Mr. Peters: I thank the sponsor for that information. I think it excuses Mr. Joyal in some respects, in relation to his questions, as to which he might not otherwise be excused. But I am rather surprised that the legal counsel always get answers to the questions they ask. In this case in particular one of the senators, namely Senator Isnor, asks a question in two separate instances and these questions are not answered. I checked back over some of the other cases in order to find out whether this had been an instance where the Hansard reporters did not get the answer or just did not follow it. I find that when this is done the Hansard reporter or the clerk who is taking down the verbatim report always puts at the end of the question a notation to the effect that an answer was made but it was indistinguishable to the clerk or the reporter. In this case, for instance we find the following questions asked by Senator Isnor:

Q. What do you mean by Montreal?—Where do you say your daughter is?
A. She is in Montreal living with her mother.
Q. How long did you live and cohabit together after your marriage?
A. How long?

This question, of course, is not answered. The question is re-asked:

Q. Roughly, how many years?

There is no answer to the question. We go on to page 13 of the evidence and we find that Senator Isnor again asks the question:

Q. Did she occupy the home you had built?

There is no answer. I am surprised that the senators, when they did not get answers to these questions did not pursue the questioning a little bit further.

There is something else about which I should like to inquire in connection with this matter. In this authority by W. Kent Power entitled "The Law of Divorce in Canada" I read on page 30 some of the statutory bars in general that would prohibit divorce. It states as follows:

The absolute statutory bars to the granting of a divorce are connivance, condonation and collusion. If the plaintiff is shown to be otherwise entitled to a divorce but the evidence establishes connivance, condonation or collusion the decree must be refused.

They refer to a case in Alberta of Emeny v. Emeny in 1929. I suggest that maybe we have here quite a few instances of enemy versus enemy and sometimes friend versus friend; but the indication would be that if it is a case of friend versus friend, probably no decree should be granted. The quotation continues:

As courts can act only upon evidence, the trial judge cannot refuse relief on the ground of an absolute bar unless the evidence is such as to satisfy him that the bar exists; a mere suspicion that it does is not enough.

Then at page 31 it goes on to state as follows:

In an undefended case, the limits of the trial judge's inquiry, either by constituting himself a cross-examining counsel or otherwise, must be left to him; and if the view be correct that there is a provisional presumption against condonation, connivance and collusion it would seem that the better practice is for the judge himself to question the plaintiff on those points in the first place.

I think that indicates quite clearly that if the courts are handling these cases consideration is to be given to some of the constitutional bars. Because the courts are not hearing these particular cases I suggest it is the obligation of members of parliament to do the best they can in order to satisfy themselves that these statutory bars, as long as they are in our divorce act, are observed. I should like to read from the evidence as it was brought out by Mr. Joyal at page 12 where he starts his questioning:

Q. Are you living with her now?
A. No.
Q. When did you stop living with your wife?
A. September, 1949.
Q. You have not cohabited with her since?
A. No.
Q. Could you explain to the committee briefly what was the occasion that led to the separation in 1949?
A. Well, between 1940 and 1949 I was a singer and master of ceremonies for radio and nightclubs and I often had to go out of town to perform my contracts and when I came back home several times there was somebody else in my place. That is one of my reasons for the separation.

This may have been grounds for separation but it would not necessarily constitute grounds for a divorce unless he was willing to prove that adultery had taken place and also was willing to prove that not only had adultery taken place but that adultery had taken place which he had not condoned. The questioning continues as follows:

Q. Did this behaviour on the part of your wife continue over a long period of time? Was it something that was repeated?
A. Oh, yes. For a year and a half or two years after our marriage she kept going out late at night and even going off for a few days.
Q. But you continued to live with her nevertheless?
A. Yes, until 1949.
Q. And that is when you finally separated?
A. Yes.
Q. And you have been living separately and apart from each other since that time?
A. Yes, since that time, September, 1949.

It would appear that during this time adultery was continually taking place. The questioning did not bring out the information as to with whom she had relations but it likely can be assumed that it was at least in some instances with the corespondent in this case. If this is true, it would indicate that condonation had taken place on a particular occasion. In other words, he had condoned this particular offence on a number of occasions and this would indicate that he had changed his mind and was not going to approve it after 1949, while at the same time he had done so for a number of years from 1940 to 1949.

This authority which I hold to be the leading one on divorce, at page 87 points out under "Discretionary Bars" in section 14, "Conduct Conducing to Adultery" as follows:

The wording of the act of 1857 (sec. 31) with respect to this discretionary bar is "such wilful neglect or misconduct as has conduced to the adultery". Such conduct must have been after the marriage. It has also been seen that, even when adultery, cruelty or desertion is set up as a reason for refusing the decree, the question whether it conduced to the defendant's adultery is a vital factor for consideration.

It goes on to point out that the court has to be very satisfied in a case of this nature as to what the wife's conduct was. Although it does not say this, it is indicated that the wife's conduct would come under common prostitution. Even if it was not the same person each time, we would at least be able to assume that she was promiscuous. It is pointed out that if this is the case then the judge must exercise a great deal of discretion in his own right. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, in this case I would think this committee must exercise that right and decide whether it would be advantageous to the welfare of the state and the community in general to grant this particular divorce.

On page 73 there is reference to a discretion being exercised in favour of an adulterous wife although she has been living a life of prostitution. Mr. Justice Bucknill said:

The most difficult part of the case is the fact that she continued to live in this way right on from 1928 to 1934, after she left her husband and at a time when she cannot say her husband was in any way forcing her to do this, or that he was in any way directly or indirectly responsible, except in this way, that he had, in my view, made it impossible for her to go back to him. He had failed to provide her with a proper home and failed to keep up the payments of 25 shillings a week which he had covenanted to do. That being so—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I must remind the hon. member that we are considering the evidence of this case in committee, Bill No. SD-35, not other cases.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I am trying to point out that this particular type of offence had occurred continually from 1940 to 1949. At the same time it would indicate that the husband was quite satisfied to live with her up until 1949. What we are saying is that he condoned her actions for nine years, and if he condoned them he has no right to decide that he is not going to condone them in the future, that it now becomes adultery although it was acceptable before. The law as such is quite clear about this. Condonation of a matrimonial offence means the forgiveness of the offence with full knowledge of the circumstances, followed by the reinstatement of the offending party to his or her former state; subject, however, to the implied condition that no later offence has been committed.

Mr. McCleave: That is the point.

Mr. Peters: In this case he points out that in 1940 when he was away he found someone was living at his home and he condoned it. I would suggest you cannot condone it for a period of time and then all of a sudden decide it is an offence. If you condone it once and there is a repetition—

Mr. Stewart: No. You can only have condonation after the offence.

Mr. Peters: The hon. member knows more about it than I do, I am sure, and it is probably true that you can condone it once and forgive the party. Then next time you do it all over again. That may be true, but I suggest a period of nine years elapsed when this was the case and it was condoned over the whole of that period. Then he decides he wishes to get a divorce, and I suggest you cannot condone the same offence. There is no evidence which would indicate that it was not with the same person.

I suggest we should not accept the argument that adultery was being committed over these years, and that when it continued beyond the time it suited him that he has the right to say he is now going to object to it. Because it would indicate that he probably had established relationships elsewhere, and that he wanted a divorce rather than anything else.

In this treatise of what condonation involves the following is stated:

> If a husband comes to one decision and means to act upon it, and then afterwards says, "Well, notwithstanding that I arrived at that decision and acted upon it, I am now going to take another line," it is clear that so far as a man is concerned, there is no going back.

In other words, if he condones an offence he has, in my opinion, to continue condoning it. If the wife got another boy friend I would suggest he might not be so happy to condone it as previously, but I think that is another line of thought altogether. I am sure we can legitimately pursue that line in this case, because he did not indicate that there was a different man with whom the wife was continuing to commit adultery from 1940 on. This treatise goes on:

> One act of marital intercourse would always be construed as condonation. But in the case of a woman the courts have been far more lenient. The petitioner seems to have tried out the idea of returning to him, and having tried it out, altered her mind with the thought that perhaps after all she would like to go on with her proceedings.

This was in reference to a case where the lady had considered the divorce, as in this case, and then decided that the arrangements were worthy of consideration and she decided not to go through with the divorce even though she had considered it for some time. Before I leave this I would like to refer to another part. It says:

> Since condonation is a conditional forgiveness it must be distinguished from the irrevocable forgiveness conferred by a Rose v. Rose clause in a deed, or perhaps in a mere agreement supported by consideration whereby the parties covenant that no past offence shall be pleaded or admissible in evidence in any proceedings between them. What shall or shall not constitute condonation cannot be determined beforehand by agreement between the parties. Knowledge of the offence is essential to condonation and knowledge must be distinguished from suspicion. Therefore, condonation of an adultery of which the plaintiff was aware with one person does not condone adultery with another person of whom the plaintiff was not aware.

As will be seen from the evidence, there were a number of men involved in this case. Forgiveness of the offence is always complete forgiveness, and no further reference can be made to such an offence as far as the granting of a decree is concerned if the couple continue to live together. However, there may be some substance in what hon. members who are more learned in the law than I am have said, namely that each act of adultery may constitute grounds for a divorce decree. Therefore it might be possible that all the offences cannot be lumped together, as I would suggest they might; that any adultery committed would be grounds for divorce, and if it happened a hundred times it would be no different to it happening once. In this particular case application was made nine years after separation.

I am very unhappy about the fact that the Senate in dealing with the evidence in this case did not establish what the courts of Quebec had found with regard to the separation charge, because it would seem to me that if adultery had been charged and proved in Quebec we would not have too much difficulty about granting this divorce. I am concerned over the fact that the Senate has not given more consideration to the evidence as it was presented to a previous court. Since evidence with regard to the separation was admitted in the Senate, I think there was an obligation on the lawyer concerned to ask what the superior court of Quebec had done with regard to this separation. If a separation had been granted on an adultery charge, then the Quebec court would, of course, have taken into consideration the question of condonation with which we have been dealing. If they did not take that into consideration I think we should ask that this case be referred back to the committee until such time as inquiries have been made regarding the action taken by the superior court in Quebec in respect to it.

There is another point of law which does not seem to have played a large part in the determination of divorce cases in the past, and that is the question of delay. This couple ceased to live together. This probably happened, originally, in 1940, but the adultery at that time was forgiven. Adultery happened continually over the years, and then we find Mr. Charles Charron, a private investigator, going to another country and establishing an adultery charge which appears to differ in no way from the adultery charges that were continually being made over the years. This gentleman did not come to parliament and ask for a divorce until 1960. I presume, of course, that he started the case in 1959—

Mr. McCleave: March 17, 1959.

Mr. Peters: March 17, 1959. I would imagine that if we granted this application it would be a good St. Patrick's Day gift to the gentleman, if he is Irish. But that is an aside. We are concerned with this question of delay. This is a question which enters into these divorce cases in the same way, I presume, as it enters into other cases. It appears that the petitioner had not made up his mind as to what he wished to do. It may be outside our jurisdiction even to ask him what he has decided to do. However, there would seem to have been a great deal of delay between the date when a divorce was sought and the first occasion upon which one of these offences was committed, even if we take the 1949 date.

On page 82 of the Law of Divorce in Canada, section 11, under the heading "Delay", Mr. Power had this to say:

> The delay which under the act of 1857 (sec. 31) is a discretionary bar is "unreasonable delay in presenting or prosecuting the petition." The same discretion exists in New Brunswick and in Nova Scotia. The delay of the respondent in putting in a defence is a factor to be considered in deciding whether cross-relief asked for therein should be granted. The reason for the court frowning on delay was expressed thus by Sir Francis Jeune, in Johnson v. Johnson (1901)—

I read this only because many of us are not lawyers and do not have the advantage of the legal training which is necessary in order to handle legal cases. The citation goes on to give the reason put forward as follows:

> The reasons why this court insists on steps being taken promptly, if they are taken at all, and why it should be very strenuous on the subject of delay, are that it is a terrible thing that people should be going about the world, neither married nor unmarried, possibly liable to contract fresh and illegal matrimony, and certainly exposed to temptation to commit adultery. This is a state of things which ought not to be prolonged for a moment longer than can be properly avoided.

The courts are very strict with regard to this matter of delay, and I think this is something to which we as a committee should give serious attention. Divorce cases have been brought before us after a delay of many years. We might say that this case was delayed only since 1949 because of the condoning of the adultery in the nine years previous to that, but even after 1949—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I must inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, there have been some thoughtful comments made in this debate. In particular, three legal points were raised, and perhaps some explanation should be given by myself as chairman of the committee.

With regard to the first point concerning condonation, I think the hon. member for Timiskaming fully answered his own question when he read excerpts from the authorities, the point being that one has to make up one's mind whether to forgive or not. The point is that you have to make up your mind whether or not you forgive. You can forgive a certain pattern of conduct and after a while if that pattern is continued while you cannot renege with respect to your original forgiveness you certainly do not have to forgive new offences that may occur from time to time. I believe that is the point here. The husband had forgiven everything that had occurred between 1940 and 1949 and after that he lost his patience to forgive.

With respect to collusion I gathered from the hon. members that there was no direct suggestion that there had been collusion. It was pointed out quite ably that the detectives had remarkably easy access into the home in New York. It was almost as though they had been welcomed there with open arms to obtain the evidence they needed for parliament. I think the point about collusion is this. If there had been an arrangement between the husband and wife and she were to go forth and commit adultery for the purpose of giving the husband evidence of adultery that would be clearly collusion and we should not entertain the petition here. If on the other hand she had set up a liaison with this man for some time—and it is pretty obvious in this case that that is what happened—and then made that evidence available rather easily to the husband that in the eyes of the law in such cases as Yaetes in Ontario and on the basis of other authorities would not be collusion. I believe that hon. gentlemen in the other place who heard this case as well as others observed the law very scrupulously and I would say it was applied very fairly in this case.

The third point raised by the hon. member for Timiskaming as to delay is a somewhat harder nut to crack. This would have been an excellent point if the hon. member had brought this newly acquired knowledge of his before the committee so we could have had a greater examination of that particular point.

Mr. Howard: As I understand it, one of the major grounds on which the Quebec superior court grants legal separations is adultery. There is some reference in the civil code of that province to cruelty and other matters but legal separations are granted mainly on the grounds of adultery. If it is not possible for the province to apply adultery as a ground for other action it should indicate this in the cases that come before this house. When a separation is granted on the grounds of adultery in the Quebec superior court it should be proof of the grounds of adultery for divorce and we should no longer concern ourselves with it. That arrangement would speed up the processing of these cases.

I appreciate that complications may arise. As often happens a couple separated on the grounds of adultery may cohabit in the interval but if cohabitation does not occur after the separation is granted we should not concern ourselves with it any longer with respect to proof of adultery.

On Friday last when discussing Bill No. SD-34 the hon. member for Halifax, as reported at page 2849 of Hansard, said:

> Mr. Chairman, we have had a particularly mischievous type of intervention in the debate on this particular case... Ordinarily, I would content myself but I am afraid I have reached a point where I cannot sit here in the House of Commons among certain other gentlemen and hear hon. members from one particular corner assassinate the characters of people who are not here and able to defend themselves.

In this particular case is the hon. member for Halifax of the opinion that the character of anyone has been assassinated and, if so, whose character?

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, that is an interesting question.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I do not think that question has anything to do with this bill. That question could perhaps be asked at another time but certainly not while we are discussing Bill No. SD-35.

Mr. Howard: With deference, Mr. Chairman, I disagree with you—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The Chair feels that that question should not be answered in this committee.

Mr. Howard: How about the individuals concerned in this case? What about the investigator, the respondent, the corespondent, the petitioner, the counsel for the petitioner, and so on? For my own guidance in these cases I do not want to be in the position of being accused of character assassination.

[Mr. McCleave.]

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Skeena has the floor. Is the hon. member for Halifax rising to say something?

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I was going to say there was a fair appraisal of the evidence in this case.

Mr. Howard: It is my intention to direct that question to the hon. member in respect of each bill we discuss. I am interested in knowing if the hon. member used words on Friday last which he did not mean—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member must confine his discussion to Bill SD-35. Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, we raised the question of delay in this case. I am pleased to associate myself with the hon. member for Halifax in his presentation to the miscellaneous private bills committee. We recommend changes in the procedure—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being six o'clock, shall I rise, report progress and request leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

Mr. Speaker: The hour for the consideration of private and public bills having expired, at eight o'clock the house will resume the business interrupted at five o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Benidickson, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Regier.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, at five o'clock I was suggesting that if the announced increase for some civil servants in any way reflects the report of the civil service commission it is the minister's responsibility to make public to the house and certainly to the civil service associations that particular report. I had been saying that if these adjustments do not reflect the one year's study made by the pay research bureau into the question of civil service salaries then we are entitled to draw the conclusion from the announcement of the minister that the wage increases were not in keeping with the recommendations made by the civil service commission to the minister some time ago. If they are not, and there is every indication on the surface that there is no connection between the $15 million announcement in the budget and the recommendations of the civil service commission, then I suggest that the pay research bureau, which is now conducting another one year study to be completed before the next budget is presented, is wasting its time if the minister is going to disregard the activities of that organization within the civil service commission which is supposed to deal with the question of civil service salaries.

But apart from all that I still think that a much more decent approach to the civil service salary structure and working conditions would be to grant bargaining rights to the employees within the public service. If the government has any real thought of putting into practice what it says it espouses, namely the competitive, free enterprise system, then it should certainly extend that concept of free enterprise to employees in the service of the government and allow the true and free play of competitive forces in collective bargaining to apply to the crown and to the employees in the public service. This is a proper extension of the theory in which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) says he believes, and the free play of collective bargaining will be a most beneficial thing for civil servants, for the government service and for the government itself because it will have a tremendous effect upon bringing civil service salaries, which have been too low for so many years, into proper adjustment.

But I suspect that the government is afraid to do any such thing because it knows full well that it could not possibly justify its attitude on salaries for people in the public service before any type of impartial tribunal such as would have to be established if the civil servants had collective bargaining rights. In years past many private employers used to use precisely the same method as the Minister of Finance has used in order to weaken and destroy any effective growth of a union within a particular industry or among the employees of a particular employer. That is one reason why it is provided in the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act and in the various provincial labour acts that it is illegal for an employer to increase or decrease rates of pay and so on during a period of bargaining or during a period when a union is trying to become organized or certified.

This is an attempt on the part of the government to emulate the attitude that many employers used to have some years ago, an attempt to weaken the effect of any organization among its own employees. I do not intend to make any further comments at this time about civil service salaries or bargaining rights even though it may be upsetting to some hon. members opposite, especially those on the treasury benches.

One of the major features of the budget and the key to its nature is the use of the phrase, a balanced budget. I am quite sure that if the Minister of Finance applied the principle he has used to balance this budget to his own financial system within his household he would not think he was being fair to his family because certainly he would not want to limit his own personal financial arrangements to such an extent as to deprive his wife and children of food, clothing, shelter and things of that nature. But that is precisely what the Minister of Finance is doing with this balanced budget because on one side of the scale that functions in this balancing process there rest about 800,000 unemployed people. This is the balancing factor in the budget and nothing else.

I have here the figure of registrations at national employment service offices released on Wednesday, March 23, 1960, as at February 18, 1960. I do not say this is the latest figure that has been issued but it is the latest I have been able to obtain. I understand that the figure is higher since that time. However, it indicates that over 800,000 people are out of work in this country. Within the Pacific region alone, which comprises British Columbia primarily, there are more than 80,000 people out of work. It is a very unwise, unfair and discriminatory thing to balance a budget with 800,000 unemployed people.

While I am on the subject of the number of unemployed I would point out that there is, of course, some difference of opinion as to which set of figures should apply, those to which I have referred or the figures compiled by the dominion bureau of statistics. There is some question as to which set of figures is correct. Reference is often made to the national employment service statistics as to unemployed being incorrect because they reflect a number of people who in fact have jobs but are applying for other jobs and people who have secured work since registration. I point out that this is taken into account. In the publication to which I have referred there is a note at the bottom of table 2 reading in part as follows:

> The count excludes registrations from persons known to have a job and applying for another one. Measures are also taken to exclude as far as possible persons who have secured work on their own since registration.

Therefore these factors are taken into account. In addition to the number of unemployed registered with the national employment service offices, there is this factor which the footnote goes on to point out:

Not all persons who are looking for work register at N.E.S. offices.

That is quite true. In addition, there are a number of people who realize that they are not eligible for benefits, who have had a pretty sad experience with the national employment service so far as finding employment is concerned, and consequently they do not bother to register, or if they do register they do not bother to go back again once they find they are ineligible for benefits but rather attempt to find work on their own.

In addition to the 80,000 people who were out of work in British Columbia as of February 18 this year, there are an estimated 20,000 people not eligible for unemployment insurance who are on social welfare or municipal relief rolls.

Some time ago, in another debate—I believe it was the throne speech debate last year—I suggested that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) would be well advised to go out and stand in a bread line once in a while and find out what it feels like to stand in a bread line merely to get a sandwich because no work is available. I suggest it would do the minister a great deal of good to get much closer to the people who are unemployed and find out their problems rather than sit in his insulated plush office and continue to study and debate which set of figures should apply—

Mr. Grafftey: The Minister of Labour is closer to the people than the hon. member has ever been.

Mr. Howard: There they go again, Mr. Speaker, knowing full well that they might get into difficulty if they stood up to make those comments. Instead of that they sit quietly by. Unfortunately so many of them are talking at the same time that it is impossible for one to find out what they are saying.

Mr. Clancy: In what year did the hon. member stand in a bread line? He has just made the statement that he stood in a bread line. In what year did he stand in a bread line?

Mr. Howard: Well, I—

Mr. Clancy: Don't say "Well, I," tell me. The hon. member has repeated it three times.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Howard: My hon. friend is just as much off base in his question as he was in repeating what I said. If he will sit down I will tell him what I said, and if he listens he will hear it correctly.

Mr. Speaker: Both hon. members should address the Chair.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, you know full well that I always direct my remarks through you; I am doing that now. What I said was that it would do the Minister of Labour some good to go out and stand in a bread line and appreciate the views of the unemployed of this country. That is precisely what I said. The minister has been so engrossed in his facts and figures and fiction that it has not been possible for him to differentiate one from the other.

Unfortunately, while the Minister of Labour seems to stand the brunt of all the problems concerning the unemployed people in this nation, he is not the one to whom they should be directed because the Minister of Finance has far greater control over the cabinet than the Minister of Labour could ever hope to have. The Minister of Labour is the present head of the Department of Labour. The unemployment insurance commission comes under his direction, as does the national employment service. He issues the statistics. He argues as to which is correct and which is not. There is hope, because the minister has taken some action. If we want to be fair to the minister—unfortunately he is not here this evening; I am sure he will be apprised of what is said here in this debate—we must say that he has taken some action on this question of the unemployed. He set up a committee to attempt to resolve the differences of opinion between which set of figures is correct. This is an admirable approach because perhaps out of it all we shall finally get one set of statistics only to which the government may make reference, and they will be stuck with them. They will not then be able to take a set which incorrectly reflects the state of the unemployed, a low set, and say, "These are the ones which apply."

Unfortunately the committee which was established by the Minister of Labour was not received with too much revelry and rejoicing by the 800,000 people out of work. The establishment of the committee will not put them back to work. It will not feed their families; it will not provide them with employment; it will not pay their medical bills; it will not help to pay their portion of the national debt into which the Minister of Finance has driven them over the last couple of years. But it is something that the Minister of Labour has done.

It may well be, Mr. Speaker, that he has lost the program that he had a couple of years ago. Perhaps he has lost the little sheets of paper he used to make reference to and say, "This is what we promised; this is what we will do." It may well be that that has been misplaced. If the minister does not have one of those promise sheets left, if he has destroyed or lost them, I would be quite happy to provide him with a copy so that the specific promises to the unemployed can be carried out.

I suggest that the real reason why the Minister of Labour is not, unfortunately, able to deal with this question, as he undoubtedly would like to, is that he is not able to propose the ideas that would bring about the solution. I think one of the reasons is that the Minister of Finance and others with him have too much say in the cabinet. The Minister of Finance is laughing at that, Mr. Speaker. Maybe he thinks he has not enough authority and wants more.

We all know there has been a shift in power in the cabinet. When this government was first formed there was speculation and hopes on the part of each cabinet minister as to who would be able to play his full part in government policy and whose ideas would be reflected in the government's decision on legislation when it was introduced. At least some of the hopes and ideas of the individual government ministers have been realized. Hopefuls have arisen from different parts of the nation, but I think the position has been pretty well solidified now. The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) takes most of his counsel from ministers from the city of Toronto. The major person in this new emergence of authority behind the throne, of course, is the Minister of Finance, as he knows, and we know. The other is my very dear friend who is now the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker). He may laugh, but he is still the person who decides which part of the estimates is going to be slashed. First it is the Minister of Finance who decides, and then the Minister of Public Works puts the decision into effect. He slashes, he cuts the estimates and he discontinues the program that is supposed to be put into effect. He is the butcher of the estimates after he gets the order from the Minister of Finance. But they are doing the slicing in the wrong direction.

The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes) comes from British Columbia. He, along with his associate minister, is the head of a department. If they want to go after it properly, if they want to use the knife and discontinue wasteful and foolish expenditures, here is the department in which to start. Do not start in the departments which mean so much to the individuals in this nation.

Mr. Walker: The hon. member talks about slicing. Will he be good enough to tell us what he is slicing at the moment?

An hon. Member: Baloney.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Howard: That is what my friend suggests I am doing; I deny it completely. But if that is what he suggests I am doing, I am sure he would be the first to recognize it because he is such an expert in the field himself.

Unfortunately this power behind the throne, this desire to disregard completely the interests of the citizens of this nation, particularly the unemployed, the people we are talking about, leaves the Minister of Labour in an awkward position. His defence of the whole scheme must be to say to the opposition, "What do you want me to do?" This is what we have heard the Minister of Labour say so many times during this session. "What would you suggest; what would you do to overcome this problem?" We know full well he does not want any suggestions; he rejects them when they are given because the minister cannot be counted on to put them into effect, anyway.

If the minister requires any suggestions he will find there are lots of them; Hansard is full of them. The legislative assembly of British Columbia dealt with this question last year and made some recommendations about what the national government should do. All parties were represented on that committee in the legislature, as are committees in the house here. When I say all parties, I mean all parties that were represented in the legislative assembly itself.

We have a Social Credit government in British Columbia, as you probably know, Mr. Speaker, and that is bad enough without cluttering the house up with Conservatives. But the electorate in their wisdom decided they did not want any Conservatives in the legislature a few years ago. If we have an election this June some time, or May, or whenever it is that the premier of the province gets around to calling it, I am sure that when it is over there will not be any Conservatives in that parliament either.

Here is what the British Columbia legislative assembly recommended. This is not a partisan political document such as that which the Liberal party developed at its leadership convention a couple of years ago and that the C.C.F. necessarily would develop as its political platform. This is a report of a committee of the legislative assembly in the province of British Columbia. It is reported in the votes and proceedings of that legislative assembly of Friday, March 20, 1959. In it this committee dealt extensively with unemployment and made recommendations as to what the national government could do, what the provincial government could do, the local government, the trade union movement and industry. It went rather thoroughly into the question of unemployment. It heard a great many representations. I will not read them all. They are listed in about one and three quarters pages. They include such companies as the Aluminum Company of Canada Limited, which is certainly not a fly by night organization; the British Columbia Electric Company Limited; trade unions; the Canadian Legion; the fisheries association of British Columbia; Shuswap Okanagan Dairy Industry Company and Surrey Co-Operative Association. All of these organizations appeared and made representations to the committee and gave the committee the benefit of their ideas, beliefs and hopes in so far as the matter of dealing with unemployment is concerned.

I suggest that this procedure is what this government should have adopted earlier. It is still not too late to do so, but it should have been done earlier this session. Authority should have been given to the committee on industrial relations of this house to follow this course in order that the members of that committee might draw upon the wisdom of people outside of this parliament and outside of this government in respect of what action the national government should take on unemployment.

Let me read some references here as to the suggestions to the legislature in the province of British Columbia. As I say, I picked this example because it is the province from which I come—that is one reason—and because it cannot be charged—as the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) or other cabinet ministers would like to charge, and as they have charged on other occasions—that the proposals advanced by members of the Liberal party or members of the C.C.F. party are nothing but political propaganda and do not mean anything, and that they are merely trying to get some free publicity or something of that nature. I therefore picked this example and here are the suggestions so far as the national government is concerned.

(1) Materially assist in a large scale works program at appropriate times of the year on such projects as:—

(a) Forest access, transprovincial, and interprovincial roads:

(b) park and camp site improvement:

(c) diking and drainage projects:

(d) stream clearance projects and the creation of artificial spawning areas:—

It makes specific reference to activity on the Fraser river and the benefits that have accrued.

(e) Fraser river flood control consistent with a policy of fish conservation.

2. Institute an enlarged program of apprenticeship and trades training during adverse seasons of employment by extending the scope of the unemployment insurance commission.

3. Adopt a carefully screened immigration policy on the basis of the stated needs of industry and agriculture thus ensuring the planned assimilation of immigrants into the national working force.

4. Encourage and promote the construction of coastal shipping and national defence requirements in Canada.

5. Foster the expansion of a research program designed to encourage the use of coal and coal by-products in our industrial economy.

6. Initiate the formation of a joint federal-provincial trade investigation team to the republic of China for the purpose of inquiring into trade possibilities with that country.

7. To provide the ways and means to extend low-cost credit in order to:—

(a) Promote and expand economic development and stimulate revenue, income, or self-liquidating projects or works by the province and its municipalities; and to

(b) Assist and encourage the establishment and growth of local industries.

8. Give leadership and co-operation in the calling of a federal-provincial conference to seek a Canada-wide solution to the unemployment problem, requesting representation from all levels of government.

Then the next phase of this deals with the provincial government, the local government, and so on. However, I confine my remarks to those suggestions or recommendations by the select standing committee on labour of the legislative assembly of British Columbia contained in its report which appears in the votes and proceedings of March 20, 1959, just a bit over a year ago. Following its presentation I would assume that the report was communicated to the federal government or some cabinet ministers of the federal government, in order to draw these things to its attention as to what should be done about the matter by them.

The record of this government is fairly bad, even on these well worth-while suggestions that have been made here. Some of them have been done, certainly on a co-operative basis. As to the recommendation about forest access, transprovincial and interprovincial roads, we have some work proceeding on a trans-Canada highway but so far as transprovincial and interprovincial roads are concerned, the need for an expanded highway program which would provide employment and develop highway construction, we have nothing. We have the trans-Canada highway and the roads to resources. We have had an indication that something might be done later on. I am concerned about this "later on". It is our opinion that these are things that should have been planned some time ago, to be put into effect when they were most needed and in order to develop these roads on a sensible basis instead of maybe a couple of years from now coming up with a scheme to do something of this nature.

As to park and camp site improvement, there has been some of this activity. As to diking and drainage projects, there is an extensive study which was made under the water resources branch of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources; by the Fraser river board dealing with diking and draining that is necessary along the lower regions of the Fraser river and certain other hydro projects further on north. That report is in the hands of the government. The government has had it since last year some time and it is sitting on it. The recommendations are there as to what could be done.

As to stream clearance projects and the creation of artificial spawning areas, we all know of what value fish is to British Columbia and of the need for employment in that regard. The flood control provisions on the Fraser river also are connected with the diking and drainage projects which have been thoroughly studied and reported on by the Fraser river board under the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

As to the other suggestions made, there is the one with respect to the encouragement and promotion of the construction of coastal shipping. What we have is not an expansion of that industry but a reversal of that recommendation and a diminution of shipping facilities on the west coast.

As to research programs designed to encourage the use of coal and coal by-products, that recommendation applies not only to British Columbia but, as was pointed out by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. MacRae) earlier today, it applies extensively to the maritime provinces. There is great need there for some machinery by means of which to make sure that our coal resources just do not sit idle and that coal miners are employed, and that we make some use of these natural resources.

Trade is another phase of this report. It deals with the republic of red China, and I appreciate the government's reluctance to do anything like that because of its fear of the United States.

There is the suggestion about provision of the ways and means to extend low cost credit. Instead of that occurring the finance minister has driven credit higher, and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker) is part and parcel of it in pushing up interest rates.

As to the recommendation to assist and encourage the establishment and growth of local industries, this is a prime thing that this government could do. The hon. member for York-Sunbury again this afternoon made reference to the need for such industries to be established in the maritimes. The maritimes are not the only part of Canada that needs the insurance of some governmental agency to bring into their areas industries which will grow up and rise in an area to the end that long term full year employment can be obtained by the people in that area where there is none at the moment and where they are economically in a collapsed position or where there is one industry and any shift in the economy of that particular industry upsets the working force and upsets the economy of the whole area around there.

I suggest that this national government on the question of developing industries should, if necessary, underwrite the capital expense involved. It should provide a reserve or a revolving pool or fund which could be loaned out on a selective basis. It would have to be on a selective basis because we have not the resources to lend money toward the entire capital expansion needs of Canada. This money should be loaned out either at a low interest rate, or at no interest rate at all if that is necessary to ensure the growth of an industry. These concessions should be provided in order that industry could go into places on a planned basis—not a haphazard basis but a planned, co-ordinated basis—to ensure the best possible supply of employment opportunities.

But the government does not want to do anything about that at all. It has that philosophy that the blind progress of our economy will eventually work itself out. We have depressions, recessions or lay-offs. We have three quarters of a million people unemployed every winter, so apparently this is no minor detail. It is part of the necessities of having this so-called free enterprise economy, which incidentally in its true sense we do not have. But because the government has this philosophy, these are the problems resulting from it: unemployment, declining trade and declining production. The government cannot cope with this particular problem if it continues to act like an ostrich and stick its head in the sand every time something dangerous occurs, and then while it has its head in the sand and its eyes and ears covered, hopes that the problem will straighten itself out.

A budget which, as I said, has on the one hand more than three quarters of a million unemployed people in Canada as the balancing factor, and a budget which continually talks about prosperity just around the corner, is not worthy of the name of a budget and should not receive the support of hon. members of this house.

The Budget—Mr. Weichel

Mr. O. W. Weichel (Waterloo North): Mr. Speaker, I consider it a great pleasure to have the opportunity of taking part in the budget debate on behalf of my constituents of Waterloo North. Our Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), a man of outstanding ability and sincerity, is to be congratulated for his splendid presentation and the terrific amount of work he has contributed to the preparation of this budget. Every hon. member of this house will appreciate his untiring efforts and loyalty in carrying out his important duties as Minister of Finance.

Through the kindness of our esteemed Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and yourself, Mr. Speaker, I was chosen as one of the delegates, along with four fine gentlemen, to represent parliament in West Germany as guests of that government last September. Perhaps one of the most impressive events was the inauguration of the new president, Dr. Lubke, who succeeded Dr. Heuss, beloved by the German people. This took place in the city of Bonn, the present seat of the West German government. Dr. Gestemeir, the speaker, in his opening remarks made mention of our presence. His words drew real applause from all those present. The hospitality of the German people was excellent, and I feel that our good will tour was of great benefit to both countries and will help establish better trade relations.

Mr. Speaker, your leadership of this delegation demonstrated your personal cordiality and sincerity as well as a deep understanding of the problems confronting us in our daily obligations. May the divine benediction rest upon you as you guide us in our duties for the strengthening of our great nation and the promotion of the public good.

May I as a member of the House of Commons observe that we have a busy schedule ahead according to the budget speech. The issues we will debate are of the utmost importance to the future of Canada. One of them that touches the heart of my industry-packed constituency of Waterloo North is the discussion of our international trade that will be carried on in this house. I hope that when international trade is discussed we will examine closely the effect that imports from low-wage countries are having on our Canadian industries, industries that have grown up with Canada and which have placed all their money, their hope and, yes, their trust, in the future of Canada.

The impact on the Canadian rubber industry of imports from low-wage countries, especially Japan and Hong Kong, has long been known. It has been pointed out before in this house during the Liberal administration but to no avail. It has caused serious harm to rubber footwear industries in my constituency of Waterloo North and in other parts of Canada. However, other industries have also been hard hit by these imports, such as the radio, television, button and shirt manufacturing industries. Again they make up important segments of the industry of my constituency. It has been pointed out to me that two years ago only 10 per cent of all radios sold in Canada were imported. Today that figure is between 40 and 50 per cent. That has meant a loss in volume to one Kitchener manufacturer of approximately 30,000 small table radios alone.

Two of the largest shirt manufacturers in Canada, along with smaller firms, employing about 2,000 people are also situated in my constituency. They, too, are asking for some government help.

Concerning tariff changes, we are informed that an important round of tariff negotiations under GATT will be initiated this autumn. Many proposed tariff changes may find some place in the forthcoming negotiations.

Turning to the rubber footwear industry in Canada, the latest figures for the 11 month period in 1959 as compared to the same period in 1958 shows that the percentage of the total consumption of waterproof footwear imported into Canada increased from 17.6 per cent during the 1958 11 month period to 31 per cent in the same period in 1959. In canvas footwear the percentage jumped from 58.9 per cent in 1958 to 68.5 per cent in the same 11 month period in 1959. To sum it all up, in the first 11 months of 1959 approximately 46 per cent of the total consumption of waterproof and canvas footwear was imported.

I realize the tenuous position that the government holds because of this country's trade position, especially with Japan, the country from which much of these imports are coming. I realize, too, that in order to keep exporting—especially wheat—to Japan we must buy in return a good amount of Japanese products. I know our government is very anxious to help solve this problem. Let us therefore use every effort in finding a way to maintain trade with Japan, but at the same time see that our Canadian industries that have grown up with Canada, that have placed all their money, their hope, and yes their trust, in the future of Canada are able to flourish and continue to provide employment for thousands of our Canadian citizens.

Just a word about our federal civil servants. As a former civil servant for more than 35 pears, and knowing some of their problems I was pleased to hear in the budget address that treasury board had approved recommendations from the civil service commission involving some 50,000 employees of the public service. May I suggest that consideration be given to revising salaries in the under $6,000 bracket as soon as possible, and that also serious consideration be given to salary increases for our armed forces and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

A few months ago, the Kitchener-Waterloo Dutchmen of my Waterloo North constituency represented Canada in the Olympic hockey championship at Squaw Valley, California, winning the silver medal. Like many Canadians, I was disappointed in the final result. However, as a sportsman and lover of wholesome recreation I felt justly proud of their achievements. Their supreme effort was not quite good enough to win the gold medal for Canada, but their gentlemanly conduct and good sportsmanship rated them as top-ranking good-will ambassadors for Canada.

Many sportswriters and sportcasters, along with individuals, have spent much time in finding a formula to provide better conditions for our competing athletes in Olympic competition. What is the answer? May I suggest two points that may be of some assistance to this question? It is my firm belief that schools in every province, not only to cover hockey but all recreation, could be started about four months before the beginning of the Olympic games, provincial governments to provide the financial assistance. Through the efforts of these schools the top athletes could be chosen to represent Canada.

My second thought concerns the federal government and the acceptance of the resolution as proposed by one of the hon. members from Vancouver on the subject of a Canada sports council, with the financial assistance coming from our government to defray expenses of our competing Canadians. This council, representing every province, could provide the necessary assistance and inspire our youth to take a greater interest in Canada's Olympic team. The outcome of such efforts could be the greatest enemy of juvenile delinquency.

Let us face the facts, especially with regard to hockey, Canada's national game. We have taught this sport to other countries, and in most cases they have been good scholars. The competition has become tougher, and in order to compete successfully our government, along with provincial governments, assisted by athletic associations all across Canada, must lead the way.

As a veteran of the first great war I am naturally intensely interested in the welfare of those who lost dear ones; disabled veterans, and all veterans and their dependents. I know it is not necessary for me to remind our government to give further consideration to their requests for pension increases and other assistance. Their sacrifices and services have been deeply appreciated by our government, the Canadian people and the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Brooks). Their needs, financial and otherwise, should continue to be one of our first obligations.

About a year ago I mentioned in this house the possibility of a university in the city of Waterloo, Ontario. Since that time, this has become a reality. The value of education is becoming more important daily, and I would like to congratulate the member for Grenville-Dundas (Mrs. Casselman) for her recent remarks on this subject. The Waterloo university college board of governors decided recently in favour of federating with the university of Waterloo. The faculty of St. Jerome's College had previously made such a decision. In the very near future agreements to federate will be signed by both church colleges with the university. The federation program will become effective July 1, 1960.

Enrolment at Waterloo college had grown in the last six years from 168 full-time arts students to over 500 this year. The university enrolled its first students in July 1957, and the students now enrolled in its co-operative engineering course total over 600. When the two related church colleges come into federation with the university the total enrolment will be between 1,200 and 1,300 students. In addition, the university is serving the community through its adult education program which has an enrolment in excess of 1,000 people.

On the university's new campus of approximately 200 acres there are now two large buildings completed and in use, the chemistry and chemical engineering building, of 54,000 square feet, and the physics and mathematics building of 100,000 square feet. Dr. Steacie, head of the national research council, officially opened the physics building on February 10 last. The total faculty of the university and colleges numbers over 100. Architects are now developing plans for the university's engineering building which is scheduled for completion in 1962. In addition to the Lutheran and Roman Catholic churches operating Waterloo University College and St. Jerome's respectively, the Anglican church and the Mennonites have also indicated an interest in building residences on the university campus for the use of the students of their denomination who are attending the university.

Only a short time ago the university publicly announced the appointment of its chancellor, the Hon. Dana Porter, chief justice of the supreme court of Ontario. As you are aware, his lordship is a man who is highly regarded for his public service, especially in the field of education. The fact that Hon. Leslie Frost encouraged Mr. Porter to accept the appointment is an indication of the high esteem in which the university is held by the premier of this province. I say in all sincerity that the interest shown by this government and by the government of Ontario in the university of Waterloo is deeply appreciated by the community, by the fine men who have made this university possible and by the members of parliament who represent that area. The Kitchener-Waterloo Record of January 8 rightly states, and I quote:

> It is important that all those involved in this great development should resolve to devote their efforts to its creative exploitation. The development of fully rounded and adequately educated citizens is of the utmost importance both to this district and to the nation at large. The new university, with its broad facilities in both the sciences and the arts, should be better able to contribute to this goal.

Today we are blessed with wonderful schools, colleges and universities, and teachers who are ever ready and willing to impart that knowledge so essential to every girl and boy in this great country of ours. We should be continually on the alert, so that when their opportunity comes we may assist them in every way. After all, our youth of today will be our citizens of tomorrow.

Last spring I spoke briefly to this house in favour of new federal plans for emergency measures and civil defence which had been announced a few weeks previously by the Prime Minister. At this time I want to add that the progress and development since last spring have justified the optimism I expresed then as to the workability of the new plans made, thanks to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith) and others.

Since then the ten provinces again met with the federal emergency measures ministers and officials at Ottawa early in October, after the provinces had had an opportunity of studying for some months the new realignment of duties and responsibilities between the federal government agencies, including the army, the provinces and municipalities. All the press reports since have indicated a remarkable unity of acceptance by all provinces of the new proposals as being both feasible and acceptable.

These emergency measures are the civilian counterpart of the Department of National Defence and the armed services with respect to what has to be done to protect the civilian population and their governments and operations in the event of war.

I am sure that all hon. members of this house will join with me in the hope that such measures may never be needed, and that the release of world tension which has occurred during the interchange of visits between the leaders of the world powers will continue and grow. But until the world does come to true disarmament, these emergency measures for the protection of our civil population are indeed necessary.

Just so long as this parliament finds it necessary to vote many millions of dollars for the armed services and to maintain radar lines across Canada to give warnings of enemy attack and to develop missile bases in Canada, just so long will it be equally necessary for this government to expend funds and carry out planning in emergency measures and in civil defence to protect our civilian populace.

From all the reports I have heard the progress across Canada in the new realignment of responsibilities and duties has been both substantial and satisfactory. In particular, I want to commend the Canadian army for the realistic way it has taken hold of its new responsibility to carry the warning of any enemy attack to the people across Canada and to assume the battlefield command of the rescue and other forces which would have to act in areas which have been damaged by enemy bombing or heavy fall-out of radioactive dust. In not only the regular army but also in all their militia units this program which was begun only eight months ago is now proceeding with dispatch under the able and energetic leadership of the general officer commanding of the central region.

Some time ago the provincial government in my own province of Ontario took formal action so that it too could co-operate fully with the federal government and the army in these emergency measures for the continuity of government and the survival of our people in the event of enemy attack. On January 14, 1960, under order in council 201/60 the province of Ontario established an emergency measures organization for Ontario to parallel and co-operate with the federal emergency organization. The provincial organization includes various provincial government departments whose continued functioning would be immediately necessary in the event of enemy attack, and whose functioning is limited to carrying out the provincial responsibilities under this new alignment.

The new Ontario organization remains within the ministerial direction of Hon. W. M. Nickle, Q.C., minister of planning and developing, who has been charged with heading the old civil defence branch, while the chairman appointed by order in council is Mr. W. J. Scott, Ontario fire marshal, whose county fire mutual aid organization throughout the province is accepted as a pattern for the fire defence organization across Canada, and who is well known for his work in civil defence over a long period of time. His contribution to civil defence has been outstanding.

In my own riding of Waterloo North we have had within recent months three cases where the automatic assistance of all the fire departments in the county of Waterloo was immediately available under this organized emergency mutual fire aid program. Undoubtedly, in all instances this county organization in Waterloo county saved hundreds of thousands of dollars of potential fire loss. They are peacetime examples of the value of organizing now for any emergency that may occur in either peace or war. This is what I feel the new emergency measures organizations are geared to do in all three of the municipal, provincial and federal levels of government. Our government is to be congratulated for its splendid progress in civil defence.

Mr. H. J. Michaud (Kent, N.B.): Mr. Speaker, the budget which was presented before this house by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) last Thursday generally was termed as a stand-pat, an unexciting budget. Unexciting it may have been to the ones who were not deprived of the necessary things of life in the course of the past year, to the ones who were able to make both ends meet in providing for their families the food, clothing, medical care and educational facilities required. When there is the assurance that these same opportunities will again be provided this budget might very well be considered, indeed, a satisfactory budget. But to those others who have seen the necessities of life evade them, to those whose incomes have left them wanting in their ability to provide to their families those things necessary to their physical and educational welfare, to those hundreds of thousands presently unemployed, this is not a satisfactory budget. On the contrary, it is a barren and gloomy budget and the bringer of gloom is the Minister of Finance.

The expected increase of 6 per cent in the gross national product alone cannot fill the gap in providing sufficient employment outlets to all those Canadians in need of income at the present time. Too much stress is also being laid again on statistical data in the present budget while forgetting the humanitarian aspect in terms of those in the country who are being denied what is a fundamental right of every citizen, namely the right, when willing to work, to earn a fair living for himself and for his dependents. It is with a sense of deep responsibility that I contend that the most urgent national problem, namely unemployment, was ignored or conjured away by the minister in the presentation of his last budget.

It is noted that a broader interest is manifested these days in the economic problems of the maritime provinces particularly. Here is a situation which calls for a broad national recognition if it is to be resolved. As a representative of the maritime provinces in this parliament I feel it is my duty at this time to deal with some aspects of the faltering economy of those provinces even at the risk of reproof and rebuff by some other representatives from that area whose utterances in this house since the opening of the present session would tend to indicate that all is well in the maritimes, that the maritimes are going through a period of great boom at the present time.

A week ago I returned to Ottawa following a few days' visit in my constituency. The conditions I found there are simply disheartening. I do not wish to be considered an alarmist or pessimist but I am saying that the conditions there are the worst we have had since the great depression in the early 1930's. If it were not for those social benefits introduced by Liberal governments which are paid every month such as old age assistance, old age pensions, family allowances and unemployment insurance—to those who are fortunate enough not to be denied unemployment insurance through vexatious interference in the application of the law—if it were not for these different forms of social assistance I say that conditions there would be, if not worse, at least in every way as bad as they were in the early 1930's.

Surely this is a situation which deserves more sympathetic attention than mere lip service when we realize that the main source of income in some parts of the maritime provinces at the present time is under the form of social benefits in one way or another. It was stated recently that about 20 per cent of the labour force in the province of New Brunswick was unemployed. That being the case, I feel that the percentage in some particular areas of that province is well over one third of the labour force. Do we realize all the social implications in a community plagued with such depressed conditions?

How long can we remain indifferent to the needs of such a sizeable segment of our population in a country where we speak of high standards of living, of notable economic expansion and high social development? We often speak of immigration in this house. I am not against immigration but I do contend that if our economy permits the integration every year of thousands of immigrants then we should also be able to take care of those Canadian born citizens who are destitute and in every way as much in need of a steady means of livelihood.

The morning I left home to return to Ottawa last week I paid a visit to the office of a local lawyer who told me that his main occupation during the past winter months had been preparing visas for people emigrating to the United States. That same morning he had had four new applications, and this lawyer is only one of those engaged in that same business at the present time. Can we not logically contend that such a situation is inadmissible?

What is going to happen to the economic and social structures of our municipalities if this mass exodus of our people to another land in quest of a situation which will procure them a livelihood continues? These municipalities at one time or another have contracted certain obligations toward these people with the expectation that the greater part of the population would normally remain in their midst. For instance, who is going to remain responsible for the school debentures of these municipalities if too great a number of these young people for whom these schools were built have to leave the municipalities and the country? No municipality can afford to provide educational facilities to a whole generation for the benefit of another country. In this respect alone we could end up in a very embarrassing situation.

