleman to remember that such a ruling would affect all private bills and not only divorce bills.

Mr. McCleave: On the point of order, should not the reading be relevant to the consideration of the committee which I think is the point that more concerns my hon. friend? We have had a discussion of the children, reconciliation procedures and other matters which do not seem very germane to an act for the relief of this particular woman. That is the point of order I raise.

My friend the hon. member for Timiskaming as a substitution for debate has read most of the evidence on pages 9, 10 and 11 of the report but this does not strictly concern itself with the substance of the bill that is before the committee this afternoon.

The Deputy Chairman: Anything in the evidence which refers to the bill may, of course, be referred to and read. The Chair has already ruled that the hon. member cannot discuss the children and he appears to understand that ruling. I hope that straightens away the matter.

Mr. Peters: I continue:

Q. It seems too bad to break the marriage at this late date. You say you have not lived together since 1957?
A. Yes, that is right, in the spring.

I fail to see how we can draw any inference that this was a particularly late date. To paraphrase from memory the treatise by Power, he points out there is an objection to granting a divorce after a long period of time, a period of undue delay. The alleged incident took place in 1959 and the petition was brought forward almost immediately which does not constitute undue delay any more than does the fact that the parties had not lived together for a period of two years.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Broome: Now the other shift takes over. We are not going to help this hon. member. He will have to talk the whole 30 minutes.

Mr. Howard: That is how little my hon. friend knows about time because it is now 23 minutes to six and I could not speak for 30 minutes.

Mr. Crouse: Every moment seems like an hour when you are speaking.

Mr. Howard: That may be so but I suspect there will be more occasions in the future that will seem like an hour to the hon. gentleman opposite.

Mr. Bigg: Cheer up. It will be your last session here.

Mr. Howard: I am having difficulty getting started but with perseverance I will make it.

Mr. Bigg: The hon. member does not really care.

Mr. Howard: I see that the hon. member for Halifax has taken up a different station in the chamber which will make it easier for us to hear his questions and easier for him to hear our comments about these cases and I hope will allow us to deal with them with greater dispatch. When he sat in his former place on this side of the chamber we always considered he was on our side and by crossing the floor I hope it does not mean he is now on the other side.

There are some matters here which are not a rehash as was suggested but which require consideration. Exhibit No. 2 is a photograph of the respondent taken in 1945 as pointed out on page 9 of the evidence by the petitioner in response to questioning by the clerk of the committee. One adduces from other portions of the evidence that the respondent was 24 or 25 years old when it was taken. In February, 1959 when the adultery is alleged to have taken place he would have been about 39 or 40. Approximately 15 years elapsed between the time of the taking of the photograph and its use for identification purposes in this case. I have not seen the photograph or the respondent and do not know if it is a good likeness that would enable a complete stranger to identify him.

This is not a good practice. Photographs that are 15 years old should not be used because a person's features change considerably between the ages of 25 and 40. Frequently there is a considerable loss of hair or other significant change in the physiognomy. I am not making a great issue of it here but the committee of the other place should inquire into whether or not it is possible with assurance to identify a person on the basis of an old photograph.

Mr. McCleave: We know we are not supposed to make reflections on the conduct of the members of the other place. There is evidence at the bottom of page 11 and the top of page 12 that the respondent admitted the picture was his. Why we bring in those general, abstract, abstruse theories or objections, when the evidence is straightforward, I do not know. For the life of me I cannot see the point of my hon. friend's argument.

Mr. Howard: When it comes to the adultery part of the evidence given by the investigators in so far as their discovery of the situation in which the adultery took place, I would point out that perhaps in this case there is not that kind of evidence which is normally given in other cases. You will recall, Mr. Chairman, that normally reference is given by the investigators to the number of beds which are in a bedroom. If it is a double bed they make particular reference to the fact that there are two pillows in the bed, each of which has been used; the pillows are indented to indicate someone has been sleeping there, and things of that nature. That is normally the kind of evidence given by the investigators and other witnesses in other cases. Throughout the evidence given by Mr. Etheridge and Mr. Brault I can find no reference to their going into the bedroom in this particular place, except they say there was one. Let me read from the evidence of Mr. Etheridge at page 11. After they had gone into this particular address he said:

> We entered the house after Mr.—opened the door. He admitted he was—and that exhibit 2 was a picture of himself.

I say to the hon. member for Halifax I would have got around to clearing up the point that he had in mind eventually, anyway. Then, the witness continued:

> It was a house which was a two-section cottage, and we stepped into the living room, and on the right-hand side past the living room was the bedroom.

Then he answers an inquiry from Senator Roebuck:

> Q. Was there only one bedroom.
> A. Only one bedroom.

Then he refers to other parts of the house, which I intend to come back to in a moment and make some other comment. That is the sum and substance of the reference to the particular bedroom. There is no indication whether there were twin beds, bunk beds, a couch or any other type of sleeping accommodation. I point out that this is a variation from the evidence given normally in this type of case.

Perhaps the question posed by the hon. member for Halifax when the hon. member for Timiskaming was speaking on this matter can be referred to. If I can paraphrase his question correctly, if not he will correct me I am sure, he asked whether or not this divorce should be granted on the ground that it was a common law relationship. I submit this is precisely what has occurred and that this is perhaps what has led the members of the other place to recommend that this bill be proceeded with.

They have recommended that the bill be proceeded with on the basis that adultery was proved by this common law arrangement between the respondent and the corespondent and that this was admitted in the presence of Mr. Etheridge and Mr. Brault and that they gave evidence to this effect. I submit that this is the basis or the reasoning of the committee of the other place in recommending that this divorce be granted on the grounds of adultery, even though it is not adultery in fact that is necessary as evidence, the only evidence that would normally lead one to believe that it could take place. This does not come within that sort of necessary test, because you can assume all sorts of things.

The fact that they were living together as man and wife and had been living together as man and wife ever since May, 1957, as was given in evidence by Mr. Etheridge of what he was told by the respondent, is the basis upon which this divorce was recommended by the committee of the other place to the other place, and I am sure it is the evidence which the committee of this house and the house itself later on will consider as the predominant factor in granting or not granting the divorce.

Mr. Aiken: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Howard: Certainly.

Mr. Aiken: Would the hon. member not agree that a continuing common law relationship would be a much better type of evidence on which to base a divorce action than a single instance about which there has been some complaint in the past few weeks?

Mr. Howard: I do not know whether my hon. friend is talking about court proceedings or proceedings before the houses of parliament.

Mr. Aiken: I am not referring to either in particular; I think the evidence is the same. What I am asking is, is it not more acceptable evidence of adultery if a continued cohabitation over a period of time is proved, because a single instance, which the hon. member has been complaining about, is much less potent?

Mr. Howard: I gather now what my hon. friend is getting at? I am not in a position to answer about the basis of a case in a court of law, because I am not that familiar with what is acceptable and what is not; but this is the point I am trying to get at. Our normal practice is to say that there were reasonable grounds to assume that adultery took place. The investigators take all steps necessary to try to prove that by making reference to the clothing and to pillows being indented and so on.

In this case there is no reference to that. This is what the divorce in this instance is being granted on, and frankly I think the question asked by my friend is a good one and this is what I am trying to get at. There is some reason to accept the circumstances in this case as being grounds for a divorce. We hear of someone knocking on a hotel room door, or a motel door. Normally, we have that motel type of case, which in many cases is arranged beforehand and everyone knows what is going to happen. In this instance we have far more reason to accept the grounds for granting a divorce than we have in cases of the other sort. This is the point I was trying to get at.

Mr. Aiken: In that case would my hon. friend admit that we should pass this bill and get on with another one?

Mr. Howard: With this slight exception. There are one or two other points here that make one raise some doubts as to whether it should be granted, and doubts as to the evidence itself.

My hon. friend from Halifax may laugh. I do not know whether he is laughing because he has a headache, as he had before, or at what I said about some other points here. If I make this particular one perhaps he will be able to provide the answer. I know he will be able to provide an answer, but in my mind it may not be the answer, but perhaps he can give us an assurance that there is an answer to it. It is with respect to the evidence given by Mr. Etheridge on page 11. It is the second question of Mr. Leithman. His first question was about photographs, and then he asked this question:

> Q. Have you had occasion to investigate Mr.—conduct, his mode of living.
> A. That is right. You retained our services in the matter during the month of June, 1959 and as a result of our investigations on the morning of Thursday, February 5, 1959,—

This is the point that is in my mind. I can assume what has occurred but in fact I do not know because the printed evidence shows that it is June and that they were retained about four or five months after they discovered certain things.

Mr. McCleave: Does the hon. member want an answer? It was obviously June in January.

Mr. Howard: That is what I mentioned earlier. In my own mind I can come to an assumption of what it was but I do not know for sure. It may have been June, 1958 but this is not clear from the evidence. We can assume that it may be a typographical error. We can assume that when Mr. Etheridge gave his evidence he meant January when he said June. It may be that he said 1959 and meant 1958. These things we do not know.

In any event, it is a point in the evidence which is in conflict and yet we are supposed to base our reasoning upon that and come to some conclusion. Perhaps in respect of this particular case also the hon. member for Halifax might avail himself of the actual transcript of evidence taken before the committee and see whether or not it is June, 1959 or January, 1959 or June, 1958 or what is the actual date set out in the transcript of evidence because typographical errors can creep in.

This is one of the things I wanted to raise, and there is another one. I refer again to page 11, the evidence of Mr. Etheridge, and the answer to a question asked by the chairman, Senator Roebuck, as found at the bottom of the page.

> Q. Was there only one bedroom?
> A. Only one bedroom. There was an upstairs section of the house, but it had been closed off from the cold of the winter. They did not use the upstairs during the cold of the wintertime.

I do not know how Mr. Etheridge happens to know whether they did or did not use it during the cold of the winter, whether they did not use it during the summer or if they ever used it. Nevertheless he volunteers the information. He was not asked any question about it. He just comes out point blank and says of his own volition that the respondent and the corespondent did not use the upstairs during the cold of the winter, that it was closed off during that time. He points out how it was closed off. Wood was used to stop the hot air from going up into the top section.

Mr. Aiken: Perhaps we need that here.

Mr. Howard: Perhaps this may be the sort of thing we require here but I am sure my friend would not want to spoil the architecture and appearance of the chamber by doing something of that nature. In any event, if I were to continue along that line you would call me to order, Mr. Chairman. Here is an indication that Mr. Etheridge knew about this beforehand. He gave no evidence about how he came to know how they did not use the upstairs during the cold of winter or what the wood was put there for or when it was put there. He is not questioned about it. He volunteers the information very graciously and generously of his own volition. He was simply asked if there was one bedroom and he only had to answer yes or no as the case might be but he went on and pointed out that they did not use the upstairs during the cold of winter.

I think one is entitled to assume from this that Mr. Etheridge is either not disclosing the full content of the discussion he had that morning with the respondent and corespondent or he knew and had had some discussions with the people who lived in the house or had been in the house himself. Possibly in his part-time work he was hired as a carpenter to board it up for the winter so that it could not be used during that period. These are assumptions. I do not think the last one could be the case because he is fairly well taken up with his work in these cases. That was more or less a facetious comment, but apart from that how did he know that the respondent and corespondent, living together as man and wife, did not use the upstairs during the cold of winter. I think we are entitled to assume that somebody told him that, that there was some prior discussion with the respondent who had lived in the house since May of 1957 and had been there during the winter of 1957-58 and again during the winter of 1958-59. I think we can assume that some discussion took place.

Mr. Aiken: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Howard: Yes.

Mr. Aiken: Would he mind explaining what point he is making at the present moment?

Mr. Howard: I am making the point that the upstairs was boarded up and Mr. Etheridge knew about it beforehand and had had some discussions with these people. He had undoubtedly been there and made arrangements beforehand. There is another case which supports that view. Just after the June in January or June in February mix-up Mr. Etheridge had this to say, which shows either careful planning beforehand or pure coincidence:

> —at 1.15 in the morning I drove up to where Mr.—was living at—on my way home—

Just coincidently he happens to be driving by on his way home at 1.15 in the morning. He then says that later at 7.15 that morning he met Mr. Brault on the particular street in question. One would assume that he had not staked out the place as private eyes are prone to do and watched it day after day. One would assume that in this instance he knew what was going to occur. One would assume that he also knew about the upstairs being closed off in the wintertime. If we are going to accept the fact that there is a common law arrangement, and that is what the Senate has done, then I think we should not clutter it up with evidence of this nature to try to prove that very vague point about adultery. I am sure that what has happened in this case is that some discussions have taken place. I am sure that Mr. Etheridge knew beforehand about the closing off of the upstairs to keep the cold out in the winter or the hot air downstairs because there had been prior discussions, and the reason there were prior discussions was that Mr. Etheridge, being familiar with the process of parliament granting a divorce and knowing from past experience what he would have to prove before parliament, made this arrangement—

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. McCleave: Nonsense, nonsense, nonsense.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, in view of the absence of any front bench Liberal member would the leader of the house inform us what the business of the house is for Monday?

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister can tell us whether the order of business announced last night will be applicable on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday.

Mr. Churchill: I am interested to see this unusual competition on the other side of the house between the two parties. The business as announced for Monday and Tuesday will stand. On Wednesday we will continue with the Tuesday items if they are not finished.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

PRIVILEGE

MR. CHEVRIER—REFERENCE TO STATEMENT IN DEBATE BY SOLICITOR GENERAL

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. A statement made in this house by a minister of the crown with regard to a debate which took place recently, has been contradicted by the premier of a province and raises a question of privilege affecting all members of the house.

Addressing the house on April 26, 1960, the Solicitor General (Mr. Balcer) made the following statement, as reported on page 3 of the appendix to Hansard of that date:

> A few days before his death, Mr. Duplessis stated that he would be in a position to submit, in October, a positive proposition to the ministers from Ottawa. It was the Hon. Paul Sauve who submitted that positive proposition. Federal ministers discussed it with Mr. Sauve and, at the time of his tragic death, only a few details remained to be worked out, which was done during a private interview between Mr. Antonio Barrette, Mr. Sauve's successor, and the Minister of Finance, sponsor of the bill which is now before us.
> We have kept our word admirably, because Premier Barrette himself believes that this bill is consistent with the terms of Mr. Duplessis' proposal, which was submitted by Mr. Sauve, and later by Mr. Barrette himself.

According to a report in this morning's Le Devoir, the premier of Quebec, in a statement made yesterday in Joliette, spoke differently:

> There was never any question of an agreement with Ottawa, but a decision taken by an autonomous government to settle a thorny problem. Thus, by proudly expressing our will, we finally succeeded in recovering for Quebec $10 million in taxes every year, and the $25 million lying dormant in Ottawa coffers.
> We even got the federal government to admit that it will entirely vacate the field of education, thus finally winning out after years of struggle.

Under the circumstances, I think the Solicitor General owes it to himself to explain this contradiction between his own statement in the house and that which was made yesterday in Joliette by the premier of Quebec.

Mr. Pigeon: There you go. Petty politics. Petty politics.

(Text):

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it must be quite obvious that there is no question of privilege whatever involved here. The hon. member for Laurier has chosen this vehicle, in the absence of the Solicitor General (Mr. Balcer), to raise a question on a measure that is now before the house and on which debate will be resumed tomorrow afternoon. It must be perfectly obvious to my hon. friend, as it will be to other hon. members who are acquainted with the rules of the house, that this matter is not a question of privilege, and that the hon. member had no right to raise it in the way he has.

MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS

Ninth report of standing committee on miscellaneous private bills—Mr. McCleave.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DISARMAMENT—REPORT ON ISTANBUL MEETINGS OF WESTERN FOREIGN MINISTERS AND NATO COUNCIL

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thought it might be helpful if I were to make a brief report to the house concerning my visit to Istanbul. As hon. members are probably aware there were two meetings held there, one a week ago yesterday.

The first was a meeting of the foreign ministers representing the five western countries which are members of the ten-nation disarmament committee. The purpose of this first meeting was to prepare advice for the three western heads of government who are to participate in the summit meetings commencing on May 16 in so far as the question of disarmament is concerned; also to consider what progress had been made in the disarmament committee itself and what suggestions should be made to the negotiators acting on behalf of the five western powers, and finally to prepare a report on disarmament to the NATO council which was to meet during the succeeding three days.

We took General Burns with us to Istanbul because, of course, our main interest there was the question of disarmament, and as you know he is heading the Canadian delegation on this important work. The progress that has been made to date by the disarmament committee has not been very satisfactory. The Canadian government is anxious that there should be a great deal more done when the committee resumes its sittings early next month.

At this first meeting I urged upon the other four western foreign ministers that everything possible must be done to get these negotiations moving; that it was very important to demonstrate to the five eastern nations on this ten-member committee and also to all other nations of the world that the west is very serious in its attempt to bring about a disarmament agreement.

We made several suggestions which perhaps would be of interest to the house. One was that the summit meeting should give direction to the ten-member committee, that instead of discussing further the general issues they should commence to discuss specific measures of disarmament. Mind you, that would mean that these directions would come from President Eisenhower, Prime Minister Macmillan, President de Gaulle and Premier Khrushchev. We had in mind that a joint declaration or recommendation, whatever you wish to call it, should be made to the disarmament negotiators.

Also we suggested that an attempt might very well be made to work out package deals; that is, take one measure of disarmament in which the west was interested and one of equivalent importance in which the east was interested and try to make a package deal with regard to these two particular aspects of disarmament. For example, the west might offer to negotiate a controlled limitation on force levels and related conventional armaments if the Soviet side would agree to negotiate on the nuclear disarmament measures in stages one and two of the western plan.

We believe this is a practical way to get things moving, and if package deals of that kind could be made in several instances the first thing we would know there would be a worth-while disarmament agreement.

Then we also suggested that when the disarmament committee meets again there should be certain informal off the record meetings of the negotiators. To date they have been having formal meetings, records are kept, and then after a matter of a few weeks the whole record is published, which means, as I am sure all parliamentarians will understand, that there is a great deal of talking for the record. We think it would be very useful if the negotiators could get into a huddle from time to time and really try to work out something among themselves. We do not say there should be no more formal meetings, but we think a mixture of formal and informal meetings would be very beneficial. We hope there will be recommendations of this kind made by the summit to the 10-member committee.

Our suggestions were received very well by the other western foreign ministers and also, when the NATO council met, they were favourably received in the deliberations of that council.

Then a word or two with regard to the NATO council meeting. It was concerned primarily with preparations for the summit. Most of the time was spent in discussing what the three western heads of government should propose at the summit meeting. There had been three working groups set up; one on disarmament, of which of course Canada was a member; another on Germany and Berlin, of which Germany was a member in addition to the United Kingdom, the United States and France; and also one on east-west relations, which was composed of representatives of the United Kingdom, the United States and France and also one representative from the NATO council.

The council endorsed the report which the disarmament working group had submitted and affirmed it in the following words:

> The alliance shares the aim of general and complete disarmament to be achieved by stages under effective international control, and supports the proposals of the western negotiators at Geneva to this end.

The council also made reference to the importance of tying in the United Nations with the work of this disarmament committee. The council asserted their view that these proposals provided the best means of carrying out the United Nations resolutions of November 20, 1959, and also regretted the unwillingness which the Soviet side had shown to discuss specific practical measures of disarmament.

Canada throughout has been very insistent that the United Nations should be kept in this picture. We regard ourselves as speaking on that committee for the various middle and smaller powers who are members of the United Nations, and as this world body has the final responsibility for disarmament we think it is of the greatest importance that it should be kept right in the picture. The secretary general of the United Nations, Mr. Hammarskjold, spoke to the disarmament committee at the last meeting they held, I believe, before recessing at the end of April.

On the question of Germany and Berlin there was a general endorsation of the approach which the three plan to use at the summit, and general agreement that it should be left to the discretion of the three how best to present the western position in the light of developments at the summit. The NATO council reaffirmed publicly its view that the solution of the problem of Germany can only be found in reunification on the basis of self-determination, recalled its declaration of December 16, 1958, and once again expressed its determination to protect the freedom of the people of West Berlin.

The third broad group of subjects dealt with was east-west relations. This, of course, covers quite a wide area, including exchanges of contacts in cultural and information fields and the possibility of discussing trade, aid and other economic questions with the Soviet at the summit. There was also discussion of the concept of detente, which has become such a popular word—meaning a relaxation of tension, I think—and also the question of peaceful co-existence. The conclusions reached included these, that the NATO members desire a true international detente, by which they mean peaceful co-operation among all states, not merely an absence of hostilities. Then they added a condition. A condition of detente is that it must be applicable to all areas of the world, that peaceful co-existence is unsatisfactory if under its cover the Soviet union continues to engage in propaganda attacks on individual members. There would appear to be a detente in so far as Canada is concerned and the United Kingdom, the United States, France and so on, but evidently the situation is a little different in the case of West Germany and Greece, for example. They are being subjected to propaganda and pressures of various kinds, and the council did decide that a detente should be indivisible; in other words, it should apply to all the nations.

Canada supported the idea that the west should go to the summit prepared to discuss in general terms with the Soviet union problems of trade. We also expressed in the NATO council an interest in having a general discussion at the summit on the problem of limiting the traffic in arms through international reporting arrangements which would apply to both the importing and the exporting countries. In other words, a country which is exporting arms would list the exports with some international agency, and so would the receiving country. This work could perhaps be done by the international disarmament organization which has been proposed by the west, should there be agreement to set up such an organization.

In addition, at the conference there were several very interesting individual statements relating to developments in particular areas, but these are not of a nature which I could properly disclose to the house.

Istanbul Meetings on Disarmament

Just before we left Istanbul and later in London we had word of the incident involving the shooting down of a United States plane. The Canadian government regards this as a very serious incident, and we think it points up very clearly the vital need for a disarmament agreement. If incidents of this kind are to keep occurring, one of these days such an incident might trigger a nuclear war. We think it shows very clearly the need for both sides, the west and the east, to reach an agreement on disarmament.

Mind you, we believe in disarmament under control. An incident like this would not happen if there were a proper inspection system. I remind the hon. members that from time to time the present government has taken the stand that Canada would open her skies to inspection if the Soviet would do the same thing in an equivalent area on the other side of the Arctic. I have, for example—I will not repeat the statements that have been made on this subject by the Prime Minister—a letter the Prime Minister wrote Premier Khrushchev on May 9, 1958 which reads as follows:

> If you are really anxious about developments in the Arctic and if you wish to eliminate the possibility of surprise attack across the polar regions, I find it hard to understand why you should cast aside a proposal designed to increase mutual security in that area.

The suggestion had been made earlier by Canada and rejected.

> Let me repeat here, Mr. Chairman, that we stand by our offer to make available for international inspection or control any part of our territory, in exchange for a comparable concession on your part. I would hope that you would accept some arrangement along these lines not only as an indication of our good faith but as part of a first, experimental step in building a system of international safeguards against surprise attack. When there is, by your own admission, a danger of nuclear war breaking out by accident or miscalculation, it is difficult for Canadians to comprehend your refusal to engage even in technical discussions intended to explore the feasibility of an international system of control.

I am sure all members of the house will agree with the position of the government, which is that Canada will do everything she possibly can to bring about disarmament under proper controls and with a system of inspection.

I think too that this incident, in addition to showing the need for a disarmament agreement, indicates the importance of the summit meeting which is to be held on May 16. There has been some suggestion in the press that perhaps now there would not be any summit meeting. I submit that it is all the more important now that this has happened that the summit meeting should go ahead. Mind you, it is not going to be any easier because of the increase in tension caused by this incident, but we hope there will be no suggestion whatever that the summit meeting should be cancelled. We think there is even a bigger job to be done by these four heads of government at the summit meeting which is due to commence just a week from today.

I must ask the forgiveness of the house, Mr. Speaker, for trespassing on its time in this way, but finally I should like to make it quite clear that the Canadian government was not aware of these activities, and evidently the United States government was not very much aware of them either. I have here a statement which was issued by the state department of the United States on May 7, and it contains this sentence:

> As a result of the inquiry ordered by the President, it has been established that in so far as the authorities in Washington are concerned, there was no authorization for any such flight as described by Mr. Khrushchev.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure the house will join with me in expressing the hope that now that both sides have seen just how serious incidents of this kind can be and just how little it might take to bring a world disaster, the nations of both sides will get down to business and really try to work out an agreement on disarmament.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, as the first one to comment on the statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green), I am sure I may express to the minister, on behalf of all of us in the house our pleasure at seeing him back in his seat looking fit and vigorous after his arduous assignment.

This is another chapter in a series of undoubtedly important visits for which the minister has made preparations. The one in Turkey is now shortly to be followed by a visit to South America. While the meetings in Istanbul were simultaneous and parallel with the commonwealth prime ministers' conference, one might have thought that before returning to Canada the minister would have gone to that conference and participated in the deliberations during the course of this week. The precedent for such participation at a commonwealth prime ministers' meeting was established at the last two prime ministers' meetings when the former secretary of state for external affairs accompanied the Canadian prime minister.

The minister has said that at the ten power disarmament discussion about which he has given a report not much progress was made in the matter of disarmament, as noted by those at the conference.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, if I may just correct that, I was referring to the meetings of the disarmament committee in Geneva which had taken place earlier.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes; that is why I added the words "as noted by the conference". The minister was obviously less optimistic today in discussing disarmament than he was earlier this session. Then he thought there were very good reasons for thinking that success would result from the ten-power discussions. It may be that the minister now recognizes more and more that disarmament is unfortunately to a very large degree dependent on the solution of major political problems which confront the nations of the world, pre-eminent among those, of course, being the question of Germany. But the minister did say that it was agreed that something must be done, and we note with satisfaction the suggestions made as to what should be done at the summit meetings.

Mr. Speaker, we were already aware that the minister had taken the position at the conference that disarmament discussions might be furthered if there was less emphasis on general concepts than on proposals with regard to specific plans for disarmament. The suggestion of a package deal, of course, is not new, but it is worth trying again. We in this party share the desire and the hope that the minister's tempered optimism this time may be justified.

The minister has reported on the desirability of some informal meetings at the ten-power disarmament talks. That has always been the view of those of us in this party. The minister might have gone further and proposed that Canada take the initiative at the ten-power meetings and suggest bilateral talks on an informal basis, particularly between the United States and the Soviet union, for reasons which I am sure the minister will recognize as obvious, and this without in any way affecting the position or the prestige of the other two great powers.

The minister did not say whether at the NATO meeting, there was adequate discussion of the question of consultation, a matter that has interested this house in regard to defence matters before us this session, and also one that arises out of the very problem which the minister mentioned at the last, involving the shooting down on May 1 of a United States plane some 1,500 miles within the territory of the Soviet union.

The minister said nothing about the announcement yesterday, which undoubtedly must have come to the attention of the NATO meeting, of the intention of the government of the United States to carry on certain underground nuclear tests.

Mr. Green: May I point out that this statement was made after the NATO meeting. We did not know about it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Now the minister answers my observation by saying that this declaration of yesterday by the President had not been brought to the attention of the conference as a whole; but that only points up the importance of more adequate consultation. It is difficult to conceive how the United States can be charged with having satisfactorily discharged her responsibilities in the matter of consultation if that matter was not brought by her to the attention of her NATO partners at the meeting in Istanbul.

We note with satisfaction the observation made the minister—

Mr. Green: May I point out to the hon. member that the question of nuclear tests is being considered not by the NATO council but by the conference of the three nuclear powers. They are dealing with the question of a nuclear test ban.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister will understand, I am sure, that this elementary fact will be widely appreciated by all members of this house; but it is also closely related to the matter of disarmament. I find it difficult to understand how we can say we are fully consulted about matters having to do directly or indirectly with disarmament if such a fact was not brought to the attention of all the NATO partners.

I was about to say that we concur in the support the minister has given to the observations made by the secretary general of the United Nations, particularly having in mind that his observations had to do with the place of a United Nations police force in the enforcement of a partial or comprehensive system of disarmament.

The minister said nothing about participation by China in a disarmament agreement. This is a matter which has been discussed at the prime ministers' meeting, and it must have been touched upon at the meeting of the NATO council.

The minister did not say anything about whether the United States had given evidence of its desire to give more vigorous support to article II of the North Atlantic treaty. When the question of freer trade and trade on a basis calculated to promote peace was being discussed in the council meeting, one would have expected that Canada would put forward her traditional view that one of the best ways of making NATO an effective instrument of collective action would be by recognizing the importance of economic as well as political co-operation.

Finally, on the matter of the incident of May 1, the shooting down of a United States plane by the Soviet union, there will be questions by some of us in this party on orders of the day, which we feel would be the most appropriate place to elicit further information. But we all agree with the minister that this is a matter that has engaged the concern and touched the imagination of most people in this country during the past few days. We can only hope that the timing of the incident as well as the incident itself will not in any way prejudice the very important talks which are going to take place within a few days among the four great powers.

I sincerely support the observation of the minister that if the open skies proposal had been accepted by the Soviet union this sort of incident would have become unnecessary. The minister referred to statements by the Prime Minister which relate to the application of the principle of open skies in the Arctic. I would remind the minister of the position taken by his predecessor and the former government in 1955, when they supported a proposal by President Eisenhower that there should be reciprocity of aerial inspection of military establishments both in the United States and the Soviet union. If that proposal had been accepted, international confidence would have been created and incidents of this kind would have been minimized. However, the Soviet union refused to accept the American proposal.

As I mentioned a moment ago, we shall have some questions to ask on the orders of the day. I do want to assure the minister once again that in these matters, despite areas of disagreement and emphasis, there is strong support in this parliament for the objectives which the hon. gentleman has in mind. We feel, however, that with regard to the question of disarmament upon which the hon. gentleman places such importance, and rightly so, there has not yet been produced—and I think the minister will not mind my saying so—either by himself or by the government, any evidence of the kind of constructive intervention that Canada could make in a matter of this great importance. It seems to us that this is not only an occasion when we should have support and unity among like minded nations; it is also an occasion when this country, exercising, as the minister earlier told us, its right of independent thought and action in the field of foreign affairs, should give more adequate evidence of having done so.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): The members of this group are delighted to see the minister returned in good health and spirits. We had some fears for him, in view of the fact that for many years he had not wandered very far from his own doorstep, and particularly in view of the fact that a number of papers and persons in various parts of Canada have wondered if the minister would suffer from sea sickness, air sickness or home sickness. We see, however, that he travels well, and before pursuing the brief remarks I intend to make I want to compliment the hon. gentleman on the fact that his short European experience is also causing him to become quite a linguist.

I shall comment only very briefly on the minister's most interesting statement. I notice he said the progress to date in the disarmament committee was not very satisfactory, and we note his suggestion recommending that the summit meeting give directions to discuss specific issues. We think there is some validity in that suggestion, and also in the suggestion that there might be a package deal—I think the hon. gentleman later said a practical deal.

We were interested to note the suggestion that off the record discussions might take place. We are of the opinion that results of some usefulness might be obtained from that type of discussion, where people are not talking for the record. Even in this house members are tempted on occasion to speak for the record, for the press though, I might add, very seldom in this corner of the chamber.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Herridge: I do want to say, with reference to the disarmament committee and the minister's recommendation that the activities of that committee should be related more directly to the United Nations, that we are all in support of that suggestion. In connection with the minister's remarks in general to that effect we simply say that this group supports any honest effort to promote disarmament in the world at this time.

Now I wish to say a word or two about the other matters. As to the German question, I do not intend to deal with that matter on this occasion, because this group holds very strong and definite views with regard to that very important subject which we shall air at the proper time which, I judge, will be when the estimates of the minister's department come before us.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

With respect to what the minister termed the incident over the Soviet union, I think that was something of an understatement; I would have said "the tragic incident over the Soviet union" in these particular circumstances. The members of this group have no hesitation in saying that we think this was a stupid action on the part of the military authorities of the United States, and one which indicates a complete lack of a sense of responsibility toward its other partners in the western world. In our opinion it was an irresponsible action which was most unfortunate at this time, and we trust that the minister and the government will protest it in the strongest terms to the government of the United States, and indicate to that government the state of public opinion in Canada on this question at the present time.

I am glad to note that the minister still expresses his hope for results from and strong support for a summit conference.

I would say also, with respect to the announcement that the United States intends to resume underground tests of atomic explosions, that the policy of this party is to work for a discontinuance of nuclear tests of all kinds. The minister has frequently advocated both in this house and in statements before the external affairs committee, a similar policy. We are of the opinion that this great blunder on the part of the United States military authorities should strengthen the determination both of the minister and of the government in the days ahead to pursue unrelentingly a constructive but Canadian foreign policy.

UNITED NATIONS

UNRWA—GIFT OF FLOUR FOR PALESTINE REFUGEES

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I have a short statement to make about Canadian assistance to the United Nations relief and works agency for Palestine refugees.

In response to an appeal by the director of UNRWA, the government has decided to make a grant of $1.5 million worth of Canadian flour to the agency to assist it in providing adequate supplies of food to the Palestine refugees being cared for in various Middle Eastern countries. The number of these refugees is now about 900,000. This gift is in addition to Canada's annual cash contribution to UNRWA of $500,000.

In addition to the direct contribution this grant of flour will make to UNRWA's food supplies, it is hoped that by releasing agency funds which otherwise would have been spent on food this grant will enable UNRWA to proceed with worth-while rehabilitation projects it has undertaken to improve the economic welfare of these refugees.

It is expected that this flour will be shipped in the near future. Provision will be made to finance this grant out of the 1960-61 supplementary estimates for the Department of External Affairs.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PLANE FLIGHTS OVER FOREIGN TERRITORY—KNOWLEDGE BY CANADIAN OR NATO AUTHORITIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In the light of the admission made by the United States that an American aircraft shot down by the Russians was on an information-gathering reconnaissance flight, can the Secretary of State for External Affairs or the Minister of National Defence state whether Soviet planes have been flying over the Canadian Arctic or other parts of Canada for the same purpose during the last two years?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there has been no identification of Soviet planes flying over Canada. Mind you, there have been unidentified planes on occasion, but none were identified as Soviet planes.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs or the Minister of National Defence. Can the minister say whether this regrettable flight of a United States plane over Soviet territory was made with the knowledge or authority of NATO or the NATO commander?

Mr. Green: Well, Mr. Speaker, I cannot speak for NATO, but I would be fairly certain that the answer is no.

Mr. Argue: A supplementary question. Did Canada itself or any minister of the Canadian government realize that such flights were being made over Soviet territory? I should like to ask a second question at this time. Is the Canadian government prepared to protest to the United States the making of this flight and request that no further flights be made in future?

Mr. Green: We were unaware of flights of this kind being made. I think the United States government is very well aware of the feeling not only in Canada but also in various other parts of the world with regard to these activities.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker—

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Essex East.

Mr. Argue: —a further supplementary question, if I may—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have already recognized the hon. member for Essex East.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs a question arising out of the last part of his answer. Since this incident was first made known to it has the Canadian government taken any steps whatsoever to inform the government of the United States of Canada's concern about this matter?

Mr. Green: There have been discussions at the official level, Mr. Speaker, but no formal protest has been made.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): So there will be no misunderstanding as to the nature of the reply, may I ask the minister whether he is satisfied beyond any doubt that the government of the United States is now aware of Canada's concern in this matter?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any doubt of that. As I pointed out in making my statement earlier, it is quite evident that the government of the United States itself was not aware of these flights.

[Later:]

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the statement he made a moment ago to the effect that the President of the United States was not aware of these flights, has the minister any comment to make on the newspaper report that the president had seen pictures taken on these flights on more than one occasion?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member would have to relate his question to the responsibility of the Canadian administration, and he does not seem to me to have done so,

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, in the light of answers to these questions may I direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and ask him if he can say what effect these disclosures will have upon the Canadian proposals for disarmament at the summit meetings. He has replied in part to this, and perhaps he may want to add something. I should also like him to answer this question. Would he comment on the statement made by President Eisenhower that he will propose the scrapping of military secrecy at the conference?

[Mr. Argue.]

Mr. Green: No, Mr. Speaker, I would not care to comment on that statement. I did point out in my earlier remarks that we believe it is all the more important, now that this has happened, that there should be a determined attempt to reach some agreement on disarmament.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

BOMARC MISSILE—BOSTON MEETING OF CANADIAN-U.S. PARLIAMENTARY GROUPS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Has the minister seen reports of the Canada-United States meetings in Boston, in which it was stated that cuts by congress in spending on the Bomarc missile illustrate the need for the United States to remember the impact of its decisions in Canada? Would the minister comment on this conclusion and on the corollary which followed, that there should be more opportunities for frank exchanges of opinion on common problems?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for sending me notice of his question. I had read the report appearing in this morning's Montreal Gazette. I would say, as I have said before, that there has been and continues to be close co-operation and consultation both at the administrative and at the military level between Canada and the United States in all matters pertaining to the air defence of this continent. This has involved very close exchanges of opinion on all common problems.

Of course, in so far as the recent recommendations of the House of Representatives and the appropriations committee with regard to the United States defence budget are concerned, no prior information was received by the Canadian government as to what those recommendations would be. All we have received is the printed report issued subsequent to the evidence which was given, the report containing the evidence before the committee. There has been no consultation, and no information has passed between that committee and the Canadian government.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. What was the status of this parliamentary delegation which issued the statement referred to by the hon. member for Laurier?

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Speaker, I believe it was an unofficial exchange and meeting of members of the Canadian parliament and representatives from the United States.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, could the Minister of National Defence explain to the house how it was that on that committee there happened to be only members of the Conservative party?

Mr. Pearkes: I have no idea, Mr. Speaker. I thought this was the meeting which was held during the Easter recess.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, it was held within the last few days.

Mr. Pearkes: Well, I did not appoint them.

Mr. Fulton: The Conservative members have the initiative to do it.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): May I point out Mr. Speaker, that any representatives at this meeting were in no sense official delegates from the Canadian government. We cannot stop half a dozen hon. members from going down and holding talks with people in the United States.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Is the minister aware that United States newspapers carried articles saying that trade, the Bomarc and other questions were discussed, and that the parliamentary delegation from Canada was led by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Jung)?

Mr. Speaker: Order. A clear answer has already been given, which would indicate that the exchange visit which was mentioned was not in any sense official and on that account it removes it, it seems to me, from the responsibility of the minister.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence arising out of his answer to a previous question. I believe that my question is in order because it does deal with the responsibility of the government. I understand that the hon. members attending the meeting referred to travelled in a government plane. Is that correct?

Mr. Pearkes: Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

Mr. Douglas Jung (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege arising out of the questions asked by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) and the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith). First may I say, as the nominal head of the group who went on a visit to Boston over the week end, that an invitation was extended to a representative of the Liberal party to accompany it. The invitation was accepted. However, owing to unforeseen circumstances the representative of the Liberal party declined at the last moment, and there was not time to approach another person.

In reply to the question raised by the hon. member for Ottawa West, I am surprised that the question of transportation came up at all. Certainly, in no report in the press that I have seen has there been any intimation that we travelled by government transportation. Every person paid his own way down. This visit was motivated by a genuine and sincere desire on the part of Canadians who wanted to do their bit in bettering Canadian-United States relations.

Mr. McIlraith: I should like to thank the hon. member for Vancouver Centre for clarifying this matter. My question arose directly out of the answer given by the Minister of National Defence. I thought it highly desirable that it be clarified, and I thank the hon. member for Vancouver Centre for having done so.

Mr. Ricard: We are used to that kind of speech.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. McIlraith: Apparently some hon. members on the government side were unable to hear the Minister of National Defence. Perhaps they can read his answer in Hansard.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Government members are very sensitive.

FISHERIES

DOGFISH—REQUEST FOR ANNOUNCEMENT OF KILLING PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and ask whether the minister can inform the house when it is intended to start this year's dogfish killing program.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. As the hon. member knows, various dogfish killing programs have been tried and none have been entirely satisfactory. The 1959-60 program was not accepted by those engaged in the fishing industry to as great an extent as we had hoped, with the result that only about 40 per cent of the money voted by parliament for that purpose last year has been taken up.

For some time now study has been given to a further modification of this plan to make it more effective. I cannot say at the moment when further action will be taken, until a more practical program is fully evolved.

Inquiries of the Ministry

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REPORTED REDUCTION OF FUND THROUGH FRAUD

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Has the minister seen the statement made by his parliamentary secretary in a Montreal speech as reported by the Ottawa Journal, in which it is said charges were made that the unemployment insurance fund was being drastically reduced by fraud and "we know fraud exists. To deny its existence would be utter nonsense." Has the minister any comment to make on this statement, and will a thorough and complete investigation of this charge of fraud be instituted at once?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): There have been continuous instances of fraud in unemployment insurance as it pertains to claims for benefits, practically throughout the existence of the Unemployment Insurance Act. Charges of fraud have been laid and, of course, there is quite an effort made to recoup the moneys that have been overpaid. I imagine that charges of fraud will continue to be laid. We keep a watchful eye to see that we catch those who fraudulently accept unemployment insurance benefits.

Mr. Chevrier: Has the minister any doubt about the validity of the figures of live claims for unemployment insurance benefits as given here in the house from time to time? In view of the statement made in the speech in Montreal, has the minister any doubt about the figures?

Mr. Ricard: No relation whatsoever.

Mr. Starr: I do not understand the question. Is it whether it is a correct figure that I am giving to the house from time to time. Is that what the hon. member means?