Does it mean that no solution can be devised to remedy such an abnormal situation? Surely we have not reached a point of such utter defeatism where we must admit that ways and means cannot be devised to remedy such depressed conditions. Indeed, concrete suggestions have been and still are being made in the face of the public awakening to the necessity of an economic revival in the maritime provinces. Foremost, there is the necessity for the whole country to realize that this is a national emergency. In this respect I can do no better than to quote the words of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) who, in dealing with this problem, had this to say as found at page 1693 of Hansard of March 3, 1960:

> There is something else we have to accept. The wealthier parts of this country will have to accept obligations, perhaps in the way they have not in the past, to the economically weaker and less developed parts of the country and to help solve their special problems. There is only one way it can be done. And it has been done in the United Kingdom. If you read the United Kingdom program for the depressed areas you will see how it was done. Nor did they have the financial and economic resources over there at that time that we have in this country now. The only way it can be done is by government schemes of capital assistance to encourage industrial and economic redevelopment in those areas. Perhaps this redevelopment aspect of the problem is as important as new development projects in our economy. If that should mean —and I suppose it would—heavier tax burdens, no Canadian has the right to complain if the taxes, if the money from those taxes, is used to put into effect constructive and forward-looking plans worked out in co-operation with the provinces so that we will not have underdeveloped areas in this country indefinitely in the future. I am thinking, of course, particularly of the Atlantic provinces.

This assistance could take the form principally of major capital works projects. This form of assistance has already been available in the maritimes to the great benefit of all. I had the occasion to mention in another debate last year that at one time anyone who wanted a job in the maritimes could get it when construction was under way at Camp Gagetown and at the airfield bases in the Labrador region. These projects are now mostly completed and alternate projects have not been initiated, accounting in part, therefore, for the heavy backlog of unemployed in the maritimes at the present time.

But other major projects are needed in the maritimes. Foremost is the construction of the Chignecto canal, which has aroused the interest of the maritime provinces as a whole recently. There is the construction of a causeway between Prince Edward Island and the New Brunswick mainland. There are those other numerous industrial developments promoted by APEC, a council formed to promote the economy of the Atlantic provinces and which is engaging the minds of all the civic-minded leaders of the Atlantic provinces. It is, therefore, the responsibility of the present government in consultation with the Atlantic provinces authorities to seek ways and means whereby appropriate and adequate measures can be devised to revive the general economy of the Atlantic provinces. Then it will be the duty of the government to act.

While it is urgent that we devise such a program of capital works, nevertheless great attention should also be given to achieve the greatest development possible of our primary industries. There is room, I submit, for broad improvements in this respect. The three main industries in the Atlantic provinces are farming, lumbering and fishing. Of these three basic industries, agriculture remains to the forefront if considered in its social as well as its economic aspects. A sound agricultural community reflects an element of stability and balance in the framework of the nation at large.

The question arises today as to how long the farm community will be able to subsist in the face of the difficulties besetting that industry. In a general economy of expansion and growth in the country agriculture finds itself in this unhappy cost-price squeeze position which, if allowed to persist much longer, might jeopardize the whole stability of the industry. Indeed, how much longer can farmers subsist if on the one hand the prices they receive for the goods they sell are continuously going down while on the other hand the prices they have to pay for the goods and services they have to buy are going up? Farmers in the Atlantic provinces and in my own riding are, therefore, anxiously waiting to see what the present government will have to offer to solve this crucial problem.

Farmers are also waiting to see what is going to happen to the deficiency payment policy on eggs and hogs which has brought such unsatisfactory results up to this time. I was told that since the inception of this inept law last January hogs have sold in the maritimes for as low as 18 cents a pound, never reaching a higher point than 23 cents a pound, which is under the 23.5 cent support price. Since the deficiency payment on pork is to be calculated on a yearly national average it might very well happen that if prices go up toward the latter part of the year, due to a scarcity brought about by many farmers being forced out of hog production, then those who have been selling at 18 and 19 cents may never recuperate any differential price at all. Unless an offer to purchase by the government is re-established in pork marketings the industry will be faced with a situation which could have ruinous consequences.

Farmers are also anxiously awaiting the introduction of the newly formed farm credit corporation. Many farmers in the Atlantic provinces are anxious to increase their holdings, but wonder whether the new government credit agency, the farm credit corporation, will operate with more flexibility than the former farm loan board. I feel very strongly that drastic measures will have to be adopted if we wish to see agriculture in the maritime provinces regain the stability it needs to restore confidence in the industry.

The fishery is also an important segment of our economy in the Atlantic provinces. Great strides have to be made in the industry if we wish to ensure a fair standard of living to those engaged in that way of life. To get a fair estimation of the general situation of some fishermen along the eastern shores, one has only to remember something that was pointed out that at the time of the Escuminac disaster last June, that is that the average income of those who were the victims of that storm—there were some 35 of them—was between $600 and $700 a year. It is very hard to realize how anyone can eke out a living for himself and his family with such an income. Yet many of our local fishermen are within that category. Of necessity, something must be done to supplement the income of those low income fishermen if they are to enjoy a fair share of the national income.

When we analyse the situation we find that many of these people, while engaged in fishery for part of the year only, are living on land holdings of some considerable size. This land, in almost every case, while fertile, tillable land which could produce many of the things needed for the fishermen's families, is left in complete abandonment. It is true that certain capital, now not within the reach of the ordinary fisherman, would be required to carry on a supplementary farm operation, somewhat of a sideline operation. That is where I submit a fisherman's fund, something along the lines of the farm credit corporation, and in conformity with the nature of the enterprise, should be established. It would permit those fishermen with insufficient income and who hold some farm land to carry on small farm operations proportionate to their family needs.

Incidentally, the history of most of those fishing settlements along the shores would indicate that in most cases they were founded primarily on an agricultural basis. It was only when fishing became an important industry that farming in those areas was abandoned. Circumstances today would justify a return to the former practice of conducting farming and fishing operations concurrently, where fishing alone is insufficient to bring adequate returns to ensure the livelihood of the fisherman's family. I therefore submit the above recommendations to the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. MacLean) who I know is anxious to do everything possible to help the rehabilitation of those submarginal fishermen.

In another respect I wish to make certain recommendations concerning the protective measures of our fisheries, of the lobster fishery in my part of the maritimes particularly. I am happy to say that some measure of success has been encountered in this respect since last year. The great majority of our lobster fishermen now realize the importance of returning to the sea undersized and berried lobsters to ensure a continuous lobster catch from year to year. Unfortunately there are still those who, unscrupulously, fail to obey the law, thus causing great prejudice to themselves and to all those others who are cautious enough to respect the law. I realize how difficult it is for the protection officers to cope with every case in this respect. But I wish to reiterate that the great majority of the lobster fishermen want the full enforcement of those protective measures. I urge the department, through its protective staff and officers, to continue its efforts in this respect until it has succeeded in stopping all those guilty of those wrongful poaching practices. The lobster industry is a valuable one along the Atlantic sea coast. It is often referred to as a little gold mine. Let us make sure that we keep that industry at its highest state of production from year to year. We need that industry.

Our third primary industry in the maritimes, and in my own constituency as well, is the lumber industry. Here again is a field where the returns are not commensurate with the value of the product and the cost to produce it, thus showing a detrimental effect on the economy of that particular industry. As an example, pulpwood, which only a few years ago was selling at $17 a cord is now selling at $10 a cord. Little wonder, therefore, that farmers had to reduce their cuttings on their own woodlots. Farmers cannot afford to hire woodsmen to produce wood for the market at such a depressed price. Many hands who formerly were occupied in that idustry are therefore left idle.

Would it not seem here again that wood prices should be brought more in line with the commodities bought with the returns of that product itself? After all, it is no secret that the price of those finished products coming from the processing of wood, praticularly paper, has been rising steadily, while the price of wood has been steadily going down. The cost-price squeeze here again is having an unfavourable impact upon the economy of the industry. Until and unless conditions are regularized in this segment of the economy unemployment will continue to prevail in the lumber industry. It is, therefore, the responsibility of the government to create better conditions which will restore to this industry its former prosperity.

These are some of the recommendations which I deemed it advisable to make to the government in this budget debate concerning the general economy of the maritime provinces and the economy of my riding. I have tried to make these objectively, with the hope that it might cause the government to give its attention to the crucial problems with which we are so greatly concerned at the present time.

Before concluding my remarks, Mr. Speaker, there is another matter with which I should like to deal briefly. I have in mind certain aspects of the administration of the unemployment insurance commission. At the outset, let me emphasize the fact that my remarks at this time are not directed at any officials in any particular office but rather at the policy of the commission itself.

In the maritimes we have a larger number of unemployed people than in any other part of the country, proportionately speaking. This is a situation imposed upon us by circumstances over which we have no control. I say this because I have an impression, at times, that there are some who like to refer to that situation disparagingly, as if we in the maritimes carried the responsibility for that situation. Lest there be any misapprehension in this respect let me emphasize the fact that our workers in the maritimes are as capable, as industrious and as eager to work as are their fellow workers in other parts of the country. If there is any difference between the status of our workers and that of the workers of other regions it is not in their character but in their opportunities to find employment.

I feel that this situation is often abused at the expense of the maritime workers, both by the employers and by the commission in its decisions to allow benefit warrants. I do not wish at this time to defend the case of those who, at times, attempt to qualify themselves through irregular methods. These, of course, must be repelled. But too often applicants of good will, with good cases, are penalized through vexatious interference devices which should not be tolerated.

Too many woods employers, for instance, during winter months particularly wish to take advantage of the law governing the commission in order to impel woodsmen to perform certain jobs on a cord basis in nearly impossible conditions, just because they know that these woodsmen cannot refuse to go lest their unemployment insurance benefits be cancelled.

I know of a case during the winter of 1959 where scores of claimants were disqualified from insurance benefits just because they refused to work for a certain contractor who did not even have a real assignment to offer to those who reported for work. The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) the other day referred to a case in which a claimant was refused unemployment insurance benefits because he refused to buy a $200 chain saw for a job which was guaranteed for only six weeks. I know of a worse case than that. On the job to which I referred just a moment ago I know of a man living 25 miles away who reported for work and who, upon finding there was no camp in which to stay, returned home, only later to have his unemployment insurance benefits cancelled because he did not accept work. In this instance I suppose he was expected to procure for himself an automobile in order to cover daily the distance between the site of the job and his home since there was no other means of communication. I submit that cases such as these are cases of pure discrimination against the workers.

Then there are other happenings which occurred this winter where miscalculations are taking place and the claimants are then requested to reimburse the amounts they supposedly were not entitled to receive. How could we be more unrealistic than to expect workers, living on an income provided by unemployment insurance benefits for weeks and months, to reimburse that same money? Where do we suppose the money is going to come from?

It is a well-known fact that the unemployment insurance fund is now seriously depleted. But I cannot conceive of any reason why Canadian workers, especially the maritime workers, should be asked to compensate for a situation which is due to no fault of their own but rather to the mismanagement of a government which has spoiled the golden heritage bequeathed to it by a previous administration. The unemployment insurance commission in many ways should show better judgment in many of its dealings with Canadian workers whom it is supposed to protect and to assist and not to penalize indiscriminately.

(Translation):

Mr. Marcel Bourbonnais (Vaudreuil-Soulanges): Mr. Speaker, I should not miss this opportunity of extending my heartfelt congratulations to the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) for the greatness of his accomplishment in bringing down a surplus budget this year. Knowing what administrative difficulties he had to face when he took over the finance portfolio in 1957 and knowing also that he had to face a deficit of almost $600 million in 1958 and another deficit of $400 million in 1959, we are all amazed that he was able to bring down a balanced budget this year.

So, since the Conservatives have taken over, at a time when the whole country was worried, the Minister of Finance has succeeded with sheer perseverance and, above all, confidence in our national potentialities, to bring this country out of the doldrums prevailing under the previous administration and along the steady road to prosperity.

Today, the ordinary citizen when asked his opinion on the present budget, answers: "Things are better, keep it up".

In spite of all the sophisms and all the nonsense spread by the members of the opposition through all the publicity mediums at their disposal, radio, press, etc., the average citizen, the farmer, the worker, finds out that we narrowly avoided a depression, through the feat of strength of the present government. Today, confidence is rising with the Conservative party, as revealed by the Gallup polls.

Besides, that is what prompts the outbursts of demagogy of our opponents who, instead of remaining calm and respectful in this house, spend their time laughing, getting excited, and jumping for no reason at all, and attempt to make light of all the suggestions made by the government.

For instance, when we took up the legislation to settle the problem regarding our universities a number of opposition members cracked jokes and tried to make fun of a problem which is so significant for the province of Quebec. In fact, I shall come back to that later on.

Mr. Speaker, before going on with my remarks, I would like, on behalf of all those I represent here, and also of those who did not have the opportunity to do so in the house, most sincerely to commend the hon. Minister of Finance for his delicate attention to the French speaking people of Canada, when he started his budget speech in French with an accent comparable to that of Her Gracious Majesty the Queen of Canada, when she addressed us in that language. There you have a positive action clearly indicating that, under this government, national unity is progressing in the right direction.

Mr. Valade: The Grits have never done that.

Mr. Bourbonnais: Mr. Speaker, with regard to national unity, very regrettable words were heard last Friday from a member of the C.C.F. party, about the province of Quebec. I will not go over all he said in his speech, because that would give him too much importance, but I cannot refrain from quoting a few lines that I find on page 2823 of Hansard:

> One of the things that bother a great many people in Canada who do not live adjacent to among or with French Canadians is a feeling that somehow they insist in taking a different view of Canadianism and of what Canadians want and need from that of people within the rest of the country. This is a most delicate—

The hon. member does admit it.

> —delicate and touchy subject for a politician to confront, but I think it needs some confronting. Like many other members who have come here in the last few years, while I have read a great deal in Canadian history about the French Canadian problem, it was not until I began to follow the French Canadian newspapers with more intensity that I realized the markedly different conception of Canadianism that the French Canadians have. This is something that we very much need to resolve—

He wants to change everything, solve problems that cannot be solved.

—even in the name of that magical phrase, national unity.

One feeling I have taken from reading the French Canadian press is that they have what is almost a conceit in their Canadianism. They push upon other Canadians an interpretation that I cannot accept and which I think many members of the house cannot accept. It seems that the contradistinction between their kind of Canadianism and ours is that theirs is French Canadian based upon language and Roman Catholic based upon religion and so on the other hand we have to be Protestant and English speaking. I do not think this necessarily is true.

I agree with that, Mr. Speaker.

I know that in my constituency, we have very few French Canadians. We have a good many Catholics who, in the main, are English speaking. Many of them are Italians, Poles and so on. I do not think their conception of Canadianism has to take a back seat at any time to what I might call the superiority complex of Canadianism that exists in French Canada—

Mr. Tremblay: This is out-and-out Maurice Lamontagne talk.

Mr. Bourbonnais: We can sense there the socialistic approach of the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher). He can hardly tolerate that different people should exist in Canada, people who do not wish to change their way of life, but who try to maintain their traditions, without forcing any other Canadians to copy theirs.

What the hon. member for Port Arthur means when he speaks of national unity is the great uniformity into which the great minority, or all Canadians, whatever their origin might be inmersed so as to come out good, manageable little guys who would think and speak in the same way and act all together at the bidding of a single socialist master—of an advanced Liberal, to use the phrase of a former Liberal prime minister.

However, as we have seen in the last election, Providence protected us from the scourge of the C.C.F. If the hon. member for Port Arthur thinks we are overbearing in our Canadianism, it shows how little he knows about Canadian history. Let me remind him that on the whole, French speaking Canadians are much more deeply rooted in Canadian soil than the great majority of Canadians of other languages, and that the fact that we have a different language and a different religion may perhaps appear to him as a different form of Canadianism which he will never understand until he learns our language and lives in our province of Quebec. For a member who has pretensions to culture, his remarks show that it is very far from complete. If the hon. member thinks the French Canadians have a superiority complex, let me tell him once again that he knows nothing about history or about present conditions, despite all his titles.

What we have in the province of Quebec is a feeling of pride in many respects and for several reasons.

Incidentally, I might give some advice to the leader of the Social Democratic party, the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue); we heard him when he took up the cudgels for certain South African subjects and tried to defend negroes who are oppressed in that country—no sincere Christian of course can admit that negroes, subjects of an important country, be persecuted—but he tried to force the government to interfere in the internal affairs of another country. I would ask him to look after his own household instead of interfering with what concerns other countries, and to attempt to teach his supporters that Canadianism and national unity are not based on prejudice.

I heard, last Friday, some members of the Liberal opposition protest loudly in connection with the benefits of the measure introduced by the Minister of Finance, to adjust the federal grants to universities.

If the hon. members would recall the difficult years education went through in the province of Quebec under a Liberal administration, up to 1935, they would perhaps understand why the great majority of the people of Quebec have supported the thesis of the Union Nationale and the former premier, the Hon. Maurice Duplessis, on the exclusive rights of the provinces in the field of education.

Perhaps it would be appropriate to remind them of certain statistics showing that under the former Liberal administration in the province of Quebec, education always came last.

In 1935, the province of Quebec had 9,000 schools—I should rather say 9,000 educational institutions, since this number included all colleges and universities, special and private institutions, as well as rural schools of two or three rooms where there was only one teacher, and we had dozens of those in each parish. Now, in 1956, there were 11,000 educational institutions in the province of Quebec, most of the small schools having been replaced by central schools of twelve to twenty classrooms.

In 1935, there were 27,000 teachers while in 1956, there were 51,900, that is 52,000. In 1935, we had 700,000 pupils in the province of Quebec, while in 1956 there were 1,116,000.

The total contribution of the taxpayers to education in the province of Quebec was $28 million in 1935; in 1956, it had reached $99 million. The provincial government's contribution to education in 1935 was $5 million and in 1956, it was $87 million.

The total amount spent on education in 1935 was $33 million, whereas in 1956, it was more than $250 million. When comparing the figures for 1935 with those of 1956, the difference between the amounts spent reflects the interest in education shown by the former Liberal government of the province in comparison with the interest shown by a Union Nationale government of Conservative trend.

Other figures show what has been done for education in the province of Quebec, because, in 1935, an amount of $1,800,000 was spent for the building and repairing of 480 schools. In 1956, 440 schools were built at a cost of $46 million. Moreover, repair work was carried out in 1,451 schools at a cost of $4,297,000 which means that in 1956, 25 times more money than in 1935 was spent for school construction and repairs. The average salary of educators in the province of Quebec varied until 1935 between $80 and $400 a year for a female teacher. No male school teacher received a salary higher than $1,500.

Today, the minimum salary of a female teacher is $1,500, and the average teachers' salary is $3,445. We therefore see the tremendous progress achieved with regard to education in the province of Quebec in the years 1935 to 1956.

This year $300 million will be spent to that end in the province of Quebec. We may therefore say that the amount spent on education in the province of Quebec will be ten times greater than in 1935. This system of assistance to education in the province of Quebec was started under a government which is known as that of the Union Nationale. That is why so many people in Quebec favour this government.

In 1952, the Liberal government tried, for political reasons, to offer assistance to universities. In Quebec, at that time, we were doubtful of the government's sincerity, recalling as we did the difficulties we had suffered at the hands of a similar administration in the years prior to 1935. After all the money that the federal government wanted to turn over to Quebec universities had been collected from Quebec taxpayers. Why then should that money reach Quebec through Ottawa, in view of the provisions of section 93 of the British North America Act, to the effect that —and I am now going to quote that section because it has repeatedly been referred to by great politicians who always try to confuse sections 91, 92 and 93, which are nevertheless quite clear to any layman. I shall read the section in English:

(Text):

In and for each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education, subject and according to the following provisions—

(Translation):

It is up to each province, then, to construe that section as it should be construed. The province of Quebec wanted to abide by that section of the constitution.

I merely wish to show that, in the province of Quebec, education is in good hands and that our province has no need of advice or help from C.C.F. pseudo-intellectuals, nor even from all those petty politicians who are more interested in their personal advancement than in that of our province and of our country.

We are proud, in the province of Quebec, of our achievements in that field in the last fifteen years. Today, if the hon. member for Port Arthur thinks that we have a superiority complex I must tell him that, when he is aware of what goes on in the province of Quebec he will understand that he is mistaken, and that it is rather a feeling of pride for us to have at last aroused the envy of our neighbours, we, who were but a poor little people exploited by blackmailers who were keeping us in ignorance in order to better exploit us and to maintain their Liberal party strong and powerful, at our expense.

In 1957, during the first session of parliament, most members voted in favour of the increase from $1 to $1.50 per capita for the purpose of assistance to universities provided by the federal government.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I think he is anticipating, or reverting to a debate on the measure introduced by the Minister of Finance concerning grants to universities. I would ask him to drop the subject.

Mr. Bourbonnais: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I only wanted to straighten out a few things.

Besides, we are discussing the budget speech, and since last week, the action taken by the members of the province of Quebec was misunderstood, I wanted to quote certain figures and to recall certain facts.

I should like, therefore, to set out the reasons why some members from the province of Quebec voted in 1958 in favour of raising federal grants to universities.

We realized—this is my own personal view, but I think it is shared by many—we members from the province of Quebec realized that provinces other than Quebec had universities which were in great need of financial help. Those provinces were counting mostly on assistance from the federal government.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order I regret having to intervene again. I thought the hon. member would limit himself to opinions of a general nature concerning certain remarks made by the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher), which are not necessarily related to Bill C-56, whose purpose is to amend the federal-provincial fiscal arrangements.

I note, however, that the hon. member is mainly working towards the point that is already covered by the bill which is to be submitted to the house and which was discussed at the resolution stage of that bill.

I would therefore ask him to drop that subject.

Mr. Bourbonnais: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, but I do not think that in describing the reasons which prompted us to vote, in 1958, in favour of raising the grants to universities, I am getting away from the bill.

What I wanted to say is that other provinces have universities, and that such universities have financial needs and were counting on help from the federal government.

I also had to keep in mind other provinces which did not object to federal aid to their universities. I was convinced that this government would soon find a solution that would be acceptable to the province of Quebec and that the amounts which had been reserved in trust for the universities of the province of Quebec would thereby increase and would be paid to them some day.

I wanted to show the willingness of the people of Quebec to co-operate with all the provinces of Canada and never to handicap the development of their neighbours.

What this government is now doing confirms my opinion and I am all the prouder of being a Canadian from the province of Quebec because I have an opportunity to participate, with the Conservative government, in the establishment of a Canadianism based on the mutual respect of the various groups which form our country, and to share in measures calculated to achieve economic recovery by a wise, farsighted and sound administration.

Mr. Gabriel Roberge (Megantic): Mr. Speaker, we have been listening for about 20 minutes to the hon. member from Vaudreuil-Soulanges (Mr. Bourbonnais). Quite understandably, I do not intend to deal with his remarks at this time, for if I did so I should be out of order, just as he was.

Last Thursday, Mr. Speaker, I heard the third budget speech of the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) not counting, of course, his miniature pre-election budget of 1957, as I was not yet a member of this house.

Actually, this is my third experience at getting ready to speak on the budget.

Reference to the official reports in Hansard for 1958 and 1959 will show that I was then unable to speak for lack of time. So my notes had to be filed away and unfortunately, I cannot use them this year, because they are now outdated.

I am more fortunate this year and, I think, it is an advantage to be able to make a few remarks about the budget speech of last Thursday.

May I be allowed to point out, at the beginning of my remarks, what Mr. Speaker himself said before the Ottawa branch of the alliance canadienne.

I have here a clipping of the Montreal Gazette for April 4 1960, headed:

"Mr. Michener boosts bilinguals."

This dispatch from Ottawa reads as follows:

(Text):

Commons Speaker Roland Michener said that mutual understanding among English and French speaking Canadians would be reached more easily if all were bilingual.

(Translation):

The item continues, and I quote the Speaker himself:

(Text):

Each of us must strive to be a member of both groups. I look forward to a future in which we have a good knowledge of each other's languages and a perfect understanding of each other's ideals.

Coming from Mr. Speaker himself, the first member of this House of Commons, this declaration must—and I personally hope it will—do more to achieve in Canada this perfect understanding between all Canadians. I wish also to point out that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) himself paid tribute to the French speaking population of this country by delivering a part of his budget speech in my native language. He started to speak in French and twice afterwards used the same language. For that he must be congratulated. On my part, Mr. Speaker, I want to pay tribute to the minister in speaking these few words of congratulation in his own maternal language.

(Translation):

May I point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Vaudreuil-Soulanges (Mr. Bourbonnais) also had words of praise for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), and it might have been the only moment in his speech where he was not out of order.

There is one thing which has always struck me—I do not say this to criticize the Minister of Finance because politicians of all parties are a bit at fault in this matter—and that is the fact that one feels the need to speak French when it comes to federal-provincial relations. That is what the Minister of Finance did, as can be seen on page 2675 of Hansard of Thursday last.

As I said, I am not blaming him for choosing that method. Should we believe that doing so will commit the government of my province to a less negative attitude towards the government of Canada? I hope so, and I also trust that the new atmosphere of agreement will continue to exist and that our province will fully benefit by its relations with Ottawa.

That friendly atmosphere, Mr. Speaker, that climate of mutual understanding might have existed under the former Liberal administration which was at the helm in this country. That government did not refer to members of the Quebec government as "those people from outside". We know the opposite is the truth. I need not emphasize what large amount of money the people of the province of Quebec lost through the negative attitude of their former premier. May I be allowed to say here that I believe that attitude was purely electoral? And I would call to witness premier Barrette, whose statements follow closely those of Mr. Sauve.

I have here a clipping from Le Devoir of March 17, 1960 reporting certain words of the present premier of the province when he referred to the future of Quebec universities. Let me quote part of that clipping:

Mr. Barrette made much of the talks with Ottawa—

And we do not blame him for those talks; on the contrary, we are very glad of it.

—made much of the talks with Ottawa to recuperate the accumulated grants.

And please note this:

We gave ourselves airs of independence, he added, but we were most anxious to settle the problem.

I also have a clipping from Le Devoir for March 28, 1960, or three weeks later. I shall quote only the title:

Mr. Antonio Barrette: Certain things have occurred in the past.

Then there is a subtile in larger print:

Today we must go hand in hand with Ottawa.

And now here is a clipping from La Presse for Monday, March 28, 1960, which goes into greater detail on this political speech made by the premier of my province. The story starts with the same quotation:

Certain things have occurred in the past.

Farther down, the article goes on to say:

Thanks to the new climate now existing between Quebec and Ottawa, we have been able to solve problems which had been outstanding for years... Ottawa is now treating us like friends. As long as they themselves will co-operate, I will never regret to co-operate with the central government, to give them a true hand-in-hand co-operation.

To conclude this first part of my remarks, I would add that under the former Liberal government, the door was not closed, but that it was the premier of the province of Quebec who closed it on his way out.

I do not intend to comment on those statements at this time, since we will probably have the opportunity to deal with them during the debate on the second reading of the federal-provincial tax-sharing arrangement bill.

Mr. Speaker, I believe it is the appropriate time to ask you to say it is now ten o'clock.

(Text):

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

NEW BUDWORM INSECTICIDE

Question No. 320—Mr. McWilliam:

1. Is the federal government attempting to produce an insecticide that will be effective for budworm spraying of forests but harmless to fish?
2. If so, what are present prospects of producing this solution?

Answer by: Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture):

1. The Department of Agriculture does not engage directly in the production of new chemical insecticides. This is done by chemical corporations, who are devoting very considerable effort toward the production of selective chemicals which are poisonous to one form of life but not to others.

Fundamental research by the department in this field is devoted primarily to the study of physiology and the mode of action of chemical insecticides to develop the basic knowledge necessary to the production of selective chemicals.

2. In view of the many problems inherent in developing a suitable highly efficient poison for one form of life, but which will have no effect on other forms of life, it is not possible to predict when such a chemical will be available for budworm control.

The department is taking a leading role in the development and testing of insecticidal toxins, which are products of insect disease organisms, and which have no ill effects on forms of life other than insects. Field trials of these against the spruce budworm and other related pests are being planned for 1960.

1. Has the Minister of National Health and Welfare received any communication or representations, since March 1, 1960, from any member of the government of Saskatchewan urging the federal government to include depreciation as a shareable cost item under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act?
2. If so, from whom have such representations been received?
3. If so, what reply, if any, has been made?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The answer to question No. 1 is no. As a consequence, questions Nos. 2 and 3 are not applicable.

COLUMBIA RIVER DEVELOPMENT—FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

Question No. 102—Mr. McIlraith:

1. Has the Minister of Finance offered to loan to British Columbia one-half the cost of the development of the Columbia river?
2. Is the federal government making any grant toward the cost of this project?
3. Has the federal government offered to share directly in the financing of the project?

Mr. Richard A. Bell (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance): The answers are as follows:

EXPORT CREDIT INSURANCE EXTENSION

Question No. 103—Mr. Badanai:

Will the Minister of Finance give consideration to expanding the operations of the export credit insurance corporation, in particular, widening the basis on which direct guarantee could be issued on negotiable instruments given to Canadian exporters by foreign buyers in respect of export transactions?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this comes under my jurisdiction. With regard to the hon. member's suggestion that the basis on which direct guarantees could be issued be widened, it should be understood that direct guarantees are available to assist financing. They are to be issued in connection with contracts involving the export of goods or services for an amount of not less than $250,000 and involving a payment period of at least two years. The question of financing smaller transactions on shorter terms is not a problem, since financing for such transactions is readily available from the chartered banks.

TOXIC NERVE GAS

Question No. 104—Mr. Argue:

1. Is toxic nerve gas produced in Canada?
2. If so, (a) where; (b) since when; (c) for what purpose; (d) under what authority; (e) under whose jurisdiction; (f) to whom is it supplied; (g) on what scale?

1. Are some service personnel living in permanent married quarters at Greenwood, Nova Scotia, required to pay direct taxes to the kings county municipal council?
2. If so, what is the purpose of the tax?
3. Does the Department of National Defence make a grant to the municipality in lieu of taxes in respect to educational costs, etc.?
4. If so, do the grants by the federal government exempt service personnel from payment of direct municipal taxes?

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): The answer to question 1 is, yes.

The answer to question 2 is that the purpose of the tax is to provide a general fund for internal financing from which the municipality sets aside certain amounts for charitable purposes and expenditures not covered by the mill rate struck for taxation on the assessment of real property.

The answer to question 3 is no; municipal grants are made by the Department of Finance. However, the Department of National Defence made a capital assistance grant toward construction of the western Kings county high school and pays a proportional share of operating costs. In addition an agreement exists between the Department of National Defence and the municipality for mutual assistance in fire protection.

The answer to question 4 is, no.

INCOME TAX DEDUCTIONS, HOSPITAL COSTS

Question No. 106—Mr. Michaud:

1. Are the basic costs of hospital treatment in a province participating in the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act deductible from income for federal income tax purposes?
2. If so, to what extent?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, question No. 1 refers to the basic costs. There might be some discussion as to what that term means in view of the interpretation of the act, and I wonder if the hon. member would let this stand until I have had a chance to discuss it fully.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

Question stands.

Question No. 107—Mr. Carter:

6. Is the city of St. John's authorized to act as agent for the province of Newfoundland in such project?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): The answer to question 1 is, yes.

The answer to question 2, is February 25, 1960. The investigation is being conducted by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the city of St. John's, acting as agent for the province of Newfoundland.

The answer to number 3 is Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the city of St. John's, acting as agent for the province of Newfoundland.

The answer to question 4 is, no.

The answer to question 5 is, with respect to the proposed land assembly project, I understand that the city of St. John's has made banking arrangements to cover the amount of the provincial 25 per cent share of the costs which the city will be obliged to bear if the project is proceeded with.

3. Are any such payments made pursuant to an agreement with the province of New Brunswick?
4. If so, when was such an agreement signed?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Acting Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): The answer to question 1 is, yes.

No. 2: All payments in respect to utilities in New Brunswick have been made to the New Brunswick electric power commission as agent of the government of the province of New Brunswick. A list of payments and dates on which they were made follows. Mr. Speaker, there are some 15 dates with amounts, and to save the time of the house I would ask that the rest of this answer be printed in Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave for the printing in Hansard of the rest of the answer?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

THERMAL PLANT, NOVA SCOTIA—FEDERAL CONTRIBUTION

Question No. 110—Mr. Robichaud:

1. Has the federal government made any contribution under the Atlantic Provinces Power Development Act for a thermal plant in the province of Nova Scotia?
2. If so, what was the amount of any such contribution?
3. Was any such contribution made toward (a) the construction of a new plant; (b) the modernization of an existing plant; (c) the increase of capacity of an existing plant?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Acting Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): The answer to question 1 is, yes.

CUSTOMS OFFICE CLOSING, PENETANGUISHENE, ONT.

Question No. 112—Mr. Macnaughton:

1. Has the Department of National Revenue received a request from the town of Penetanguishene for a postponement in the closing of the local customs office?
2. If so, has this request received consideration?
3. Has any decision been reached?
4. If so, what is the nature of the decision?
5. What reply, if any, has been made to the people of Penetanguishene?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): The answer to the first question is, yes; the answer to the second is, yes; and the answer to the third question is, yes. In reply to question No. 4, the decision was maintained to keep the customs office closed despite the representations made on the subject by the town council and by Dr. Rynard. In answer to question No. 5, the town council was advised of the reason for the closing of the office, and was also assured that the question would be kept under constant review. In doing so the department was following the principle laid down by my predecessor in office when he transferred the excise office to Midland as a preliminary step to closing the customs office.

"CANADIAN ECONOMIC OUTLOOK FOR 1959"

Question No. 113—Mr. Pickersgill:

1. Did the Department of Trade and Commerce prepare a document entitled The Canadian Economic Outlook for 1959?
2. If so, did this document forecast a continuing high level of unemployment throughout 1959?

Starred Questions

3. Did this document forecast a level of gross national product which was lower in volume than that actually realized?
4. To whom were copies of this document made available and on what dates?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): This is a question which attempts to deal indirectly with what was settled during the session by a vote of the house. On February 15, on a motion for the production of this document, the house decided that it should not be produced.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): On the point of order which has been raised by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I would draw Your Honour's attention to the fact that the only question which was settled by the house was whether or not such a document should be produced. Surely the settling of the question whether it should be produced in public does not preclude us from asking whether such a document exists.

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure that a valid point of order is raised. The question has been put on the order paper and asked. The minister, as I understand it, objects to answering on the basis of a prior decision of the house. There is no precedent for ordering that an answer be given.

PRESS SECRETARY, OFFICE OF LEADER OF OPPOSITION

Question No. 114—Mr. Pigeon:

1. Is there a position in the office of the Leader of the Opposition for a press secretary, or public relations officer, or some similar official, the salary for which position is provided from public funds?
2. If so, what is the precise description of the position, when was it created, and by whom is it now filled?
3. Was there any such position between December 14, 1956 and June 21, 1957, and if so, by whom was it filled?
4. Is or was any such official paid a salary from public funds, and if so, how much, and under what precise authority?

Mr. Richard A. Bell (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance): The answer to the first question is no; the second question is covered by the answer I have just given. The answer to the third question is no, and consequently question No. 4 does not apply.

LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION—STAFF SALARIES

Question No. 115—Mr. Pigeon:

1. What is the total of the annual salaries paid out of public funds to the staff of the Leader of the Opposition today?
2. What was the total of the annual salaries paid to the staff of the then leader of the opposition on January 8, 1957?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DISARMAMENT—WESTERN REJECTION OF RUSSIAN PROPOSAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he has any comment to make on the reported rejection, point by point, by the western delegates to the disarmament conference of Premier Khrushchev's proposals for complete disarmament as a basis for any disarmament compromise.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The discussions in the ten nation committee are, of course, private. Nevertheless I think I am revealing no secrets if I say that so far progress in that committee has been retarded because of the Soviet insistence on acceptance of the Khrushchev proposals as the basis of negotiations. In an effort to pave the way for discussions on concrete disarmament measures the western side has thought it desirable to clarify why it is that the Soviet plan is unacceptable as the sole basis for negotiations. The Leader of the Opposition will recognize that this is a normal process of negotiation.

IMMIGRATION

QUEBEC—REPORTED DELAY IN CLEARANCE OF MONTREAL-BOUND PASSENGERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and ask whether the hon. lady saw a delegation from Montreal this morning in connection with immigration clearances at Quebec for Montreal-bound passengers. Can the minister answer the question I put to her earlier as to whether any undue delay will be caused such passengers? Can the minister say what was the result of her interview with the Montreal delegation this morning?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I saw no delegation this morning, but I understand that officials of my department saw a delegation which was in Ottawa. I have not yet had a report of that meeting.

With regard to undue delay, I can assure my hon. friend that my department at all times seeks to co-operate with the shipping companies toward obviating any delay. I am sure that if the co-operation is mutual there will be no difficulty.

FLOODS

BEAUCEVILLE, QUE.—REPORTED DELAY IN DYNAMITING OF ICE IN RIVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence. My question will clearly indicate the national scope and interest in public affairs of our group.

In view of the fact that the Associate Minister of National Defence reported to the house on March 9 that an army report recommended the use of explosives to weaken the ice on the Chaudiere river two or three weeks before the anticipated date of the spring break-up, would the associate minister explain why, as reported in the Montreal Gazette of April 5, the army is only now being sent on this annual dynamiting task when the waters have already risen five to six feet, and the break-up is imminent?

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question. It is quite true, as I said on March 9, that action by the Canadian army would follow a request from the provincial authorities.

Subsequent to blasting operations on the Chaudiere river at Beauceville last year it was recommended that preparations for such an operation should be made two or three weeks before the expected date of the ice run. However, it was not until Monday, April 4 that a request for assistance from the provincial government was received by headquarters, Quebec command. A group of army personnel were immediately sent from Valcartier to Beauceville, arriving there on Monday evening. Blasting operations on the river commenced at five o'clock the next morning and by six o'clock the ice was moving slowly.

It is hoped that this prompt action by the army will eliminate the danger of flooding at Beauceville.

Mr. Herridge: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since this is the third consecutive spring that the army has been called upon to dynamite the ice of the Chaudiere river at Beauceville, does the associate minister not think the time has come to treat this as a normal operation instead of as a recurrent, last minute emergency?

Mr. Sevigny: On this particular matter, Mr. Speaker, it is the policy to send the army upon the request of the provincial authorities. To date this policy has been followed.

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

WINNIPEG—ESTABLISHMENT OF CITIZENSHIP COURT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration what progress has been made with regard to the establishment of the Canadian citizenship court at the city of Winnipeg?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there is provision in the current estimates for the cost of the establishment of this court. I am told that premises are now available and the civil service commission is proceeding to recruit staff.

Inquiries of the Ministry

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

SOUTH AFRICA—INQUIRY AS TO ADMISSION OF REFUGEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. D. Crestohl (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Can the minister tell the house whether any request has been made by any group, organization or individual for consideration by the government of Canada of the admission of refugees subject to racial discrimination, from South Africa, regardless of their colour?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): No such proposal has been made to the department so far as I know.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I ask the hon. lady a supplementary question. Can she say whether her department or any other department has any staff in South Africa capable of dealing with such applications if they were made?

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Speaker, I can only speak for my own department; the answer is no.

UNITED NATIONS

WORLD REFUGEE YEAR—REDUCTION IN WAITING PERIOD FOR TUBERCULAR CASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Taylor (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that under the world refugee year program refugees who are suffering from tuberculosis are being admitted to Canada, would the minister be prepared to consider a reappraisal of the practice of regarding tubercular cases as being in a prohibited class for admission until the disease has been inactive for two years? I am thinking particularly of dependants of Canadian citizens who find themselves in this situation?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, this matter has been under study for some time, and I am pleased to announce that it has now been agreed to reduce to one year the waiting period for persons suffering from tuberculosis that is considered to be inactive.

WORLD REFUGEE YEAR—INQUIRY AS TO ADMISSION OF ADDITIONAL REFUGEES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I wonder if the minister could indicate to the house the number of additional refugees who are going to be brought to Canada under the world refugee year plan?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I take it that the hon. member means under the tuberculosis plan?

Mr. Hellyer: Yes.

Mr. Green: I am not in a position to say as yet how many more will be covered by the extension.

REPRESENTATIONS BY CANADIAN WELFARE COUNCIL RESPECTING REFUGEES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder whether the Prime Minister has yet reached a decision on the representations of the Canadian welfare council, about which he was not able to announce a decision when he made a statement on the other points the other day, that is with respect to liability for health and welfare care.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I do not think I can add anything to what has already been said. When there is anything further to announce, an announcement will be made.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the Prime Minister could say whether the matter is still under active consideration.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I said that on the last occasion the question was asked.

WATER RESOURCES

LAKE ONTARIO AND ST. LAWRENCE RIVER—AGREEMENT RESPECTING CONTROL OF LEVELS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the meeting held between the Canadian and United States sections of the international joint commission on Tuesday, April 5 to discuss the draft of a final recommendation to the two governments on the control of water levels in lake Ontario and flows and levels in the St. Lawrence river, can the minister tell the house whether agreement was reached by the international joint commission and what formula will be established to control the level of the river, which will have a bearing on down-river interests?

[Mr. Hellyer.]

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the answer is that the international joint commission has reached agreement on this matter and that it will make its recommendations to both the United States and Canadian governments in the next few days. It will not be possible, of course, to comment further until the recommendations have been received.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a supplementary question. Can the minister say whether the two provinces involved, namely Quebec and Ontario, have been consulted and whether they gave their consent to those recommendations?

Mr. Green: I am afraid it will not be proper for me to make any comment on the recommendations until we have actually received them and have had an opportunity to study them.

Mr. Chevrier: I can understand that, but can the minister say whether the provinces were consulted?

Mr. Green: I think there have been consultations before now, but I do not know that there have been any as yet about these recommendations.

AGRICULTURE

BUTTER, CHEESE AND SKIM MILK—REQUEST FOR STABILIZATION PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture, of which I have already sent him notice. Following the minister's reply to my question on March 30 last, a number of farmers in my area and in the province have been sending me telegrams and letters—I have a sheaf of them here in my hand—asking if the minister might now be more encouraging and indicate whether the government will maintain price supports on butter and cheese and reestablish a support price or a deficiency price on milk powder.

(Text):

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture:) Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that this is a matter in which there is a very high degree of interest not only in Quebec but in other provinces of Canada. However, I can add nothing to the reply I gave on March 30, that this is a matter of government policy which will be announced in due course.

(Translation):

Mr. Augustin Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Would the minister kindly have his department consider granting Quebec producers the same support prices on their cheese delivered to Montreal, as are given to Ontario cheese producers for cheese delivered to Toronto?

(Text):

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, this question really relates back to the terms of the stabilization act. Under that act the support price set for agricultural commodities is a percentage of the base price for the previous 10 years. The price of cheese for the previous 10 years in Quebec was less than the price in Ontario, and that is the reason the support price in Quebec is half a cent less than the support price in Ontario. The same situation prevails in so far as the support price for hogs is concerned in my home city of Calgary. It is $3.50 less per hundred than in the city of Toronto.

NATIONAL REVENUE

TRAINING OF PERSONNEL POLICING DUMPING PRACTICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Have the personnel recruited for the customs division of the minister's department for the purpose of policing dumping practices generally completed their training?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Yes, Mr. Speaker, although we are continuing to recruit others. Hon. members may have seen in the press last week advertisements of the civil service commission seeking further recruits.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF BROADCASTING COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to direct a question to the house leader, and I ask it because of the current public interest in broadcasting regulations and licensing. Has the government altered its intention, as outlined at the commencement of the session, to re-establish the special committee on broadcasting? If no, could he give us some indication of when the government intends to call this committee?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The hon. member's question will be taken into consideration, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NATO—DISCUSSION BY DEFENCE MINISTERS OF GERMAN BASES IN SPAIN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence a question arising out of a press report in the Manchester Guardian of April 1, 1960 dealing with the recent NATO discussions in Paris, which read:

> The only two countries with no objection to German bases in Spain were Canada and Portugal.

I should like to ask the minister whether he would comment on the accuracy of that statement.

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): The question of bases in Spain was not brought up at the NATO meeting. There was no mention at any time of the country of Spain; therefore the report is quite inaccurate.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): May I ask a supplementary question. Can the minister say whether the government is opposed to bases in Spain?

Mr. Pearkes: Government policy in that respect has already been stated.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

DON MESSER AND HIS ISLANDERS—REQUEST FOR AUDIENCE RATING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Macdonald (Kings): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. In view of the fact that Don Messer and his Islanders, from Prince Edward Island, are in Ottawa for an engagement at the Coliseum today and tomorrow, could the minister inform the house: (a) what their rating is among Canadian produced programs? (b) how wide an audience do they have in Canada?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, it has not been the policy of the C.B.C. at any time to announce individual ratings of the various programs. However, I am sure the applause signifies that to some persons in the gallery at least it is a very popular program indeed. It was on the maritime network for many years and is now on the national network, and is one of the best received programs on the C.B.C.

INCOME TAX

DEDUCTIBILITY OF CONTRIBUTIONS TO MORAL RE-ARMAMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): On March 31 the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam asked me a question with respect to taxation policies respecting contributions to Moral Re-Armament. I am advised that the records of the Department of National Revenue indicate that the Oxford group or Moral Re-Armament, also known as the Oxford group and Moral Re-Armament, was incorporated without share capital under the Dominion Companies Act under letters patent in 1944 and amended by supplementary letters patent in 1956. The main purpose of the organization is said to be the advancement of the Christian religion. It has been recognized as a charitable organization since 1956, and donations to that organization are deductible as charitable gifts in accordance with, and to the extent provided by, section 27, subsection 1 of the Income Tax Act.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Tuesday, April 5, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Benidickson, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Regier.

(Translation):

Mr. Gabriel Roberge (Megantic): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at ten o'clock last night, I had just completed the few preliminary remarks I had to make on the budget speech for the fiscal year 1960-61.

I shall now deal with certain particular aspects. Like several observers, I was surprised at the enthusiasm shown by some hon. members who support the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), when he brought down his budget. That enthusiasm, indeed, has also surprised the Montreal Gazette correspondent, Mr. Arthur Blakely. Here is what he wrote in the Gazette for April 4, 1960:

(Text):

All the same, it isn't easy to account for the frequence with which applause—one burst every 120 seconds—greeted Mr. Fleming. Encouragement on this scale is over and above the line of duty.

(Translation):

But Mr. Blakely does not stop there. A few lines down, he adds:

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I must remind him that it is against the rules to quote from newspaper editorial and articles which reflect upon the actions of hon. members in this house. This is for his guidance as he proceeds.

Mr. Roberge: I am sorry if I have offended in this respect, and I will try not to do so again.

(Translation):

I shall nevertheless continue my remarks and say, without, I am sure, being out of order, that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) was right to call this a do-nothing budget.

I noted in the minister's budget speech the advice he gives and the recommendations he makes to the Canadian people so that the government may succeed in balancing this country's financial position.

It is well known that the government itself has been the largest borrower of modern times in Canada.

Today, the Minister of Finance warns Canadians that they will have to cut down on their spending if they want to make both ends meet. The house will no doubt remember the fairly scathing criticism directed in the house by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm against the governor of the Bank of Canada with regard to his annual report.

In various public statements, Mr. Coyne had asked or advised Canadians to cut down on their spending. He repeated that warning in his annual report, and I shall now quote a few excerpts of the Bank of Canada annual report for 1959 to the Minister of Finance, and more particularly a paragraph appearing on page 9 of the English text.

Mr. Coyne says the following:

We must in the end learn as a nation to live within our means, and exhibit the strength and will to do so. It would, in my view, be the path of realism to move firmly in that direction on a broad front without delay.

Further on he says:

For the purpose of maintaining full employment, economic growth and a rising standard of living, we do not need to stimulate a temporarily high but unsustainable rate of consumer spending by means of more and more consumer credit, or of capital expenditures on a scale greater than our own capacity and willingness to save out of annual production for that purpose. We would benefit more from greater diversification of our production, which could provide a higher average level of employment and one less exposed to the hazard of sudden changes.

And I shall add one of the last sentences in this chapter of the Bank of Canada report, which may be found on page 10, where Mr. Coyne states:

The adoption of sound and balanced programs for future development, the avoidance of excess in spending and borrowing, and the promotion of a more stable and diversified structure of economic activity, have never been so essential to the continued growth and stability of the Canadian economy.

It seems that last Thursday the Minister of Finance finally decided to agree with the governor of the Bank of Canada and, in his budget speech, to give himself and Canadians at large some advice on the art of saving.

In this regard, I should like to quote a few sentences from the budget speech delivered by the Minister of Finance, on March 31, 1960, as recorded on page 2672 of Hansard:

We must place emphasis on greater productivity and efficiency rather than on sheer size, on cost control rather than on price increases, on greater saving rather than on excessive consumption.

A little further, he added:

In saying this, I am fully aware of the role of leadership that falls to the federal government. It is the responsibility of the government to try to establish the conditions of financial balance within which the endeavours of others can be carried out successfully. Let me assure hon. members that the government is discharging this responsibility.

A little farther on, the Minister of Finance again referred to the matter of saving when he said:

Saving—voluntary, purposeful, constructive saving—is essential in an economic system dedicated to freedom and progress.

In his budget speech, the Minister of Finance also announced salary increases for federal civil servants. His statement was hedged with oratorical precautions, as though he wanted to apologize for his failure to grant such adjustments earlier, in spite of pressing demands from civil servants' associations across the country.

Recalling the statement he had made on October 13, 1959, when he explained why he did not want to grant salary increases to federal civil servants, he said, as reported on page 2679 of Hansard of Thursday last:

The decision taken by the government, in the light of its financial position, will not preclude consideration being given to the special position of certain categories of civil servants as the government's financial circumstances permit.

A little farther, he added:

It is now nearly three years since there has been a general increase in civil service salaries. The last general increase was authorized by the present government in July 1957, and made retroactive to May 1, 1957.

With regard to this matter, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a slight correction in order to remove any doubts in the minds of hon. members and of the general public.

When the estimates of the Department of Labour were being considered during the session of 1958, my hon. friend, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) insisted on that matter of salary increases for federal civil servants. Here is what he said, and I quote from page 3678 of Hansard for August 16, 1958:

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not want to get into a quarrel with the minister, for whom I have the greatest possible esteem. I think we really do understand one another. I will repeat what I said. I said that this matter was considered by the treasury board of the old government at its last meeting and was recommended, but that final approval was left to the incoming government. That is what I said, and if that is what the minister agrees with, then we are in complete agreement.

Mr. Starr: That is right.

Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that a salary adjustment had been considered by the previous government, by the treasury board at the time, but that in view of the change which was about to occur, the St. Laurent government thought it wise to leave to this government the care of taking a final decision and of adopting also the treasury board's recommendation.

Less than a third of the total number of civil servants throughout Canada, 50,000 out of 180,000, will benefit from this government largesse, if I may apply that word to something which had been impatiently awaited—and justly so—for so long.

The classes of civil servants which stand to benefit from those increases in the immediate future are clerks and stenographers, as well as meteorologists and veterinarians. In that regard, I should like to quote from page 2680 of Hansard, what the minister had to say on March 31, 1960:

I am happy to report that the treasury board—has now approved recommendations from the civil service commission involving some 50,000 employees of the public service, principally in the clerical and stenographic classes but also including some of the professional classes such as meteorologists and veterinarians, where recruitment and retention of the essential number of qualified officers have become increasingly difficult.

Besides the civil servants properly so-called, there are at least two other classes of Canadians who are regular employees of the state, men whose work is also of immense value to the country and who, on occasion, even risk their lives on its behalf. I refer to the members of Canada's armed forces and of the R.C.M.P. So far, the government has made no announcement regarding those people, and that is too bad. This fact was noted by the Canadian Press correspondent, who referred to it in an article which appeared in the Gazette for April 1, 1960. I quote:

(Text):

There was no mention in the speech of members of the armed forces and of the R.C.M.P.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, we who sit on this side of the house hope that the government will look into the situation of those government employees and will see to it that they get a raise proportionate to the risks involved in their type of work and also to the present cost of living.

The minister also indicates that the government has been guided mainly by considerations of personnel recruiting, thereby implying that it has become difficult to recruit certain classes of civil servants precisely because of salary levels.

It is not my intention to quote any further from the minister's speech, but I should like to refer briefly to the opinions expressed by civil service associations in that respect. I have here a clipping from the Ottawa Journal of April 1, 1960 from which I will quote a few excerpts for the record. The report appears under the following heading:

(Text):

Says CS will "Hit the roof".

The joint action committee of the civil service said today it is "disappointed" the salary increases announced in the budget last night are not retroactive, and apply to only 50,000 employees, roughly one third of the civil service.

A stronger statement came from the professional institute of the public service, which slammed the boosts as "too little and too late"—

(Translation):

And farther down in the same item, I read:

(Text):

Today, the joint action committee made these points:

1. It has "consistently" pointed out the justification for an effective date in salary boosts of October 1, 1958—

2. The joint action committee also expresses concern at the "emphasis" placed by the finance minister on the recruitment factor in relation to further adjustments for other classes.

The committee holds that this approach to pay revision will cause "much anxiety" among employees not included in early announcements.

The PIPSC lays emphasis on the lack of pay boosts for senior civil servants, "a realm in which the institute's research has revealed a crying need".

It also fears the rate of rotation will be "far too slow" to keep up with changing conditions.

[Mr. Roberge.]

It may cause some surprise that the hon. member for Megantic should have something to say on the position of this country's civil servants. It is true that I am not a representative of an Ottawa riding; but it is also true that there are public servants in my own. And even if I only represent a single constituency, I am, like all my hon. friends here, spokesman for the nation as a whole.

Some people in my riding are employed in various post offices, some in the unemployment insurance offices, others in customs offices. Most of them are neither clerks, nor secretaries, nor meteorologists nor veterinaries, which means that only very few civil servants in our district will benefit from the budget increases. Those Canadians do, however, expect their position to be reconsidered, like the various classes of employees elsewhere. It is obvious that the classes of civil servants in my part of the country are the same or, at least, similar to those in other districts, in cities and towns of similar size. Those people too are entitled to the salaries provided for their jobs and their responsibilities.

I pointed out before, in a quotation, that recruiting needs had guided the minister in his decision.

I know personally that, in our district, some young people who would have all qualifications for certain jobs, positions in the unemployment insurance office, for instance, even refused to submit to the various examinations, because of the insufficient salary provided and also to a certain extent, because of their small prospects of getting higher pay. Such conditions are unfortunate, because the country is thus being deprived of the services of well qualified citizens.

There is another field that the minister failed to deal with and I would like to offer a few remarks about it.

But this state has other servants than those who work in the federal civil service, either internal or external. There are also provincial employees, and employees of municipalities and school boards. I should like to say a word on the latter two classes.

Most mayors and aldermen of cities and towns and councillors of rural municipalities, as well as members of school boards, ordinarily work without remuneration. Some of those devoted public men go to some personal expense, often more than would appear to be either fair or necessary.

This anomaly has been recognized by some municipalities, and in some cases provincial legislatures have granted them authority to remunerate their elected officials.

The federal government, under statute 1-2 Elizabeth II, chapter 40, entitled: "An act to amend the Income Tax Act", has recognized that fact. And the then Liberal government enacted paragraph 3 of section 10, which I will not read. I have it here, it is a bit long and couched in legal phraseology, the chief merit of which is certainly not clarity.

I am informed that, in many cases, those elected municipal officials cannot benefit from the provisions of the act, because their allowance is not considered as expenses, and that it must be added to their income. It will be agreed that the St. Laurent government took a step in the right direction, and it will be agreed also that after eight years, it is now necessary to take a further step.

In the last eight years, the expenses of mayors and aldermen, and of school trustees, have increased for all kinds of reasons, and it does not seem fair to me that those citizens should be called upon to pay a double tax, that is, both on their income and on the expenses they incur in the fulfilment of their duties.

Must school or municipal boards provide that part of the remuneration shall be considered as a salary and the other part as expenses? On reading over the section I referred to earlier, it seems that this is the case.

However, since it is a matter of income, I do not believe the federal government would be going beyond its jurisdiction if it were at least to investigate the position in which mayors and aldermen of our cities and municipalities, and school trustees, find themselves in this respect.

I believe the government would lose very little in the way of income if a minimum remuneration were made exempt from taxation for these people.

I urge the Minister of Finance to study this aspect of the matter and take corrective action as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker, I now want to conclude my remarks by talking about confectionery and chocolate manufacturing establishments, and also soft drink bottling plants, in respect of the sales tax. This tax is levied to the extent of 11 per cent, of which 8 per cent goes into general revenue and 3 per cent into the old age security fund. It will be recalled that in 1957, the Liberal government had removed the excise tax on soft drinks. The minister has no doubt received the briefs submitted by the association of confectioners and chocolate makers in 1959 and also in 1960. Those briefs are quite explicit and are worthy of consideration.

There have been situations in the past that made such sales taxes necessary, but it does seem that those situations no longer exist and that taxes on chocolate and soft drinks should now be removed.

The brief emphasizes the fact that at least 10,000 people are employed in the chocolate industry with total earnings of over $25 million. A certain number of people are living from the sale and distribution of those products. Research made on the subject definitely shows that sales of those products are reduced as a result of taxation. The tax also cuts down purchases of commodities used in connection with those products, and this in turn prevents any development of national production in that field. There seems to be no doubt that complete removal or at least a material reduction of the tax, would result in increased production.

A proper promotion campaign could boost consumption and therefore create new jobs at both the production and the distribution levels. The general outcome of such action, as far as revenue is concerned, would probably be increased returns from that tax in relation to the number of sales. I think that in this case the old saying: "The sales make the profit", is particularly applicable.

At all events, people employed in that industry would pay income tax since they would hold jobs, and unemployment would be relieved accordingly.

What I have just said about the chocolate industry also applies to the soft drinks industry. I have here a short brief prepared by the manufacturers and I should like to put a few excerpts on the record. I quote:

> Removal of the sales tax on soft drinks will enable bottlers to:
> (a) Employ several hundreds additional workers,
> (b) Compete on an adequate basis with tea, coffee, chocolate drinks, canned and non-aerated fruit juices, popsicles, ice cream, soft drink powders, etc.—
> (c) Develop their business and provide many local advantages.

The brief goes on to show that removal of the tax would likely enable 573 bottling plants to supply jobs to 1,600 and even 2,200 more men, not including salesmen. To complete this quotation, I should like to put on record the last paragraph of this brief:

> From 1,600 to 2,100 men will no longer be unemployed and the government will not have to pay unemployment insurance on their behalf. Instead, they will promote the local economy with the money they will spend; they will be paying taxes as well as contributing to unemployment insurance.

Those were the remarks I wanted to make in this house about the third Conservative budget.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I must inform him that his time has expired.

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to deviate for a few moments from the subject now under debate in order to extend the sympathy of, I am sure, everybody in the house to the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Habel), chief whip of the opposition party, in the sad bereavement which he and his family suffered yesterday in the death of Mrs. Habel.

I realize that the annual budget is always an issue of keen national concern. This large budget is no exception, and before dealing with some of the implications may I extend my congratulations to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) on the able presentation he made the other day. It has been my privilege to observe at close range eight different ministers of finance in this parliament, and I may say that I think Canada has been very fortunate in having the outstanding talent, the high type of character, the devotion to duty and the distinguished service given by all these gentlemen. I feel we are still fortunate in having the hon. member for Eglinton as our present Minister of Finance. In native ability, in culture, in devotion to duty and industry I think he is unexcelled by any of his illustrious predecessors.

I know we all have a sense of pride stirred within us when we read that our gross national product has exceeded $35 billion. I must say, however, that as long as we have an unemployment problem and huge deficits on international payments and trade, I think we should beware of taking the size of the gross national product as a sound yardstick of our progress as the former government did. It is true that it indicates the vastness and variety of our resources and the native ability of our people. It is true that it emphasizes that no matter what may lie ahead we as Canadians hold the blue chips in terms of natural resources. We have more resources than any country with a similar number of people has ever enjoyed and we have need of a farsighted, vigorous, energetic population characteristic of this northern climate.

With respect to those totalitarian people with whom we are forced to compete we must be wary of following the pattern of smug complacency followed by the previous government and of failing to recognize that we are meeting a new form of international competition from another type of society altogether. We have to stop and take stock of the totalitarian dictatorship which now controls half the world. They think they can outdo us, as it were, and gain economic supremacy over us. They believe we have grown soft as a result of our high standard of living and what they regard more or less as our reckless extravagance, short working hours and so forth. They believe we have grown soft and as a result shall fall like ripened fruit into their hands.

I think they underestimate us in holding that view but at the same time I suggest that we must avoid the pride and complacency that seemed to characterize those who ruled this country over a long period of time. We can rejoice in the fact that we have vast resources and a high standard of living but despite this we should at this period in our development tighten our belts a little and go to work in an effort to face the challenge of this problem.

It has been my privilege to watch the progress of this young country for some time both from the fields of agriculture and the factories of industry. I have been privileged by the sufferage of Dufferin-Simcoe to listen to more than one third of all the annual budgets that reported the progress of this dominion in this house and therefore I would feel unworthy of the responsibility that my experience imposes if I hesitated to draw attention to trends that I believe have been and are dangerous to the security and progress of this country. It may be somewhat unpopular to refer to these trends but may I suggest it might be economically disastrous to ignore them.

We must face these issues. We cannot avoid them and we do not desire to. One trend that has been dangerous in my opinion has taken the form of a surrender by all parties to what I might describe as popular or political clamour to have governments do so much for so many. I am not so reactionary as to suggest—indeed, I do not admit that I am reactionary at all, but I do not suggest—that there is not a need for social welfare legislation—I am not unmindful of the fact that while on one hand we talk about our high cost of production and our high cost economy we are, on the other hand, handing out to the people in many cases assistance to provide things which they should earn for themselves and which falls within individual responsibility to provide. We have a great free enterprise system but it is overburdened with all these costs that must come from the production of that system.

One of the chief reasons why the remnants of the one third great Liberal party are now sitting in the shades of opposition is because approximately one half of our industrial enterprises and three quarters of our raw ore resources are controlled by foreign interests. The people of Canada are anxious to have our economic independence restored before it is too late. That is why we have had the change of government.

With regard to the increasing responsibilities in the field of so-called social welfare, I realize it is probably of little use referring to the value of the dollar in 1925 and the value of the dollar today, but surely it makes us stop and think when we realize that the cost of the welfare aspect to our economy today is more than four times greater than the total cost of all government administration when I first entered this parliament. Surely we should stop and take stock at this stage in our development.

As a consequence of the trend to which I just referred it is probably difficult to reconcile such a highly burdened economy with the economies of other countries with whom we compete in the production of finished goods and where wages are less per day than our costs are per hour.

May I venture to suggest to industry that they must lower their costs to meet this type of competition. That is their chief duty. That is a primary function of business management. Management must devote itself to this daily task in order to survive. The management of Canadian industry today is I believe among the best in the world. It operates with a high standard of employment and maintains the highest wages and shortest working hours and more frequent coffee breaks than business management in any country of the world except the United States, and yet we try to meet the additional burden that confronts us.

It is obvious that industrial management in this country is good or it could not survive under these conditions and pay all the fringe benefits it does and still pay to the government in the form of other charges over 50 per cent of all it makes.

In every branch of our primary industries we have witnessed a revolution in the production of goods with a corresponding reduction in manpower. In agriculture we have witnessed the same thing. We see today that twice as much can be produced as was produced 25 years ago employing one-third as many people. It is estimated that inside of a very few years agricultural production employing only 10 per cent our people will produce more than is produced today.

During this period of transition it is important that we be alert to these changing conditions. When the opposition were in power they seemed almost to have fallen asleep. They ignored these changes which screamed for attention before their very eyes. They did little to provide for employment in other fields of enterprise. They dismally failed to give the necessary encouragement for the establishment of secondary industries and employment therein which industries would process finished products in this country. Indeed, clinging to their old free trade doctrines they encouraged the importation from low wage foreign countries of finished products with a high labour content and apologized for it by expressing the need to buy finished goods everywhere so they could sell our raw products with a low wage content in the markets of the world. It is not difficult to sell goods to someone who wants them or to someone who cannot do without them. This form of economic appeasement has been unsound.

As a result of the policies of the previous administration the expansion of industry and the creation of jobs in Canada was only about half as good as it has been in the same period in West Germany, Japan, the United Kingdom and the United States. It is important to remember that three of those countries, as all hon. members know, underwent destruction during the war. Despite that their industries have been rebuilt. They have increased their industrial activity and employed people just twice as fast, percentage-wise, as Canada has.

Do not let us fall into the old Liberal habit of believing in that kind of optimism where you say that everything is fine as long as it does not happen to me. This country is strong and virile. Indeed, it has to be to stand that type of complacency. It has also, to the extent to which I have referred, failed to maintain its place in probably the most active industrial expansion period of the world. Like the lost minute, those days are gone forever. Had we not failed in that period the immigration policy would be different today. We would not be having a curtailment to less than one third of the immigrants we brought in in 1913. We would not have had the situation where 510,000 of our educated boys and girls were going to the United States to find employment in the last five years of the former regime.

These things should be studied, Mr. Speaker. There was a time when they should have been taken at the flood. There was a time in world prosperity when we should have been alerted in a business way rather than stay in this smug complacency. The result of it is we find ourselves today with international deficit payments of $1,500 million and a trade deficit of over $500 million, and dividends going out of this country to those who control half our industry and three quarters of our raw resources. At the end of last year it amounted to $500 million. That did not come about because this government was elected; that did not come about overnight; that was established and left, with the consequent growing unemployment, on the doorstep of the present government. For the second time in my years in this house we have had that heritage from the Liberal champions of free trade.

Then, Mr. Speaker, we have a lack of population. My hon. friend is mumbling something but I hope he is thinking more than he is talking. We find that the lack of population is closely associated with the unemployment problem. I am sure that it is recognized by every hon. member within the sound of my voice as the chief problem and as the chief challenge of this government today. What does the opposition suggest as a solution? The only solution I have heard is that of enlarging the free trade pattern which did so much to create the problem itself. The opposition has suggested free trade with the United States. Then, they suggested free trade with the United Kingdom, but they backed away from that one very fast. Now they have gone farther afield and out into the Atlantic and they say, "We want free trade within NATO. We do not know what we are going to do with the inner six; we do not care what happens to the outer seven, but we will take them all, let the chips fall where they may."

This old doctrine of free trade was outmoded 50 years ago. This reckless trend which has been developed and followed under such complacency, the habit of using our gross national product as the only yardstick, disregarding, as they did, trade deficits every year but one in 10 years before this government came to power, measuring prosperity as they have, exporting our raw products as a specialty and importing finished products as a political expediency, has been as unfair to labour as it has been unsound and extravagant to our economy.

For over 30 years I have sat here and listened to vigorous debates on the unemployment problem, only to see it temporarily relieved from time to time by the grim necessities of wartime. That is not good enough and I do not believe we have to endure it. I think it can be improved and under this dynamic government that we have elected it will be improved. It has become almost chronic.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, may I pay a tribute to my old friend and colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green), for his untiring and capable influence with other countries toward disarmament. I mention it because we all hope and pray that he may be successful and that we shall have a substantial measure of success. Here let us pause and realize that if he is successful, and if we accomplish the goal we are all striving for, there will be a change in the economic picture. We will have to find a place for those who have been toiling in the extravagant and wasteful work of producing the defence equipment that we have all felt was so necessary. These men must be placed somewhere else; we must find some form of employment for them. Owing to our swiftly changing labour conditions, opportunities for increased employment are not going to be found in agriculture or in the production and exportation of other raw products.

May I again emphasize what I believe has been a tragic misapprehension indulged in by many in this house, namely that we must accept finished goods, with a high labour content, from other countries before we can sell our raw products in other countries. I have repeatedly said this in this house. I am speaking about the manufacturing industry because I am interested in the labouring man. I have probably less manufacturing in my riding than many others. I have no personal interest in management, and I am not connected in any other way at the present time with the manufacturing industry, but I am conscious of the fact, as I believe every hon. member is, that that is the only avenue in which we can find employment to absorb the boys and girls we are now educating. They must be employed by the manufacturing enterprises in this country.

I do suggest that so far as having to buy the finished goods from the countries where we sell our raw products is concerned, as everyone knows, while we hold those blue chips in raw resources and the United States is depleting hers we have a market for those products there and in many countries of the world. Does anyone suggest for a moment, in saying that we have to buy the finished products before we can sell our raw products, that a steel plant that buys the raw ore from Labrador or from Steep Rock will go to the textile people in the United States and say,

"We want to get another load of iron ore. How about the Canadian home market? Have you been able to absorb it all? You are selling twice as much as they are producing for themselves. You are getting in on their textiles, but do you think you are getting enough of them?" Does anyone for a moment think that is the situation? No, Mr. Speaker. It might happen in a country under a dictatorship, but it does not happen in those countries where we hope to develop our greatest trade.

Do not let us forget, that the United States and other countries buy raw products from us as and when they need them. If it were otherwise, we might achieve a favourable trade balance. We buy more finished products from the United States than any other country, and this has been true for the last half-century. We have been buying more every year during the last 10 years except one, and that was during the Korean war. If that theory is sound, then why does the United States of America not take our uranium when we want to sell it so badly? Stop and think about it, gentlemen.

I can well recall the days when the Liberal party was in power, and twice in the history of their government the United States closed us out of their market for western cattle and other agricultural products. There was the Fordney-McCumber tariff in the late 1920's and the Hawley-Smoot tariff in 1929. The late Right Hon. Mr. King warned us to be careful not to provoke the United States with any trade proposals because of our raw products going to the United States. We were buying a million dollars worth of products per day more from them than we were selling and yet overnight, Mr. Speaker, as you will recall, they closed their market to our western cattle and agricultural products.

I mention these things to remind this house and to remind the country that we do not need to take the finished products of these foreign countries to the exorbitant extent we are today merely for the sake of selling raw products which have less workmanship content in them. This policy is unfair to labour. It is extravagant and unsound to our economy. Surely, if we learn slowly, we learn by experience that this condition is not as it has been represented.

No, Mr. Speaker, let us not forget that after all when we need markets so badly the only market in the world over which we have any control is our own. It is one of the greatest markets in the world. No similar number of people buy so much in the way of manufactured goods and consumer goods. We buy as many automobiles, frigidaires, radios and television sets as many countries that have over 100 million people. This is a great potential market that will give increased employment and will do more to solve the problem of markets for agricultural products in the long term than all the parity prices and novel ideas that we have had presented as solutions for agricultural problems. No other development is as necessary as the development of that home market.

The possibilities for development of that market are illustrated by the fact that we are paying about $270 per capita for products from outside the country. Just stop and think of it; that is 10 times per capita more than any other important industrial country in the world ever bought from outside its borders. Should we wonder that we have unemployment, that we have to build post offices, give handouts, enact social legislation and so forth? I have always known that you cannot put much politics into business, but let us try in this time of challenge to put a little business into politics. Let us observe these facts that are screaming for solution. I think the United States of America buys about $28 per capita of products from outside the country.

I am glad to observe that our government has taken into account the difficult conditions in the textile and other manufacturing industries. I am glad they are taking a step in the right direction in that regard. I am glad to observe that they are trying to get away from that free trade pattern that was set by their predecessors. This is a change for which the people of Canada voted; this is a change which the people of Canada expect from this government, led by a dynamic Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), who is supported by one of the ablest cabinets we have had in Canada since confederation. This government has more numbers behind them, and more youth and clean-cut ability than I have experienced in my time. This is a great opportunity to put into effect the policies for which this party stands, the traditional policies for the development of our own resources within our own country. I am sure that is what this government is trying to do. Despite the handicaps that manufacturing industry has had, the high taxes, stubborn competition, they certainly employ more people, pay more of our taxes and give needed freight tonnage and freight revenues to our railways to a greater extent than all the other industries of Canada combined except mining.

I can only suggest that it is rather amusing to me that those who are struggling to hold together the tattered remnants of the Liberal party, are feebly drawing attention to the related problems of unemployment. You would imagine this problem had only developed since the election. It has been said that Rome was not built in a day. These issues have not developed overnight. We find that unemployment has been almost chronic for some time in this country. They tell us now that the unemployment situation is bad and that our per capita debt is terrible. You would think these conditions only arrived overnight. They do not tell you that the debt more than doubled in the last five years of their regime. They say the international balance of payments situation is bad, but they do not tell you that during the last five years of their government our deficit in goods and services totalled over $6 billion. This heritage has again been dropped on the doorstep of the incoming government.

These are some of the reasons the opposition gives for having no confidence in the present government. May I suggest it is very amusing because it just emphasizes why the public has not any confidence in them. In the interest of enlarging our home market for farm products, employment for an increasing population and strenghtening our national economy, I urge the government to restore confidence and stability in our manufacturing industries. Changes must be made in that old free trade pattern that has already threatened our economic independence. Had it not been for the extravagant stimulus of defence production, this dangerous trend would have been far more conspicuous.

The manufacturing industry is indigenous to a sound economy. Its encouragement and expansion are now as equally challenging to the government as are the agricultural problems. These two industries are complementary and neither needs to be sacrificed in the interest of the other. The employment in the factories of industry is as vital to this country as the work in the fields of agriculture.

I say again, and this may be politically unpopular, that it is economically dangerous to avoid this problem. The future of our industrial growth is unlikely to be confined to either the St. Lawrence or great lakes areas. Indeed, Winnipeg now challenges the record of Hamilton, as we see the smokestacks rising in the wheat fields of Saskatchewan. Edmonton and Calgary seem to hold happy arguments as to their greatness in their rich and lucky province. Indeed, the hope of the maritime provinces as well as the great prosperity of British Columbia depends on the steady growth to which I have referred. We are facing a new age in these swiftly changing times in a world that is becoming industrialized more rapidly all the time.

[Mr. Rowe.]

I do not believe our customs and tariff structures in this country have changed much in 50 years. I think it is high time that we streamlined and modernized our approach to these gigantic problems as we face days of possible economic adversity such as we have never experienced previously. As you know, Mr. Speaker, our tariff structure has been kicked around all during these years as a political football. I have had a couple of passes at it myself. It has been nicknamed to suit the season and to suit the occasion. It has been called "reciprocity" sometimes. At others it has been called in debate "brick for brick", "don't provoke the U.S.". At other times it has been called a "countervailling duty plan". Sometimes the policies have been fixed more in Washington than in Ottawa. It is about time that we took a straight or new look and did a little bit of a face-lifting job on our whole customs and tariff structure which has not had an investigation since 1907. I think we must modernize and streamline this approach.

In this regard may I suggest and urge upon the government the necessity of giving consideration to the enlargement of our tariff board so that it might give hearings to direct appeals and submissions from producer and consumer organizations that might expedite its findings and recommendations accordingly to the government.

Before closing may I again mention the general agreement on tariffs and trade, commonly known as GATT. This is another child of the former government left, for better or worse, on the doorstep of the present government. We were told by the former government that before they went over to negotiate this treaty, "we lowered our tariffs more than anybody else before we entered negotiations, and that is why they liked us so much". They made the agreement. Strange as it may seem, the present government has adhered to it more diligently probably than many of the other signatories. However, if our industrial employment is going to be unduly endangered by adherence to GATT, I think we had better consider the advisability of having a more practical fiscal policy made in Ottawa rather than in Geneva. Even in these days of such great international tension and uncertainty we cannot afford to sacrifice our economic independence on the altar of world diplomacy.

In closing I wish to pay a compliment to our dynamic Prime Minister for his efforts, during election time and since then, to bring to this great young country of Canada a greater degree of national unity. In that regard I believe we can all say that this government has succeeded to no small degree. In our provincial and dominion relations, and in all classes, races and creeds are more closely united than they have ever been at any time since I entered parliament. I believe a great deal of credit is due to this vigorous new government in Ottawa. Despite these challenges and despite our troubles the future is not as dark as some might think it to be. I believe it will be a brighter future if our people are encouraged to face realities. I believe we need that same type of unity that marked the habits and practices of our people in this country when our survival was at stake, at that time their achievements surprised the world. I believe that type of unity between the west and the east, the farmer and the manufacturer, industry and labour, the capitalist and the shareholder, and between provincial and dominion governments must be re-established. Our people will then guarantee a sound economic future that can maintain a way of life that no other people have ever approached.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I shall like to associate myself and the C.C.F. party with the opening remarks of the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (M. Rowe) in which he expressed the great sorrow of all of us on learning of the passing of the wife of the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Habel), the Liberal chief whip. To our colleague and to the family we extend our utmost sympathy at this time in their bereavement.

It was like old times, Mr. Speaker, to listen to the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe. He has played a distinguished part in the public life of this country for many years. Sitting now on the government side of the house he has shown today something of the old fire and talent in debate that we have had displayed so often in the house. As a friend for some considerable length of time I want to tell him sincerely that I hope he will in the future avail himself of the opportunity to speak more frequently than he has in the recent past. I am sure he would receive the same kind of attentive hearing he was given this afternoon.

The hon. member started out by pointing out some of the great issues facing the people of this country. No one could have pointed them out more ably than did the hon. gentleman. As a matter of fact, during his opening remarks I was wondering whether he thought he was still on this side of the house because he was pointing out the great deficit in international payments that faces this country, the greatest deficit in history. He was pointing out the tremendous amount of unemployment in this country.

Mr. Pallett: That is not accurate.

Mr. Argue: That is correct.

Mr. Pallett: No. Look at the statistics.

Mr. Argue: He was pointing out the tremendous amount of unemployment in this country that has not yet ben dealt with. He went on further to say that these were at least two of the problems that is was necessary for our country to solve, particularly in view of the great challenge to this nation and to other nations in the western world from Soviet competition at this time. However, when the hon. gentleman came to his solutions I think he showed that the Conservative party, particularly if it should follow his advice, is not likely to deal—certainly not in a satisfactory manner—with these great problems that face our country today.

I think the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) made a very basic decision many months ago and that was that no matter what happened as far as other questions are concerned, no matter what the degree of unemployment in the country, no matter what the condition of the agricultural industry and no matter what the position of the old age pensioners, the budget would be balanced with as little increase as possible in expenditures. That purpose the Minister of Finance has accomplished and he seems to be highly satisfied with the state of affairs in our country today. In his budget speech, amongst other things, he said this as reported at page 2669 of Hansard:

> Twelve months ago when I introduced the last budget we were emerging from a recession.

As reported on the next page he went on to say this:

> Last year we emerged from a recession—

As far as the Minister of Finance is concerned, he feels that we are out of the recession and that everything is going well He went on to say this:

> We can look forward optimistically to another year of solid expansion and balanced growth.

I do not agree that we have had a year of solid expansion. I do not agree that we have had a year of the kind of balanced growth that should commend itself to the minister. I think we have witnessed a year just ended in which Canadians were not doing as well, either by way of production or by way of consumption, as they are capable of doing. There are many great problems facing our nation at this time. These problems have not been dealt with and have not been solved. The Minister of Finance was frank enough to point out that there are more unemployed today than there were a year ago. There are 18,000 more persons out of work and looking for jobs than a year ago. The latest figure is 555,000; a year ago it was 537,000. Yet the minister is prepared by his statements in the budget to allow this situation to continue. He is making a forecast of the same type of general increase in the gross national product for the coming year as he made in the past year. And very obviously the government has decided that it is going to live with unemployment and it is perfectly prepared to allow unemployment to continue at its very high level.

The government has not brought forward a policy to deal with farm income. The government is reverting to the open market system. It is pulling the props out from under the supports for many agricultural products. It is using the technique of deficiency payments. It announced the other day a small payment by way of deficiency payment on one grade of eggs, and still the producers who brought to market eggs of other grades will receive no payment whatsoever. In the meantime they have lost the benefit of the support for purchase prices that helped maintain a somewhat higher price for those other grades.

The government announced a few weeks ago—I was not in the house at the time; had I been I would not under the rules of the house have had an opportunity to make any comment at that time—that it was saying "No" to the western agricultural delegation. This came as a very distinct shock and great disappointment to the producers of western Canada who had placed so much faith in this government. They had come to Ottawa asking the government to fulfil its promise of providing parity prices. They had asked the government to consider the price-cost squeeze. They had asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) to go at least part way toward fulfilling his promise of providing deficiency payments.

But what have they received? I think they received very bad treatment from the Prime Minister. I think they received rather insulting treatment when they had to wait for almost a full calendar year before the Prime Minister finally made up his mind, although ostensibly he was considering it all this time, and said "No, there is nothing for you". We are hoping that this does not close the door for the duration of this parliament on the very important and well documented case of western producers for some assistance. The budget was a disappointment in that no mention was made of any improvement of the position of our agricultural producers.

So there is widespread unemployment. The agricultural industry is being placed more and more at the mercy of the open, unregulated market against which organized agriculture has complained for so many years. We have seen in 1959 Canada's net indebtedness on international payments reach the highest figure in Canadian history. The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) pointed out this afternoon, very properly, that this means our country is in hock to this extent to foreign investors, mainly investors to the United States, and that to the extent signified by these figures our industry is coming more and more under the control and domination of United States capital. The hon. member went on to point out that it was not just a case of an adverse balance of payments on merchandise trade, but that to the extent of $600 million or more we had to pay out obligations as a result of investment of outside capital in Canadian industry.

This raises once more the whole question of our independent control and management of our own industries. How often did government members when they were on this side of the house point out the great dangers that flow from an excessive control of Canadian industries by outside capital? Here, then, is the third great problem facing the Canadian people at this time and about which this budget said little except to accept, in the words of the Minister of Finance, this inflow of capital; and he went on to say that in his opinion it was in the best interests of this country.

There are other problems facing our nation, and I think these problems must be solved in the interest of a higher standard of living for Canadians as well as in the interest of greater control of our industry by Canadians.

The other problem I refer to is the growing number of legalized rackets in the country that result in an exorbitant cost of living for Canadian consumers. I have made some study of the drug industry and I think there is ample evidence to show that Canadians today are paying exorbitant prices in this country for drugs. Canadians' health needs for drugs are being exploited, and I suggest this is a field in which this government and other governments should take immediate and appropriate action.

I have a number of examples of cases where prices charged for certain drugs are, I think exorbitant. The publication "Gilbert Surgical News" of Toronto lists the cost of terramycin hydrochloric capsules at 100 for $42.08, whereas sold under the generic name of oxytetracycline hydrochloric the price for 100 capsules is $28. Similarly, with the brand name Pen-Vee tablets 100 are sold for $50.62, and under the generic name of phenoxymethyl penicillin 100 are sold for $18. It has been reported that in the city of Toronto hydrocortisone acetate tablets in the 20 milligram size are laid down at a cost of $40 per thousand. Under the brand name of Hydrocortune acetate they retail at $295 per thousand. It is reported that Largactil, the brand name for a drug known as chlorpromazine hydrochloride in the 25 milligram tablet which is laid down in Toronto at a cost of $2.75 per thousand, is being retailed at $80 per thousand, almost a 3,000 per cent mark-up.

Here is an instance where appropriate action should be taken, action which would result not only in preventing inflation to some extent but also in rolling back the cost of drugs, a very important item in the budgets of a great many Canadians. I have advocated the placing of this whole question before a committee of this house for study and investigation. Although I am a member of a movement which is very much in favour of public ownership and public development, we are not advocating public ownership for the sake of public ownership. However, the production of drugs is one field where a crown corporation producing essential drugs —not gobbling up the market; not establishing itself as a monopoly, but setting itself up as a pilot production plant—could be very instrumental in controlling the price of drugs.

Mr. Rynard: I wonder if I could ask the hon. member through you, Mr. Speaker, if he realizes that the system of imposing controls upon the production of drugs such as, perhaps, he is advocating—I am not too clear—has resulted in a situation where during the years the Russians have been working under it not one new drug has been produced under that system, whereas in Canada and the United States hundreds of new drugs have been produced, leading to the saving of millions of lives.

Mr. Argue: The hon. member may know more about what is coming out of the Soviet union than I do, but I have read about the vast array of new drugs which are being produced in this country, and in the words of those who are authorities in this field even the minds of some of our medical doctors are being brainwashed by the amount of advertising of certain brand names.

Mr. Rynard: Perhaps, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Argue: I am prepared to answer the hon. member's questions when I sit down, but my time is limited.

I think there are many examples of exceedingly efficient public enterprises. I might mention, for example, the Polymer Corporation, which in another field has done much to keep down the price of rubber. I am not suggesting wide-open public ownership in this area, but I am suggesting that now is the time when parliament should take action in the interest of the health and welfare of Canadians.

There are other rackets in which prices are charged which are altogether exorbitant. In addition to an inquiry into the drug industry I should like to see an inquiry undertaken into the cost of the basic material used in the production of dental plates. There was a report of the combines investigation commission in 1947 which showed that the manufacturing cost of a set of blanks at that time was 15 cents, while the cost to the dentist was $4. Here is another case where there should be a public inquiry.

There is another racket which is widespread in this country to which the government has closed its eyes, and that is the racket in interest rates. Small loan companies, moneylenders, those who provide money for second and third mortgages, are charging interest rates of 15 per cent, 20 per cent, 25 per cent, 30 per cent or more. Here is a whole area in which action should be taken to reduce the cost to consumers of essential goods, thereby reducing the general cost of living and, perhaps, even resulting in a general reduction in the price level in this country.

I feel that the budget should be a plan that it should set forth the government's program to increase production, to increase the welfare of Canadians. I have pointed out some of the problems. I want to make it abundantly clear that in approaching these problems we feel solutions should be found in an atmosphere of the fullest freedom and public discussion. Freedom in this country is not just a question of maintaining parliamentary democracy, though that is essential. It is also a matter of making certain that we have a free press and freedom of discussion; freedom for the dissemination of information.

We feel that in so far as it can be avoided we should resist any growing monopoly in the field of mass media; the field of newspapers, radio and television. Royal commissions have studied this important question in the past. Recommendations have been made that outlets in this field should be separated and independent as far as possible. I believe that the growing concentration of newspapers in Canada has now reached a point which would indicate the desirability of a parliamentary committee inquiring into the degree to which this concentration exists, the rate at which it is being accelerated and to what extent this process impairs the free and frank reporting and discussion of public questions. That is why I have on the order paper a resolution asking that a parliamentary committee be set up to look into this whole matter. We are disturbed about the situation which is arising in this country. We are disturbed by what we feel is a potential threat to freedom of discussion in our nation.

We know that the board of broadcast governors decided the other day to recommend the award of a television outlet in Toronto to the Telegram, a newspaper in that city. We question the desirability of newspapers owning or controlling television outlets. We question this development, and we say, along with the royal commission, that whenever possible it is better to have independent outlets and that as far as possible there should be a separation of control as between newspapers, television and radio.

We are looking to the day when there can be a much more rapid development of the Canadian economy. We wish the government would take action as proposed in our subamendment to encourage the accumulation and investment of Canadian capital in Canadian industry, and we think that in all the actions taken by the government everything should be done to protect our resources in the interest of our country. I have been reading in recent days some of the documents which were presented before the energy board, some of the evidence which was provided in connection with the applications for the export of natural gas from our country. I have noticed that with the minister's announcement the government is making provision for the export of vast quantities of Canadian natural gas to United States markets over a period of 25 years at varying prices to a number of companies. We feel strongly that Canadian resources should be developed in the interests of Canadians.

We participated in the pipe line debate in this house in which the government of the day was accused of providing from the substance of this country the material and resources that would result in creating new millionaires and in a greater control of Canadian resources by Texas buccaneers. We have been exceedingly disappointed in that this government since it took office has done nothing to ensure that the resources of Canada are developed more in the interests of Canadians and that no action has been taken to ensure that no more millionaires will be created and that there will be a reduction in the control of these resources outside our nation.

[Mr. Argue.]

I anticipate much discussion this session of the award made involving the export of gas to these various companies. The people of British Columbia have a particular complaint in that they are being charged a higher rate for Canadian gas than is being paid by United States citizens. I am not satisfied that the energy board obtained the best price for this gas. There seems to be much evidence that the United States market is so large and the demand by United States consumers so high that a higher price could have been obtained for our natural gas. The gas in the southern part of Alberta should to a greater extent be used for Canadians. Since it is our gas it should be Canadians and not the people of the United States who should pay the lower price for bringing gas from the more northerly part of Canada.

There is no indication that I can see that the government through approving the recommendations of the board has not approved everything it comdemned when in opposition. It has gone along with the trans-Canada pipe lines setup. The export of gas is being provided for that company. Even with the development of the export of Alberta gas to California, United States interests are obviously in control of this great operation to the extent, we are convinced, that Canadians are getting less than they deserve from this natural resource.

The figures placed before the board by the government estimate that for the first year of operation Pacific Gas Transmission Company will make a net return on its investment of 12.6 per cent. The Alberta Natural Gas Company will make a net return on its share capital of 14.5 per cent. These are high profits. There is little by way of risk. The market is there and all that has to be done to assure a large profit is to provide marketing facilities.

The whole question of leverage was gone into. In the days ahead I believe it will be seen that this government like the former one has played an undesirable role in making new millionaires and in providing additional millions to present millionaires. It has continued to allow the exploitation of our natural resources without giving the necessary consideration to the welfare of the Canadian people whose property these natural resources happens to be.

As the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe has said, our society faces a great challenge today. Many Canadians are disappointed in the budget. I am certain that unemployed Canadians are disappointed that the government has no program to remove unemployment. I am certain that the agricultural producers who look to this government for help are disappointed. I am certain that some hon. members of the Conservative party are disappointed. The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe is disappointed that unemployment remains at a high level. I think there are some in the world who are probably pleased with the budget. I would think the occupants of the Kremlin must look with satisfaction at the fact that Canada has unemployment, regional poverty, and that racketeers in the country are exploiting the welfare of ordinary Canadians. They will be pleased that Canada which as the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe said is endowed with more natural resources for its population than any other nation in the world is just limping along. We will have to do something about these problems not only in the interest of Canadians but in the interest of maintaining Canadian freedom and maintaining Canada as a leader among middle powers.

I am not prepared to admit we cannot solve the great problems that face us but the government does not know the problems exist. The Minister of Finance has closed his eyes to them. He has talked about a balanced growth and has forecast for the coming year the same increase in the gross national product he referred to in the last budget. All these great problems are going unsolved and apparently the government is happy that they are not being solved.

There are a number of principles which should govern our action as a nation in the days ahead. First, we should not be satisfied with our degree of freedom but should increase it. This government should be concerned, as it has not been, with the abrogation of freedom in Newfoundland. The government failed to raise its voice with respect to racial discrimination in South Africa and has side-stepped the issue when questions have been raised on orders of the day. Humans in that nation were whipped to work just as they were on this continent many years ago under slavery and yet the voice of Canada is soft when it comes to this world issue. We should speak out firmly for the protection and preservation of freedom in Canada and anywhere in the world where it is threatened. If we want to have respect in the councils of the nations we cannot have one standard for nations in the commonwealth and another standard for those outside the commonwealth.

The second principle is that as a nation we should invest more in our resources so we can develop them in the interest of the nation. The third principle is that we should embark on a full employment program in Canada, with greater production, and we should not have the smug satisfaction of the Minister of Finance who shuts his eyes to the suffering of half a million Canadians out of work.

Fourth, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that action should be taken to increase efficiency, to reduce prices, to eliminate waste. One of the places to start is here. We should eliminate excessive prices of essential commodities in our country.

Fifth, I am suggesting that we take appropriate action within our constitution to provide educational opportunities for every Canadian, irrespective of the pocket book of the individual wanting that education, or the parents of our young people looking for an education.

Sixth, contrary to the view of the government that now is the time to hold on, that now is the time to resist any extension of welfare services, I suggest that now is the time to embark on a program of old age pensions for retired persons in Canada which will maintain a pension in keeping with the great productive wealth of our nation. In other words, now is the time to increase old age pensions and social security benefits. I suggest that now is the time for an increase in the health benefits available to Canadians.

Why should Canadians who are sick and need medical attention have to face the tremendous cost of that medical attention? We have a hospitalization program. It is a good program. It will soon be available in every part of Canada. Let us not be satisfied. Let us increase the program. Instead of it being a net liability to Canadians, which apparently is the view of the government, it would be a tremendous asset to our nation to have a program that would remove the fear of heavy medical expenses in time of ill health.

The seventh principle I advance is that we must do everything we can at all times to maintain the integrity and the independence of the Canadian nation. I am not against the people who live in any other country. I feel that citizens of the United States, of the United Kingdom or of other countries in the world have within their jurisdiction the development of the resources of their own nation. We should have the same jurisdiction in Canada. I submit that if we adopt the kind of principles I have put forward we shall improve our standard of living, we shall improve our democratic machinery, we shall improve life in our nation and, above all, we shall make certain that this great development of Canada is for Canadians.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member for Assiniboia would answer a few questions? One of the things we have to consider and one of the things we have to be very careful about is that we do not set back the manufacturing of and the bringing out of those new drugs. One of the things that I want to say to him is that about 80 per cent of all drugs—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I would ask the hon. member to ask one question.

Mr. Rynard: I have a question I was leading up to. Eighty per cent of all new drugs used today were produced in the last 20 years. The hon. member talked about the cost of prescriptions. One third of the prescriptions issued cost from $1 to $1.99. I ask the hon. member where the high cost comes in there? And only 7 per cent are for $5 and over.

I ask the hon. gentleman another question. He spoke about an investigation into this. Is he going to stop the import of those drugs from Japan and from those other countries that buy the raw material and do no research whatever in the production of new drugs? In other words, would he be instrumental in denying the tremendous cures that we have had in the last 20 years through the production of those new drugs simply because the firms have been allowed a little profit which they can plow back into research?

Mr. Argue: I thank the hon. member for his important questions. I would not wish to do anything that would stop the development of new drugs.

Mr. Rynard: That is what the hon. member is suggesting.

Mr. Argue: I would think the development of new drugs is not so much the result of the fabulous profits that are made by some of these drug manufacturing companies but in the main is the result of the company having put together a very large and talented research team, and a research department where people in the main are working on salaries. It is through their research department that they have developed their new drugs. They have not been developed because of the profit motive.

Of course, I would do nothing to discourage drugs coming into our country, needed drugs that have been developed in other nations. I would encourage those drugs being brought into our country by encouraging a lower price that people can afford to pay. I am not talking about reasonable profits. I said I felt there should be some public development; that the production of some of those drugs should be carried on as a pilot operation, not to control the market. If the manufacture of those drugs, in proportion of the instances, was done at a low price I believe the manufacturers would control some of these mark-ups. I do not think my hon. friend would agree that a mark-up of 3,000 per cent is quite necessary.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to add my words of sympathy to the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Habel) upon the loss of his wife. I think all hon. members of parliament, irrespective of which side of the house they sit on, realize that the whole foundation of our society rests in the home and that the loss of the wife breaks up the home and disrupts the individual. I know I speak for all backbenchers in that regard.

I am also very happy to follow the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) and the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue). We backbenchers, we newcomers to the House of Commons, feel that the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe is a sort of father of this party, one of the elder members. We remember him in our early days. He used to come out to speak in Saskatchewan and Alberta on behalf of the party. When he speaks we all look to him for wisdom.

I am also very happy to follow the hon. member for Assiniboia, the house leader of the C.C.F., because I may say to him personally that we graduated from the same university. I remember him in those days when we used to debate together. I did not think or realize at that time at the university that he was a socialist. I doubt that very much today.

Mr. Argue: I sat with the C.C.F. in the students parliament in 1940.

Mr. Woolliams: I do not know whether you did.

Mr. Argue: I did.

Mr. Woolliams: I will not answer that now.

My first words are words of congratulation to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming). I cannot help but believe that all hon. members, irrespective of where they sit, appreciate and will accept the premise that the personal prestige and stock of the Minister of Finance are greater and have surely increased since his call to the all-important position of Minister of Finance. He has piloted this country through an economic recession which this government inherited in 1957. On budget night he was able to prophesy a surplus for the coming year. I think great credit is due the Minister of Finance for his policies, recommended to the government, which enabled him to bring in a budget in 1960 which indicates that there will be a surplus next year.

It is always most astonishing for me, as a backbencher, to listen to the inconsistencies of the members of the opposition. We had some good examples of them today. This is the type of inconsistency that bothers me as a backbencher. Some days the hon. member for Assiniboia gets up and says that this government is financing on a deficit, and is this not terrible? This will lead to nothing but bankruptcy. Then on another day when he is speaking on estimates or some other subject he says, spend more money for the farmers; more money for the pensioners; more money for this and that. This is the type of inconsistency that is very difficult to follow so far as the opposition is concerned.

Mr. Argue: It can still be balanced at a higher level.

Mr. Woolliams: After all, when we took office we inherited a recession in this country and through the efforts of this government, the spending of $1 billion on housing, the increasing of subventions for the coal industry, pouring more money into the unemployment insurance fund, we were able to bring the economy of Canada into a state where we can now see we are moving out of recession and into prosperity. For example, we have spent millions of dollars on a farm support program.

I should like to come now to inconsistencies that are exhibited by an opposition group that does not now sit in this House of Commons—they used to sit here—and I refer to the Social Credit group. Many of the members of that group who sat in this house are now members of the legislature at Edmonton. As this house knows, the Social Credit party has the largest majority in the legislature at Edmonton in the history of Alberta. If they were to criticize themselves, therefore, they would destroy their own house. They have taken on a new function in the province of Alberta and that is the criticism of federal policies. I do not believe any Conservative member of parliament would be disturbed about people going to the polls and defeating him on the basis of principles for which he stood. I am sure he would accept that defeat with good grace. However, I would hate to be a candidate in the constituency of Bow River and realize that I had been defeated by false statements, statements which misrepresent the policies of this government.

I want to come now to a problem that concerns the province of Alberta, and concerns particularly the Bow River constituency. I refer to the coal industry. I might say that, so far as Bow River is concerned, there are two particular parts that mine coal. The first is Canmore and the second is Drumheller. Farther south in the Macleod riding is the Crowsnest pass area. These false statements and these misrepresentations to which I refer this afternoon have been made in the legislature with regard to this industry during the last five or six weeks. I believe it is my duty and my privilege as a member of parliament here to answer this new opposition who, by the way, have seen fit, because they are the critics of the federal members of parliament from Alberta, to increase their remuneration in order to compensate them for these new responsibilities.

I refer to an article published about a month ago in the Herald which says, "Get off fanny and aid coal industry". This is a criticism directed toward this particular government. I should like to refer also to a statement made in the legislature by the hon. member for Pincher Creek, to which reference is made in the press as follows:

> Mr. Kovach said he has heard a lot of talk about Japan emerging as a market for Canadian coal, but so far not one ton from southern Alberta has been exported to that country.

This is the kind of misrepresentation about which I am talking. What has been the policy of this government in so far as the coal industry of western Canada is concerned, and I want to deal with western Canada because I am not one who knows the problems of Nova Scotia and the other coal mining areas in Canada. Let us just look at the record for a few minutes. When this government took office we immediately started a program of sales for coal to Japan and, in 1957, the first contract was entered into. As a result of that 40,486 tons of coal were sold. In 1958, 21,505 tons of coal were sold. In 1959, 192,857 tons of coal were sold. I am told by companies with which I have contact in Japan now that Mitsui Busan and Company Limited and Marada Steel Company are negotiating for another contract for 470,000 tons of western coal to be shipped to Japan. When you read statements made by the Hon. Gordon Taylor, minister of highways for Alberta, and other members of the legislature to the effect that there has been no coal shipped out of Alberta to Japan, and realize they are setting themselves up as critics of the federal government, then the record must be set straight. These are the people whom we must meet and with whom we must deal so far as our political future is concerned in Alberta.