Mr. Chevrier: Perhaps, in order to make the question more clear, I should preface it with what was said, as reported again in the Ottawa Journal.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member probably goes too far in quoting. His question is perfectly intelligible. If he would repeat it perhaps the minister would understand it. I think he did not hear it.

Mr. Chevrier: The purpose of the question was to ask the minister whether he had any doubt about the validity of those figures which he himself gives from time to time—I think it is at the end of each month—in answer to questions put by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin).

[Mr. MacLean (Queens).]

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, the figures I give in response to questions asked are those supplied to me by the unemployment insurance commission.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): May I ask the minister a supplementary question. It has to do with his statement in relation to fraud with regard to unemployment insurance benefits. Will the minister say to what extent fraud has existed, since this appears to leave some cloud over some people receiving unemployment insurance? Can the minister say to what extent, if any, this has to do with the major reduction in the amount of money in the unemployment insurance fund?

Mr. Starr: If the hon. member will put this question on the order paper I shall be glad to get the unemployment insurance commission to give that information.

Mr. Argue: Would the minister care to tell the house whether instances of fraud have had anything to do with the tremendous reduction in the amount of money in the fund? I do not think the minister should leave the impression that fraud is widespread and deleting the fund.

Mr. Ricard: You are the one leaving that impression.

Mr. Starr: I do not know how the hon. member got the impression that the reason for the depletion in the fund has been fraud; it is probably one of the things—

Mr. Argue: Your parliamentary secretary said so.

Mr. Starr: No, Mr. Speaker. It is one of the things that does have some bearing, and it has been going on and will continue to go on. Therefore if we catch it we shall try to recoup the moneys overpaid.

[Later:]

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): I have a supplementary question I wish to ask the Minister of Labour. It has to do with the subject matter of the previous questions put to him. I hold in my hand a press clipping, the heading of which reads:

Frauds Threatening Jobless Insurance.

This is the heading over the speech made by the minister's parliamentary secretary on this subject. My question is this. In view of the charges made by the parliamentary secretary—

Mr. Ricard: There were no charges made.

Mr. McIlraith: —has the minister ordered an investigation into this matter?

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I think if I read the sentence from the text of what was said by my parliamentary secretary to the unemployment advisory committee at Montreal on May 5, 1960 it may help. These are the words:

Before doing so, however, may I say that in comparison with the total volume of cases, fraud is almost negligible.

Mr. McIlraith: I have a further supplementary question. I should like to ask the minister what meaning he attaches to these words uttered by his parliamentary secretary, or at least attributed to him:

We know that fraud exists. To deny its existence would be utter nonsense.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

ROYAL WEDDING—STATEMENT ON USE OF JET PLANES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. A. Lambert (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday, May 5 the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres (Mr. Cardin) asked the Minister of National Revenue whether the C.B.C. proposed to send planes to bring pictures of H. R. H. Princess Margaret's wedding back to Canada, and how much it would cost.

The answer is that I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation that they did not send planes to bring back pictures of Princess Margaret's wedding. Arrangements were made, with the co-operation of the Royal Air Force, whereby the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation television material would be flown to Canada and the costs shared by others whose material would also be carried in the planes. It is estimated that the total cost to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation will be somewhat less than $30,000.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE FAIR

REQUEST FOR REPORT BY POSTMASTER GENERAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Postmaster General? Has the Postmaster General any report to make to parliament in connection with his trip to Paris, made for the purpose of obtaining the world fair in Montreal, which was lost by a very narrow margin?

Mr. Murphy: Why were you not here last week?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Questions were asked along that line, Mr. Speaker, and answers were given by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) last Thursday and Friday, which dealt with the matter.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Does the Postmaster General think, as a result of his experience at this conference, that it would be in the interest of world peace to have the minister attend the summit conference?

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

INQUIRY AS TO INVESTIGATION INTO PROPOSED BANK MERGER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. It will be very brief, as is my practice. Does the minister consider that the proposed amalgamation of the Toronto-Dominion Bank and the Bank of Nova Scotia violates the terms of the Combines Investigation Act? In view of the continuing amalgamation of private banks in Canada, is the minister concerned about the possible development of a private banking monopoly in Canada?

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure that the hon. member's question is one that comes under the purview of the Department of Justice. If he wants to ask whether an investigation is being made he may do so, but to ask the minister for an expression of opinion in the way he has seems to be quite out of order.

Mr. Herridge: Supplementary to what I have already said, is an investigation going on in the direction I have mentioned?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): No, Mr. Speaker, there is not. In any event bank mergers, if any should come about, do not come within the anti-combines legislation. Any such amalgamation would be regulated by the Bank Act, under which they are examined by the Minister of Finance and the governor in council. I make my answer, however, on this basis, wishing to make it clear that I have no knowledge of any such proposed merger or amalgamation.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

UNEMPLOYMENT—SUGGESTED INVESTIGATION BY JOINT COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, in view of reports of what is likely to happen in another place I should like to ask the Minister of Labour if he would consult with his colleagues to see whether it might be possible to have a joint committee of the two houses of parliament set up to investigate the problem of unemployment, so that the representatives of the people could have some part in that investigation.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I was not aware that any committee had been set up in the other place to investigate the problem of unemployment.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question of the Acting Prime Minister. Is it not a fact that the government spokesman in the other place has received authority from the cabinet to initiate a committee for the purpose of discussing unemployment in the other place, when that very privilege has been denied the members of this house?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The first part of the question is in order.

Mr. Chevrier: Who is going to answer?

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member could show that a committee has been set up in the other place to deal with unemployment, I think he could then properly ask questions with respect to this matter today.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is the Minister of Labour not aware that notice has been given by the government leader in the other place that he will move tomorrow for the establishment of such a committee?

Mr. Starr: If the hon. member for Essex East will read the motion under which the committee is to be set up in the other place he will not find the word "unemployment" in that motion at all.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Oh, weasel words of the government.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Essex East has now said "weasel words of the government". I say to him that the word "unemployment" is not in any motion to set up such a committee.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will the Minister of Labour deny that if the word "unemployment" is not there words of similar meaning—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have been following this discussion, and it seems to me that the only part of it that is relevant, and that is of doubtful relevancy, is that part asking the government whether it would consider joining in an inquiry. I say that is of doubtful propriety for two reasons. First, it seems to be rather hypothetical and, second, it seems to be asking the government for a declaration on a matter of policy. In so far as proceedings in the other place are concerned, questions of that nature are out of order.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, if I cannot ask a question I am sure you will agree that I may rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Not to demonstrate what the motion is in the other place. I think that would be quite out of order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I not raise a question of privilege?

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member has a question of privilege he is always at liberty to raise it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I will state my question of privilege and Your Honour, with wise judgment, will decide.

Mr. Speaker: I have asked the hon. member to state his question of privilege.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I was about to do that, but before doing so I wanted to pay a deserved tribute to Your Honour.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Stop clowning.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My question of privilege is this. Having been denied in this house the opportunity of participating in a committee to study unemployment, have my privileges as a member not been violated by according that opportunity to members of the other place, particularly when I as a member of the house along with other members can be said to represent the people of this country more directly?

Mr. Speaker: This house can only deal with the privileges within its own walls, and if we become involved in matters having to do with the other place it seems to me we are out of order.

Mr. Murphy: He will never be there.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is that a prayer?

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT—REQUEST FOR POSTPONEMENT OF CONSIDERATION OF AMENDMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce in his capacity as house leader. I base my question upon the indication he gave on May 5 as to the business of the house for the present week. He indicated that on Wednesday we would consider the Combines Investigation Act amendments. In view of the fact that we have just received the printed amendments today, I would ask the minister to consider postponing their consideration until some time in the future in order that we may have an opportunity to give these amendments further study.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I announced the business of the house for Wednesday on May 6.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, on May 5 the minister indicated that Wednesday would be devoted to studying the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code.

Mr. Chevrier: Look at the order of business given on the next day.

PUBLIC SERVICE

OTTAWA—REPORTED INTENTION TO CHARGE PARKING FEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. T. Richard (Ottawa East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works. Will he confirm or deny the report in the Ottawa Citizen of today that it is the intention of the government to charge a parking fee to civil servants who park their automobiles on the grounds of the government of Canada?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I have not read the article in the Ottawa Citizen of today, and am therefore unable to make any comment on it.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER GREATER DISPATCH OF BUSINESS

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (for the Prime Minister) moved:

That a select committee, to be designated, be appointed to consider with Mr. Speaker the procedure of this house for the purpose of suggesting any changes that may be desirable to assure the more expeditious dispatch of public business, with power to send for persons and papers, and to report from time to time its findings and recommendations to the house.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the rules of this house are one of the most important elements in the functioning of our parliamentary institutions. There are some who treat rules and regard for rules with a measure of impatience, but I think all hon. members will realize how vital are the rules of the house.

The aim of the rules must be to govern our procedures and methods in the house and to assure the orderly, efficient, fair and expeditious dispatch of the public business. Therefore there is a need, from time to time, to examine the rules and determine whether they are best serving these purposes. The business of the house does undergo change, and sometimes these changes in the business that comes before the house do call for changes in the procedures of the house.

The house, over the years, has been faced with an increasing variety and scope in the business that comes before it to be transacted. There is the problem also of the lengthening of the sessions. Those hon. members who sat in this house in the long sessions of 1955 and 1956, and who attended the double sessions we had in some of the earlier years, will not need to be reminded of the way in which the business of the house has been lengthening the average session. I think all hon. members are aware also, Mr. Speaker, of the fact that the world's judgment of parliamentary institutions in the commonwealth and in the western world can no longer be taken for granted as a favourable verdict. We are judged, in all the parliaments of the commonwealth and the west, by the way we transact the public business as well as by the decisions which are reached and the courses of action upon which we decide.

Five years have passed, Mr. Speaker, since the last revision of the rules of the house was carried out. Prior to that the last previous one was in 1927, and it was not as extensive as the revision of 1955. Actually the committee which tendered its final report in 1955 had sat through six sessions of parliament. This committee study arose, in the first instance, as the result of an amendment introduced by the opposition on June 12, 1951 to a government motion resolving that the house go into committee of supply. It was one of those very rare occasions in this house upon which the government has accepted an opposition amendment to a government supply motion.

The committee was appointed on June 15, 1951. The proceedings and the terms of reference may be found in Votes and Proceedings of that year at page 505. The motion was introduced by the then prime minister, Mr. St. Laurent, and it is probably an interesting reflection on the rate of political mortality in this house that of that original committee appointed on June 15, 1951, my colleague the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Brooks) and I are the only surviving members in this house. Later the personnel of the committee was enlarged, and in 1955 when it brought in its final report among the members who then constituted the committee and who are still members here are the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson), the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) and four members on this side of the house who are now ministers.

There had been earlier reports from the committee and decisions taken in the light of its recommendations to alter the rules of the house. As the result of one of those recommendations the hours of sitting were changed, the hour of sitting in the afternoon being advanced from 3 p.m. to 2.30 p.m. and the hour of daily adjournment being advanced from 11 p.m. to 10 p.m. As the result of a later decision, the Friday evening session was eliminated and a Friday morning session introduced.

The terms of reference of the committee now proposed under this motion are precisely the same as those under which the earlier committee to which I have referred operated and introduced its final report in 1955. Indeed, from the beginning, in 1951, the committee's attention was directed by the house in these words, "to assure the more expeditious dispatch of public business". The interpretation given to those words in the committee year after year, I may say, was broad enough to include improvements that might be judged desirable by other standards as well. The final report of the committee was introduced in June, 1955, and that report may be found at page 705 of Votes and Proceedings for June 14, 1955. It was a very extensive report, occupying some 66 pages of Votes and Proceedings.

The report of the committee was unanimous, although it was quite clear that unanimity was reached only as the result of compromise and some of the members of the committee, myself included, indicated that some elements of the report could only be supported by reason of accepting the report as a whole, on balance. The debate on that report began on July 1, 1955, and the report was finally concurred in on July 12, 1955.

Out of that extensive revision of the rules came some major changes. One calls to mind some of them, Mr. Speaker. First, there was the introduction of the limit on the debate on the speech from the throne, limiting that debate to 10 days in all with morning sessions. The second was the limitation of the debate on the budget to eight days; the third was the limitation of the number of supply motions to six, with a total of 12 days devoted to them; another was a reduction from 40 minutes to 30 minutes in the time accorded any hon. member when speaking in committee. A new procedure was also introduced in respect of the tabling of documents in the house.

Let me say just briefly, Mr. Speaker, that while in every case it might have appeared to some hon. members that the changes had the effect of introducing a curtailment, in some degree or other, of the rights of hon. members to engage in discussion or in otherwise unlimited discussion, I doubt very much if any hon. members today, after the experience we have had in working under these rules for the last five years, would ever wish to go back to the old rules or to repeal any of those changes that were introduced in 1955.

I am sure hon. members are aware that the mere revision of the rules of the house will not bring to perfection the proceedings of this house. There is the old and continuing problem of the enforcement of the rules. A former clerk of this house, Dr. Beauchesne, once said that if the rules of the house were enforced there would be no need whatever for revision at any time. He was referring particularly to the reading of speeches in the house which, of course, is prohibited by a rule which has been very difficult to enforce. Another of the rules is the one forbidding repetition in debate. There are other factors that must enter into the discharge of public business, such as the observance of the rules; the number of political parties represented in the house; the extent of the co-operation that exists in the transaction of the business, and so on. In addition there are such matters as the use of the committees of the house to transact as much of the business as can usefully and properly be transacted in committees without occupying the time of all hon. members. I think it may be said that committees of the house are being used today to the greatest extent in the history of this house. This leads to a more thorough review of the business of the house referred to such committees. There are some hon. members who will not be so certain that the time of the house has been thereby economized. Similarly, by giving more advance notice of the business of the house a contribution has been made toward expediting that business.

One other matter that was mentioned in earlier debates was the contribution to the expedition of the business of the house that ensues from carrying on debates so far as possible on a continuous, uninterrupted basis.

In connection with this proposed new study of the rules by a committee of the house, suggestions have been made from time to time as to various improvements which might be made in the house. The suggestions, indeed, are numerous and varied. It will be for the committee to study and assess them as it may see fit. There is, of course, Mr. Speaker, the matter of the rule respecting closure. I trust that the committee will be prepared to examine and report to the house on that rule.

Suggestions have been made from time to time about the method by which we vote in the house. One hon. member suggested in an entitled to comment on it, has confirmed in to the introduction of mechanical devices such as have been employed in the House of the People in India.

Suggestions have been made that there are more supply motions provided for than are necessary. Some quarrel has been taken with the fact that on three of the Mondays precedence is given to private bills over private members' resolutions. Suggestions have been made from time to time about arriving at limited debates by agreement.

These are but a few of the suggestions which have been made from time to time and which I am sure the committee will think it profitable to study and report upon.

May I offer the view that the committee, if the house sees fit to set it up, may well study the means of improving the efficiency of our methods in the house and the dispatch of the public business in the most expeditious manner possible without the sacrifice of the essential rights of members. In this task I think the new committee may enjoy an advantage that was not enjoyed by the committee which sat from 1951 to 1955. At that time all of the members on the government side had had no experience in opposition, and all of the members on the opposition side had had, I think, no experience in government. That situation has been changed since and I think that those or some of those on the committee who are appointed from the government side of the house will have had experience on both sides of the house; and it may be expected now that those, or at least some of those who are appointed from the opposition side will have had experience on both sides of the house. This may well influence the views of members of this committee on some of the questions which come before it.

The committee will have the advantage of having as its—I do not say chairman, but as its, shall I say, moderator—the Speaker of the house. This is a committee that is appointed to assist Mr. Speaker in this study, and the benefit of his experience and his observations will be available to the committee as well as his opinion as moderator of meetings.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a question? I believe in the previous committee Mr. Speaker was made chairman of the committee. Is the government going to make a similar recommendation to this committee?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, your predecessor was not appointed chairman of the committee. The committee recognized that it was appointed by the house to assist Mr. Speaker. Mr. Speaker of course presided, but I do not think the designation "chairman of the committee" is a proper one to apply to the Speaker. He presided at the meetings of the committee; the house designated the committee for the purpose of assisting Mr. Speaker.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, may I say that in the light of the length of time which was devoted to the study of the rules by the previous committee, I do not think the house will expect the committee to come forward with a final report at this session. If that should be the case, I am sure the house will be pleased to set up the committee again at the next following session to continue its work. The appointment at the present session, however, will at least launch the committee and enable it to carry forward its work. If the committee should see fit to make recommendations about changing the rules at this session, that matter will have to be considered however the report is received.

I am sure it will be the wish of this house to demonstrate, not only to the people of this country but to others elsewhere who may be interested in watching the course of parliamentary government, that this parliament, the offspring of an ancient institution, retains all the virility and vigour required to enable it to undertake and to make such adaptations as may be required in the proceedings of this house to increase its efficiency, its decorum and its dispatch of the public business.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all hon. members will welcome the action being taken by the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Fleming) in moving to set up this committee for the purpose of considering with Mr. Speaker the procedure of the house for the purpose of suggesting any changes that may be desirable to assure the more expeditious dispatch of public business.

I was happy to note that in his remarks the Acting Prime Minister made it clear that he viewed those words as having the same meaning which was given to them by a previous committee of a previous parliament dealing with this subject. I take it that by his remarks he means he views the work of the committee as that of suggesting improvements in the procedures in the House of Commons. With that we all concur.

I also noticed with interest his reference in the earlier part of his remarks to the world's judgment of parliamentary systems. Any experience I have had in parliamentary matters over the years, and I think I am entitled to comment on it, has confirmed in me the very strong conviction that of the competing systems of government throughout the world the one system that offers to all human beings in any given country the best guarantee of the protection of their individual human rights and liberties, and the best method of guaranteeing those rights and liberties and evolving them into a working system regulating their day to day lives in political matters, is the parliamentary system. We are fortunate enough to have inherited that system.

Bearing in mind the tremendous increase, of necessity, in governmental activities—that is, governmental activities in all manner and types of relationships to the individual citizen of the country—it is well that we examine periodically our procedure to make sure that the machinery through which the elected representatives of the citizens operate is working efficiently and that it gives full opportunity to those elected representatives to well conduct the country's business.

I take it that this is not a party matter; at least, I so view it. I view it as something pertaining to the rights of all members of the House of Commons; that is, all members regardless of where their responsibilities may lie, whether as members of the government, whether as government supporters, whether as members of the opposition. It seems to me that the whole basis of our system lies in the guarantee that the individual member, no matter what may be his particular responsibility, has his rights assured so that he may make a government answerable for its action —I shall have something to say on that later in my remarks—or that he may voice a grievance or assert his views as to the wisdom or otherwise of a particular policy. It is the guaranteeing of those rights which is important and, having guaranteed those rights, so organizing and so arranging matters as to make efficient use of the time available in any given parliament.

There is one subject upon which I owe it to myself to express a view. I was somewhat surprised to hear the hon. gentleman refer to the subject of closure. Closure became the subject of political debate on the hustings, and I think all members will agree that the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) made a definite commitment on the question of the closure rule, indicating that the government would deal with it. The hon. minister's remarks today gave an impression which I hope he did not quite intend. That commitment, to which I have referred, having been given by the Prime Minister, I hope it is not the intention to place it on the shoulders of a committee charged with advising Mr. Speaker. A stand has been taken on this subject and I think the minister will understand my suggestion that, after reflection, he might take a somewhat different attitude. I should hate to see the work of the committee impeded by having to deal with this controversial subject, taken from the shoulders of the Prime Minister and the government of the day where the Prime Minister has placed it by his own actions, having made his representation with regard thereto to the people of this country. I think it is very important that the position of Mr. Speaker, be preserved at all times, and that there should be no question about a burden of this kind being placed on his shoulders. So I hope the Acting Prime Minister will understand my remarks—

Mr. Churchill: You mean the former acting prime minister.

Mr. McIlraith: The former acting prime minister? I am not out of date, because the government did not announce the change. Then I hope the former acting prime minister, who also proved his great ability in an acting capacity in another field, will not misunderstand my remarks on this point, but that note will be taken of them.

With regard to improvements in the procedures of the House of Commons, although we note the hon. gentleman's reference to a quotation from a former illustrious clerk of this place to the effect that there was no need to amend the rules, we must bear in mind that members of the House of Commons are human beings and, as such, have human frailties. This being so, it is necessary from time to time to examine the rules in order to see if they should not be amended. As a matter of fact I, for one, am quite content with the fact that members of the House of Commons have human failings. I think that is a fortunate thing, and I should hate to see any other concept of society being asserted in this country.

An interesting question arises when we come to consider the procedures of the House of Commons. There is, of course, that part of our procedure which relates to the government itself, and which is not governed by the rules. Considerable responsibility lies on the government of the day with regard to bringing forward public business in an orderly way so as to permit the fullest discussion and the fullest assessment of the opinion of the house with regard to it. As an example of what I have in mind, it is interesting to note that we are today discussing this motion to set up a committee on the seventy sixth day of the session. On the last occasion when a subject of this kind was under consideration the debate on the motion to set up a committee was brought forward on the seventh day of the sitting of the house.

This raises the whole question of the timing of the bringing forward of public business for decision by the house. This can only in a very limited way be determined by the rules. All hon. members would probably agree that it is not desirable that a government be unduly restricted by the rules as to the time at which matters are brought forward for debate and discussion; on the other hand, it is highly desirable for the efficient functioning of the House of Commons that the government should exercise great wisdom in the timing of bringing forward items of public business. I am never quite sure whether the leader of the house requires other attributes as well as wisdom as a qualification for that office. Sometimes I think he should be possessed of intuition as well as wisdom. However, this is not intended as a criticism of the government of the day as far as the bringing forward of matters for consideration by this house is concerned. I wish, rather, to point out that this most important part of our daily procedure is not governed to any substantial extent by the rules.

Along with our consideration of this question there is another matter that might be mentioned, namely the whole question of a period of time which ought to elapse between the first reading of a government bill and its coming forward for second reading. It seems to me that a reasonable period of time should elapse between first and second readings of a government bill. For some time I have felt that insufficient attention has been paid to this small, but important, detail, and that the time of parliament could be saved, and a better—a more efficient—debate could take place if a proper period of time were to elapse. I believe that in earlier times, in another of the parliaments about which we have heard so much, there was a requirement of a 10-day delay. That protection has been removed, I believe, though I have not had an opportunity to verify the fact in preparing for this debate.

Then there is the whole question of committees. I have been very much concerned with what I consider to be the substantial damage being done to the procedure in the House of Commons because of the inordinately large number of committees now sitting. I doubt if the government itself realizes —because government members are not usually members of committees—the number of committees which are sitting and the frequency of those sittings. I wish to develop this subject today, because I hope the government will look into the matter.

Mr. Pallett: I wonder if the hon. member will permit a question. When he said "government members" did he mean that in a narrow sense?

Mr. McIlraith: I meant "members of the government".

Mr. Argue: He meant it in the correct sense.

Mr. Pallett: "Narrow" is the word.

Mr. McIlraith: No. I am sorry.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the hon. member for Peel consider himself a member of the government?

Mr. Pallett: A supporter.

Mr. McIlraith: We now have a sharply increased number of committees sitting. I have not attempted to work out a tabulation but it would seem that we have about twice the number currently sitting that ever sat in any parliament since confederation. Although the government leader suggested bringing the business to a conclusion the other day we have not even at this time set up all the committees for which notice has been given on the order paper or indicated in the throne speech.

That brings me to this point. The practice in former days when there were very few committees was to have large committees. We now have some dozen or so standing committees as well as many special committees. I should like to place on the record the number of members on these standing committees. The committee on privileges and elections consists of 29 members; the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraphs, 60 members; the miscellaneous private bills committee, 50 members; the committee on banking and commerce, 50 members; the public accounts committee, 50 members; the committee on agriculture and colonization, 60 members; the committee on standing orders, 20 members; the committee on marine and fisheries, 35 members; the committee on mines, forests and waters, 35 members; the industrial relations committee, 35 members; the committee on debates, 12 members; the committee on external affairs, 35 members; the joint committee on printing consists of 23 members of the House of Commons and the joint committee on the library of parliament consists of 21 members of the House of Commons. In addition there are a great number of special and select committees having in each case a very large personnel.

This has brought about a gradual change over the years that has been sharply accentuated in the last two or three years. The large number of members on each committee means that each member of the House of Commons is on a great number of committees. The committees of necessity must meet concurrently. The result is that we have developed the practice over the last decade or so of having what one hon. member aptly described as a group of nomadic members moving from committee to committee, spending a few minutes at each committee sitting or indeed not attending committee sittings at all or not attending the meeting of a particular committee for days on end.

That is not an efficient way of doing committee work. I would hope that examination would be given to the question of the size of committees and the time of setting them up. The time of setting them up is not governed by the rules but is controlled by the government. The number of members, however, would be a matter for changes in the rules. Those changes could be made if my view is shared by other hon. members who may think it desirable although I recognize that some hon. gentlemen may have sharply differing views. I merely seek to indicate the present difficulty which in my opinion, for what it is worth, the committee ought properly to examine.

There is one other significant thing. A great deal of difficulty arises from committees sitting while the house is sitting. That difficulty would disappear if the committees were smaller. Incidentally, I know one ought not to make personal references but the experience I have had in committee work over the years supports the view that smaller committees are much more effective. The problem of attendance and the problem of conflicts with sittings of the house simply disappear if it is a small committee.

I think it is a legitimate comment to say that many supporters of the government find extensive committee work rather desirable because while technically they have as full an opportunity as anyone else to participate in house debates, in practice they do not always have as full an opportunity as they might wish when debates are limited either by the rules, as with the throne and budget speech debates, or on other occasions. It is simply not mechanically possible with large majorities. Indeed, I noticed that this matter was raised in the early sittings of the earlier committee on procedure. At that time it was thought that the government of the day had a large majority but the present government has an even larger majority than when this point was raised.

If an hon. member could be on one or two committees in a parliament instead of five, six or seven as at present he would find it possible to attend the sittings of the committee and to take up the subject it is studying as his major and special activity. I have the feeling that it would enable fuller participation in the work of parliament on the part of that committee member. It would provide more effective participation and would give the hon. member an opportunity to develop as an expert on that subject because of his accumulated experience on the committee and his extensive study of the subject.

There are other matters of this nature that could be dealt with. One question that has bothered me is the period of the day in the ordinary day's sitting before orders of the day are reached. I refer to that whole period covered by the routine proceedings, the question period. It seems to me there should be examination given to a more effective use of that period. While I supported the change in the rules made in 1955 I now find in the light of experience one of the changes has represented a retrograde step although many of the changes in the rules I supported at that time have proved effective. The retrograde step to which I refer relates to questions. We now have on the question hour three types of questions, starred questions, written questions on the order paper and oral questions.

In 1955 a change was made concerning questions on the order paper. Instead of having them answered in the House of Commons, which was a very short procedure, they are not now further dealt with in the house at all but rather are answered by the appropriate minister filing with an official of the house the written answer. The appropriate official then sends notice to the person asking the question. That may be done at any time of the day. It is most unsatisfactory from the point of view of the person asking the question. In my view it is also highly unsatisfactory from the point of view of the procedure in the House of Commons and the loss of time involved. A consequence of the inefficiency of that procedure, because of what I have said and also because of the fact that the answers to questions are not printed with other similar types of information in the Hansard record but rather are printed at the end of Hansard, is that an hon. member is virtually compelled to decide whether or not he will make his question a starred question or try to frame it as an oral question. The result is a clumsy thing from the point of view of anyone referring to Hansard, a loss of time in the house itself and an unsatisfactory procedure from the point of view of the one asking the question.

I would hope that that matter could be examined. For my own part I should certainly like to see the written questions answered at the appointed time during the proceedings in the House of Commons simply by the minister indicating the number of the question if he is answering. This is a very short procedure. It would have the virtue of having the questions printed in the appropriate place in Hansard, and all of this would tend to eliminate the great number of starred questions which require an oral answer, sometimes quite lengthy. It would obviate the necessity of them, and it would also obviate the necessity for asking some of the oral questions on the orders of the day.

There are other matters which require attention. Probably there should be some examination of the reason for and an explanation required when an order of this house is not, for one reason or another—sometimes a very good reason—presented to the house within a required limit of time. There are some very bad examples of delay. For some of them there are reasonable explanations. In others, it is not so clear; there is no explanation. But, in any event, these are lesser problems which may require to be looked at. It seems to me they require the attention of the committee.

There is a rather interesting thing about this committee. It will have the benefit of the excellent work by the earlier committee on this subject; it will have the advantage referred to by the former acting prime minister of the day, if I may use an apparent contradiction in terms, and there is also the very good report from the select committee on procedure in the United Kingdom, ordered to be printed February 15, 1959. There is all that great fund of material available.

There is one other matter of which we should take some cognizance. When the changes were made in 1955 concerning the matter of the motion to go into supply it was decided that a vote would be required at a point of time on the evening of the second day. After that period and up until ten o'clock there is an opportunity for any member of the House of Commons to express a grievance against the government of the day. I think that that procedure might be looked at because, with the wider activity of government in an ever widening field—and that process has been continuing for many years and I expect it will continue as time goes on—it is desirable that some clear opportunity be given a private member to assert a grievance against the government; also that the appropriate minister concerned be given a designated opportunity to reply. As the procedure now stands, if there is an amendment to the amendment of the motion to go into supply, the amendment to the amendment, under the rules, is put at 8.15 on Tuesday evening. It is voted on; then the bells are again rung, requiring the usual lapse of time before the vote on the amendment itself is taken.

It is a small thing, but the extra 15 minutes or 20 minutes there could be very useful and better used in the interests of parliament, in the interests of governing the affairs of the country, by a private member asserting a grievance with correspondingly an appropriate amount of time given to a minister. It may be necessary or desirable, Mr. Speaker, to strengthen this right of members to assert grievances, in view of the changed procedure and the limitation of the time taken for the supply motion, but also in delimiting it to protect the government and the appropriate minister in making a reply. In other words, the former practice, prior to the change in the rules, was that a supply motion was not restricted to any given length of time. All the minister had to do was to wait and then to take as much time as he wished to reply. That was not satisfactory; but there is, however, a period of an hour and 10 minutes or an hour and 15 minutes for the whole matter of grievances. That whole subject should be looked into.

Under the old procedure there was no limit of time for a statement of grievances by members of the House of Commons and there was a tendency in deference, Mr. Speaker, may I say that this was a difficulty that I am sure all Speakers had—to have a general debate on the subject of whatever the grievance was. It is a very difficult point to determine.

There is a whole subject there because this matter of voting supply is one of the most important functions of the House of Commons. We have, I think appropriately, limited the time of the supply motions but we have not sufficiently protected the use of the remaining time for the assertion of grievances or the statement of grievances by individual members of the House of Commons.

Then, there is another thing—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member's discussion of the rules, but there is a rule which compels me to do so and to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, my knowledge of the rules is not adequate but I thought the first speaker of the official opposition on any government motion had unlimited time. I may be in error but that was my impression. Maybe it is in reply to a want of confidence motion that the first speaker has unlimited time.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No; when speaking in opposition to a government motion.

Appointment of Committee on House Rules

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I think it is in order for the House of Commons itself to deal with its procedure from time to time as laid down in the rules. Of course, this requires that a motion be passed and that Your Honour, in the words of the former acting prime minister, will act as a moderator of the committee. I think we are particularly fortunate in this parliament in being presided over by Your Honour and I feel that there is every possibility—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has raised a point of order which I think is quite correct and which I improperly interpreted. The hon. member for Ottawa West has unlimited time and I offer him the floor again if he wishes to proceed.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to prevent the house from hearing the leader of the C.C.F., but if I may be permitted to take a moment I should like to continue.

My view of the whole matter is that it is of the utmost importance, at a time in human society when there are competing systems and when our system, as was correctly stated by the minister in moving the motion, is under the test of world opinion, that we take cognizance of just what our practices and procedures are.

Without wishing to trespass on the time of the house although the rule gives me the right to do so—I will not take more than a very limited time. I want to make reference to an editorial which I read in the Ottawa Journal on May 7, 1960, not on this subject but on a related subject. I thought it was very good. It is entitled, "Bureaucracy Must Be Kept Under Constant Watch". The point of the editorial had to do with a speech delivered by Viscount Kilmuir, Britain's lord chancellor, at the University of Chicago law centre. The editorial contains this quotation from his speech:

> Governmental bureaucracy must be kept under constant watch. A large number of regulations affecting the lives and homes of citizens have poured from the government; all manner of tribunals outside the ordinary courts of law have been set up... Procedures have been devised which appear to many of us to be dangerously restrictive of the liberty of the subject.

Then the editorial goes on to say:

> Our modern economy being what it is, life now being so desperately complex, governments are compelled to delegate authority, to set up boards and commissions to do things which they themselves cannot do. But this should never be permitted to mean that the citizen is deprived of his rights, and especially of the inalienable right of his day in court.
> That is what is meant by the saying about eternal vigilance being the price of liberty. And this vigilance, it should be added, is not something to be exercised with respect to bureaucrats alone; it must be applied to cabinets as well, to cabinets whether they are Liberal, Conservative or of any party whatsoever.

The editorial was not intended to apply directly to the subject now under discussion, Mr. Speaker, but I think it does. In my opinion it is very relevant and important. The government of necessity is engaged in a great number of activities but the necessity of the government, because of the volume of public business to be brought before the House of Commons, to seek methods to expedite the business of the house should never be permitted to bring about a situation where any member of the House of Commons elected as the representative of citizens of this country is deprived of his rights and especially of his inalienable right to his day of argument on the point at issue.

The observation in the editorial that the price of the preservation of our system, with the benefits which I believe it confers on the human beings making up this country, is eternal vigilance is equally applicable. There must be eternal vigilance over the practices of parliament, over the correct procedures to apply to assure all members that their rights will be preserved, to assure the government of its right to bring forward its business and have it dealt with, to assure individual members of the opposition of their right to bring forward their grievances and to assure them of their right to make the government answerable to the elected representatives of the people.

In welcoming this motion, Mr. Speaker, I express the wish that the work of the committee may be useful in improving and strengthening our system of government.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I said a moment ago that I was quite sure that a committee working with you as moderator would have every possibility of reaching some general agreement on proposed changes in the rules. I agree with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) when he says that our type of society and our parliamentary system in the western world are on trial today and that it behooves us to do everything we can to make them efficient and, I would add, to make them operate in the interests of the ordinary citizen of this country. The rules of the House of Commons are absolutely essential to our parliamentary system of government. These rules make provision for the government to accept its responsibility as the government of the country and for the government to accept the responsibility of introducing legislation into the House of Commons, but they also give members of parliament, particularly members of the opposition, the right within the rules to speak out, to commend if desirable and to criticize at length anything that we feel is undesirable.

The basic foundation of our parliamentary procedure is set out in Beauchesne, third edition, citation No. 1. That citation reads as follows:

> The principles that lie at the basis of English parliamentary law, as Bourinot so aptly says, are: "to protect a minority and restrain the improvidence or tyranny of a majority; to secure the transaction of public business in an orderly manner; to enable every member to express his opinion within limits necessary to preserve decorum and prevent an unnecessary waste of time; to give abundant opportunity for the consideration of every measure, and to prevent any legislative action being taken upon sudden impulse." In a close contest when the house is considering a highly controversial measure, the positions of parties are equalized; the government side may rely on its majority but the opposition is strengthened by the rules of procedure which both are bound to preserve and which the Speaker must enforce.

I believe that the members of the opposition parties who comprise the minority have the right to criticize legislation at length, at great length if in their opinion they feel it desirable, but that the government and parliament itself have the right to come to decisions on various questions before the house.

As the Minister of Finance has said, a committee of the house made a report in 1955. As a matter of fact, the changes then were really the first and only substantial alteration in the rules of the house since confederation. On other occasions steps have been taken to change the rules but these steps involved particular circumstances and the changes were not widespread.

In 1912 and 1913 a filibuster occurred and there was consideration of rule changes following the filibuster. In 1927 certain reforms were instituted but again not of the widespread nature of the reforms in 1955. After changes were made in the rules of the house in 1927 we went on for a number of years before any further move was made to alter the rules. The next motion to appoint a committee was moved in May, 1940, but further action was not taken because of the special emergency war conditions at that time. In 1944 a procedural committee made certain proposals which were studied in committee of the whole but never reached the house for decision. In 1946 a similar committee was appointed. In 1947 a report was made. On January 25, 1948, the Speaker's report was tabled in the House of Commons but nothing was done to bring it into effect. As the Minister of Finance has said, we continued until 1951 when a further committee was established and as the culmination of its work over a long period of time changes in the rules were adopted in 1955.

I point this out merely to show that the rules of the Canadian House of Commons have been effective. We have been able to conduct our public business under those rules, almost without change, for a very long period of time. There were some changes in 1955, and we have been conducting our business under those rules since that date. I do not know, myself, what the government has in mind. I do not know, for example, whether or not the cabinet has come to some general understanding as to what rules it feels should be changed or even as to what the objective should be.

I am not one of those who view parliamentary proceedings, as they now are, with great impatience. I am not one of those who feel that one of the most important things is to shorten the session and get out before a certain target date, to wrap up the business so that members can proceed to some other occupation. As I see it, the work of a member of parliament is becoming more and more a fulltime occupation. While we are always open to consider proposed changes in the rules which may be of benefit, those changes should not be hastily arrived at and the objective should not be to have a parliamentary session of a particular number of days or a particular length of time. These are not the main objectives that we should be considering in discussing the procedures of this house. I am all for the expeditious conduct of the business of the House of Commons; I am in favour of that, but one should not assume that it is always the opposition that carries on a given debate for a length of time or that that is the reason a certain procedure is taking a long time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That certainly applies to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Argue: The members on the government side of the house have been trying to get into the debates in recent sessions. As a matter of fact, for the first time they have insisted on a procedure of alternate speakers from the government side of the house with a speaker from the opposition side of the house. In other days we would quite often go around the parties. If one will look over the records of the House of Commons, I am quite certain I am correct when I say that in those debates the great majority of the speakers came from the opposition side of the house. Therefore, when members of the government party wish to become active they should not become more active at one moment and then, at the next moment, hurl accusations at the opposition about delaying tactics which are preventing parliament from adjourning on their favourite target date.

There is another thing, Mr. Speaker. I am not trying to be critical of the government in this respect or of any member of the government, but I think there is a good deal of knowledge that comes with experience in connection with how the program for the House of Commons can be laid down for the efficient dispatch of the business. If the government wishes to delay the house, then I say here is the way to delay the house. They should take a controversial piece of legislation, announce it for debate one day and then postpone the debate for another week. If you could find four or five controversial pieces of legislation, you probably would not need to announce any other business because if you give 265 members a chance to consider making a speech, or making a second speech, you will get all kinds of speeches in the house.

In my opinion the only way to manage the affairs of the house and the legislation to be discussed is to take an item and stick to it until it has been concluded. Then you could go to another item of business. This hop, skip and jump method we have seen during this session, so far as the work of the house is concerned, I think has played a large part in the lack of progress, if you wish to put it that way, in this session.

Mr. Churchill: Will the hon. member permit a question? The hon. member said he was not being critical, but he is now being critical in talking about the hop, skip and jump method of dealing with legislation in the house. Would he give an example of this?

Mr. Argue: I could refer to Bill No. C-56, the tax-sharing arrangements act, which has been going and coming. My colleague mentions the trans-Canada highway bill, and that certainly has been dealt with by the hop, skip and jump method. I think if the house leader would discuss with some of us the mapping out of the business of the house it would lead to a more orderly discussion and more orderly dispatch of the business of this house.

I do not believe there is any substitute for good will and good relations. Even if you make the rules restrictive I do not think you would gain the expeditious dispatch of public business half so well as you could by discussion and by agreement amongst the parties. If we are not adult enough to make some progress by such a method, then democracy will be in a bad way. Trying to throttle—this is no reflection on anybody—the members by prospective changes in the rules will not accomplish that result.

I have said that there is one way to conduct the affairs of the house that would lead to the dispatch of business. This motion before us is an example of how not to do it, although immediately I qualify that statement by citing the reference of the Minister of Finance to the effect that in his view it was not likely the report of this committee would be adopted during this session. He said something later about an interim report, and perhaps we could act on that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not believe the hon. gentleman heard me correctly. I said it is hardly expected the committee would make a final report at this session.

Mr. Argue: I accept that as being what the minister has said. I take it, then, that certainly the final changes in the rules will not be made at this session, unless there is unanimous agreement in the committee. If there is unanimous agreement, then I would be all for making any changes, any improvements, any moment we could reach that kind of agreement.

When the committee was set up to deal with the rules during the session of 1953-54 it was established on November 27, which was the twelfth day of the 1953-54 session. On January 14, 1955, the rules committee was established and, Mr. Speaker, that was the sixth sitting day of that parliamentary session. We are dealing with the initial stages of the establishment of this committee now, and I believe this is the seventy sixth sitting day of this session. Obviously, this is not the way to bring about the establishment of probably the most important committee this session, certainly so far as the rights of parliament are concerned, namely to have the initial discussion of this motion on the seventy sixth day of the session. It was mentioned in the speech from the throne when parliament opened, and I would suggest that this debate might have taken place months ago and the committee could have been set up and have considered the vastly important work being referred to it.