Let us look at the truth about the coal industry so far as southern Alberta is concerned. What are the main criticisms they make? They say there is coal being imported into Canada from the United States. I think we will accept that. Coal was coming into Canada during the time of the Liberals, and we are prepared to say there has been coal coming in from the United States during the term of this government. Let us look at the facts. There are three types of coal mined in southern Alberta. In Canmore, which is a town nestled in the Rockies on No. 1 highway between Calgary and Banff, they mine anthracite coal. This particular coal is used for coking coal, industrial coal, and that is the type of coal which Japan has been buying for its industries.

Then, the Crowsnest pass has coal. The members from Nova Scotia will know exactly what I am talking about when I say that this is a high bituminous coal. The coal in the Crowsnest pass area is on the border between British Columbia and Alberta and is the type of coal that is used in industry. It was the type of coal that was used by Canadian National and Canadian Pacific to create steam for their locomotives. This market was lost when the railways changed from steam power to diesel power. The railways, of course, did that for reasons of economics.

Then, last but not least, we come to the coal that is mined in Drumheller. The valley town of Drumheller is a good, prosperous town in that part of Alberta which is one of the best farming areas anywhere in the province. But as you drive from the town of Drumheller you drop into what might be categorized as a canyon, and there in the valley are the various coal mines that have been operating since the early 1900's. It was from these mines that the domestic fuel was obtained to keep the farm homes warm, to keep the homes warm in the villages, towns and cities of many areas. This coal is not bituminous coal, nor is it anthracite coal. This coal is sub-bituminous domestic fuel.

Let us look at these arguments. For years, the Social Credit party has been telling the coal miners and operators in Drumheller that this coal coming in from the United States is the reason the miners are out of work. By the way, for the last 15 years there has been a great problem in the Drumheller valley in so far as the coal miner keeping his shifts going in the summer months is concerned. They say that this coal is coming in from the United States, and that is the problem. Let me make myself very clear in this regard. The coal that is mined in Drumheller is not bituminous coal. The coal that comes from Pennsylvania is bituminous coal and is used in the industrial centres of Ontario. It is an entirely different type of coal from that which is mined in Drumheller. It would not matter whether one lump of coal came in from the United States or 20 million tons, it would not affect the Drumheller area because the coal that is mined in Drumheller is a domestic fuel which has been used for that purpose for the past 60 years, the Drumheller coal could not and cannot be used in this class of industry.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Something new has appeared on the horizon in Canada. Our newspapers are full of it now. I refer to the competition between fuels such as oil and natural gas. Mr. Manning who heads that party and is prime minister of Alberta honestly admits that the reason there is a labour problem in the Drumheller valley is the competition of oil, propane and natural gas. Today when we go on farms in western Canada, the same as in eastern Canada, we find that these homes are heated in the winter by oil or propane. We need only to go to places like Calgary, Edmonton and other urban centres in Alberta or places in Saskatchewan or Manitoba in order to find that natural gas which is clean and convenient is the new domestic fuel.

It is because of the development of the petroleum industry in Alberta—and I am one who stands in my place and endorses it—that the onus by the provincial government has been put on the coal operators and these men have been put out of work who live in Wayne, East Coulee and other places, to which I could take you this afternoon. While the Social Credit party have wanted to take credit for the development of the petroleum industry, they will not take the blame for the adversity of the coal industry. There we have the inconsistency. There we have the misrepresentation. There we have the false position in which they stand today as far as this industry is concerned.

I might say that when you read on in this article you find that Hon. Gordon Taylor minister of highways, places the full onus of the problem of unemployment in the Drumheller valley on the federal government, he places it not only on this government but on the Liberal government. Surely a province that has received $1 billion from the petroleum and natural gas industry, and which by the development of this industry has seen this change-over from the energy of coal to the energy of petroleum, has some responsibility to these people in the province of Alberta who are unemployed owing to that new industry.

Last but not least, the province of Alberta, since the Social Credit party took over has received millions of dollars in royalties from the coal industry but not one of those dollars has been put back into the industry either to help the operators or the coal miners. That is the reason why I brought in provincial politics this afternoon. They are playing federal politics and I suggest it is up to members of parliament from Alberta to answer these misrepresentations concerning the coal industry and other industries about which they care to speak in their legislature. The Social Credit government instead of giving the facts actually preach falsehoods.

I should like to direct the remainder of my remarks to the natural gas industry of Alberta. The recent announcement by the Minister of Trade and Commerce approving the decision of the energy board in granting licences to four companies, namely Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited; Alberta and Southern Gas Company; Canadian-Montana Pipe Line Company and Westcoast Transmission Company Limited, to export natural gas from western Canada will mean three real benefits economically to this country. First, it will create an industrial expansion in Alberta and the rest of Canada beyond the vision of the greatest visionary. Second, it will assist Canada in correcting its unbalanced and unfavourable trade with the United States. Third, it will create top flight jobs for Canadians and full employment in the province of Alberta and in other parts of western Canada.

We have heard from the Liberal party some criticism in this chamber of late of the delay in the export of gas. I should like to answer that criticism this afternoon. But before doing so I should like to refer to an article which appeared in Saturday Night of February 6, 1960. It was written by Edwin Copps and it was headed "The Energetic Energy Board". This is what he said:

> If all its performances are as good as its premiere—

He was speaking of the board.

> —the national energy board may stand as one of the Diefenbaker government's best acomplishments to date. At its first public hearing in Ottawa this month, the new five-man board put on a show of efficiency and expertness—

In brief he said that of all the things we have accomplished this one may go down as the greatest of the Diefenbaker government. What does he say about the situation if these licences to export gas were approved and as to what it would mean? I am going to deal with that matter in a few moments but first I want to read further from the same article at page 22 of the magazine:

> If all these permits are granted, the revenue to Canada from the gas sales alone will be upwards of $170 million a year. The resulting expansion in Canada's natural gas industry will create some 40,000 new jobs, yield a livelihood for some 200,000 Canadian citizens. It will trigger a $500 million program of new industrial development in the country—pipe lines, gathering systems, processing plants and all the other elaborate installations the natural gas industry needs.

What a contrast that is to what the hon. member for Assiniboia had to say. In one breath he speaks about unemployment and in the next breath he is opposed to the export of gas. This article states that the resulting expansion will create 40,000 new jobs in Alberta, will create 200,000 new jobs throughout Canada and will bring each year $170 million into Canada from the United States in order to help, as I said previously, to balance our unfavourable trade relations with that country. I say this personally; I have said it outside of this house and I say it here today. I think this will be the greatest boon for western Canada since the early days when agriculture began to boom in the early 1900's.

What has been our stand in this regard? The Liberals have accused us of delay. Let us see where the Liberal party stood in the province of Alberta. Since 1951—and I can speak with some authority in this regard—the provincial Liberal leader at that time, namely Mr. Prowse—he gave up the leadership in 1957 to Mr. Grant McEwan—was opposed to any export of gas in Alberta. Mr. Grant McEwan, speaking in the Bow River riding during the provincial election in 1958 and in the Thorncliffe area in the city of Calgary made the definite statement that he too was opposed to the export of natural gas from Alberta to the United States. Both these leaders have stood out against the export of natural gas from the province of Alberta. How can the Liberal party here in the opposition say that we are responsible for the delay when their party took the stand in western Canada that they were against any export whatsoever? We also have the record of another member of their party, a senior member of the legislature for many years. I refer to Mr. Hugh John MacDonald. He is still against the export of gas.

What has been this government's stand? When this government took office—and I have said this previously but I should like to repeat it—this government set up the Borden commission. Why was the Borden commission set up? It was set up so that the facts would be obtained and determined with regard to how much natural gas we have for the foreseeable future needs of Canada and how much surplus we have to export. What was their report in that regard? Their report was quite simple. They said there were proven reserves in the province of Alberta of 23.7 trillion cubic feet and an estimated reserve of 300 trillion cubic feet. Then when the energy board was set up they revised the figures and said there are actually proven reserves of 30.5 trillion cubic feet. Those figures do not mean much unless you take a look at what Canada needs for its foreseeable future requirements.

Before I read these figures out, let me just say something more about the board. How can you ever come to a decision or how can the energy board ever come to a decision without the proper facts before them? How can a judge come to a decision when he is judging a case unless he has the evidence before him? Hence the energy board was set up. This energy board should have been set up five years ago or ten years ago. These facts should have been before the proper department so that the export of gas could have gone forward two, three of four years ago from the province of Alberta because the figures now show that we had necessary surplus reserves.

To come back to the question of what are Canada's needs in the foreseeable future, keeping in mind the fact that we have in the province of Alberta proven reserves of 30 trillion cubic feet, may I say this? We will use in 1960 an estimated amount of natural gas of 344.15 billion cubic feet, and by 1989 we will need 1,608.63 billion cubic feet. If you add up all our needs from 1960 to 1989 you will find we will need approximately 29,765 billion cubic feet, which is approximately 30 trillion cubic feet.

In other words, we have proven reserves in Alberta for the needs of Canada for the next 30 years. That was stated in the report of the energy board. Even at a conservative estimate, if we find 2.5 trillion cubic feet of gas each year by normal exploration—this is set out in both the Borden report and the energy board report—we will probably have to drill between 360 to 400 new wells a year. It is estimated that by 1989 we will have in this country proven reserves of 92 trillion cubic feet of natural gas. So not only can we take care of our foreseeable needs in the future of Canada but we can take care of those export commitments and have a reserve of some 40 trillion cubic feet at the end of that time.

Therefore I say without any reservation, and I have taken this stand in the house and outside, that I am in favour and always have been of exporting natural gas from western Canada. Today we have the proof and I want to congratulate the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) for recommending and approving on behalf of this government the export of gas to the United States.

Now I want to answer some criticisms offered to this government by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) when he talked about millionaires. I take this position. Since when was it a sin to make a dollar out of farming? Since when was it a sin to make a dollar out of natural gas? Since when was it a sin to make a dollar out of any business? The labourer has come a long way since the day I dug manholes in the streets of Moose Jaw in 1938 to work myself through university. Labour realizes today that when business makes a dollar, they, too, can make a dollar and their standard of living goes up accordingly. How can labour earn higher wages if the industry which employs them is insolvent? That is something which I feel is a lesson that the leader of the C.C.F. party would do well to learn. I repeat; when business does well, so does the labourer because, as the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe said today, we in Canada have the highest standard of living in the world.

Now I come to one last point, and that is the reference to some criticism which has been offered of our leader, the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker). During this session in particular there have been some personal attacks made against him. Often they referred to his statement that as long as he was Prime Minister of Canada he would see no man or woman would suffer. I think it depends on what definition you put on the word "suffer". I think in my day when I was unemployed as a young man if I could have enjoyed unemployment insurance I would not have suffered. But I do know this, and I know everyone will agree with me, that there is no place in the world where we have a greater opportunity than right here in Canada.

When I was in Japan I listened to their problems, and when I told them of our problems they laughed. I said our problem is that we have too much butter, that we have too much beef, that we have too much wheat, too much uranium, too much natural gas and too much petroleum. What a problem. But what an opportunity for 18 million people if those people today will go out and work—and I think they will because I have confidence in Canadians —with the same vision of the pioneers who developed this country. I think that is the type of vision that our leader the Prime Minister has in reference to Canada.

I learned my lesson well when I listened to the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher). He said the members of parliament should take home a bag of books every night. So I started taking home a bag of books every night, and by good fortune I picked up an article written on January 21, 1947 about a distinguished member of parliament, and at that time he himself was just an ordinary M.P. This is what this writer had to say. He is a distinguished writer for the Ottawa Citizen, Austin F. Cross, who was writing in "Western Business and Industry", volume 21, January 1947, page 54. He wrote:

> John Diefenbaker is no ordinary member but a national figure. It was he who was making himself heard in the councils of the great, it was the member for Lake Centre putting Lake Centre on the map. That's why this Saskatchewan riding returned him by the astounding majority of 1,009 on June 11, 1945. With every other Progressive Conservative candidate in Saskatchewan beaten, even with the Liberals ending up with a mere two members of parliament, John Diefenbaker came through as easily as if the had been running in Toronto.

Last but not least he says this:

What about tomorrow?

He was talking about his characteristics.

I'd say that John could go as far as they want him to go. In parliamentary debate he is as good as the best, most of the time. Buttressed by the authority that being in the government lends you he would make a superb cabinet minister. He could fill any one of half a dozen portfolios with distinction. If, by the long arm of circumstance—

This is certainly looking into the future.

—he some day was given the party leadership, he could make not only a great but inspired prime minister.

Nothing that needs ability, nothing that calls for ambition, nothing that demands enterprise, would stop John Diefenbaker on his climb to the top. All he wants is the call. When or if it comes, John's ready.

I would say to those critics who personally attack our Prime Minister that I, as a man of western Canada who has seen the development of his character, am confident as I stand in my place that I speak for every member on the back benches, and I am sure they have full confidence in the leader of this party and the Prime Minister of this country.

(Translation):

Mr. Yvon Dupuis (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): Mr. Speaker, I want first of all to associate myself with those who, this afternoon, offered their condolences to the Liberal opposition whip in this house, (Mr. Habel) on the death of his wife. I wish to tender him my deeply felt sympathy in his cruel bereavement.

Mr. Speaker, during the few remaining minutes before adjournment, I propose to speak of the budget, but in another way than is usually heard in this house.

First of all, I must commend the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) for the brilliant manner in which he outlined the situation, in reply to the speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming). He put his finger right on the problems now facing the Canadian public, contrary to the Minister of Finance who, wearing a wide grin, complacently stated in this house that everything was for the best under Conservative rule.

Mr. Speaker, I want briefly to point out to hon. members that everything is not as perfect as the Minister of Finance said it was. As a matter of fact, I wonder whether the Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and all the friends of the Conservative party who are in this house, do not feel a bit awkward when rising before the Canadian people to say that all goes well, when everyone in Canada knows that we have now over 800,000 unemployed in this country. How could they help being embarrassed, especially after the Conservative leader formally promised throughout this country that "if he was returned to power, no one would suffer in Canada".

Mr. Speaker, there are people who suffer in Canada, but the Prime Minister offers no excuse for not keeping his promises. Furthermore, there was the other promise to the effect that the day after the elections he was to launch "a famous billion dollar public works program". We are still looking for the projects that would come out of that promise. A tax reduction had also been promised as soon as the Conservatives returned to power. We have had tax increases instead. The end of budget surpluses had also been promised, since taxes would be lowered. That promise, Mr. Speaker, has indeed been kept because instead of surpluses we have had deplorable deficits, three of them in a row, since our friends opposite were returned to power.

And, today Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance, all smiles, is announcing that he foresees a $12 million surplus for the coming fiscal year. Well, this prospect of a $12 million surplus, take it with a grain of salt, because we recall the promises made by the Conservative party during election time, and which were never kept at any time or in any way.

The Prime Minister had promised to find new markets all over the world for our manufactured products. Has he found any? Not at all, Mr. Speaker. We are now faced with an export deficit, the volume of our exports being lower than that of our imports.

Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance said all sorts of things, but this is precisely what he forgot to tell us the other evening in his budget speech. If I may, Mr. Speaker, I should like to go back over the record of the last two years and mention some points which the minister has omitted.

On the day of the Minister of Finance's speech, two years had elapsed since the Conservative party was elected to office, and on the occasion of that second anniversary, it is fitting to recall what our dear Conservative friends have given us since they took over this great country.

First, I should recall the C.B.C. strike, which was settled after unbelievable delays on the part of the government, not to mention the part played by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) who practised an ostrich policy and stuck his head in the sand to avoid looking at the problems. There is also that famous matter of winter navigation which the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) had promised. As for agriculture, it is completely depressed. There is also the notorious feud between members of the government and the governor of the Bank of Canada. Then there was the fight over the "tight money policy", which was also covered by a definite promise by the Prime Minister who had declared that if he was returned to power he would do away with the tight money policy. Yet money was never so scarce as it has been since the Conservatives were returned to power.

Mr. Speaker, there is a deficit in exports, and a slow down in house building, where the situation is getting worse. Everything is known. We read it in the papers: there will be less house building this year than ever before.

While we are discussing problems of much interest, we, from the province of Quebec, note that the ministers from the province of Quebec never take part in the discussion, and merely keep silent when mention is made of problems of such importance as federal-provincial relations, the trans-Canada highway and unemployment.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that it is a shame to see ministers remain in their seats and make no effort to take a stand in such important circumstances.

When the government is reminded of unemployment, the depression, the tight money policy, the conflict with the governor of the Bank of Canada, the confusion in national defence, the mess in agriculture, our friends opposite reply: "You are prophets of doom and gloom, you have no confidence in your country, you see nothing but blue ruin."

Mr. Speaker, I would very much like to be able to sing praises about the budget introduced by the Minister of Finance. I would like, as would all Canadian citizens, to be able to rejoice over the achiements of a Tory government. But like everyone else, I cannot help facing the fact and, in the face of those facts, I cannot help blaming the Conservative government.

Mr. Speaker, a moment ago, I saw the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Dorion) enter the house. This reminds me that last year, during the debate on the budget, the hon. member for Bellechasse said that we in the opposition, reminded him of those thunder plagiarists who were talking as loud as they could in order to imitate the noise of thunder.

Allow me, in my turn, to make another comparison and to tell you, while looking at our friends opposite, something altogether different.

When I look at the Minister of Finance with his serene air, his grin, his tight lips, when I see him proudly introduce in this house a sorry budget, I cannot but think of that popular French song entitled:

"Tout va très bien, madame la marquise". (All is for the best, madam Marchioness.)

It is the story of a marchioness who was going out on a trip. Before leaving, she phoned her lackey and said:

Hello John, how are things going?

And John replied:

Oh don't worry, madame la marquise. Only, added John, I have a little something to deplore. I might as well tell you—the roof fell in, the house burned down, the stables are on fire; the poultry was destroyed, and your mare has run away.

Apart from this, madame la marquise, all is for the best—don't worry—for the best.

Mr. Speaker, thinking of my friend the Minister of Finance, who said that everything was for the best in the best of worlds, whereas everything is wrong and everybody tells him so, I prepared, as a counterpart to the remarks of the hon. member for Bellechasse, who spoke about the plagiarists of thunder, a small poem—which, though not in the grand manner, rather aptly points out present conditions in this country.

Now listen to this little piece, based on the song "Madame la marquise". As you will see, it concerns the budget and the administration and I shall not stray from the matter now under discussion. Here it is:

Hello, hello, John, what news—

Mr. Asselin: Sing it.

Mr. Dupuis: No, I shall not sing it; but it will soon be heard on a record. The hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Tremblay) would sing it well.

Mr. Tremblay: I prefer to sing duets.

Mr. Dupuis: The hon. member for Roberval—

Mr. Tremblay: I would not sing such nonsense.

Mr. Dupuis: No, because you have a soprano voice and this should be sung by a bass.

Mr. Tremblay: I'd rather have the voice of a soprano than that of a eunuch.

Mr. Dupuis: I know you never do it on your own.

Mr. Speaker, here is the beginning:

Hello, hello John, anything new?
You said that "No one will suffer"
Say, my dear John, that can't be true
Under Mister Diefenbaker.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I come to the chorus. It is Mr. Diefenbaker speaking; here is his reply:

Everything's well, madame l'électrice
Everything's well, everything's well
But I must say . . . There is a little twist
A little twist of no import:
Hundreds of thousands unemployed
Are suffering and seeking jobs
But after all, madame l'électrice
Everything's well, everything's well

(Second verse)

Hello hello Bill—

This refers to the Postmaster General.

Hello hello Bill, anything new?
And what about the Post Office?
Tell us, have all your dreams come true,
Have you done better than the Grits?

And here is the Postmaster General's reply:

Everything's well, madame l'électrice
Everything's well, everything's well
But I must say . . . There is a little twist
A little twist of no import:
In post offices they used to steal
They're stealing now our trucks and jeeps
But after all, madame l'électrice
Everything's well, everything's well.

Hello Donald, anything new?
Tell us about your last budget
Will it be gay, will it be blue?
Do you foresee a deficit?

Here is the Minister of Finance's naive reply:

(Chorus)

Everything's well, madame l'électrice
Everything's well, everything's well
But I must say . . . There is a little twist
A little twist of no import:
Added to all our promises
Just put a twelve million surplus
We are victims of a vision
Making a little confusion
We had to raise maybe too much
The taxes that we were to cut
A new sickness, a sorry mind
Sends you to Senate for a lifetime
In all the banks of our country
Reigns the "tight-money-policy"
Our M.P. for L'Assomption
Flaps his wings like an old "pigeon"
On a BOMARC for a journey
The exports of our nation
Are smothered by importations
Clement Brown and Noel Dorion
Are expecting a promotion
The eggs, the hogs and the chickens

Mr. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It is my impression that house orders do not allow a member to refer by name to another member; he must refer to the constituency.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, I am reading a poem.

Mr. Asselin: Even if it is a poem, the standing orders of the house should be observed, and I would ask you, Mr. Chairman, to rule on this point of order.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, may I point out to my colleague that I did not name any member of the house. What the rules forbid us to do, is to address an hon. member by name and telling him: "You are this and that". I am reading out a poem telling us that Mr. Dorion did something.

The previous speaker said several times: "John here and John there". He did not call him by name but he was speaking of the Prime Minister, quoting from a paper.

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, still on a point of order, I shall point out that the representative who preceded the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville read out an item but did not call a member by name as did my hon. friend.

Mr. Dupuis: I am calling nobody by name. I am reading out an item referring to Mr. Noel Dorion—

Mr. Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, if you were in the chair this afternoon, you have doubtlessly noticed that on five different occasions at least, members were called by name. So I believe that if such practice was tolerated this afternoon, the same treatment should be granted the hon. member who now has the floor.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Of course, the standing orders of the house demand that we should refer to a colleague by mentioning the name of his constituency rather than his surname. However, I thought I understood the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville quote some work, whose author I do not know, so that, in the circumstances, he might perhaps be allowed to conclude what he has to say.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, I am not surprised at my hon. friend's interjection. Of course, this hurts him, and I understand that very well.

So, as you have suggested, Mr. Speaker, I shall go on with my remarks.

Before I was interrupted, I was reading a poem by the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville. I have also taken the trouble to explain that it is not written in fine literary language. However, it does describe the conditions prevailing in Canada.

Mr. Pigeon: Do you have a verse on the scandal of the Jacques Cartier bridge?

Mr. Dupuis: Frankly, I think the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sevigny) could tell you that. I saw his picture in a paper this morning, and I think it describes the situation fairly well. So, Mr. Speaker, may I go on—in any case, I am nearing the end:

> The eggs, the hogs and the chickens
> Are crushed by Harknesses' ceilings

Mr. Tremblay: I knew that—

Mr. Dupuis: Now look at that. The hon. member for Roberval is piping up.

> We realize a little late
> That we made a lot of mistakes
> But after all, Madame l'électrice,
> Everything's well, everything's well.

Well, Mr. Speaker, our friends opposite may interrupt and roar when the facts are being exposed, but not one of them could stand up at this time and deny that the Prime Minister had promised that there would not be one person out of work in Canada under his administration. Not one of our friends opposite could stand up and contend that there is not one Canadian citizen who has voted for the Conservatives and not been worse off since the change. Not one of our friends opposite could deny, despite the statements made by farmers' associations in this country, that our farming population is in serious danger. Not one Conservative member could deny having deceived us, or that the Postmaster General (Mr. Hamilton) has failed to keep his promise of providing two mail deliveries a day when there still is but one delivery a day.

And the Postmaster General who had promised—that they cannot deny—to take measures likely to put a stop to post office robberies, has to cope today with robberies not only in post offices, but also of postal trucks.

Mr. Speaker, the Conservative party has deceived the voters in making promises it knew were impossible to fulfil. They did not keep their promises and it is our duty to call them to account.

And if the hon. member for Bellechasse, looking at the members of the opposition, is reminded of plagiarists of thunder, when I look at the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister, I say: How wonderful. When everything comes crumbling down, they go up on the mountain and sing: "Everything's well, madame l'electrice."

[Mr. Dupuis.]

(Text):

Mr. J. A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, in rising to participate in this debate I wish first to join with those hon. members of the house who have expressed condolences to the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Habel), the whip of the official opposition party, in his bereavement.

I should also like to add my words to those of previous participants in this debate in complimenting our Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) on bringing in a balanced budget designed for these troubled times and one that has been balanced without an increase in taxes. Despite this fact taxes are still lower than when the previous government was in power.

In the time at my disposal I should like to bring to the attention of the house some questions of vital concern not only to my constituency of St. John's East but also of concern to the constituencies of my genial and learned colleague the hon. member for Humber-St. George's (Mr. Batten), the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Granger) and the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne) because in each of these constituencies there is located United States defence installations employing many thousands of Canadian citizens.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) on April 15, 1959, replying to a question asked by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), stated that as of March 31, 1959 there were 4,324 Canadian citizens employed on United States bases in Newfoundland and Newfoundland-Labrador. This is a matter of interest and concern, as I said before, not only to my own constituency but to the constituencies of other hon. members in this house.

In my own riding of St. John's East there is located on the shores of Quidi Vidi lake a beautiful white city which was originally known as Fort Pepperrell and in later years as Pepperrell air force base. This is one of the four bases given to the United States by the United Kingdom in the early war years but not necessarily as part of the famous destroyers for bases deal, that deal in which the United Kingdom in our hour of need leased military bases to the United States government in return for 50 destroyers. On the contrary, bases in Newfoundland-Labrador and I believe those military installations in the colony of Bermuda were leased to the United States government on a gratis basis; there was no quid pro quo. I cannot speak with authority for the colony of Bermuda but I feel I can speak for the then colony of Newfoundland, which is now part of Canada. Newfoundland at that time had no elected government. Our constitution was suspended in 1933 because of a financial crisis in the then world-wide economic depression.

These bases were assigned to the United States government at various strategic locations in Newfoundland and in Newfoundland-Labrador territory on a 99-year lease basis. At that time nobody was in a position to argue and present the case of the government and the people of Newfoundland; for ours at that time was a colonial administration, governed directly by Westminster.

The folly of this course of action is now coming home to us. With the great changes in North American defence, the advent of the atomic age, the advent of the ballistic missile, no longer is it necessary for world powers to maintain fighter bases, not to mention bases strictly of a military nature. Pepperrell air force base was one of those bases which was leased in 1940. The people in Newfoundland had no say in the matter. They had no choice, no voice in their sovereign territory being leased to another power, yet a friendly power, for a period of 99 years without a dollar in exchange. Mind you, were I to say that those bases, those United States defence installations, were not a boon to our country and our province now would be to distort the facts, because I would say without qualification that United States defence spending in Newfoundland and Labrador, as an economic factor in our progress, ranks on an equal basis with the economic impact of confederation in 1949.

As I said a few minutes ago, the folly of the action in 1940 of the then imperial government could have had very serious and very tragic human consequences to the many thousands of Canadian citizens now employed on those bases. One thing can be said, namely that it was a very insecure position; nevertheless the fact remains that those people who did accept employment in 1941 did so with the realization that the bases were to remain for 99 years; consequently, it was logical for them to assume that their employment would be of a permanent nature.

Yet, it was not until a few years ago that those four or five thousand Canadian citizens were even enjoying the benefits of unemployment insurance. It was only a few days ago that it was announced in St. John's and in this house that the long fight those people have waged to be recognized as pensionable employees of the United States government in Canada has finally borne fruit. This is of prime importance to my constituents because it has been announced that the United States air force base in St. John's, beautiful Fort Pepperrell, on the shores of Quidi Vidi, is about to terminate its operations. It is with a little nostalgia, it is with a saddened heart, that we say goodbye to those friends whom we have cultivated over the past two decades. I am pleased to say they are leaving under good auspices, because, through the good offices of the United States government, in consultation with the government of Canada, the rights of those Canadian citizens to a pension, which is the least price that can be paid, has been recognized.

Will you call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: I ask whoever is leading the house whether there is any indication of what may be done early next week?

Mr. Brooks: There is no change so far as the budget is concerned; we shall go on with that debate. The other business will be announced in due course.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CHURCHILL—REFERENCE TO EDITORIAL IN WINNIPEG "FREE PRESS"

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege relating to an editorial which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press dated Monday, April 4, 1960.

The editorial, in part, reads as follows:

> The most serious offence that a Canadian cabinet minister can commit is to misinform the House of Commons on a factual matter of public business. Of this offence Mr. Churchill, Minister of Trade and Commerce, has recently been guilty three times over. The true information about Canada's present position in the field of trade and foreign debt, together with Mr. Churchill's large package of misinformation, are shown today in an adjoining column.

Then, Mr. Speaker, I quote another paragraph in the same editorial, which is as follows:

> Having distorted the figures, Mr. Churchill used them to show that Canada has no need to worry about the prospects of its foreign trade or its accelerating plunge into foreign debt. The government's foreign economic policy, in short, is based on Mr. Churchill's optimistic analysis which, in turn, is based on false figures.

Then I quote a third paragraph from the same editorial:

> Meanwhile, by distorting the known official facts and misleading parliament, the government and the nation, Mr. Churchill has discredited himself as a reliable witness on the vital questions of policy.

Mr. Speaker, every one of those three paragraphs is false. The figures that I used in the speech I made in the House of Commons on March 21 and March 22 were derived from official dominion bureau of statistics publications. No figures were distorted; the known official facts were not distorted; no figures were false or erroneous.

The same false statement about using wrong figures occurs in the heading of an article on the same page of the Winnipeg Free Press written by one who designates himself by the initials B.H. The heading is, "Wrong Conclusion from Wrong Figure". The article by B.H. on which the editorial writer purports to base his editorial is similarly misleading and false.

Mr. Speaker, I did not misinform or mislead the House of Commons either deliberately or otherwise. There are other things I might say; there is more detail into which I might go, but I think I have said enough to indicate what is in my mind regarding this matter.

UNITED NATIONS

WORLD REFUGEE YEAR—STATEMENT BY MINISTER RESPECTING CANADIAN PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a brief statement concerning world refugee year. Today has been designated as a day on which special efforts will be made in countries around the world to focus public attention on the world refugee problem in order to encourage increased contributions from the public to the world refugee year program.

In Canada a unique program has been planned by the appropriate private agencies. As far as I am aware no other country is attempting anything like it. Mayors and reeves of municipalities across Canada will be proclaiming the last week of April to be national austerity week. During that week Canadians will be requested to deny themselves some luxury or pleasure on which they would ordinarily spend money and to send the money so saved to their local world refugee year committee. In the course of this special week, tag days and other methods of fund raising will be employed in aid of world refugee year.

The government has agreed to follow up the interest engendered by national austerity week by authorizing post offices across the country to use a special world refugee year postal cancellation during May and June. It is hoped that this special postal cancellation, which will read "World Refugee Year—Remember and Give", will remind Canadians during the final months of world refugee year to make their contribution to their local world refugee year committee.

Hon. members will recall that in early March I announced that the government would be prepared to extend the program for the admission of tuberculous refugees and their families to Canada if suitable arrangements could be worked out with the provincial governments which administer the sanatoria. It may be appropriate for me to state at this time that the replies received from a number of provincial governments have been encouraging, and we have therefore begun the preliminary selection and processing of additional tuberculous cases in the refugee camps. Until these processes have been completed it is, as I said yesterday, not possible to give the specific number of tuberculous refugees and their dependents who may ultimately be admitted to Canada for rehabilitation.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I am sure all members of this house will join with the minister in impressing upon the Canadian people the desirability of their making a contribution toward a solution of this problem. The government does not, however, in the statements which have been made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, indicate its intention to extend its own contribution. It is true that the minister has announced that more tubercular cases will be processed, but I suspect this is largely due to the underestimate which was made of the total number of tubercular refugees who could be covered by the original grant appropriated for that purpose by the government.

In any event, the minister does not indicate if the government has accepted the representations made by the national welfare council and other voluntary social and religious organizations which asked for assistance so they in turn might make some definite contribution toward the alleviation of the refugee problem. The criticism, of course, also has prevailed that Canada has been prepared only to take those tubercular cases that were capable of rehabilitation, that the hard core which remains a very substantial part of the tubercular refugee problem, was not one to which Canada was giving the kind of support it should.

It may be that the minister will take note of these observations and find ways and means of integrating them in the program on which Canada has officially embarked. The solution of the refugee problem is something that commends itself to the conscience of all civilized people. It is appropriate that Canada, a country with excellent tubercular treatment institutions, should in this way join with other countries in trying to resolve this world refugee problem.

I venture to express the hope in taking my seat that the government likewise will be continually interested in the resolution of another refugee problem, that in Palestine.

[Mr. Green.]

These are problems that require the careful attention of civilized peoples whose governments are called upon to make a contribution to the solution of these very vital humanitarian problems.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, this group has always expressed concern for the welfare of people who are suffering anywhere. On that account we are pleased to hear the minister's announcement which indicates that Canadians will make some personal contributions and sacrifices in support of action by the federal and provincial governments.

In view of this response on the part of various organizations and individuals to do more in connection with making world refugee year a success I urge the government to give further leadership by increasing the number who can be assisted as the result of government action, through responding favourably to representations made to it by such organizations as the Canadian welfare council and religious and other bodies across Canada.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING PAYMENT OF PENSION DURING ABSENCE FROM CANADA

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Old Age Security Act to permit payment of pension in prescribed circumstances to pensioners absenting themselves from Canada beyond the periods now prescribed; and to provide also certain saving and transitional provisions to protect and preserve the rights of pensioners so absent upon the date the said measure comes into force.

Motion agreed to.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR LATEST STATISTICS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Labour if he can give us the latest figures of unplaced applicants in the offices of the national employment service for the latest available date.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker; 832,823.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would I be correct in saying that is 40,000 over the comparable figure for this date last year?

Mr. Starr: I could not say that, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think it is about 40,000 more than the figure for the same time last year.

Mr. Hees: I am sure you figured it all out well in advance.

Mr. Starr: If that figure comes from the Martin bureau of statistics calculations I would have to check on it, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hees: What did your bureau tell you?

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

SOUTH AFRICA——SUGGESTED WITHDRAWAL OF CANADIAN EXHIBIT AT TRADE FAIR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. If he does not feel that it comes under his department he might refer it to a colleague.

In view of the discrimination being practised by the government of South Africa, as evidenced by the restoration of the personal identification pamphlet, would the Canadian government as a method of showing its disapproval of such inhumanity to men consider withdrawing the Canadian exhibit now on display at the annual trade fair in South Africa?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the trade fair in South Africa opened on April 4 and will continue until April 23. We have our own building there. It was constructed in 1958 for the Rand Easter show, and was modified for this year's exhibit. There are about 80 manufacturers exhibiting at the fair, and the displays are chiefly with regard to engineering equipment. With the fair under way and 80 Canadian firms showing exhibits there, it is not possible for the government as such to take any action. I appreciate the hon. member's interest in this matter.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. Is it not possible for the government to express the view that those exhibits should be withdrawn? As a further supplementary question, is the minister aware that deteriorating trade between South Africa and other parts of the world has now led business leaders in that country to interview their government, asking—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Argue: —for modification—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is going well beyond the proper scope of a question by making statements. He is volunteering a statement instead of asking for information.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Moose Mountain.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I should like the minister to answer my question.

Mr. Speaker: In due course the hon. member may rise again. I recognize the hon. member for Moose Mountain.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Argue: Yes, I think I can rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: No point of order can arise between the time I recognized the hon. member for Moose Mountain and now, because he has said nothing. The hon. member will have to bide his time.

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Assiniboia wish to repeat his question?

Mr. Argue: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. My point of order is this. When a member is asking a supplementary question and is endeavouring to place before the house the foundation for his question, even though Your Honour may feel that the supplementary question has been expanded too far—I do not agree that that is what I have done, but it is Your Honour's right and duty to decide whether that has been done—I do not feel that the recognition of some other member removes the right of the person who is about ready to ask his supplementary question; I refer to his right to put his question to the government.

Mr. Ricard: Put it now.

Mr. Argue: It is a long standing rule of this house that a point of order can be raised at any time. I feel that I was perfectly justified in raising the point of order at that time. Other supplementary questions are allowed, and having regard to the importance of the issue I was raising and having regard to the foundation I was laying for my supplementary question, I feel that my supplementary question was in fact in order and that Your Honour should not have used the tactic of attempting to prevent me from asking it—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Withdraw.

Mr. Argue: —or should have sought to prevent me from asking the supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is perfectly entitled to raise his point of order and state his viewpoint. I hope he will not transgress by making references to the Chair as he has just now been doing. Perhaps by recognizing another hon. member I prevented the hon. member from getting an answer to the first part of his supplementary question by reason of his having added to it irrelevant material. If the hon. member wishes to repeat his supplementary question of course he is entitled to do so, provided that the supplementary question is not embellished as it was before.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Speaking on the point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say this. Perhaps the time has come when this house should examine the practice it is getting into with respect to the asking of supplementary questions. I regret that I do not have in front of me the actual references. However, I have been concerned about this matter because, while Your Honour has allowed—and as I recall it all your predecessors have done so or have been inclined to do so—reasonable latitude with respect to the asking of supplementary questions, I suggest that during this session particularly the supplementary questions, which previously have been confined to probably not more than one or at the most two on any one subject, have been extended on a number of occasions so that as many as six or more supplementary questions have been asked on one subject. As Your Honour will appreciate, this procedure takes the matter out of the realm of questions seeking information on urgent matters and into the realm of debate.

An hon. Member: Cross-examination.

Mr. Fulton: And as somebody behind me says, "and of cross-examination". It is clearly such an enlargement of the principle with respect to the asking of questions as to be out of order. When we had a discussion on a point of order not so long ago, and when I raised a point of order with regard to questions, we were told that this was the custom and it was suggested that I was seeking to limit, or to ask Your Honour to limit, the rights of the opposition with respect to the asking of questions and to run counter to custom.

At that time I pointed out that what I was concerned about was a trend developing which, if not called in question, would then be regarded as having become customary. It is for that particular reason that I now raise this point of order with regard to supplementary questions. If we as a House of Commons do not examine the practice that we are beginning to follow, I am afraid we shall later be told that because the matter was not raised, this has become a custom.

The particular ruling I have in mind is one by Mr. Speaker Glen no longer ago than 1943, in which Mr. Speaker Glen said this. I am not quoting his words verbatim, but I know I reflect their sense accurately. He said that supplementary questions are not allowed by our rules. That was as recently as 1943. There have been rulings by speakers since that time which perhaps were not quite as strict as that by Mr. Speaker Glen but which certainly restricted the asking of supplementary questions to not more than one or two on any one point. Certainly no hon. member, as I recall it in looking at this ruling, has the absolute right to ask a supplementary question.

I submit in brief that the rules of this house, as interpreted by the Speaker of the House, make it clear that supplementary questions are not allowed by right and that if allowed they are allowed occasionally only as a matter of latitude, usually only in order to clear up what would otherwise be some misunderstanding or some gap in the information that had been given in the original answer.

I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that we are falling into the practice not of raising supplementary questions for that purpose but of using them for the purpose of engaging in debate at a time when debate is not supposed to be taking place. Debate is supposed to take place only when we reach the matters which are on the order paper for discussion as part of the regular business of the house.

I would be prepared to discuss the matter at greater length if Your Honour desires me to do so, but I raise the matter now because, in view of what was said by the hon. member for Assiniboia, I think if the matter is not raised at this time we shall be told later, if we raise it, that the practice has become a custom and should be allowed. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that it is wrong to allow it to become a custom because it is contrary to the rules of this house.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Speaking on the point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say this. I am sure Your Honour will have been grateful for the advice and information you have received from the Minister of Justice, whose interest in and concern about this matter is no greater than that of any other member of the house. The citation in question in Beauchesne's fourth edition which seems to cover this matter is citation 182, which reads as follows:

The extent to which supplementary questions may be asked is in the discretion of the Speaker.

We are quite content to leave it so.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Read on.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If any hon. member wishes to read more of the citation he is free to do so. The hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Campbell) appears to have something to add.

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): If I may, I should like to say a word on the point of order. I wish to submit a citation. I believe it is the one to which the Leader of the Opposition has just referred. I am going to read from it a little bit further:

Mr. Speaker Lowther laid down the rule about this on the 5th July, 1915, in the British House of Commons, where the practice is practically the same as ours. He said: "All supplementary questions are irregular and are not provided for at all in any standing order. It is entirely a matter of grace. I may say generally that the object of supplementary questions is to elucidate any ambiguity in the reply of a minister or to seek for some further information if he can give it; but supplementary questions should not be put, and ought not to be put, to embarrass a minister or to lead him to give an answer in a hurry which at a subsequent time he might be sorry that he gave. I will give as much freedom as I possibly can, but at the same time there must be some limits."

I think this citation very forcefully substantiates the position taken by the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Fulton: Somebody has handed me the citation to which I referred, namely the ruling of Mr. Speaker Glen on May 28, 1943. I should just like to put it on the record and leave the matter there. As reported at page 3126 of Hansard of that year Mr. Speaker Glen had this to say:

Mr. Speaker: That is hardly a question that can be asked on the orders of the day—

The question had been asked by Mr. Knowles.

—and certainly it should not be put. I must point out further that a practice is coming into vogue in the house of putting supplementary questions to elicit answers in addition to those given by ministers. If the rules permitted it, that would be entirely proper; but the rules do not permit of supplementary questions being asked. I have allowed a number of these questions where explanations or statements by ministers might reasonably be requested, in circumstances where the minister would no doubt wish to have his remarks made as clear as possible. But I must point out that the rule is as I have stated.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member wishes to speak on the point of order I will hear him, although I think the matter has been sufficiently debated.

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): I would like to clear the matter just brought up by the Minister of Justice. He has read one decision and only one. I would like to know whether that is the only decision in favour of his theory which he has found since confederation?

Mr. Fulton: No, Mr. Speaker. I can give the hon. member a list. I can refer him to other decisions of Speakers, more or less on this point. Some are not as strict as the one I have referred to, but the tenor of them confirms what I have said. There are decisions in the 1944-45 session, the 1950 session, the 1953-54 session and the 1957-58 session.

Mr. Speaker: The discussion has perhaps not been strictly relevant to the point which was raised by the hon. member for Assiniboia, but as it concerned the business of the house I was glad to have the advice and assistance of members who wished to comment on the use of supplementary questions.

There is no doubt that the supplementary question is at the discretion of the Chair. It is not specifically provided for by our rules; nor is the oral question, which we permit at this time of the day, provided for in our rules. The whole practice is one which has grown up and become established in the course of time.

I think the supplementary question—in moderation—is permissible and desirable where it seeks to clarify an answer which has been given. The objection I took to the question asked by the hon. member for Assiniboia, which I think was his first supplementary although it may have been his second, was that the question itself was quite improper. He indicated later, on a point of order, that the earlier part of his question was in his view a proper supplementary and I offered him the opportunity, if he wished, to repeat it.

As to the time of raising the point of order, I ruled that his question, which had proceeded to give information rather than ask it, was not acceptable by recognizing another hon. member. It seems to me that when an hon. member has been recognized and has not yet said anything it is improper to interrupt him, either on a point of order or otherwise. The hon. member I had recognized might himself be rising on a point of order.

To conclude the matter, if the hon. member for Assiniboia has a supplementary question which he feels should be asked, I will hear it and exercise my judgment as to whether it should be permitted.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, as I was about to ask, some 15 minutes ago, is the Canadian government prepared to suggest that the exhibits at the fair in South Africa should, in the interests of non-discrimination, be withdrawn?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I wonder to what extent that applies in this instance? According to May's Parliamentary Practice, sixteenth edition, supplementary questions may be asked if they are necessary for the elucidation of the answers which have been given. I gave a concise answer to the question which was asked which does not require any elucidation whatsoever, and this question is quite out of order.

Mr. Speaker: I think if the minister will review the situation he will recall that the first question asked whether the government would withdraw its participation in the trade fair. The answer, as I recall it, was that the government had commitments to exhibitors and in any event was not prepared to take that course. The supplementary question then asked whether the government would seek to have the exhibits withdrawn. To my mind that does not go beyond a reasonable supplementary inquiry.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I cannot follow the practice of the hon. member for Assiniboia—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Greenwood is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Macdonnell: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: On the same point raised by the minister?

Mr. Macdonnell: No, a new one.

Mr. Speaker: Then, having disposed of that point, I think the minister should have the opportunity to reply if he wishes to do so.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, we do not intend, as far as I know, to take any action with regard to the matter raised by the hon. member for Assiniboia, and I so indicated in the answer I gave to the earlier question.

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my point of order is a very simple one. Am I right in understanding that when you yourself are on your feet nobody else is supposed to be on their feet? If that is the fact, then may I point out this rule is being constantly broken.

[Mr. Speaker.]

HEALTH AND WELFARE

NEWFOUNDLAND—REPORTED RADIATION HAZARD IN FLUORSPAR MINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Southam (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Can the minister state whether steps have been taken to ascertain whether there is a definite radiation hazard to men working below the ground with Newfoundland Fluorspar Limited, as a report in this morning's Globe and Mail indicated?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the occupational health division of my department has been co-operating for some time with the Newfoundland department of health and the provincial mines department, and has surveyed the working conditions in this mine. It was found that radiation levels did in some cases exceed the recommended limit of exposure, but I am informed that measures have already been taken to reduce these to a point well within the margin of safety.

TELEVISION

REFUSAL TO BROADCAST CONSERVATIVE NATIONAL CONVENTION OF 1942

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. L. Hanbidge (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. If he has not received notice of this he may take it as notice. My question is based on a question raised by the leader of the C.C.F. group (Mr. Argue) and by the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Pearson), as reported in Hansard of Tuesday, April 5 at page 2910.

Was the official who is said to have refused to let the Leader of the Opposition be televised the other night the same official who refused to let any part of the proceedings of the Conservative national convention in Winnipeg in 1942 be broadcast? Was that refusal in 1942 based on an order of the government of the day for fear that there might be aid and comfort for our enemies of those days?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

STATEMENT ON CANCELLATION OF INTERVIEW WITH LEADER OF OPPOSITION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, although I may not have an answer to the question just asked by the hon. member, I do have an answer to the question which was asked me the other day by the hon. member for Assiniboia regarding the cancellation of a telecast, not the one of 1942.

I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation that an interview with the Leader of the Opposition, proposed as part of last Saturday's hockey telecast intermission, was neither scheduled, refused nor cancelled by the corporation. A suggestion for such an interview was made and then withdrawn by the advertising agency which handles the hockey account. The corporation further informs me it cannot speak for this agency, nor can it be responsible for the treatment of news reports related to this matter.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

ELLIOT LAKE—NEW REGULATIONS RESPECTING HOLIDAY AND SEVERANCE PAY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Labour whether he has now received a report from the advisory committee of the unemployment insurance commission on the matter of severance pay at Elliot Lake?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): No, Mr. Speaker. May I say a brief word of explanation. The committee met on March 4; this is the report I got from the unemployment insurance commission. It met on March 4. Recently, as a result of that meeting, a report was made to the unemployment insurance commission. The unemployment insurance commission asked the advice of the justice department as to one of the items in the report. The Department of Justice gave an opinion to the effect that the recommendation could not be implemented. Consequently the committee has reconvened to meet tomorrow in order to decide that particular matter. I am advised that a report should be made in the early part of next week.

PENITENTIARIES

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REPORTED CRITICISM OF MEDICAL FACILITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. A. McLennan (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Has the minister any comment to make on a west coast radio broadcast made last night by Jack Webster criticizing the medical facilities at the British Columbia penitentiary?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I understand there was such a broadcast, but I have not seen the text and therefore am not in a position to make any comment or give any answer to anything that may have been said therein. But I should like to advise the hon. member that over the past few days I have received complaints about the medical facilities at the British Columbia penitentiary, and I have now asked for a report on this subject so that I may be in a position to determine what steps, if any, are needed to improve these medical facilities.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REQUEST FOR IMPROVEMENT OF RECEPTION IN SOUTHERN ALBERTA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arthur Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might ask the Minister of National Revenue, in his capacity as reporting minister for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, whether the corporation are prepared to improve their transmitter facilities at Lacombe, Alberta, in order to provide better reception so far as audibility is concerned for the residents of southern Alberta.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member, as well as others, has spoken to me about this matter on various occasions. I have taken it up with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and I am advised by the corporation that improvement of these facilities is very high on the priority list of projects.

IMMIGRATION

IRENE REBRIN—STATEMENT RESPECTING DEPORTATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in reply to questions which have been asked in the house by the hon. member for Cartier and the hon. member for Kootenay West with reference to Miss Irene Rebrin, may I say that this woman was admitted to Canada as a visitor and subsequently sought to change her status and remain here permanently as an immigrant. After an inquiry held under the provisions of the Immigration Act she was ordered deported because she could not comply with specific provisions of our immigration laws and regulations applicable to immigrants. She appealed against the order, as provided under the Immigration Act, and the appeal was dismissed.

This case has been carefully reviewed to see whether the strict application of the law should be waived by the exercise of the discretion vested in the minister under the Immigration Act. However, on the basis of classified information available to us we are satisfied on security grounds that the deportation order should not be interfered with.

HOUSING

NUMBER OF INSURED LOANS IN FIRST QUARTER OF 1960

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works, notice of which I sent to his office earlier today. Will the minister advise the house of the number of insured loans made during the first quarter of 1960?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for sending notice of his question. The number of approvals of insured loans in the first quarter of 1960 was 1,731. The hon. member will be glad to hear that in the last two weeks the rate of approvals has been stepped up, in that there were 367 approvals for the week ended March 25 and 264 approvals for the week ended April 1. Therefore the rate for at least the last two weeks is at about the same level as it was last year with respect to loans by life, loan and trust companies.