We had some changes in the rules in 1955, and I think in general the changes in the rules were beneficial. But I do want to point out some of the disadvantages that I feel have resulted from those changes in the rules. We have a fixed throne speech debate of ten days. We have a fixed budget debate of eight days. This may be resulting, I am not sure, in a shorter throne speech debate and a shorter budget debate than would otherwise occur. I think probably it means a shorter throne speech debate because of the morning sittings. But what has been the result? Certainly the effect as far as the country is concerned, as reported by our friends above us here, is that the debates are dead; the debates are inconsequential; that members are just waiting and everybody is waiting till the tenth day is reached and we can get on with some real business. That is the attitude toward the budget.

I think there is a tendency when you embed a closure rule in the book or a series of closure rules—and that is what they are—to remove much of the vitality of the House of Commons. Reports go abroad, and I feel they are accurate generally, which say that when we have a fixed debate of one day on something, or two days, or ten days on the throne speech or eight days on the budget, the debates are dead, they are inconsequential, and everyone is just waiting around until the vote is called. The only thing you can draw from that is that we could have either wide open-ended debates or perhaps we could look at the length of the debate provided by the rules themselves. But I do feel that the best of parliamentary debate takes place when the members are not facing a fixed closure on the bill or the motion they are considering.

There were other changes in the rules brought about at that time, not all of which I think have been beneficial. There is one rule I would like altered. I do not put it forword as the most important rule in the book, but I think that as it used to be in the book it was better for parliament than it is today. I refer to the periods of time allowed for consideration of private and public bills. Under the old procedure, every Tuesday and every Thursday for a one-hour period the House of Commons devoted itself to discussion of private and public bills.

Mr. Broome: Would the speaker permit a question?

Mr. Argue: Yes.

Mr. Broome: How many public bills have we been able to discuss this session?

Mr. Argue: We have not discussed many public bills, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Broome: And can the speaker tell us the reason?

Mr. Argue: —but we have discussed a lot of private bills, and when hon. gentlemen opposite have made the request that we go to certain private bills having to do with companies of various kinds we have proceeded expeditiously momentarily to their discussion.

Mr. Broome: I am talking about the other private bills.

Mr. Argue: I know exactly what the hon. member is speaking about. I was saying that these two one-hour periods are devoted under the rules to discussion of private and public bills, with the exception of such allotted time during the course of the throne speech debate and the two days covered by supply motions. If instead we reverted to the old rule whereby during the speech from the throne and during debate on supply motions we had this one hour for private and public bills, I feel it would be a better use of the time of this house.

I can remember, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure many members of the Conservative party can remember, the debates we used to have on interest bills when those bills came up perhaps every other Tuesday or every other Thursday. They came up rather frequently because there were more periods of time allocated for their debate. There used to be great consideration given to those bills when they were placed on the order paper by hon. members, and I think beneficial results took place. I believe that if the bills placed on the order paper having to do with high interest rates in the country had not been placed we would not have made the advance which was made, small as it was, of exercising some greater control over the interest rates returned by small loans companies. That is a question which I hope the committee will consider when the rules are before it.

I think that in addition to considering the efficient dispatch of business itself we should consider how we can make the House of Commons more effective in dealing with public questions which are of great importance. I know there is a temptation for government members to say that the thing to do is to have an expeditious dispatch of government business, and there is an inclination perhaps on the part of members of the opposition to discuss at great length the questions which members of the opposition think are important and are burning political questions.

I would like to see consideration given by this committee to the question of what changes there might be in the rules so that parliament, the government and members of the Conservative party, along with members of the opposition parties, might consider some of the basic, fundamental economic issues which face the people of this country in such a way as to bring about improvements in legislation. I think the committee should have a greater opportunity to make recommendations to the government. If anything, I think perhaps there has been some improvement in this regard from this government as compared to the former government.

I am not trying to make the point that things are getting worse, but I think it is a ridiculous procedure for a committee of this house to consider at great length burning questions and then, after their consideration, to proceed in camera and have the chairman of the committee get up and say "Well now, this is the report", which I suggest he obviously has had written by the cabinet minister involved or it has been written in the cabinet minister's office.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Oh no.

Mr. Argue: Oh, the Minister of Finance has never heard of this of course, and the majority members nod to each other.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, both the hon. member and I have heard of it before, but I can assure him it is not done now.

Mr. Green: We are too busy to spend our time doing that.

Mr. Argue: I do not know, Mr. Speaker. I guess some of the members on the government side get their knowledge by a system of osmosis, because whether it is done in the cabinet or not they seem to have a very good idea of how to keep the government off the hook and not embarrass any hon. members.

What I am hoping can be done is that some greater leniency be given as far as committees are concerned and as far as recommendations are concerned. I do not want to adopt the United States system, I am not advocating that; but I do think that committees under our procedure could be strengthened. I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that we consider the possibility of making provision within the rules for the continuation of committees of the house which are considering important public business so they can meet between sessions. I think it would be of advantage to the country to have such committees dealing with urgent public questions and making recommendations on which the government might be prepared to act. If the government would take the position that it desires to strengthen the work of committees and make it possible for them to report to the house in such a way that approved legislation will result it will help the Canadian government and give opposition members on such committees some satisfaction in having played a part. If anything it will strengthen the political position of the government. I think our main consideration should not be a party question at all but merely a question of finding ways and means by which we can best deal with the great public issues of the day.

The Minister of Finance mentioned the question of closure on which the government's position is clear. In the election campaign the government took the position that the rule of closure should be abolished.

I hope the government will come forward with that decision. I hope closure will be abolished because I do not think it is good or necessary. I have not changed my view about closure. I hope that when the government is talking about closure it will not be inclined to place further refinements about the closure rule in the book of rules governing the procedure of this house.

A moment ago when discussing the question of private and public bills I was asked some questions. I feel that private divorce bills should not occupy the time of hon. members of this house. I do not think it is fair to parliament or to the people involved that they should be forced to come to parliament and follow this clumsy procedure to obtain what is called relief. I would hope this committee could consider ways and means of solving this problem in a way that will create no ill will or opposition in the provinces affected but by general agreement will see if some procedure can be adopted to remove the obstacles and difficulties of the present procedure. I hope this can be done without offending the susceptibilities of the people of Quebec or Newfoundland which we all respect. It could accomplish a very important goal, namely of getting these bills out of the House of Commons and into a court in the city of Ottawa or it could bring about some further refinement of the rules governing this question even within parliament itself so that the House of Commons might not have to deal with this difficult subject.

When the committee is set up I expect to have the honour of serving on it. I am hopeful that the rules can be considered in such a way as to bring about a more expeditious dispatch of public business. I can tell the Minister of Finance I will endeavour from this side of the house to be as vocal and aggressive in the protection of the rights of hon. members of the opposition and of the house as I am sure he and the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Green) would be if they had remained on this side of the house.

As I said in opening my remarks, in my view the government has the right and the responsibility to introduce legislation. Hon. members of the house have the right to speak on this legislation. The government has the right to expect that parliament in its own good time will come to conclusions on legislation. It is the fundamental right of hon. members of this house to speak out and if necessary to do so at length in opposing and criticizing government legislation. This right must be maintained. If it should disappear then parliament itself as an institution will disappear.

I would imagine that people in other systems of government looking at our parliamentary system would say it is cumbersome and inefficient but nevertheless it has served our nation well. I am in favour of rules that would expedite business but would oppose any rule which I feel may damage our basic democratic system and bring about streamlining at the expense of the fundamental rights on which our parliamentary form of government has been established.

We hope the committee will have successful deliberations and proceed on the basis of the procedure of the committee of 1955. In pointing out the method by which that committee proceeded I think I can do no better than to quote a paragraph from the remarks made by the then hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, Mr. Stanley Knowles, who participating in this debate on July 1, as reported at page 5568 of Hansard, said:

> Incidentally I might point out that the report being brought in in this way meets a basic condition which we have laid down every time the motion has been made for the setting up of a committee on procedure. We contended every time that the rules of parliament belonged to parliament as a whole and that they should not be changed simply by the government using its majority to put through such changes as might be convenient for the government. We took the position, not that all changes had to be unanimous but that they should be by general agreement. These proposed changes are by general agreement so far as the committee is concerned and so far as the four parties of this house are concerned. I think we can compliment ourselves as a House of Commons on the job that we have done in connection with this matter.

I would hope that the present committee instead of counting the members on the committee when proposed changes are to be made to the rules and saying, "The majority have voted a certain way," will say, "It is much preferable to have general agreement among all parties as to how our House of Commons procedure may be improved."

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I shall not detain the house many minutes. I do not propose to make detailed suggestions as to changes in the rules, but there are two or three general observations I should like to make.

First of all, I should like to endorse what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) said in introducing this legislation about the great importance of it. I remember very well the labour that the minister himself put into the proceedings of the last committee, he and and the others concerned. I often think that the rules of debate which grew out of the wisdom of our ancestors and more lately of ourselves are in many ways quite remarkable. For example it is always remarkable to me to think that one man can stand up and stop this whole assembly from acting if it departs in any way from the rules.

What I chiefly want to bring to the attention of the house is that I think we ought to remind ourselves that all is not going well with democracy in the world. In support of that statement I want to read a sentence or two from a speech recently made by Mr. Adlai Stevenson. This came to me as a great surprise as perhaps it will to other hon. members. I was simply amazed at this statement. I confess I had the feeling that democracy was so obviously the wisest form of government that it was going to sweep over the world. I think that when we go back to the nineteenth century we can see that this was the feeling in Great Britain. The British went about the world trying to give to other people what they thought was the greatest thing in the world, political democracy. We know that they thought that it would sweep the world, but we also know what has happened since. This is what Mr. Adlai Stevenson said:

> No wonder great political, social and scientific revolutions are sweeping the world and that instead of seeing the world grow democratic we have seen 11 countries, I think it is, turn to other forms of government in the last few years. Democracy is not winning in the world. It is losing.

I take it that Mr. Stevenson who is a responsible man was careful as to the accuracy of what he was saying. Indeed, we do not need to go to Mr. Stevenson to find discontent with our parliamentary system. I find not infrequently in this house people who are bored to death with the proceedings here. I went home to Toronto on the train recently with a new member. I remember a phrase he used. He said, "I cannot stand this. How much longer is it going to go on? When are we going to start doing business? When will we begin to take action and stop all this talk?"

I will not philosophize about that but will simply say there are two kinds of government in the world. One is government by persuasion and the other is government by force. We all know what government by force is and we could use ugly words about it but it will suffice for my purpose to say that it includes the ultimate sanction, namely murder. On the other hand, government by persuasion does take time. It means that the rights of the minority must be respected. It means that every man must have his say and no other man is able to crack down on him and say, "You are talking foolishly," or "You are talking too long and you have to stop." Every man in a democracy is entitled to be as foolish as he wants to be within his time.

I think it is of great importance that this subject should attract more attention in this house. I remember reading again and again in the careers of successful parliamentarians that one of the things they did when they came to parliament was to acquaint themselves with the rules of the house. I must say I did not do so and it is one of the things I deeply regret. I simply wanted to make that point and say how tremendously important I feel this is.

I am not going to attempt to make detailed suggestions. I thought that both the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) and the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) said interesting things. I was particularly interested in the comment of the hon. member for Assiniboia about the effect of a fixed period for the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne and on the budget in reducing the quality of debate. I will not comment on that but I am going to say this. I feel that somehow or other we ought to be able to tone up the quality of debates in this house. I do not feel very proud or happy when I think what the ordinary visitor to the public gallery must often say to himself when he comes here on a brief visit. He may come in here and to my great regret he may see an hon. member standing up unashamedly reading every word of his speech and not even reading it well. There are people who can read so well that one hardly knows they are reading and if they can get away with it more power to them, but that does not happen often. I feel we are just stultifying this place if we allow what goes on now to continue; that is, having man after man stand up and unashamedly read a speech. It is deadly dull and bears no resemblance whatever to a debate. The hon. gentleman may have no reference whatever in his speech to what was said previously in the debate and he may be talking about something entirely new.

I said I did not intend to take many minutes of the time of the house and that is still my intention.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As far as I am concerned, I hope you go on.

Mr. Macdonnell: There is one other thing. I mentioned this the other day to a party of members. Perhaps we could apply it to ourselves. I think there is a danger of having the maximum time for a speech become the minimum. I think it is regrettable that we almost automatically take the full 30 and 40 minutes as the case may be and use it up. I believe it would make a tremendous difference, more than we realize, if there were a greater number of speeches lasting for 5, 10, 15 or 20 minutes instead of the maximum of 30 or 40 minutes. I suggested the other day—and I have not checked it yet myself—that I believe it is true that in the British house there are a large number of short speeches. I intend to check on that and see if it is so.

I still intend to keep my promise about speaking briefly but I have just one more thing to say. I love this place. I think this is a wonderful institution. This place not only maintains the laws but maintains the right of civil liberties, religion and education. Indeed, it is the background of everything we value and cherish. I like to think that in a sense we are the trustees of the past and of the contributions made by Macdonald, Laurier, Borden, St. Laurent and others we can think of. I believe that this committee's work is tremendously important. I hope it will not be hurried. I hope that members of the committee will not allow themselves to be influenced by the talk they hear inside this chamber and outside of it to the effect, "Why do you talk so much?" I would say that wisdom, by and large, comes out of abundant debate and we should not try to shorten it too much or we will find that we will suffer.

I apologize for intervening in this debate because I have really no practical suggestions to make. Somehow or other, though, men of our age should be able to stop what we all know is a distasteful practice, that is to say the reading of long, dull speeches—unashamedly read, as I say—without any pretence whatever of observing the rules of the house.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, the remarks just concluded appealed very much to me. I am afraid, however, I cannot join the hon. member in loving this place. I find it, so far at least, not an institution that is very lovable. That is one of the reasons I wanted to make some remarks today.

What has bothered me is that none of the speakers participating in this debate thus far has mentioned two points that seem to me worthy of consideration. One is a definite attempt to elevate the status of the average member of parliament. I am speaking of government members as well as opposition members. The curious thing is that in both Britain and the United States a debate is always ensuing among the people who observe parliament and among parliamentarians themselves about the efficiency of congress or the British house of parliament. In the last year in Great Britain there have been a number of substantial criticisms and a very good one was put out entitled "The Reform of Parliament" by the Fabian society. The British and the people of the United States are always knocking their systems about and tearing them to pieces, applying interpretative and critical standards to what goes on in their legislatures. It seems to me that we do all too little of this.

It is perhaps presumptuous of me to mention this since I have only been here a few years and I cannot judge whether parliament in the good old days was better than it is now, but the status of the average member of parliament, whether he is a member of the government or the opposition, is not a particularly high one. I think it would be improved, for example, if we had more free votes in this house. I think it would be improved also—and this, of course, is not quite procedural—if members of parliament had more research and investigative facilities through this house and especially through committees. I think the committee that will investigate the rules should go into this question very thoroughly.

I also feel that my prime commentary in this house is that we are supposed to be the scrutineers and watchdogs, that the administration puts things into effect as a result of legislative policies introduced here and we check the administration and also the legislation. It seems to me we do not do a bad job of checking legislation but we do a poor job in our function as scrutineers. Here again it seems to me this can be improved by elevating the status of the member of parliament, by giving him more power on parliamentary committees to scrutinize.

Experienced hon. members of this house have said that more committees are sitting now than in the past. Quite frankly I am completely disillusioned when I think of some of the farces we have witnessed in committees in the past months. In one committee that sat recently a point of order was debated for three and a half hours. When there are as many as 60 members sitting on a committee you have to shop all around the house in an effort to find a quorum.

You have conflicts where members will be sitting on three committees. We have had situations in this house, according to the analysis I made last year, where the official opposition turned up for meetings of fewer than one third of the committees. Members are supposed to answer the call of a committee meeting yet in this particular situation, in the last session of the house anyway—if anyone wants to check the attendance records they will find this is so—the official opposition never bothered to answer the summons in two thirds of the cases. Therefore, from a completely different point of view I have arrived at a position not too far from that of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), who is worried about the fact that we cannot get anyone to listen to us, and that we cannot even stand to listen to ourselves. He is concerned about it because of the past and the tradition. I have not shared in that tradition at all. I know this is not a stimulating change and in terms of debate we just do not have crisp and hard talk.

One of the things we might try is to emulate a British device which lets a private member issue what is in effect a written challenge to a cabinet minister to a half-hour on the spot debate with a 12-hour notice. The minister gets the notice in the morning and they have the debate at 9.30 in the evening.

One of the things we could introduce here is the system they have in the United States congress of yielding the floor. Here we have to ask permission to rise and ask questions, and usually the questions are designed just to throw the fellow off his stride. In the United States the speaker yields the floor and you actually get crisscross debate within the limits of the topic being discussed. I can think of a number of occasions where instead of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) or the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) resorting to the question technique, which I tend to feel most of the time is mere obstruction, if they could get up and ask the hon. member who has the floor to yield the floor for five minutes and state a position we could get a genuine flow of debate across this place instead of the situation that does exists, except for a few members, where most of us go behind the curtains or out of the place when debate is going on.

It is for these reasons that I think the committee has to take a very long look at the rules. Again, I say, I do not know what the situation was in previous parliaments but certainly this is far from an exciting one. I have noticed, in talking to academic people, and the criticism in the press, that it is coming to be recognized that many people are fed up with the House of Commons just being a talking chamber. I think the hon. member made the best case possible for talk. We need to keep that up, but why can we not make the talk more stimulating, more exciting? I think we have to examine this. I think particularly the party leaders have to look into it.

Is there any explanation for the fact that so many members hesitate to say something bold or new? In this regard, I was very pleased when the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Nasserden) got up and made his speech, which received such wide publicity. Surely, as a member of parliament, he had the right to get up and give his views on the agricultural situation. After it was over the whole impact seemed to be, how did this fellow dare to break party bounds. I heard members say, "What is the matter with him; has he gone off the deep end to get up like that and break the party line?" This emphasizes to me the point that we need more freedom from the point of view of party leadership and more encouragement from party leadership to speak our minds on issues.

I know Canada has very many subjects and topics that are divisive. I can think of one, the Chignecto canal. How is it going to affect Halifax? How about winter shipping on the St. Lawrence? How is it going to affect Halifax, Saint John and the St. Lawrence ports? Because these things are divisive in so far as our parties are concerned we do not bother to talk about them in the house; we do not bother to have the things threshed out in public. It seems to me that we should have much more of this and it would encourage private members, if we did have free votes on private members' resolutions and bills, to express themselves.

Therefore, it seems to me that if this house is going to be reinvigorated and revivified it has to come from the backbenchers. May I make this point, Mr. Speaker? It has always seemed to me in terms of abuse of the rules —the Minister of Finance started off that way —it is always the veterans of the house who abuse the rules most. This is an inescapable conclusion of mine. It is not the backbencher, the chap who has not been here too long, it is the veterans who ignore the rules; they have got the elan; they have the confidence. They get up and push it. What an example that is to show—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member is referring to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Fisher: I am referring to the Minister of Finance at the moment but the Minister of Finance is no greater sinner than the man who asked the question.

I do not know what the experience of other members may be in trying to assess the attitude of the people, the enlightened people of the country, who pay some attention to parliament, but the ones that I bump into are rather scathing. This is a fine thing if it is this government they are blaming it on but it is more than that. They are blaming it on the institution itself. They say there is something fundamentally wrong with it. I think the committee should spend worth-while time going into it.

One of the final points I should like to make is this. I think this committee should look into something that seems to me is really depressing the status of the average member of parliament. I refer to the proliferation of royal commissions and regulatory boards. Every time you set up a royal commission, then almost invariably you remove a touchy topic from the centre of debate and put if off to one side, into the refrigerator, for a while. Every time you set up a regulatory board such as the national energy board, the board of transport commissioners, which has been with us for a long time, or the board of broadcast governors, you are creating a group, not answerable within this House of Commons directly, to handle very tough and delicate particular situations. This is a trend in our complex society which you cannot pause or block, but it seems to me that this practice of removing subjects away from parliament, once or twice removed, puts us in the position where we no longer are as important as members of parliament used to be.

I need not go further, but I think it makes ministers much less important. I have always deplored the number of times ministers in this house are willing to use the fact that something is before a board instead of answering the question. I notice the way the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) is prepared to be so detached about the C.B.C. and the board of broadcast governors. I do not think we are going to reverse the trend of more regulatory boards but steadily we are removing from the scope of the members of parliament what used to be their immediate consideration. These boards are getting increasing authority and getting just that much further away from us. It seems to me the test of our system is going to be whether we can keep the average member of parliament within this chamber somehow with the feeling that he has something to say about this and that complexity which piles on to our agenda.

To bring this to a point, it is noticeable that in some of the other democratic countries, in Denmark and Scandinavia, indeed in Britain, there is discussion going on about the question of having somebody acting as a public protector. I understand the Prime Minister of Great Britain is now looking into the question of the ombunsdman, which is a Danish device of having what is in effect a public defender, because of the growth of so many boards and regulatory groups. It is felt that the individual citizen needs protection, and there should be one person to ask for protection from the state. We like to think of the member of parliament as a person to come to; but the Danish experience is that the ombunsdman is the man for this task. He is a man who scrutinizes government regulations on the basis of the protection of the individual liberty. If any citizen of the state has any complaint at all he merely has to fire it at the ombundsman and the matter is investigated. I would not recommend particularly that we need an ombundsman set-up at the present time but certainly we need some way of enhancing the position of the member of parliament vis-à-vis the state and the apparatus that has grown up.

The point I wanted to make about committees was largely made by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith), namely that they should be smaller. I cannot see why we cannot have committees of eight to ten members. I cannot see why our committees cannot meet when the house is not in session. When dealing with certain matters I cannot see why they cannot meet not so much in secret but in camera. When the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) was making his remarks on committees he was very clear, in setting out his intention to use them more, that he was following the British example and precedent. The British have much smaller committees than we do and they have a much bigger house membership. Their committee on public accounts breaks up into subcommittees which go out and visit sites. I think we could make very effective use of that kind of committee.

But the problem here, and this again is a problem for the party leaders and not for the select committee, is that if we are going to have smaller committees and give them more important tasks we have got to make the job worth while in terms of prestige and function. I do not know how that can be done except by insistence on the part of the party leaders that this is important work and that it has to be done. In Britain they do not have too much trouble in the House of Commons getting people who are willing to serve on these small committees for which there is very little publicity. If hon. members follow British parliamentary affairs they will know that their committees are unlike those of the United States and certainly unlike Canadian committees in that they are not in the centre of the public eye, but they do perform fairly steady and complete work by way of scrutiny, of which we do not manage to get nearly enough done.

It would certainly seem to me that if the committee to be set up wants to look for examples the best thing it can do is to constitute a subcommittee and send it off to look at the way other parliaments handle the problems that we are being confronted with here and try to find out why it may be that in Britain, Denmark, Sweden or the United States there is more fire or interest in their parliaments than we have in Canada.

Another procedural matter that I want to suggest that the committee should look into is the question of some kind of television or radio coverage of the actual proceedings of the House of Commons. I know that the oldtimers do not look upon this suggestion with much favour. They think it is a rather poor idea.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hear, hear.

Mr. Fisher: I do not see why the hon. member who has just interjected should interject because the kind of performance he puts on on television would give him an automatic advantage. I should like to suggest that one thing we can do is to start to televise the private member's hour once a week.

An hon. Member: On divorce?

Mr. Fisher: I think if you focus attention several times during the session on what the private members are doing you would get more private members interested in their contributions to affairs. This may sound like a desperate remedy but I think it should be looked into. There is no reason at all why there should not be radio broadcasts from this chamber. Of course, with the present standards, the difficulty would be to get any radio station to take the broadcast, but I certainly think we could get some kind of broadcasting or telecasting that might be useful in drawing attention to parliament.

Mr. Macdonnell: Would you have all the speeches read then?

Mr. Fisher: The hon. member says, "Would you have all the speeches read then?" I think the majority of the set speeches are read now.

Mr. Macdonnell: Are you going to change all that?

Mr. Fisher: I still feel that the rule against reading speeches could be enforced again if the leaders of the parties would lay down the law. I regret as much as any member the fact that member after member will get up and read his speech. I always wonder about the authorship of these treasured papers. It has always seemed to me such a silly subterfuge when even a cabinet minister, as happened once this session, will say that he is consulting his notes. I can understand cabinet ministers wanting to consult their notes in order to be sure what they are saying, but this destroys the whole basis of the rule. I suggest that this committee should not only consider this rule but its abolition if we cannot make it stick. The only way we can make it stick is for the party leaders to lay down the law and see that the whips enforce it. An hon. member interjects and says that this does not work. I am getting the kind of interjection that suggests that what I am saying is not too popular.

Mr. Macdonnell: Would the hon. member not agree with this? In saying this I admit I am doing so partly to correct the wrong impression I gave. Take, for example, the budget speech. I would not suggest that the budget speech could be delivered extemporaneously. There are occasions when I think ministers are perfectly entitled to read their speeches.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, we have a situation where members asking questions will read their questions. A question is usually a rather short range effort and it seems to me that is one place where members could do without reading.

There is one thing I should like to see before the debate closes. I should like to hear from some of the government members who have been chairing committees as to their views on the matter of giving committees more work. I see one or two of them in the house and perhaps we could have some suggestions from them as to how we can make our committees work more efficiently. While we are having more committee meetings, I am not convinced that we are doing much more with the committees. For that reason I should very much like to hear from some of them as to how they think things could be improved. It has not been the ministers who have been running these committees in terms of their actual day to day work and I think it would be worth while if we could have some suggestions from these people as to how the committees could be made more important.

The last suggestion I should like to make is one that finds a great deal of disfavour with the lawyers in the house or perhaps I should say that I understand that the lawyers do not like it. According to my understanding the fall months are the time when they can make some money in their law practices. Nevertheless it seems to me that we are very foolish to so arrange our sittings that we will probably spend a lot of time here this summer and then have to have a fall session. It seems to me it would be much smarter to have some kind of a split so that the summers are free. This should appeal to every member who wants to get round his constituency. Certainly in my part of the country the summer months are the only months when it is really pleasant to do so.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member is going a bit beyond the scope of the committee. After all, he is talking about the sittings of parliament and he will recall that we are only one of the three elements of parliament.

Mr. Fisher: We are only one of the three elements of parliament, but if one of the objects of the committee is to speed up our work and make the sessions more efficient one point they will have in mind is to determine how we can handle matters more quickly and more expeditiously. The only point I was trying to make was that the committee should consider that perhaps splitting the session in two would be a factor in the more expeditious handling of the business of the house.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on this matter. I am very pleased that it is being discussed and that the committee is going to be set up because I too am very concerned about what members of parliament can and do accomplish. Throughout the country we hear continually about the committee work being done by backbench members of all political parties. I believe that throughout the country there is a belief that this is happening.

However, I was at a meeting of the Legion a while ago, and they asked me what had happened to the veterans committees in the last two or three years. They asked me, was it not true that the members of the veterans committees were veterans? Was it not true they were all in favour of the proposals that were placed before them? I said, yes, I sat on the committee and I was sure all members were in agreement. The committee had brought in a report, and while there was some amending of opinion to reach a unanimous agreement, that agreement had been reached and a report introduced. Then, they asked me a question which I feel we should ask ourselves: What happens after a committee brings in a report?

It is true that the backbench members attend committee meetings and give a great deal of consideration to these matters. They give to the committee whatever knowledge they have on the subject, and the committee comes to a conclusion. Then, Mr. Speaker, what happens when the committee reports? If the government and the backbenchers are going to stand on the record of the contributions they have made in committee, then some consideration will have to be given to what happens to the reports of these committees. There was another committee of which I was a member, and it did an exceptionally good job. I believe the government and the people of the country would have received a great deal of benefit if consideration had been given to the proposals made by the estimates committee on defence expenditures, under the chairmanship of the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Smith).

Mr. Speaker: Order. What we are asked to do under this motion is to consider the establishment of a committee on the procedure of the house for the purpose of suggesting any changes that might be desirable to assure the more expeditious dispatch of public business. So far I have not made reference to any hon. member—and we have had very interesting proposals made during a discussion of the procedures of the house in general terms—going beyond anything that this committee would be entitled to deal with. The reason I have interrupted the hon. member is that what the hon. member is talking about is a matter of substance, not of procedure. I believe that since we have had a fairly representative discussion, members should confine themselves now to the question which is whether or not it is desirable to set up a committee.

If the house decides to set up a committee, then there will be an opportunity to present all the matters which hon. members feel could be improved. This is not the time or the place to go through all these matters. With these observations for the guidance of the hon. member, perhaps he would continue.

Mr. Peters: As I take it, Mr. Speaker, your ruling is we should discuss only whether or not it is desirable to set up this committee. I think we are all in agreement. We are always optimists. We believe that this committee would do some good, although I was just saying that, in my opinion, the committees with which I have had something to do in the past have not accomplished very much. If they have produced some good results, it certainly has not been apparent to the man on the street who is looking for legislation from these committees.

I should like to say something about what I believe should be done by this committee. I certainly have not been here very long, but as a new member I am of the opinion that the rules, no matter what they are, can be used. We have operated under various forms of the rules in the past. I believe that if this committee is going to reach any satisfactory conclusion it will have to be done, as my leader said a few minutes ago, by agreement. We find that, individually, as people we are not too bad, put collectively we believe that those who belong to other parties are not very good. We usually find that the rules can be amended by agreement, but this cannot be done on a formal basis.

We find, at the end of a session, when an agreement is requested on a limited basis an arrangement is usually arrived at and, while we do not change the rules, we can generally reach our objective through co-operation. I should like to make some comments on some other matters, Mr. Speaker. I believe we would be very foolish to oppose the setting up of this committee at this time. There are a number of things I should like to see the committee do, although I do not believe some of the other committees have functioned as satisfactorily as we would have liked them to function. We will probably have an opportunity of discussing the various aspects of this matter on another occasion.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I was hoping, Mr. Speaker, that I would have the opportunity of making a few comments on a particular matter so that this motion could be considered by the house before six o'clock. Unfortunately, I have not been able to do so because of the length of the debate. I am not complaining about this one bit. The debate has been most helpful and most instructive, especially the suggestions made and opinions expressed by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), who has had so many years' experience and who, as he said, has such a love of parliament and parliamentary life. Even though my experience is of a much shorter duration—I hope it will continue for some years to come—I must agree with the hon. member and say those are my feelings as a result of my short experience in connection with parliamentary activities.

While the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) was giving his opinion as to why it would be desirable to establish the committee at this time, the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Broome) interjected two or three questions. I did not catch the whole import of them, but I understood they were queries as to why we have not been able, as we had in the past, to deal with public bills in the hands of private members. This raises a question concerning the rules of the house as they relate to other types of bills, notably private bills relating to divorce. It was my thought that perhaps a very brief and general reference to that and other matters might be acceptable at this time.

Mr. Churchill: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker: I think the discussion proposed by the hon. member would be distinctly out of order on this motion to set up a committee to consider the rules.

Mr. Speaker: I will note the hon. member's point of order and deal with it immediately after the recess.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Speaker: The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) raised a point of order as we were about to adjourn. I think that at the stage the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) had reached I could probably not properly declare him out of order; but as he had indicated the subject which he wished to speak about, I should say that in my view it would be in order to suggest that the rules, or such special rules as the committee might consider appropriate for private bills relating to divorce, would be a proper subject for consideration by such committee. But to go beyond that and discuss the substance of the matters which would be relevant before the committee in dealing with that problem would not be in order.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, that was the end toward which my remarks were leading, that this motion before us is to establish a committee to consult with yourself about the rules and procedure to expedite the dispatch of business, and that one of the items with which the rules deal, along with many others of course, is that of private bills originating in the Senate, in the other place, dealing with divorce. It was also my thought that this could be one of the specific subject matters with which the committee, once it is established, would concern itself.

In recent years, as Your Honour and other hon. members know, there has been a considerable amount of discussion in the committee of the whole, and to a lesser degree in the house itself, about this particular type of private bill. I am sure there is not a member here, or a member who is not here either, for that matter, who is not familiar with the discussion which has taken place during succeeding private and public bills hours and on days set aside for private members' business.

Because I think this also is a specific subject matter with which the committee might well concern itself, I should like in a very brief way to indicate some of the reasons why it might not be desirable for parliament to continue to discuss and deal with this particular class of private bill in the manner in which it has in the past or, indeed, for parliament to deal with it at all. I subscribe to the latter view, of course, which is the approach we have persistently used with respect to private divorce bills. If I may, I would like—

Mr. Speaker: Before the hon. member indicates what he has in mind, I might say at the outset that it would be quite out of order to raise the issue whether or not parliament should deal with divorce bills, because that would be beyond the powers of any committee set up to consider procedural matters. As to the pros and cons of the procedure which might be appropriate, I think that, too, would be out of place here because that would be the subject matter of the representations to be made to the committee itself if and when it is set up.

I have allowed a certain latitude of discussion in this debate because it seemed to me to be a very useful debate for the guidance of the committee, but I think it would be out of order to attempt to indicate what are the kind of rules the committee should adopt. In effect, I am limiting the hon. member to comment on this motion to set up a committee to expression of the view that the committee might well deal with the problem he has raised.

Mr. Howard: I quite well appreciate, Mr. Speaker, that it would be out of order to make reference to alternate methods of dealing with this particular class of bill if such reference applied to some structure, such as a court for argument's sake, outside parliament itself. That would properly not be within the ambit of the motion nor within the province of the committee itself if the motion which is before us were passed.

I think, however, it might be permissible if I make this suggestion. I think this is a question which could occupy the thoughts and attention of the committee itself. It has been my understanding, perhaps a misunderstanding but I would like to refer to it, that in discussing similar motions to establish other special committees in the past, by speaking in the house to the particular motion hon. members have taken the opportunity of expressing their ideas in this way and have drawn them, prematurely probably, to the attention of the committee. In that way the views of individual members of the house with respect to certain matters before the committee, in this instance before the rules committee, were made known to the committee rather than their appearing as a witness before the committee itself in order to suggest the particular way in which the rules might be altered to deal with divorce bills arising in the other place.

I think that inasmuch as Your Honour by your strong suggestion—if I may call it that rather than ruling—has indicated I have probably reached the limit of the intent of my remarks, I should not go beyond what I have already said up to this moment. I would certainly like to have gone further in this discussion and I had in mind an amendment to this particular motion which I think would have been in order. However, I do not intend to move such amendment, but I might perhaps be allowed to reiterate strongly and sincerely that I think this is a field in which the committee can be of prime assistance.

I hope the committee in its wisdom will not be too rigidly bound by the fact that it should not think in terms of methods outside parliament, such as giving jurisdiction to the exchequer court, establishing a separate federal court or something of that nature. I do not say this to override your rulings, Mr. Speaker, but it is one thing the committee might well deal with. I hope it does, and I hope just as sincerely that it may come back to the house with some suggestion or recommendation in its final report which will allow a better or saner method of dealing with this class of private bills.

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South): I have one or two things to say on the subject of this motion. Someone said that democracy is the worst possible form of government other than any conceivable alternative. After a number of sessions in this house I begin to wonder whether the speaker really had the right idea. An overhaul of the rules is long overdue. As a member from the far west I am concerned, despite the remarks of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), about the useless waste of time that goes on in this house, and there is useless waste of time.

For instance, I can recall an occasion last session—and I trust I am not trespassing on the terms of reference of the committee—when one member, despite the fact that all the other members wanted to continue after ten o'clock, was able to negate the will of 264 others, by refusing unanimous permission to carry on. That happened not once, but several times. It is not democracy or protecting the rights of opposition parties for one member to be able to impose his will on this house as has been done in the past, or for two members to impose their will on the house as is being done in the present. I say that an overhaul of the rules is long overdue; not to take away the rights of the opposition, because we on this side would fight harder than anyone to prevent that, but to take away the right of individual members to make a mockery of this parliament, which is what is happening time and time again.

I should also like to see the words of the hon. member for Assiniboia carried out in practice; to use his own phrase, I should like to see every member able to express his views. Yet in our only free ranging debates —the debate on the address and the budget debate—we Conservative members from British Columbia were represented by only one hon. member in both debates. If one adds the four C.C.F. members from our province, perhaps we had much more than a fair share of the time of the house, but speaking for backbenchers on this side we did not seem to do very well.

During the dinner hour I was analysing the debate on the address in the light of the rules as they exist at present, and I found that on this occasion 79 hon. members spoke; 32 Liberals, 8 members of the C.C.F. party and 39 Conservatives. I found that the C.C.F. group with 3 per cent of the members of this house had 10 per cent of the time spent in debating the speech from the throne, and 13 per cent of the time during the budget debate. The Liberals, with 17 per cent of the membership, had practically 40 per cent of both debates and the Conservatives with 78 per cent of the members had 50 per cent. If one wants to talk about equality of treatment between individual members of this house, I say that this is not equality of treatment.

I should like to see this committee go to work to bring in its recommendations as soon as possible. I do not care whether the recommendations are unanimous or not. I should like to see a free vote taken when the recommendations do come to us in order that everyone may vote the way he feels, because I am concerned about the waste of time that goes on; the fact that we deal with trivialities for hour after hour and, then at the end of the session authorize the expenditure of millions of dollars on estimates without giving due consideration to what we are doing.

It is a time for a change in these rules. It is time for a change with regard to filibusters. The hon. member for Assiniboia mentioned the filibusters of 1912 and 1913. We are enduring a filibuster right now during the time set aside for private members, yet the hon. gentleman has the nerve to ask us to give more time to carry on this stupidity and this arrogance; more time in which to impose the will of one, or two or three members on this house. I say the time is long overdue when we should change these rules, and the sooner the committee gets to work and the sooner we have this change the sooner parliament will be afforded the opportunity to give proper consideration to measures and topics which are really of importance.

While the committee is considering these questions I hope it will also give some attention to means by which the other place could make more effective use of the undoubted ability which its members possess. There is a great job before this committee, and I suggest it should be formed right away and get to work as soon as possible.

Mr. Howard: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Broome: What is the question?

Mr. Howard: I just wondered whether the hon. member was applying his reference to "arrogance" to myself.

Mr. Broome: If the caps fits, wear it.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): I had intended speaking on lines similar to those of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Broome). One matter which I think is deserving of the committee's consideration concerns the order of speaking in the house; I think that is just about what the hon. member for Vancouver South had in mind.

In recent years the Canadian people have taken to electing to this house large majorities. This was the case in 1953 and 1949. Regardless of the political complexion of the party in power we must, I think, recognize that it has become a habit with the Canadian people. This results in a large number of members, who have been elected by people who expect them to take an equal share with all other members in the business of parliament, having only a restricted opportunity to do so. Thus when debates are in progress the fact that the government party was four members to every one on the opposition side means that the backbench member on the government side has only one opportunity to speak compared with four afforded to members of the opposition.

I feel so strongly about this because I feel the reason the backbench members in the previous parliament under the Liberal administration became fed up with the proceedings—if they did; and I understand that they did—was this very same reason. Naturally, I do not want to see this happen to members who support the government at the present time. I feel that the opportunity to speak must be shared more evenly with hon. members on the other side.

An hon. Member: Talk to your whip.

Mr. Aiken: There was some reference this afternoon to the increasing amount of interest in committee work. I feel that this has resulted to a large extent from the situation in the house. Hon. members on the government side who are desirous of speaking have waited time after time, turn after turn, while hon. members opposite put forward their views again and again. For this reason hon. members have taken to attending committee meetings where they may express their views equally with all other members. This is perhaps one of the reasons why some complaint has arisen about attendance in the house about which mention was made this afternoon. Undoubtedly if an hon. member has an opportunity to attend a committee where he will have an equal chance to express his views which he feels he was sent here to do, he will take advantage of that opportunity in committee and perhaps neglect the business of the house or at least give it second priority, when it should have first priority in his order of business.

Mr. Crestohl: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question. Does the hon. member have any particular formula for a sequence of speakers to suggest to the house?

Mr. Aiken: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have two formulas.

Mr. Speaker: With the leave of the hon. member, I will suggest that it would be more appropriate to present the formula to the committee, if and when it is established.

Mr. Aiken: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will not refer to my formulas except to say that I feel the committee should consider a formula that would give a more equal opportunity of speaking in the house to hon. members on the government side in a situation such as this.

The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Broome) mentioned the two main debates, the throne speech debate and the budget debate. In many instances, these are debates in name only. Admittedly the first few speakers do raise issues but frequently in the throne speech debate there is merely an individual presentation by an hon. member who has particular problems or matters which he wishes to bring to the attention of the house. I feel that in the throne speech and budget debates an hon. member might very well have an equal opportunity with other hon. members without violating the well-accepted rule that Your Honour follows, that speakers in a debate ought to be taken alternatively speaking for and against the problem.

I was concerned about the question as to whether an hon. member was speaking for or against a motion should make any difference in the order of speaking. In looking in Beauchesne's fourth edition I found a citation which applies to the situation that occurred this afternoon. Citation 124, subsection 1 reads:

124. (1) In order to be allowed to speak more than 40 minutes under standing order 31 a member who speaks immediately after a minister has moved a government measure must speak in opposition to the motion.

I think Your Honour was right in the first decision in relation to the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) because he did not speak in opposition to the motion and therefore possibly should not have had more than 40 minutes. The point I am making is that the rules and practice in some cases have established a difference between whether an hon. member is speaking for or against a motion. This is a matter for the due dispatch of business to give all hon. members an opportunity to speak and do the job they were sent here to do, and in my opinion the committee should give serious consideration to it.

Mr. Rouleau: Mr. Speaker, can the hon. member tell me what prevents him from taking part more often in the debates of the house? He is allowed by the rules to do so.

Mr. Aiken: I would say, Mr. Speaker, that I take advantage of every opportunity I can to speak in the house.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make just a few brief remarks. I did not hear all of the debate but I listened with interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), who I thought made a most thoughtful speech. I wish to point out to the later comers of his party who are somewhat critical of the time consumed by the opposition and the number of times they speak that the minister in his remarks which I commend to their attention and perusal clearly recognized the rights of the minority, the opposition in parliament, and also the function of the opposition. I thought the hon. gentleman was most fair and he indicated as always that he has a sound understanding of the principles of democracy and the workings of the parliamentary system. I ask those hon. members who have spoken recently to consider what the hon. member said and I urge them to learn from him because of his thorough grasp of the principles I mentioned and because of his sound suggestions about protecting the rights of the minority.

I wish to bring to the attention of the house something I mention at every appropriate opportunity in debates of this nature. In my opinion—and I think this opinion is gaining ground in this house—we have to do something about changing the times of our sessions. I understand the irritation felt by hon. members opposite about the time taken by the opposition. They have to sit and listen to lengthy debates without the same opportunities of participating, in one sense, although they do participate in the real sense. Perhaps, however, it is not appropriate from the point of view of the government to allow too many government members to speak. I have known the government whip on occasions to send notes to speakers and say, "We want you to lay off and stop speaking." That is understandable when the government wants to reach a conclusion within a certain time. Perhaps a minister may be leaving town the next day or something of that sort.

We live in circumstances that have changed since the time our rules were established. As I read the history of parliament as recorded in Hansard since 1867 I find that at one point it was easy to conduct the business in three or four months. In recent years the multitude of activities in which the government has engaged has placed a greater load on parliament. It is not sufficient for us to come here in January and hope to conclude the business by July 1. It is a physical impossibility to do that properly. The government should give consideration to splitting the session.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not want to prevent the hon. member from expressing an interesting view but he will recall we are summoned here not by the rules and our services are dispensed with not by the rules. I am afraid the hon. gentleman will have to look to some authority other than the proposed committee to deal with the problem he has mentioned. The summoning of parliament and the prorogation of parliament is not a procedural matter with which this committee could deal. While it is an interesting subject and it was mentioned by another hon. member I do point out that in my view it is not relevant to this discussion.

Mr. Herridge: Would I be in order in suggesting that this committee take up with the appropriate persons the idea that I am advancing now with a view to getting action from the right direction? I just wish to say I think we should split our sessions; come here in January and leave at the beginning of June, then recess, come back here in the middle of September and complete our work sometime early in December. I make that suggestion, Mr. Speaker. I might be slightly out of order but I think the committee can give some consideration to it.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

ESTATE TAX ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Estate Tax Act and to provide among other things:

(1) That the deduction from aggregate net value allowed for the value of any gift made to a charitable organization in Canada be extended to the value of a gift made to a charitable foundation in Canada.

(2) That the Canada Council be deemed to be a charitable organization for purposes of the act.

(3) That there be included in computing the aggregate net value of the property passing on death any amount payable under a policy of insurance effected on the life of the deceased for the benefit of the family of the deceased, where such policy, immediately prior to the death, was owned by the employer of the deceased.

(4) That where the property passing on the death of a person includes property the value of which was determined as of the date of death of that person according to prescribed tables of present values of annuities, and within four years of the date of death there occurs an event, such as a death or change in marital status of a beneficiary, that allows the value of the property to be determined having regard to the occurrence of that event, the property shall, on application made in accordance with prescribed conditions, be revalued and the difference in tax refunded.

(5) That the four year limit, after which the minister may not make a re-assessment unless there has been fraud, misrepresentation or failure to disclose by the person filing the return, may be waived by the executor by notice to the minister.

(6) That any enactment founded on paragraphs (1), (2) and (4) shall apply in respect of deaths occurring after December 31, 1958, and any enactment founded on paragraph (3) shall apply in respect of deaths occurring after March 31, 1960.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Finance, of course, was very brief on budget night on outlining some of the contents of these resolutions. I wonder whether he has any intention at this stage to expand on his statement?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Chairman, I think there is nothing that I can usefully add at the outset to what I said in the course of the budget speech on March 31 concerning the resolution that is now before the committee. It has six paragraphs to it, each dealing with a separate proposed amendment to the act and I think that discussion could best take place on each of these seriatim, if this meets with the approval of the committee.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I take it that what we have in effect is one resolution with six paragraphs. We do not seem to have any certain rule in debate at this stage, but in the past it has been the practice of the committee—and I think it is a good one—to have somewhat of a general discussion, if necessary, at the opening of the debate stage of the resolution. After that perhaps the Chairman calls the subparagraphs and we endeavour to confine ourselves to relevancy in respect of the contents of those individual paragraphs. Of course, I have no objection to this procedure being followed again this year.

The committee is well aware that this is the first occasion since the new Estate Tax Act was passed in 1958 that we have had to consider its effect.

I must again point out to the committee that we felt that we were rather pushed, particularly at the committee stage in the banking and commerce committee, in discussing the provisions of the new Estate Tax Act. It was one of those occasions when we were sitting very frequently in committee when the house itself was sitting and when there was urgent business in the house.

I was interested to find that even the members of the Canadian Tax Foundation, who met in their twelfth tax conference after the bill was passed, felt that sufficient time had scarcely been given to the public at large, and even those specialists, to digest the contents of this new legislation which even embodied a new principle. I am sure that the Minister of Finance has at some point considered the equivalent of a Hansard stenographic report of a symposium that was held after we passed this bill in 1958 by very eminent specialists in the estate tax field, representing both lawyers and accountants.

I was interested to find that at this 1958 conference of the tax foundation they seemed to seize upon the very points that were troubling those of us who were members of the banking and commerce committee in 1958 when we felt that there was rather undue haste in considering some of those items. Indeed, I think there is confirmation of a bit of a rush in the fact that some of the proposals of the minister today are in line with the recommendations that were advanced by opposition members and members of the public in 1958 when the minister's new estate tax was being considered; but he would not heed in any consequential manner any of the recommendations that were made at that time.

I know that when in November, 1958 this panel was discussing the new federal Estate Tax Act the first item they directed attention to was section 26 of the act which indeed got foremost attention from the banking and commerce committee and from the Senate. Hon. members will recall that the Senate amended the bill and in particular were concerned about section 26.

It is interesting to find that in this field of alleged and objectionable double taxation the minister, on March 31 in his budget speech, indicated that in another section of the resolution before us, namely in the package relating to income tax amendments, some form of amendment in this field is being proposed. In view of the fact that this amendment refers to taxation of estates as well as to taxes on incomes I think it would not be out of the way at this stage, when we are discussing the Estate Tax Act, for the minister to give us a little more information than he gave on budget night about what his proposals are in this field. I think we could very usefully hear about that tonight as well as perhaps to follow it up, as we will when we come later to the present paragraph 14 of the Income Tax Act resolution.

In addition, we find that the Canadian Tax Foundation was concerned, as were the members of the opposition at the time, with the prospects for some form of co-operation and co-ordination with those provinces which have their own succession duty legislation. We were alarmed and concerned about the possibility of the lack of uniformity in the matter of tax credits which are an important thing to the individual taxpayer.

Hon. members of the committee will recall that this bill of 1958 introduced a completely new feature, in that it proposed to tax in estate matters persons domiciled outside of Canada. We were concerned about double taxation in this field and even avoidance of tax in certain instances. I commend to the minister's attention again the discussion on this subject by those very eminent specialists in estate tax matters.

Quite early this session the hon. member for Mount Royal asked what progress had been made in the matter of renegotiating, in consequence of the new Estate Tax Act, tax conventions particularly with the United States but also with other countries and the minister indicated, as found on page 919 of Hansard of this session, that negotiations were still in progress. I would hope that we could get another report from the minister tonight on this very important subject because it is well known that since the old succession duty act, which was the basis of the former tax convention with the United States, disappeared on January 1, 1959 taxpayers have been without the opportunity of the usual set-off that is provided by a negotiated tax convention with a country as important as the United States. We are also interested in having recognition of the new Estate Tax Act for this purpose by other countries as well.

Members of the committee who were members of the banking and commerce committee in 1958 will recall that members of all political persuasions represented on that committee were very concerned about what are now sections 28 and 29 of the new Estate Tax Act. With respect to section 28, I refer to the matter of a minority interest in a corporation and the deeming under certain circumstances that that will be equivalent to owning shares in a majority interest. As I have indicated, the new act has been in operation since January 1, 1959. Personally I have had no professional practice in this field but knowing that this was a matter of very keen interest on the part of all members of the committee and that the interest was such that the administration brought in an amendment to the bill in committee in response to our protests, I was quite interested in reading the rather cynical and frank comments of a symposium of experts—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Would the hon. member relate this to the resolutions which are before the committee?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, Mr. Chairman. I am dealing with a resolution indicating that it is proposed to introduce amendments to the Estate Tax Act and I am speaking generally to the first clause. I want to remind the parliamentary secretary that this is a rather unusual form of resolution in that it is my understanding that the government is under obligation to give notice to the house of any proposed amendment to the Estate Tax Act or similar legislation which might involve an increase in taxation. My understanding is that while it is customary and desirable, I would agree, to give notice of all changes of consequence that are proposed it is not necessary in practice to give notice in this form of amendment that might involve a reduction or decrease in the weight of taxation or something in the nature of a technical change in administrative practice.

When we are presented subsequently with a bill we find there are many clauses in these taxation bills of which there has been no notice in the resolutions in a detailed and definitive form. Therefore I am referring very broadly to some of the items upon which I should like to have an expression of view from the minister in view of the fact that this legislation has been in operation for some 17 months.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, a good deal of latitude has been extended to the hon. member in the hope that we would thereby save time and not be wasting time on points of order. However, we have heard a review of what happened in the standing committee in 1958, which is water under the bridge now and has no connection of which I am aware with the amendments now proposed. In addition, the hon. member is now going a good deal further and is embarking on a review of certain sections of the main act. There is no amendment to section 28 or section 29 involved in the present resolutions whatever.

Mr. Benidickson: Section 26.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member has before him a resolution and it is my respectful submission, Mr. Chairman, that that gives him no right to start in to examine all the sections of the main act in detail and review the discussion that occurred on those sections when the bill was under debate two years ago. Surely this is going very far afield and I submit that the hon. member cannot relate this to any general remarks that he was making at an earlier time.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I am sure you are familiar with the precedents when we have discussed budget resolutions in the past. When the minister sat on this side of the house he was, of course, one of the most arduous critics that we had when we were on the other side. He was as always very exhaustive in his analysis of any legislation presented to the house and in the many years that I have sat with him in the house he never at this stage confined himself as he is suggesting it would be proper for me to confine myself. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that when we are discussing legislative proposals at the resolution stage it is certainly in order for the committee to consider alternatives to those proposals before the bill is finally drafted and presented to the house. That is the traditional practice at the resolution stage. That is what a resolution is for. It is for the purpose of hearing the broad intentions of the government in giving notice of its intention to bring down a bill, and surely the government wants to hear from the opposition and other members of the committee in the informal way provided at the resolution stage as to what should be included in the bill before it is drafted and presented to the house.

The Chairman: Order. Has the hon. member concluded his remarks on the point of order?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes.

The Chairman: I would think that the point of order has some value. I might refer the hon. member to a decision two years ago as found in Hansard of July 22, 1958. There was a reference at that time by the deputy chairman to standing order No. 59, section 2, which, as everybody knows, provides that speeches in committee must be strictly relevant. The deputy chairman continued:

> Now this is an amending act—
> [Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]
> I think that is the case here. We have a resolution providing some amendments to the Estate Tax Act.
> —and when you amend an act it does not open up the discussion of the full act.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is there a ruling to that effect? Are you saying there is a ruling to the effect that when amendments to an act are brought in the whole act may not be discussed?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would you mind giving us the precise citation?

The Chairman: It is found at page 2551 of Hansard of July 22, 1958. I would understand that any discussion as to alternatives to the items mentioned in the resolution would be relevant but certainly not a discussion of all the other clauses of the act which are not being amended by the resolution and which one hon. member thinks should be. Otherwise the old act would come under the discussion in such case. We are discussing resolutions to amend the act in certain respects. In order to be relevant, the discussion must be confined to the points which are raised by the resolution.

Mr. Benidickson: I draw your attention, Mr. Chairman, to the governing clause which is the opening sentence of the resolution:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Estate Tax Act and to provide among other things:—

In other words, the resolution itself indicates that what is before us in perhaps six spelled out points is not necessarily exhaustive and fully indicative of the intentions of the minister when he brings down his bill. Surely this matter cannot be one-sided. May I simply also say to Your Honour that you are referring to one ruling of last year. I say it is contrary to practice that I have known in 15 years' membership in the House of Commons. Surely just because we have a new administration we do not necessarily have, simply by interpretation by the chairman, new rules for the House of Commons. We have devoted the whole day so far to considering the proper method of changing the rules. We are setting up a committee for that purpose. But surely we do not somersault with respect to the traditional practice in our committee by the results of a ruling of one chairman.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, that is a most improper reflection on the Chair. An hon. member with the experience of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River does not do himself justice by proceeding in that way. He knows quite well that this matter was the subject of a ruling in 1958 and that the ruling that was then made followed the established practice of the House of Commons.

Mr. Benidickson: No.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is ample authority for the proposition that the introduction of an amendment to an act, whether it is a taxing act or any other act, does not open the whole main act for consideration.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the minister a question—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If the hon. gentleman has forgotten may I remind him and also the hon. member for Essex East of the ruling given in 1957 in the time before the change of administration by the then deputy speaker, the late Mr. William Robinson. It is to be found at page 3022 of Hansard of April 3, 1957.

Mr. Benidickson: Was that on budget resolutions?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This was a debate on a resolution to amend the Income Tax Act. The chairman intervened as follows:

The Chairman: Order. May I intervene here to say that I believe to some extent we are repeating what would more appropriately be said in the budget debate. I have not interrupted the hon. member up to this point because I thought he was laying a groundwork for discussion of this resolution but I must point out to the hon. member that we are now discussing the resolution with regard to income tax which is very confined and set out in numbered paragraphs. I do not believe that a general speech of this kind is in order.

If I allow latitude to the hon. gentleman I of course must allow latitude to other hon. members to reply and we are in committee governed by the strict rule of relevancy. I must ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the proposals which are set out in this particular resolution.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Mr. Chairman, are you taking them one by one?

The Chairman: I understand that in previous years—if my memory serves me correctly—I did call them for discussion paragraph by paragraph. That is up to the committee of course. If the committee agrees I would be glad to do it in that way but in any event we must confine ourselves to the resolution itself.

As to the resolution itself, Mr. Chairman, I draw your attention to the fact that the resolution opened with precisely the same formal opening words as the resolution now before the committee. It opened with these words:

Income Tax Act

Resolved that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Income Tax Act and to provide, amongst other things:—

Then follows an enumeration. In that case it was a lengthy enumeration of over a dozen paragraphs with many subparagraphs. It is therefore quite clear that the hon. gentleman has misconceived the proper interpretation and that he is not at liberty to stray into particular subjects related to the principal act but which are not involved in the resolution now before the committee. He began by saying that he wanted to make some general remarks. Perhaps exception could have been taken to that statement but we did not wish to intervene if he had something to say that was a foundation for some specific remarks he proposed to make related to the terms of the resolution. But that is a different matter from what he is doing now, Mr. Chairman. He is now proposing to go into individual subjects that are not related to the resolution at all.

Mr. Crestohl: On the point just raised by the Minister of Finance, I should like to draw his attention to the fact that the introduction of this resolution is altogether different from the introduction of the resolution, for example, on the Excise Tax Act. This resolution reads as follows:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Estate Tax Act and to provide among other things:—

With respect to the Excise Tax Act the introduction to the resolution reads as follows:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Excise Tax Act to provide:—

The wording is not "among other things". It states strictly: "to provide". We are now dealing with the Estate Tax Act resolution wherein it is stated "and to provide among other things". We can be told that we did not limit ourselves to the six items of the resolution because we made provision for us to be able to introduce "other things". If that is indicated, it is certainly althogether different from the introduction of the resolution with respect to the Income Tax Act. I think the committee ought to know what those other things might be. Otherwise far too much latitude is given and we can be taken by surprise later. I think we met that difficulty last year. My memory is not clear on this matter but I recall that we wrestled with that problem last year. I like the wording, for example, in the Excise Tax Act resolution which is the same type of resolution and which is as follows:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Excise Tax Act to provide:

And then follow paragraphs 1 to 6. The situation would then have been different and your ruling, Mr. Chairman, on relevancy would have been more accurate. I do not say it is not accurate as it is but it would have been more accurate if the introduction to this resolution had been:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Estate Tax Act to provide:

And the items have been enumerated from 1 to 6 as they are here. But it says more than that. It says, "to provide among other things". "Among other things" certainly touches almost the entire act. Any section of that act can be amended in the bill that may come before the house if this resolution permits it to do so.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): If any significance is to be attached to what the hon. member for Cartier mentions—and I submit it ought not to be—may I draw to your attention, Mr. Chairman, that on April 3, 1957, in connection with the ruling read by the Minister of Finance, the resolution in relation to the Income Tax Act read as follows:

> Resolved that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Income Tax Act and to provide, among other things:—

There followed approximately a dozen enumerated matters or in other words, precisely what the hon. gentleman has referred to. On the basis of that type of resolution the then deputy speaker of the house, Mr. William A. Robinson, one of the distinguished deputy speakers of this house, ruled in accordance with what was read by the Minister of Finance, and that ruling has been followed on a number of occasions to which I could draw Your Honour's attention if it were necessary, both by his honour the deputy speaker Mr. Courtemanche and by his honour the deputy speaker Mr. Sevigny.

Mr. Crestohl: Mr. Chairman, may I say that the parliamentary secretary should then tell the committee whether there is any difference between the two methods of introducing the resolution, where in the one case provision is made for "among other things" and in the other case no such provision is made. Do they both mean the same thing? Is the latitude of debate identical in both cases? If it is identical, then why burden the resolution with the words "among other things"? If we are to be restricted to the six items, why put in the words "among other things" and not put in the same wording in the excise tax resolution? They both do not mean the same thing.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Cartier has been a member of this house for some time and I thought he was well aware that the forms used with respect to these four resolutions are those which have been used in this house for many, many years, indeed, as long as any of us have been in this house. The form used here respecting the resolution concerning the Income Tax Act and the Estate Tax Act is the form which has been in use with respect to those statutes and their predecessors for, I think, as long as any hon. member of the present house has been in this house.

The reason—and I thought he was well aware of this—that a different form is used with respect to the amendments to the Excise Tax Act and the amendments to the Customs Tariff is that those amendments come into effect on budget night. The amendments to the Income Tax Act and the Estate Tax Act normally, unless otherwise provided, come into effect on a date stated in the act or on royal assent.

Mr. Chairman, this is fully established procedure in this house. The formulas used here containing the introductory words have been established for many years. Every hon. member of this house knows that the bill to amend the Income Tax Act always contains many provisions which are not specifically referred to or spelled out in the resolution which precedes it. That has always been the fact. Sometimes you will have a dozen particular provisions selected for mention in the resolution and you may find the bill running to 30 or 40 pages of detailed provisions. There is nothing new about this. This is the well established practice of the house.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister is familiar with his intentions with respect to the bill, and I am grateful to the hon. member for Cartier for pointing out the distinct difference between the introductory words introducing the Estate Tax Act resolutions and the resolution with respect to the Excise Tax Act. Has the minister the intention of bringing in with respect to this bill to amend the Estate Tax Act items, under this basket of other things, which are not referred to in these six paragraphs which are before us in the document?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There will be some provisions, of course, as will be expected by hon. members who have had experience in this house, in the same way as matters are selected for special mention in the resolution respecting the amendment to the Income Tax Act. This is well known to all members.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has very kindly drawn my attention to citation 268 on page 222 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, fourth edition, and this I would direct to your attention. The first paragraph says:

> Though it is the function of the committee of ways and means to impose rather than repeal taxes, examples of the repeal of taxation effected in this committee are to be found upon the Journals.

This is the significant sentence:

> Proposals for the variation or modification of taxation can therefore be made in the committee—

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that if proposals for the variation or modification of taxation are appropriate for the committee of ways and means, surely it is appropriate to discuss certain suggestions to the minister with respect to variation or modification of taxation and the specific proposals as advanced by him in the resolutions.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, surely the hon. member has been in this house long enough to know that there is still the rule of relevancy. That is what he is completely overlooking. He brings himself, he thinks, under one rule and therefore says, "Abolish or forget the other rules which apply".

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I have listened to this discussion with some interest and I will admit that one is restricted in the literal interpretation one wants to give to the situation by the mere citation of the observations made by Mr. Deputy Speaker Robinson in 1957. But each situation has to be governed in the light of the facts that attend it in the instance under immediate discussion.

This act is no more different than any other bill introduced into this house except that, as it is included in the ways and means chapter of the budget resolutions, the Minister of Finance gives it a quality altogether different from any other bill introduced into this house. Is it seriously to be argued that if a bill were introduced into this house dealing with some aspect coming within section 91 of the act, on the first clause of the bill an hon. member would be precluded from arguing that the bill was insufficient because it did not seek to embrace a particular situation? The Minister of Finance, if he follows me, certainly would not argue that that kind of argument could not be made. Of course an hon. member must speak about the bill before the house. In that sense he must make an argument that is relevant. But that does not mean that he cannot argue that a bill is insufficient because it does not include a particular provision.

As I follow the argument of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, what he was seeking to establish was that, if among other things not specifically mentioned in paragraphs one to six there was not included something in another section of the bill, then it ought to be included. Surely there is an undue restriction of debate to take any other position, and I do not think that the rulings which have been referred to intend to go that far.

This measure is no different from any other bill, and the fact that it is included in a ways and means resolution does not give it a character or restriction different from any other particular measure. If that is the case then it is an ordinary bill, and in an ordinary bill on the first clause it is open to an hon. member to say: "I agree with this section; I agree with all provisions in this bill, but the bill is deficient because it ought to go further." If an hon. member is precluded from saying that on this measure, why should he not be precluded on any other bill? I cannot believe for one moment that the Minister of Finance is serious in suggesting that an hon. member is not at least to be given that latitude, and that was all that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River was seeking to do.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, if the hon. gentleman's statements did not have such a ring of familiarity we would give them a greater degree of credence.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You are referring to the Excise Tax Act in 1958.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): But the fact is that the hon. gentleman has argued this matter before in committee and it has been determined by the house. The hon. gentleman argued with his usual eloquence on July 22, 1958 in connection with the Excise Tax Act. The resolution which was then before the house had this lead:

> Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Excise Tax Act and to provide, among other things:

Then followed a number of enumerated matters. The hon. member made precisely the same argument. Indeed, I think he used the exact words which he used tonight.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No; the argument he used in 1958 was better than tonight.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Yes, it was much better than tonight; I am sorry if the hon. gentleman is slipping as he ages. Mr. Deputy Chairman at that time said this, as reported on page 2551 of Hansard for July 22, 1958:

> It is, of course, up to the Chair to follow the regulations set out here, and with regard to what was said by the hon. member for Ottawa West, standing order No. 59 does say in section (2)
> "Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration."
> Now this is an amending act, and when you amend an act it does not open up the discussion of the full act. All hon. members realize that.

That is, except the hon. member for Essex East.

> The Chair wants to be as generous as possible, of course, in order to help the thing go through, but we cannot let this grow into a debate on the entire Excise Tax Act, and therefore I will have to ask members to limit their general remarks to items that appear in this amendment. There is no other way, and that is the ruling of the Chair.

The hon. gentleman from Essex East appealed that ruling, a ruling on precisely the matter which is now before the committee. The house upheld the ruling of the Chair. Perhaps the hon. member does not agree with the ruling which was then made and upheld, but at least as a believer in democracy, and as one who so vigorously applauded the speech which was made this afternoon by the hon. member for Greenwood, he should uphold the ruling which was then confirmed by the majority.

Mr. Crestohl: The parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance owes a duty to the house as well as to himself to explain this matter further. Why is it that the present resolution does not use the words "among other things"? We are entitled to an explanation why this phrase is used sometimes and why it is not used at other times.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The Minister of Finance has explained.

Mr. Crestohl: He has mentioned what the practice was in the past, but that does not always mean it is right. Somewhere along the line it is bound to happen that an old practice is not right after all. That is not a sufficiently sound argument to convince me, to say that because a course has been followed for many years it is necessarily right. I do not say it is not, but I want an explanation why the wording is different in the case of this particular resolution. In 1958 the wording was such as to include the phrase "among other things". That could mean one thing, in which case why is the wording of the present resolution different, in that it does not include this expression "among other things"? What is the difference in the two forms of the resolution?

Mr. Benidickson: Of course, the Minister of Finance attempted an explanation, but his parliamentary secretary has pulled the rug from under him. The Minister of Finance made two points in answering the hon. member for Cartier when he asked for an indication of the meaning of this phrase "among other things". First, he said that the language in this resolution—and we have three or four—was in the form which had been followed from time immemorial. He said in the second place that the reason for the differentiation between one resolution and the Excise Tax Act resolution was that in one resolution the tax became effective on budget night and in the other it did not. The parliamentary secretary has just indicated that he does not agree with the Minister of Finance on either score, because he has pointed out that the language introducing the Excise Tax Act in 1958 is not the same as it is now in 1960.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): And for a good reason.

Mr. Benidickson: I would imagine that in 1958 the tax became effective on budget night.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before you make your ruling, Mr. Chairman, I must say I have been somewhat astonished to discover that of all the members of this house the Minister of Finance should rely on a decision of Mr. Deputy Speaker Robinson. Some of us remember one famous occasion when the hon. gentleman was not willing to rely on decisions of the deputy speaker of this house.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): To his very great credit.

Mr. Pickersgill: To his eternal discredit.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Nonsense.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Is this relevant to the resolution?

Mr. Pickersgill: It is relevant to the authority. The hon. gentleman did not think much of the authority on that occasion. It seems to me that what has been ignored entirely is the first phrase—the first four words—in this resolution. The resolution begins—and I point out Mr. Chairman, that it is a resolution, not a bill—by saying: "Resolved that it is expedient—" I have never been able to understand how there can be an argument that something is expedient without it being possible to argue at the same time that it is not expedient. Surely we are not to be restricted in our argument that something is not expedient because the language is different in some way and, as I apprehended, that is what the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River was seeking to do.

The Chairman: There is no doubt, I think, in the mind of any hon. member that standing order No. 59, section 2 applies here. Therefore, we must have strict relevancy. As to what may be the exact meaning of relevancy I understand there may be disagreement, but I do say that it has to be a reasonable interpretation; it has to be reasonably relevant any way in the opinion of an ordinary man.

Hon. members have referred to previous practice, especially the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, but all the cases which have been mentioned show that the Chair has applied the rule of strict relevancy in cases similar to this one, and no precedent has been mentioned to the contrary. The hon. member for Cartier has drawn the attention of the committee to the words "among other things". The Minister of Finance has given an explanation, but from the viewpoint of the decision of the Chair I may say that I cannot open the door to unlimited discussion and abolish the rule of relevancy by holding that "among other things" makes it possible to introduce any kind of an amendment which is not mentioned in the resolution. An amending act does not permit discussion of the main act.

Of course, if later on when the act is introduced some hon. members think objection should be raised as to the sufficiency of the notice, then this may be discussed. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River has also referred the Chair to citation 268 of Beauchesne. I would say that this citation has no relation to the subject of relevancy but rather to amendments in committee of ways and means. Of course, if an amendment is submitted to the committee, its validity can be examined, but in relation to its contents. I would refer the hon. member to citation 276, paragraph 2 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, which relates to the previous one and which confirms the views I have just expressed. There may be a general discussion as to all the amendments which are indicated by the resolution, but the discussion must be relevant to any of those items, or all of them.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I be permitted to ask a question for clarification? On the basis of the ruling which Your Honour has made or is about to make, one is precluded from discussing at this stage anything except the enumerated proposed amendments. I readily admit we are only discussing the resolution stage, not the bill, as I mentioned a moment ago. But there are more than these enumerated amendments about to be introduced, and they are covered by the phrase "among other things". So the situation is that one is at the mercy of those who know the contents of the bill if one is to be in order in discussing this matter, because obviously if one had any foreknowledge about the matters to be covered by the proposed amendments which are greater in number than those which are enumerated he could deal with all those undisclosed amendments.

However, one is precluded from doing so, not by the Chair and not by the rules but by the knowledge which is possessed only by the authors of the bill. Surely, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River is in as strong a position as the chairman of this committee who does not, I presume, know the contents of this bill. It may be that the very matters which the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River has been discussing are matters which are covered by the phrase "among other things", not in the enumerated six clauses. The only one who is in position to govern the situation in terms of relevancy of which Your Honour speaks would be the Minister of Finance. Surely we are not to be placed in a position of that kind, and the hon. member ought to be allowed at this stage the latitude he seeks, because the very matters he mentioned may be among other things not referred to in the six clauses which appear on page 7.

The Chairman: I thought I had dealt with the objection raised by the hon. member for Essex East. In my view, the resolution which is before the committee of ways and means can have reference only to the imposition or reduction of taxation. The bill itself may have reference to other aspects than those indicated here. If it does, then these new matters may be discussed in committee of the whole on clause 1 of the bill. Therefore, I would think that the ruling which I have indicated, and which I reiterate, should be accepted.

Mr. Benidickson: On paragraph 1—may I combine it with paragraph 2, because I think they are closly related—I take it that under the statute as it existed one would be entitled to an exemption by reason of an intended charitable bequest if that bequest was made to an organization. A person may have an idea that he would ask his trustees to set up some scholarship which would be at the discretion of the trustees, and I take it that under the act, despite what the average testator might think, he is not entitled to the deduction from taxation as a charitable bequest. So what the minister is doing here is, first of all, indicating that specifically the act can be extended to a charitable foundation. In the definition will it later be indicated whether that is a foundation of the testator or other foundation such as The Atkinson Charitable Foundation, and so on.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is, as I am sure the committee will appreciate, a difference between a direct gift to a charity which is actually engaged in a charitable operation and a gift to an organization as, for instance, a foundation which through its trustees or board of directors distributes money among organizations which are directly engaged in charitable enterprise. Hitherto, under the Dominion Succession Duty Act and thus far under the Estate Tax Act only the former case has been treated as a gift to charity. Now it is proposed to enlarge the scope of the rule in order to provide that a gift to a charitable foundation shall be regarded for the purpose of the act as a charitable gift.

Mr. Benidickson: Would the minister indicate that under present law my rather rough interpretation was correct, that if a testator was indicating in a will that he wanted to set up some scholarships, to leave it to the trustees rather than, shall we say, specifically to a university or to an organization, that it would be invalid in so far as exemption from estate tax is concerned.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The other question raised by the hon. member concerns whether the charitable foundation in question must be one set up by the testator himself. No, it need not be so, but I want to make the point clear that hitherto a mere gift to a charitable foundation, so-called, did not entitle that gift to be treated for the purpose of the act as a gift to charity unless the charitable foundation itself was engaged in a charitable enterprise. In that case the gift was brought under the first of the two cases, but it was because the recipient was actually engaged in a charitable operation. This is intended to enlarge the provision and make it clear that a gift to a charitable foundation, even though the foundation itself might not be engaged directly in a charitable operation but is dispensing funds among charitable agencies or organizations engaged in charitable operations, will now become exempt for this purpose.

Mr. Benidickson: Has the minister given consideration to the practice in the United Kingdom where I believe the matter of whether or not a bequest is for a charitable purpose is based on common law precedents with respect to what is a charity. I would imagine that in the first instance the taxation authorities have discretion to decide whether or not some personal arrangement for scholarships such as I have indicated was satisfactory for that purpose. If there were a dispute between the taxing authorities and the executors I suppose it would be settled by the law courts. In our case, it must be an organization, I think. Has the minister given consideration to following British common law with respect to a wider concept of what is a charitable bequest?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The provision in the act to which I direct the attention of the hon. gentleman is section 7(1) which provides:

> For the purpose of computing the aggregate taxable value of the property passing on the death of a person, there may be deducted from the aggregate net value of that property—

Certain amounts. Subparagraph (d) specifies gifts to what may be called charity. In this particular case it is the value of any gift made by the deceased, whether in his life time or by his will, where such gift can be established to have been made absolute to:

> (1) any organization in Canada that, at the time of the making of the gift, was a charitable organization operated exclusively as such and not for the benefit, gain or profit of any proprietor, member or shareholder thereof.

In the interpretation of these words of the statute I do not think there has been any serious difficulty. Reference could, of course, be made to the common law and to the decisions of the courts as to what is a charitable gift.

Mr. Crestohl: I think there is a departure here, because the Canada Council is also known to hand out scholarships.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is the next paragraph. We are dealing with No. 1 at the moment. That is No. 2.

Mr. Crestohl: I beg your pardon. I should like to discuss that.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that we discuss this paragraph by paragraph? Shall paragraph 1 carry?

Paragraph 1 agreed to.

On paragraph 2.

Mr. Crestohl: Of course we all welcome paragraph 2, but I wonder whether we understand it in its entirety. The Canada Council is not restricted to dealing with charities pure and simple; they also hand out funds and provide for scholarships and bursaries. I wonder whether the minister envisaged that anyone who does make a bequest, which would be the equivalent of a scholarship or 10 scholarships or 10 bursaries in the same class that the Canada Council provides, would be in this position, that those bequests would be deductible even though they are not bequeathed to the Canada Council itself but are for the very same objectives? I am afraid that we are opening up a door here which I think would be very welcome to encourage scholarships and higher education.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I point out to the hon. gentleman that to qualify under the act at present it would have to conform with the provisions of section 7(1)(d), which I read a moment ago. The gift in that case must be made to some charitable organization. The present paragraph is designed to make gifts to the Canada Council qualify as charitable donations. The Canada Council is a charitable organization within the meaning of the old Dominion Succession Duty Act and the present Income Tax Act. Hitherto, it has not been deemed a charitable organization for the purpose of this act. That is the reason why we are asking the committee now to provide for the purposes of the Estate Tax Act the Canada Council shall in fact be deemed a charitable organization so that a gift to the Canada Council will be deductible from the aggregate value of the estate.

Mr. Crestohl: Does the minister not see the relationship there? The Canada Council will provide scholarships, and anyone who wishes to make a bequest through the vehicle of the Canada Council to provide scholarships will find that they will be deductible. If similar scholarships are provided through another vehicle, through another organization which does not fall within the scope of this section 2 or section 7(b)—

Mr. Benidickson: Or through his executor.

Mr. Crestohl: Yes, or even through his executor, they will find that they are not deductible. I can understand that this section is in a class by itself if the bequest is made to the Canada Council. Why should not a bequest which is made for the identical purpose but not through this vehicle or this avenue but through another one be deductible? I see a difficulty there. I do not want to say it will be a discrimination, but it certainly will be setting something aside and making an exception of a scholarship given through this channel as against a scholarship given through another means. If it is the intention to encourage the giving of scholarships and bursaries then the exemption should be allowed under the general heading of granting scholarships and bursaries and not restricted only to scholarships and bursaries given by the Canada Council.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The gift must still be through a charitable organization. In the case mentioned by the hon. member for Cartier, the form of gift, in order to acquire exemption, would need to be a gift to a particular charitable organization for the purpose of providing scholarships or bursaries. This would entitle the gift to the exempt status. It must still be a gift to a charitable organization within the provisions of section 7(1)(d).

Mr. Crestohl: I am sure the minister understood my analogy. The bequest ultimately goes for education and if the testator leaves a bequest to his executor and says, "I want this money to be used for scholarships of the same kind, class and category as those that are given to the Canada Council", why should that bequest not be deductible? That I cannot understand.

Mr. McMillan: When paragraphs 1 and 2 are enacted they will apply in respect of deaths after January 1, 1959 instead of January 1, 1960. Why is that so?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. gentleman will find the provision for the effective date of the amendments in paragraph 6 of the resolution.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member asked why that date was selected.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In order to give to the persons who might have made gifts under those circumstances the benefit of an exemption since December 31, 1958. It is a relieving provision.

Paragraph 2 agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall paragraph 3 carry?

Mr. Benidickson: When the Minister of Finance briefly described his intention with respect to the amendment of the Estate Tax Act on budget night I think he made the comment that we would be faced with resolutions which on balance were neither specific, relieving nor adding new imposts. I find that paragraph 3 is indeed a new form of tax. That was something that escaped attention in the existing statute. Will the minister explain the past history of insurance of this kind? Has he any knowledge of what might be taken in as a tax if this particular item is passed?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, this in essence is more a matter of eliminating a doubt as to the effect of the present provisions than of imposing any new tax. This has reference to the provisions of section 3(1)(m) of the Estate Tax Act. The purpose of the proposed amendment is to ensure that death benefits arising out of employment which are now generally subject to estate tax will be taxable when they are in the form of life insurance payable to the beneficiary of the deceased.

Although life insurance owned by the deceased at the time of his death is now taxable, life insurance owned by the employer on the life of a deceased, for example, in a company group insurance scheme, may at present escape tax even if payable to a beneficiary of the deceased. This is a matter of rectification of an anomaly by our removal of the doubt in this respect. The words that appear in the paragraph: "for the benefit of the family of the deceased" were used in the resolution to make it clear that a policy owned by an employer on the life of a key employee which is payable to the employer would not be included.

Paragraph 3 agreed to.

Paragraphs 4 to 6, inclusive, agreed to.

Resolution reported.

INCOME TAX ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Income Tax Act to make provision in respect of a new class of profit sharing plans under which

(a) amounts allocated by the trustee shall not be included in the income of an individual who is a beneficiary under the plan until the year in which they are received,

(b) no tax shall be payable by the trustee under the plan on the taxable income of the trust,

(c) an employer may deduct in computing income for the year an amount which when added to his contribution, if any, under a registered pension fund or plan does not exceed $1,500 per employee.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I take it that the minister is dealing with the first resolution with respect to income tax. This is a new concept. Perhaps the minister would see fit to enlarge upon his comments made on budget night, particularly as he indicated that this house this session is not going to be asked to do more than to receive the bill at first reading. Our debate on the bill at this session will conclude at that stage.

I recognize that for certain types of profit sharing plans we will be completely reversing the stage at which we impose an income tax. It seems to me it would be appropriate for the minister to outline his expectations and plans at this stage. I realize he is following a precedent that we have had in the past with respect to the Estate Tax Act which we were discussing and also some years ago with respect to the Income Tax Act—I think it is a good practice—whereby a bill is introduced and those who are specialists in the field then have the opportunity between sessions to examine the intent of the minister. The minister also graciously indicates that he is prepared to receive comments, criticisms and recommendations in the interim before he really asks his colleagues in the House of Commons to accept any radical change in taxation methods.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Chairman, I would be pleased to say something about the purpose of this resolution. As I indicated in the budget speech on March 31, it is our intention at the present session to introduce a separate bill to amend the Income Tax Act in respect of profit sharing plans and to carry that bill no further than first reading at the present session. Then between now and the 1961 session full opportunity will be afforded to hon. members, to persons interested in this subject and to the professional groups, lawyers, accountants and any others who may be interested, to study the measure and to assist us with their views.

This is proposed partly because this will be quite a new departure in the Income Tax Act and partly because this is a highly complex subject. It has been considered by the Department of Finance for some years. It was considered before I became minister and my colleagues and I have had the problem under study for nearly three years since the present government came into office. I stress, Mr. Chairman, that what we are doing tonight is simply asking the house to give approval to the introduction of a separate bill for this purpose. The provisions will not appear in the bill to amend the Income Tax Act which will be introduced following approval of the second resolution under the Income Tax Act. In other words, this year we have two resolutions respecting the Income Tax Act. The second is the ordinary one with the detailed provisions which will be followed by the introduction of a bill to be carried through all stages with a view to coming into effect by enactment at this session. The first resolution will lead to the introduction of a separate bill and that bill will not be carried beyond first reading at this session.

Without trying to make this subject look too complex for this purpose because it is, as I have indicated, a very highly complicated matter, and without asking the house to spend a lot of time on this abstruse subject in view of the fact that it will be exposed for further study and there will be ample opportunity at the 1961 session to consider it as fully as the house may wish, let me give a general explanation of the purport of the proposed provision.

This resolution proposes that legislation be introduced to provide a new code of rules for taxing profit sharing plans. The existing legislation in respect of such plans will not be disturbed but the way will be opened for a new class of profit sharing plans. The main change in the tax treatment of plans coming under the proposed new legislation will be that employees will not be required to pay income tax on the amounts allocated to them each year under a plan if these amounts are held by a trustee and accumulated. The tax on these amounts will be deferred until the amounts are actually received by the employee.

Profit sharing plans take many forms but they can be divided roughly into two groups. There are what might be called the cash plans and what might be called the deferred plans. Under the cash plans, of course, the employer pays a bonus or makes cash distributions to his employees related to profits made in the year in question. This payment made in cash to the employees is the same as other remuneration for tax purposes and, of course, no tax complication or problem arises. Under the deferred plans the employer also makes an allocation of profits to his employees but instead of paying it to the employees in cash the amount is turned over to a trustee to be held for each employee until he retires. These funds held by the trustee are then invested with a view to earning income. Accordingly each year the trustee for the plan makes an allocation in favour of each employee who is a member of the plan. These allocations are made up of the employee's share of the contributions on account of the profits made by the employer plus the earnings of the accumulated fund to the credit of the employer in the hands of the trustee.