Mr. Garland: May I ask a supplementary question. In view of the fact that the figure just given by the minister represents, I believe, approximately a 75 per cent decline compared with the 1959 first quarter figure, can the minister say what steps, if any, have been taken by the government to encourage greater participation by the approved lenders for the balance of 1960?

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, this is not a debate. We completed that debate two weeks ago. As my hon. friend knows, the government takes these matters under careful and constant consideration. The whole question of housing occupies a great deal of my time.

Mr. Garland: Of the number of loans made by the approved lenders in the first quarter of 1960, can the minister say how many were made by the chartered banks of this country?

Mr. Walker: As far as I know, very few indeed. As to the exact number, I have not that information at the moment.

Mr. Garland: Would the minister be prepared to give that number?

An hon. Member: Put it on the order paper.

[Mrs. Fairclough.]

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

EAST SAINT JOHN THERMAL PLANT, N.B.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State. Can the minister give this house one single valid reason as to why there is such a delay in tabling documents and correspondence exchanged between the government of Canada and the government of the province of New Brunswick with regard to the East Saint John thermal plant, as ordered to be tabled by this house on February 3 last?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Acting Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. member has to exaggerate the situation at all. I am quite sure there is a very good reason for it.

Mr. Robichaud: Then what is it?

Mr. Balcer: I will inquire and answer later.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

NEWFOUNDLAND—REPORTED LOSS OF MAIL BAG

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Postmaster General or the Minister of National Revenue, or both of them. Is one of them now in a position to comment on the loss of a mail bag containing applications for income tax refunds, as reported in the Newfoundland Weekly Herald, to which I referred on March 29 and March 30?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, there was no foundation whatsoever for the suggestion of loss made by the hon. member, putting it into the same class as most of his other statements.

Mr. Denis: The question I asked of the Postmaster General concerned a report in a Newfoundland newspaper, which really exists. I think I gave my copy to the Minister of National Revenue, and I think he should be fair enough to say that I did not pretend that report—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for St. Denis seems to me not to be asking a supplementary question even, but engaging in a debate with the Postmaster General. I suggest that he put his question on the order paper.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Wednesday, April 6, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Benidickson, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Regier.

Mr. J. A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock last evening I was leading into the subject of the United States defence bases in Newfoundland and Labrador which were granted to the United States government by the imperial government at the outset of the second world war in 1940. I referred to the fact that although these bases had been leased for a period of 99 years without the advice or consent of the people of Newfoundland at that time, no protection whatsoever had been provided for the pension rights of the people who were employed on those bases.

I referred yesterday to the fact that this is a matter of concern to other hon. members of this house who have these bases located in their constituencies. I have in mind St. John's West, where a United States naval base is located at Argentia; Grand Falls-White Bay-Ladrabor, where the United States air force has a location at Goose Bay, and Humber-St. George's where the United States has the Ernest Harmon air force base situated on the west coast of Newfoundland at Stephenville around which a town of some 8,000 people has grown.

This is a very important question, because I think the time has come when this whole situation should be carefully studied and reappraised in connection with the future disposition of these bases. I am founding this contention on the fact that only a few weeks ago the United States government and our own Department of National Defence announced that Pepperrell air force base at St. John's would terminate its operations by September 1 of this year. This news was not unexpected, because warnings had gone out several years ago. Yet in spite of the fact that representations have been made by the employees over the past ten years or more, it was only upon realization that a close-down was imminent that the right of these people to a pension was recognized.

I mentioned earlier that I was happy to refer to this subject because our relations with the United States military forces in Newfoundland during the past 20 years have been, I suggest, without parallel anywhere in the world. Our relations with United States service personnel have been exemplary. Many thousands of our people have found constant employment with them. These men and women from the United States are fully integrated into our society and communities. They take an active part in community affairs and in sporting events, and they have generally been good neighbours. They will be very greatly missed. I should like on this occasion, on behalf of my constituents, to acknowledge publicly our deep sense of appreciation and our deep sense of loss with regard to the departure of these good friends.

Now, however, the question arises as to the future disposition of these bases. For example, Pepperrell air force base, which was founded in 1941, originally as a military establishment and subsequently as an air force base, contributes at the present time approximately $12 million annually to the economy of St. John's. Hon. members will realize without difficulty that the loss of this sum annually to a city of less than 100,000 people is substantial and constitutes a severe economic blow. This is accounted for mainly by the fact that there are approximately 5,000 air force personnel employing some 1,200 civilians. The civilian payroll alone reaches a total of $4,576,000 annually. The annual rate of pay per week for Canadian citizens employed on this installation is $81.

As I said, this base was established on a 99-year lease which means, in effect, that it was not similar in all respects to military camps as we have come to know them in Canada. These buildings are permanent buildings. The total value of the properties located at Pepperrell, near St. John's, exceeds $40 million. These include a fully independent, self-contained hospital; magnificent school buildings, beautiful large living quarters of brick construction, as well as all the other buildings that go toward making up a large military establishment.

The St. John's Evening Telegram in its issue of January 12, 1960 said:

> A "deactivated" Pepperrell air force base—a technically-abandoned base on Canadian territory, which was not Canadian when the territory was handed over and which was granted more as a gift than as part of a business contract and without prior consultation with its original owners, seems to have the makings of a very interesting international question.

In the same issue, with reference to the properties on Pepperrell air base, the Telegram said:

> In any event, what is to happen to the magnificent, multimillion dollar plant located on the base in the shape of a splendid hospital, a fine school, family homes and barracks, that, without too much difficulty, could be turned into apartments.

Are they to be left to deteriorate, as they inevitably must, when Newfoundland is short of classrooms, hospital beds, housing accommodation? Surely there must be some way, some arrangement that could be made to put such costly and worthwhile buildings and other facilities to work to fill a great need.

It is true that we are desperately in need of hospital beds, and that there is a magnificent hospital located on this establishment. We have been pressing for an armoury at St. John's, and there is a magnificent armoury at the Pepperrell air force base in addition to classrooms and buildings of all descriptions.

Probably what is more important is the fact that with the withdrawal of the United States air force a vacuum will be created in the North American defence structure. No one is prepared to concede that the day of so-called conventional war is a thing of the past. On the contrary, the future existence of civilization depends on hostilities being restricted to such small conventional wars. I raise this point to emphasize to my colleagues in the government and particularly to the Minister of National Defence the need of consultation on the part of his department with the joint chiefs of staff of the Canadian services, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Defence Production in respect to this question.

I will be the first to concede that the allocation of the defence budget across Canada is made not on a per capita, regional or proportional basis but purely on the basis of strategic need. Newfoundland is the Gibraltar of Canada, of North America. It is Canada's easternmost frontier. It has only a token force of Canadian military personnel. With the withdrawal of the United States air force, and with the question being raised as to the future disposition of the facilities at Pepperrell, now is the time when we should give consideration to providing a military establishment there on Canada's easternmost frontier comprising members of the Canadian army, navy or R.C.A.F. as the case may be. There is a need for such a Canadian establishment at the Gibraltar of North America, which has always been fortified, if for no other reason than to provide a token force, to establish and maintain sovereign rights and to recognize the strategic location of this part of the country.

As I have said, we have a ready-made military installation in Canada in which since 1940 Canada and the people of Newfoundland have had no say. What is to be its future? We know that Pepperrell is to be vacated, but what will be the future of the United States air force base at Stephenville? It is primarily a fighter base. We know from discussions in the house that the trend in the general defence policy of North America adopted by Canada and the United States is away from the fighter to the ballistic missile and other weapons. There seems to be no justification for this installation, which is primarily a fighter base, basing interceptor squadrons. What is to happen to the town of 8,000 people that has been built up in that area over the past ten years should the installation follow the course at Pepperrell and terminate its operations?

These questions require careful and serious study on the part of our government in consultation with the government of the United States through its department of state and department of defence. This is a domestic question certainly falling within the province of the federal government. It points to a need to reappraise the situation on the east coast with regard to our own military installations.

The Royal Canadian Navy has great strength in Nova Scotia, which is the traditional home of the navy in Canada and will always be so. Surely there is a requirement for larger air force establishment at St. John's to fill the vacuum created by the withdrawal of United States troops. I suggest that without undue delay this question be given serious thought by the government of Canada, and that consultation be initiated with the United States government relating to the eventual disposition of United States properties in Canada.

I should like at this time with the consent of the house to have printed as an appendix to Hansard a description of the physical buildings and properties at Pepperrell air force base, so that hon. members may see more clearly exactly what I am talking about. May I have the consent of the house for this purpose?

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member indicate the source of the table to which he is referring?

Mr. McGrath: Yes, Mr. Speaker. It is from the United States department of defence. It appears to be lengthy, but it is triple space printing and could be easily condensed to occupy, I would think, not more than three pages of the record.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member suggesting that this be printed as an appendix to Hansard?

Mr. McGrath: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house give consent to the printing of this table as an appendix to Hansard, that is a table showing a description of the buildings at Fort Pepperrell?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: For material referred to above, see appendix to Hansard for Friday, April 8, 1960.]

Mr. McGrath: I thank the house for this courtesy, Mr. Speaker. Before I leave the subject may I at this time publicly acknowledge the understanding, co-operation, kindness and consideration shown by his excellency the ambassador of the United States and members of his staff and the United States air force authorities in Ottawa during the weeks this question has been under discussion. It is as a result of their endeavours and the endeavours of the consul general of the United States in St. John's, and the understanding of the United States air force authorities, that the people who are being laid off from some of these bases, particularly Pepperrell, are to be granted pension rights under the United States civil service retirement act.

Before I resume my seat I would like to refer briefly to one other subject which affects my constituency. I would like to refer to the surplus labour situation in the iron ore mines of Bell island. I draw the attention of the house to the fact that, notwithstanding what may have been said to the contrary by learned members of the opposition from Newfoundland, particularly the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, the Minister of Labour wrote to the premier of Newfoundland on October 5, 1959 following his visit to Bell island to personally survey the situation there, where some 600 men were laid off last year as a result of the closing down of one of the three shafts of the mine. As a result of his personal appraisal of the situation he recommended to the premier of Newfoundland that they, that is, the federal and provincial governments, share in a vocational training scheme in order to enable particularly the younger people on Bell island —where there are, I might add, over 14,000 people wholly dependent on one industry—to get some vocational training to provide greater scope and opportunity for them, and for men of middle age who know nothing but work in the mines over the past years. This need has been recognized by the people of Bell island, including members of the labour movement and civil leaders. It is a very serious problem. The need to relocate those people in other sections of the country or of the province, as the case may be, where jobs are more readily available and where they could have greater scope because of newly acquired skills, is obvious.

I am sorry to say that although the minister's letter was acknowledged on October 8, 1959 and advice was given by the premier that the matter was being referred to his colleague, the provincial minister of labour, that is where the matter stands at the moment. I am raising this matter at this time, sir—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will the hon. gentleman permit a question? The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, to whom my friend made reference, is not in the house because of another engagement. If he were here I am sure he would ask the following question. Would the situation in Newfoundland, as revealed in the premier's letter, be due to the fact that the premier of that province does not have the necessary resources owing to the failure of this government to live up to the financial terms of the agreement it made with Newfoundland?

An hon. Member: You know better.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am just asking the question.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Nonsense personified.

Mr. McGrath: That is a rhetorical question that does not warrant an answer. The hon. member is a past master at getting statements on Hansard when other members are speaking.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): He smuggles them in.

Mr. McGrath: In any event, Mr. Speaker, if the question of the learned member for Essex East does warrant attention, surely if the government of Newfoundland with greater revenue than ever before cannot afford a 50-50 arrangement with the federal government to provide vocational training for about 500 people, then I suggest it does not deserve to carry on the government.

My purpose in raising this particular question at this time is to impress upon my learned colleagues in the opposition, particularly my good friend for Bonavista-Twillingate, who is not here—maybe the hon. member for Essex East will convey this to him—the necessity of his interceding with his good friend and mentor the premier of Newfoundland, on behalf of my constituents on Bell island. Please ask him whether he will at least look into the possibility of acceding to the request of the Minister of Labour in providing that badly needed vocational training for those displaced miners on Bell island.

In closing, I thank the house for its indulgence in listening to my remarks, which I have tried to make of a national character rather than purely local in scope because, as I said, the question of the United States bases affects not only my constituency but other ridings in the country. The question of the surplus labour situation on Bell island is one which concerns all of us in Newfoundland. I would hope that we can forget our partisanship long enough to resolve some of these problems, particularly as they apply to our people. After all, they are not interested in the colour of our political flag when their stomachs are empty. I would ask, sir, that these questions be treated in the way that the United States bases question has been.

I might add, sir, that I like to feel—and I am sure the hon. member for Humber-St. George's (Mr. Batten) would agree with me—that it is because of the fact that those problems have been kept out of the public forum and have not been made partisan political questions that the solution has been a satisfactory one, particularly in regard to pensions. I would hope that the same spirit would guide us in discussion with regard to the future of the displaced miners of Bell island and other questions.

(Translation):

Mr. Guy Rouleau (Dollard): Mr. Speaker, last Monday, when the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Bourdages) rose to comment on the budget speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), I was preparing to listen closely to him in view of our friendly relations and also because of the fact that he represents the constituency next to mine in Montreal.

I was quite disappointed however, because if you analyse his speech and leave out the quotations, there is just nothing left.

He gave us a definition of the word "create". To create, he says, is to do something out of nothing. On the basis of that definition, there is little to be done with his speech, because there was nothing in it.

He managed to say, after the minister's budget speech, that we have a great, an outstanding Minister of Finance.

That reminded me of the speeches we used to hear regularly in Quebec from Union Nationale members, about a certain politician they described as being the greatest since confederation.

While we are on the subject, may I remind some of the Quebec Conservative backbenchers that this is not the Quebec legislature, where duplessism is the keyword; this is the House of Commons of Canada, where there are standing orders which are applied with fairness and justice.

A number of Conservative backbenchers from Quebec use this house as a sounding-board to extol the merits of a man of whom, unfortunately, they are disciples.

Mr. Duplessis, as the dictator of Quebec for many years, caused untold harm to Quebec and to Canadians on the national level. We were misjudged because of the stand he took and because of his insubordinate and reactionary turn of mind. It is not surprising that from time to time we hear remarks such as those made last Friday by the member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher). However, in view of the position he holds, I think that before making his speech he should have sought information about the true feelings of the right-minded majority of French Canadians.

It has never entered the minds of Quebec people and French Canadians to impose their views on the other provinces. But I understand that Mr. Duplessis' attitudes led many of our fellow citizens outside the province of Quebec to believe that we objected to everything coming from Ottawa or from the other provinces. He always gave the impression that Quebec refused to compromise. But this was only the opinion of one man and of a few of his followers who, unfortunately, were entrusted with the future of the province.

When you know the French Canadians well, you realize they want to live their lives fully as Canadians, within the framework of the Canadian confederation, sharing the rights and responsibilities of all Canadian provinces.

This is something you personally understand, Mr. Speaker, and I commend you for the attitude you show publicly towards Canadians, not only since your appointment as Speaker, but always.

The Speaker of this house deserves the admiration and respect of all Canadians, and most particularly of French Canadians, whom he sincerely understands and admires.

But I would ask my French Canadian fellow citizens, who are sitting in this house under the Tory label, to stop behaving as henchmen of Maurice Duplessis and the Union Nationale. They should at last understand that, as they have been sitting here for three years, they are here to deal with national matters, on a national level and in a purely national spirit.

That should not prevent them from expressing, from time to time the views of the province they represent here, but they should in doing so, remain conscious of the fact that we are living in a Canadian confederation which extends from coast to coast.

The prime objective of federal members should be the greatness of their country, of all their country, and the welfare of Canadians, of all Canadians. The leader of the government here is not the leader of the Quebec government, but the leader of the Canadian government. My Conservative colleagues from Quebec seem to forget it sometimes.

This is so true that when the member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Fortin), addressing a Manitoba audience, stated, as reported in the press, that Mr. Duplessis had been obsessed by autonomy, none other than the great treasurer who controls the sinews of war for the Union Nationale, saw fit to denounce him to the whole province, right in the legislature, and to call him a child.

After the remarks made by the Hon. Gerard Martineau, the member for Montmagny-L'Islet felt bound to go back on his opinion and to explain himself, in order to reingratiate himself, not with the leader of the Canadian government, but with the big chief of the Union Nationale.

Such a situation is unbearable for a member of the Canadian parliament.

In saying this, I do not want to point personally to the hon. member for Laval because, as far as I know, he himself never walked into that trap. But, as I mentioned earlier, his statement that the Minister of Finance is a great Minister of Finance reminds me that the front and backbenchers of the Union Nationale, in my province, were always saying that Mr. Duplessis was the greatest premier since confederation.

Mr. Maurice Duplessis is now dead. God has judged him and history will judge him. When the hon. Mr. Sauve replaced him, a new mood spread over the province of Quebec. Already the Union Nationale and the Conservative members had started to say that he too was the greatest premier we ever had in the province of Quebec. Since both of them were the greatest premiers, I wonder where this leaves the present premier of Quebec.

To come back to the Minister of Finance, as I have just said, the member for Laval exclaimed, in his charming candour, that he was a great, great, great Minister of Finance.

When he sings the praises of the Minister of Finance, of the Prime Minister, and of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, he reminds me a little of a purring cat waiting to be patted.

Well, after the few remarks he made, he had his pat, his reward, when the Minister of Finance turned towards him and gave him a big smile. There are less of those purring cats nowadays, that used to keep close to cabinet members looking for a smile, a pat or something else. But we notice this year, since the appointment of parliamentary secretaries, that many of the purring cats keep huddled in their corners and are no longer heard from.

After hearing and studying the budget speech and after surveying the reactions of various groups of businessmen across the country, I can only say that this year's budget is much smaller than Conservative members, through the hon. member for Laval, would have us think, and that the Minister of Finance is not that great.

Of course, since confederation, it did not happen very often that a Conservative government, through its Minister of Finance, could in a budget speech forecast a slight surplus, and I understand the quite childish satisfaction felt by the Minister of Finance when he introduced his budget, and by the government members and later on by Conservative backbenchers.

I must say frankly that, as a Canadian citizen, I am happy that the budget could finally be somewhat balanced and I wholeheartedly hope that the minister's forecast will prove to be right, although I doubt it very much.

But I cannot forget that, if this year the minister was able to forecast a surplus of $12 million for next year, it is because of the tax increases of last year, which yield approximately half a billion dollars each year to the treasury.

Nor can I forget the 800,000 unemployed in our country, about whom the Minister of Finance did not seem to care very much.

I cannot forget either the 100,000 civil servants whom the Minister of Finance did not take into account in the salary increases.

I cannot forget either the businessmen and industrialists across the country, who suffer and many of whom are facing bankruptcy because of the credit restrictions laid down by the Bank of Canada in collusion with the Minister of Finance.

And the Conservative backbenchers ignore those issues which are vital for all Canadians, and hang on to what seems to them a safety belt after those discouraging and depressing deficits of the last three years.

According to those Conservative backbenchers, Mr. Speaker, all is for the best in the best of worlds. In their view there is no unemployment. They see no credit restrictions, and they think that civil servants are satisfied. Like children, they are wild with joy. They are happy. Therefore civil servants must be happy too, as must be businessmen, leaders of industry, and even the unemployed.

Like them, we should follow in the footsteps of the hon. member for Laval who declares that the Minister of Finance is a great, great, great minister.

But, Mr. Speaker, even if, as a Canadian, I expressed some hope because of the $12 million surplus announced by the Minister of Finance, I say again that, because of our past experience, I cannot share their views and call the present holder of the finance portfolio a great minister.

Since the Conservative party took over in 1957, the government and the Minister of Finance have increased this country's national debt by more than a billion dollars, thus increasing the servicing of the debt by several hundred million dollars a year.

For the year just ended, the Minister of Finance, a few days before his budget speech, confirmed to us that the deficit exceeded $400 million. Is that something about which Canadians may rejoice? The only happy ones are the Conservative backbenchers.

During the years 1945-57, the government under a Liberal prime minister succeeded in lowering the national debt by $2,413,000,000, which reduced the servicing of the debt accordingly. In less than three years, the Conservative government has again increased the national debt by more than a billion dollars, thus adding some $500 million yearly to the servicing of the debt.

Mr. Speaker, I do not hesitate to state in this house, and before the whole nation, that in less than three years, this government and the Minister of Finance have destroyed the results of 11 years of good and sound Liberal administration.

However, Conservative backbenchers are rejoicing and are satisfied with the mirage summoned before their eyes. I did not know they were naive enough to be satisfied with so little.

The hon. member for Laval told us in this house last Monday, that if he were sitting in the opposition, he would be so discouraged by the finance minister's budget speech for this year that he would resign.

That shows very little knowledge of the Leader of the Opposition and of members who are sitting by his side. Like our leader, our sole purpose is the greatness of our country and the welfare of our fellow citizens.

What we have done since we have been in the opposition has been merely to ask the government to give a sound administration to this country and to ensure the welfare of Canadians.

Discouraged? We could have been that long before today, when we saw our country so badly administered by this government. But we are not discouraged. We never are, and never will be. We shall not let up. Quite the contrary, we shall keep on working towards the goal I have just indicated.

We have a role to play in this house, and neither the member for Laval (Mr. Bourdages), nor his Conservative backbencher friends, will prevent us from playing it.

However, we are astounded by the naiveté of Conservative members who content themselves with so little. In view of their puerile attitude, we are determined to fight on for our Canadian fellow citizens, confident that we represent the views of the great majority of Canadians who are only waiting for the opportunity of sweeping out of office a government that is showing arrogance, inconsistency, complacency, and which is leading us, without any doubt, to economic chaos and to unemployment.

The people are not happy. The unemployed are not happy. Businessmen are not happy. Industrialists are not happy.

Mr. Ricard: Neither are the Liberals.

Mr. Rouleau: Only those dear Conservative backbenchers are happy.

Mr. Ricard: The Liberals are not.

Mr. Rouleau: Why don't you do something about the unemployment in your constituency?

We wonder why the member for Laval, who, epitomizing the thought of his backbencher friends, stated, I don't know on what basis, that civil servants were happy with the $15 million granted to a third of them. I am glad for those civil servants who will get a small salary increase, and I take this opportunity to point out to the Minister of Finance that it would now be proper to show our gratitude to those ladies who, in parliament, are our collaborators; I mean the members' secretaries. They are not only our stenographers, they are real collaborators. They show unlimited devotion and they have great responsibilities. They do not hesitate to stay on the job until late, to carry on the work they have undertaken, and what is more, they defend the member for whom they work. They deserve not only our admiration, but also all our gratitude. I hope that, as a token of our gratitude, the Minister of Finance will grant them the raise they deserve.

As to the 100,000 who have been ignored, I would strongly advise the hon. member for Laval and his colleagues to take note of the comments of various officials of civil service organizations, which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen for April 1, 1960. It is reported that the joint action committee of Canadian civil service organizations expressed bitter disappointment at the salary increases announced by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech, which involved only a third of the civil servants. The report added that there was general dissatisfaction.

Mr. Ken Green, of the national defence employees association, stated that the commission had been ignored and that increases should have been extended to all civil servants. Mr. Fred Whitehouse, president of the Civil Service Federation of Canada, said with a touch of humour that civil servants would hit the ceiling. He added that the increase, which had been expected for all civil servants, applied only to one third of them.

Mr. Marshall, president of the professional institute, indicated that civil servants were not being given full satisfaction.

Those are only a few comments from officials of civil service groups. I am sure they adequately represent the feelings of all Canada's civil servants.

Tory backbenchers are happy, but civil servants are not, and they still remember the Minister of Finance's statement that even if funds were available, civil servants would not get the increases they have been demanding.

The unemployed are also dissatisfied. The 800,000 people who, across Canada, would like to earn a decent living but cannot, surely do not share the feelings expressed by the hon. member for Laval, and are quite disappointed that the Minister of Finance has mentioned nothing that might be of some help.

Proportionately, Canada has twice as many unemployed as the United States. That is an intolerable situation. Instead of rejoicing at the few crumbs they are getting from the Minister of Finance, Conservative backbenchers should give serious thought to the plight of family heads who are unable to find jobs and who, much to their sorrow, have to let their families live in want.

Being jobless, many of those family heads have lost their car and some furniture, because they could not meet the payments. Many have had to take their children out of schools and colleges because they were no longer able to pay for their education.

Instead of rejoicing, Conservative backbenchers should feel pity for those unfortunate people and insist time and time again that the government correct the situation once and for all, and not tolerate such a disastrous state of affairs affecting hundreds of thousands of families in a country with unlimited natural resources and supposed to be rich.

If we were able to find the necessary funds for our war effort—and rightly so—it is inconceivable that in a country such as ours and in peacetime means cannot be devised to provide work for our bread winners and citizens.

The member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) and several other opposition members made constructive suggestions to the government. But as the suggestions originated from the opposition, they were ignored just as the employment situation in this country is ignored. However, while the unemployed are unhappy and opposition members are anxious to see that crucial problem settled, Conservative backbenchers are happy.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, they are happy, but business, industry, the civil service and the jobless are quite unhappy about the government's attitude.

Had he been of any consequence, the member for Laval would have been the laughing stock of all textile plant owners when he said that they were satisfied with the budget and that all their troubles were over.

Nevertheless, a statement by Mr. W. H. Young, vice president and general manager of the Hamilton Cotton Co. Ltd. is to be found in the Hamilton Spectator of April 1, 1960 to the effect that the budget had no significance for them, and another by Mr. E. D. James, vice president of Comos Imperial Mills Ltd., to the effect that the budget was most disappointing and the technical changes in the wording of tariff regulations would not in the least reduce costs to textile mills.

This year, construction, which has often been considered the basis of our economy, is experiencing a dangerous and even alarming decline. Businessmen and industrialists see their profits dwindle gradually. Credit restrictions are making it hard for them to stay in business.

The Prime Minister went to great pains to tell us in a television broadcast last fall that there was no tight money policy in this country.

The Minister of Finance repeated the same thing. Let us ask industrialists, businessmen, merchants or workers whether they can easily borrow at the bank the money they need to successfully operate their business. They know in advance the answer they will get from the bank manager. They will be told that there is no money available for them at the present time.

The Prime Minister and his Minister of Finance may deny the government's responsibility for this state of affairs, but the facts prove that full responsibility for the tight money policy rests on the present government.

Indeed, what has happened, Mr. Speaker, since the Conservatives took office?

In order to fulfil a few of the many irresponsible promises they had made to the voters, they had to go to a terrible expense and plunge the federal administration into deficits that had never been equalled so far. To cover those deficits, the government had to resort to loans and particularly to the famous debt conversion operation.

As a result, whatever money was available in banks or elsewhere went to the government, which became the country's heaviest borrower. The government grabbed money which otherwise would have been available to small borrowers, thus causing interest rates to soar. This has forced every Canadian taxpayer to pay more for servicing the national debt which in two years has risen by one billion dollars, raising the interest payments by $249 million a year.

The increase in interest rates had an impact on the borrowing of school boards and municipalities. Those corporations, when they are able to secure loans at all, have to pay an interest rate often exceeding 7 per cent. And who ultimately pays the interest charges paid by municipalities and school boards? Who pays for the increase in servicing the national debt? The taxpayer, the small property owners whose assessments rise accordingly.

If the Tory government had administered things wisely, it would at least have balanced its budget since 1957; it would not have had to resort to enormous borrowing, and the borrowed money would still be available to others at a reasonable interest rate. We would not be facing today that tight money policy which is driving hundreds upon hundreds of people to the wall and contributing to unemployment.

The Prime Minister, just like the Minister to Finance, wants to deny the evidence, by maintaining that they have nothing to do with the decisions of the governor of the Bank of Canada. Those two ministers accused the chartered banks of being responsible for the tight money policy. Nothing is farther from the truth. The decisions taken by the governor of the Bank of Canada are completely endorsed by the government. The Bank of Canada is under the jurisdiction of parliament and, more particularly, of the Minister of Finance.

If the governor of the Bank of Canada were to take some action and adopt attitudes contrary to the government's, he would have no other alternative but to tender his resignation. However, to my knowledge, neither the Minister of Finance, nor the Prime Minister, nor any member of this government has denounced the governor of the Bank of Canada with regard to tight money policy. I have not heard it said that the governor of the Bank of Canada had considered tendering his resignation to the Minister of Finance.

It therefore means that this government, in order to meet the dire results of its inexperience and its lack of responsibility endorses the Bank of Canada in its tight money policy.

The Minister of Finance would have the Canadian public believe that there is no tight money policy in this country. He had solemnly promised that, under a Conservative government, there would be no credit restrictions. That is just another promise broken by the Conservative government.

During the present session, I heard on various occasions the Minister of Finance, with a few Conservative backbenchers in his wake, exclaim that the leader of the government and the Conservatives had fulfilled all their promises.

I indict that statement as false, and so do our people. The leader of the Conservative party, who is now Prime Minister, and the Conservative government did not fulfil their promises.

Yet, if I refer to the Toronto Star of December 2, 1957, I find the following statement, which the Prime Minister is supposed to have made at a Conservative convention in Ottawa. Mr. Diefenbaker, is said to have stated at the time. "A promise given is a promise kept." And he added that 10 per cent of the promises he had made had been kept.

He suggested that a government which did not keep its promises was doomed to defeat.

I would like, this afternoon, to recall some of the promises made by the leader of the government during election campaigns, promises which have not yet been fulfilled, even after three years of administration. A whole litany of unfulfilled promises could be listed.

We had been promised a tax cut of $500 million a year. In the session which followed the coming into power of this Conservative government for the first time, taxes were reduced, because another election was in sight soon after. But right after the general election of 1958, instead of being reduced by $500 million, taxes were increased by the same amount. We had been promised a balanced budget. However, since the Conservative government has been in power, deficits have been as follows: 1958, $38,500,000; 1959, $609,300,000; 1960, $405,800,000, which makes a total of $1,053,700,000 in three years. Are these what we might call balanced budgets?

The Prime Minister had long been solemnly promising a bill of rights. Every year, since he has been in power, he introduces his bill, but never gives the house an opportunity either to consider it or to adopt it. There is another unfulfilled promise of the leader of the government.

When he was in the opposition, the Prime Minister kept promising to raise old age pensions to $60, but they are still at $55 a month.

The Prime Minister had promised new tax-sharing arrangements between the federal government and the provinces. Apart from a few slight concessions made to the provinces, those arrangements have not yet been renewed; and that is another promise that has not been fulfilled by the Conservative government.

We had been promised that closure would be abolished in the House of Commons. Still another promise that has not been fulfilled by the Conservative party.

The province of Quebec had been promised the same representation in the cabinet which it used to have under the Liberal regime. That is another promise that had been made, but has not been kept.

We had been promised that Canadian National Railway employees would have their pensions increased. Another broken promise.

A Canadian coastal guard had been promised. We have no Canadian coastal guard yet. Another promise unfulfilled.

We had been promised that the special excise tax on cars would be abolished. Nothing has come out of that. Another promise that has not been fulfilled.

We had been promised a price support program for fish. Nothing has come out of that. Another promise that was not kept.

We had been promised that the prairie farm rehabilitation act would apply everywhere in Canada. Another promise that has not been fulfilled.

We had been promised equal freight rates, to help agriculture and industry in the prairie provinces, so that they might compete with the rest of Canada. It has not been done. Another broken promise.

We had been promised that tuberculosis and mental illness would be included in the national hospital insurance plan. It has not been done. Another promise that has not been kept.

We had been promised a vigorous immigration policy. On the contrary, immigration is being slowed down. This is another promise on which the government has backed down.

We had been promised a reduction in unnecessary government expenditure. However, since the Conservatives have been in power, expenses have been rising steadily. Another unfulfilled promise.

Mr. Ricard: That includes money for the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Rouleau: I hardly need mention that this is another unfulfilled promise.

We had been promised that immediate legislation would be introduced to provide for the control of water pollution. It has not been done. Another unfulfilled promise.

We had been promised that action would be taken for the greatest possible use to be made of the port of Churchill as an export centre for western grain. That has not been done; it is another unfulfilled promise.

We had been promised that Canadians would be encouraged, through fiscal measures, to invest their funds in such a way as to gain ownership of Canadian corporations. It has not been done, and it is a further unfulfilled promise.

We had been promised that a standard gauge railway would be substituted for the narrow gauge railway in Newfoundland. It has not been done, and it is still another unfulfilled promise.

We had been promised protection for manufacturing companies. Nothing has been done in that regard, and it is another unfulfilled promise.

We had been promised a change in the differential method used for taxing Canadian oil companies. It has not been done. There is another unfulfilled promise.

We had been promised a tax bill designed to help small industries, but that has not been done. Another unfulfilled promise.

We had been promised tax rebates for research into every field. It has not been done, and it is another unfulfilled promise.

That is only a partial list of the promises which the present government has left unfulfilled, and I wonder how Conservative backbenchers can be satisfied with such a government, just as I wonder how those who attended the Conservative convention in early December could cheer their leader when he stated that a promise made by a Conservative government was a promise kept. The Prime Minister, on that occasion, said that a government which backs down on its promises is doomed to defeat.

Mr. Speaker, after the list I have just given, I hardly need to say, what fate is in store for the present government.

According to a report published in La Presse for March 15 the Solicitor General of Canada (Mr. Balcer) stated in a speech delivered before the junior chamber of commerce of Montreal, that the difference between Canadian political parties is nothing more today than a difference between the teams that make up those parties. I refuse to accept that statement, because I think there are basic differences in the political outlook of the Liberal, Conservative and socialist parties. I feel sure, from the experience we have had in three years of Conservative administration, that the team which now leads the Liberal party is incomparably better and much more experienced than the Conservative team.

At the head of our party, we have a man of outstanding abilities. He has been a professor at the University of Toronto, and his ability has given him a reputation that will never be forgotten.

He raised Canada's reputation to unprecedented heights, and earned something which no Canadian had ever earned before: the Nobel peace prize.

He is the uncontested leader of the Liberal party. As Leader of the Opposition, his unquestionable skill is recognized by every member of this house, and by everyone who has had the privilege of following the debates in this house.

He is the future prime minister of Canada, and as such, he will give the country the sound administration we have a right to expect.

The Liberal party, in its 22 years of administration, and even through a terrible war, managed to provide a sound economy, to ensure a record prosperity and a high level of employment in Canada.

Three years of Conservative administration have resulted in heavy budget deficits and instability caused by a lack of administrative sense on the part of the leaders of the present government.

Canadians wanted to give the Conservatives another chance, but if we listen to the man in the street today, we realize that the people are longing for the day when they can replace the present government by a team that has always showed its mettle.

As I said at the outset, the member for Laval stated that if he were in the opposition, he would be so discouraged he would resign. I tell him again that, far from being discouraged, we are getting ready to restore to this country a sound administration and, until we appeal to the country, we will keep on doing in this house the work vested in us by the constitution.

As for the hon. member and the other Conservative backbenchers, they will not have to resign. The people of Canada will see at the next election that they are sent back home. The future of the country will be entrusted to other administrators.

Mr. Ricard: That is what you were saying in 1958.

Mr. Rouleau: I do not want to question the sincerity of any one but, on the record of the last three years, we cannot have confidence in this government. Under the constitution, we still have two or three years to go before another election is held. I sincerely hope that the situation does not grow any worse.

This is a beautiful, great and wealthy country. To develop all the wealth with which it has been endowed, we need, at the head of the government, a team capable of developing our bountiful heritage. The Conservatives woefully failed at the task. It is up to us, to the press and the public in general, to prevent things from getting worse from now until the next election.

The natural resources of this country are unlimited. There is no reason why there should be any unemployment in Canada. No Canadian willing and able to work should suffer. We are still in a better position than the United States. We have a great part to play among the nations of the world.

What we have to do is to develop all our resources. Unfortunately, this government has been unable to do it. So, for the time being, we must make the best of the situation and prepare for the future.

In spite of what is going on at the present time, I have confidence in my country. I have confidence in my fellow citizens and I know that our own team is ready to watch over the destiny of Canada.

In a few years from now, we shall solve the problems that the present team cannot solve and we will continue to administer the affairs of our country so as to make it one of the great, one of the greatest and most peace-loving countries of the world.

(Text):

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): This is the fourth day of the debate on the budget, and I find myself puzzled and perplexed—and interested, of course—by one aspect of it, and that is that none of the five members of the previous government who sit in this house have yet taken part in the discussion. They do not ordinarily behave like non-combatants, and I have been asking myself just why there should have been this extraordinary unanimity of silence. What are they waiting for? New ammunition to come up from the base? Or do they expect that the newspapers will put down a barrage under which they can make an advance? If that should be their motive, I doubt whether they are going to find it a satisfactory one. At any rate, I suppose it will emerge soon.

One might imagine that the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) has been very busy with statistics—preparing his own ammunition, so flexible and so original—and one might imagine that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) is in company with his distinguished former chieftain whose life he is writing, and he will, no doubt, seek counsel there. But to come back to the newspapers. I doubt very much if any comfort will come to the opposition from that source. I shall read a short quotation from the Montreal Star which, so far as I recall, has not been very partial to our party over the years. This is what it has to say in part:

> From the national point of view it is vital to pay our way, and that is what Mr. Fleming promises . . . Indeed, a balanced budget in this year must be regarded as something in the nature of a minor miracle.

I like those words. And then the article goes on to say:

> Its achievement reflects the integrity and growing stature of the Minister of Finance.

I like that, too, because it seems to me a plain statement of fact. I think the people of this country, even those who do not like us, are going to be impressed by the fact that we are now paying our way. I think as that sinks in it will be more and more impressive to them.

There is one quarter from which the opposition might have expected support. I refer to the Toronto Star. But I find the editorial which appeared in the Toronto Star the day after the budget somewhat perplexing. It is true the writer left some postern gates through which to return to the attack later on, but for the moment, it seems to me, he was pussy-footing.

The only interesting thing to me about the editorial was that it uses a word I have never seen used before. It is a kind of highbrow word and I suppose one finds in use in the higher Liberal ranks. The editorial referred to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) as an "euphoric mariner". It is not an unpleasant word. I looked it up in the dictionary that we have in this chamber but it is not there. Apparently it is not the kind of word that hon. members of parliament use. It is perhaps over their heads.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is not a parliamentary term.

Mr. Macdonnell: It is not a term of insult. As a matter of fact "euphoria" is a rather interesting word. It is described as a word used to express well-being or the perfect ease and comfort of healthy persons. Now, who could have more feeling of well-being than the Minister of Finance at the present time?

Mr. Benidickson: It may be a false well-being, though.

Mr. Macdonnell: It seems to me that the Star, perhaps unintentionally—it may be that they did not know the meaning of the word— paid the minister a compliment. The word is not in the dictionary we have in the house and I do not suppose it would be in a Cambridge dictionary but it was in Murray's Oxford dictionary and that is what it means.

I repeat, I have no doubt that the Minister of Finance does feel a considerable amount of comfort. I would if I were in his position with a balanced budget. I think as one looks back one can see that it has not come about by accident but was based on long term planning and tenacity. After all, the Minister of Finance has had a long schooling in politics. He began in what is probably the most useful of all kinds of public service, as school trustee, went on to be an alderman and came down here as a member. We all know his record here. We are all aware of his zest for work. We all know he had a certain—what shall I say—aggressive quality which was very useful when he was in the opposition and which even now can be shown from time to time. He also had a considerable capacity for using the word "no" and that, I am sure, has been very useful in his present job.

Of course we must not forget that the minister has colleagues nor that he has the support of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and his other colleagues, but when we look back and see that in those three years there has been a kind of steady relentless purpose moving toward a balanced budget we all must feel an admiration for the hon. gentlemen. He sought two years ago to prepare for it. Last year he told us he hoped that this year it would come about, and here it is.

The Minister of Finance, of course, has his critics. As a matter of fact there was a period when he was subject to a great deal of very ignorant—I repeat, ignorant—criticism, some from people who should have known better and some from people who did not know at all and should not have undertaken to express opinions. I will admit there was a time when some people who should have known better where inclined to be critical. I believe that most of them have changed their minds and realized that the minister's long term planning was sound. I think they have realized that they were wrong.

Let us take, for example, the conversion loan. There were lots of people who talked foolishly about that, and I repeat, foolishly. What was the comment of people who knew about it at the time? I can remember very well what was said by a man whom I respect very much, a well-known businessman. I will never forget his words. He said, "What else could he have done?"

When you look at what happened in respect of that conversion loan and when you realize that in July of 1958 the average length of term of the outstanding victory bonds was 4.3 years and that by the first of September it was 13.3 years, anyone who understands debt and what it means will realize what a tremendous relief that was. I do not think any serious man in the world of finance will deny now that that operation was necessary and wise. They might say, "Oh well, he should have sold the bonds cheaper; he got too good a bargain from the public; he has probably made too good a sale," but that is not a very serious crime.

I do not think any serious person—and I must admit there are some people who are not serious who undertake to talk about it —will deny that that conversion loan was very wise indeed.

Mr. Benidickson: I would put in a caveat.

Mr. Macdonnell: Well, caveats cost nothing. As I understand it you can put them in practically with no fee.

I also want to say a word about the premium on the Canadian dollar. I mentioned it especially because it is referred to in the amendment. The minister explained that at length in Toronto in January, I remember, and briefly again in the budget, and to me the answer to that is that so far as I am aware none of the people who have talked about it and wanted it wiped out is prepared to say how to do it. The minister has pointed out in his statements that without controls and in a free market you cannot do it unless with fabulous expenditures. As I understand it, no one in the opposition has faced up to the question and said he is prepared to accept controls because no doubt he would find out quickly that if you are going to have financial controls as there were during the war time there will be other controls, too, and people are not in favour of them.

I believe every reasonable man will echo the words of the Montreal Star to which I have already referred that the balancing of the budget is the primary consideration, and when you tell them the budget is balanced they metaphorically sit back and say, "Thank God; that is a good thing." Let me read again the last sentence of the Montreal Star editorial:

> —a balanced budget in this year must be regarded as something in the nature of a minor miracle. This achievement reflects the integrity and growing stature of the Minister of Finance.

Surely those are words which the Minister of Finance can regard with deep satisfaction and pride.

So far I have been dealing with our own affairs which I believe the judgment of this country will pronounce good. I think even the bitterest opposition critic knows in his heart they are good. We had a list from the hon. member who spoke last of all kinds of things he alleged have not been done but for the most part they were small stuff. The judgment of the country will rely on the over-all fact that this minister has steered us into smoother seas by balancing the budget which was what everybody wanted.

If we lived in a world where everyone was in that position how happy we would be but we do not live in that kind of world. It is impressed on us more every day that we live in a shrinking world. We are living on each other's doorsteps with planes that go nearly a thousand miles an hour and with radio that goes instantaneously and tells other people in the world how we are all living. We are conscious of the fact that there are many countries—100 altogether, according to Paul Hoffman one time head of the Marshall plan—where poverty, ill health and despair prevail. Mr. Paul Hoffman was I suppose par excellence the man most skilled in international finance in providing relief to underdeveloped countries. He recognizes that there are 100 tragically poor countries, not including China, and that their population is 1,250 million.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Two thirds of the people of the world.

Mr. Macdonnell: Yes, two thirds of the world's population. He speaks of the powerful moral, political and business reasons for this. I underline the word "business". I believe myself that all of these three considerations represent, I was going to say the $64 question, but I would like to multiply it and say $128 question. Barbara Ward, the amazing woman who was once an editor of The Economist speaks of several break-throughs in these last ten years. Among others, she speaks of the break-through of those hungering for economic growth, hundreds of millions of them, and says that this and other break-throughs will expand explosively—I repeat, explosively—to make the sixties a period of challenge and change unequalled in human history. I wish I had the eloquence of a Lincoln or a Churchill, because I believe this is the thing which every one of us should take to heart. We know that in the back of our minds there are forebodings about the world we live in. We really get to the stage where we just try to forget them. But there they are.

I am going to read a few of the comments of world leaders which will underline the situation and give us the picture. First of all, I want to read wise words of our own Prime Minister. He speaks about the economic assistance to underdeveloped countries as a major and mandatory need if freedom is to be preserved in the world. Major and mandatory; that means something has to be done if freedom is to be preserved in the world.

Mr. Benidickson: What was the date of that reference?

Mr. Macdonnell: I am not sure of the date. It is from a speech of the Prime Minister. I would have to give the date to the hon. member later.

I want to read briefly from three or four other world opinions. First of all, a word from President Eisenhower on this question. When speaking of the crisis he said:

> We face what could be a turning point in history, and we must act decisively.

Macmillan speaks of improving the conditions of life in the less developed countries of the world. He says it is one of the great challenges of our time. Then, this quotation from de Gaulle, which interested me more than any because it was not the kind of thing I would expect from him. He says this:

> It is the duty of those who are best endowed and strongest to help others—those who are in want, those who are underprivileged. This, they must do if they themselves do not want to perish.

I repeat that. "If they themselves do not want to perish." There is a hard-boiled world leader, if you like, and this is what he has to say about the situation. I do not think any of us should take it lightly.

I have read these quotations because I want to make clear that those practical men are agreeing with Hoffman. I shall quote later from Eugene Black of the world bank, another businessman who has put this forward as tremendously important.

The results are rather disappointing. Hoffman said that: The result in 1950 was very disappointing. The per capita income in 1950 in underdeveloped countries is estimated at $110. In 1959 it should reach $125-$130. That is only $15-$20 in 10 years. The income has gone from approximately $110 to $125-$130. In other words, there has been an increase of only $15 to $20 in 10 years. Hoffman adds that this is dangerously slow. The average increase in the western nations between 1950 and 1957 was $300 per capita. In the United States it was $530. The rich are getting richer and the poor desperately poorer. Hoffman again says that the goal for 1969 should be $160.

When you look back at what was done in England and in western Europe you can see that there was a tremendous success achieved. The recipient nations were well organized. Hon. members recall how they were able to take the money and use it. Hon. members recall the loans we made to Britain in 1946. This is one of the first things we remember in parliament, the Minister of Finance, and I, who were new members at that time. As I recall, our loan was $1,250 million and the United States $3,750 million. They did a good job. As we remember, the Marshall plan worked almost a miracle under the management of that great man Hoffman. I just want to read a sentence from what Marshall said in 1947 at Harvard University:

> Our policy is directed not against any country or doctrine but against hunger, poverty, desperation, and chaos. Its purpose should be the revival of a working economy in the world so as to permit the emergence of political and social conditions in which free institutions can exist.

I commend these words to the intelligence of every one of us. I have quoted Hoffman's aim for 1970.

We are spending billions on defence. Speaking for myself, I do not see how we can let down our guard.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Just for my own satisfaction will the hon. gentleman give me the date of his reference to Hoffman?

Mr. Macdonnell: The quotation was taken from a speech Hoffman made in Toronto on October 19. I will send the hon. member a copy.

We are spending those billions in the hope —sometimes we find it a faint hope—that the equipment will never be used. We hope it will be a deterrent, but we can never be sure. We remember the old phrase, "Hope deferred maketh the heart sick". I suppose what happens is that we try to tuck this into the back of our minds and not think about it. We watch new weapons being manufactured becoming obsolete before they are even ready for use. We see hundreds of millions of dollars spent for weapons which, as I say, are already obsolete. Meanwhile, another deterrent is not being adequately used. I refer to the deterrent of a revival of a working economy in the world, as Marshall said, so as to permit the emergence of political and social conditions in which free institutions can exist.

I think the feeling throughout the world is that war is not the only great enemy, but that poverty is another. There is no mystery as to how to aid countries. We learned how to do that from past failures. Money has been wasted but a great deal has been learned. The Hoffman organization under the United Nations makes searching inquiries before moneys are supplied. They survey natural resources and they give technical assistance. Recently there has been established a United Nations special fund, to which we have made a contribution, which will supply limited funds for capital development.

Let me read from Hoffman's pamphlet, entitled "One Hundred Countries" and his proposal at page 45. I wish to read also a short extract showing the almost miraculous results which can come about if the situation of these people can be improved ever so little. Here is what Hoffman says:

> My proposal is this: That we—all of us together—fix it as our goal to double in the 1960's, as compared with the 1950's, the annual per capita rate of economic growth in 100 countries and territories containing a billion and a quarter of the world's people. If we achieve this goal it will mean increasing the per capita economic growth rate of the less developed countries from an average of 1 per cent a year in the 1950's to an average of 2 per cent in the 1960's. To do this it will be necessary for the less developed countries to sustain an annual rate of economic growth of 4 per cent. This will mean a total increase of about 40 per cent and a per capita increase of nearly 25 per cent in 10 years. It will mean increasing per capita income from the estimated present figure of around $100 to around $125 in 1970. This means increasing per capita income in the 1960's by about 25 per cent per person or an average of about $2.50 per person per year.

I have one more quotation, and it will be my last quotation of any length. It struck me as so almost unbelievable that I want to read it. Hoffman said:

> If the less developed countries receive additional foreign capital and increase local savings sufficient to lift their per capita incomes by only 1 per cent more a year over the coming decade, they might well offer to the United States alone a market for an estimated $14 billion of its exports in 1970. This would represent an increase of more than 100 per cent over total U.S. exports to the same areas in 1958. And over the 10-year period, the total exports of all the developed countries to those areas... might be as much as $320 billion. In the long view, these 100 underdeveloped countries are for the United States and for the developed nations generally a great new economic frontier.

There you have the business side of it. We do not need to regard it as charity. There is a business side of it too. For instance, let us apply this to India. I was present in Montreal two years ago when the Minister of Finance presided over the commonwealth meeting there. So far as India is concerned, we can remind ourselves that in addition to being a member of the commonwealth India has a settled government, it has law and order and it has a well trained civil service. Therefore we can be reasonably certain that money applied there would be well spent.