As the law stands at present employees are subject to income tax on these allocations each year even though they may not receive these allocations in cash until many years later. Of course, the proceeds from the plan are not taxed when actually received if they have been taxed each year as they were allocated. This requirement that the tax must be paid each year on amounts allocated but not actually received is, we are told, discouraging participation in profit sharing plans. If so it stands in the way of achieving the full social benefit to be derived from having employees share in the prosperity of the enterprise which provides their employment. Moreover, if employees are discouraged from participating in deferred plans they will probably save less to provide for their years of retirement.

The proposed legislation will provide for tax deferment for those plans that elect to come under these new provisions. This means that amounts allocated by the trustee shall not be included in the income of the employee until the year these amounts are actually received. It will also be provided that the income of the trustee will be exempt. This exemption for the trustee exists under present legislation for profit sharing plans and also for trustees under registered pension plans and the R.R.S.P's, registered retirement savings plans.

Under the legislation at present governing the taxation of profit sharing plans the employer may deduct the amounts he contributes into the plan without any limit. Here I am coming to the tax position of the employer. Since the present rules require the amount the employer contributes to be allocated among the employees and taxed each year, whether or not actually paid out, it is the same for tax purposes as any other remuneration. Accordingly there is at present no need to place any limit on the amount the employer contributes just as there is generally no limit on the amount the employer may deduct on account of salary or wages paid to employees.

On the other hand, under the new proposal the employee is to be permitted to defer tax on the amounts allocated to him under the plan and accordingly there must be some limit on the amounts involved if revenue is to be protected and equality maintained with the other provisions in the act for tax deferment. For this reason the resolution proposes that the amount an employer may deduct for contribution into this new class of profit sharing plan plus his contribution, if any, under a registered pension plan shall not exceed $1,500 per employee. The legislation proposed by this resolution will set out the conditions which have to be met in order that plans may become registered deferred profit sharing plans.

The main difference between the proposed registered deferred profit sharing plans and existing registered pension plans will be that there will be no employee contributions into the deferred profit sharing plans. It will be possible, of course, for employee savings plans to be operated in conjunction with deferred profit sharing plans but the employee will not be allowed to deduct amounts paid into such savings plans. In view of this important difference from employee pension plans, the rules governing the investment of the funds of deferred profit sharing plans and the rules concerning payment of the proceeds in a form other than as retirement income will not have to be as restrictive as for employees pension plans.

Mr. Benidickson: I am grateful for that explanation of the minister's plan as he conceives it at the moment. I think it is desirable that this procedure be encouraged. The last estimate I had as to progress along that line in Canada suggested to me that we do not seem to be moving along by any means as rapidly in this field of employer-employee co-operation and planning, particularly for retirement, as is the United States. A couple of years ago at least I think there were some 250,000 different businesses in the United States that had profit sharing plans and at the same time about two years ago there were in Canada known to us only about 250. Hence in proportion to population and so on we are falling somewhat behind.

I think the relative figures with respect to participation by employees about two years ago were two million employees covered in the United States and only about 100,000 employees in Canada. The minister may have more up to date figures. However, this is not as new a policy as some of us might have imagined. I myself was rather surprised to find that in the late 1880's—as long ago as that—there had been held in Paris an international conference of those who were interested and who were participating in profit sharing plans. Even in this country we have had an excellent example of a company which has had this plan in operation for almost 50 years—I refer to the Canadian Kodak Company. I think it was in 1957 a distribution they made at that time was the equivalent of $545 for each employee. When something of this kind gets established and operated by a well established company such as the Canadian Kodak Company one can see that it is very much worth while indeed.

I quite realize that organized labour has looked a bit askance at profit sharing. They felt that perhaps it was something that would reduce their effectiveness in collective bargaining and so on. But I think those who are interested in this thing have been rather pleased to see that such a leader of organized labour as Walter Reuther, head of the united automobile workers, when he was I think last negotiating in the United States for the united automobile workers in 1958, indicated that this was one of the objectives, that in addition to some other hopes for the achievement of better working conditions he hoped the members of his organization would participate in profit sharing in the automobile industry as well as having a steady advance in wages.

I wonder whether the minister would indicate what he has in mind. If there is now to be a tax deferment—something which there has not been up till now—with respect to the allocation of the shared profits, a tax deferment similar to that which is provided for employees' retirement annuities or for pensions, does he have a concept of something being necessary similar to the blue book of rules for pension funds which I think insists that for the employer and for the employee to get a tax concession of any kind the scheme must be offered without discrimination to any person in the organization or in the company who desires to participate? I think it is true of a pension plan that you cannot set up a scheme under which certain privileged executives get the benefit of a pension and it is not offered to other employees of that corporation. Inasmuch as there will be a tax deferment and the tax is not paid by the individual immediately after the allocation does the minister think that similarly it would be necessary to insist that the privilege be offered to all members of the employer's organization?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not think the matter is quite as complicated as that. What will probably follow here after 1961 will be simply a course of practice. The department may choose to issue explanations of this practice to assist those who will be dealing with such plans. But in connection with registered retirement savings plans no manual is issued to inform them and I doubt very much whether any such manual would be necessary with respect to the type of profit sharing plans that are contemplated by the proposed amendment.

Mr. Benidickson: What is the present practice in the United States? Have there been two types of taxation such as I think the minister has in mind? In other words, if it is a cash profit sharing proposition down there do they pay a tax immediately; and if it is a deferred profit sharing scheme do they have tax deferment?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am told that the United States has two schemes and provisions of the law corresponding to the cash scheme and the deferred scheme in the way I have indicated. However, I would not wish to be too precise in likening the provisions of the United States law to what is contemplated here.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to ask the minister a question. No doubt he knows that certain unions, particularly the international mine, mill and smelter workers, have made representations to the government urging that vesting rights be established in pension schemes undertaken by companies or companies and employees when exemption from taxation is permitted. I know that when I asked the Prime Minister a question he said the government was considering the matter and that an announcement would be made at a later date as to the government's decision. Can the minister tell the committee anything about this matter or how it rests?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That has nothing whatever to do with this resolution under discussion.

Mr. Herridge: It is a separate thing?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It has no bearing whatever on this present resolution. This contemplates an entirely new type of provision in relation to profit sharing plans. It has nothing whatever to do with the kind of scheme to which the hon. gentleman refers. The matter of creating vested rights is something which falls under provincial jurisdiction. All that the federal government can do is to relate certain tax incidence to the question of vesting or not vesting, but that has nothing to do with this subject whatever.

Mr. Herridge: The minister says it falls under provincial rights. But why would the Prime Minister inform the house that the cabinet was considering these representations?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The question as to federal jurisdiction can only arise in connection with tax treatment. The federal authority might provide a tax reduction dependent on whether there are vested rights or rights that are not vested. But that does not create a right to vesting. It only relates certain tax incidence to either vesting or failure to vest. But the right to vest as such is a matter relating to property and civil rights. That is the distinction. It is quite a clear distinction. All that the Prime Minister could refer to, of course, was the tax incidence that would follow. I think that was the way in which he understood the hon. member's question.

Mr. Benidickson: I will just be a minute, Mr. Chairman, if the committee will tolerate it. I share the curiosity and interest of the hon. member for Kootenay West. As I understand the matter with respect to the vesting of the company funds, the point made is that inasmuch as a tax deduction is possible on the part of the employer for his contribution to the pension fund, the government should encourage a vesting by making tax exemptions inoperable if the company does not vest after a certain period of time. It seems to me that if some kind of tax reduction is available to the employer by profit sharing, the government could in these regulations insist that there be a vesting at a certain point; otherwise the employer would not get the benefit of the tax deduction.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): As you know, that arises under an entirely different section of the act and does not relate to this at all. I think this could best be discussed on another occasion.

The Chairman: Order. It being ten o'clock shall I rise and report a certain resolution?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, if the committee were agreeable I think there is only one more question and we could dispose of this resolution.

The Chairman: Is the committee agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Crestohl: Can the minister tell the house if there has been an estimate made or a calculation of some kind made to declare to the house what advantages there will be to the department in having this passed? Will there be additional income by way of taxes? Will it be administratively easier? We do not know, as it is somewhat complicated, precisely what the advantages would be in enacting this legislation.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This provision is not introduced for the advantage of the government or a department. It is a provision which will relieve taxpayers from taxes which are applicable at the present time. It is virtually impossible to make an estimate of what this may mean because so much will depend on how many of the profit sharing schemes are made to conform to the provisions of the legislation. Therefore one really cannot offer any estimate which will have any value whatever, but I think on consideration the hon. member will see that this is something which is intended to be for the benefit of the taxpayer, not for the advantage of the government.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Resolution reported.

Resolutions adopted this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I inquire what the business is for tomorrow?

Mr. Churchill: Tomorrow we will start with the second reading of Bill No. C-56, which is No. 8 on today's order paper, an act to amend the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act. If that is completed we will carry on with the three remaining budget resolutions. If we do not complete that business tomorrow, Wednesday will be a continuation of the discussion of the budget resolutions.

For Thursday the proposal is to finish the discussion of Bill No. C-56; if not on Tuesday then on Wednesday, if not on Wednesday then on Thursday; and in any case budget resolutions would follow that bill.

It being five minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Question

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

CJOR, VANCOUVER—LABOUR BROADCAST

Question No. 359—Mr. Pickersgill:

1. Was a broadcast entitled "What are the national issues in the west coast union fight" broadcast by station CJOR, Vancouver, on February 20, 1960?

2. If so, was station CJOR forbidden by the board of broadcast governors to permit the rebroadcast of this program on other stations and, if so, for what reason?

Answer by: Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue):

1. Yes.

2. Station CJOR, Vancouver, was advised that the program could not be rebroadcast until the board received assurances from the station that those holding views opposed to those expressed on the program of February 20, 1960 would be given an equal opportunity to express these views on the first possible program following.

The step taken by the board in this instance was consistent with the provisions of the board's directive to all radio stations entitled "Political and Controversial Broadcasting Policies." This directive requires that, if a station broadcasts a program on a controversial subject, equal opportunity must be given to all parties to the controversy to express their views. After listening to the taped recording of the program broadcast by station CJOR on February 20, entitled "What Are the National Issues in the West Coast Union Fight", the board was satisfied that this requirement had not been met.

STANDING ORDERS

CONCURRENCE IN THIRD AND FOURTH REPORTS OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Miss Margaret Aitken (York-Humber) presented the third and fourth reports of the standing committee on standing orders, and moved that the reports be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

AIR TRANSPORT

AUSTRALIA—STATEMENT ON DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING AGREEMENT

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, during the past week civil aviation officials of Australia and Canada have been discussing in Ottawa arrangements for air transport services between the two countries. The existing arrangements were settled under a bilateral air agreement of 1946, but both countries felt these arrangements needed adjustment to meet the requirements of Canada-Australia air travellers in the jet age. Qantas already operates Boeing jets on the route to Vancouver, and Canadian Pacific Air Lines is to take delivery of its Douglas DC-8 jets later this year.

Both delegations agreed that there was a need for the closest possible co-operation between Canada and Australia, two leading members of the commonwealth, in the highly important field of international civil aviation. It was agreed that as a first step toward this objective the air carriers concerned, Canadian Pacific Air Lines and Qantas Empire Airways, should consult on mutual ways and means of providing, on a fully co-operative basis, efficient jet air services for Canadian and Australian air travellers. The air lines were instructed to report the result of their talks to their respective governments, which would then arrange for further official talks.

The official delegation discussions in Ottawa took place in an atmosphere of great cordiality, and both sides expressed full satisfaction with the progress made.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

FLIGHTS OF FOREIGN PLANES OVER CANADIAN TERRITORY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the alarming report which was made by a respected reporter for the Ottawa Journal last evening entitled "Believe Red Spies Fly Over Canada", which in effect states that Russian flights over the Arctic are assumed to have kept an eye on northern development, including the D.E.W. line, can the minister say whether this is a fact and has he any comment to make thereon?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): A very similar question was answered yesterday by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green). On the D.E.W. line there have been from time to time unknowns, but there has never been a case where it has been possible to confirm that any of those unknowns has been a Russian aircraft.

[Later:]

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I wish to address a question to the Minister of National Defence with respect to these unidentified planes which have been sighted over northern Canada. I wonder if the minister could tell us by what means we attempt to identify them?

Mr. Pearkes: By means of the radar warning system.

Mr. Hellyer: A supplementary question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the fact that radar equipment cannot distinguish between friend and foe, will the minister tell us whether we have any planes or rockets capable of making an identification at altitudes of 50,000 feet or more?

Mr. Pearkes: Canada has no planes or rockets capable of detecting aircraft flying over the Arctic ocean or the extreme north of Canada. Of course the radar operators check with the flight plans which have been filed.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

U.S. PLANES OVER RUSSIA—REPRESENTATIONS TO WASHINGTON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs arising out of the regrettable flight of a United States plane over Soviet territory and the disturbing report in this morning's Globe and Mail that similar flights are going on even now, before the summit meeting. Can the minister say whether representations have been made to Washington asking that such flights be stopped?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would not confirm statements of that kind which appeared in this morning's press. I would think this is rather wild speculation. As I pointed out to the house yesterday, our views with regard to this incident have been made known to the United States government.

Mr. Argue: Has this been done through official channels; through our ambassador in Washington, for instance?

Mr. Green: All our views are made known through official channels.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO ECONOMIC ASSISTANCE TO AFRICAN COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he can outline Canada's proposals for economic assistance to African countries, as mentioned by the Prime Minister last week in London and repeated again today in radio news broadcasts?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all members of the house will be pleased that at the commonwealth prime ministers' conference in London consideration is being given to the possibility of increasing the present level of economic assistance provided by commonwealth countries to Africa. Hon. members will appreciate that since consideration of the proposal made by our own Prime Minister in London has not yet been completed it would not be appropriate for me to give any detailed account at the present time.

I can say, however, that this government has been concerned for some time about the desirability of the commonwealth countries providing the new and emerging nations of Africa with additional economic assistance. What is contemplated is economic aid over and above what commonwealth countries now contribute in Africa. As we all know, Canada at the present time has a program of technical assistance to commonwealth countries in Africa amounting to about $500,000 each year. In addition, of course, the African members of the commonwealth share in the commonwealth scholarship and fellowship plan whereby young people from the various African universities come to universities in Canada and the other nations of the commonwealth, and possibly Canadian students go to some of the universities in these African countries.

We believe that this initiative in taking further steps to help the nations of the African continent is a very important one, particularly because of the economic and political future of that continent. At the present time I think Africa is the most important continent in the world from the point of view of potential development and potential changes, and with the new nations emerging from time to time it is vitally important so far as the commonwealth is concerned. Nigeria, for example, will become independent on October 1, and I believe that the prime ministers' conference now meeting in London has agreed that Nigeria will be accepted as a full member of the commonwealth. This is certainly a continent to watch and a continent to which all possible assistance should be given.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs a supplementary question. Will this plan, a general outline of which has been given to the house, be related in any way, as is the case with the Colombo plan, to any other country outside the commonwealth as a donor?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, we would hope that other countries would participate in this program, and also possibly the United Nations.

INQUIRY AS TO DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING APARTHEID

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and ask if he is aware of the report from London on "News Roundup" this morning concerning the refusal of South Africa to discuss apartheid at the commonwealth prime ministers' conference, and of the intention of the Afro-Asians to publicly denounce South Africa and vote her out of the commonwealth? Is there any substance to this report, and has the minister anything to say about it?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I believe this is another case of speculation. There has been a good deal of press comment in the United Kingdom and, of course, in Canada as well concerning the question of South Africa in so far as it has been dealt with by the prime ministers' conference. I was in communication with our own Prime Minister this morning and there were informal talks held yesterday on this question. These talks have not yet been concluded. Any statements such as this are premature, and they probably do not help very much to settle this difficult question.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

FEDERAL PARTICIPATION IN CONFERENCE ON NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, based on a little news tidbit.

In view of the announcement in Victoria on May 7 by Premier Bennett that a conference of heads of government and technical officials from Alaska, the Yukon and British Columbia will be held there on July 19, and in view of the fact that there are three government jurisdictions involved including the government of the United States, would the minister inform the house whether the Canadian government is participating in the organization of this conference and, if so, why the announcement of the conference has been made only by Premier Bennett of British Columbia?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, the federal government is not involved in this conference in any way. I think this explains the last part of the question, as to why Premier Bennett made the announcement.

According to the information I have, the conference was first suggested by the governor of Alaska, to be held in Alaska. Premier Bennett was unable to attend at that time, and I understand he suggested that the meeting be held in Victoria. The commissioner of the Yukon Territory, who has jurisdiction in the third area, was also invited to attend. The purpose of this conference is stated to be to discuss matters of mutual development. The conference has no official status because neither the government of the United States nor the government of Canada is involved.

PUBLIC SERVICE

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF QUEEN'S PRINTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Solicitor General (Mr. Balcer)?

Could the Solicitor General tell the house for what reasons the government is taking so much time in appointing a successor to Mr. Edmond Cloutier as queen's printer?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as I have previously stated, this is a matter of general government policy. When a decision is taken, it will be made known to the house.

Mr. Denis: A supplementary question. May I ask the Solicitor General whether the civil service commission or the government itself is responsible for this appointment?

Mr. Balcer: It is a responsibility of the government.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Acting Prime Minister with regard to the appointment of a Queen's printer? Could the minister tell us whether there is a prescribed time limit governing this appointment and after which the appointment is automatically abolished?

(Text):

Hon. Howard C. Green (Acting Prime Minister): An announcement will be made on this question in due course.

PENSIONS

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF PORTABLE PLAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether he is able to report on the progress that is being made in the efforts of his department to establish a so-called portable pension plan, especially for industrial workers.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): As I mentioned in a statement before the standing committee on estimates recently, one of the outstanding weaknesses of present industrial pension plans is that they do not provide transferability of pension rights from one employer to another. This is a subject which was commented upon in the Clark report, and which is being studied.

I might point out also that at least one provincial government, that of Ontario, has established a six-member committee to conduct a special study of portable pensions. The findings of this group should be of great value.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question. Has the government study of the Clark report reached the stage where the government will be able to take some action consistent with its promise to the people at the last general election?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, the government of course is fulfilling its promises as declared at the last general election. As I have said before, study is being given to the Clark report, and when a decision has been reached the proper course will be followed.

TRADE

WHEAT—INQUIRY AS TO PURCHASES BY INDIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has the minister any report to make to the house following his conversations reported to have taken place yesterday with the Indian minister of food and agriculture, and more particularly as to whether India has suggested that it wishes to reduce its commercial purchases of wheat from 400,000 tons to 250,000 tons unless a loan can be arranged?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The situation with regard to the sale of wheat by Canada to India is not thoroughly understood. India has not been a commercial market for Canada. That market commercially has been an Australian market. However, over the last three years we have made substantial gifts of wheat to India under the Colombo plan and by special gifts we made an arrangement with India for the purchase of wheat under a long term loan in the 1957-58 crop year and again in 1958-59. All told, in the crop year 1957-58 almost 24 million bushels were disposed of to India under this arrangement, and in 1958-59 just over 11 million bushels. So far as this year is concerned, there has been a gift to India of over 4 million bushels under the Colombo plan, and the purchase arrangement that was reported in the press holds good for this year.

We are looking forward to maintaining our position in the market in India, but it has not been one of our major markets for the sale of wheat. I discussed this matter with Mr. Patil, and he quite agreed that the position of Australia, their major supplier on a commercial basis and the position of Canada, a minor supplier on a commercial basis, should be maintained.

He also pointed out to me that India is a rice-eating country, and that if they had the funds available they would be purchasing rice instead of wheat. He further made the point that in the consumption of wheat in India, preference has been for the soft wheat which is the type produced in Australia and largely by the United States. The Indian family, instead of getting flour from a flour mill, purchases this wheat and grinds it up at home. That is something that is not so easily done with the very hard Manitoba northern wheat which is the customary type we sell abroad. That is the situation with regard to Canada's assistance to India pertaining to wheat.

Mr. Argue: I should like to ask a supplementary question. Since the United States have now developed a market in India for roughly 150 million bushels a year for a four-year period and Canada's market, as the minister has said, one year recently was almost 24 million bushels, are any steps being taken to develop the market in India for non-commercial wheat, particularly some of Canada's lower grades?

Mr. Churchill: That matter is under serious consideration. We are anxious to assist India, one of our commonwealth partners, in these difficult years with regard to India's food supply. We are giving serious consideration to that aspect of it in the nature of gifts of wheat and flour not only to India but to Pakistan and Ceylon.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

CEMENT—ALLEGED COMBINES IN ONTARIO AND BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice, and I apologize for not having sent him notice.

I wonder if the minister's attention has been drawn to a newspaper article in this morning's Globe and Mail which indicates that the Toronto city council alleges that the Canada Cement Company Limited, the St. Mary's Cement Company Limited, the St. Lawrence Cement Company Limited and the Lake Ontario Portland Cement Company Limited have been engaged in a price fixing arrangement both this year and last year with respect to the price of cement, and also to the effect that a similar arrangement exists in Vancouver with respect to other firms. I should like to ask the minister whether this will be brought to the attention of the director of investigation and research in order that inquiries may be undertaken.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): I did not notice the article in the Globe and Mail today, but I am certain it will be brought to the attention of the director. If the Toronto city council feels the concern which is apparently indicated in the article, I am hopeful it will also get in touch with the director.

PARLIAMENT HILL

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON CLEANING OF MONUMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): As somewhat of a conservative—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Herridge: —so far as works of art and beauty are concerned, I want to ask the Minister of Public Works a question prompted by the shock I received on taking an after lunch constitutional around this building with a gentleman of the fourth estate. I wish to ask the minister this question. Who ordered the scouring and consequent desecration of the monuments on parliament hill, and what is the reason for this unusual and unique treatment of bronze monuments?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): I cannot give the hon. gentleman the real answer to his question—it would not be polite—but may I thank him for his question and say that from one who calls himself a conservative it is delightful to have these examples of poetic licence in which he usually indulges and in which he has indulged again today. Perhaps, some time, he could frame his question in blank verse.

Knowing that we have many connoisseurs in this house, before attempting the much-needed cleaning of these monuments we sought the advice of the national research council, of which the hon. gentleman is a great admirer, and after considering many alternative methods we decided on this expert method of cleaning which, I am sure, will work out to the satisfaction of even the hon. member for Kootenay West.

BRIDGES

THREE RIVERS—STE. ANGELE—INQUIRY AS TO NEGOTIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Solicitor General? Further to the promises made in 1957 and 1958 to the effect that a bridge would be built between Three Rivers and Ste. Angele as soon as a Conservative government was in power, could he tell us what stage discussions have reached in that connection?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the bridge between Ste. Angele and Three Rivers is one that local people are anxious to see built; and if my hon. friend will refer to local newspapers, he will see what great progress has been accomplished in the matter.

Mr. Boulanger: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, is it not the minister's opinion that the bridge should be built at this time when there is such widespread unemployment in our area?

Mr. Balcer: I think that construction of that bridge will be very useful, and the sooner it can be undertaken the better.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

DISCUSSION OF METHODS FOR PREVENTING ROBBERIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): May I direct a question to the Postmaster General. During his trip to France did the hon. gentleman have an opportunity of meeting the French postmaster general and, if so, did he take the opportunity to discuss measures to be taken in order to stop robberies of post offices?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Unfortunately my time in Paris and in France was devoted to other matters—

Some hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. Chevrier: Give us the details.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): —also of an official nature, which required to be attended to on a certain date. Immediately those were over I returned to Canada because I did not want to miss a moment of my association with the hon. gentleman opposite while this house was sitting. Perhaps on another occasion when this house is not sitting I shall be able to return to France and meet the postmaster general there.

INCOME TAX

REPORTED INQUIRY INTO EXEMPTION OF CHARITABLE DONATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to direct a question to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of National Revenue. I had intended to ask it yesterday, and today the minister is not here. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary will take it as notice.

Could we have a comment confirming or denying the sensational story about Ottawa studying tax files in connection with the exemption from taxation of charitable donations?

Mr. M. J. A. Lambert (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Revenue): I think everyone has seen that story. The figures used may be obtained from the annual report of the department. As to the observations made by the author of the article, I do not know the source, but at the moment I would not care to say anything beyond that which the minister is reported to have said. If there is further comment to be made he will undoubtedly make it.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL TAX-SHARING ARRANGEMENTS ACT

ALTERNATIVE ARRANGEMENTS FOR UNIVERSITY GRANTS—EXTENSION OF INDIVIDUAL INCOME TAX RATE

The house resumed, from Thursday, May 5, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) for the second reading of Bill No. C-56, to amend the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act.

(Translation):

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, when this debate was adjourned last Thursday evening, I was saying that in 1956 an important amendment was introduced by the St. Laurent government, whereby not only were grants to universities doubled but provision was made for the accumulation of funds in case a university decided to refuse them temporarily. Therefore, if $25 million are now available to our universities, it is because of the legislation introduced by the St. Laurent government. One can not speak highly enough of the wisdom, the foresight and the courage of the previous Liberal government which staved off financial disaster from our universities. I might point out to our Conservative friends from Quebec that if, in 1951 and in 1956, negative autonomists of the type of the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Tremblay) had been in office, not only would our universities now be unable to take advantage of those $25 million, but we would have to speak in the past tense of French universities outside the province of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, a great many views have been expressed on the constitutional legality of those university grants, but no authorized court has ever rendered a decision on this matter. For this reason, I am not afraid and I am even proud to support the view, so often expressed by Mr. St. Laurent, that those grants do not encroach upon the autonomy of the provinces. It is easy to understand that I much prefer the views expressed by an authority on constitutional law like Mr. St. Laurent to the changeable opinion of the former Quebec premier who said one thing in 1951 and then said the opposite later on.

I might add, Mr. Speaker, that I have my doubts concerning the constitutional opinions expressed during this debate by our Conservative friends from Quebec, reminded as I am that, during many debates on constitutional matters in the past, they changed their minds as they did their shirts, and maybe for the same reasons.

Now, what about the constitutional position of Bill C-56? It must be remembered that this bill is the result of many caucuses held last fall between our Conservative friends from Quebec and the Minister of Finance. It was then they laid this twin-yolked egg.

Bill C-56 involves two, well defined jurisdictions. Provincial jurisdiction is subordinated to the federal one in the case of a provincial tax collected by a provincial legislature for provincial purposes.

In this bill, Mr. Speaker, a rather unusual and extraordinary term is set down, stipulating that the Minister of Finance is to be the sole judge of agreements entered into by a provincial government and universities. In other words no one but the federal Minister of Finance can decide whether or not the agreement between a provincial government and a university is satisfactory, from his point of view.

It is clear, when you read the bill, that, as the provincial elections drew near the Quebec provincial government got panicky and unfortunately managed to transmit its panic to this government, with the result that we now have before us a bill drafted in involved legal gobbledygook, a bill which, on the face of it, raises a very obvious constitutional problem.

That is why, before the bewilderment and panic which have gripped our Conservative friends, I quoted last Thursday a thought expressed by an ancient author and which, I believe, applies to this case, when I said:

Whom the gods would destroy they first make mad.

Mr. Speaker, this bill therefore sanctions an interference and an encroachment, on the part of the federal government, about a direct tax levied by provincial authorities, and if we carefully scrutinize the speeches made by some Conservative members from Quebec, we may observe some reticence, some doubt and a deep concern about this bill.

May I be allowed, first of all, to refer to the speech made by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Dorion) on April 26 last. The hon. member could not help expressing his deep concern when he said, as recorded on page 16 of the English appendix to Hansard of that date:

> While the Minister of Finance has the right to satisfy himself that the arrangements reached between the provinces and their universities are truly consistent with the requirements of the act—

Mr. Speaker, I say that the hon. member for Bellechasse himself recognized that, in order to ensure the proper operation of this act, the presence of the Minister of Finance was absolutely necessary, because he is the one who judges whether such agreement is satisfactory or not.

I now refer to the speech made by the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Asselin) on May 5 last. In my opinion, the hon. member is assailed by doubt, and is trying to appease his conscience when he says, as recorded on page 9 of the English appendix to Hansard for May 5:

> Even if this bill is less than perfect, it remains that we have only two years to experience its constitutional effects and, in 1962, the authorities concerned will be free to accept it permanently or to reject it if its constitutionality is seriously questioned.

As regards the extravagant speech made by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Tremblay), which is recorded on page 16 of the English appendix to Hansard for May 5, it is indeed a feat, a great accomplishment; the hon. member managed to use up all his time in dealing with a given subject and yet completely avoided talking about the legality, the constitutionality of Bill C-56.

Mr. Speaker, I now come to the speech made by the Solicitor General (Mr. Balcer) on April 26, 1960. I am very glad to note that he is now in his seat, and I will try to sum up in three points the speech he made that day.

First of all, the Solicitor General said that this bill was, in his opinion, a compromise.

Second, the Solicitor General discussed the St. Laurent formula, which he rejected as he had in the past. Here is what he said on the subject, as reported on page 3284 of Hansard:

> Such a piece of legislation, Mr. Speaker, which had the effect of isolating Quebec, was of course unsatisfactory and even harmful to national unity.

After the Solicitor General had completed his remarks, the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) asked him the following question:

> Would the hon. minister allow me a question? Why did he not vote against grants to universities in 1951 and 1957?

And here is the reply of the Solicitor General, as reported on page 3288:

> Mr. Speaker, I do not remember about 1951, but I recall having been the only member to vote against them in 1957.

Mr. Speaker, I shall be dealing with those statements of the Solicitor General in a moment.

At this stage of my remarks, I should like to answer a ridiculous claim made by the Solicitor General when he said, as recorded on page 3288 of Hansard:

> —any legislation which finds its place in only nine provinces out of ten and is not acceptable to the tenth province leaves a very grave doubt as to its constitutionality.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: I believe the hon. member is reading from another debate of this session, not this debate.

Mr. Deschatelets: If you will permit me, Mr. Speaker, to discuss the point you have raised—

Mr. Speaker: I find that this speech was delivered—

Mr. Deschatelets: If you will allow me, on the point you have just raised, I would point out that I am quoting extracts from the speech made by the Solicitor General a few days ago. I am reading from Hansard of April 26, 1960 at page 3436. These are the exact words used by the Solicitor General.

Mr. Speaker: Of course, if that is the case, the hon. member is entitled to proceed; but my record of this debate shows that the Solicitor General spoke and was recorded at page 3284 of this debate, and that was the reason I raised the point.

Mr. Deschatelets: I have reference to the French version.

Mr. Speaker: Oh, it is the French version; very good.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Speaker, as I was saying, the Sollicitor General stated that:

> —any legislation which finds its place in only nine provinces out of ten and is not acceptable to the tenth province leaves a very grave doubt as to its constitutionality.

Let us be logical, Mr. Speaker, and let us dispose of the legal opinion advanced by the Solicitor General in the statement I have just quoted. If it is true that a piece of legislation is of doubtful constitutionality if it is accepted by only nine provinces out of ten, why then did he two days ago, support the estimates on the trans-Canada highway, when he knows quite well that only the province of Quebec is not getting any of the funds voted for that highway?

I could also direct the same question to every Conservative member from the province of Quebec.

Having said this, Mr. Speaker, I should now like to deal with an extremely serious point concerning the Solicitor General, indeed one of the most serious points raised since the beginning of this session. The Solicitor General has stated that the St. Laurent formula was unconstitutional, and that he had voted against it. Moreover, he has said that when a piece of legislation applies only to nine provinces out of ten, its constitutionality is questionable. Well, I have here a book entitled "Keith's British Cabinet System", by Arthur Berriedale Keith, D.C.L., LL.D., D. LITT., F.B.A. On page 92 of this book, there is a paragraph under the heading "The Doctrine of Collective Responsibility", which reads as follows:

(Text):

It is essential to the modern cabinet system that responsibility should be collective. Lord Salisbury expressed this clearly:

"For all that passes in cabinet each member of it who does not resign is absolutely and irretrievably responsible, and has no right afterwards to say that he agreed in one case to a compromise, while in another he was persuaded by his colleagues.

It is only on the principle that absolute responsibility is undertaken by every member of the cabinet who, after a decision is arrived at, remains a member of it, that the joint responsibility of ministers to parliament can be upheld, and one of the most essential principles of parliamentary responsibility established."

Matters are discussed in cabinet, and a decision taken. It then becomes binding on every member of the cabinet and, of course, on every minister outside the cabinet. He must vote for the government's view if a vote is taken in parliament, he must, if called upon, defend the decision, he must not excuse himself on the score that he was outvoted. If he does not consent to take responsibility, he must resign—

(Translation):

And now, Mr. Speaker, I wish—

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. A cabinet minister has to assume his responsibilities—

An hon. Member: Does the minister wish to resign?

Mr. Chevrier: There is an argument, for you.

Mr. Balcer: A minister must assume responsibility for the legislation and acts of the government, and that is what I am doing. I have been glad to do so and, for this reason, I support this resolution.

[Mr. Deschatelets.]

(Text):

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, there is no point of order here.

Mr. Speaker: I have been endeavouring to discover what was the minister's point of order. I had some difficulty in following him.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Speaker, I go on to page 94, where the author says this:

(Text):

... but a ministry made up of men without common principles, held together by little more than the desire for office, would speedily lack power and cohesion.

(Translation):

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have a question to ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming). For the few moments I shall address him, I would like him to listen very carefully, because this concerns him as well as the Solicitor General.

Here is my question: I would ask the Minister of Finance, when he closes the debate, to tell us exactly what he thinks of the point that has just been raised.

The Solicitor General states that when legislation applies in nine provinces out of ten, its constitutionality becomes doubtful.

If it is true, as I have proved, that the Solicitor General maintains that Mr. St. Laurent's formula, based on equalization, is unconstitutional; if it is true that the Solicitor General, as I have also shown, voted against that bill, since the legislation is contained word for word in Bill No. C-56 now before us, I ask the Minister of Finance whether he approves or disapproves the attitude of the Solicitor General; and if the Minister of Finance disapproves that attitude, I shall ask the following question: Which of the two will now resign, and when?

I now ask the Minister of Finance, if he does share, in the matter of ministerial responsibility, the ridiculous views advanced by the Solicitor General, when will they both resign?

Now, from the angle of departmental responsibilities, Mr. Speaker, I would like to complete my argument, and, with your permission, I shall again refer to page 95 of this book, where the author says:

(Text):

If he does not consent to take responsibility, he must resign, as did Lord Russell in 1855, Mr. Forster in 1882—

(Translation):

There is also a list of the few statesmen who, to uphold the principle they held to, resigned because their views were not shared by the majority of the cabinet. Also, may I recall that, under the former Liberal government, some years ago, Mr. Cardin, who was then minister of public works, and Mr. Powers who was minister of national defence (air), seeing that they could not agree with the opinion of the majority of the cabinet members, were logical and resigned.

Mr. Balcer: I approve the present legislation.

Mr. Deschatelets: When we read the speech made by the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard) on May 4, 1960—but I must say, first of all, that on constitutional matters the hon. member for Sherbrooke is the leader of the Conservatives of the province of Quebec—we easily see how he feels about section 9A, because, according to page 3549 of Hansard, he said:

> Could the minister consider right now the possibility of amending section 9A (b) (ii) by replacing the following expression:
> —satisfactory arrangements exist in the opinion of the minister.
> By the following expression
> —satisfactory arrangement exist in the opinion the minister.

And the hon. member for Sherbrooke goes much further when he states:

> It is true that the act on which this bill is based already gives the Minister of Finance exorbitant powers. Nevertheless it is distasteful—

You will note, Mr. Speaker, that he uses the strong word "distasteful".

> —that the federal minister should act as arbitrator and be the only one to have a say on the value of the said agreements.

There we have the proof that our Conservative friends from Quebec are utterly confused, as a result of the constitutional myth which they themselves created with their provincial leaders in 1952, regarding the formula of the federal government, after they had accepted it in 1951.

Now that there is the Barrette-Diefenbaker axis, we realize the embarrassment of our Conservative friends from Quebec because already in their own speeches, we find confirmation of the fact that the attitude taken by the Liberal government of Mr. St. Laurent, not only did not encroach upon provincial autonomy, but was an indication of a courageous, farsighted and wise government.

(Text):

Mr. J. C. Van Horne (Restigouche-Madawaska): Mr. Speaker, I simply want to say a few words by way of congratulation to the federal government and the government of the province of Quebec for having resolved this problem which has held up the progress of the universities of the province of Quebec for many years. What is happening in this debate? It is evident that the Liberal party is trying to take this matter and make it into a campaign issue in the forthcoming provincial election in Quebec.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): You are a Social Crediter.

Mr. Van Horne: Never. Mr. Lesage, the Liberal leader in the province of Quebec, who sat in the cabinet of the former government when Mr. Mackenzie King and Mr. St. Laurent rocked and rolled the Canadian confederation, is the very man who now wishes to try to convince the people of Quebec that he is all out for autonomy even at the expense of the universities.

The main reason I should like to say a few words this afternoon is that I have in my riding a French speaking university, St. Louis University at Edmundston. I know of the tremendous work done there, of the sacrifice and devotion of the professors who have given and dedicated their lives to education. I also know that the university now gets only a pittance by way of aid. Until this year they were receiving in grants approximately $12,500. That amount has been increased this year by 25 per cent, but what they receive is still a pittance. Such grants are not nearly enough, and they do not permit the universities to do the job they wish to do and have to do. Any action by the government in the direction of helping the universities is most welcome.

In passing may I say that the Solicitor General (Mr. Balcer) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), who have taken the initiative in this matter, as well as the late Hon. Maurice Duplessis and the late Hon. Paul Sauve, former premiers of Quebec, and the present premier, Mr. Barrette, deserve the highest commendation; and they are getting that commendation from 99 per cent of the Canadian population and from every serious citizen of the province of Quebec who believes in the progress of education throughout the country.

When I think of the late Mackenzie King and look across the floor of the house and realize whom he had as an adviser, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill), then I certainly do not blame him for crossing the waters and getting his advice from the voices of the grave by holding hands around a seance table.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am afraid the hon. member is departing from the subject matter of this discussion.

An hon. Member: As usual.

Mr. Van Horne: Mr. Speaker, this has to do with the advice we are getting from the leaders of the Liberal party on the other side of the house.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): You are a Social Crediter.

Mr. Van Horne: I am for Restigouche-Madawaska first.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): And Social Credit.

Mr. Van Horne: I have nothing to do with Social Credit. I have nothing to do with any other party, but I can tell hon. members right now that when it comes to helping education and universities I have always maintained that governments have never done enough. That applies to the government of the province of New Brunswick just as much as it did to this government and as it does to the government of the province of Quebec. But of all the governments in the country, which government is now taking the initiative in giving consideration to education and the help that is merited, if not the government of the province of Quebec? That is one reason why in the forthcoming election you will see that the Union Nationale government will be returned to office with a bigger than ever majority.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I understood the hon. member to begin his address by remarking that the Quebec election campaign was being introduced into this house and that he disapproved of that practice. I hope he will continue to disapprove of it by not referring to that matter himself.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): What about Place Ville Marie?

Mr. Van Horne: It is a big success, for your information. The plight of the universities is essentially the subject matter of this debate. One purpose I have in saying a few words this afternoon is to let the government of the province of New Brunswick know that unless more effective, positive and helpful steps are taken to assist universities such as St. Louis University in Edmundston, Sacred Heart University in Bathurst, St. Thomas university in Chatham and Mount Allison University in Sackville, they will be faced with serious and insurmountable problems. They are unable to pay the salaries necessary to get the teachers they need. The people who teach in these universities do so at great sacrifice, in many cases receiving no salaries but merely getting a subsistence allowance for their life's work.

I wish to refer to what I said at the NATO conference in 1958: "So long as lack of money denies the opportunity to our young people to develop the talents that God gave them and to pursue the vocations for which they are endowed, so long as money prevents our young people from doing that, we as parliamentarians are not doing our job and are not being faithful to those on whom the future of Canada depends". In this day of automation, in this day when national defence has become so paramount and we are so dependent upon scientists and others with technical training, are we to sit back and let this country go ahead without giving more help to our universities by placing at their disposal the necessary funds? Let us not forget that one of the main reasons for the unemployment problem today is that many people are not trained, and one solution that should be included in the consideration of factors that will relieve the temporary unemployment each year is education, not only vocational education but technical education. We need more trained men in this country in order to marshal the assets of Canada into more productive wealth and provide jobs for our people. Yet here we are, pussyfooting around, trying to make a political issue for Mr. Lesage in his forthcoming election, when we should be discussing methods of giving more effective help to our universities and to our young people.

I have long been an advocate of the establishment of a national scholarship fund, in co-operation with the provinces, so their constitutional rights will be protected. This has not come about. So long as we deny our young people the right to an education merely because they lack funds, and that is what it amounts to today; so long as we continue to ignore the growing needs of these universities; so long as we deny our students the opportunity to pursue their education as far as their talents will permit them; so long as we refuse to come to grips with this most urgent problem, then I maintain we are not doing our job.