I should like to read a sentence from a speech by Black of the world bank because I feel ever so strongly that this is a matter in which we should all be deeply concerned in our own self-interest. Black in speaking at Oxford a month ago dealt with the need of backward countries to develop efficiency and emphasized particularly that everything depends upon the responsibility of the backward countries themselves. Unless they are ready to stir themselves, unless they are ready to make greater sacrifices, the thing does not start at all.

These men are businessmen. Black has lent nearly $5 billion through the world bank without any loss. That shows the kind of man he is. He is not going around dishing out money for charity. He stresses the need of these countries stirring themselves and developing pride of workmanship and then he goes on to say, which impressed me very much, that the objective should be "that every ounce of resources available is used as efficiently as possible" in these countries. He then had this to say:

And how important it is that the free world community stand ready to pledge whatever measure of its wealth can be usefully employed in this endeavour.

There is the challenge. Let me point out at once the range and the limitations of whatever measure of this wealth can be usefully employed. We are not going to run crazy. The borrowing countries have got to do their part but on the other hand Black suggests that the free world community has a tremendous responsibility. This, as I say, is from an experienced banker who has lent nearly $5 billion without loss.

I have just one other thing to say. I hope that we will not forget the results of failure. If we go on as we are now I think we will fail. I think this thing has got to be stepped up. I should like to refer to some remarks of Adlai Stevenson, for whom I have great respect. He stresses the need of narrowing the economic disparity that exists now in the world. Here are his words:

We can't go on much longer living in a world where, for instance, the average yearly income in America is $2,000 a year and the average yearly income in India is $60.

I remember that I was amazed when I was at the commonwealth conference two years ago over which the Minister of Finance presided; this figure was before us at the time and I was amazed, that there was no complaint on the part of the representative of India. I would not have been a bit surprised if he had said, "Look, we cannot go on this way". But he like Black no doubt was looking at the thing in a practical way. I continue quoting Adlai Stevenson:

No wonder great political, social and scientific revolutions are sweeping the world and that instead of seeing the world go democratic we have seen 11 countries, I think it is, turn to other forms of government in the last few years. Democracy is not winning in the world. It is losing.

You may or may not agree with Stevenson but at any rate we will agree that he has been around and has seen more than most of us have. I admit at once that I was greatly impressed by his statement. He strikes me as being a man with his feet firmly on the ground, and this is what he says. I had not been aware that 11 countries had turned to another form of government.

With regard to our own government, it has given a lead and things have been done. The Minister of Finance has told us about this from time to time and I have quoted the Prime Minister's words which I now repeat:

Economic assistance to underdeveloped countries is a major and mandatory need if freedom is to be preserved in the world.

I find these words very impressive. I do not think the matter could be put more strongly. My feeling is that people like ourselves should be thinking about it. The Prime Minister will be going to London before long. We do not know what the agenda of the commonwealth conference is but it is pretty hard to believe that the prime ministers will not be thinking about this question. The Prime Minister's words are beginning to carry far, not only as Prime Minister of Canada but also as John Diefenbaker. I should tremendously like to feel that when he goes he may have the feeling that the people of this country are behind him and that if he wants to take great steps in this matter which is all important he will be supported.

Let me emphasize again that there is no intention on the part of people like Hoffman and Black to rush into huge expenditures.

They realize it is going to take years. They realize that the countries to be benefited have got to assume the greatest part of the burden but on the other hand they feel that unless we can steadily improve the situation within a few years the prospect is not going to be good.

My feeling is that it is a fair thing to put this matter before hon. members of the house. I believe that no one should take it lightly and that for unselfish and also for selfish reasons it is a matter of the greatest possible importance that comes right home to every one of us. In my opinion there should be indications given to the Prime Minister and the other members of the government through all kinds of organs of public opinion and by representatives of public opinion, our churches, universities, trade unions, boards of trade and chambers of commerce all across the nation that this matter should be taken seriously.

I suggest that the first people to take it seriously should be ourselves. By what I have said this afternoon and particularly by referring the house to the words of other people I would hope that possibly I have persuaded hon. members that this is a matter which we should all take seriously. We played a great part in the war and I think there is no reason why we should not play an even greater part in peace. I believe that part cries out to be played.

Mr. H. M. Batten (Humber-St. George's): Mr. Speaker, before making any comments dealing directly with the budget I should like to say at this time how grateful I am to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green) for his interest and action on behalf of those Newfoundlanders employed on United States air bases in Newfoundland.

I should also like to thank him for his courteous replies to my representations on behalf of those in my own constituency of Humber-St. George's who are employed at the Ernest Harmon air force base in Newfoundland and also for his kind attention to the correspondence from the chairman of the committee representing the employees at this particular base.

In August, 1940, following the establishment of the permanent joint board on defence by the United States and Canada, the United Kingdom, with the approval of the Newfoundland commission of government, gave the United States the right to construct bases in Newfoundland and to hold them on a 99-year lease. Early in 1941 construction began on three chosen sites, namely at St. John's, Argentia and Stephenville. Since the period of initial construction until the present time a number of Canadian citizens have been employed as full time employees with unlimited tenure. Many of these have been steadily employed for 15 years.

I understand there has been a great deal of correspondence between representative committees appointed by the employees and the commands of the various United States bases, the United States department of defence and the United States civil service commission. I believe also that these agencies have shown considerable interest in the possibility of providing some retirement plan for those "non-citizens holding permanent excepted appointment". The statement made by the minister last Thursday in the house is a most welcome one to all concerned. To those who have worked on this base for some time and who have decided to make their homes in this area the decision with regard to pensions affords a large measure of real satisfaction.

Colonel William H. Noel, the commanding officer at Ernest Harmon air force base, has also shown a keen interest in this retirement plan and has encouraged the committee in their efforts and in their representations. To him I express my appreciation and thanks for adding yet another accomplishment to the long list of services rendered to the people of western Newfoundland by the United States armed forces.

The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) referred to vocational training. I have a general knowledge of the problem about which he speaks. I think I will say here that education in a broader sense should include not only those in elementary schools, high schools and universities but also those whose abilities lead them toward the technical rather than toward professional fields. I do not want to expand on this problem at this time but I would say that in a country like Canada, which is highly industrialized—and which maybe in the future can look forward to greater industrialization—and a great manufacturing country there will always be the need for technically trained people.

I think that technical education should be expanded all across Canada in order to fit more people for jobs where know-how and native talent are required. In Newfoundland we have a need for this type of education beyond what we already have. But as everybody recognizes, we have great demands on the money allocated for education in my province. At the moment there is a great demand for elementary schools and regional high schools. Then there is the money required to build a new university. All these things add to the burden which the province must bear with regard to its educational responsibilities.

However, from my own correspondence I know that a great deal of interest is being shown in vocational education. Even in my own home city of Corner Brook a well set-up committee is now giving a thorough study to the vocational training act as it applies in Canada and as it would apply in Newfoundland. They are also discussing vocational education as it is operating in Newfoundland. Knowing the personnel of that committee as I do, I have no doubt that when they reach their conclusions those conclusions will be worth studying.

I come now to a brief consideration of the budget. During the last few months we have heard, both inside and outside of this house, that this government has no financial policy, that it has failed to provide the leadership which Canadians expect and that it operates on the theory that time solves most problems by removing them. There is a good deal of truth in that statement and the best evidence of it is the budget of 1960. In his budget speech the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) gave a report of the year's operations and then after a little bit of sermonizing he expressed the hope that during the coming year everything would turn out for the best. The trade deficit, tight money, unemployment, defence spending and many other topics of daily interest to our people were touched on only lightly or ignored altogether.

During the election campaigns of 1957 and 1958 the present government pledged itself to lower taxes, lower spending and lower interest rates. According to the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) in 1957 every Canadian was overtaxed by $30 a year and every family was overtaxed by $120 a year. He said that the government of the day was on a wild spending spree and that high interest rates and tight money were forcing industry, the provinces and the municipalities to the wall. Then he shouted, "Give us a chance, we will show you". The Canadian people gave him the chance. Let us now have a look at some of the results of his stewardship.

The revenues of this country in 1957 amounted to $5,106 million and in 1960 to $5,892 million. This means that the average per capita revenue in 1957 was $314 and in 1960, $334 or an increase of $20. Rather than taxes being reduced by 20 per cent, the per capita tax in the last three years has been increased by approximately $20.

Let us look at expenditures. Expenditures in 1957 was $4,849 million, an average of $295 per person. In 1960 the estimated expenditure is $5,880 million, an average of $334 per person. Here the per capita expenditure is shown to be $40 more than it was in the year '57.

Our net debt was $11 billion in 1957; in 1960 it was $12,100 million. In 1957 the average net debt was $664 per person; in 1960 it was $681 per person, an increase of $17.

In 1957 the net interest on our national debt was $313 million; in 1960 the net interest on our national debt was $499 million. In 1957 the net interest as a percentage of our debt was 2.85 per cent; in 1960 it was 4.13 per cent. Interest rates were less than 4 per cent during the election campaign of 1957; in August of last year they were well over 6 per cent.

The minister went on last year in his budget speech to say that he expected that the gross national product would increase by 7 per cent. We now know that his expectations were not fullfilled.

Mr. Benidickson: Fifty per cent wrong in volume.

Mr. Batten: The increase in the gross national product is no more, and may be a good deal less, than during a number of the years under Liberal administration. I am not going to give the figures on all this because they have been given by other speakers. The figure of borrowings was $164 million in 1958, $1,200 million in 1959 and $900 million in 1960, making a total volume of $2.3 billion odd.

Obviously this government has been on a wild spending spree of unequalled proportions. The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) a few moments ago referred to the fact that the government was now paying its way. I do not think the government is paying its way until it is able to repay to the Canadian people the money which it has borrowed from them in the last three years and then has brought forth a balanced budget. I do not think this government will be in power long enough to pay the expenses of this exhibition of, or expedition into, Toryism.

In the matter of trade, we have a trade deficit of $1,460 million. All these items go to show the manner in which the present government has kept its promises to the Canadian people. I remember that in 1957 the Prime Minister shouted, "Take the taxmasters off the backs of the Canadian people". Who are the taxmasters now? Surely when we look at these figures we must realize that these promises must have been made in days when the government did not have the responsibility it has now.

We talk about tight money and interest rates. The Prime Minister talked about them in 1957 and pointed out how damaging they were to the provinces and the municipalities.

He went on to take credit in 1958 for lowering the interest rate, yet in 1959 he disclaimed all responsibility for tight money or high interest rates. Let us look at what the Prime Minister said in 1958. In Calgary on March 14 of that year he claimed that interest rates had fallen sharply as a result of government action since the previous June, from a high of 4.33 per cent to 2.89 per cent. Surely if the government can reduce inerest rates in 1957 it can reduce interest rates in 1959.

He went on to outline in Selkirk on March 17, 1958, as reported in the Toronto Telegram of March 18, Progressive Conservative accomplishments since they had assumed office, and he declared that one of these was to ease the tight money situation inherited from the former Liberal administration. If the Prime Minister and his cabinet eased tight money in 1957, then they did not think they had the authority and responsibility and the know-how to do it in 1959.

When the Tories are out of power the Liberals are blamed for tight money and high interest rates. When the Tories are in power they disclaim all responsibility and place that responsibility on the Bank of Canada and the chartered banks. When the Tories are out, the government of the day is the villain; when the Tories are in the government the Bank of Canada is the whipping boy. When the Tories are out they see one side of the penny; but when the Tories are in they flip the "Coyne".

When the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. MacRae) spoke yesterday I did not think he was completely satisfied. He made reference to the appointment of a minister for Atlantic affairs. This is what he said, as reported on page 2926 of Hansard:

> —perhaps the time has arrived when there should be appointed a minister of Atlantic affairs just as we have a minister of northern affairs.

I could not agree with a statement like that. In the first place the position of the provinces is quite different from that of the Northwest Territories. Again, I would have some very grave doubts about appointing a minister for Atlantic affairs, because all that would do would be to make a colonial office for the Atlantic provinces. I do not think the Atlantic premiers are very happy about it either.

I have here a page taken from today's Montreal Gazette, which contains an article headed "Regional monetary policy". Perhaps the Minister of Finance would listen to this. Then there is a subheading, "Atlantic premiers ask British banker's aid".

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Minister of Finance should listen to this.

[Mr. Batten.]

Mr. Batten: It goes on:

> The Atlantic provinces premiers have asked one of Britain's foremost bankers to study the effect of federal money policies on the Atlantic region, it was learned here. Sir Oliver Franks, chairman of Lloyds Bank, told them he would consider their request and give an answer in about 19 days.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would the hon. member permit me to suggest that he ought to speak possibly with a little more force so that the Minister of Finance, who is now engaged, could listen to this very important subject.

Mr. Batten: It continues:

> It is understood Franks has been asked to head a commission of three who would investigate the effect of Ottawa's money policies at first hand and submit recommendations or changes.

Surely this indicates that the premiers of the Atlantic provinces are not very happy with the monetary policy of the present government.

Going back to some of the promises which have been made by the Tory party, one can almost see the sky darkened by the flapping wings of chickens coming home to roost. Or we could look back over the long list of Tory promises on which this government was elected and, viewing them in the light of accomplishments, is it any wonder that the government should want to scorn the base degrees by which they did ascend.

Mr. Chambers: The best record in history.

Mr. Batten: You will have a job to prove it. I come now to a few comments concerning civil service salaries. For many months the government has had this question under consideration, but the shabby treatment accorded to members of the civil service last Thursday evening compounded all that was done before. Determination of civil service salaries is a joint responsibility of the civil service commission and the government as outlined in section 11 of the Civil Service Act. Generally the policy of the federal government has been to relate increases in salary to the remuneration received by workers in comparable fields. This policy was well defined in 1951 by the former prime minister, Mr. St. Laurent, when he said:

> As I have said on previous occasions, the government's policy in these matters is based on two main principles, first, that salary and pay scales and other conditions of employment in both the civil service and the armed forces should be such as to attract and retain persons of the right type and necessary qualifications; second, that having regard to ancilliary conditions of employment, remuneration for each class of work or employment should be generally in line with that paid for comparable work by good private employers.

On May 1, 1958, the Prime Minister expressed the same view in these words:

> For many years it has been generally accepted that two main principles should guide the determination of salaries in the service. First, the salaries must be enough to do the job, that is, to attract enough of the right kind of men and women into the service and keep them in it. Second, they must be fair as between civil servants and people outside the service—the taxpayers—which means that the salaries we pay for any class of work should be comparable with those paid by private employers for similar classes of work taking into account the other terms of employment that are necessary to make a fair comparison. I think these principles should continue to guide us.

In an effort to arrive at some satisfactory method of comparing civil service salaries with those in other fields the government in September, 1957 set up a pay research bureau following a similar development in the United Kingdom a year earlier. This bureau, under the direction of the civil service commission and the Department of Finance, made its first report which was followed by a report of the commission in the spring of 1958 stating that no general revision of salaries was warranted. At that time the government refused the request for salary increases and shifted the blame from the shoulders of the cabinet to the commission by tabling the report in the House of Commons. This report was not embarrassing to the government, because it could be used to support the cabinet's rejection of the civil service request, a rejection based on the government's financial position which had been brought about by the government's own financial ineptitude.

Further investigation was made by the bureau, and it was shown that some classes were receiving salaries 20 per cent below those paid by private employers. The overall picture revealed a gap of about 8 per cent. The commission's report based on these findings was not tabled in the House of Commons although it had been received about six weeks before the last session ended. Why was the 1959 report not tabled? Why was it considered to be confidential although the 1958 report had been made public? Obviously on this occasion the government could not use the commission as a whipping boy. Responsibility for the denial was now placed squarely in the lap of the government. Then, true to form, the government began its delaying tactics and returned the report for further examination.

Finally, on Friday, October 13—it was a most unlucky Friday for the civil service—the Minister of Finance flatly denied to accord the increases. This time, having no commission report to support his action, he proceeded immediately to muster public opinion and backing by stating that the salary raises which had been requested would cost $214 million which would be equivalent to an increase of 15 per cent in the income tax rates. One can hardly conceive of a more effective statement with regard to placing public opinion behind the minister's rejection and militating against a favourable attitude on the part of the taxpayers toward the civil servants' application.

The arithmetic by which the minister began with $50 million to meet an 8 per cent increase in salary and concluded with $242 million is devious and doubtful. The minister may not have intended to do so, but he certainly left the impression in the public mind that if the requested increases were granted the total amount would be an immediate charge on the treasury for the year 1959. The public may take a different view and consider that if almost $6 billion is to be collected by the Minister of Finance the spending of this money, while directed by the government, should be managed by those who are qualified to do so and who are sufficiently well paid to do so.

A few months ago the increases requested by the civil service were supposed to cost $242 million. In the next budget speech the minister stated that $15 million would be sufficient to provide increases for about one-third of the civil service. No wonder there is confusion and resentment. This whole matter has been poorly handled by the government. The arrogant manner in which the recommendations of the civil service commission were rejected; the minister's tabling of one report when it suited his purpose—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On a point of order. The minister never tabled any report.

Mr. Batten: I did not get that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member has said the minister tables reports when it suits his purpose. The minister has never tabled any report, and if there is any assertion that the 1958 report was tabled, that assertion is wrong.

Mr. Batten: If the hon. gentleman wishes to make a comment on what I am saying he will have ample opportunity when I am through.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, Mr. Speaker. This is a matter of privilege. The hon. gentleman has said the minister tables reports of the civil service commission when it suits his purpose—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a point of order—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I was speaking on a question of privilege.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am rising on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister wishes to make a correction with respect to what has been said by the hon. member who has the floor, and he raised that as a matter of privilege. I think the course to be preferred, if the hon. member who has the floor does not yield, is to make the correction at the conclusion of the speech. That is the better course to follow. It is one which is prescribed by the rules of the house although, perhaps, it is not one which is usually followed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Without labouring the point, may I say that the comment made by the hon. member is a reflection—and I think it was intended to be a reflection—upon myself. The hon. member said the minister does something when it suits his purpose. My answer is that the minister never did anything of the kind. He never tabled any report.

Mr. Speaker: If the minister thinks that there is a reflection on his conduct amounting to a question of privilege he can, of course, raise it at the time, and should do so.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is what I have done.

Mr. Batten: Mr. Speaker, if the Minister of Finance wants to talk I prefer that he do so in his own time. I would remind the house that there are three kinds of politicians, those who talk too much, those who tax too much and those exceptions who do both. The Minister of Finance is the exception.

In discussing these salaries I agree with the minister's class by class arrangement which I am sure will be welcomed by the civil servants but I am sure they will be concerned with the date of this revision and the date from which any increase will be effective. Certainly this revision was in the mind of the minister when he presented his budget. Why was the announcement not made then? Obviously, to the Minister of Finance a headline in the daily papers indicating a surplus was more important than the peace of mind of the civil servants.

I wish now to refer to the speech made on Tuesday last by my friend the hon. member for York-Sunbury. The hon. gentleman placed a table on the record at page 2925 of Hansard showing the amount of money spent under different headings in the years 1955 and 1959. There is some question in my mind as to why the hon. gentleman should pick the year 1955. I believe that if comparisons are to be made they should be made between significant years. Why not take the year 1945 or 1935?

The hon. gentleman then went on to give the amount of money being spent under different headings and referred, for example, to the trans-Canada highway. There has been no money spent by this government on the trans-Canada highway except that which would normally follow the initial legislation. The government has brought in no legislation to amend the act other than to provide the money that is normally required.

My hon. friend then went on to speak about the amount of money given to the Atlantic provinces for the acquisition of buildings and vessels. The question that comes to my mind is this. What about the 50 ships that were going to form the nucleus of a great Canadian mercantile fleet? What about the Canadian steamships down in Halifax harbour? Statements of this kind are wild and unfounded.

I am reminded of the occasion when the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) claimed that his government built the airport at Stephenville. That airport was constructed, had been officially opened and was being used before the election of 1957. I am also reminded of a statement made by the Prime Minister last November in the famous speech when he spoke about social justice and referred to the increases which had been given to the Canadian people under the heading of family allowances. I am sure the Canadian people have received no increases under the heading of family allowances as a result of any legislative action on the part of this government.

Mr. Speakman: Oh?

Mr. Pickersgill: None whatever.

Mr. Batten: Indeed, none whatever.

Mr. Speakman: They got promises, but nothing else before then.

Mr. Batten: I turn to the speech made by the Minister of Finance in Halifax, I believe last October. He referred to a number of things in the Atlantic provinces and although I do not believe he intended to do so directly he certainly left with the people to whom he was speaking the impression that these things were Conservative policies.

He referred, for example, to the feed freight assistance policy and went on to describe how important it was to the maritime provinces. It certainly is important but I know that this policy was initiated by the Liberal government in 1941. He went on to talk about the great benefits derived by the Atlantic provinces from the industrial development bank. That, too, came into being as a result of Liberal legislation passed in 1944.

The hon. gentleman went on further to talk about the Atlantic provinces' adjustment grants. Here I am going to give the minister full marks. I have said both inside this house and outside of it, and I shall say again, that in providing these special grants to the Atlantic provinces the minister has done a commendable job for which I give him full credit. He made reference to those grants in his speech on that occasion.

The hon. gentleman also referred to the subventions on coal, yet coal subventions were started in 1928, a year when a Liberal government was in power in this country. The minister's next reference is a dandy. He referred to the $15 million paid by the federal government toward the construction of the Canso causeway. Here again is a good Liberal project.

The hon. gentleman went on to talk about Camp Gagetown, another project initiated by the Liberal government. He spoke about the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act passed in 1944, the Farm Improvement Loans Act also passed in that year and also referred to freight rates in the maritime provinces stating that money had been granted to reduce the rates in those provinces, but they were reduced to 10 per cent from 17 per cent after the rates had been increased.

The minister when making his speech would have been more interesting to the people in the Atlantic provinces if he had made reference to special income tax concessions to industry locating there, if he had talked about the freight rate structure in the Atlantic provinces, low cost capital loans, consideration for the building of trunk highways, a greater allocation of defence spending and the tariff structure in relation to the maritimes. Those are things in which the people there are interested. However, we do give him credit for giving to the people of the maritimes a long list of Liberal accomplishments.

I turn now to a consideration of federal-provincial relations. We all know the story here. We know that during the 1957 election campaign the Prime Minister promised that if he were elected his government would call a federal-provincial conference immediately to settle some of the problems existing between the provincial governments and the senior government of this country. He said, for example, on April 25, 1957, in his opening campaign speech in Massey Hall:

> We intend to form a government to immediately convene a dominion-provincial conference to bring about a settlement of these problems, not in the spirit of arrogant domination as displayed by the present government, but in the spirit of unity and amity and with mutual tolerance and respect.

In the same speech he said:

> —a Conservative government, if elected, would immediately call a federal-provincial conference to settle existing problems.

I could cite a number of these references, but let us examine what has happened. A conference was called late in November. The premiers came, made their statements and went home with the promise of another meeting in January. No such meeting was ever called.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I must inform him his time has expired.

Mr. Nicholas Mandziuk (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, it was a pleasure to hear such enlightening addresses from the members of the opposition; it was a pleasure to hear political battles fought over again today; it was a pleasure to hear how many people are unhappy and in particular those sitting on the benches opposite. I felt that there might be some change in this world but yet it has not changed. The life and activity of this nation, both in production and development, are going on at a great pace in spite of the fact that the "experienced" hands of the gentlemen opposite are not at the helm of state. Because they are not at the helm of state they resort to every trick known to oratory to introduce doubt and timidity in the public mind. Do we need any proof of this statement? Just glance back at what has been going on during this session, during the last few months, few weeks or few days.

Not so long ago the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) gave us a very interesting and exhaustive review of the situation of Canadian trade. Canadians were happy to hear that our export trade was expanding, that we were gaining new markets. But, Mr. Speaker, this stunned the opposition for a while. Then when they regained their balance they charged him with too much optimism. "Oh, you are too optimistic. Things are not as good as you say. Oh, how much better they would be if we were sitting there instead of the place where the Canadian people put us."

I was going to make reference to a critical editorial in the Winnipeg Free Press. In view of the fact that the Minister of Trade and Commerce rose this afternoon on a question of privilege, it is already on the record and I am going to skip it.

Let us go to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green). Most of the country thinks he has done a wonderful job.

In spite of the fact that he is not as experienced as some of those men opposite, a lot of those experienced men opposite have their former colleagues at home biting their fingernails. Hon. members know that the Secretary of State for External Affairs spoke with pride of the role Canada is playing in world affairs, e.g. in the United Nations. This role is nothing to blush about. Canada's role and influence in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, in the British commonwealth of nations and in international affairs is probably out of proportion to our size and population. This role is owing to the leadership that our Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) has given.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs gave us the exact picture. What did we hear from the opposition? Oh, they joined in a chorus: You are too optimistic; Oh, this world is so dark; there are dark clouds on the horizon, thunder and lightning; hell will break loose unless the Canadian people realize that they have been fooled. Do they know why they are where they are? They are there because they fooled the Canadian people until they realized it.

I think the review of the Secretary of State for External Affairs filled us with pride. I think any person with any sense should appreciate criticism. I could refer to the words of President Eisenhower when he spoke to one of the Latin American nations, either Argentina or Brazil. He said, "We are not saints; we can make mistakes, but our hearts are in the right place." Are the hearts of these people who criticize in the right place? What do we hear from them? "Disarm, disarm", one section cries. "Oh, to arms, to arms", the other section cries. They accuse us of lack of leadership. I am trying to give the house my personal reactions, the reactions that I get as a backbencher, as a man with no political experience, the reaction I get from all this back-biting back and forth.

Let us go to another department. If the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) had any secret hopes that he would get any bouquets or prizes for bringing in a balanced budget he must be disappointed. When the minister budgeted for a deficit in previous years the hue and cry was: "You are driving this country into ruin; oh, you are spending money like a drunken sailor." Hon. members heard that, did they not? It was said, "You are spendthrifts; you are leading us into inflation that is going to be the ruin of this country. What does he know about finance?"

An hon. Member: Who is that?

Mr. Mandziuk: I am just repeating the words and the questions that they asked and the implications that they tried to put across to the people of this country. But, when the minister brings in a balanced budget they call it "cold porridge". That is what the expert financial critic said. They call it, "a do-nothing budget, a don't-budge budget; they say that the jobless were ignored", and so on down the line.

In the course of my remarks I shall give some of the reactions of the Canadian Press. But before I do so, I want to mention the criticism, or the so-called criticism, as it affected me. When interest rates were going up last summer we heard nothing more than the theme, "tight money, tight money". We even had some questions on the orders of the day. What are they saying today when interest rates are going down? There is not a peep from the other side. Why?

An hon. Member: They are all asleep.

Mr. Mandziuk: Oh, yes. It will be a long time before they wake up.

Mr. Deschatelets: We are enjoying your speech; it is very good.

Mr. Mandziuk: Thank you. I am giving it for your enjoyment. Let me refer to another department. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) was all but crucified, all but charged with treason, when under his instruction, direction and leadership the stabilization board changed the system of price supports on eggs and pork from outright purchase to deficiency payments. What did we hear in this house?

Mr. Michaud: The hon. member for Rosthern.

Mr. Mandziuk: Blue ruin. Barrels and barrels of tears were shed for the poor farmers. I too felt like crying for them because I knew they were not getting a square deal. But why the silence now? The Minister of Agriculture asked the house and the country to give the scheme a chance and I am beginning to think that the minister has some horse sense. Egg prices are going up and the opposition has not asked one single egg question or one omelet question up to this time. But I think that wonderful troupe is tuning up for a new chorus. There will be another chorus. Do you know what it is going to be? When the price of eggs reaches a certain level, a level of prices to which I think Canadian farmers are entitled, the opposition is going to be singing another chorus. In whose defence will they be crying? They will be saying that the poor consumer is going to suffer because the price of eggs is going up. They cry, they always cry.

I have tried to follow the criticism of the budget. I like to hear objective criticism.

We appreciate that. But all we hear are bits here and bits there. Do you remember the story—I think some hon. members will—about the six blind men of Hindustan who went to see the elephant. Each one touched a certain part of the elephant. The one who touched the ear said that the elephant was like a fan. The fellow who took hold of the elephant's tail said that it was like a whip or rope; he could not be convinced otherwise. The chap who got hold of the elephant's front leg said that it was very much like a tree. But the fellow who bumped his head against the body said that the elephant was like a wall. Then they started to fight among themselves as to who was right. That is what we get by way of criticism from the opposition.

Those of us who lack the political experience of the gentlemen in the opposition are astounded and bewildered by such tactics. But we have some common sense and common sense tells us that the aim of the opposition is to talk the country into another recession so that they can be given an opportunity to put on their tarnished and battered armour, get out their three-legged horse and pose as saviours of the people in the next election. If you will permit me, Mr. Speaker, I should like to read an extract from a newspaper article. How true are the words written by Nate White in the Christian Science Monitor of February 20 last. Mr. White is the business and financial editor of this paper and this is what he had to say under the headline, "Gloom-Talk Hobbles U.S. Boom". The article refers to the United States but I think it is most applicable to Canada. He said:

> A recession does not begin solely from talk, but talk plays an important part in it. Talk becomes publicity, and publicity in this highly communicative society multiplies. It is extremely easy to manufacture a recession almost literally out of thin air once the communication system gets in motion. This is what is happening now.

He is referring to the United States but that is what is happening right in this country and in this house. He went on to say:

> But if gloom, like a low-spreading fog, continues to creep throughout the nation, it can introduce doubts and timidity in public thought and eventually in business decisions. Before anyone hardly knows what has happened, a recession is upon us.

This must be the object of the opposition. The words of this eminent journalist are so applicable to the tactics and apparent plans of these people who were so long in power and so used to ruling this country that like children they are still crying for those sweet days when they were in power.

The budget has been introduced and the rules call for a maximum of eight days debate. Barrels and barrels of tears will be shed. In fact, several barrels of tears have been shed already. Eight days of debate costs the Canadian taxpayers a pretty penny. Therefore Canadians expect their elected representatives to give full and careful consideration to the manner in which the government raises money and the manner in which it spends it. The budget has been labelled as a cold porridge, do-nothing budget and everything else, but I maintain that it will have definite effects on every segment of our economy.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Mandziuk: As we adjourned at six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, one of my colleagues remarked on the fact that our friends, the Grits, were conspicuous by their absence, there being one frontbencher and two or three others present. But I was heartened by another colleague who said that when their leader teed off with a non-confidence motion on Monday, I think it was, with a very good factual criticism of our defence policy, he counted only 13 of his supporters during that one speech of his. I was therefore heartened. I have not lost heart. I was reflecting that they did not care to listen to an inconspicuous backbencher and that was the reason they had stayed away.

Mr. Deschatelets: I hope the hon. member has better arguments than that one.

Mr. Mandziuk: I am again reminded of the six blind men of Hindustan by this remark of my friend.

Taking the budget as a whole we should be happy, if for nothing else than the fact that there are no tax increases. I join those who have spoken previously in complimenting the Minister of Finance on a job well done. Hon. members do not need to take my word for it. I know in particular that members of the opposition often resort to opinions appearing in the press. May I be permitted to quote from the Winnipeg Tribune an editorial published on April 1, the day after the budget was presented. It states in part as follows:

> Just the same, the budget must have given many Canadians a great deal of quiet satisfaction. For the first time since 1957 the finances of the country were climbing out of the red into the black. Mr. Fleming was able to balance the 1960-61 budget and even forecast a small surplus.
> This means—

I hope the doubting Thomases will take this into account.

—that the inflationary effects of government fiscal operations should diminish considerably and that the competition for capital resulting from heavy federal government borrowing should ease off. This year Ottawa will borrow only $201 million compared with $900 million in 1959. The provinces and private agencies should be able to borrow for more of their growth needs in Canada rather than being forced into the U.S. money market.

I quote further:

The effects of this determination and effort are already being felt.

I ask my hon. friends to mark these words.

The bank rate—a barometer of tension in the nation's finances—has fallen to 3.26 per cent—

No wonder they do not ask how the bank rates are at the present time.

—after a steady eight-week decline.

Mr. Fleming is further complimented in this editorial as follows:

The essence of Mr. Fleming's budget speech and the budget itself was middle-of-the-road moderation. The same can hardly be said for the initial criticism of the budget by William Benidickson, Liberal financial critic. It is his job to criticize and to tear budgets apart, but statements like "shocker" and "I don't know when a country has lost so much ground in so short a time" simply detract from a serious opposition assessment of the government's financial shortcomings.

That is the opinion of an extremely responsible paper. I recollect that the other day—I think it was on Tuesday—this same hon. gentleman, namely the financial critic of the official opposition, appeared on television and was asked what he would do. His answer, as probably those who saw that broadcast are aware, was this, "We would consult experts and we would do something". They had time in which to do something for a good many years.

However I should like to come nearer home and come to the capital. May I be permitted to quote a bit from the Ottawa Journal dated April 1, the day after the budget was introduced? It states as follows:

This is Mr. Fleming's answer to the pessimists who, within the past two years, saw deficit spending bringing possible budget deficits of a billion dollars, spoke of mounting debt and inflation threatening fiscal ruin.

The Jeremiahs who talked that way forgot Donald Fleming; forgot the Calvinistic finance minister who knew his stuff and did his homework and had the courage to say "no". The man who said "no" on civil service salaries—

Although they threatened to jump through the roof, as one hon. gentleman has remarked. They should attend to their business in offices instead of trying to jump through roofs away out west.

—said "no" to his ministerial colleagues, said "no" in the treasury board. Come hell or high water, the line would be held.

[Mr. Mandziuk.]

That is Donald Fleming as described in the Ottawa Journal. The editorial goes on to say this about the minister's estimates:

Hopeful guesses? Perhaps; but Mr. Fleming's past guesses have been amazingly good—his estimate a year ago of national income and the deficit came within fractions of being right.

In any event, come what may short of war, pestilence or other catastrophe, we have left big deficit budgets behind, for the time being at any rate; have struck our fiscal tents, with promise of prosperity ahead.

That is the local paper. I know the charge may come forth that these two papers that a backbencher has quoted are always favourable to the Tories but how about quoting from a paper which is favourable to the Grits? An extremely eminent journalist, who at least has grit tendencies with a small "g", namely John Bird, writing in the Toronto Star, stated this. May I quote part of his article? I respect the gentleman's judgment because I believe he showed good judgment when he was writing this article. Here is what he says:

However, the budget itself does bring Canada some way toward meeting the conditions which Coyne lays down—

Although very reluctantly, he still admits something, does he not? I continue the quotation:

—namely a reduction in the rate of our increasing dependence on foreign financing. It's roundabout, but it's there.

That is important. I do not care how the minister obtains it but he has obtained it. I come back to the quotation:

More important even than a small budgetary balance is the cut-back in estimated "cash requirements", that is in the need for the government to borrow money outside. For the coming year cash requirements for which the government will have to go to the money market are estimated at only $201 million as against $900 million last year and $1,273 million the year before.

That indicates that there is a very favourable reaction to this year's budget. Time does not permit, but I could quote for hours from various papers across the country showing a favourable response to this budget, this "cold porridge budget". True, some items show concern. I think we are here for the purpose of giving every item in the budget our serious consideration. I will share with you, Mr. Speaker, what disturbs me, and that is the statement by the Minister of Finance that the tariff was going to be increased on textiles.

Textiles immediately made me think of Japan. What effect would these tariff increases have on our trade with that country? I am going to paraphrase the minister's remarks he made to the Saskatchewan board of trade on February 19. He said that we westerners are very touchy at the mention of anything that may endanger disposal of our wheat, because next to the United Kingdom Japan has become our second best customer for this product of the soil. Japan purchased $70 million worth in 1959. Western Canada depends so much on this country buying our foodstuffs.

I can well recall letters written by farm leaders from the west at the news that there were some negotiations going on between this government and the government of Japan about the cut-back on some of the imports coming in from that friendly country. The farm organizations were very disturbed and wrote letters to the Prime Minister and to the government. This same subject occupied a lot of space in the briefs presented by the interprovincial farm union as well as in the brief presented by the union federation of agriculture.

I myself was disturbed and wanted to find out what was the situation in fact, and I found the answer in the minister's address to the Saskatchewan board of trade on February 19 of this year. I would advise those hon. gentlemen who have not read this address to do so, because I think it throws a lot of light on this matter and it enlightened me about some of these matters which really disturbed me. I quote from this address, page 18:

> There are two particular features of the agreement which are noteworthy. The first is the escape clause whereby Canada reserves the right to apply fixed values for duty in the event of damage to Canadian industry; the second, the provision for consultation whereby each country undertook to give sympathetic consideration to representations made by the other. You should know that in the six years which have elapsed since the signing of the trade agreement with Japan, Canada has not once resorted to this special escape clause. We have been able to resolve our problems through frank and friendly consultations. This is the way of friends, and I assure you that both Canada and Japan would very much like to continue in this spirit of friendly co-operation.

That shows the basis of agreement between us and Japan. We know for a fact that in 1959 Japanese exports to Canada amounted to $105 million; $25 million of those Japanese imports, one quarter, were textiles. They affected our textile industry; I realize that.

But as a good friend and customer, Japan imposes restraints on exports to Canada. That is in accordance with the terms of the treaty. She recognizes that exports to Canada must proceed gradually and that she must avoid a disruption of Canadian markets. Japan recognizes that she must avoid excesses or flooding of Canadian markets with any one particular commodity.

I had to have two questions answered to be satisfied in my mind that the textile industry in Canada was an industry of sufficient importance, because we of the west, the woolly west, do not recognize the importance of some of these industries to Canada. I looked at the Canada Year Book and I found some very interesting facts, although the Canada Year Book of 1959 only contains statistics and records for 1956. But I found that there were 3,776 textile, clothing and woollen mills employing almost 200,000 people. That is a good sized industry.

Then I went further and searched to see whether there was any such animal in Manitoba, that young province which entered confederation in 1870. To my surprise I found that Manitoba had 37 textile mills, four knitting mills and 154 clothing establishments. This industry employed around 7,000 people. All in all there is around 200,000 people employed, and that means that if every family has an average of three or four members, there are about 800,000 human beings who depend for their bread and butter on work in our textile industry.

That impressed me because of the fact that this government recognized the importance of the agricultural industry. Therefore, the simple answer is, why not recognize the importance of the textile industry? If it gives a living to almost one million people in Canada, why should it not receive some consideration? This government has given consideration to improving the conditions of the agricultural industry by various enactments, such as farm improvement legislation, farm credit, acreage payments, cash advances, price stabilization, and shared assistance to farmers to compensate them for grain snowed under.

I had, too, another question which should be answered, because I realize we have to keep our people employed. Will this increase in tariff rates endanger our trade with Japan? I am watching the clock, Mr. Speaker, and I could quote from the address of the Minister of Finance, as reported in Hansard at pages 681 and 682 of February 3 last. I could read extracts from his address in Saskatoon at page 20, but time does not permit.

There it is shown that our trade with Japan is on the increase, that in the three months of November, December and January just past it has gone up. That is very encouraging. I am glad the Japanese understand that we cannot permit an influx in large volume of any particular manufactured product, because what Japan sends to us are finished manufactured products which compete with products made in Canada, while we sell to them raw products, foodstuffs, wheat, or products of the mine and of the soil. But having asked these two questions, I think I can safely meet with very little fear any criticism by farmers out west and prove to them that this industry was entitled to this recommendation of the tariff board. It was not a decision of one man but of the whole board. It deserves some consideration.

In closing, I should like to give a few words of warning, not to the minister, because I think he is doing his best, but to industry. I hope the textile industry does not take this as a licence or as an excuse for raising the prices of their products. I hope that labour does not take this as a licence to ask for, and strike for higher wages. The Minister of Finance has asked us to hold the line. He is asking everyone to hold the line, including the big corporations.

As a man who grew up and grew old out in the west, I can say that this price squeeze in which the farmer finds himself caught today is the result of rising costs. I should like to read in the press that there has been a cut-back in the profits made by the corporation, profits which in some cases have reached astronomical figures. This is what is causing the price squeeze. I do not attribute to labour, in the main, the causes for these rising prices. I believe that our labour is efficient. I believe that for a dollar's worth of work our labour produces more than any other labour on earth. But I feel everyone must co-operate. This appeal made by the Minister of Finance to all of us to hold the line applies to the corporations, also.

I wish to repeat that the reason we are being priced out of the markets of the world, and the cause of this price squeeze, is rising costs. I am prepared to grant tariff protection but, again, I say I hope industry does not take this tariff protection as licence. We have to get our labour working but we also have to be prepared to compete with goods coming from Japan or from any other country. Of course, we want to trade with Japan as well, because trade is a two-way street.

In closing I should like to quote the words of the Minister of Finance as they appear on the official record of this house:

> So long as our access to foreign markets is unimpaired and we are able to keep the cost and the quality of our products and services thoroughly competitive we need have no fear for the future.

I think that applies to everyone. It applies to big business, small business and everyone alike.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I rise to support the subamendment, and in order to relate it directly to my remarks I should like to quote it again at this time:

> That the amendment be amended by striking out the period after the word "unemployment" and adding thereto the following words:
> 'and in the opinion of this house the solution of these problems requires amongst other things that the government give consideration to the following measures:
> 1. The planned elimination of wasteful defence expenditures,
> 2. The provision of a self-liquidating public investment program,
> 3. The provision of an appropriate capital gains tax.'

Before proceeding with my remarks, I do want to say that I enjoyed a number of the speeches which have been made by hon. members in this debate on both sides of the house. Whether I agree with them or not, I like people to get up and express themselves and tell the house where they stand—although I must say we are decidedly under the impression before they rise that we know where they stand.

I was particularly interested in the very thoughtful speech which was made this afternoon by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) especially when he referred to the international situation and the contest going on in the world today; the struggle of ideas between those who believe in democratic institutions and those who are supporting forms of dictatorship.

I listened carefully and with interest to the speech made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming). I have listened to the minister for 12 years as a pessimist in this house, and three years as an optimist. I listened very carefully the other evening when the minister was speaking, with his Cromwellian stance, preaching the doctrines of Gladstonianism, doctrines of retrenchment and reform in the nugatory accents of Bay street.

While I was listening to the hon. gentleman I was inclined to think of past days, and I was reminded how much the minister resembled in his ideas and his mannerisms a very old friend of mine, an old Kootenay pioneer. As soon as I mention that magic word "Kootenay" I see all faces turned this way as if I was about to open the doors to paradise. Anyway, he was an excellent person. He performed the role of a minor tax collector and collected money due for mining licences, fishing licences, dog licences, and that sort of thing. He was a scion of the house of Buccleuch in Scotland. He was a Presbyterian elder, a man of unquestioned integrity, untainted virtue and as stubborn as a mule. He had another interesting facet to his character. He flew a Union Jack in front of his premises every day and, as a matter of fact, he had a Union Jack always on one desk or table in his office. I have heard of someone else who had a Union Jack draped on his desk in this house. But, as I said before, he was an excellent character, a lifetime friend of mine who combined in his person all the characteristics of John Knox and Scrooge.

His family motto was: Always balance the budget. He was known as Walter Balance the Budget. I will illustrate what a good chancellor of the exchequer he was in his official capacity and in his domestic affairs, too. I remember being in a post office on one occasion when he went in to post some papers. He used to send the Vancouver newspaper to his brother in Australia. He handed the paper in, and the postmaster handed it back and said: It is a cent short. It will take another cent stamp.

He looked at him for a moment. "Ah, my boy," he said, "hand it me back, I'll take it home and cut out the advertisements." He promptly walked home, took an hour or so to cut out the advertisements, walked back and mailed the paper. Naturally he was a Conservative. Why I was reminded of this gentleman when the minister was speaking is because he always believed in balancing the budget. It is always wise to do so so far as the current account or daily or annual consumption is concerned, but to be successful as chancellor of the exchequer you must do more. You must have fiscal policies that make the best use of the human and natural resources you have in the country.

This old gentleman was well off in natural resources. He owned miles of timber limits and a good number of mineral claims which he never developed because he would always insist on balancing the budget and would not develop them until he had accumulated sufficient surplus so to do and he never accumulated that surplus. He died after 50 years of waiting for a surplus without having developed his resources because he wanted to balance the budget and was not willing to secure credit based on his natural resources or undertake a self-liquidating enterprise in the interest of the country.

When the minister was speaking I could not help but think of this ancient friend and very fine gentleman because in many respects I think the minister resembles him. We can learn a lesson from the faults of this humble chancellor of the exchequer and so can our present chancellor of the exchequer. I want it understood that my comments are directed to the minister in his official capacity because as a private citizen I know he is one of the kindest men who has ever picked the pockets of a helpless taxpayer.

I realize that the minister has to budget within the terms of reference of the capitalist system which provides certain limitations. My criticisms and the alternatives I propose to government budgeting are based on the socialist philosophy and outlook which of course means that instead of placing profits first we must consider humanity first.

We live in an expanding economy producing an abundance for all and exporting large quantities of goods. We have the abundance but what do we have against that? At the lowest estimate, the one accepted by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr), we have at the present time approximately one half million unemployed. That is the situation facing us. Unemployment is a serious and continuing problem in all its various aspects whether it is seasonal, occupational, regional, structural, technological or otherwise. This is a serious disease of modern capitalist society.

Anyone who reads books or daily, weekly or monthly publications knows there is an increasing interest on the part of economists in this aspect of modern society, continuing unemployment regardless of the prosperity of the majority.

To support my argument I shall quote a few brief paragraphs from an article by Edwin Copps which appeared in Saturday Night, issue of April 2, 1960. He writes what I consider a helpful article on the subject entitled "The Stubborn Facts About Unemployment" which appeared under the heading "Ottawa Letter":

> One of the minor tragedies of parliamentary battles is that their most important aspects are quickly forgotten. Politics creates most of its clamour about trifles. People remember the points that don't matter and miss the points that do.

There is much truth in that. I continue:

> For example, if Canadians remember anything about the most recent debate on unemployment it will be that most of the squabbling was about figures. They will recall that the opposition claims that nearly 900,000 persons were unemployed this winter while the government believes half a million were without work and looking for it.

That depends upon which side of the house you sit. I continue:

> This bickering masks the main malignancy of our economic life. It is the fact that our nation has within it a tumour that won't go away. It is a hard nub of persistent unemployment, a continuing surplus of labour in some parts of Canada. In good times and bad, it would appear, we have less than "full employment".
> In the rare moments of enlightenment when it was not gazing at two sets of troublesome figures, like a snake before the beady eyes of a mongoose, the House of Commons saw clearly something it was loath to admit. What it saw was this: we only enjoy full employment in wartime. At other times, even relatively prosperous ones like the present, many of our people are either on relief or sipping at the weak brew provided by unemployment insurance benefits.

Regardless of which side of the house we sit on I think as realists trying to find solutions to the difficult problems that face us—and no one suggests there is an overnight solution—we must recognize the disease. In this case the disease is continuing unemployment in some of the sectors of modern society.

At the same time we realize as this problem exists we find various veterans organizations urging a 33⅓ per cent increase in the pensions of disability pensioners. Simultaneously, the veterans organizations urge an improvement in war veterans allowances particularly with respect to permissive income and some other aspects of war veterans allowance legislation. These increases are requested by organizations that are in close touch with veterans because they realize the people concerned require some adjustment in the pensions or allowances they receive to meet the changing cost of living in recent years.

We also find that many of our senior citizens lack the necessities of life and simple comforts. I have had the opportunity to visit senior citizens in my constituency who receive old age assistance or old age security. I have seen the dire necessity occasioned in most cases by living in larger places where much of the pension or assistance, is consumed by rent. I have seen the need of these people who have borne the heat of the day and instead of spending their lives in a measure of security and comfort exist with a great deal of discomfort lacking in many cases the bare necessities of life. I am sure that all hon. members have received correspondence on this question or have seen resolutions from organizations directly concerned with the welfare of senior citizens.

Unemployment, the needs of veterans and the needs of our senior citizens are problems that face us. Then, we have our civil servants who in many cases are receiving salaries below the prevailing rates in the districts in which they live. The evidence of the need of that increase is to be found by anyone who has read the excellent briefs brought to the attention of the government and hon. members. I am unfamiliar with all of the details as to the schedule of salaries, details as to the classifications, and so forth, but after reading those briefs I am distinctly of the opinion that our civil servants are entitled to adjustments in their salaries, wages and so on. We are glad that the government has at last started to recognize the just claims of the civil servants. Here is another group, a very important group in Canada rendering a service to this country, which has placed before the government its needs with respect to salary adjustments. I mention these few important segments of our population only to illustrate the points I wish to make. There are others, but time will not permit me to deal with them now.

[Mr. Herridge.]

What are the facts in relation to, shall I say, our opportunity to meet this demonstrated need? I do want to make it clear that I am not one who believes in unsound finance. By that I mean I recognize that budgets generally, except in times of emergency, as far as current revenue and current expenditure are concerned, should be balanced, and the suggestions I wish to make will be along these lines. I am not one who has lived on what you would call a bed of comfort all my life. I have known what hard work is, saving my pennies for a rainy day. That sort of experience inclines one to be fairly sound when making suggestions dealing with financial matters.

But what are the facts? I have stated some of the needs that have to be met. This year, as I heard the minister, it is estimated our gross national product will be $54.6 billion. The minister informed us that an amount equal to a quarter of that would be capital invested in Canada this year. The minister also informed us that in 1959 we had the largest exports in the history of Canada. Last year, when we had somewhere between 500,000 and 900,000 unemployed in this country, we exported $5 billion worth of goods, and we want exports. That is the position of the government as a whole with respect to the gross national product, anticipated capital investments in 1960, and the export situation last year which the minister expects to be improved this year.

What about profits? I am going to give only three or four illustrations. Last year was a most profitable year for business people in Canada. Since we live under the capitalist system I am not one to suggest for a moment that it is a criminal offence to make a profit because I realize business cannot exist under capitalism without making a profit. But I do want to bring to the attention of the house the excellent showing that some of the companies made last year, and the possibility this offers for the Minister of Finance when he is looking for funds to meet the needs that I have mentioned.