Over the week end I had an opportunity of speaking to the rectors of two universities very near my riding. One of their problems is that next year they cannot get professors. They cannot get professors because they cannot afford to pay them the commensurate salaries. Of course the members of religious orders, the secular priests who look after St. Thomas university, are very willing to sacrifice their lives to education. The discouraging thing which they have to endure is the fact that students leave their schools because they do not have the money to finish their courses, and the fact that they see facilities being denied because of a lack of money. This condition is all the more difficult to bear in view of the fact that the last government wasted some $600 million in developing an aircraft that did not fly. When we see the money that is made available for defence and think how defence is related to scientific education, how can we stop short of a solution to this problem of education?

One purpose in rising this afternoon is to urge this government, by every possible means, to undertake the establishment of a national scholarship fund and to take another look at the plight of the universities, especially those universities whose enrolment may be under 600 or 700 students, what are commonly called the smaller universities. I maintain that it is of the greatest importance that we give this problem the consideration it merits, and that we do so at this session. For that purpose I would suggest and urge that, as the late Paul Sauve did in the province of Quebec, we call together the heads of all the universities in Canada and let them present briefs to us outlining their problems and spelling out their needs.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have allowed the hon. member a good deal of latitude beyond the scope of the present bill, but I do hope that he will not abuse the privilege but will confine his remarks to the question of university grants under this bill.

Mr. Van Horne: I am about to conclude, Mr. Speaker. My main purpose in rising was to try to dispel a few misconceptions that are creeping into this debate in order to make a political issue in the province of Quebec. One of the reasons we have 50 Conservative members from the province of Quebec is that the people felt sure that by sending Conservative members to Ottawa a solution would be found to the problem of the universities in Quebec. It was for that reason that a great many of these people gave the Conservative candidates in Quebec such majorities. This agreement never would have been possible under a Liberal government. This agreement is now an accomplished fact. This agreement passed the test of legality. It had been referred to the most eminent legal minds in the country, and their findings have been taken into very serious consideration by this government.

Let us not forget the plight of the universities, and let us spend more time dealing not only with the plight of our universities but with the plight of our young people who cannot afford an education. Let us get on with this plan.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Would the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska permit a question? Will he assure the house that he will be here for the rest of the session, after having delivered a provocative political speech?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's question does not seem to relate to the bill.

Mr. Van Horne: I think it does deserve an answer, Mr. Speaker. I did not hear it, so would the hon. member mind repeating his question? The only time I have not been in this house was when I was in the hospital.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's question was out of order.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): It is on the record; you can read it.

Mr. Crestohl: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has concluded his speech, and I have recognized the hon. member for Port Arthur.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I have some timidity in getting into this electoral campaign because of some remarks made previously in this debate by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey). I want to give the hon. member the opportunity to carry out his silent treatment by taking my time in commencing my remarks so he can leave if he wishes to do so. During the resolution stage of this measure I made some remarks in connection with this matter, and consequently there were certain reactions in various quarters. I do not intend to try to put any gloss on the remarks I made at that particular time. I still stand behind them.

I do feel that the argument has reached the stage now where the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), supported by other members of the Liberal party, is urging the unconstitutionality of this amendment, and that we should have an assurance from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) and other ministers of the crown that they are positive it is constitutional.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): We said we have doubts.

Mr. Fisher: The hon. member has interjected that they have doubts. I think the hon. member for Laurier was more positive than that, as positive as a politician can be in talking about something as sacred as the constitution.

The main reply for the government up to this stage of the debate has been from the Solicitor General (Mr. Balcer), and it seemed to me he was putting forward a theory which, in effect, meant two constitutions. In my opinion, and in the opinion of my associates, we are not too clear, as a result of the crossfire, as to the constitutionality of the bill. As the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin) put it, we are in favour of any measure that will lead to the financial support of the universities, whether they be in Quebec or any other province. We are strongly in support of the general principle of the bill. We will be very interested in the amendments which the Liberals have promised us they are going to introduce to see if they can tidy up the bill and make it more constitutional.

One of the most distinguished contributors to this debate, the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Dorion), spent a considerable time trying to show, in contradistinction to the hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Roberge), that the fathers of confederation had universities in mind, that they were aware of the universities' existence. The hon. member for Bellechasse also argued that we have a pact or treaty in confederation because the fathers of confederation, especially Sir John A. Macdonald, used the words "treaty" and "pact" a number of times. I should like the hon. member for Bellechasse and the other members who have read the confederation debates to search those debates and find one single case where the word "universities" is used. I do not think they can find it.

I believe the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron) has made this point, which surely seems to me to add some validity and worth to the argument; that if you are going to preoccupy yourself with what was in the minds of the fathers of confederation, it is then valid and worthy to argue that they did not have in mind cutting out universities or assigning university education of the type of which he talked specifically or practically, in any kind of watertight compartment, to the provinces.

The contribution I wish to make at this stage is derivative. I want to read a few paragraphs from a commentary on law and policy by a distinguished Canadian academician, namely Professor J. A. Corry. I hope this intellectual analysis will be of assistance to people like the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) who dealt with federalism, and I think this will be in order in so far as this is a federal-provincial arrangement. Professor Corry in his book states as follows:

> The definition of federalism which the Anglo-American world has found meaningful because for a long time it accorded with our experience is as follows: general and regional governments of co-ordinate and mutually exclusive authority ruling over the same persons and the same territory under the close surveillance of a court. We have seen enough of the tribulations of federalism in the last twenty five years to ask why the founding fathers ever believed that structures so defined could be made to work. If we keep their assumptions in mind, we can see that they would have given something like the following answer in 1789, and again in 1867:
> The provinces, or states, as the case may be, will live largely self-contained lives, after the fashion of provinces in the past. They will have to submit to only a few dictates of the national government in foreign trade, foreign policy and like matters. The electorates, both national and provincial, jealous of individual freedom and wanting little from governments of any kind, will be watchful to keep governments from extending their activities. Restricted in their functions in this way, governments will not run foul of one another. Economic and social life, left to itself, will find its own harmony in freedom. If governments from time to time forget themselves, and trespass one on the exclusive sphere of the other, the courts will declare such trespasses unconstitutional. Where confusion arises about the exact extent of exclusive spheres of legislative authority, the courts will define exactly and clearly the precise limits of federal and provincial legislative power. Both unity and diversity will flourish in harmony under the reign of the constitution and the law.

This is the ideal picture Professor Corry projects as being in the minds of the fathers of confederation. He then goes on to state as follows:

> The greater part of these expectations have been proved false. The provinces have been pulled out of their self-satisfied isolation into dependence on national and international markets. Electorates, it has turned out, want more and more from governments. Both national and provincial governments have expanded their activities out of all recognition. In the course of doing so, they have often found themselves in conflict with one another, and partly because of this have been drawn into a great range of co-operative and interlocking ventures. They even co-operate now in draining the pockets of the taxpayer.

I think that comment is very relevant in terms of this agreement.

Mr. Speaker: Before the hon. member goes further may I say that I am afraid he is setting a bad precedent by reading at length such generalities, which he has not applied at all to the debate in question. If there is a sentence or two which he actually wants to have on the record I am sure the house would not object, but to read long extracts of generalities about the federal system is a precedent that I should not like to see established. That is why I have intervened.

Mr. Fisher: My reason for doing so, Mr. Speaker, is that at least 15 times or 20 times in this particular debate, as it has proceeded up until now, I have been attacked from a number of sources on my view of constitutionalism within confederation. I was trying to lay the groundwork. I think I am coming to what you mean. Professor Corry says:

> Classical federalism in the Anglo-American mode, as I shall call the federalism I defined at the outset, is not really workable in the age in which we live ... It has been transformed into what is called co-operative federalism, or the new federalism.

That argument that we no longer have classic federalism but co-operative federalism it seems to me finds recognition in the very kind of bill that we are about to pass here, or at least that I expect we hope we are going to pass. It is to make a plea for the recognition of this co-operative federalism on the part of members of the house that I rose to speak today. I should like to suggest in closing that the famous quotation or remark of John Donne in his "Devotions XVII" can be applied here with the substitution of the word "province" or the word "man": "no province is an island, entire of itself; every province is a piece of the continent, a part of the main."

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take only two or three minutes in discussing this matter. As hon. members know, Yukon is not yet a province but is approaching the day when it will have provincial status. At the last session of the Yukon legislative council motion No. 20 was passed by the council, in words to the following effect:

> That two members of council be chosen to represent the people of the territory at the forthcoming dominion-provincial fiscal conference scheduled for July 25 to 27.

This resolution passed with the support of all members of the legislative council. Because it involved the expenditure of funds it required the approval of the commissioner of the Yukon Territory. In a letter to the Speaker of the Yukon legislative council the commissioner states as follows:

> I have discussed the proposal with Ottawa and agree that it would be unwise for the Yukon to be represented at this conference. The two territories have a considerably better financial deal with the federal government than do provinces and their special position might well be endangered if they were represented at this conference.

I am diametrically opposed to the opinion of the commissioner which he states to the Speaker of the Yukon legislative council in this instance. It is only right and proper that there should be some representation at these fiscal conferences from the people of the Yukon. As I say, the council passed this resolution without any opposition whatsoever. They did it with the thought in mind, as explained to me, that members of the council should attend some of these conferences—and here I am quoting the Speaker of the Yukon legislative council:

> —if only for the benefit of obtaining greater knowledge and learning the hard steps ahead before we gain provincial status—

I rose simply to say that the attitude of the administration in the Yukon in this regard is a very poor one, is a negative one and one that should be corrected. I rose to lend my wholehearted support to the request of the representatives of the people of Yukon to be represented at this conference, even if it is only as observers.

(Translation):

Mr. Maurice Johnson (Chambly-Rouville): Mr. Speaker, after hearing a digest of Conservative members' speeches presented in a "La Reforme" style by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets), I think I am justified in starting to express my views on this bill by a reference to the speech made on this matter by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) on April 26 last. I think I am not betraying his thinking if I sum up all his arguments in this way.

His remarks were an attempt to justify the arguments advanced by the former federal member for Montmagny-L'Islet, who has since become leader of the provincial Liberal party of Quebec. It had been claimed by Mr. Lesage that Bill C-56 made the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) the arbiter between the provinces and their own universities. The hon. member for Laurier went further by casting doubt on the constitutionality of that legislation. If the hon. member for Laurier was right in terming the act unconstitutional, if the provisions of the legislation implied a delegation of powers, and if that delegation of powers was contrary to the constitution, we would be forced to the conclusion that all fiscal arrangements between the federal government and the provinces since 1945 were likewise unconstitutional.

If that was the legal position of those tax rental arrangements, what else is there for us to do but pass a bill extending the tax sharing act until 1962, that is until the whole matter is reviewed at a federal-provincial conference that would finally settle the problem. That, to my mind, is the principle of Bill C-56, with the following variation:

1. Amendments to the said legislation by this bill provide a machinery whereby the federal government will be allowed to continue until 1962 obligations announced by the former government with regard to Canadian universities. We should remember that regardless of the form in which federal grants have been made so far, the fact remains that, morally, the federal government has undertaken first with regard to individual universities and then with respect to the Canadian conference of universities and the Canadian universities foundation to pay each year a certain grant, the amount of which could be raised or lowered unilaterally by the federal government.

2. Until 1962, universities will receive a set amount on which they can count. Moreover, in all provinces where there is a provincial system of university grants, the total sum which is equal to $1.50 per capita, that is, in each "prescribed province"—to use the very terms of the legislation—corporations taxable in that province under provincial law will benefit on their income from a federal tax exemption equal to that amount.

The principle of the bill is therefore as follows:

1. The application of chapter 29 of the 1956 statutes, 4-5 Elizabeth II, will be extended until 1962.

2. The province of Quebec and any other province that will levy on corporations a tax amounting up to 10 per cent of the federal tax will constitute, under the act a "prescribed" province if, on the other hand, there exists in that province an arrangement whereby it pays grants to its universities on the basis of at least $1.50 per capita.

Since it has been in office, the Conservative government has had to solve many problems left unsolved by the Liberal government. Nobody can, in good faith, blame it if it was compelled to put off until this session legislation designed to remedy a situation brought about by the Liberal government in relation to federal grants to universities.

Can the government be fairly blamed for introducing compromise legislation? Not a compromise with the government of the province of Quebec, but a compromise between the opinion of the people of Quebec, who consider as unconstitutional any form of federal grants to universities, and the opinion of Canadians in general of other provinces, who consider that the federal government has responsibilities and duties towards Canadian universities.

In other words, what is this government doing if not taking into account, in this bill, the objections put forth by Quebec?

Can the government be fairly blamed for taking into account also the opinion and requirements of the majority of the people of Canada?

That is the heart of the problem, Mr. Speaker. I humbly submit that too many Canadians are unaware of the basic elements of the Canadian fact, when they suggest solutions to a national problem. Too many Canadians are unaware of the fact that there are, in Canada, two cultures, two modes of thought very different one from the other. Our Liberal friends argue that Canadian universities in general made their needs known to the Massey commission. But that was precisely the basic mistake of the Massey report: it attempted to codify the standards of a Canadian culture and to make an inventory of the means to finance it, without taking into account the constitutional problems that the suggested solutions were likely to involve.

Having ignored the fundamental requirements of our federative system, when they sought to implement the recommendations of the Massey commission about universities, the Liberals created a new problem which further complicated that of federal-provincial fiscal relations. The Liberals knew they would meet with opposition from the Quebec government. Why then did they not try to establish a system that would have made allowance for this opposition which, in those circumstances, was legitimate? Having committed itself in this way, the Liberal government held fast to its position, and never tried to introduce legislation that would establish a system which would take into account the objections of Quebec and the requirements of the population of the other provinces. It was the great merit of this government that it took into account those views which, let us admit it, are diametrically opposed.

What is the attitude the Liberals would want us to take? To please them we would have to denounce this bill and, consequently, reject the compromise. What would be the consequences if we were to reject this compromise? They would accuse us of trying to thrust our views upon the rest of the country.

Mr. Speaker, we will certainly not play into the hands of the Liberals. We stick to our views concerning the unconstitutionality of federal grants to universities, but we appreciate that the federal government could not cease to offer grants to Quebec universities without legislating in such a way that Quebec taxpayers, in this case the corporations subject to the provincial corporation income tax, would not be doubly taxed.

On the other hand, the central government, in view of its fiscal agreements with the nine other provinces of Canada, could not offer a solution that would have had the effect of throwing its whole system of tax agreements out of balance before it expires in 1962.

There was only one way out, namely to offer an alternative to every province. What Liberals regard as a limitation placed on the autonomy of the provinces is only, in fact, a provision designed to preserve the fiscal balance provided by the act on arrangements between the government and other provinces of the country. Moreover, and I emphasize this, this act is valid only until 1962.

It cannot be claimed that certain provisions of this act constitute a delegation of power from the provincial governments to the federal government.

First, with regard to the province of Quebec, the federal government legislates on the basis of known facts. There is already in the statutes of that province a special act providing for special aid to the universities, the amount of which is equivalent to $1.75 per capita of provincial population. On the other hand, the Quebec legislature, at its last session, passed an act amending the corporation tax legislation. The direct tax payable by corporations coming under this act now equals 10 per cent of their federal tax. As a result, those corporations are threatened with double taxation, because the deduction allowed by the central government has so far been equal to 9 per cent of the federal tax.

The central government has therefore decided to reduce the assessment of this group of taxpayers by an amount equivalent to the increase provided for by the amended provincial legislation. As far as the province of Quebec is concerned, it matters little whether the federal government legislates in one way or another, because, on the one hand, the provincial legislature had asserted its autonomy through the enactment of an item of legislation providing for more substantial grants to universities than are offered by the federal government under the St. Laurent formula, that is to say the equivalent of $1.75 per capita of population in the province. On the other hand, Quebec universities have received the amounts that had been earmarked for them and have immediately handed them over to the provincial government. There remained for the federal government to provide machinery to stop the payment of any federal funds to Quebec universities, without at the same time punishing Quebec taxpayers.

The present legislation meets this need. The Quebec government is not a party to a federal-provincial agreement. It does not even have to consider such agreements. On the other hand, on the federal side, it was necessary to amend the legislation on tax arrangements between Canada and the provinces in such a way as to provide for a parallel deduction equal to the amounts set aside under the old system by the federal government for the Quebec universities. The only way to do that was to set up compensation machinery working in a parallel direction with the deductibility formula provided under chapter 29 of the 1956 statutes. How, then, could the parallelism be established without ratifying, under the act, a pre-existing fact that it would be the Minister of Finance's responsibility to ascertain?

Second, as far as the other provinces are concerned, the act should leave any Canadian province free to use the system offered to Quebec. And to give satisfaction to any province wishing to let its universities collect the federal grants under the former system, a versatile formula had to be provided which did not cancel out the option offered to Quebec taxpayers. Finally since the method has to be such as to not interfere with the fiscal arrangements, since the federal government is bound by arrangements with nine of the ten Canadian provinces, this attitude had to be adopted. The Diefenbaker cabinet should therefore be congratulated for working out this realistic compromise.

Allow me to add in reply to the shabby comments made by the member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) against the Quebec ministers in the present government, that they are probably not as talkative and verbose as the hon. member, but that they are to be congratulated for their efficiency in settling the problems of Quebec honourably.

In my humble opinion, Mr. Speaker, there can be no question of a delegation of powers under this bill.

What are the basic requirements for a delegation of powers?

At least three conditions are necessary:

1. The existence of two sovereign governments.

2. The existence of a formal agreement between the two governments.

3. An assignment by one government to the other of a field of jurisdiction over which the former holds exclusive rights.

Now what are the facts?

In the first place, there is no formal agreement between the Quebec government and the federal government. On the other hand, there is no transfer, from one government to the other, of an exclusive field of jurisdiction, unless the member for Laurier and his fellow members of the opposition wish to claim that the federal government or the provinces have the exclusive jurisdiction in the field of direct taxation.

To maintain that Bill C-56 is unconstitutional because it provides for or implies a delegation of powers between the federal government and one or several provincial governments, amounts to saying that the federal-provincial fiscal agreements ratified by chapter 29 of the statutes of 1956 are unconstitutional, and that the whole fiscal system established by the St. Laurent government, and inspired by the evangelist Lamontagne, is totally, completely and irremedially unconstitutional. I wonder what the Liberal opposition is driving at.

Mr. Speaker, our Liberal opponents make much of the fact that the federal government can, under this bill, withhold a certain amount from the equalization payments of the province of Quebec. But fond as they are of quoting Mr. Duplessis, have they forgotten that Mr. Duplessis never looked upon those equalization payments as anything but refunds on account of moneys illegitimately collected by the federal government which thereby infringed upon the fiscal rights of the province?

Mr. Speaker, what struck me in the argument used by the member for Timmins (Mr. Martin) was his suggestion that education had to suffer from the debates concerning government jurisdiction with regard to federal grants to universities. To infer from this that Quebec universities have suffered from the debate that has been going on since 1952 respecting federal assistance to universities, there is only one step.

This is a fable that must be destroyed at all costs. We owe it to the excellent reputation of our educational system in Quebec, a system built upon sacrifice and thanks to the unshakable faith and perseverance of our educators since the dark days of 1760. We owe it to the good name of our universities which, after the regrettable discussion of federal aid to universities, very undeservedly acquired the reputation of poor relatives in our provincial educational system. We also owe it to the good name of the talented and devoted men who dedicated all their energy to the defense of cultural values peculiar to the French speaking ethnical group in Canada. We owe it to the memory of two great Canadians—yes, great Canadians—who, as history will proclaim, gave the best years of their lives to that work—I was going to say all their lives—those two great men now deceased, the Hon. Maurice Duplessis and the Hon. Paul Sauve. We also owe it in all fairness to their successor, the hon. Antonio Barrette, who is following in their footsteps and who made of the last session of the provincial legislature the session of education. In a word, we owe it to mere justice, to truth itself.

It has been said on various occasions, even in this house, and, I think, if my memory serves me well, that I have heard it said by some of my Liberal colleagues, that Quebec universities lost about $8 million, because Mr. Duplessis was opposed to federal grants.

[Mr. Johnson.]

If I remember well, that was the statement of the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Leduc), and I refer to Hansard for April 1, 1960.

Now, Mr. Speaker, nothing is more inaccurate than such a statement. Indeed, I have here some figures which prove that, even if the provincial government had been opposed to federal university grants since 1952, for reasons which I think were legitimate and easily justifiable in the eyes of people of good faith, our Quebec universities received from their own provincial government infinitely larger grants then those offered by the federal government.

Let us look at the figures for the years 1952-53. The amount offered by the federal government to Quebec universities was $2,087,000; the amount paid by the province of Quebec was, that year, $7,330,980.13; for 1953-54, the federal offer was $2,134,500; the sum paid by the provincial government to its universities reached $6,786,183.51; the amount offered in 1954-55 by the federal government was $2,177,000, whereas the total paid by the provincial government of Mr. Duplessis to universities in Quebec, was $13,342,542.45; for 1955-56, $2,260,000 were paid by the federal government; the amount given by the provincial government of Quebec to its universities, that is, by a government responding to the universities' request, reached $19,203,287.63. For 1956-57, on the basis of $1 per capita, the federal government offered those universities an amount of $4,628,376, while the provincial government paid a total of $11,608,385.88; in 1957-58, also on the basis of $1 per capita, the federal government offered $4,758,000, whereas the provincial government paid $21,701,762.29.

Grants were offered by the federal government in 1957-58, by trampling on the constitution and the rights of Quebec $4,758,000; amounts offered by the Quebec government in full accordance with confederation and the constitution, $21,701,000. In 1958-59, the federal government offered $7 million, whereas the Quebec government paid $9,291,000. The total amount of grants offered by the federal government was $25,470,000, while the Quebec government gave $57 million to its universities.

Some account should also be taken of the devotion to duty of the Diefenbaker government, of the tremendous work of the Minister of Finance within the Diefenbaker government, and also of the provincial government's co-operation, because the provincial government had confidence in the new federal administration, and knew that it would not try to strangle the province of Quebec but would try to reach an agreement on the basis of justice and according to the constitution.

Mr. Speaker, in addition to those $57 million paid to its universities, the Quebec government will now be in a position to offer them an additional amount of $25 million, recovered as a result of its steadfastness. Yet the Liberals call that bad business for the province of Quebec!

Mr. Parizeau: The Liberals are just talking through their hats.

An hon. Member: How logical.

An hon. Member: They are talking through Mr. Lesage.

Mr. Pigeon: The hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier does not know that because he has not been living in Quebec very long.

Mr. Boulanger: Why don't you season that with natural gas?

Mr. Johnson: Mr. Speaker, there has just been a reference to provincial matters. Someone has mentioned natural gas, but I rather feel it is the smell of ink from the printing bureau.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Johnson: Mr. Speaker, my friends from the Liberal party feel themselves drawn into the provincial field in spite of themselves. They often refer, without actually mentioning him, to their man, Mr. Lesage who, in 1954, talking with his customary seriousness about provincial autonomy, referred to a cat which was being pulled by the tail. In fact, that reference may be found in the speech made by the Hon. Jean Lesage, on April 14, 1959, as it appears on page 4319 of Hansard. The one who said those words at the time has just brought forth a huge mouse. In fact, Mr. Speaker, the absentee leader of the Liberal party, the Liberal hero of the great electoral battles of Matane, Roberval, Labelle and Lac St-Jean, the great parliamentarian who has shown his great knowledge of parliamentary procedure at the Reform Club of Quebec City, well ensconced in his plush red seat, paid for out of the liberation fund, had an inspiration on reading Bill C-56. He suddenly discovered, as in some Jacob's dream, that Quebecers believe in the autonomy of their province. This led him to the conclusion that perhaps the citizens of the province of Quebec believe in their cultural value, and believe, in overwhelming majority, that the federal government, under the constitution of our country, has no jurisdiction in the field of teaching and education, that the universities of the province of Quebec must remain entirely under the control of their provincial government.

Suddenly, he saw the light. And that new Saul in scout pants felt animated by autonomist faith. I understand he has even decided to convert the citizens of the whole country to the constitutional doctrine of the Quebec government.

Perhaps in justification of the views expressed by the Moses from Port Arthur, he has acquired, in addition to so many others, a new complex of superiority, that of wishing to impose Quebec views on the rest of Canada.

But, Mr. Speaker, when he was a member of parliament in Ottawa, when he was a federal minister in the St. Laurent cabinet, why did the Hon. Jean Lesage—what a pretentious name given to such a mountebank—why did the Hon. Jean Lesage not show as much enthusiasm in defending the position of the province of Quebec? If he is prepared to state today that Messrs. Duplessis and Sauve would not have accepted such a compromise—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Johnson: —why, when he was sitting in this house—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I ask the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville not to stray too much from the principle of the bill now before us? I appreciate that we may discuss opinions of someone who is not here, in relation to this bill, but I do not believe that we can stray from the subject matter to the extent he has done for the last few minutes.

An hon. Member: Let him go on, he is doing well.

Mr. Pigeon: He is sinking Mr. Lesage, he is finishing him.

Mr. Johnson: Mr. Speaker, I hear the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) say that I am sinking Mr. Lesage. I think that remark was unnecessary, because I feel that Mr. Lesage is already sunk.

Mr. Speaker, you say, in your great fairness to the Liberal opposition, that I am getting away from the bill, so may I ask whether it is out of order to refer to the opinion of the Hon. Mr. Lesage, and whether it means I am getting away from the subject under discussion? I do not think this is getting away from the subject of federal aid to universities, because we are now on second reading and considering the principle of the bill.

Besides, Mr. Speaker, as Mr. Lesage is not very well known in Quebec, I thought I would describe him in order that people may better know who I was talking about.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I though I had clearly indicated to the hon. member what would be relevant, that is to say discussion of opinions expressed on this bill. I do not think we should go any further than that, and discuss opinions on other matters or attitudes about other matters.

Mr. Johnson: Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: He is all at sea, now.

Mr. Johnson: Mr. Speaker I feel that in reporting the views expressed by Mr. Lesage on federal assistance to universities, I am respecting the principle of the bill.

I was saying that Mr. Lesage stated, in a press conference, that Messrs. Duplessis and Sauve would not have agreed to such a compromise.

Consequently, I would ask Mr. Lesage—and I ask also my Liberal friends opposite—why, when he was sitting in this house, he did not proclaim to the country as a whole that Mr. Duplessis was right in not giving in on that matter of university grants?

If he is prepared to admit today that federal assistance to universities is unconstitutional, I would ask him to deny his previous statements and to deny those of the hon. member for Papineau (Mr. Meunier) who, in this house, on April 26 last, blamed Mr. Duplessis for his failure to discuss any compromise with the St. Laurent government.

Incidentally, would the hon. member for Papineau, who is a lawyer, advise a lady client, who had been a victim of attempted rape to discuss any compromise with her attacker?

Mr. Speaker, if Mr. Lesage is sincere, why does he not repudiate his statement in favour of federal assistance to universities? For instance, would he be willing to repudiate what he said to McGill students on January 12, 1959 and that I find in Le Devoir of January 13, 1959? I quote:

> As you know, I was a member of the government which established grants to universities. You may thus infer my personal opinion.

If Mr. Lesage is sincere, when will he deny the statement of the Liberal member for Notre Dame de Grace, Mr. Paul Earl, who stated the following at the provincial legislature on February 24, 1959:

> We should accept the federal grants.

If Mr. Lesage is sincere, when will he repudiate the speech he made in the House of Commons in 1954, since he says he is willing to defend the autonomy of the province of Quebec?

If Mr. Lesage is sincere, he who in 1954 criticized Quebec for taxing Ottawa, why is he criticizing Ottawa today for "untaxing" Quebec?

How can this new convert to autonomy reconcile his former attitudes with the position he pretends to take now? Mr. Speaker, it is on purpose I use the word "pretends", because I do not believe in his conversion. I think he certainly does not deserve that the voters forgive him like Peter was forgiven.

The voters of Quebec feel that instead of this he deserves the fate of the apostle who hanged himself to an olive tree.

Mr. Speaker, I know that the population of Quebec has enough wisdom to settle the Lesage case at the next elections. Therefore, I would not have wasted my time, nor that of the house, in discussing his case, if the Liberal members had not first transposed the debate to the provincial level. Because Mr. Lesage, forgetting the advice of a political friend who told him one day to forget his rhetorical speech, plunged headlong into a denunciation of Bill C-56, probably without having read it properly, or at least understood it properly, the federal Liberal members from Quebec decided to oppose this bill in order, they believe, to help their branch manager who is in deep trouble.

Trying to use every means to attain their ends, they took this opportunity to try to clarify a principle which is obscure, to say the least.

In fact, what logical argument did the Liberals make in this house which could prove a single one of their statements? Oh, I realize it is easy now to judge, out of their context, the attitudes adopted by Mr. Duplessis in 1951, and to condemn him in absentia, when he is no longer here to reply. I personally witnessed the behaviour of some Liberals in the legislature. I remember that when Mr. Duplessis was there they never dared state in his presence the shocking and nonsensical things, not to say the smut, they were pouring out about him outside the house.

Like unmannerly street-boys, they did not dare provoke him to his face. They preferred to fling mud at him when his back was turned.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I really believe the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville is again straying from the matter under discussion. What may happen in the Quebec legislature, especially as far as Bill C-56 is concerned, is absolutely out of order.

Mr. Johnson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Could I, on occasion, talk about Mr. Duplessis?

An hon. Member: Do not split our ears—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member, I think, does not need very special instructions to know what is relevant or what is not. I trust he will obey the rules.

An hon. Member: He could seek advice from the member for Roberval (Mr. Tremblay).

Mr. Johnson: Mr. Speaker, what grieves me, is that I was about to pay some compliments to my hon. friends opposite. If I am allowed to go on, I may have a chance to pay them some compliments, because, now that Mr. Duplessis is no longer with us, certain members who I thought were serious and for whom I have great regard—that is the compliment I wanted to pay to them—are venting their overflowing spleen on this great man. I wonder why they persist in insulting the memory of Mr. Duplessis. What is their interest in doing so, if not an antiquated backward and outmoded conception of the ways to influence public opinion?

Do the Liberal members really believe they are helping the provincial Liberal party?

Finally, do they really believe they are serving Canada, our country? Do they feel that in this way they are serving the national unity which they claim as their handiwork?

(Text):

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I want to take only a few minutes to offer my congratulations to the government and also to the government of the province of Quebec on having resolved what has been for a long time one of the knottiest problems that the nation has had. I understand that the agreement arrived at was basically designed by the government of the province of Quebec and I believe that the acceptance of this agreement by the federal government and the provincial government of Quebec is going to be a most noteworthy and welcome milestone in both national development and the development of national unity in Canada. It can be the beginning of much greater areas of agreement in the years to come.

I completely fail to understand the attitude of the Liberal opposition in the House of Commons. The acting leader of the Liberals, the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), made some rather radical statements in expressing his attitude toward this legislation. As found on page 3282 of Hansard of April 26, he said:

> This is, to say the least, a fantastic piece of legislation. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that no other federal government or minister of finance since confederation has dared to intervene so emphatically, so evidently and so thoroughly in an exclusively provincial matter.

On the next page he went on to say:

> —I believe that several provisions of this bill constitute the worst intrusion ever attempted by a federal government in the affairs of a province.

As we understand the situation, the solution now being offered is by mutual agreement and when a solution is arrived at by mutual agreement I cannot appreciate how at one and the same time it can be called the worst intrusion ever attempted by a federal government in the affairs of a province. According to the Liberals, apparently it is perfectly all right to tax the people of Quebec in order to pay grants to universities elsewhere in Canada; apparently that is the Liberal version of national unity. We do not believe it is right to tax the people of Quebec in order to help finance universities in other areas of Canada when universities in the province of Quebec cannot obtain the same assistance.

Mr. Crestohl: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Regier: Yes.

Mr. Crestohl: Does the hon. member mean to imply that because there is an agreement between the two parties that necessarily makes it constitutional?

Mr. Regier: I did not say that that makes it constitutional. What I did say was that to tax people of Quebec against their will for aid to universities elsewhere while such aid is being denied to their own universities is a worse intrusion in the affairs and the autonomy of a province than is the method now being offered for the consideration of the house.

Mr. Leduc: What about the trans-Canada highway and hospital insurance?

Mr. Regier: If this indeed is fantastic legislation, if this indeed is not a step in the right direction, if in the opinion of the Liberal party it constitutes the worst intrusion, then all I can say is that the method under which they operated for so many years at the expense of national unity and to the detriment of the interests of the people of Quebec was a much greater offence against national unity than is this legislation. If the Liberals want to vote against this bill, if they want to put themselves on record as being unalterably opposed to what in the course of Canadian history will turn out to be one of the greatest steps in the development of national unity; if the Liberal party wants to be on the record officially as being forever opposed to such a move, that is up to them.

We believe this is a happy solution indeed. However, I do want to put one reservation on the record. We hope the government realizes that the needs of the provinces are going to grow and that particularly in the field of education they are going to grow at an alarming rate in the years immediately ahead. I have here an article in the May 21 issue of Maclean's magazine. The article is headed as follows:

> Our high schools are headed for a crack-up unless we hire another 2,400 teachers right away, build another 2,500 classrooms, raise more than $100 million to pay for them.

The article is written by Robert Walker, and he points out that we are now arriving at the stage where the post-war babies are entering our high schools. It will only be a limited number of years until those post-war babies are going to be knocking on the doors of our Canadian universities. The problem with which we are now faced of financing the universities is going to be multiplied many times over in the years ahead and our provincial governments will be unable, under the existing arrangements, to provide the degree of university education that they ought for our young Canadians.

We feel, especially in view of the fact our needs are going to grow so rapidly, that this legislation now before us is rather inadequate. It is really a poor substitute for meeting the needs of the provinces in so far as a new deal in the matter of revenues is concerned which would enable the provinces to meet their constitutional responsibilities. We heard a lot during the election campaign concerning a proposed new deal for our provincial governments. We sincerely hope that the acceptance of the bill now before us will not be misinterpreted and that the government will not believe that we are expressing our satisfaction with the fact that the government has met its obligations and is enabling our provincial governments to obtain the revenues that they need and of which they were assured at the time of the election campaign.

We also note with alarm the insertion in the bill of the date March 31, 1962, which would indicate that the government may not be contemplating any upward revision of aid to universities before the end of March, 1962. We hope that our 10 provincial governments, and especially our educational institutions, will not have to wait until that date before a new deal is granted them because they have already waited for some time.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to ask the hon. member a question before he resumes his seat. Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the C.C.F. was now opposing what Mr. St. Laurent did under the university grants, and which was so warmly supported by Mr. Coldwell and his whole party?

Mr. Regier: We have always been happy with any assistance being offered by the federal government in connection with the cost of university education anywhere in Canada. However, we said at that time we did not believe the attitude of Premier Duplessis was acceptable, and at that time the Liberals agreed with us. Now the Liberals seem to say that Mr. Duplessis has been right all along.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

(Translation):

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, before we go into committee on this bill, may I put a question to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming)?

(Text):

Mr. Pickersgill: On a point of order, sir, the hon. gentleman, I believe, has already spoken in this debate.

An hon. Member: No, he spoke at the resolution stage.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: If the hon. member proposes to explain the sections of this bill, could he not also give some explanation with regard to section 9B, paragraph 2, which says this:

> As determined by the minister.

I would like to have the minister give some explanation later on.

In closing, I may say, that, in view of the adverse remarks of the opposition members on the bill, if they vote in favour of it, they will cover themselves with ridicule in the eyes of the people of Quebec.

Mr. Loiselle: Who is talking of ridicule?

Mr. M. J. A. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, as a representative of French-speaking people living outside the province of Quebec, I would be remiss if I did not say a few words on this legislation.

It is true that in the province of Alberta we have received grants for our universities; anyhow, there was only one university concerned, the provincial university. But, as you know, Mr. Speaker, we must, as Canadians, concern ourselves more with the higher education of our people, in order to keep our young Canadians in this country.

On several occasions, I pointed out my anxiety at seeing too many of our young people leave Canada for other countries.

I found that we had less and less young people in the province of Quebec. I look upon Quebec universities as Canadian universities and not only as institutions of one province. We are all Canadians, and we should look upon universities in each province as contributing to our national development.

Therefore I feel we should constantly increase our support to our universities.

There are those who claim that the federal government should not interfere directly in an attempt to control education—and I stress the word "control". However, now that we are working towards smooth relations between the federal government and the province of Quebec on the matter of grants for education, I think perhaps we should stop quarrelling and discussing procedure, and look at the purpose of this bill.

The purpose now being sought, and which in fact has been reached, is to enable Quebec universities to get grants from the federal government, or the equivalent of such grants. That is what really matters.

I was surprised at this so-called debate, because as a stranger to the province of Quebec and to the politics of the province of Quebec, all I have heard was about petty Quebec politics, something which should never have happened. Moreover, I think opposition members were wrong in taking such an attitude. Most speeches we have heard did not belong here.

Some hon. Members: What about the speech we just heard?

Mr. Lambert: You have been asking for it, because after all, gentlemen—

Mr. Loiselle: It is no surprise to see you fall into the trap.

Mr. Lambert: —after all, gentlemen, is it your privilege to—

Mr. Habel: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think the hon. member should know enough about standing orders to address himself to the Speaker, and not to hon. members as he is doing now.

Mr. Lambert: All right, Mr. Speaker, I shall address myself to you, and through you, to the members of the opposition to whom I was speaking directly. I was going to say that they invite such speeches, because they have no exclusive privilege to launch into all kinds of criticism without inviting rebuttal.

We thank you—

An hon. Member: Thank you.

Mr. Lambert: —for that kind of speech. I thought that was a rather narrow attitude, considering what we are trying to do. I therefore hope that after hours of election campaigning which should have been done elsewhere, we shall get the support of the hon. members opposite.

(Text):

I must say that this bill concerns directly the relationship between the federal government and the provincial government of the province of Quebec in so far as assistance to the universities is concerned. That is the main aim of this bill. One would have thought—certainly this statement applies to those of us who come from regions outside of the province of Quebec—that the members from the province of Quebec, and I refer to members of the opposition, while realizing that this plan had not been entirely successful in the past, instead of twisting, turning and trying to introduce some petty politics, something that was completely unnecessary in my opinion, would have said, "All right, this aim is being achieved and we must thank the good sense of other people".

After all, if you arrogate to yourself the exclusive capacity to negotiate or to arrange things, you are certainly going to find yourself in difficulty. But if other people are able to achieve the end that you would have desired to achieve, why adopt a dog in the manger attitude? That is perhaps the best qualification I can give it, if I may be permitted that expression of "dog in the manger attitude". I therefore felt that on this occasion I would not be accused perhaps of lecturing the house but would be regarded as making what I hope to be objective observations on a subject matter with regard to which we are pleased to see that a method has been found. We have this bill which will go to the assistance of the universities in the province of Quebec which will then receive the same measure of assistance as is being received by universities in other parts of the country. Goodness knows, Mr. Speaker, our universities throughout the country require a good deal of assistance if we are to maintain our young people at the topmost level of education to which I feel they are entitled, thereby developing and preserving the best of the intellectual capacities of our Canadian nation.

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this is the fourth day of the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill. It has been an unusually spirited debate and I believe it has been one of more than passing interest. We have seen some extraordinary things in the course of this debate. I suppose the most extraordinary one has been that of seeing the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) and his principal lieutenant in the house, namely the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) at variance in their approaches to this bill. I shall have something further to say on that subject.

It has been even more extraordinary to find the opposition in this house launched into a debate without knowing how they were going to vote. Can you imagine, Mr. Speaker, serious members of this house going along into the third day before one of them could indicate how he and his party proposed to vote at the conclusion of the debate? Hon. members will recall that, when the hon. member for Laurier spoke in leading off for the opposition in this debate a fortnight or so ago, at the conclusion of his remarks or, I should say, at the conclusion of his denunciation of the bill, I asked him how he was going to vote upon it and he could not or would not tell me.

On the second day of the debate another frontbencher on the other side of the house, namely the hon. member for Levis (Mr. Bourget), delivered his denunciation of the bill. At the conclusion of his remarks I rose and asked him how he was going to vote upon it and he either could not or would not tell me how he was going to vote upon the bill. It went to the third day of the debate, before the Liberals found out how they were going to vote at the conclusion of the debate.

What an extraordinary performance that was, Mr. Speaker. Near the end of the third day the official opposition decided that after all the denunciations their members had uttered of the bill they were going along lamely to vote for the bill at the conclusion of this debate.

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private and public bills, the former having precedence, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15.

PRIVATE BILLS

JEAN BRASGOLD MARTZ

The house in committee on Bill No. SD-43, for the relief of Jean Brasgold Martz—Mr. McCleave—Mr. Rea in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall these 52 private bills be taken under one item?

Mr. Howard: I would ask that they be taken separately.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

The Deputy Chairman: The committee will consider Bill No. SD-43.

On clause 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Howard: I have a couple of comments to make on the item before us, Mr. Chairman. I would say also briefly to the Minister of Finance, through you, that it is unfortunate to have been obliged to interrupt the start of his discourse on some domestic matters in order to deal with others.

In this particular bill which is now before us we find that in the petition, which is dated September 10, 1958, it is shown that the marriage took place in January of 1938 between the petitioner and the respondent, and that there were two children born of that marriage. Also indicated in the petition are the birthdays of the children and the allegation that adultery had been committed during the past eight years and, in particular, on September 1, 1958. The address and name of the corespondent is also given.