The Bell Telephone Company, the largest privately owned company in Canada, showed a net profit of more than $50 million, which was 29.3 per cent over the year 1958. The British Columbia Telephone Company, which we dealt with recently in the form of a bill presented to the house, second in size to the Bell Telephone Company, had a net profit in 1959 of $6.6 million, over 60 per cent higher than in 1958. The New Brunswick Telephone Company, privately owned, showed a net profit of more than $2 million in 1959; this was 33.7 per cent more than in 1958.

Let us take a look at a few of the other large corporations. Dominion Tar and Chemical had a good year, with a net profit of 53.8 per cent over 1958, amounting to $11 million. The British American Oil Company had a net profit in 1959 amounting to over $25 million, a 25 per cent increase over the year 1958. Abitibi Power and Paper Company showed a net profit of $11.8 million for 1959, a 22.5 per cent increase over 1958. International Nickel had a net profit of $85 million in 1959, more than double the 1958 profit.

I suggest that not only is it the duty of the opposition to criticize the government's policy or policies but to offer constructive alternatives to government policy. Before doing that I want to say that I have thought very seriously about this question because over the years I have come to the conclusion that time is running out for those who refuse to recognize the changes that are taking place. On the one hand, we have a growing economic dictatorship known as monopoly capitalism which is daily freezing out the genuinely free enterprise practised by small manufacturers and businessmen. This is occurring in every part of this country. On the other hand, we have the political dictatorship of communism.

We in the C.C.F. group, believing in democratic principles, believing in parliamentary institutions, believe there is a middle course. We call it a dual or mixed economy, representing an understanding of human nature, Canadian psychology, Canadian history and Canadian traditions, and that we can do something to find a middle way between those two extremes before it is too late. This is why this group continues to put forward to the house the policies it does. Unless we do this, Mr. Speaker, there is a day coming—and it is not far off—when there is going to be a clash between extreme views, because if you remove all the economic diversification from democratic society you will have placed democratic society into two clearly defined groups; on the one side the monopolistic owners, and on the other side the workers recognizing the fact that that is the position they must continue to occupy in society for all time.

How can we meet those current needs that I have mentioned? I have made these rough calculations. I am not suggesting that they are exact but I think they are approximately exact. I will deal with current account first. I think that any person who goes into debt for his needs is going to become bankrupt very soon. When it comes to current account we have to pay as we go, and we can do that and provide for the needs of the people of this country.

I estimate that a 33⅓ per cent increase in disability pensions will cost $50 million. The amount required under the War Veterans Allowance Act will cost approximately $7 million. To pay our senior citizens at this time—I am suggesting this figure—an extra $10 a month to which they are entitled would cost $130 million. The cost of increasing our civil servants' salaries I am going to place at $50 million. That makes a total of $237 million that we have to find for this current account expense involved in carrying on the day to day life of these people. Can we do it? With revenue estimated by the minister this year of $5,892 million, $237 million does not seem a very large figure to satisfy the needs of these very large groups in our society. We suggest that these needs can be met. They can be met first, as we say in our amendment, by the planned elimination of wasteful defence expenditures, and for a start we will use the figure of $300 million. I believe there is a reduction this year of around $90 million in defence expenditures.

We in this group are quite confident that every dollar that is being spent on the Bomarc is being wasted. We are quite confident that if the government pruned wasteful defence expenditure we could save $300 million for a start, and I think I am very conservative with that estimate. Not only do I say that but I predict that this government will be doing just that inside of a year or two because of the change of circumstances with defence.

We also urge an appropriate provision for a capital gains tax. This is a rather difficult tax to estimate. I have gone to a number of sources for information, and I estimate that we can obtain approximately $100 million a year from that tax. There is such a tax in the United States and the United Kingdom, and for the life of me I cannot see why a person should win $100,000 in a sweepstake and not pay a cent of tax while some poor chap working hard every day has to pay income tax if he earns above a certain level. There is a large field for the operation of a capital gains tax. When we refer to an appropriate capital gains tax we are not suggesting for a moment that we should take away the benefits that a man derives when he sells his home or farm property and moves from one place to another, but there are appropriate areas in which a capital gains tax can be applied.

According to the figures I have drawn up that makes a total of about $400 million as against requirements of $237 million. We in this group are definitely of the opinion that by taking that course we can, without any imbalance of the budget, provide for these people who are appealing to the government for assistance and help at this time to remedy their present circumstances.

What about unemployment? I have left unemployment to the last because we in this group are of the opinion that unemployment, continuing problem that it is and related as it is to fiscal, investment and resource development policies, is not going to be solved out of current revenue. It will have to be solved as the result of a national investment program.

What do we need in this young country? There is need for a national highways system. I am not going to deal with that fully because I think there is a bill still before the house. But we have only to read a number of publications and resolutions in recent days to realize the enormous amount of money we are losing in tourist trade because of our highway system in Canada. The main reason for our unfavourable balance at the present time as far as the tourist industry is concerned is the condition of our highways in Canada. That is indicated in United States publications.

We need hospitals. My goodness, in the city of Ottawa people cannot get into a hospital. I have heard of people waiting for 10 days, two weeks and so on, and that condition prevails in many places. Should that condition prevail in a civilized society producing the immense amount of wealth that we are? We also need schools. There is a great need for rural redevelopment, which this government has recognized. At this point I want to say that I have been very interested in reading the proceedings of the Senate committee dealing with land use in Canada. I think they are doing very useful work. That is the sort of thing that can be done very well by the Senate. They can take their time, and I am not saying that in a jocular sense. Studies of this sort are not easily made by members of the house when they are burdened with the work of the house committees and correspondence. I think the members of the Senate committee are doing very useful work and as a result have obtained some most useful information.

There is a tremendous need in Canada for rural redevelopment and for the relocation of about 25 per cent of the farming population from marginal to satisfactory economic farm units. This has been proceeding in the United States. This is a field in which something practical can be done as a result of federal, provincial and community co-operation.

Look at the need for power. Look at the difficulty we are having in British Columbia and with respect to the development of that great natural resource, the Columbia river. Look at the opportunity there for the federal and provincial governments.

It is for that reason that we propose the provision of a self-liquidating public investment program. As long as it is self-liquidating it is a sound program because it is for the development and utilization of natural resources which brings returns. In doing so we bring together to the advantage of the community as a whole idle human resources and idle natural resources.

It will require planned fiscal and development policies to overcome the unemployment that is with us at this time and which will continue with us in any circumstances under our present system. We in this group say this. Because we believe in this mixed economy we believe that governments, whether federal or provincial, have to face the fact that they have to take the leadership with respect to the public sector of the economy. There is a public sector that definitely requires development. We say, let the private banks supply the capital needs and the capital requirements of the private sector of industry and development in this country and let the Bank of Canada supply the credit that is required for a national investment program.

The security is there as has been evidenced in recent years. Mr. Wenner-Gren comes to British Columbia and gets an option, as it were, on 40,000 square miles of British Columbia with huge water resources, huge forest resources, huge land resources, in short, an empire. What did his representatives do when they came before the Senate committee last year? For what did they plead? Mr. Mainwaring's adopted children came before the Senate committee and wanted the government to impose export of power taxation by order in council so they could bargain with any government in the future as to the taxes they would pay. They came before this committee and definitely said they were going to raise $500 million. What is the security? The natural resources of the people of British Columbia.

It is the same with the pulp and paper industry. One company in that province gets a timber management licence and is immediately able to go to New York and raise $200 million. What is the security? The natural resources owned by the people. We have hydro companies doing the same thing. We say that people seem to be hypnotized by the idea that money can only be created by private institutions. Under these circumstances the lending of money is a racket and an imposition on the people of this country. I am not blaming the individuals concerned. The responsibility does not rest on them. Things are changed when enough people understand the situation and are alerted to it.

What we say is this. Why not use the national credit of Canada through the Bank of Canada, using the natural resources of Canada as the security or the base for a national investment and development program? We suggest that is one way in which to provide stability and more regularity of income in this country. It can be planned between the federal government and the provinces to fill up the gaps in unemployment at the most serious periods.

This afternoon, when the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) was speaking he mentioned our responsibility to the underdeveloped nations and the fact that democracy was challenged throughout the world. That is another aspect of our program that we believe in. The hon. member mentioned the disparity of annual income, between an average of $2,000 a year on the North American continent and $60 a year in India. There is no question about it, that situation cannot continue indefinitely. In the ordinary process of economics it will destroy us through an expanding population.

Democratic institutions are in danger. If we are going to meet our responsibilities abroad and do the things at home that are required at this time and in the future full production is essential to meet the needs.

I am nearing the end of my speech, Mr. Speaker, I have not had the opportunity to go into detail but I suggest that these are some of the alternative proposals, put forward by this party in order to provide full production in Canada and consequently full employment and to provide an opportunity for the government to fulfil its obligations to Canadians at home and needy persons abroad.

In conclusion, may I say this? We ask the government and the minister to give serious consideration to these proposals advanced in good faith.

Mr. M. E. Barrington (Chateauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie): Mr. Speaker, my first words must be directed to paying respects to you on behalf of my electors and myself, having regard to the honoured position you hold in this house. I also at this time want to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) on the excellent budget he brought down one week ago tonight. I think this budget is appropriate and sane. We have heard a great deal of criticism, one way or another; but when we look back over the last three years we find that we inherited a recession which, had it not been for the good work of the present government under the capable leadership of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), could easily have developed into a depression and a severe one at that.

The present government, through its timely action, avoided this threat. Today we have a balanced budget. Over the past week end I had occasion to speak with several of my electors, and I am happy to say to the minister through you, Mr. Speaker, that I heard nothing but the most favourable of comments on the budget that was brought down one week ago tonight.

I think a further proof of the value of this budget as it has been brought down and of how well it has been received by the electorate in general across Canada is shown by the criticism made by the opposition. They are really floundering. They are looking for something to criticize. They are extremely disappointed in the budget, we know, because it is too good for their liking. We have heard such things as this. When they were asked what they would do, they said, "We would consult the experts" or "We would do something". I think the best experts to consult are the electors of Canada. Were they asked today in a poll what they would do I think they would give the same reply as that which they gave in 1957 and 1958. I think all will agree that the reply given at that time was most definite. The criticism of the opposition that I have heard to date—and I think I am a fairly regular attendant here in the house—reminds me somewhat of the housewife who is trying to make gravy without grease. The ingredients will not stick together and the people will not eat it.

I should also at this time like to congratulate the government and especially the Minister of Finance upon the proposed program for the civil service. I have a fair number of civil servants in my constituency and I know they are happy about the present plans. They look forward to a general improvement in their rate of salary. It is not all going to happen at once. They understand this fact. They are willing to accept it. The point about which I am extremely happy in the civil service plan is that it is going to help the man in the civil service with the lower salary. In other words, this is a plan to help the needy and not the greedy.

I have the honour to represent three counties in the province of Quebec, namely the counties of Chateauguay, Huntingdon and Laprairie. This being my maiden speech in the house I should like to take hon. members on a short tour through my constituency.

The counties are located in the southwestern part of Quebec and are bordered by the St. Lawrence seaway on the east and by the county of Beauharnois-Salaberry on the north, the remainder being bordered by the state of New York and a section of the constituency of St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville.

As the county of Laprairie has a population composed to the extent of some 90 per cent of French speaking Canadians, I am pleased to represent my electorate there in the French language.

(Translation):

Laprairie constituency is located on the south shore of the St. Lawrence river, directly opposite the city of Montreal. As will therefore easily be realized, it represents an important section of the St. Lawrence seaway. Cote Ste. Catherine, the Laprairie basin, Candiac, Caughnawaga—are all places that we often hear about and which are situated in this important constituency. Farms and beaches along the river have all vanished from that area, as did the beautiful scenery of the great St. Lawrence. Many sites have been bought for future industrial expansion; a large industrial centre is under construction there. Population is rapidly increasing and, in this regard, I urge the Postmaster General (Mr. Hamilton) to consider the advisability of providing the electors of Laprairie with a letter carrier service.

Already, with the St. Lawrence seaway, the numerous railways, the well kept roads, the riding has become an ideal site for the development of new industries, and I intend to do all I can to attract new industries and, at the same time, to co-operate fully with the authorities in this regard.

I have in mind something you have probably heard about, and I refer to a project as important as the St. Lawrence seaway itself. You have probably guessed that I mean the deepening of the Richelieu river. The Richelieu will be deepened some day. It has to be done because the whole country needs it, because we need it and our neighbours to the south need it too. Some people suggest deepening the Richelieu from Sorel as far as lake Champlain. Others believe it would be more advantageous and more useful to dredge this canal inland, from Ste. Therese island on the Richelieu to the vicinity of Longueuil.

I have a third project in mind. I refer to a canal starting at Ste. Therese island, on the Richelieu, and cutting through the land to the area just outside Laprairie. One of the great benefits from such a scheme would be to shorten the distances and reduce construction costs. Moreover, the canal would end up in a new area, where it would be easy to do some city planning and provide appropriate residential, commercial and industrial zoning. This third project would obviously be of considerable benefit not only to the city of Laprairie but also to the surrounding area, on the south shore, and to the whole constituency.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, my home county is the county of Chateauguay, the county where history was made on October 26, 1813 when Colonel Charles-Michel de Salaberry, with a few hundred soldiers and a friendly band of Indians, won immortal fame by successfully defeating the American invaders who had invaded Lower Canada and were marching on the city of Montreal. This is where the all important battle of Chateauguay was fought and won, and it is one of the great historical sites of our country.

The other county I have the honour to represent is the county of Huntingdon, which stretches from the Indian reserve at St. Regis across the river from Cornwall to the Richelieu river, and has some 50 miles of frontier with our neighbours to the south in the state of New York.

The two counties of Chateauguay-Huntingdon form what is known as the Chateauguay valley, and here dairy farming is the principal industry. In fact, it is considered to be one of the more important of its kind in the whole of Canada. Here a large percentage of the fluid milk consumed in the city of Montreal is produced. We have excellent soil and growing conditions, and all in all it is considered a very prosperous farming community.

Great pride is taken in the fine dairy herds raised throughout this area, and we have a good export market to the United States of purebred cattle and other livestock. In fact, it is not uncommon for cattle to be shipped from this area to such places as South America and many of the other Latin countries.

If I may be permitted to insert a little commercialism at this time I should like to say that in this fertile and prosperous valley, to be more explicit, my home town of Ormstown, Quebec, each year is held an agricultural and livestock exhibition. It is held in the second week in June and I would like to take this opportunity, through you, sir, to invite anyone interested in a good livestock and agricultural exhibition to be my guest at this fair, which is often called the Little Royal, and is known as the biggest fair in the smallest town in Canada.

As I have stated, the main industry in the counties I have the honour to represent is that of dairy farming. Dairy farming is a subject we hear very little about in this house. I have been rather disappointed, I might say, about this, since I have come into the house. We hear a great deal of another type of farming, but I fear we do not hear enough about the dairy farming industry.

I should like at this time to discuss this industry, but first let us take a look at the man who operates as a dairy farmer. What is he made up of? What kind of individual is he? There are two words which answer this question: he is a hard-working man. A dairy farmer today starts before sunrise and goes long after sunset. To be a successful dairy farmer a man must not only be hard-working but must be practically a jack of all trades and master of many. For example, he must be, in part, a veterinarian, an agronomist, a machinist. He has to be an expert in so many fields and in a goodly number of them he must be highly qualified.

We hear statements that the dairy farmer is enjoying great prosperity. With this I cannot agree. He has possibly shown a certain degree of prosperity in the last few years. But this has all come about by good management and efficiency on his part. The way things are in the dairy farming industry today, the dairy farmer is not getting the protection that other industries are enjoying. We know we have surpluses in dairy farm products, but I think these surpluses are because of the efficiency of the dairy farmer. We know that in the last few years he has been able to produce more; he has been able to place his commodity on the market, and I think especially of butter where a surplus has been built up of this product. Very well. Suppose this surplus has been built up due to the efficiency of the farmer. Why should the farmer be penalized because he is an efficient operator? We have to find a cure for this situation.

The dairy farmer has a great deal with which to contend. He must face many difficulties. He has to gamble with the weather. He has to gamble with the moods of the people in general, and he has a difficult market in which to compete. Workers in other spheres—workers in industry, for example—can go on strike through their labour unions if they are not happy about the way things are going. But the farmer would look very foolish if he decided to go on strike, closed down the valves on his cows and sent them out on the picket line. It would be a pretty foolish operation.

He is at the mercy of the public. He cannot obtain protection in the same way as other workers are protected, although the whole rural economy, especially in the eastern part of Canada depends on the dairy farmer. I think it is so true, the saying we often hear, that as the dairy farmer goes, so goes the nation. If the dairy farmer is enjoying prosperity, the whole district around him is sharing that prosperity. The dairy farmer is, no doubt, the backbone of our country. Maybe this country is gradually becoming more industrialized, but anyone who believes that a day will come when there will be no such thing as a dairy farmer had better give the matter further thought. The dairy farmer is the backbone of the country and I am certain he will continue to be so for many years to come.

With regard to this question of surpluses, I should like to make a suggestion to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) and to the government as a whole. As I have just said, I do not feel that the efficiency of the dairy farmer should be a reason for penalizing him in the end. I ask the Minister of Agriculture, whose dairy farm policy will, we know, be brought into the house in the very near future, to hold the line, especially with regard to the price of butter. I ask him to take no action as a result of which the dairy farmer will suffer. Let the minister retain the present measure of support. Everyone knows we cannot go on forever buying up surpluses. No government can do that. But I should like to suggest that the government appoint a commission to work with the dairy farmers of Canada through their group leaders to study this question in the coming year to try to arrange matters so that a balance between supply and demand with regard to this product can be attained. Butter is very important to the economy of the eastern dairy farm, and the future of the whole dairy industry depends on this product.

Now I should like to say a few words about another industry which I have in my constituency, namely the textile industry which plays an important part in the lives of my constituents both in Chateauguay and Huntingdon counties, especially in the towns of Huntingdon and Ormstown. As in other such localities, we are very much concerned about the future of this vital industry. We know that since the Progressive Conservative party has been in power a great improvement has been noted. We realize that there is still more to be done.

The former government criticized the textile industry, saying it was inefficient and poorly managed. It was ready to abandon ship and let the industry sink. We know that the present government has no such intention. I am happy to say that the textile industry in the two towns I have mentioned, Huntingdon and Ormstown, is under the best of management, well organized and efficient. Sometimes when we speak of the textile industry I think we forget the very important part it plays in the life of our country.

We find that the primary textile industry, especially in the province of Quebec, is located in the smaller municipalities. When there is a shutdown at the mill, there is a shutdown in the town. This affects the merchant, the butcher, and the grocer; the whole financial set-up in the town is disturbed. When we consider that some of these smaller plants are established in towns with populations of 2,000, 2,200, or 2,800 people, one can imagine the effect upon all concerned when the mills are shut down. We cannot allow that to happen.

I know the Minister of Finance has given a great deal of thought to this problem and that he is still working hard on it. I have heard directly from the management of the mills I have mentioned that they are very pleased with the action the minister has taken to date. They know he is sincere and that he intends to do his level best to improve the situation, but I ask the minister this: even if it is necessary to take what might be considered in some quarters to be drastic action, he should take such action for the benefit of this all-important industry. As I have stated, many of the smaller municipalities are directly affected. Again, on behalf of the employers and employees engaged in the textile industries in my area, I ask the government to take very definite steps to improve the situation.

In the same breath, I want to thank the government on behalf of the employers and employees in this industry for the steps which have been taken in the past month to come to its aid. I sincerely hope that this assistance will continue until such time as this industry will enjoy the prosperity it once knew and deserves. As my final words on this subject, I would say if this industry is to survive in the smaller municipalities and small towns the assistance and aid must come now.

I bring these matters to the attention of hon. members, first, in order to represent my electors who have placed their confidence and trust in me by electing me as a member of this house and, second, in order that it be known that the counties of Chateauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie do in fact exist. I regret to say this, but facts are facts and let us put the cards on the table. In past years my counties were poorly represented by the elected member who in the apparent custom of the day sat on the laurels of a sympathetic vote and forgot the needs of the electors. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, this is not the pattern I shall follow either in this house or in representing my electors outside this house.

In closing I wish to express my thanks to the electors of my counties of Chateauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie for the confidence they have placed in me and I wish to say that although the greater proportion of my electors are French speaking Canadians, I, an English speaking Canadian have been elected to represent them in this honourable house. This is a fact of which I am justifiably proud. This not only shows the great feeling of harmony that exists between our two great races in Canada but also indicates the fairness and good will shown to the minority race in that fine province of which I am proud to be a son, the province of Quebec.

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, since the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) brought down his budget, several members have made speeches and, from the ministerial benches, there has come an unending stream of praise and congratulations directed at the Minister of Finance. One wonders if their words did not exceed their thoughts, as in the case of the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Tremblay).

Soon they will have to publicly retract their remarks through the press, the same as he did.

The present budget, submitted by the Minister of Finance certainly deserves—

Mr. J. H. Tremblay (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, the budget submitted by the Minister of Finance—

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising to a point of order?

Mr. Tremblay: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

(Translation):

Mr. Tremblay: I am rising on a question of privilege because the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger) just said that I had retracted through the press. I simply sent to the press a letter explaining what I meant in my speech, together with some incidental remarks on farming.

Mr. Boulanger: The budget introduced by the Minister of Finance no doubt deserves some praise, if it is compared with those of 1958 and 1959. However, the compliments paid the minister should not be too warm, considering the mistakes he has made in the past, as between his forecasts and the facts.

Mr. Speaker, like my colleagues, I should like to make a few remarks to express the feeling of the taxpayers I represent here. In the constituency of Drummond-Arthabaska, as in many others, there are two sectors of economic activity which determine the prosperity of its inhabitants: the textile and farming industries.

The matter on which I should like to call the attention of the house, and most particularly that of the Minister of Finance, is that of the textile industry.

The question has given rise to many newspaper comments, especially lately. It shows the importance of the textile industry in Canada, and particularly in eastern Quebec and in Ontario.

That industry, one of Canada's major industries, has been an essential factor in Canada's economic development.

According to figures published in the statistical year book, 1959 edition, in 1956 we had 3,786 establishments engaged in the textile industry, including 965 in primary manufacturing processes, 296 in knitting, and 2,525 in garment making.

Those 3,786 establishments employed 182,575 people, and produced close to $1,700 million worth of goods. It is hard to get statistical data for 1959, to compare with the figures I have just quoted.

However, I intend to talk about some sectors for which we have statistics showing that our textile industry has been constantly declining since 1956, and that that is one of the causes of the present alarming unemployment.

In spite of the best efforts of our industrialists and workers who wish to maintain their industries in operation, several of them gave up or moved to other countries. In fact, hardly two years ago, the Geo. Pattinson Company, which was employing 250 workers, moved its plant to Jamaica. Slingsby Manufacturing Co. ceased its operations in January 1959, thus putting 300 employees out of work.

(Text):

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Boulanger: No, Mr. Speaker. My time is short.

Mr. Anderson: I was just going to say that the factory has not moved yet so the hon. member does not know what he is talking about.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: No.

Imperial Cloth Company, a 25-year old industry which employed from 70 to 100 workers had to close its doors in 1958, after having incurred monthly losses of $3,000, for several months. Canadian Cotton, which was employing 2,000 workers, also closed its doors last year.

That was also the fate of a small plant in Saint John, New Brunswick, as well of that of Rosamond Woollen Mill in Almonte, Ont.

In Milltown, a textile plant sold its machinery to a private individual who moved it to the Dominican republic. In our own province, and in particular in St. Hyacinthe—

Mr. Pigeon: Which has a very good member.

An hon. Member: According to the St. Hyacinthe paper.

Mr. Boulanger: Gotham Hosiery Company closed it doors and dismantled its machinery in order to sell it—

Mr. Ricard: There are four new manufacturers.

Mr. Boulanger: That company employed 400 persons. In that same city of St. Hyacinthe, another company—

Mr. Ricard: You do not say a word of the others who have opened—

Mr. Boulanger: National Hosiery Mills, which had been operating since 1936, with about a hundred employees, closed its doors after having incurred a loss of $60,000 in two years.

In Sherbrooke, in the constituency of the defender of the textile industry—not here in this house but behind the scenes—Orient Hosiery, which employed 300 workers, closed its doors.

Julius Kayser had to lay off part of its staff.

Bruck Mills Ltd. has to close its doors, intermittently, from one to two weeks a month.

Venus Mills Ltd. closed its doors, having gone bankrupt.

Mr. Pigeon: Where is that?

Mr. Boulanger: Domil Ltd. had to close intermittently.

Mr. Ricard: That has always been so.

Mr. Boulanger: Yet, in 1957 and 1958, the Conservative government and its members—

Mr. Ricard: You know nothing about that industry.

Mr. Boulanger: —had found very easy reasons to explain the alarming situation which, according to them, was affecting that industry. It was the fault of the previous Liberal government, they claimed.

All the Conservatives of today, who were candidates in constituencies where there are textile plants, kept on saying that under a Conservative government, the textile industry would revive and prosper.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) himself said in the maritime provinces, as reported by the Halifax Chronicle-Herald for May 6, 1957:

> If we want to build up this country and ensure jobs...we cannot do so by exporting labour to the United States in the form of primary products.
> A Conservative government would carry out a national development program as a crowning feature of Canada's first centenary as a nation.

On February 23, 1958, at Cornwall, Mr. Diefenbaker said this, which I find in the Cornwall Standard-Freeholder for February 24 1958:

Mr. Ricard: He did not learn his trade in English.

Mr. Boulanger:

> Last night, Prime Minister Diefenbaker promised that a Progressive Conservative government would pass legislation to put an end to the dumping of textiles and other products in Canada.
> Canada cannot live without its textile industry. Following representations to the tariff board, and the board's recommendations, we shall have to take the necessary steps to protect all our industries against dumping, he added, amid thunderous applause from the audience.

A year later, the Canadian Cotton plant closed down. We are now in 1960, and for three years have been under Tory rule. And now we realize the deplorable and piteous state of our textile industry.

Let us see what happened in the cotton industry since this government came into power. I do not mind comparing my figures with the 1956 figures, i.e. the last year of Liberal rule, as the statistics for that period cover the whole year. In the cotton industry, there were 22,400 employees on the payroll at the end of 1956 in all the spinning mills, which produced 51 per cent of Canadian consumption, whereas at the end of 1959, the number of employees fell to 18,200, while the production only covered 41 per cent of our domestic needs. At the same time, the United States alone sold us 45 per cent of our consumer needs.

Therefore, since this Conservative government came in, i.e. within the last three years, the number of workers in the cotton industry fell by 4,200, while our domestic market declined—

Mr. Pigeon: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Boulanger: —in the proportion of 9 per cent.

Are conditions any better in the wool industry? Let us see. In 1956, 13,940 workers manufactured 53.42 per cent of our Canadian consumption. In 1959, 11,010 employees, i.e. 2,930 less than in 1956, supplied 49.7 per cent of our consumer needs.

Mr. Pigeon: Why?

Mr. Boulanger: In the silk and rayon industry, in 1956 15,200 employees produced 74 per cent of our domestic consumption, whereas in 1959, that number had fallen to 14,600 workers, whose production only reached 67 per cent of our consumption.

Mr. Tremblay: Are these Lamontagne's figures?

Mr. Boulanger: We lost a production of 60 million linear yards of cotton, 6 million linear yards of synthetic fiber and 1 million linear yards of wool material.

Mr. Pigeon: Why did you object to increased tariffs on British woollens?

Mr. Boulanger: It means that under the Conservative administration, the number of people employed in the primary textile industry has decreased by 6,730 in three years. May I point out, Mr. Speaker, that I am not referring now to manufactures of rubber goods, hardware, silverware, sporting goods, etc.

That is only part of the picture in the primary textile industry of Canada. It is no better off than some other industries like coal and gold, which are supported by federal grants.

The distressing position of primary industry, which has been brought about by the Tories, is no better than that of the secondary textile industry, or of advanced processing of primary textiles, such as the industries manufacturing articles of clothing, awnings, tents, nets, etc.

While the primary textile industry is affected by imports from the United States, India, Italy, etc., the secondary textile industry is affected to an alarming degree by the imports from Japan.

Our trade exchanges with Japan have greatly increased during 1959. Our total exports have reached $140 million, while our imports totalled $105 million, leaving a $35 million balance in our favour in Canadian dollars.

If we examine the amount of our textile imports, we note that it reached $41.5 million, or 56 per cent more than in 1958 when it was $26.6 million and 115 per cent more than in 1956.

According to the estimated figures for the first months of 1960, we may expect an even greater increase in imports over 1959.

Contrasting with the figures I have just mentioned, with a market 15 times that of Canada, the United States bought from Japan six times more goods than we did in 1959.

The break-down of our imports from Japan is as follows: textiles, about $10,600,000; finished products, $30,300,000; yarns and sundry, $600,000.

Therefore 73 per cent of our imports of textile goods are made up of finished articles which require no further processing by Canadians.

The Japanese can indeed refer to a balance of $35,000,000 in Canada's favour. But let us look at actual facts and find out which of the two countries gains more.

To fully appreciate how much damage Japanese imports are doing to our economy, we must think of the replacement value represented by those goods in Canada.

That replacement value being two or three times greater, it means we imported the equivalent of $300 million worth of goods from Japan last year.

Apart from the figures, there are other principles which should guide our economy. The most important one, and one which our ministers do not seem to understand, is that we would gain more from promoting employment in our factories than from promoting the sale of raw materials. As long as we go on exporting our manpower through the purchase of finished products imported from countries where salaries are as low as 15 cents an hour, there is no hope of checking unemployment.

While I realize that we have to buy from Japan and from other countries if we want to sell them our own goods, there must be a reasonable balance in the transactions, a balance which should be based on the intrinsic value of the dollar in each respective country.

In the past few months, I know that representations have been made to the Prime Minister and to the Minister of Finance by western farm organizations, urging the government not to apply restrictions to Japanese imports because that would prevent a further expansion of our wheat exports.

I respect that point of view, but the hard fact remains that there are close to 200,000 employees in our textile industries. If we deprive them of their means of subsistence, Canada's economy will be jeopardized, and western farmers may be the first to suffer.

We must also think of the 93,000 young people who enter the labour market every year. What can we offer them as compensation for the jobs we would be exporting through increases in our purchases abroad?

After all, we should not have to buy them a ticket to Japan or Hong Kong.

Mr. Speaker, to assess the possible effects on our economy of the government's failure to protect our secondary and primary industries—and I am thinking of textiles—we need only look at a study made by Canadian National economists in the city of Stratford, Ontario, on the economic impact to be expected from the creation of new jobs for 100 workers. It is shown that those 100 new jobs would provide a living for 131 families or 427 individuals.

Those 100 jobs would create 117 other non-industrial jobs, and finally, would raise the annual purchasing power at retail prices by $939,000.

There is no doubt that if the investigation had been continued into the possible effects of the creation of 200 new jobs, the resulting figures would have been more than doubled.

Mr. Speaker, it cannot be denied that the situation of the textile industry is alarming in Canada. It is alarming for two reasons: excessive imports and ineffective anti-dumping legislation.

What future is there for our textile industries? That will depend on the share of the Canadian market that is reserved for our domestic industry in relation to imports.

In 1956, economists predicted that in 1975, Canadian demand for clothing would rise to $2,000,200,000, or 2¼ times the present level. The same will apply to the demand for industrial and household textiles.

The figures collected in 1959 show that the forecasts were rather conservative.

It can therefore be expected that in 1975, the labour force employed in the primary textile industry will be of 182,000 people for the production of the textile products required to meet our needs.

What proportion of the labour force will be Canadian? That will depend on the percentage of the domestic market that can be retained by our industry.

If the 46 per cent share we have today is maintained, in 1975 we shall have 120,000 employees in the primary textile industry. At that rate, the same could be said of the secondary industry.

The textile industry is aware of the unemployment situation which exists now and will exists 15 years from now. It is also aware of its need to expand in order to keep up with the development of the country; that is why it has put in modern equipment comparable to that of American industry.

However, there is a phase in the economic process where the industry and the textile workers can exert no influence, that is in the field of world trade.

Only the government can be of assistance in that field if it wants so supply an incentive for our industries.

To achieve that, we need men who have the strength and the courage to face the problem, and not ministers and members of parliament who hide their faces when they speak in this house. In other words, we need men with backbone.

(Text):

Mr. Anderson: You have got them now. You did not have them in 1957.

Mr. Ricard: He is speaking through his hat anyway.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: For the last three years, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance have received representations, briefs, delegations, etc., etc. from the people concerned and the result was a tariff increase on British woollens which has been practically ineffective.

In 1958, anti-dumping legislation was passed by parliament, which could give good results if it were applied. Yet, we had a greater number of linear yards of cotton imported than last year and the Canadian government did nothing to protect the textile industry. Consequently, members from every region where the textile industry is established stated in 1957 and 1958 that the textile industry had to be saved.

For the past three years, that is since the end of the Liberal administration, while the number of employees has decreased by 6,000, our imports have increased and this has contributed to the slow down in our textile industry.

(Text):

Mr. Hodgson: You mean they dropped 6,000 three years ago.

Mr. Anderson: Mine are working night shifts.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: I have here a letter giving a summary of the situation in the textile industry.

Mr. Pigeon: Over whose signature?

Mr. Boulanger: It was published in La Tribune of March 1960, and reads as follows:

Sir:

Last January 26, Mr. Maurice Allard, member of parliament for Sherbrooke made an interesting speech in the house on the question of disarmament and on its consequences.

With all the members of my family, I can appreciate what Mr. Allard can say on a question of such scope and importance, but I think that in view of the serious situation in which—

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker. I shall conclude my remarks—

Mr. Ricard: It is an anonymous letter.

Mr. Tremblay: He does not know the rules.

Mr. Boulanger: —by commenting on the press release in which the primary textile industry said, following the statement of the Minister of Finance, that:

—The primary textile industry states that "the changes in Canadian tariff on artificial fabrics and fibres, announced tonight by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), will hardly bring any change in the protection against imports."

In another release, the Canadian cotton industry made this statement:

The Canadian cotton textile industry has studied the Canadian tariff amendments announced tonight by the Minister of Finance, Mr. Fleming, and sees no real cause for optimism.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member will permit me to interrupt, it is now ten o'clock.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

(6) Fort Nelson airport was operated by R.C.A.F. until July 1, 1958 at which time it was taken over by Department of Transport.

(7) Tofino airport was operated by R.C.A.F. until June 10, 1958 at which time it was taken over by Department of Transport.

* The revenue from commercial air lines was quite readily obtained from financial statements for the 14 major airports but in the case of the other 30, complete detailed information was not available in Ottawa. Complete information could be obtained from the regional offices but that would take a considerable length of time. It is considered that the figures quoted are 95 per cent correct.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

WELFARE BENEFITS TO WOMEN RETURNING TO RESERVES—EXTENSION OF PROVINCIAL WELFARE SERVICES

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take this opportunity of announcing two policy decisions concerning the administration of Indian affairs.

The first concerns women of Indian origin who have lost their Indian status through enfranchisement or marriage, and who have no alternative but to return to friends and relatives on the reserves for various reasons such as the death of their husbands or serious illness in the family.

Up to the present there has been no satisfactory means whereby essential welfare and educational help could be provided to these women and their children. It has been decided, therefore, on humanitarian grounds that educational and welfare assistance shall be granted to these people on reserves in the same manner and to the same extent as though they had Indian status.

Second, I wish to announce that the federal government is prepared to negotiate agreements with the governments of the various provinces for the extension of normal provincial welfare services to persons residing on Indian reserves. The purpose is to avoid the development of exclusive welfare services on reserves which would tend to set Indians apart from other Canadians and duplicate provincial programs in adjacent non-Indian communities.

In negotiating these agreements the federal government is prepared to pay a reasonable share of the costs of the benefits, over and above the federal contribution under existing federal-provincial agreements, such as the Unemployment Assistance Act; and to share with the provinces reasonable costs of additional staff and administration required for the application of such programs. Moreover, my department will be prepared to enter into agreements to enable Indian bands to assume responsibilities for welfare programs normally administered by municipalities under provincial legislation.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the hon. lady on both these announcements. I think they are both very progressive steps indeed.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): We also appreciate the announcements made by the minister with respect to these two matters, which are exceptionally good ones. We hope additional steps will be taken later on in order to deal with other similar problems.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

HOURS OF SITTING ON WEDNESDAY, APRIL 13

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in that spirit of agreement which has been revealed here may I suggest an amendment to the motion standing in my name on the order paper. I make the suggestion with regard to the amendment on the basis of standing order 58, subsection 6, which reads as follows:

> On the eighth of the said days, at fifteen minutes before the ordinary time of daily adjournment or, when the eighth day is a Friday, at 4.45 o'clock p.m., unless the debate be previously concluded, Mr. Speaker shall interrupt the proceedings and forthwith put the question on the main motion—

In order to cover that situation I would ask—and I hope the house will agree—an amendment by adding these words after "3.30 p.m." in the motion:

> —which shall be deemed to be the ordinary time of adjournment that day within the meaning of standing order 58.

The motion in my name would then read as follows:

> That, on Wednesday next, April 13, the hours of sitting shall be from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. and from 2 p.m. to 3.30 p.m., which shall be deemed to be the ordinary time of adjournment that day within the meaning of standing order 58, and that the provisions of standing orders 2 and 6 be suspended in relation thereto.

I so move.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to congratulate the Prime Minister on this amendment, which I think is a very progressive one.

Motion as amended agreed to.

UNITED NATIONS

CONFERENCE ON LAW OF THE SEA—CANADIAN PROPOSAL RESPECTING FISHING ZONE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question arising out of reports from the Geneva conference on the law of the sea. The question is this. Has the Canadian government now abandoned its proposal for a 12-mile fishing zone reserved exclusively for the fishermen of the coastal state without recognition of any historic fishing rights?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman knows, from time to time in order to attain a reasonable measure of agreement without the sacrifice of rights that are regarded as first principles, changes are necessarily made. The conference has been proceeding for some time, and the Canadian government has concluded that it is most desirable without the sacrifice of principles, to attain a measure of agreement which has been attempted for many years.

To that end we have instructed our representative at Geneva to place before the conference a proposition whereby the six miles would be the territorial limit, and six miles beyond that would constitute the area in which each country would have its own fishing rights, except where there has been in the past the use in that area of fishing rights by other countries. In so far as that situation is concerned, all those traditional rights will terminate at the end of 10 years. I think that in effect answers the question of the hon. gentleman.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question. Does that mean there will be no change whatsoever for 10 years?

Mr. Diefenbaker: That means that in effect Canada's position previously was one of accepting the principle that the period should be five years. An extra five years has been added in order to assure that we shall be able to attain something, which otherwise could not be done, for the benefit of generations to come.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am just asking for information. The Prime Minister said our previous position was five years. My recollection is that when the Secretary of State for External Affairs made the announcement in the house there was no such stipulation whatsoever. Was not the position originally taken that we would negotiate bilaterally with respect to certain of those historic rights?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes; there would still remain, of course, the bilateral negotiations to which the hon. gentleman refers.

[Mr. Pearson.]

IMMIGRATION

IRENE REBRIN—REQUEST FOR DISCLOSURE OF REASONS FOR DEPORTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, in view of the human approach taken by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration on another problem this morning, I should like to address this question to her.

In view of the statement by Miss Irene Rebrin in a Vancouver hospital yesterday that she cannot think of any possible reason for the government's refusal to let her remain in Canada; and in view of her statement, "What country would take me now with this stigma over me?", and in view of her expressed wish that the immigration department should make public the reasons for their denial of her right to remain in Canada, in justice and in fairness to Miss Irene Rebrin will the minister make public the reasons for her deportation?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the statement, but it is my impression that I gave an explanation yesterday.

Mr. Herridge: A supplementary question. Are war criminals accepted as immigrants in Canada?

Mrs. Fairclough: That is scarcely germane.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to ask the hon. lady a supplementary question about this matter. Has she offered, on behalf of the government, to pay the transportation costs of the voluntary departure of this person to any other country where she is willing to go?

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Speaker, I am unable to say whether there was any formal offer. I think the question was asked of us in regard to the departure, whether if there was a formal offer to depart voluntarily the government would assure the cost of such departure, but I cannot say what was the outcome of that discussion.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the hon. lady make inquiries and let the house know whether any such offer was made and, if so, on what basis?

Mrs. Fairclough: I shall be glad to do that.

AGRICULTURE

SUGAR BEETS—FIXING OF SUPPORT PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Can the minister say whether, in fixing the support price for sugar beets this year, consideration will be given by him and by the stabilization board to the loss suffered by farmers growing sugar beets in western Ontario as a result of the decision this week by the arbitrator pursuant to the contract between the Dominion Sugar Company of Chatham, Ontario, and the sugar beet growers?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in setting a support price for any commodity consideration is given to all relevant matters. Full weight is given to them before a final decision is arrived at as to what the support price will be.

REPORTED REJECTION OF REQUEST OF WESTERN FARMERS FOR MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister arising out of a press report that the Prime Minister has rejected the request of western farm leaders for a meeting. Can the Prime Minister say why he has refused to see the western farm leaders, and whether an appointment has been made for some later date?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the press reference, but there was no rejection. There was simply a communication by me to the secretary of the liaison committee representing the 10 farm groups asking him to place before the government in writing their agreed alternative to deficiency payments. After those representations have been made and studied the question of whether there should be a meeting with the western liaison group will be determined. The only matter that was brought to the attention of the secretary was the fact that the government wanted to know the alternative which these western organizations had in mind, and the only denial of a meeting was that a meeting could not be arranged before the Easter recess.

Mr. Argue: May I ask a further question to elicit additional information. Is the alternative plan that the Prime Minister requested the delegation to submit to him in addition to the alternative plan they presented to the government at the last meeting?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I cannot enter into an argument during the course of the orders of the day, but may I say that any representations made in the past constituted not an alternative but a series of alternatives.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I could ask the Minister of Finance a question supplementary to that asked by the hon. member for Assiniboia. Is the government at the present time considering any payment to the western farmers which would upset the balance of ways and means that the minister put before us in his budget speech?

Mr. Argue: What a question.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think no one will recognize the impropriety of that question more readily than the hon. gentleman who asked it. The budget introduced last week was naturally introduced with the full support and concurrence of the government. It is the government budget.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order raised by the minister, I recognize no impropriety in asking whether the government is considering a policy, and I repeat my question to the minister. Is the government giving consideration to doing anything for the western farmers?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is asking me just about the same question that was asked of the Prime Minister a minute ago. Is it the tactic of hon. gentlemen opposite to go down the treasury benches and ask every minister the same question? With great respect, I say this is not the proper way to ask questions on the orders of the day.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask a further question—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If I may deal with the objection that has been taken to the question, it seems to me that the question does involve a straight decision of policy, and the hon. member could hardly expect it to be declared in answer to a question at this time, particularly in view of what has already been said on the subject. The hon. member for Essex East.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I was going to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Finance, but in view of your observation possibly I could ask the Prime Minister whether he is not aware that on March 4 the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources suggested to the farmers of western Canada that if they had any alternative plan, such as acreage payments, they should lay it before the government.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's question is one of those argumentative questions that get us into difficulties if pursued, and I would ask him to reserve it for debate.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

JOHN MORRISON—ANNOUNCEMENT OF PAROLE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. S. MacLellan (Inverness-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Justice. Would the minister advise the house whether Mr. John Morrison, who was recently removed from Hamilton to Sydney, is now free to return to Hamilton?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Yes, Mr. Speaker; Mr. Morrison was paroled last night. Information I received this morning indicates that this fact was communicated to the authorities in Nova Scotia by telegram last night, and the certificate of parole is being forwarded to Hamilton where Mr. Morrison was employed and to which place he wishes to return.

I am advised also that there was a suggestion that a warrant would be issued on an outstanding charge for an offence against the Nova Scotia liquor act. My information is that this matter was referred to the attorney general of Nova Scotia, and he gave instructions that the warrant should not be issued. According to the latest information I have, therefore, Mr. Morrison, on payment of the fine for the previous conviction, will be free to return to Hamilton and resume his employment.

Perhaps the house would permit me to observe, Mr. Speaker, just to avoid a misunderstanding, that those matters upon which Mr. Morrison was taken down to Nova Scotia were not outstanding charges but outstanding convictions. When the matter was drawn to our attention it seemed about the only thing that could be done, inasmuch as the convictions had been recorded, was not to interfere with them in so far as they were sentences, but if he paid the fine, immediately to follow the sensible course of paroling the prison sentence, and that has been done.

FINANCE

EFFECT OF FEDERAL MONEY POLICIES ON ATLANTIC REGION—FEDERAL CONSULTATION RESPECTING ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder if I could ask the Minister of Finance, in view of the jurisdiction given to the parliament of Canada by subsections 14, 15, 19 and 20 of section 91 of the British North America Act, whether he was consulted by the premiers of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick before the governments of those provinces made an approach to Sir Oliver Franks to head a royal commission to investigate the effect of federal monetary policies in the Atlantic region.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): It depends upon what the hon. gentleman means by "approach". I was not aware, until he made the announcement just now, that an approach had been made to Sir Oliver Franks.

Some hon. Members: Read the newspapers.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is sometimes more interesting to listen to these announcements in the form of questions asked by hon. gentlemen opposite on the orders of the day.

I had been made aware by the premier of one of the maritime provinces that he and the premiers of one or more of the provinces in the Atlantic area were considering inviting someone from the United Kingdom to advise them in regard to such questions. The precise form of the organization, whether royal commission or otherwise, was not clearly indicated at the time.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question. Would the Minister of Finance agree that it is desirable that such a royal commission if established, if that is the proposal, should be composed of outsiders, without consulting the government of Canada, considering that monetary policy comes under the jurisdiction of the federal government?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, no decision with reference to any matter that falls under federal jurisdiction in this country is going to be taken except by the federal government and the federal parliament. Let me make that quite clear. If other jurisdictions wish to engage in studies of questions they think are of interest to them, I do not think it is a function of the federal government to tell them they may not do so. We respect the rights of other jurisdictions, and that has been axiomatic with this government. It is our policy to proceed, where decisions are to be taken that will have legal effect, so they will be taken by the body holding the constitutional power in that regard.

[Later:]

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question supplementary to the ones asked of the Minister of Finance, and it is this. Which of the premiers made him aware of the fact that the Atlantic premiers were considering this whole matter?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Premier Flemming of New Brunswick.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF WHITE PAPER ON POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Minister of National Defence whether, in accordance with the practice followed in the last session, he proposes to issue a white paper on defence before the discussion begins on his estimates?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): There will not be a white paper to the same extent as the one which was issued last year, because the main principles as they were enunciated in that paper still apply. However, we will get information to the committee in advance of its meeting in order to indicate changes that may be made.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

A. V. ROE COMPANY—INQUIRY AS TO PRODUCTION OF AUTO CAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Defence Production whether he can give us anything concrete about all the speculation now going on with regard to the Avro auto car and the money the government is giving this company.

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, as far as the Avro car is concerned, hon. members will realize that work on this car has been going on by way of development since 1952. At first help was given by the Canadian government and then by the United States government. At the present time negotiations are going on between Canada and the United States with regard to the research and production sharing program, but no contract has been signed to this day.

Mr. Fisher: A supplementary question. Is the vehicle designed for defence purposes or is it for civilian use?

Mr. O'Hurley: Both, Mr. Speaker.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR ACTION ON CURRENT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Labour, now he has told the house that the number of unplaced applicants at national employment service offices has practically reached the level of March, 1958, whether he would tell us what measures the government proposes to take to meet this emergency?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, what the hon. member has just stated to the house is not true.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, the minister told this house yesterday that the number of unplaced applicants was about 832,000. He has told us on previous occasions that fishermen are deducted to reach this number, and if he will take the trouble to look at the statistics he gave us two years ago he will find that my statement is accurate. Therefore I repeat my question. What is the government going to do about it?

Mr. Speaker: Order. There seem to be differences raised by this question and answer which cannot be resolved on orders of the day, so I suggest that it is improper to pursue the matter.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

BILL OF RIGHTS—INQUIRY AS TO REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether it is the intention of the government to submit the proposed bill of rights, which is on the order paper, to a committee of this house, where submissions can be made and evidence heard?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thought I dealt with that question on a previous occasion. My recollection is that I said the matter would naturally be considered by a committee of this house, and I am unchanged in that view.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Thursday, April 7, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Benidickson, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Regier.

(Translation):

Mr. J. N. Tremblay (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, it gives me pleasure to add my own congratulations to those already extended the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) for the budget he recently brought before the house. His budget confirms almost to the letter the optimistic forecasts he had made last year, and neatly debunks the claims of the opposition. It raises the highest hopes for Canada's economic future. I hope that free newspapers and responsible newspapermen will use it to dispel the feelings of panic which unfair opponents have been trying to sow among the people in the past few months.

May I, now, Mr. Speaker, come back to a subject that is close to my heart? I refer to the C.B.C. This subject does fit into the budget debate, because the problem of the C.B.C., I think, is now one of the most important in view of the very purposes of the C.B.C. and of the troubles affecting that crown corporation, and also because it concerns the public at large and because of all the money being spent by this government agency.

I shall therefore deal with a few aspects of the C.B.C., mostly with regard to the French network. Unfortunately, my analysis will forcibly be incomplete, because the problems involved are of such importance that they would require much more time.

Last year, Mr. Speaker, we tried by every means at our disposal to study the fundamental problems of the C.B.C. in the house committee on broadcasting. That investigation, from which the people had been expecting great results, was quite a disappointment. We barely managed to get from C.B.C. officials a few items of information to satisfy the legitimate curiosity of the citizens, who have to foot the bill for the maintenance and operation of such a costly enterprise.