At the outset, before I proceed to discuss whether or not the statements made in the petition have in fact been proved by the evidence, I should like to mention that the hon. member for Halifax in whose name this bill stands is unavoidably absent today, presumably taking part in a somewhat strenuous event in his own province. I imagine that the hon. member for Marquette or the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) will be taking the place normally occupied by the hon. member for Halifax in piloting these bills through second reading. I might add that in my opinion no finer gentleman could be found to perform this function or, indeed, many other functions relating to the business of parliament.

I am sure that if during the time I am making some comments on the item before us I get off base as it were, or fail to make myself clear, one or other, both of these hon. gentlemen will be quick to point out the error of my ways and draw to the attention of the committee those aspects which they think I may not have interpreted correctly from the evidence before us.

With respect to proving that the marriage did in fact take place, the petitioner appeared before the committee, was sworn, and was asked certain questions by the clerk—the usual questions relating to age, occupation, and so on. Further questions were then asked with regard to the marriage ceremony. The petitioner replied that she was married, giving the name of the person to whom she was married, the date of the marriage, her religious faith and the name of the person who solemnized the marriage which took place in Montreal. She was then shown a document and asked if she recognized it. She replied in the affirmative and identified the document as her marriage certificate. That certificate was then filed as exhibit No. 1. Thus we can take it, without question, that the marriage did take place, and this very important part of the petition is proved.

It is also indicated in the petition that there are two children born of the marriage, and questions were asked of the petitioner by a Mr. Blank. Perhaps I might indicate, for the benefit of the Hansard reporter that that is the actual name of the lawyer, Mr. Blank, and is not a substitute word such as we often use in place of the real name of an individual involved in some of these cases. Mr. Harry Blank is the counsel who appeared in this case and he asked questions about the children, as appears on page 10 of the report, as follows:

Q. Are there any children born of this marriage?
A. Yes, two.
Q. What are their names and ages?
A. My son—is 20. He was born in 1939 My daughter's name is—. She was born in 1945.
Q. When is the last time you lived together with your husband?
A. 1949.
Q. You have been separated for approximately 10 years?
A. Yes.

The next group of questions, with the exception of the last one which I read, do not relate directly to the children themselves but to the situation existing in the household leading up to the reason for separation. I should like to expand a little further on the subject of the children and consider the situation in which they find themselves at the present time. As to the son who, as stated in the evidence is now in Israel, I would assume he is probably not directly in need of care and maintenance by either of the parents; he is probably in employment or in the armed forces in that part of the country. The daughter, however, being with the mother and being now of the age of 15, is probably in need of care and maintenance such as children of that age require. The question is asked on page 11 by the chairman of the subcommittee, Senator Barbour:

Q. Do you have the children?
A. Yes, sir.

I suppose that even though the question is framed in the plural, the answer in fact relates to the one child who is in the care of the mother. The next question is:

Q. Does your husband contribute anything towards their keep?
A. He did, not too much.

One can draw the conclusion from that that the children have not been cared for too well as far as financial support is concerned. Subsequent questions asked by Mr. Blank the lawyer, while they do not specifically mention the children themselves do indirectly have some bearing on this question:

Q. Did you ever have your husband arrested for non-support?
A. Yes, sir. I had a hard time to get any money from him.

Then there is one other question about some legal proceedings which were taken for non-support, and which is answered in the affirmative.

That is the sum and substance of the questions and answers in the evidence with respect to the care and maintenance of the children. As you know, Mr. Chairman, from having listened to the recitation of evidence in other cases, the questions and answers in this instance are somewhat scanty. I am not casting any reflection on the activities of members of the other house in this regard, I simply mention it as a point of fact. There are some circumstances which might be of interest to the committee which existed, according to the evidence given, prior to the actual petition which was submitted for relief in this instance. I should like to return to page 10 where I ceased when I was talking about the children, and go to questions by Mr. Blank, about a third of the way down the page:

Q. When is the last time you lived together with your husband?
A. 1949.
Q. You have been separated for approximately 10 years?
A. Yes.
Q. Why did you separate?
A. He was running around with other women.
Q. How do you know that?
A. He did it openly.
Q. Do you know what he has been doing for the past number of years?
A. He has been living with someone else.
Q. The same woman?
A. Yes.

I assume the question "the same woman" meant he has been living with the same woman for the past number of years, and that she answered in that sense, probably differentiating this particular woman from her plural use of the word earlier when she said "other women". Then Senator Barbour, chairman of subcommittee No. 3, asked the petitioner questions relating to the circumstances:

Q. Do you know that of your knowledge?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Have you been to the place where they are living?
A. I have not been but I know they are living together as man and wife openly.

I relate these circumstances here, Mr. Chairman, to the conclusion I wish to draw with respect to the material part of the evidence relating to adultery to show that again prime consideration was given, and I think quite properly so, to the fact that there was a common law arrangement, an open, knowledgeable common law arrangement, existing between the respondent and the corespondent. That in itself, upon their own admission and as given in evidence later on by one of the investigators, is the basis upon which this particular divorce was recommended to be granted by the other place and the basis upon which we should also consider it. That is why I relate this preceding evidence by the petitioner.

Following that there was another question by Mr. Blank:

Q. After you discovered that your husband was living with this woman—

Then Senator Barbour interrupts because apparently he had not finished the trend of his questions. He asks:

Q. I think it would be well if you told us how you know.
A. Well, she calls herself Mrs.—

Then the married name of the petitioner herself is given and the married surname she would have if she were in fact married to the respondent.

Q. Have you been talking with her?
A. No, but when her mother passed away she had it announced in the death certificate that she was the wife of—
Q. You mean, the death notice in the paper?
A. Yes.

Then follows a question by Senator Bradley with respect to this relationship:

Q. It is common knowledge in the neighbourhood?
A. Yes.

Mr. Chairman, I think we can draw from that that Senator Bradley was referring to it being common knowledge in the neighbourhood that the respondent and the corespondent were living together openly as man and wife and that the corespondent was in fact using the name she would have used if she were legally married to the respondent; that is, using the married name of the petitioner.

There follow then some questions about collusion and whether any of these things had in fact been engaged in between the petitioner and the respondent. Then Mr. Blank asks at the bottom of page 10:

Q. Have you ever forgiven him for this?

That relates, I assume to his activities.

A. No, sir.
Q. Did you in any manner, shape or form help arrange this relationship between your husband and this woman?
A. No.

Then Senator Bradley asks further similarly related questions:

Q. You have not arranged this divorce between you?
A. No, sir.

Q. There is no chance of reconciliation?
A. No, sir.
Q. You will not forgive him?
A. No, sir.

In this particular instance, also, Mr. Chairman, there are two investigators, as they classify themselves, Mr. Peter Rosen and a Mr. Abe Golden, both of Montreal. They undertook here to give evidence as to their activities with respect of the respondent, what they discovered and saw.

I find it difficult at this hour when the young page boys are not here to get a glass of water. Quite frankly, I do not know why the page boys are absent at this particular hour because I do not see anything in the evidence I have read so far which could be considered indelicate. Nevertheless, that is what takes place.

Mr. Rosen appeared as a witness. He gave his name, age and occupation on page 11. Then he is asked some questions by Mr. Blank, counsel for the petitioner. He identifies a photograph and says it is a photograph of the respondent. Incidentally, in this instance also it is a photograph taken a long time ago, according to the evidence of the petitioner in answer to questions from the clerk of the committee. You will recall that we had some discussion about photographs taken some years ago and whether in fact they would still bear a resemblance to the individual whose picture it was. In this instance I do not know what "a long time ago" means. In any event, Mr. Rosen identifies the photograph and gives the name of the person he says it is a photograph of. Then he is asked:

Q. Will you tell the court—

Those words are used, Mr. Chairman. I would suggest that what he meant was, "Will you tell the honourable subcommittee of the other place". But the use of the word "court" might allow for a thought to be expressed at this time. Perhaps if we do establish a separate federal court we might very well appoint members from the other place as judges of that particular court to deal with divorce proceedings, because they have certainly had a great deal of experience over the years in dealing with them.

The evidence of Mr. Rosen is rather lengthy but I think I can point out the common law arrangements necessary to establish that relationship. If you recall, on one other occasion I was accused of selecting parts of the evidence out of context to paint a particular picture, but I am sure my hon. friend from Marquette and the hon. member for Victoria, (B.C.) would not do that in any event. On one occasion it did occur, and I do not want to fall into the position of having someone say that I selected particular evidence to show particular points. Permit me to make rather extensive reference to the evidence.

A. I investigated Mr.—movements about a week prior to December 1, 1958, we found he was living at—and I found he was living there with a woman. On further investigation I found they had been living there for the last three years together. On December 1, 1958, my man—.

Incidentally, his man is A. Golden, another investigator. I continue:

On December 1, 1958, my man Mr. Golden and myself drove up to—at approximately 6.30 in the evening and we parked ourselves close by and we waited. About 7.30 that evening Mr.—drove up with his truck and he drove his truck into the back yard of the house and then he came out of the yard and into the house. We stayed there until about approximately 11.30 in the evening. Mr.—nor the lady in the house came out. At about 11.30 we noticed the lights went out downstairs and there were still some lights upstairs. It was a two-floor house. Shortly after that, about a quarter to twelve, all the lights were out upstairs. Mr. Golden and myself, we went up to the door and we rang the bell. It took a few minutes and a man—the light came on in the vestibule and the man came to the door and he opened the door.

You will recall, Mr. Chairman, and others will recall, I am sure, that on a previous occasion the hon. member for Vancouver East was wondering how within the period of half an hour adultery could take place. If the hon. member for Vancouver East were here now I am sure he would be quite concerned about how within a period of two or three minutes adultery could take place because this is what he said. He said that at 11.30 they noticed that the lights went out upstairs and there were still some lights downstairs; it was a two-floor house. Shortly after that, about a quarter to twelve, all the lights were out upstairs. I continue:

Mr. Golden and myself, we went up to the door—

As soon as the lights go out they go up to the door and they ring the bell. It took a few minutes and the man came down. Therefore, in a short space of time, in a few minutes—what a few minutes mean I do not know, in fact, but we can assume probably not more than five minutes, according to the particular evidence given by the investigator —adultery took place. The lights went out upstairs. About a quarter to twelve they went up to the door and within a few minutes a man came downstairs and they go on to give other evidence. I use this only to point out that it is ridiculous to expect people to believe that on this particular day adultery took place. This is what it says in the petition, that for the last eight years this has been going on. According to the rules of the Senate you cannot be general, you must specify. Therefore, they specify and they say, "And in particular, on the first day of December, 1958, adultery took place." Adultery took place within the space of a few minutes and we all know that this probably is not possible. I assume it may be possible if a couple were in a rush or if they were using a motel for the evening as happens in some of these cases. But the evidence is that they were living together for three years. Certainly by this time they had got sort of accustomed and used to one another. They say that in that space of a few minutes adultery took place on this particular day or this particular night.

So far as saying adultery took place on the first day of December in particular, I think we can say that is absolute nonsense. According to the times given here it did not take place. If these investigators had waited for half or three quarters of an hour after the lights went out, as is usually the case, before they went and knocked on the door then perhaps one could give some credence to the suggestion that adultery or intercourse had taken place at that particular time. But to say that it took place in the space of a few minutes is to say something that I doubt very much, and I am sure the members of the other place doubted it very much.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question? On what authority does the hon. member profess to come here and to act as an arbitrator in these things? I mean—

Mr. Howard: The hon. member in asking his question got as far as the words "I mean". I thought he was going further.

Mr. Walker: Yes. "Upon what meat doth this our Caesar feed, that he has grown so great" to come into this forum and pontificate on such a subject?

Mr. Howard: Some weeks ago on the invitation of the Minister of Public Works I became interested in the particular cases before us. I am no authority and I am not attempting to arbitrate. If we are going to be asked to pass divorce cases, then I think we should have an understanding of the full implications of the evidence given before the other place in order to determine whether we are doing the proper thing or not. In answer to the question, if we had not undertaken a thorough study of some of these things there would have been a number of cases already passed by this parliament in which there was a great conflict of evidence. One was a contested case and as a result of our study and asking parliament to study these things we are looking into them carefully. It is not a question of pontificating, arbitrating or setting myself up as an authority, which I have no right to do. It is a question of allowing full discussion and coming to an understanding of these cases so long as they are here before parliament. I think it is the responsibility of all hon. members to do the same sort of thing and to acquaint themselves as thoroughly as possible with the circumstances that exist in order to ensure that we are doing the right thing when we pass a law dissolving a marriage.

I think I can say without the shadow of a doubt that adultery did not take place on the first day of December. We can assume that it has taken place. They have been living together for three years as man and wife. That is the evidence given. But in this particular case, if we pass this divorce on the grounds that adultery took place we will be granting it on the grounds of a common law arrangement having existed, and the reference to adultery having taken place on this particular day will not be borne out. This is the prime factor that will be in our minds, and I am sure it was in the minds of the members of the committee of the other place.

Anyway there is further substantiation of this common law arrangement in the evidence. Also, Mr. Chairman, there are some conflicts between the evidence given by the two investigators.

Mr. Mandziuk: May I ask the hon. member a question. The hon. member referred to common law arrangements. What does he mean by a common law arrangement? The evidence in this bill proves that these two people, this married man and this woman, were living together for a period of nine years. The hon. member refers to a common law arrangement. I would like to have him clarify that.

Mr. Howard: Yes, I would be quite pleased to attempt to do it. Certainly I would not think my thoughts on the question of what common law means would anywhere near approximate the understanding that my hon. friend has after having been so many years in a particular profession. The words "common law" are ordinarily understood by laymen to mean two people, a man and a woman, living together but not legally married. This is the circumstance which we have related—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I must advise the hon. member that his time has expired. Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, this question of the common law relationship is one that has received very little consideration from legal authorities but it is very interesting to note that Power in discussing this matter has pointed out the things that are necessary to prove a marriage and what constitutes a marriage. The legal definition of a common law marriage is that it is one where a man and woman live together in a certain relationship and have children and the husband recognizes the children as being legitimately—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Would the hon. member explain to me what this has to do with Bill No. SD-43?

Mr. Peters: In Bill No. SD-43 we are concerned not so much with the charge of adultery because the charge of adultery is incidental to the common law marriage which has lasted for over nine years. I was trying to point out that the common law relationship has been accepted in a number of acts. One of them is the War Veterans Allowance Act.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I cannot see anything in the preamble of this bill referring to a common law relationship. This bill refers to adultery as the cause for divorce. There is no reference to the common law relationship.

Mr. Peters: When the hon. member for Skeena was discussing this bill a question was asked toward the end of his remarks.

An hon. Member: No one asked you.

Mr. Peters: Whether or not I was asked maybe I will see fit to answer. I would suggest that the charge of adultery is only incidental to the situation that has developed over a period of years and that we are not so much concerned with the adultery charge. I am quite sure we can prove that there are no grounds for adultery as such in this bill but that a situation developed over a period of nine years which would tend to convince one that adultery was quite possible and very likely and in fact did happen. Having regard to the over-all situation rather than a specific incident, though the other committee asks for a specific incident, I think we could well grant this divorce as we could have granted the last one on the grounds of a common law alliance.

I would be quite happy to go into the legal definition of what constitutes adultery and I think the evidence here will not bear that out. Before we come to the evidence of the detectives it might be wise to mention one other matter that I think is a consideration in this case, and I have reference to the petitioner herself. The petitioner was asked by her lawyer how long it was since she had lived with her husband. The actual question was:

Q. When is the last time you lived together with your husband?
A. 1949.
Q. You have been separated for approximately 10 years?
A. Yes.

This woman has lived apart from her husband for 10 years. As the committee is well aware, the length of time that elapsed from the committing of the first act of adultery of which the wife had knowledge gives rise to the charge that undue delay took place in this case, and undue delay is an absolute bar to the granting of the divorce.

Mr. Mandziuk: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Peters: Yes.

Mr. Mandziuk: On what authority does he base the assertion that undue delay bars the petitioner from seeking a remedy in the courts?

The Deputy Chairman: Order. That question certainly is not relevant to this bill.

Mr. Peters: It seems, Mr. Chairman, that you have ruled that the question is not admissible anyway. Mr. Power has certainly pointed out that this is one of the absolute bars to the granting of a divorce. I only point this out as an indication that this case did not develop overnight. This was not a case of the husband entering into other arrangements over a short period of time and the wife instigating divorce proceedings immediately to seek relief from this situation. This situation carried on for a long time.

The evidence of the investigators appears to be the only thing in which many members are interested and I wish to deal now with their investigation of the so-called adultery. I think we are being unfair and unrealistic in a case of this kind when we ask that adultery be proved. That was my point in endorsing the argument the hon. member for Skeena made that a divorce can be granted on the basis of a common law arrangement.

But when one specific incident in that common law alliance has to be proved and there is not going to be reference to the fact that there is a common law alliance then we are going to have to be as specific in this case as if the husband had gone to a hotel and had been caught in adultery there with a woman. If that is not going to be proved then we should be willing to grant the divorce on the grounds of the husband having lived publicly and openly in a common law alliance. The investigator in this particular case was Mr. Peter Rosen. He is 38 years old and lives in Montreal.

Mr. Chambers: What has that got to do with it?

Mr. Peters: His occupation is investigator. The lawyer asked him these questions:

Q. I show you exhibit 2, a photograph. Can you tell me whose photograph that is?

A. Mr. Louis Martz.

Q. Did you have occasion to investigate Mr. Louis Martz's conduct around the first of September, 1958?

A. That's right.

This is nine years after the couple terminated the marriage, according to the information given by the petitioner.

Q. Will you tell the court what you discovered?

A. I investigated Mr. Martz's movements about a week prior to December 1, 1958, and found he was living at 10675 Gariepy street in Montreal North, and I found he was living there with a woman. On further investigation I found they had been living there for the last three years together.

What he is saying is that the couple made no secret of the fact that they were living in a common law alliance outside the bonds of normal matrimony, and while this is not an admission of adultery I suggest it is certainly an admission that one of the original partners to the marriage had terminated his connections and had begun a liaison with another woman which he intended to continue. I suggest that this in itself should warrant us in granting the divorce. The witness continued:

On December 1, 1958, my man, Mr. Golden, and myself drove up to Gariepy street at approximately 6.30 in the evening and we parked ourselves close by and we waited. About 7.30 that evening Mr. Martz drove up with his truck and he drove his truck into the back yard of the house and then he came out of the yard and into the house. We stayed there until about approximately 11.30 in the evening. Mr. Martz nor the lady in the house came out. At about 11.30 we noticed the lights went out downstairs and there were still some lights upstairs. It was a two-floor house. Shortly after that, about a quarter to twelve, all the lights were out upstairs. Mr. Golden and myself, we went up to the door and we rang the bell. It took a few minutes and a man—the light came on in the vestibule and a man came to the door and he opened the door. I asked to speak to Mr. Louis Martz and he said "That's me. What is it?" I said "We would like to speak to you" and he opened the door and we walked right into the house. I showed him the picture that I had, exhibit 2. I asked him if that was his picture and if he was Louis Martz, and he said yes. I said that we were acting on behalf of his wife and he said "What does she want? What is she bothering me for? I wish she wouldn't keep bothering me. I have been living here. I don't want to be bothered by anybody". I said "Well, we have to get the evidence against you. You are living here with a woman." He said "So what. We have been living together for nine years." I said "That's none of our affairs" and we made our way up the stairs to the second floor, which was a bedroom and a den, and there was a woman in the bedroom and she spoke to Mr. Martz and she said "What do they want?" and he said "It's my wife making trouble for me" and I said "There is no trouble. We just want to know what your name is and that's all". The woman and Mr. Martz discussed something between themselves for a minute or so and then she told us her name was Marie Titleman. There was no one else in the house. We looked around. The bedroom itself had a double bed with two dressers in the room and a couple of chairs and there was woman's and man's clothing in the cupboards in the same room. I then told Mr. Golden we had seen enough, and we left.

Frankly, Mr. Chairman, I think they had seen everything. They even went through the cupboards in the house in order to meet the legal requirements for establishing that adultery had been committed. They invaded the privacy of a family and of a home. Just what did they see? They walked into the house and a man admitted that he was Mr. Martz. He admitted that he was living with this woman, but that is of no importance whatever. We are not interested in that. All we are interested in is establishing that on this particular day, at this particular time, adultery did take place. They looked around and they found some clothing in the cupboard, both men's and women's clothing. They found that both of these people were living there, something they knew before they went there. But they did not find them committing adultery.

Adultery is not something that happens over a period of a week, it happens in a specified period. Some proof must be presented that adultery did take place. I am suggesting that the witnesses did not even attempt to prove that adultery had been committed. This was not important at all. All they did was to find out who the corespondent was. This is absolutely necessary in order to meet the requirements of the law because in presenting a divorce bill we must give the proper name of the corespondent. Except when exceptional circumstances are involved it is impossible under our Canadian law to establish grounds for divorce without giving the name of the corespondent.

This is what has happened. We are confronted with a common law alliance. The implication is that adultery has taken place. In order to establish this fact the detectives in this case went into the house, examined the situation and talked to the man. He admitted the common law alliance, but he did not admit that adultery had taken place on this particular day. The committee is being asked to suppose that adultery did take place or could have taken place. I suggest it is not necessarily proved that the man was in the bedroom upstairs. The evidence does suggest that the lady was upstairs, but there is no proof that this man was not sleeping in the den. There is no proof that this man was not sleeping downstairs on this particular night. There is not even mention of the pillows in this case. Mention is made of the fact that a couple of cushions were involved rather than pillows. We do not even have the limited evidence given in other cases which does give a much clearer indication that adultery could have taken place.

I should like to refer to this question of adultery. On another occasion I said that if a man admitted living at common law the divorce could not be granted on that ground. I was wrong and the lawyers in the house were right. What the judges and courts have discussed on previous occasions was the fact that an admission of adultery was serious, sometimes having criminal implications, and there was always a suspicion the man was doing so by pre-arrangement in order that the divorce could be granted. The common law alliance was not of too much importance, but adultery had to be committed—

The Deputy Chairman: Order; the hon. member is discussing the proceedings in a divorce case and not Bill No. SD-43.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I think in this particular case we have before us a common law alliance which has implications of adultery. I am quite happy to see this divorce bill granted on the stipulation it is granted on the basis of a common law alliance, not adultery, because adultery has not been proven.

The Deputy Chairman: We can just discuss this bill and whether or not, according to the evidence, adultery has been committed. According to the judgment of the committee of the other place, it has been, and that is all we can discuss.

Mr. Peters: In this case, I would say we certainly have before us no evidence that adultery was committed on this particular day.

Mr. Lambert: Vote against the bill, then.

Mr. Peters: I might vote against it. We have not concluded our discussion of the matter as yet. There may be something said by members on the other side of the house that would change my mind. I admit I was partly wrong in my statement on a previous occasion. The chairman of the committee of the other place asked this question:

Q. Was anything said about them living together while you were there?

A. Mr. Martz told us that they were living in that house for about three years, but after further talk he said "We have been living together for nine years in different places but they had lived there for three years". In fact, last week I went up there and I checked again and the same woman was still living in the house with Mr. Martz. They were still living at the same address.

I believe the chairman of the committee of the other place was very concerned about this matter. This is not the normal, stereotyped question we find in other cases. It is rather a different type of question and shows his concern about these people living together, and what the arrangement was.

In so far as the implication that adultery could have taken place is concerned, I might say that in looking through Mr. Power's book I am unable to find any indication that a divorce was granted on the ground of what is called common law arrangement. It is for this reason that I am quite concerned—as was the chairman of the committee of the other place—about the fact of the alliance or the arrangement that was made and which, in my humble opinion and I think in the opinion of many members of the other place, was given full consideration, and the divorce was granted.

There was a second witness to this incident on this particular night and that was Mr. Abe Golden, age 52, living in Montreal and also classified as to occupation as an investigator. Defence counsel Mr. Blank started his questioning in this way:

Q. Mr. Golden, I show you a photograph, exhibit 2. Do you recognize the photograph?
A. Mr. Louis Martz.
Q. Did you have occasion to visit premises at 10675 Gariepy street in Montreal on December 1, 1958, with Mr. Rosen?
A. Yes.
Q. Will you tell the committee what you saw and heard?
A. At approximately 11.30 p.m. Mr. Rosen rang the bell and it was answered by a man. We entered the house and the man had on his pyjamas. Mr. Rosen showed him the photograph and he admitted he was the man in the picture.

It would appear that he was in this picture more than just in this particular photograph.

Q. And what happened?
A. While we were conversing I followed Mr. Rosen upstairs to the bedroom and there was a woman in bed.

That is quite an interesting sentence:

While we were conversing I followed Mr. Rosen upstairs and there was a woman in bed.

I suppose he left Mr. Martz downstairs conversing with himself. But in any event they arrived upstairs.

Mr. Martz got nasty and wanted to know what it was all about—

I presume that is while he was discussing matters with himself downstairs.

—and we told him we were there on behalf of his wife. He said, "What is she bothering me for? I have been living with this woman for nine years." We then left.

Mr. Chairman, they did not leave then. They looked through the dresser drawers. They examined the cupboards and they ascertained for themselves that women's clothing and men's clothing was contained in those cupboards. This fellow therefore left too soon because there should be another couple of lines to the questioning of him as to whether there was a reasonable indication that a man and a woman both shared that particular room.

Q. Do you recall about seven years ago I asked you to serve a subpoena upon a woman in connection with a case of Louis Martz?
A. Yes.
Q. Is this the same woman you served on Querbes street?
A. Yes, sir.
By the Chairman (Senator Barbour):
Q. Was the bedroom on the same floor that you entered?
A. The bedroom was upstairs.

Then Senator Bradley asks some questions that I think should have been asked by the lawyer himself. His questioning went in this way:

Q. You went upstairs?
A. Yes.
Q. What were the conditions you found in that room?
A. The bed was disturbed. There were two cushions on the bed. It was a double bed.
Q. Any evidence of clothing there?
A. Yes, there were clothes on the bed and on the bureau.
Q. Men's and women's?
A. Yes.
Q. How was Mr. Martz dressed?
A. He had on his pyjamas, sir.
Q. And the woman?
A. The woman was covered up.
Q. She was in bed?
A. Yes, sir.

I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that you would be obliged to draw a fairly strong inference from this evidence of these two investigators if you were going to draw the inference that the charge of adultery had been substantiated or, as I suppose the lawyers would say, that a prima facie case had been established that would indicate adultery in this case. I think the investigators were also of the opinion that if people lived in an open and public common law alliance it was rather foolish for them to be there and to go through the rigmarole they must go through in these cases in order to indicate beyond a reasonable doubt that adultery took place.

In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, this is not an established case of adultery. By the admission of the respondent, the lack of appeal by the corespondent and the inference that has been drawn from the evidence of the plaintiff, I would suggest that there are good grounds for granting this divorce; but this ground must be the ground of common law alliance and not the ground of an adultery charge as has been indicated in the petition. If the committee saw fit to pass this bill today by changing the interpretation from an adultery charge to an adultery charge over a period of years because of a common law arrangement, then I would be quite happy to have this divorce granted on the common law ground. Unless somebody objects to it, it is my opinion that this bill will be passed on the ground of common law alliance.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Mr. Howard: Next sitting.

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Speaker: Now?

Mr. Howard: I should like it to be read on the next day.

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Howard: I rise on a point of order. If I rise to discuss third reading now, presumably we shall reach six o'clock and the third reading will then be adjourned and the bill will fall to the bottom of the order paper. It is not my intention or desire to have that happen. That is why I asked that it be allowed to be read a third time the next day.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that this bill be read a third time at the next sitting of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL TAX-SHARING ARRANGEMENTS ACT

ALTERNATIVE ARRANGEMENTS FOR UNIVERSITY GRANTS—EXTENSION OF INDIVIDUAL INCOME TAX RATE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) for the second reading of Bill No. C-56, to amend the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I had drawn attention to the fact that although the debate on this measure began on April 26, the Liberal opposition did not know at that time how it was going to vote. The debate was resumed on May 4; the opposition did not know then how they were going to vote; it was resumed on May 5, and only as that day passed, and the Leader of the Opposition was finally able to declare himself, did we learn how the Liberals opposite intend to vote on this measure.

[Mr. Peters.]

As an old friend of the hon. member for Laurier, I think a serious injustice has been done to him by his leader. The hon. member could not possibly have made the speech he did make in opening the debate on this measure for the opposition on April 26 without expecting that he and his associates would vote against it. Otherwise, what he said on that occasion, and the attitude he took, become utterly incomprehensible, and I do not think the hon. gentleman takes incomprehensible positions. Similarly, another frontbencher on the other side, the hon. member for Levis (Mr. Bourget) does not ordinarily take incomprehensible positions but he, like the hon. member for Laurier, has been left in an impossible position by the way in which the Leader of the Opposition has now pulled the rug from under his feet.

There is a question of responsibility in this house for utterances made in it. I intend to digress for a moment and offer this comment on the speech made by the hon. member for Laurier in launching the debate on behalf of the official opposition. I am reading part of an editorial which appeared in a well-known Liberal journal, the Toronto Star of April 30:

> The Hon. Lionel Chevrier, former Liberal transport minister, is exaggerating when he describes the new federal-provincial university grants program as—

Mr. Pickersgill: I am rising on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: I was about to rise on what, I imagine, is the same point. I think it would be out of order to cite the opinions of a newspaper reflecting on statements of an hon. member made in the course of a debate in this house.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, there are parts of this editorial which I think fully comply with the ruling you have given—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): How could it?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We read editorials in this house—

Mr. Pickersgill: Not commenting on a debate before the house.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am not reading a portion which comments on a debate; I am reading an observation on a position taken in relation to this question.

Mr. Speaker: I am afraid the minister has ruined his position by reading the first part of the editorial. It is true that a good deal of editorial comment on the policy which is enshrined in this bill has been used, and that would be in order. However, anything that is attributed in a critical way to an individual member in a debate here goes beyond what is permissible in my view, and I hope the minister will govern himself accordingly.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Then I draw attention, with the support of a Liberal source in this regard, to the fact that the charge which has been made in relation to this matter—and I shall be returning to this subject—"will not enhance Liberal party prestige in the rest of Canada or the cause of Canadian education which has suffered from the enforced poverty of Canadian universities". I add this: that "this new arrangement, whatever its faults, has the merit of being acceptable to Quebec and providing funds for Quebec universities".

Let me recall here just what it was that the hon. member for Laurier had to say about this measure when he spoke on April 26. This was the lead-off speech; this was the keynote speech for the Liberal opposition. This is what he said, as recorded at page 3282 of Hansard:

> There is a new constitutional problem created by this bill.

And further:

> This is, to say the least, a fantastic piece of legislation. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that no other federal government or minister of finance since confederation has dared to intervene so emphatically, so evidently and so thoroughly in an exclusively provincial matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Did you ever hear a more blatant example of irresponsibility in this house? The very members who now purport, by rapping their desks, to endorse this extraordinary statement by the hon. member for Laurier are those who in a few minutes will be in the invidious position of voting in favour of this measure.

The hon. member for Laurier proceeded:

> The province will become a mere fiscal agent of the federal authority with respect to a direct provincial tax raised for a provincial purpose. This is surely the height of arrogance.

The height of arrogance? I say it is the height of irresponsibility for hon. members in this house to pretend any longer that they have a sense of responsibility and make such statements as that about a measure which is before them and then turn around and vote in favour of the measure. How can any self-respecting member, how can any self-respecting opposition, how can any self-respecting political party say those things about a measure and then vote for it? If hon. members opposite really believe what was said on their behalf by the hon. member for Laurier how can they follow such a course? How can they claim to be following an honourable course except by voting against a measure which they have condemned in such emphatic terms?

How can the hon. member for Laurier describe this legislation as fantastic and then vote in favour of it? How can he say that no other federal government or minister of finance since confederation has dared to intervene in this way in an exclusively provincial matter, and yet vote in support of what he calls an intervention by the federal government in a provincial field? How can he, as a self-respecting member, say of this bill that the province will become a mere fiscal agent of the federal authority and then turn around and vote in favour of that very proposition?

The course that the opposition has followed in this debate amounts to an utter negation of responsibility. The hon. gentleman wound up by saying that this was surely the height of arrogance. Mr. Speaker, surely it is the height of folly on the part of the opposition to think they can carry conviction to the Canadian people when they talk out of both sides of their mouths while they are debating and then vote in exactly the opposite way. I say that if hon. members opposite believe what was said on their behalf by the hon. member for Laurier they are defaulting in their duty by not opposing this measure. I say, further, that the Leader of the Opposition, when he spoke in this house on May 5 announcing that he and his followers intended to vote for this measure, repudiated what was said earlier on behalf of himself and his party by the hon. member for Laurier, the hon. member for Levis and other members; and he repudiated Mr. Lesage. I say that we have surely heard the height of hypocrisy and double-talk.

Admittedly the opposition was faced with a dilemma with respect to this measure, but surely the way for them to win respect in the face of a dilemma is to take their courage in both hands and stick by what they say in this house, not run away from it. They will not win respect from the Canadian people by a pusillanimous attitude of this kind.

We saw an effort being made by the Leader of the Opposition on May 5 to introduce a diversionary tactic. He wanted to get the mind of the house away from the provisions of this bill with respect to university grants so he tried to bring in as a red herring an argument about equalization, as applied to the other amendment contained in this bill, in relation to the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act.

It was a pretty transparent diversion. We did not oppose the principle of equalization in 1956. On the contrary, we extended the principle of equalization in the 1958 amendment to this legislation; we extended it again by the 1959 amendment and we are extending it again by this amendment which is now before the house. We have nothing to learn from Liberals opposite about the equalization principle or about meeting the needs of the provinces and improving their fiscal positions, because we did something to meet those needs and have done more than any Canadian government in history has ever done.

I am always interested in questions of timing on the part of the opposition. I found something very interesting with regard to the timing of their deliverances on this subject. On March 18 the resolution in anticipation of this measure was moved and it was known to hon. members opposite that the provision for increasing from 10 per cent to 13 per cent the provincial share of the yield from the personal income tax would expire at midnight on March 31. I had hoped that we would resume debate on the resolution the following week and I did make that suggestion to hon. members opposite.

For reasons which to them appeared adequate they did not wish the debate to be resumed at that time and consequently it could not be resumed until April 1 and on that day the resolution was passed. But it was well known to them at that time, indeed it had been a matter of agreement between parties in the house, that the balance of the period up to the date of the Easter adjournment would be fully occupied with the debate on the budget. So the provinces in the meantime dropped back to the 10 per cent share of the personal income tax and it will not rise again to 13 per cent until this measure becomes law.

However, that was not the matter that seemed to concern hon. members opposite. I seem to find another purpose in their timing effort in this regard, for I find that while any attempt to advance the measure further had been effectively precluded by the position they had taken before Easter, the Liberal leader in the province of Quebec—

An hon. Member: Who is he?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —Mr. Lesage on April 13 delivered himself of his views on this measure. There, I think, is an interesting matter of timing because hon. members opposite timed their attitudes on this measure in such a way that the resolution would be passed and the bill would be introduced before Easter, but the bill would not be advanced to second reading and they would not have to take their positions, and in the meantime Mr. Lesage, having seen the bill, delivered himself of his opinion on the bill.

In a report coming from the city of Quebec, which is printed in an article in the Globe and Mail of April 14, appears the following:

> Liberal leader Jean Lesage said today that he will denounce the current federal-provincial agreement on the financing of university grants if his party takes power at the next general elections.

Very interesting. Yet the same party is going to vote for this measure on second reading in this chamber tonight. The report proceeds:

> Mr. Lesage said that the right given in the bill to the federal Minister of Finance to approve any arrangement between the provincial government and the universities constituted a most dangerous precedent in the field of provincial autonomy.
> In addition, the fact that Quebec would have to return the difference between its 1 per cent increase in corporation tax and the grants authorized—$1.50 per head of population—to the federal treasury meant that the federal government was "deciding on the use of a tax which the province was imposing for purely provincial purposes..."
> Mr. Lesage said that this policy of federal-provincial fiscal relations would constitute a major theme of the Liberal campaign during the next two months.

I find it very interesting that hon. members opposite evidently did not wish to be called upon to take a position in this house on second reading of the bill until after Mr. Lesage had delivered his views on the bill in the province of Quebec.

It is perfectly evident that when the hon. member for Laurier spoke on this measure in this house on April 26 he was speaking in accord with the views expressed by Mr. Lesage to which I have just referred. That is why I say that a grave injustice has been done to him when his leader chose to repudiate him when he spoke in this house on April 5. It is evident that hon. members opposite were waiting to take their lead from Mr. Lesage. They waited for his signal, they received his signal, and I think the result has been a sacrifice on the part of a once great party of self respect in the way they have gone about announcing their position in this matter.

I shall have something further to say about the speech made by the hon. member for Laurier. He laboured so hard to establish some respectability for what he called the St. Laurent formula. I will call it the Liberal formula as reflected in the federal-provincial relations and the university grants legislation when we came into office. To try to give that formula some measure of respectability he did his best to tie us, the government, up with it as though we were approving him. He read some portions of speeches I made in the house previously, but, believe me, he was very selective in his treatment of my previous utterances in the house. He omitted my declared determination to find some solution for the problems we had inherited from them. I would crave the right to remind the hon. member of something that I said in this house on September 6, 1958 when I asked the house to approve the estimates of the Department of Finance including the item for federal grants to universities that year. This was not referred to by the hon. member in his speech. I am quoting from page 4725 of Hansard for September 6, 1958:

I wish to make it clear on behalf of the government that we would wish the institutions of higher learning in Quebec to have the benefit of the provision intended on their behalf by parliament. The province of Quebec has more than a quarter of the population of Canada. Last year it had one-third of the students of all of Canada attending institutions of higher learning. Quebec pays its full share of taxes out of which this vote is made available, and the matter has been the subject of representations made by our members of parliament from Quebec.

The hon. member did not quote that and did not say anything in accord with sentiments of that kind. Further on the following page I said:

Now I say, Mr. Chairman, of this agreement in relation to the attitude of the present government, that while the formula contained in the present agreement has not so far been such as to be viewed with favour in the province of Quebec, if there is any formula or modification of the present agreement which anyone cares to put forward which would permit the institutions of higher learning in the province of Quebec to participate, and which is in keeping with the national interest, we as a government are prepared to give it serious consideration.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is exactly what Mr. St. Laurent said.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is exactly what Mr. St. Laurent did not do, and not one of the hon. members opposite did what we have done in this regard.

The next year, while asking the house to approve a similar estimate for federal grants to universities, I made the following observation as reported at page 6393 of Hansard of July 18, 1959. This somehow escaped the attention of the hon. member for Laurier.

This is still the position of the government.

That was said with reference to what I had said the year before, just now quoted.

I add to what I said last year that as this situation develops, if there is no change of attitude, no change in the basis on which these university grants are payable, it must be recognized by all that the present situation cannot continue. In other words, some way acceptable to the jurisdiction that controls universities in Quebec, some method must be worked out that will make those sums intended for the province of Quebec available to the institutions in that province in some form or other.

I can say, Mr. Chairman, I shall certainly devote the best efforts of which I am capable in trying to evolve some modification of this present provision that will make the grants available to all parts of Canada in a way that will be fair and equitable. I say without reservation that the committee cannot contemplate with equanimity a situation under which a large portion of this grant that is earmarked for the institutions of higher learning in Quebec is simply accumulating and is not being made available to be used for the purpose for which parliament intended it.

I closed with these words, Mr. Chairman:

But, Mr. Chairman, having regard to the fact that nearly all of the universities of one province of this country are not receiving their share of these grants, before such an item or any item on this subject is presented to the house in another year a most intensive effort must be made to grapple with this very great difficulty. For my part, I give the committee my personal assurance that anything I can do to help to resolve this difficulty will certainly be done if effort and understanding can do it.

The hon. member did his best to equalize the position of the government and the opposition. We want no part of the position of the opposition in this respect. Our position was that we were not satisfied with the provisions in relation to the university grants. We were not satisfied as long as they were on the basis under which it became impossible for the institutions of higher learning in the province of Quebec to derive any benefit from them. I reject any attempt to link us with the interpretations that the hon. gentleman opposite has used.

Then he talked about the constitution and he got all mixed up in the constitution. He wandered into the theory of delegation, that there is no right on the part of one level of government in this country to delegate jurisdiction to another level. That was completely irrelevant because there is no delegation whatsoever involved in this measure.

Let me endeavour to clarify the position for the hon. member because he has completely misapprehended it and consequently has allowed himself to stray into a most far fetched interpretation of this measure. What does this bill do? It offers an alternative, an alternative to the present system of university grants, and it offers that alternative to all provinces in this country. This is open to every province. It does not matter whether it has signed an agreement to rent the corporation tax field to the federal government or not, we want to put all provinces in this country on a footing of equality; therefore, this legislation provides that any province that had rented that field to the federal government and desires to alter its agreement and resume the collection of corporation taxes will be permitted to do so and then it can act on the alternative basis with respect to the university grants.

The decision is left to each province. Nothing is forced upon any province; nothing is taken from any province. No province is hurt. So far as the accounting is concerned at the end of the year, this is a provision in a federal government statute in relation to the measure of accounting for these funds that this legislation provides to be paid by the federal government over to the provincial governments under certain terms laid down in the federal legislation. Is this a trespass? We are simply confining ourselves in this respect to what is proper federal legislation.

This bill does not purport, as the hon. gentleman thought, to confer taxing rights on the provinces. The federal government has no jurisdiction whatever to confer taxing rights on the provinces.

Mr. Pickersgill: Nobody ever said that at all.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is from the constitution of this country that the provinces derive their right to levy taxation, not from the federal government. This measure does not purport to instruct any provincial government or legislature to do anything. When the legislature of the province of Quebec in recent months raised the corporation tax in that province from 9 per cent to 10 per cent it proceeded in exercise of its own constitutional rights. It sought nothing of the federal government or of the federal jurisdiction; it exercised its own rights of its own volition as a free and sovereign legislature.

Incidentally, it may surpass imagination or belief, in the light of what has been said by hon. members opposite in this debate, that the measures that were taken by the Quebec legislature in that regard were taken unanimously in that legislature. There was no voice of dissent raised there. When legislation was passed there to raise the rate of corporation tax from 9 per cent to 10 per cent there was no voice of dissent raised there by the Liberal opposition in the house. When the Quebec legislature was invited to provide grants equivalent to $1.75 per capita of population in that province, available equally among all the universities and institutions of higher learning in that province on the basis of student enrolment, there was not a word of opposition to that measure registered in the legislature of Quebec. No, every member voted for those measures. Those were measures taken by that legislature in exercise of its own sovereign rights.

How can so brilliant a man as the hon. member for Laurier be capable of such a befuddled interpretation of the plain words of the bill?

Look at what he said at page 3282 of Hansard. It just does not bear any more resemblance to the facts of this bill than day does to night. Let me say to him that there is no provision whatsoever in this bill requiring a province to levy an additional tax of 1 per cent on corporate income. The province could raise the money to pay the direct grants to the universities by any method available to it under the constitution. The point is simply this. If the province wishes to replace the present federal grants to universities by equivalent direct provincial grants and if, as the legislation provides, satisfactory arrangements, in the view of the minister, exist for the payment of such direct provincial grants, the corporate taxpayers of that province will receive an additional abatement of 1 per cent in the rate of corporate income tax. That is the federal corporate income tax. Further, in order to preserve equity among provinces, the calculated value of that additional abatement to the corporate taxpayers, and hence to the province, will be adjusted to $1.50 per capita by means of an additional payment or deduction from payments that are provided to be made under the terms of the act. It cannot be asserted that the bill either provides for the levying of a provincial tax on corporate income or that it provides for taking back any part of a provincial levy.

The hon. member went through some strange efforts at argument. He got mixed up in his references to one ninth of the standard corporation income tax referred to in the bill. He thought that that was the provincial tax. Of course, he was quite wrong. The standard corporation income tax is not only not a provincial tax—it is not even a federal tax, but a means of defining and calculating the amount due as tax rental under the provisions of the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act. I trust that the next time the hon. member goes agunning he will come back with more game.

Mr. Chevrier: He will go again, don't worry.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If he goes again I hope he will have a clearer head than he had when he undertook his speech on April 26.

Mr. Chevrier: At least he will deal with the bill.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We are told now that there are conditions imposed. There were no conditions imposed upon the sovereign legislature of the province of Quebec in doing what was done; but in doing what the federal government is prepared to do with the money that is raised by federal legislation and for which the federal government must take the responsibility, the language of the bill is perfectly clear and is confined properly to the exercise of what is clearly federal jurisdiction.

What on the other hand is the effect of opposition to this bill, the kind of attack that was delivered on the bill by the hon. member for Laurier and other hon. members opposite? If that is the position of the opposition, then it means that Quebec—if that position were to triumph—would be denied, as it was before, the benefit of the legislation, the benefit of the equivalent of those federal grants. But for this bill Quebec would have been doomed to be denied the benefit of these provisions. Had hon. members opposite continued in office it never would have received one cent because they would not have changed their formula which they have praised so loudly in the course of this debate. They would not have changed it and Quebec would have had nothing.

Mr. Pickersgill: How do you know?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We will not be misled by their double talk now. Quebec would not have had the benefit of the more than $25 million which has now been distributed.

Mr. Pickersgill: Under the St. Laurent formula.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If the Liberals had continued in office they would have continued to sit tight. They would have continued their nefarious efforts to starve the province of Quebec into submission. I say very firmly that we of this government were not prepared to stand idly by and see a great province of this country treated in that discriminatory manner. In the view of this government, unlike the former government, there are no second-class provinces in this country.

Let them praise their formula. Let them take the new formula proposed, whether in relation to university grants or in relation to the increase that this bill provides for the remaining two-year period covered by the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act in the provincial share of the yield from the personal income tax. They say their formula was so wonderful. They are full of praise of it. If their formula had continued in effect, and it would have if they had continued in office, the provinces of this country, in respect of the yield from the personal income tax, would have gone $55.9 million short in the fiscal year 1958-59 compared with what they did receive under the present government; $65 million in the fiscal year 1959-60; and an estimated $68.3 million in the present fiscal year. That is just $190 million to date, and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) says that is a mere nothing.

Mr. Pickersgill: I never said anything of the kind.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In addition we are providing $100 million through the Atlantic provinces adjustment grants. Therefore, with another year to go beyond the present fiscal year in relation to the increase of 3 per cent in the yield from the personal income tax and in addition to the Atlantic provinces adjustment grants you will see that the provinces, as a result of the changes made by parliament at the request of the present government, will have derived by the end of the five-year period more than a quarter of a billion dollars that they would not have had if there had not been a change of government. That is quite apart from the increases we have made in the provision of university grants and in the provision that is now made by this bill in its other feature.

The last point I wish to mention is that the hon. member for Laurier sought to make a virtue out of the fact that there was no lapse in recent years in connection with the provisions that were made and the share of the institutions of learning in the province of Quebec simply accumulated. I do not like to say it was the Liberal purpose but it certainly was the effect of Liberal policy that the growing accumulation year by year had the effect, and I suspect was intended to have the effect, of exerting ever-increasing pressure on the province of Quebec to yield.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was to make sure they would get their share.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That accumulation began in 1956 and, but for the present government and the present measure it would have simply continued to accumulate rather than being available for distribution upon acceptable terms. I say that there is no virtue in mere accumulation. The fact is that there is some definite virtue and, I think, satisfaction to parliament in the fact that we have worked out a method that has enabled the distribution of that accumulation to be made on an acceptable basis.

Finally, I say that this is a commendable measure. It is fair to all. It is fair to all persons in this country and to all provinces. It takes nothing from any person or from any province. There is no interference whatsoever with the jurisdiction of any province. This measure respects fully the constitutional rights of every province, their rights in respect of taxation, their sacred rights in respect of education. All of the rights of the provinces are respected in this measure. Let us have an end to the kind of double talk that has characterized the speeches we have heard from the Liberal opposition in the course of this debate. The time has now come to stand up and be counted.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I presume we are going into committee on the bill shortly. If the hon. gentleman wishes to put his question in committee that might be more appropriate.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to put it now if the minister will allow it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Very well.

Mr. Chevrier: The question is this. Is the Minister of Finance of the same view now as he was in 1958 that federal grants to universities as distributed by the former government and continued by this government are constitutional?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member has raised that point because perhaps I did not deal with it quite as fully as I should have.

Mr. Chevrier: You dealt with none of the points.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I was concerned about the time limit so I appreciate very much the opportunity the hon. gentleman has now given me to deal with that question. In the course of this debate we have witnessed a good deal of playing with the words "constitution" and "constitutional". Hon. members opposite have sought to put the word through some kind of strait-jacket and, when they say "unconstitutional", treat it as though it simply meant something that would be treated by the courts as ultra vires if an issue arose and it came before the courts in litigation. When we talk not infrequently in these debates, about things being constitutional or unconstitutional I believe we are speaking—I hope we are—about those things that will contribute to the effective operation of the constitutional structure of this country.

Mr. Pickersgill: Double talk.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate would not know the difference between double talk and triple talk. His is never quite so simple as ordinary plain talk; it is either double, triple or quadruple.

Mr. Pickersgill: I say what I mean and I mean what I say.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I go further and say it is clear that when, through items in the estimates, we increased from $1 to $1.50 per capita the funds available to the universities, that was not the kind of legislation that would be ruled ultra vires in the courts, but as long as that kind of legislation had the effect of making effective provision for the institutions of higher learning only in nine provinces and was set up on such a basis that assistance could never become available to the institutions in another province, then we say that this is not the way to treat the Canadian constitution. This is not the way to enable the Canadian constitution to work effectively as it ought to work, as men of good will in all parts of the country want to see it work.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I have the permission of the minister to ask him another question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): With pleasure.

Mr. Speaker: I must report to the house that the minister's time has expired.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister has indicated his willingness to answer.

Mr. Speaker: Only by unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am rising on a question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am rising on a question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order; the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) has a question of privilege.

Mr. Pickersgill: My question of privilege is this: I did not wish to interrupt the minister when he was speaking, but the minister completely misrepresented the position I have taken, and have always taken—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order; the hon. member has a right, if he feels that his views or statements have been misrepresented by a speaker, to call attention to it and make his explanation briefly.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister said—I am not absolutely sure that I can reproduce his words precisely, and I am quite willing to have the minister correct me if I am not being fair—that I had treated the increase in the equalization payments as though it were nothing. That, sir, is not true. I have welcomed them every time they have been introduced, and I have always given this government credit for doing it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On the question of privilege, sir; the hon. member has, it is quite true, allowed himself generously, graciously, condescendingly, to speak well of the action of the government in providing the Atlantic provinces adjustment grant, but he has always poured ridicule on and he has always minimized the increase that the present government has made in the provincial share of the yield from the personal income tax. It was for this reason I gave those very substantial figures in the course of my remarks tonight. So, what looks to him like a very, very small change in the St. Laurent formula, has meant about $190 million to the provinces in these last three years.

Mr. Pickersgill: The record speaks for itself.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Fleming, Eglinton), which was agreed to on the following division:

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon—Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1—Amendment of agreements.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Finance in his opening remarks made some very kind references to his friendship with me and I, of course, can recall the days at Osgoode Hall when he was as flambuoyant then as he was this evening and, of course, those of us who sat in the classroom with him remember how very often the hon. gentleman would make a great deal of noise about a point of law only to discover at the end that there was no point to his argument at all. I say this to him respectfully, because this evening in the remarks which he made so loudly and with such eloquence I do not think he made any attempt to reply with any degree of seriousness to the objections which were posed by those of us who sit on this side of the house to certain aspects of this bill.

Mr. Fulton: And for which you all voted.

Mr. Chevrier: The Minister of Justice made a point of interrupting me by saying that this was a bill for which we all voted. Yes. The Minister of Justice may not remember that on a similar occasion, when he and his colleagues sat on this side of the house, they did worse than that.

Mr. Fulton: On what occasion? Give chapter and verse now.

Mr. Chevrier: When there was a discussion of the National Housing Act in 1954 during a period of four days the hon. gentleman and his friends criticized the government day in and day out and then, when the vote was taken, they voted in favour of the measure.

Mr. Fulton: No constitutional issue there; no provincial election then.

Mr. Chevrier: More than that, Mr. Chairman, there was, during the discussion of that bill—

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: I am surprised that the Minister of Justice is not able to sit there and take it.

Mr. Fulton: You are surprised and disappointed.

Mr. Chevrier: I am disappointed at you. If you will only listen to what I have to say perhaps the disappointment will be on the other side. I was about to say that on third reading of that bill there was an amendment moved by a member of the C.C.F. party that the bill be not read the third time, because of an amendment concerning interest. Again the members of the Conservative opposition who criticized our conduct so strongly tonight through the Minister of Finance voted on third reading, on the amendment, with the government of the day.

An hon. Member: Discuss the bill.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, I am going to discuss the bill, do not worry about that. But the Minister of Finance did not discuss the bill. He raised a smokescreen, and for 40 minutes all he tried to do was to attempt to show that there was a division between us in so far as our attitude is concerned.

An hon. Member: He convinced you.

Mr. Chevrier: There is no division. I intend at this stage to put on record—

An hon. Member: Smokescreen.

Mr. Chevrier: There is no one better than the Minister of Finance at being able to raise a smokescreen around an issue such as this, though he has not been very successful.

An hon. Member: You voted for it.

Mr. Chevrier: Apparently hon. members on the other side of the house do not like this.

Some hon. Members: Oh.

An hon. Member: We love it.

Mr. Chevrier: At least they should do us the courtesy of listening to this speech in the same way as we listened to speeches from the other side of the house. However, if hon. members opposite want to interrupt, let them go ahead and do so because I can speak a great deal louder than they can. I may not be able to wave, the way the Minister of Finance does, and hop, step and jump as he did this evening, but at least I intend to talk to the bill if I am given an opportunity to do so.

The Chairman: Order. May I remind all hon. members that it is not permitted by the rules to interrupt the hon. member who has the floor without first obtaining permission, nor is it permitted to interrupt while the chairman is speaking. I would ask for the co-operation of everyone so that this debate may proceed in an orderly way and so that the hon. member for Laurier may proceed to discuss the bill which is before us.

Mr. Chevrier: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, I appreciate your intervention and I will proceed to answer the point which was raised, namely that there was a difference of opinion between the Leader of the Opposition, and myself and the members of our party. Apparently the Minister of Finance had completely forgotten what I stated as recorded at page 3284 of Hansard of April 26, 1960, and I quote:

> In conclusion I should like to summarize the attitude of the official opposition toward the main parts of the bill. We support the increased payment to the province; that is, the extension of the rate of 13 per cent of the standard individual income tax for a further period of two years, although such an arrangement is not what the provinces were led to believe they would get from the present government before the last general election. Next, we are also in favour of the university grants paid out of the federal treasury, which were started by a Liberal government and distributed through the Canadian universities foundation or, as I suggested last year, through a provincial universities foundation or council, because such grants are in the public interest; they are not financed by a specific direct tax, and they are not accompanied by any conditions affecting education.

So far as the constitutional basis of the proposed new arrangement for federal financial aid to universities through the provinces is concerned, we believe this is an attempt to go beyond the jurisdiction of parliament. We do not feel that anyone in this house should be an accessory to what seems to us a violation of the constitution, even if such violation were to last for a period of only two years. Therefore we feel that the government should either satisfy the house that the bill is completely constitutional or give us an assurance that the necessary modifications will be made during the course of the discussion to bring the bill within the jurisdiction of the federal parliament.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Will the hon. member read on a little further.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister asked a question and I indicated that when we got that assurance then we would consider our position. But the point I am making is that there is no difference of opinion on what was said by myself on this occasion and what was said by the Leader of the Opposition. The Minister of Finance sought to raise a difference of opinion but there was none, and I repeat now that we voted for the second reading of this bill because we believed in equalization payments. We voted for the second reading—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, surely it is not in keeping with the rules of this house for an hon. member, after a vote is taken, to get up and give his reasons for voting as he has. There is a rule of the house which precludes any reflection on a vote. The vote on second reading has been taken and we are not now debating second reading; we are in committee of the whole on clause 1. It is not open to any hon. member now to rise and make a speech indicating the reason why he voted for a bill after speaking against it, or in any other way. That is completely contrary to the rules and proceedings of this house.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, on the point of order, the clause we are on is clause 1 which deals with equalization. I was saying that we voted for the principle and if that offends my hon. friend I do not think it offends against the rules. However, let me put it in this way. I say that we are in favour of the bill because we believe in equalization payments.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, clause 1 of the bill has nothing to do with equalization. It has to do with revising agreements at the option of any province which has signed an agreement and now wishes to go on the new alternative basis which is proposed.

Mr. Chevrier: The first clause deals with an amendment of the arrangements under the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act which is a continuation of the tax-sharing arrangement and which includes equalization payments. I should not be interrupted by the minister, because I believe I am in order.

Mr. Chairman, we believe in university grants, as I said in the statement which I read out. We believe in a continuation of the St. Laurent formula and we believe also that the principle laid down in this clause 1 is one which we can support.

However, there are many hon. members in this house, and I refer particularly to the Quebec Conservative members, who opposed the payments of grants by the foundation, as set out in the definition, within the province. That is why the government has submitted to the house this bill. It is a method which we think raises serious doubts, serious doubts of a constitutional nature which I do not intend to repeat because I put them on record during the course of the original discussion.

In due course, however, we propose to move an amendment to this bill which we think will remove the objectionable features of the bill and which will offer a new method of distributing the grants which we believe is more acceptable and will do away with the seriousness of the objections which I placed on Hansard on an earlier occasion.

There are, it seems to me, a number of objections which have not yet been removed by the Minister of Finance during the course of his statement. The words which I mentioned in this bill, "in the opinion of the minister"—for example.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, that is in a later clause of the bill. We are discussing clause 1 and surely it is not open to the hon. member to stray around and discuss all the clauses at the one time. He is talking of a provision under clause 2 of the bill and we are on clause 1.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, could I say a word on the point of order raised by the Minister of Finance. It is a time-honoured practice in this house which has never been more frequently asserted than by the hon. gentleman who is now Acting Prime Minister that on clause 1 of a bill—I may say this was upheld by your predecessors, Mr. Chairman, and also upheld by you only yesterday when the Minister of Finance raised a point about the resolution stage of a tax resolution —there is a general debate about the provisions and the attitudes of the parties to the details of the bill which cannot be discussed on second reading. What my hon. friend from Laurier was seeking to do was to indicate, since this bill constitutes a scheme of things, to indicate all in one piece so that it will be comprehensible to hon. gentlemen opposite whom we are trying to persuade, that this course should be taken. This cannot be done if a new kind of restriction is to be put upon us, a restriction which was argued against so ably and convincingly, and so frequently, by the present Acting Prime Minister when he sat over here and which you yourself, sir, upheld only the other night.

The Chairman: I understand the practice generally is that on clause 1 of a bill discussion of a general nature can take place and some latitude should be given. However, may I point out to the hon. member for Laurier that going into too many details might bring about repetition when we come to clause 2. I think his views at this point should be more general and not relate to detail as to what his proposed amendment will try to correct; otherwise we would have repetition of debate. But I agree that on clause 1 general considerations may be given.

Mr. Chevrier: I thank you, Mr. Chairman, and I realize there is perhaps a point there. I will not discuss further at this time the amendment which I had intended to move. I will leave it for a later stage. However, I would like within the confines of this clause to recapitulate succinctly, the position so far as we are concerned and I think I can do it under three heads.

It seems to me that there are several objections to the proposed alternatives that the government has outlined in this bill. The first one was in the words which are underlined in the bill, "in the opinion of the minister." It seems to me they raise a serious constitutional doubt in the light of section 93 because they constitute a clear and direct interference with the sovereign right of the province in this field. Here is a field of legislation which is referred to in this bill. Here is a proposed federal statute. Here is a proposed federal law which in fact says directly to the province: "You shall make an arrangement with the universities of the province which shall be satisfactory to the federal Minister of Finance".

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Nonsense.

Mr. Chevrier: That is set out in the bill. Moreover, parliament is being asked to say that the arrangement to be made between the provincial government and the universities must be in accordance with and subject to terms and conditions not inconsistent with those contained in any agreement entered into between the federal Minister of Finance and the Canadian universities foundation. In the face of that it seems to me that, in the matter of education, over which the province alone has jurisdiction, the provincial government will therefore be bound by these definitions and by this agreement to which it will not even be a party.

Then there is, of course, the very serious objection contained in the last part of the bill on page 3 that if more than $1.50 per capita is derived from the provincial tax the federal government must claim the excess as a debt due to Canada. If this is not against the letter of the constitution, then it seems to me it is against the spirit of the constitution. In any event, if it is neither it is odious because the federal government under the terms of the bill will then be claiming the proceeds of a provincial tax collected for provincial purposes.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Why did the hon. member vote for a bill so odious?

Mr. Chevrier: I put on Hansard the reasons for that a moment ago and I was interrupted by the Minister of Finance because I could not discuss it. Now my friend asks the same question.

Without offending the rules of the house I should like to move now to another aspect of this which I think is of considerable importance to us all and particularly to those hon. members who took part in the discussion. I should like to discuss for a moment the consideration of the obligations imposed on the provincial government with respect to its transactions with the universities in the province, in the agreement which is referred to in the bill as being made between the Minister of Finance and the Canadian universities foundation. Here, of course, I want to refer in an especial manner to what three hon. members speaking in this house had to say on the subject, but more particularly the hon. member for Bellechasse. On Friday, April 1, 1960, the hon. member for Bellechasse had this to say, and I quote from his words at page 2811 of Hansard:

(Translation):

First, under the 1952 legislation, institutions qualifying for grants—

(Text):

The hon. member was dealing with what was done by the former administration at that time.

(Translation):

—had to be recognized both by the federal government and by the provincial government in the province where they were operating. Moreover—and this is even more serious—the federal Minister of Finance was given the responsibility of defining the expressions "university level" and "university degree". And to give practical application to this utterly fantastic power, the government, on January 9, 1952, passed order in council P.C. 123—

Of which I have here a copy.

—which gave a federal definition of those terms, and also fo the terms "student" and "university".

And the hon. member for Bellechasse went on to say:

Just as a sample, let me quote the definition given of the phrase "university level":

"With regard to a province, a more advanced curriculum than is generally accepted in the provinces as a prerequisite university enrolment."

That, you must admit, was a dangerous definition, the terms being so vague and indefinite.

Far from improving the situation, those conditions and terms only made it worse.

And the hon. member added, a little further on:

That time, no further compromise was possible, and federal grants were spectacularly rejected.

(Text):

That is a very strange assertion to come from the hon. member for Bellechasse.

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. May I refer to citation 148 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, fourth edition. Surely, this is repetitious. Citation 148 reads:

(1) It is a wholesome restraint upon members that they cannot revive a debate already concluded; and it would be little use in preventing the same question from being offered twice in the same session if, without being offered, its merits might be discussed again and again.

(2) It is irregular to reflect upon, argue against, or in any manner call in question, in debate, the past acts or proceedings of the house, on the obvious ground that, besides tending to revise discussion upon questions which have already been once decided, such reflections are uncourteous to the house and irregular in principle in as much as the member is himself included in and bound by a vote agreed to by a majority; and it seems that, reflecting upon or questioning the acts of the "majority" is equivalent to reflecting upon the house.

With all due deference I contend that what the hon. member for Laurier is doing at the present time is completely contrary to the rule as set out in this citation.

Mr. Pickersgill: On the point raised by the hon. member for Stormont, I do not suppose you need any guidance because it has always been the practice in the house to treat the whole debate from the beginning of the resolution stage until the completion of third reading as a single debate.

The Chairman: It seems to me that citation 148 refers to repetition of debate during the same session but, generally speaking, the discussion of a bill is only one debate.

Mr. Chevrier: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Before I was interrupted I was trying to indicate, and I had about reached the point where I was citing the hon. member for Bellechasse, and I had referred also to the same argument made by the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinonge-Delanaudiere and in part by the hon. member for Charlevoix, wherein a great deal was made of those definitions, but I should like to tell the committee that those definitions had no legal status whatsoever. Those definitions were put in the order in council P.C. 123 for the sole object of calculating the grant and, it seems to me, that does not need a great deal of explanation in so far as this committee is concerned.

Indeed, if the federal government were to offer grants to the universities there had to be some kind of definitions and there had to be some kind of a basis upon which the grants could be paid. There had to be a definition of a university, of university level, of a university degree and of a student; otherwise, the grants could not have been paid, and that is why they were put in the order in council. Thus, those definitions were not in any way as stated by the hon. members in this debate, an encroachment upon the provincial field; but, Mr. Chairman, lo and behold there appears on the scene the Minister of Finance. On the eighteenth day of January, 1960 he enters into an agreement with the Canadian universities foundation, with the national conference of Canadian universities, and in clause 13 there appear the same words, "student, university, university degree and university level", with the same definitions, word for word. I will place on Hansard the French equivalent of what the hon. member for Bellechasse said was a fantastic intrusion and encroachment upon the provincial field.

Here in the agreement made between the Minister of Finance and the Canadian universities foundation is the definition of university level:

"university level", with respect to a province, means a stage of an educational program that is more advanced than the stage that is generally accepted in the province as the university entrance requirement.

And, in the French language:

(Translation):

University level:

With regard to a province, a more advanced curriculum than is generally accepted in the provinces as a prerequisite university enrolment.

(Text):

Word for word with what the hon. member for Bellechasse put on Hansard, the same argument as was made by the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinonge-Delanaudiere and in part the same argument as made by the hon. member for Charlevoix. Will these three members and the other hon. members from the province of Quebec rise in their places and condemn these definitions? They are exactly the same as those brought into effect by the former administration in order in council P.C. 123. If these members are logical with themselves, if they are honest with themselves, then of course they will say that either they did not know about this or, if they knew about it, they should never have made the argument because if it was wrong to use those definitions in 1952, which in no sense was an attack upon the structure of education in a province, surely it is wrong to use them in 1960. It is word for word, phrase for phrase, clause for clause exactly the same. I challenge these three hon. members who entered this debate to rise during the course of the discussion and to tell us why there is not the same objection today in 1960 to the agreement between the Minister of Finance and the Canadian universities foundation.

(Translation):

Mr. Dorion: Mr. Chairman, I apologize for speaking from a seat other than mine. May I ask a question of the hon. member?

Mr. Chevrier: Certainly.

Mr. Dorion: If I understood correctly, what the hon. member for Laurier just quoted is part of an agreement between the Minister of Finance and the federation of universities. Am I right?

Mr. Chevrier: You are.

Mr. Dorion: In that case, could the hon. member not make a distinction between an agreement concluded by the concerned parties and an order of definitions given in a unilateral way by a minister of the crown?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, Mr. Chairman, there is a distinction to be made, except that, in this case, the agreement is mentioned in the bill and, in fact, the province is party to the agreement, even if it did not sign it. There lies our objection.

(Text):

That, sir, is the other point to which I want to come.

(Translation):

Mr. Asselin: It is far-fetched.

(Text):

Mr. Chevrier: My hon. friend says that that is pulling hairs. Just let him listen to this and see if it is because, after all, if what was done heretofore by the former administration is being done word for word by this administration surely it must be as bad, if it was bad, providing hon. members want to be consistent.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

(Translation):

Mr. Dorion: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry—

Mr. Chevrier: No, just a moment. I have not yet finished answering the question of the hon. member for Bellechasse.

Mr. Dorion: I do not want to pester the hon. member for Laurier, but—

Mr. Chevrier: Go ahead.

Mr. Dorion: Are Quebec universities members of the Canadian universities foundation?

Mr. Chevrier: Well, the agreement between the minister and the Canadian universities foundation, obviously, does not affect universities of the province of Quebec, but on the other hand, under this bill the province of Quebec is subject to the agreement between the minister and the Canadian universities foundation and is—

An hon. Member: Bound.

Mr. Chevrier: Bound, that is the word—thank you—as it is said in the bill. It is the point I wanted to make because, if you look at the wording of section 2 (4) you will see this: that—

(Text):

Satisfactory arrangements must be made for the payment by the province directly to institutions of higher learning in the province.

(Translation):

And listen to this:

(Text):

—in accordance with and subject to terms and conditions not inconsistent with those contained in any agreement entered into between the minister and the Canadian universities foundation.

This means that the province will be bound, although it is not a party to this agreement, by the terms that are contained in the agreement and therefore bound by the definition "student"; bound by the definition "university level"; to which the hon. member for Bellechasse took such strong objection; bound by the definition of "university degree"; and also bound by the definition of "university". These are definitions which the hon. member for Bellechasse found were so strong and so fantastic. He said that they were a fantastic provision. Here the bill goes much further than the hon. member may want it to go. From now on if this bill is approved the province in its dealings with the universities will have to comply with any agreement to which it is not a party—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Oh, no.

Mr. Chevrier: —and made by the Minister of Finance with the Canadian universities foundation.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Chevrier: You can ask your question when I am through.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member was very quick to ask me questions.

Mr. Chevrier: Very well, go ahead.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Is it not clear to the hon. member from reading that provision that the agreement between the Minister of Finance and the Canadian universities foundation will have application only to those moneys that are paid over by the minister in pursuance of the legislation to the foundation and that does not include any provision for any province that is a prescribed province, a province which does not rent the corporate tax field to the federal government?

Mr. Chevrier: The minister had better amend his bill because that is not my understanding of it or he had better read the bill. The minister apparently does not understand his own bill because here is what it says:

"Prescribed province" means a province...
(i) that has not entered into a tax rental agreement...
(ii) in which, for that fiscal year, satisfactory arrangements exist in the opinion of the minister—

It is a unilateral deal.

—for the payment by the province directly to institutions of higher learning in the province, in accordance with and subject to terms and conditions not inconsistent with those contained—

In the agreement made between the minister and the Canadian universities foundation. I submit it could not be plainer than it is in this bill. That may not be the intention—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): How can you misread the provision in that way?

Mr. Chevrier: —but there is no doubt that the significance of the definitions used up to now for the sole purpose of measuring grants will be completely changed because under this provision the provincial government will be bound in its dealings with the universities in the province. This means that when the provincial government makes annual grants available to the universities within the province it will have to accept the definition of "student"—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, you were very generous with the hon. member in allowing a general discussion. It was about three quarters of an hour ago that he embarked on that, but his whole speech now is related to the details of clause 2. We are just headed into endless repetition when we come to these clauses. Surely the hon. member must have some regard for the rules of the house. If he is going to discuss the details of clause 2, then in my respectful submission that can only be done when you call clause 2, Mr. Chairman. This is not general discussion at all. This is the most detailed kind of discussion of a clause that has not yet been called by the Chair.

Mr. Chevrier: On the point of order, I was interrupted three times, twice by the hon. member for Bellechasse and once by the Minister of Finance, and asked to give reasons why I made the statement earlier, and I was attempting to reply. The minister asked for it and now that he is getting it he raised an objection because he does not like the interpretation.

The Chairman: Order. We have been allowing time for the interruptions, but the hon. member's time has expired.

An hon. Member: Let him go ahead.

Mr. Chevrier: Thank you.

The Chairman: I may say I was beginning to worry about the discussion of clause 2 because it seemed to me that it was going a little beyond the rule allowing general debate on clause 1. In any event, as the hon. member's time has expired, I do not have to rule on that.

Mr. Chevrier: Would the committee allow me to complete the answer to the questions asked of me by some hon. members?

Mr. Henderson: Southern courtesy, yes.

Mr. Chevrier: The courtesy for which I am asking now I have many times extended to members on the other side of the house.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am quite sure that the committee would wish to extend every courtesy to the hon. member who is speaking for his party. I can only ask, Mr. Chairman, that any general discussion which is permitted be general discussion or else discussion pertinent to the provisions of clause 1, and that detailed discussion of clause 2 be reserved until we reach clause 2. There will be ample opportunity for discussion of clause 2 then. There is no infringement of the hon. member's rights in proceedings as I am suggesting.

Mr. Chevrier: I thank the Minister of Finance for giving me the opportunity of continuing for a moment longer. I think the remainder of my remarks I could make on clause 2, but if I were able to make them now I would not have to make them on clause 2. I would, in order not to encroach upon the time of the committee, simply like to conclude the answers to the questions which were put to me by two hon. members, and then I could resume my seat. This would take a matter of a few minutes.

What I was on the point of saying, Mr. Chairman, when I was interrupted was that if the Minister of Finance at any time found that the agreement which he had made with the foundation was not satisfactory he could change that agreement. If he changed that agreement and its provisions, including the definitions which I have put on Hansard, then the provincial government would again, in its place, have to change the arrangement made between itself and the universities and re-negotiate with them an entirely new arrangement. So, it seemed to me, in answer to these questions, that it was quite evident that this bill contained a clear element of compulsion which had been introduced into this federal legislation with regard to education or, more concisely, to the relations which exist between the provincial government and the universities in the province.

It is for that reason I am astonished that the members of the Quebec Conservative party have not noticed this anomaly or, having noticed it, have not raised it at all. So far as we are concerned we feel that according to our constitution a provincial government is completely free to deal with the universities in the province as it sees fit. It is also a matter of concern to us that it should be the business of the federal government to interfere at all, as it seems now quite clear the federal government will be doing, in the field of education by the wording contained in this bill. That is why we cannot accept the provisions that I have mentioned in the bill. We wonder how it is that the Quebec Conservative members can accept them now after the criticism they made against the definitions, when in no way they were binding upon the provincial government in its relations with the universities in the province.

There are two other points I should like to make but I do not want to trespass unduly on the time of the committee. I shall reserve them for the discussion under clause 2.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, it is quite obvious that the hon. member has wandered far under the guise of carrying on a general discussion such as is permitted on the first clause of a bill when in committee. I do not intend at this moment to follow him in his detailed discussion of the individual provisions and detailed terms of clause 2 of the bill. If I were to do so I would be following him into an open and very clear breach of the rules. I will simply say at this moment, reserving in detail my remarks by way of reply until the proper time when you call clause 2 of the bill, that I do not think I have heard, in 15 years in this house, such a jumbled misunderstanding of any provision of a bill as I heard in this committee on the part of the hon. member for Laurier this evening. I do not like to say that; I regret saying it, but it is a fact.

Mr. Chevrier: That does not deal very well with the point, does it?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I pointed out that I will be pleased to deal with this in detail when we reach clause 2 of the bill. I would not wish the remarks of the hon. member, who has strayed so far from clause 1, to be interpreted as having any validity by reason of their not being mentioned at this point.

I simply make a general observation and hope, in the meantime, the hon. member will really read the provisions of the bill and in that way correct for himself this hopeless jumble in which he finds himself as a result of completely misreading and misinterpreting the plain provisions of this bill.

Mr. Chevrier: I have read it very carefully, and I have spent a lot of time on it. I am surprised that is the only answer of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is not the only answer; the answer will be given at the time it ought to be given when clause 2 of the bill is under discussion, and when the hon. member ought to have made his remarks.

(Translation):

Mr. Leduc: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with much interest to the various members who participated in this debate. Furthermore, I have listened carefully to the outline given by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming).

I fail to understand the attitude of the Minister of Finance, that of the Solicitor General (Mr. Balcer), as well as that of the Quebec premier.

I should like to know from the Minister of Finance whether there is some agreement between the government of the province of Quebec and the federal government. I read in yesterday's press a report of a speech made in Joliette by the Quebec premier and I have here that part of it which will interest the house. Here is what it says:

Mr. Barrette said that there was never any question of an agreement with Ottawa, but a decision taken by an autonomous government to settle a thorny problem. Thus, by proudly expressing our will, we finally succeeded in recovering for Quebec $10 million in taxes every year, and the $25 million lying dormant in Ottawa coffers.

We even got the federal government to admit that it will entirely vacate the field of education, thus finally winning out after years of struggle.

Would the Minister of Finance tell us whether there really was an agreement or not? I am sure everybody would be interested to know whether such an agreement exists. I have here the last letter—

The Chairman: Order. It seems to me that the hon. member's arguments are still quite close to clause 2 of the bill, and I wonder whether it would not be better for the committee to vote on clause 1 before dealing with clause 2, which seems to be the only one of interest to him. In committee it is impossible to start a discussion all over again on second reading. It is permissible to make a few remarks of a general nature on clause 1, but no go so to repeat the whole debate on second reading. When we come to clause 2, or to any other clause, it can be fully discussed.

I wonder whether it would not be better, in the interests of orderly discussion, to reserve the remarks which the hon. member is now making until we examine clause 2.

Mr. Chevrier: I have a suggestion to make to the Minister of Finance. I might perhaps make it in English.

(Text):

If I may I should like to make a suggestion to the Minister of Finance in English and it is this. In order to assist a more orderly discussion in the debate I suggest that we suspend discussion of clause 1 and go on to clause 2 on the understanding that we may have a general discussion on clause 2. The reason I make that suggestion is this. We have an amendment to propose later on. If it were approved it would require a consequetial amendment to clause 1. Otherwise the chairman is going to be pehaps in the difficult position of being obliged to rule. None the less, I think the hon. member for Gatineau and those will follow him should have the general latitude that is allowed under clause 1. I make that suggestion in an effort to be helpful.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The rules of the house make ample provision for proceedings with reference to bills that come before the house, Mr. Chairman. I suggest that we simply follow the rules of the house. So far as clause 1 of the bill is concerned, if the hon. member has an amendment to introduce and if it is relevant, then I suggest that he introduce it. So far as discussion of clause 1 is concerned, Mr. Chairman, you have indicated that you are prepared to countenance some general discussion. Any other discussion, in my respectful submission, must be strictly relevant to the terms of clause 1.

I do not propose to accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Laurier under which we would reverse the order of the clauses and start jumping around the bill. The provisions of clause 1 of the bill are quite clear. They are simply enabling provisions in relation to the revision of any existing agreement that any province has entered into for the purpose of renting fields of taxation to the federal government. Clause 2 apparently is the clause that principally interests hon. members opposite. But surely that is no reason for departure from the rules of the house. If there is discussion relevant to clause 1, I suggest that we should proceed with it. If the discussion that hon. members wish to initiate relates to clause 2, then let us follow the proper procedure and adopt clause 1 and then proceed to clause 2.

The Chairman: May I point out that of course the practice has allowed general discussion on clause 1 of the bill; but nevertheless the rule of strict relevancy applies and it is not permissible to revive a debate on second reading. It therefore seems to me that the remarks of the hon. member for Gatineau were relevant only to clause 2 and were not of the general nature that I have in mind that could be included in remarks on clause 1, and not referring especially to clause 1. I would therefore ask him to wait until we reach clause 2 in order to continue in this line of discussion.

(Translation):

Mr. Leduc: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Since we must discuss only the items concerning clause 7, here is what it says:

1. Subsection (3) of section 6 of the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

Well, Mr. Chairman, I will deal with the sharing of taxes and it is precisely because I want to discuss the sharing of taxes that I would like to know whether the government of Quebec has signed an agreement with Ottawa because, according to the statements of the premier and according to the act adopted in Quebec under which an additional tax of 1 per cent will be raised on the income of the corporations, there is no mention whatsoever that a part of this amount should to be paid back to Ottawa.

Mr. Balcer: There is no mention either of an agreement in the bill.

The Chairman: I believe the point again raised by the member for Gatineau (Mr. Leduc) is not related to clause 1. The only place where there could be a relationship with the provincial act to which he referred is in clause 2. But clause 1 refers to a general agreement, a general method of tax-sharing. I believe the point he raised is related only to clause 2 and I am sure that at that time he will have an opportunity to discuss it. So, I would urge him to wait till we come to that clause.

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, if I may be allowed to make a remark in connection with your own call to order, it is said in the explanatory note of the bill:

> The purpose of clauses 1 and 2 of this bill is to provide certain alternative arrangements for payment, either by Canada through the Canadian universities foundation or directly by a province, of the grants to institutions of higher learning presently paid under the authority of the Appropriation Act.

By simply reading the explanatory note as well as clause 1, I suggest, Mr. Chairman, with all due respect, that it would be in order for the member for Gatineau to discuss this matter.

(Text):

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I wonder whether I can help to clarify this provision of clause 1? Otherwise we are going to waste a good deal of time in going on as we are and, if I may say so, in a disorderly way. The provision of clause 1 of the bill affects only those provinces which up to this time have entered into agreements with the federal government to rent to the federal government the field of the corporation tax. There are eight provinces that have entered into such agreements. Ontario collects its own corporation tax. Quebec has no agreement with the federal government; it collects its own corporation tax. This provision now under debate, Mr. Chairman, simply has reference to those eight provinces which up to this time have entered into agreements to rent that one field of taxation to the federal government and it permits them, if they so desire, to revise, repeal or amend the agreement they have made with the federal government in order to resume the collection of the corporation tax. This clause could have no application to provinces in the position today of Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. Chevrier: May I say a word on this matter because here—

An hon. Member: Ten o'clock.

The Chairman: Order. It being ten o'clock, I think we might continue this discussion when the committee sits again. Then I will hear the hon. member, unless there is unanimous consent to continue now.

Mr. Chevrier: I can do it in about two minutes.

The Chairman: Unless there is unanimous consent to proceed, I shall be obliged to call it ten o'clock.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I suggest that as we are all trying to accommodate one another here this evening perhaps the committee might be willing to continue its sitting for the two minutes so that the hon. member may complete his comment on the point of order.

Mr. Chevrier: I thank the minister.

The Chairman: Is the committee agreeable to that procedure?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Chevrier: The only point I want to make is this, and I will make it quickly. On the discussion of the resolution as well as on the discussion on second reading we are prevented from dealing with the bill clause by clause. There is a rule which prohibits that procedure, and it is a very good one. We speak on the principle, and that is what we did. Now we come into committee and what are we being told? We are being told that we cannot discuss this matter on clause 1, that we must go to clause 2 or wait until discussion of clause 3. We feel that on clause 1, as you yourself, Mr. Chairman, said earlier, there should be a general discussion which should not be in too great detail in order that hon. members might put their objections, if they have any, on record. Then when we come to clause 2 we shall have to deal with that, and clause 3 similarly. That is the proposition I make.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I can only say that the proposition which the hon. gentleman has put forward is completely at variance with the rules of this house. The discussion on clause 1 may be general, if that is permitted, but when it becomes detailed it must be relevant to clause 1, not to clause 2. Discussion on the details of clause 2 must await the calling of clause 2.

Mr. Pickersgill: In view of the fact that the Minister of Finance has spoken again, I suggest you call it ten o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: It being ten o'clock I will deal with the point of order on a later occasion.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I inquire what the business is to be tomorrow?

Mr. Churchill: We shall continue consideration of Bill No. C-56. If that is finished we shall go on with the budget resolutions.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.