It would be putting it mildly to say that questions asked by the legal representatives of the people were not adequately answered. Instead, more often than not we were prevented from getting any information. The committee had first of all to reject an attempt by the Liberal party to keep the inquiry strictly within the terms of the new broadcasting act. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill), who had made that suggestion, knew very well that if he succeeded in narrowing down the subject matter in this way, he would at the same time avoid many risks for his party.

However, the committee did not accede to the Liberal party's request. But, thanks to a procedural trick, against which I have protested on many occasions, members of the committee had to refrain from entering the personal field, to which I certainly would have no objection if at the same time it had not ruled out every possibility of alluding to people and to facts directly linked with the issues under review.

We thus found ourselves in the strange position of not being able to refer to public facts supposedly because those facts were not purely abstract. We had to be content with indirect questions, dodges and roundabout approaches. The result was a feeling of helplessness and frustration, and the people had the impression that their representatives were unable to do anything and that the investigation was only an artifice design to hoodwink the voters. No wonder, therefore, that the atmosphere was immediately tense and that discussions got nowhere.

Then certain newspapers made matters worse by describing as a witch hunt the sincere efforts being made by hon. members to elicit information. It is interesting to note that the newsman who was the first to sound the bugle in this matter was a C.B.C. minion who, for many years now, thanks to a weekly appearance on television and on a few other programs, has pocketed fabulous fees which, last year in particular, ran into something like $16,625.

It is easy to understand why he should hasten to discredit hon. members who were threatening an industry which was so profitable to him. That personage who, as we may recall, had at one time vigorously defended the cause of public morality, did not choose to follow in the footsteps of those who, on behalf of the people whom they legally represent, try to suppress commercial monopolies which, at the C.B.C., are operating at the expense of taxpayers, try to eliminate extravagant and unnecessary spending, scandalous deficits, shameless patronage, and who attempt, in the name of decency, of the moral code, of good common sense and fundamental values, to bring some order into a public corporation which, according to the very words of the bishops in the province of Quebec, does not care to safeguard "the higher values of faith and morals".

Mr. Speaker, those zealous defenders of the most questionable, if not the most unsavoury aspects of the C.B.C. forget that the legal spokesmen for the people, in trying to get some information on the C.B.C. administration, were only attempting to answer the innumerable complaints and representations from citizens and public bodies in Canada, who were rightly worried about the spirit of the public broadcasting and television system, and by its bad financial management.

The growing uneasiness that has been noted in this respect, blazed into an outright crisis when the new government took over, precisely because all sorts of pressures increased and multiplied as the people saw in the Conservative government a way to lance an abscess which the Liberal party, and for good reasons, had lacked the courage to drain.

It was in that context that the committee on broadcasting was appointed. As I said last year in this house, differences of opinion immediately sprang up. They had their source in different concepts of government responsibility with regard to the C.B.C. If, as I said, this responsibility is restricted to looking solely into the financial aspect of the corporation, the problems can be expressed in figures and bookkeeping devices. In that case, a parliamentary committee has only to inquire into administrative matters in so far as they affect the budget. If, on the contrary, it is felt that the C.B.C. is not a crown corporation like the others, because it does not deal only with material questions, but owing to its vast moral and intellectual content, cannot be treated as a purely financial body, then the parliamentary committee looking into the matter, has the right, without encroaching upon the corporation's inside business, to try and establish a connection between the cost of the corporation to the taxpayers and the quality of its offerings.

Mr. Deschatelets: From the very start of his remarks, the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Tremblay), has been criticizing the procedure of a committee of the house. If you refer to page 2898 of Hansard, dated April 4, 1960, you will find that I also discussed the attitude of a parliamentary committee. I was speaking about the industrial relations committee.

And here is what the Speaker told me, in calling me back to order:

> It seems to me the hon. member is reflecting on a decision of a committee of the house. He is not within his rights in taking a course of that kind.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Roberval should abstain from discussing the decisions taken, or the procedure followed in a committee of the house.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am inclined to believe that the decision referred to by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets) is more or less in order, because as far as I can make out, a vote taken in the house cannot be discussed in committee; however, a committee report may be commented on once it has been introduced in the house.

I do not see that the hon. member has in this case discussed a vote or a decision of the committee referred to.

Mr. Caron: Just a word on that matter. I do not believe—I do not have the exact paragraph of the standing orders here, but I think the standing orders do not permit committee matters to be discussed in the house except by permission of the house, and as the matter was not raised, I think the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont is right.

Mr. Johnson: Mr. Speaker, that rule would apply to a report of a committee sitting during this session. Now, the member for Roberval is referring to a committee report of the previous session.

(Text):

Mr. Fisher: On the point of order, I should like to suggest that the hon. member be given complete leeway to go as far as he wishes in his criticism of the committee, because I firmly believe that the chairman and other members of the committee will be prepared to produce arguments in answer to what is being said. I think this is a contribution to a free and open discussion. If the hon. member is going to show that this committee's operations were of a kind that blocked him, I think he should be allowed to proceed.

(Translation):

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion, even if the committee report was not approved by the house it remains a final report, and at this time it is in order and in keeping with practice to discuss it, even if the house has not approved it. Unless the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron) is able to recall a specific case, I do not think I can maintain the question of order.

Mr. Tremblay: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

As I was saying, we have the right—and without unduly interfering with the internal business of the C.B.C.—to try to establish some relationship between what the C.B.C. is costing the taxpayers and the quality of what it is offering to them. That is the point of view I had adopted during the inquiry of the committee on broadcasting, and it is in the same spirit I should like to make the following remarks.

The C.B.C. is not a public service, in the same way as are certain other government bodies. Its services are of a moral category, because they have a direct bearing on the souls and minds of our citizens.

Therefore, we cannot, in regard to any C.B.C. activities, use the same criteria we are accustomed to use in the case of activities of an ordinary crown corporation. It is not surprising, therefore, that the members of the parliamentary committee should have tried to go beyond the requirements of an inquiry into purely administrative and financial matters.

For my part, I tried to define the problem in its exact terms, and to establish what must, first of all, constitute the basis of the C.B.C., its purposes, its principles, its methods, its means and the pertinent facts connected with what I have just outlined. I distinctly remember the wry faces of some C.B.C. pundits when we asked them what the C.B.C. should be, and about its responsibilities in the intellectual and moral field.

Their answer was that the C.B.C. was trying to provide wholesome and entertaining programs. That was a very neat way of begging the question.

Yet, in putting those questions, the members were trying to echo the representations made by the public. They were asking, on behalf of others, the essential questions. They were making their own the opinions, criticisms and protests of the people whom it is their duty to represent. I do not think we can decently challenge the validity of such representations on the part of the people. They are the democratic expression of a right, based on democratic principles and on the normal exercise of democratic privileges. Those who think that the legitimate representatives of the people have nothing to do with the claims of those who have elected them and who, through their taxes, are paying for the administration of the C.B.C., show utter contempt for democracy, in whose name they are none the less pursuing all their destructive campaigns.

I think Mr. Speaker, that we have a right to examine all the facts pertaining to the administration of the C.B.C. We have such a right because the people have recognized it in appointing us to represent them and to defend their interests in this house. We would be derelict in our duty if we evaded such a difficult and thankless task. We have a right to inquire into the cost of the C.B.C., because it is the people who are paying and because we are the official representatives of the people.

We also have a right to look into the ethics of the C.B.C., in order to assess the value of its program policies, and find out whether the C.B.C. is carrying out the purposes for which it was set up, and whether its activities are truly in line with the needs of the human community it is designed to serve.

I think some people fail to realize the importance of these basic problems, and tend to minimize the role of the people's representatives.

We are a legitimate government and as such, the trustees of the public welfare. We have the rights that correspond to that tremendous responsibility. There is an essential democratic principle involved here.

I have had occasions in the past to commend the C.B.C. in this house. I then had in mind certain high quality productions which deserve the highest praise. That is no reason why I should not criticize its other productions, whether of medium or of poor quality, and to judge them severely in view of what the taxpayer has to pay.

I recognize that, in this field as in others, no one can be perfect. Still, there are certain mistakes that should never be made, when the people are footing the bill. There are basic rules of caution which must be observed so as to keep to a minimum the risks involved in necessary experiments. To quote just one example, take the case of the broadcasting of the production: "La plus Belle de Céans". It cost the taxpayers $84,000. No one has ever denied it was a failure. A failure which was due, in the very words of Mr. Marcel Ouimet, to a "slackening of the usual supervisory machinery", which in plain English, means a lack of elementary supervision and precautions. Apart from its cost, it was a major blunder, considering the circumstances. Could anyone be surprised, therefore, that protests poured in after the broadcast, that an investigation was demanded, and that it was even urged that those responsible be fired for such a gross mistake, if we can so describe it, in view of the circumstances, the context and the atmosphere surrounding the event? Hardly anyone could be found, except the author of "La Vertu des Chattes" (The tabby-cat's virtue) to shield the responsible parties. Then finally a C.B.C. representative, Mr. Gerard Lamarche, summed up the situation by saying that if the C.B.C. sometimes blunders, it never does so deliberately.

Now, Mr. Speaker, you know why roses are red and violets are blue. This is the very height of justification. As if it were conceivable, in a field like the C.B.C. that people might goof with intent. I can't make head or tail of it, although I can see that the C.B.C., unaccustomed as it is to account for its deeds and misdeeds, has not yet hit upon the standard phrases and blanket alibis.

But reverting to my subject, I maintain that we were entitled, without underestimating the importance of the work done by the C.B.C., nor attempting to whittle down its public prestige or to discredit anyone, we were entitled, as I say, to have the C.B.C. account for itself. All the more so because the deficits piled up by the C.B.C. are forcing us to seek new funds from the taxpayers. I therefore feel no embarrassment in availing myself of representations made by the people to direct questions to the C.B.C. on its general policy, on its plans, on the philosophy behind its information activities, its recreational programs and on what it describes as its educational broadcasts, because I have received such representations from known public bodies, educational institutions, associations, religious societies, and individuals in all walks of life, all of whom are justly alarmed at the philosophy apparently prevailing in the C.B.C., which disregards the traditional and historical values of the Canadian community.

I do not think I am wrong in following up, in that matter, the directives of the bishops of the civil province of Quebec, who voiced serious and significant protests about the French network. My reason for speaking today is to give expression once again to all those representations, and to those which were made last summer by a group of citizens who met in Montreal to discuss the problems of our government radio and television systems.

May I take this opportunity to express astonishment at the fact that our friends of the Liberal party did not deem it necessary to file a strong protest against the program I mentioned a while ago, and at the fact that they did not comment on the episcopal collective letter. Their only steps were those in defence of the three gentlemen of the English network who took it into their heads one day, in order to protect their meagre fees, to stir up a war against what they called political interference, which, in any case, they could never prove. Nothing else mattered, no, neither the philosophy of the C.B.C., the intellectual as well as the moral dangers of some programs nor the slant of its information. All of a sudden, Messrs. Peers, Gillis and Trotter of Toronto were the C.B.C., with a Montreal branch run by Laurendeau and Gagnon. Let us recognize, Mr. Speaker, that we ran a great risk in that case, and that Canada as a whole was never closer to a catastrophe. The point was this: those men were resigning because they were no longer allowed their daily gravy, so miserably earned by their few minutes of commentaries every morning. Without that breeze from Toronto each morning, the nation would wither away. An executive's weakness removed the threat, the program was resumed and Messrs. Gagnon and Laurendeau did not have to resign and actually were saved from an embarrassing financial flop.

The moral of this story is that the government has no right to raise its voice in criticism, be it a shadow of criticism. The people's representatives have no right to complain about the huge costs of the C.B.C., they have no right to say that programs of questionable quality are costing huge amounts; even less are they allowed to think that slanted information is a bad thing. No, this is all political interference. The result is that we accept the existence of a state within the state, and that our sole recognized right is the right to vote money to a corporation without knowing exactly what use is being made of it.

Mr. Speaker, I say that the rights and privileges of the C.B.C. are those which are granted and recognized by parliament, that this parliament has the right to demand an accounting and that the members of parliament have the right, like other citizens, and on behalf of the citizens they represent, to complain about the C.B.C. Otherwise we are allowing the establishment of feudal benefice, of game preserves, which sooner or later become a burden upon the state and a threat to its security. The Canada Council, if you allow me to say so, is becoming that type of mighty organization which disclaims any responsibility towards parliament.

Mr. Pigeon: That is true.

Mr. Tremblay: I believe, Mr. Speaker, that if we allow the setting up of such organizations, we are endangering the rights of parliament and democratic privileges. The people of Canada are forced to accept institutions which they are called upon to maintain and provide for, but which do not accept corresponding obligations towards the people.

Those are the views I put forward last year in the committee on broadcasting. I have tried to uphold the principles of a responsible government. Moreover, I feel this is the purpose for which the committees of the house are set up, so that from time to time the members may have the opportunity to analyse in detail the administration they entrust to officials. Thus, the members in turn are in a position to account to the public, to explain the machinery of administration and to justify the expenditures so incurred.

I repeat that the committee on broadcasting could not perform its duties. It has been more or less a smokescreen, because it did not have the means to get the necessary information. The discussions were hampered with all kinds of technicalities of procedure. I do not hesitate to say also that the French speaking members did not have the opportunity to go into a full and detailed study of the French network administration.

Therefore, I regret that this committee has not been re-established sooner. Needless to say that what has been announced in that regard—that is, that we would be studying instead the problems of private stations—could not satisfy those who believe that before judging private enterprise and setting up rules and regulations for it, we should first settle the affairs of the government owned corporation.

I feel that the public radio network is costing the taxpayers enough money to justify us in trying, first of all, to clarify the situation there. If we can manage to restore to it an inspiration and a policy in conformity with its objectives and aims, then we shall be able to hold it as an example and use it as a model, for who can claim that it has really improved?

The complaints made by the public last year still stand. We might even say that the C.B.C. has tightened certain policies and seems to challenge public opinion. Mr. Alphonse Ouimet, its president, took the lead when he announced certain changes—changes of form at the most, aimed at fooling the public—in the management of the corporation.

In an interview with Mr. Claude Paulette, on October 1, 1959, during the T.V. news program at 11 o'clock at night, he did not hesitate to say that the recommendations of the committee on broadcasting had nothing to do with the changes he was announcing.

With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote what was said during that interview which is really, as will be seen, a masterpiece of insolence:

Mr. Paulette: Do you think that the changes which you have just made at the higher level of administration of the C.B.C. will meet the recommendations of the parliamentary committee on broadcasting?

Mr. Ouimet: I think the committee was not specific, except on one point. The committee recommended the appointment of a senior officer responsible for all programming across the country and also for the control of the costs of programs. The board of directors and the management of the C.B.C. do not believe it is possible to place such a responsibility upon one man alone because we have 90,000 programs a year, both French and English, national programs and regional programs. What we did, therefore, was to divide this responsibility between three general directors, each responsible for one sector of our programs.

Mr. Paulette: Could it be said that the changes you made were entirely due to the recommendations of the committee on broadcasting?

Mr. Ouimet: In fact, that organization was planned at least two years ago. The idea was to reduce the number of senior officers directly under the authority of the general manager at that time, or the president now.

Mr. Paulette: Does that reorganization mean that your programming policy is going to change?

Mr. Ouimet: Not at all. Organization is one thing and the programming policy is another, altogether different thing.

Mr. Paulette: Can other changes be expected at the lower levels of the C.B.C.?

Mr. Ouimet: I could not tell you, for the whole C.B.C. organization is under consideration at the moment, and I do not know whether other improvements can be introduced outside the head office. Of course, if any become apparent they will be introduced if necessary.

[Mr. Tremblay.]

It was quite a blow. The patient had really recovered; he had all the strength needed to jeer at the minister responsible for the C.B.C., at the government and at members of parliament.

This explains why known commentators were brought back so quickly, why our institutions were again the target of attacks, why anyone could say anything on the government owned radio or television network as long as his words bore the stamp of that spirit of anarchy that has been denounced on many occasions in certain circles.

There still prevails in the C.B.C. this amoral atmosphere consisting of a complete disregard of principles inspired by Catholic and Christian ethics; as in the case of the frequently harmful movies that are shown without any consideration for the education of the public for which they are intended, and for its ability to make necessary reservations. Still scheduled are certain T.V. serials that are an outrageous caricature of the life, morals and languages of French Canadians; others that are downright stupid, or padded versions of writings of merit, but now made devoid of all sense and significance. The odious program "Music Hall" is still running, as is the inept program "Coq à l'âne" and the unqualifiable "En première", where nothing but insipid scripts have been offered, most of them reflecting a sense of morbidity already too much in honour in the C.B.C. There are many other programs quite as questionable; entertaining programs, would say Mr. Marcel Ouimet, but which promote a taste for the nonsensical and trifling, when they do not simply undermine authority, or principles and values worthy of the highest respect.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Rumilly will like this.

Mr. Tremblay: And those gentlemen, last year, at the time of the strike, labelled this "French culture". I am all for culture, as long as it means the elimination of American-inspired programs, nonsense of all kinds, caricatures of our language, programs of questionable moral quality, and those young people's programs that prompt our young people to break free from parental authority as soon as possible and to seek entertainment outside the home. What will be left, after all that? Surely there are some excellent programs, but on the whole unfortunately, there are too few.

I shall have the opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to come back to the specific matter of programs. I shall then be able to specify the general criticisms I have just made, because it is not my intention to cast reflection on those C.B.C. officials who are doing remarkable work with a scrupulous conscientiousness and in a spirit steeped in the best cultural traditions.

What I denounce is everything that is done under the sign of improvisation, of amateurism and incompetence, not to mention the motives of profit and commercialism that mark the activity of certain stars and of certain producers.

There is also inefficiency at the top. The accumulated and repeated deficits of the C.B.C. had already shown it up on another plane. The C.B.C. programs are still more eloquent in this respect.

That is why I advocate early and drastic reforms in the whole structure of the crown corporation, providing:

1. That a crown minister be directly responsible for that public body as well as for the national film board, and other cultural government bodies;

2. That a deputy minister be especially appointed to serve as a liaison officer between the minister and the corporation;

3. That an advisory committee be set up, composed of prominent personalities in the religious, educational, social, artistic, cultural and economic fields; which advisory committee would have to make a complete study of the corporation's program policy and, when needed, act as a board of censorship;

4. That competitions be organized for the recruiting of performers of all kinds, in co-operation with the conservatory of music and drama of the province, schools of fine arts and the various artistic and cultural bodies of the province of Quebec;

5. That competitions be organized for the selection of radio and television scripts, and that a jury, recruited among personalities of the literary and artistic world, be appointed to judge those scripts, in co-operation with the C.B.C. producers;

6. That the annual budget of the C.B.C. be included in the estimates of government expenditures and thus be open to criticism by the taxpayers' legitimate representatives.

Those suggestions do not prevent me from hoping that, in the near future, the setting up of a provincial radio network may look after purely educational programs, in order to put an end to that further federal interference in provincial affairs, through the medium of the C.B.C.

Those suggestions, Mr. Speaker, could serve as a basis for reorganizing the C.B.C. I claim that they are the last word in the matter. However, I do think they deal with some of the most important aspects of the general problem. I realize there are difficulties involved; they will certainly be interpreted as an attempt to make the C.B.C. subservient to politics. I do not think that is the case, and such is not my intention; in any case, they would have the advantage of making plain civil servants out of the regular employees of the C.B.C.—in this I do not include performers and writers—and would allow the government to exercise closer control over the corporation's finances. Such a reorganization would in no way impede the C.B.C.'s really cultured and artistic activity. It would however guarantee a better control over a government organization which, under the guise of freedom of speech or of thought, must not be left to the whims or will of coteries which strive to thrust their views, feelings, ideas or prejudices upon the people. Instead of being some kind of a state within the state, the C.B.C. would become again what it should be, an organization representative of our environment and reflecting its philosophy, its principles, its social, religious, political, artistic and cultural life, its aspirations, its concerns and various trends of thought.

(Text):

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): Mr. Speaker, in order to appreciate the full significance of this year's budget I thought it might be useful to study a few flashbacks of the important events which have not only challenged Canada's strength and ingenuity in the past but which indicate clearly the magnitude of the problems that Canadians of this generation will have to face. Everyone will agree, I believe, that since confederation tremendous economic, social and political changes have taken place within the boundaries of our country which are indicative of and comparable with similar changes in the world as a whole. The extremely rapid pace with which these changes have been made in our country and in the world is to my mind of particular significance, and should be foremost in our thinking with respect to what is to happen in the remaining 40 years of this century.

Since the turn of the century the pace of our economic and social evolution has accelerated, and has gained a momentum which in many respects is causing justified anxiety. The tempo of life is quickening and the concept of values has changed. Materialism in all levels of society, particularly on the North American continent, has reached the point of being the accepted criterion of economic, social and even political consideration. So far as transportation is concerned, the world has shrunk so that now we are but a few hours away from the farthest geographical point, and we are even engaged in conquering outer space. Economic and military isolationism is now unrealistic. Absolute sovereignty in now sacrificed for economic and national security. The concept of international trade has so evolved that it is causing us serious trade problems. The world is split into two opposing ideological camps, and continues to face the possibility of a disastrous economic war or incredibly horrible military suicide.

In spite of these very real and undeniable problems and challenges, Mr. Speaker, the government, after having undermined Canada's financial stability, could offer to the country nothing more than the undecided budget that the Minister of Finance brought down the other evening, and which is characteristic of the policy of this "we knew it all" government. There have been serious problems and challenges in the past, but they have not been solved by indecision. The first world war taught us that Canada would no longer be excluded from international conflicts in other areas of the world, and we also learned that Canada was not immune to world economic disturbances.

[Mr. Tremblay.]

The economic depression of the 1930's was a challenge to Canada. In 1935, Mr. Speaker, did Mackenzie King ask the opposition what they would do under the circumstances, as the Prime Minister has done ever since he assumed office? No, Mr. Speaker; Mackenzie King launched into what was then a revolutionary and extensive social legislative program, which in fact was opposed in part by the Conservatives, with the result that all the social legislation we have on our statute books today, and which indeed has become an essential crutch for our economy, is due to the foresight, planning and courage of Mackenzie King and the Liberal government of that day.

Mr. Grafftey: He consulted the crystal ball.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is utter bunk.

Mr. Cardin: In 1939 Canada was faced with another challenge, the second world war. At that time we did not have ships, guns or planes. Not only did we not have them, but we did not even have the industries by which they could be built. Did Right Hon. C. D. Howe ask the opposition what they would do in the circumstances? No, Mr. Speaker; Right Hon. C. D. Howe faced up to his responsibilities and took the means of building the ships, planes and guns, and in doing so he also gave birth to Canadian industry.

Mr. Pallett: He did not ask anybody, not even his own party.

Mr. Bourget: Why should he ask you?

Mr. Pallett: He did not even ask his own party.

Mr. Cardin: The new international relationships that were made obligatory during and after the last world war were another new challenge to Canada. A whole new concept of our external relations made it necessary to revamp the Department of External Affairs, to set up in the countries of the world Canadian embassies and missions and to train and send Canadian representatives to international conferences such as the United Nations and NATO, in the formation of which, by the way, Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent played a great part. For a country that prior to the second world war had relatively no Canadian representation abroad, Canada has more than held its own in the diplomatic field, and we owe a tribute of appreciation to the foreign service officers and members of the Department of External Affairs for their hard work and the exceptionally remarkable success they have achieved in such a short time.

But in the face of the complicated and pressing problems of a rapidly changing world, did the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), when he was secretary of state for external affairs, ask the opposition what they would do in the circumstances, as the present Secretary of State for External Affairs has done since he has taken over that portfolio?

An hon. Member: Bosh.

Mr. Cardin: No, Mr. Speaker; the secretary of state for external affairs in the former government assumed his responsibilities and made his decisions without fear of being repudiated by his prime minister.

Mr. Pallett: Perhaps he could answer that question.

Mr. Ricard: He abstained from voting when the situation was too tough.

Mr. Cardin: As a result of his competence, his tireless efforts and effective contributions in our struggle toward world peace, he was awarded the Nobel peace prize.

Another challenge to Canadian ingenuity was the post-war period when men in the armed forces had to be reintegrated into the working force, when industry had to be converted from military production to peacetime production after going through an almost incredible period of expansion. Did Right Hon. Mr. St. Laurent ask the opposition what they would do in the circumstances? No, Mr. Speaker; he faced up to his responsibilities and took the steps that the circumstances required without considering whether or not they were popular or politically advantageous. Nor did he preach economy to the country and indulge in record governmental expenditures as the Minister of Finance is now doing.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Would the hon. member permit a question? Would he mind being specific and saying where the money is being wasted at the present time, or being spent unnecessarily?

Mr. Pearson: Hundreds of millions wasted.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): National defence.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I did not ask the hon. member for Essex East, I was asking the hon. member who made the assertion.

Mr. Cardin: I did not say that money was wasted. I just suggested that the expenditures of the government are increasing, and that was all I said. I do not believe the Minister of Finance can deny that. Right Hon. Mr. St. Laurent did not preach economy to anybody; he did, however, administer the country within the very realistic limitation of the country's capacity to pay. The result was that the Conservatives, who were the eloquent but false prophets of gloom and doom of that day and who each year since 1945 had predicted that the war boom would end and the country would be thrown into a catastrophic depression, were politically disappointed because the recessions which started in 1948 and 1953 were stemmed by appropriate and effective action of the government of the day. The 1957 recession, which occurred five months after the Conservatives came to power and from which the Minister of Finance, in three budget speeches, claimed Canada was emerging has not, in spite of the minister's statement, been stemmed.

In the light of the challenges with which our national economy, our international trade and our national security are being presented today, it was disconcerting to note the complacency with which the Minister of Finance basked in the very partisan applause of government members as he brought down his budget—

Mr. Pallett: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Cardin: I will be happy to answer all my hon. friend's questions after I have finished what I have to say.

Mr. Pallett: I just wondered if the hon. member was under the impression that we were still in a recession.

Mr. Cardin: I will answer questions after I have finished what I have to say. It was actually frightening to witness the minister's coyest and toothiest smile as he announced, after bringing down repeated record deficits, that this Conservative party, which in 1957 claimed to have the answer to all the problems, had finally given birth to a microscopic surplus of $12 million. This is true if, of course, you do not count the $210 million in total cash deficits which the government will have to borrow during the current year.

So, Mr. Speaker, a toothy smile and a debatable forecast of a $12 million surplus are the only assets which our Minister of Finance, with the excitement, the pride and the naiveté of a nouveau riche, has to offer as a solution to the ever challenging economic, social, trade and security problems facing the country. Not only is this year's budget indicative of the government's alarming indecision and lack of plan and foresight in all fields, but once again the government has used the propaganda gimmick—in this case a nominal or fictitious surplus—in order to camouflage the true insignificance of the budget and its complete inadequacy to meet the real problems facing the government.

This time it is the Canadian people who must foot the bill for this latest Conservative publicity stunt, because the surplus was obtained at the expense of the 800,000 unemployed who were ignored in the budget and to whom nothing was offered, not even words of encouragement that a solution would be found to the very real and pressing unemployment emergency.

This surplus was obtained also at the expense of the provinces and municipalities who are still waiting for the equitable share of taxes promised to them three years ago. The two thirds of the civil service which was ignored in the budget and which had every right to claim an increase in salary also contributed to the Conservative propaganda surplus. So did the farmers, to whom so much had been promised by the Conservatives. Their net revenue dropped 7 per cent in 1959, yet the government proposes to do nothing about it.

We may ask, by shirking these real problems and responsibilities has the government effectively cut down its expenditures? No, Mr. Speaker; government expenditures this year will be $173 million more than they were last year. Because the Conservative policy of promising more than the country could afford, and because of the extremely high interest rates on our national debt, for which the government is responsible, the government is now caught in a vicious financial circle which apparently leaves no room for the consideration or solution of the fundamental problems that are now challenging our economy.

I was literally shocked to hear the minister say, as recorded at page 2671 of Hansard:

> Our people have demanded social security, services and facilities from all levels of government on an expanding scale.

He says, "our people have demanded". Why, Mr. Speaker, the Conservatives not only claimed that this expanded social security was financially possible, they actually promised it in 1957. Not only did they promise it, they also promised to reduce taxes by $500 million as well. I submit that it is the height of arrogance, the height of effrontery for the Minister of Finance, after having blamed the previous Liberal government and the Bank of Canada for the present financial impasse, to attempt now to lay the blame on the people of Canada who had no reason to suppose that the Conservative promises were not only empty and irresponsible but, indeed, economically dangerous. Surely the Minister of Finance and the Conservative party must have realized these dangers.

If the government have no solution to the problems before us, at least they should have the decency to recognize and accept responsibility for their own mistakes without trying to lay the blame anywhere and everywhere except where the blame really belongs.

How insignificant, Mr. Speaker, is the $12 million surplus compared to the $2.3 billion deficit the government has incurred over the past three years without being able to point to any real solution to any of the problems that now face us, and when in fact the increased payments in social benefits have been swallowed up and neutralized by high taxes, high interest rates and the high cost of living. How shallow and empty are the minister's words of confidence and smiles of self-satisfaction compared to the gravity and urgency of the real economic problems which he left out of his speech. The minister did not mention in his speech that the best economists in the country are agreed that the so-called Conservative prosperity, with its alarmingly high rate of unemployment, will cease and we will have at the end of 1960 the depression that the Conservatives prophesied under the Liberal regime.

How will the government, which has no financial reserves whatsoever, which has increased the national debt by $2.3 billion in three years, and which has burdened the economy for many years with an extremely high interest rate, be able to meet the financial obligations of a depression? How will the government, which in a period of so-called prosperity has seen its unemployment insurance fund decline from $874,574,000, in 1957 to $408,145,000 in February, 1960 be able to cope with the catastrophic number of unemployed which is characterized of a period of depression?

What is the government going to do about the continually increasing international payments deficit which rose this year to an unprecedented $1.5 billion? What confidence can Canadians have in a government which spent $5,607 million on our national defence last year and intends to spend this year $5,880 million, when we know that our national security seems to be centred around a useless Bomarc which the United States has discarded, and our obsolete CF-100's? The government apparently has no plans whatsoever for providing Canada with alternative adequate defence equipment, in spite of the fact that Canada's geographic position makes her a likely theatre for a third world war. Not only does the government not have a policy but it apparently refuses to discuss defence policy in this house or in committees set up for this purpose.

These are the facts, Mr. Speaker, which make the minister's $12 million surplus utterly ridiculous and insignificant, and which prove clearly that the government is not up to the responsibilities the people conferred upon it in 1957. Not only is the government lacking in foresight, in planning and in leadership; it is also lacking in courage to face up to the problems and inform the public of the seriousness and the urgency of finding solutions to problems which now threaten Canada's economy and security. The government apparently still prefers to hide behind smiles and verbiage to save its face, but in doing so it is jeopardizing the true welfare of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, when Sir Wilfrid Laurier stated that the twentieth century would belong to Canada, he did not say there would be no problems and no challenges in our path. He took it for granted that these problems and challenges would be faced squarely and fearlessly. However, in making his prediction I am afraid Sir Wilfrid Laurier had not counted on Conservative indecision and maladministration.

Mr. Pallett: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member a couple of questions. First of all, is he of the opinion that there is presently a recession in Canada; and second, where did he get the figures he quoted about defence expenditures?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We are facing a very uneconomic situation, and this government has no policy.

Mr. Cardin: If the hon. member wants me to answer his question, I did not claim we were now in a recession. I stated that the best economists in the country so prophesied, and I would refer the hon. member to the report of General Research Associates Limited, March issue, which claims that at the end of 1960 or the beginning of 1961 we are going to be in a serious recession.

Mr. Pallett: Would the hon. member answer the second question about the defence expenditure figures?

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Speaker, I took down the figures from the budget debate, from the minister's speech and the estimates. The hon. member will agree, I am sure that the Minister of Finance, in all his confusing reports, can quote figures which he can defend. I can quote figures which I can defend also, and they will not be exactly the same figures.

Mr. Pallett: The hon. member mentioned defence expenditures of $5,000 million odd.

Mr. Cardin: No, I said $5,880 million—$5 billion.

Mr. Pallett: They are the same.

Mr. O. H. Phillips (Prince): Mr. Speaker, my first words must be of congratulation to the Minister of Finance for his budget and its presentation. The fact that the Minister of Finance was able to introduce a balanced budget despite increased expenditures and without tax increases is, I think, a credit to his ability as minister. Most of the editorial comment has been very favourable, and I think the average Canadian is agreeably surprised that the budget is being balanced without tax increases.

Now a word on the subamendment which will be voted on this afternoon. I would refer specifically to the self-liquidating investment fund. I checked with the Oxford dictionary, and I found that the word "liquidating" when applied to business usually refers to bankruptcy. I think the subamendment can aptly be described as bankrupt.

While the minister has received a great many compliments, perhaps he would appreciate a suggestion along with the compliments he has received. I refer particularly to the reduced expenditures of the Department of Public Works. I have a number of projects in my constituency which, while not deleted, have unfortunately been delayed. I know the policy of reducing public works expenditures when a budget is being balanced; it is not new. Past ministers of finance have usually reduced public works expenditures too, but I wonder if in the long run this does not cost us more. Quite often there are emergency repairs and emergency dredging in various harbours which have to be carried out, and I think it increases the total cost of these projects.

The tariff changes are most welcome, and I think will be very beneficial to the textile industry in particular. Last year the potato growers received additional protection, protection which had been requested for years from the previous government. This year they have received greater protection. The tariff on processed potatoes entering this country will help that industry here, which is only in its infancy in Canada. During the present session of the Prince Edward Island legislature there has been considerable discussion over the efforts of the Prince Edward Island government to establish in that province a processing plant for potatoes. I am sure the tariff protection provided in this field will give them an extra incentive to bring their efforts to a successful conclusion.

In discussing the economy of the Atlantic provinces I had hoped to compare the percentage of the population with the gross national product, but I find there is no breakdown by areas.

Our primary industries are those associated with agriculture and fisheries, and perhaps a word on these two subjects might be appropriate at this time. Agriculture in the Atlantic provinces enjoyed a very good year in 1959. Our net farm income in Prince Edward Island will be almost identical with that for the year 1958, which was the second best year on record. Fishermen on the Atlantic coast enjoyed their best year in history in 1959. Total fish landings were worth $60 million for the year; and when we consider the employment that is provided in processing plants, the total value of the Atlantic fisheries is obviously far greater than the landed value. Our fisheries in Prince Edward Island are, of course, much smaller than those of Nova Scotia and Newfoundland, but we had a record landing amounting to $4.2 million.

It is interesting to note the increase which has taken place in landings over the past decade. In 1949 the landed value in Prince Edward Island was $2.1 million. In 1959 it was $4.2 million, an increase of over 100 per cent in the decade. I may say that the greatest increase has occurred in the last few years and is partly due to increased prices received for the fish, especially by the lobster fishermen. It is also due to the efforts of the Department of Fisheries to modernize and improve fishing methods. More long-liners and draggers are being used, and the Department of Fisheries through the subsidy on these vessels and the loans provided by the provincial loans board is continuing to assist in the expansion of this industry.

During the present session we have heard a great deal about unemployment but very little about employment. During the past year employment in Prince Edward Island was at a record level. We had more people working last year than at any time in our history. This is probably due to the number of federal projects being carried out in the province, including the expansion of the R.C.A.F. station at Summerside, the Charlottetown airport, roads to resources, and public works.

While our employment has been high, wages unfortunately have not been high. In 1956 the average wage in Canada was $64.44. In Prince Edward Island it was only $47.50, and in Nova Scotia $52.90. In New Brunswick it was $55.10. In 1959 the average wage was $73.47. In Prince Edward Island it was $54.75; in Nova Scotia, $60.17 and in New Brunswick $60.39 per week. If we are to improve the economy of the Atlantic provinces and establish industries it is essential that we should increase our basic weekly wage. There is a tendency for the low wage rates in the maritimes to become perpetuated in a number of ways. The average wage in respect of federal contracts is considerably lower than in the rest of Canada. In the past winter I received complaints that the C.N.R. was paying 70 cents an hour for labour used to shovel snow. I think hon. members will agree that this situation is extremely bad, and that efforts must be made to correct it.

There is in the maritime provinces today new interest and a feeling of encouragement over the results of a number of actions taken by this government. These actions include the adjustment grants given to the Atlantic provinces. The grants have been the greatest morale boost to the maritimes since confederation. We have also received assistance to establish thermal power plants, and we have received other forms of help which have laid the foundation for an improved future. I think the time has now come to act and build upon that foundation.

Our two main difficulties are lack of industry and transportation problems. In the past, under the Liberal government, industry in the maritime provinces—and the maritime provinces in general—was neglected. The former government had a policy of giving us a one-way ticket out of the maritimes, and it was aided in that regard by the genius of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, who was very much in agreement with that policy.

In order to develop new industry in the maritime provinces we must have funds, and I suggest the establishment of a federal-provincial development fund for the maritime provinces. This fund could be used to extend our present industries and also to establish new industries, preferably in conjunction with our primary products of the farm and sea. The interest rate should be low enough to attract firms to the maritime provinces, and certainly it should not be above the rate charged on farm loans at the present time.

I think this should be a joint fund of the dominion and provincial governments, and I hold this view for several reasons. First of all, maritimers themselves have a responsibility for improving their lot. We should play our part. Second, the provincial governments themselves have various plans for the establishment of industry. New Brunswick and Nova Scotia have already done a great deal to establish industries in their provinces, and the new government of Prince Edward Island has plans along the same lines. We should take advantage of their experience and of the experience and advice of the APEC.

Third, in the maritime provinces there is a suspicion of advice and direction from Ottawa. We dislike the idea of some official taking a two-day expedition to the Atlantic provinces and then returning as an authority on our problems and giving advice to the government. In fact, if I may refer to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate again, I would say that he is a classic example of the type of individual who causes suspicion in the maritime provinces. He comes down for a couple of days at election time, and then returns and grows wheat on his farm in Rockcliffe.

A second method of developing industry in the maritime provinces would be through more consideration by and contacts with the Department of Defence Production. The present minister has gone a long way toward correcting several unfair situations that occurred under the former administration, notably that of the grouping of tenders. Formerly a number of tenders were called together, and there was always at least one product with respect to which the maritime firms could not compete. This grouping has been largely eliminated, and its elimination has benefited us to a great extent in the Atlantic provinces. However, I should like consideration given to the United States plan of giving preference to depressed areas; where there is a labour surplus in one area, of giving a certain preference to the tender from that area.

I think we could also break up the tendency of having goods delivered to a central warehouse in Ontario. A couple of years ago a maritime firm tendered on a contract for army boots. The tender of the maritime firm was 9 cents a pair higher than that of a firm in central Canada, but they were required to deliver the boots to a warehouse in Ontario and they lost the contract. But when the boots were delivered to the warehouse in Ontario the army promptly shipped a large portion of them back to Camp Gagetown. If the maritime firm had been allowed to deliver those boots to Camp Gagetown they could have tendered successfully.

Our second problem is transportation. It is not a new problem by any means. It has been plaguing us since confederation, and has increased considerably since world war II. Last year in the house I suggested that the Department of Transport give consideration to the establishment of a sea-train service. The department has taken notice of this suggestion and has given some consideration to it. But in the meantime I wonder whether we are not moving a bit too slowly in this regard. The United States is taking quite seriously sea-train, container service, or "fish-back", or whatever you care to call it. At the present time 17 vessels are under construction in the United States for this service.

I refer to an article in the Globe and Mail of May 20, 1959, which quotes an official of Grace Lines Incorporated as predicting that in the next 15 years the majority of general cargo ships will be of the container type, that is to say they will be ships that take general cargo aboard in large vans, in which it is trucked directly from the shipside to the consignee. An article in the Duluth-Minnesota News Tribune of October 15, 1959 states that the interstate commerce commission has authorized "fish-back" container service from Duluth to Detroit and Cleveland. I feel that this type of service could be adapted from the maritimes to the ports on the seaway, and that the ports of Halifax and Saint John could be utilized on a year-round basis. This service could also be utilized for the shipment of products to the developed areas in northern Quebec and Labrador. The products could be placed in the container vans, shipped to Seven Islands and on by rail from this area.

We in the maritimes are greatly interested in the royal commission that is at present studying the transportation problem. However, we have a suspicion that transportation commissions tend to rehash what other commissions have gone over. When you consider the briefs that are submitted to these commissions you find that they are similar to previous briefs, and that each report of a royal commission on transportation seems to devote a good deal of space to reference to previous reports. If we looked around for different methods I think perhaps we could accomplish more than by attempting to doctor up our present methods of transportation.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CARDIN—REFERENCE TO REMARKS IN DEBATE EARLIER TODAY

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I inadvertently misinformed the house earlier today by stating that the government expenditures for 1959 were $5,670 million and in 1960, $5,880 million. What I had intended to say was that in 1959 the government's defence expenditures were $1,422 million and in 1960, $1,528 million. I was hoping that perhaps Hansard would make the correction.

I also wish to thank the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Pallett) for having brought the statement to my attention.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) that Mr.

Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Benidickson, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Regier.

Mr. Phillips: Before one o'clock I was discussing the transportation problems of the maritime provinces. No discussion of our problems would be complete without reference to the three C's, namely the Prince Edward Island causeway, the Chignecto canal and the corridor road across Maine. These matters are now under study, and it is difficult to say too much until the studies are completed.

The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker) has told me that an interim report on the causeway will be available shortly. I will make no further comment other than to say I hope we do not have too many interim reports and that a decision will soon be reached on this vital project. If for any reason a causeway is not feasible, then we must have plans approved immediately for the construction of a new rail carrying ferry for the Borden-Cape Tormentine route. I am naturally more interested in a causeway than in the other two projects but the Chignecto canal has taken on new importance with the announcement that there is a possibility of increased industry in the area if a canal is constructed.

There is a tendency to look upon these projects as a means of providing temporary employment in the maritimes. I think this attitude is entirely wrong. These projects should be looked at as part of the general development of the maritimes. If we are able to establish industry, improve our transportation problems, keep our young people at home, raise the population of the maritimes by a minimum of half a million people, we will have solved an awful lot of our difficulties; we will have a local market for our manufacturing and primary producers.

Recently I received a copy of the budget address delivered in the Prince Edward Island legislature. One part of that address should be very interesting to members of this house. It is the statement that 56 per cent of Prince Edward Island's revenues are obtained through grants from the federal government. We could only have achieved this large percentage of grants through the efforts of our present Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and our able Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming). We look forward with confidence to the next full scale dominion-provincial fiscal conference, and we are sure our problems will receive the same sympathetic consideration then as they received in 1957.

[Mr. Cardin.]

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, the occasion of the budget debate is the second and the last opportunity of hon. members to speak in general terms on the policies, general and financial, of the government and, within certain limitations, to speak on matters affecting their own constituencies, their own provinces and the country; also, on international affairs and relationships.

It is not my intention as I rise to speak in the budget debate to criticize the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) because he has brought in what might be called an interim budget, nor to criticize him, as has been done by some people and by editorial writers and suggest that he is waiting to introduce a budget of a more beneficial nature to the majority of the people of Canada just prior to an election. To me that is not an important piece of criticism because it is the general policy of governments and of election expediency to follow that procedure.

It may be a number of years before a change is made and a budget is introduced on the understanding that its underlying principle is the welfare of the country and not election expediency. However, in applying myself to the budget speech made by the Minister of Finance I personally can come to only one conclusion, namely that the principal motivating idea behind the remarks of the Minister of Finance the other day was that it is good policy to leave a few things unsaid. On analysis I do not think the budget speech of the Minister of Finance can be interpreted in any other way than that he considers it good policy to leave a few things unsaid.

This afternoon I want to speak on some of the things which the minister left unsaid. I can find no better way to introduce my remarks than to draw to the attention of hon. members the fact that in previous sessions, and even in the present session, I have made the statement that Conservatives and Liberals, in government and out, supporting a free enterprise system as they do, stand completely indicted because the record of Canada conclusively proves that the only time we have anywhere near full employment in Canada is in time of war when men and women offer their lives for their country and goods are produced for destruction. But when men and women of Canada want to live for their country, to produce for consumption in a useful manner, then we reach the position where we find ourselves in a period of depression, recession and unemployment, as at the present time.

As I have already informed you, Mr. Speaker, I have made this statement once in the present session and previously in other sessions, and I have been sneered at and jeered at from the government side because I said it. So, how better can I introduce my remarks in the budget debate this afternoon than to ask those who sit on the government side of the house this question? If they will not listen to an analysis by the group of eight in this corner of the house, will they pay any attention to an analysis made by one of their own members? I refer, of course, to the speech made on April 6 by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe). It was quite remarkable how quiet Conservative members were when he made this statement, as found at page 2966 of Hansard:

> For over 30 years I have sat here and listened to vigorous debates on the unemployment problem, only to see it temporarily relieved from time to time by the grim necessities of wartime. That is not good enough and I do not believe we have to endure it.

That was the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe speaking. If the treasury benches and Conservative members generally do not want to listen to us who have been saying the same thing for so many years, will they listen to what was said by one of their own members who, according to his own statement, has now heard one third of all the budgets ever delivered in the House of Commons of Canada? It is because of what he tried to say that I want to make my views known in the budget debate.

I not only listened to the Minister of Finance when he delivered his budget speech on Thursday night last week but I have read twice everything he said on that occasion and I want to say in unequivocal terms that the Minister of Finance in his presentation let the people of Canada down because of his refusal to face the facts and realities as they exist in our country. I was, as I think everybody else was, happy to hear him say that Canada is prosperous and booming but for the Minister of Finance of Canada to stand up in his place and ignore completely, with the exception of two sentences, the situation of the low income groups and the unemployed is a dereliction of responsibility on the part of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The hon. member really does not believe that at all.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has been a member of parliament for a few years. I have had the honour of being a member of parliament or a member of a legislature for 27 years. Let me tell him that in the over 20 years I was in the British Columbia legislature and the seven years that I have been here I have never made any statement in which I did not believe. I hope that the hon. member has the same sincerity with regard to his responsibilities that I have with respect to mine. I say that we are happy that in the opinion of the Minister of Finance the majority of the people have prosperity and there is a boom in Canada. But I say that the Minister of Finance, having regard to the responsibilities of his position, was derelict in his almost complete omission of any reference to any discussion, let alone planning, with respect to the condition of the low income group, the pensioned group and in particular the unemployed of Canada.

Just over a year ago there was a disaster in Springhill. That disaster meant a great deal to the people of Canada and to the members of the house. Much was said by the government about the disaster, about the horror of the men who died, the heroes who tried to bring them out alive or dead and what the federal government would do for the people of Springhill. A year has gone by and what has been done for the people of Springhill? I was there about a week ago. According to figures I was given there are over 700 unemployed. Where are the new industries that the government was going to establish there? There are two, a battery plant employing approximately 34 people and a woodworking plant employing seven on part time. There is to be a new prison that may eventually employ about 53 people. Is there anything else? No.

Mr. Cardiff: What did you expect them to do, build a whole new town?

Mr. Winch: I certainly expect a government that has said there shall be no undue suffering in Canada to keep its promises.

Mr. MacEwan: Mr. Speaker, will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Winch: The hon. member who has just interrupted had a lot to say last year but what has he to say about Springhill today?

Mr. MacEwan: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Winch: I intend to continue my speech. You can ask your questions when I sit down. It might be helpful if you would represent your part of the country better than you have done in the past.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): But he represents Springhill.

Mr. Winch: You cannot tell me that there is a boom in Nova Scotia. No, there are grave and great troubles down there. Was there any mention in the speech of the Minister of Finance as to how that kind of problem is going to be handled? Was there any mention of the fact that when Avro took over Dosco they promised that coal mines would be open, not closed, but now there are fewer coal mines than there were before? When Avro took over Dosco citizens of Nova Scotia were turning out axles for railway freight cars. Now that is no longer being done in Nova Scotia because of Avro direction and control outside of Canada. The axles are coming from overseas. Are there any plans with respect to coal mining, with respect to the machining of parts that were previously made in Canada? Are there any plans for the 700 unemployed in Springhill?

Let us go to the other side of the country, to British Columbia. At the invitation of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) and the president of Trans-Canada Air Lines I had the opportunity to travel home on a jet plane about two weeks ago. What is the situation there? According to the government's own figures, there are over 80,000 unemployed in British Columbia and the Yukon. In the construction industry alone there are over 12,000 unemployed. In the budget speech was there any mention of methods or plans by which these problems could be dealt with? No. There are just two sentences to the effect that things are not going right. In other words, we find that the policy speech of the Minister of Finance is one of wishful thinking, one of drift and absolute refusal to face up to the realities of the situation; a refusal to do any planning on behalf of those who are not prosperous.

What is the policy of the government with regard to planning for stopping the loss of industries and keeping people employed? There is none. In British Columbia during the past six months the whaling industry has been nonexistent, and this is the first time that has happened in 10 years. It is a small industry I admit, but it does mean an amount of $600,000 in annual payroll and it has meant several hundred thousands of dollars also to those who supply services such as petroleum companies, shipyards, vessel outfitters and so on. There has been no indication during this entire session, let alone in this budget speech, of any plans to maintain the herring industry of British Columbia, the whaling industry of British Columbia, the coal industry of British Columbia. Only lately the last coal mine closed down. There has not been a word about this situation. There has been no suggestion that would bring help to the closed coal mines of Nova Scotia or replace the loss of machine work since Avro bought Dosco. Now, as a result of outside control, products are shipped into Canada which we previously brought into being ourselves.

There may be good reasons for all these things. Surely, however, there is a good reason for asking the Minister of Finance and the government, have you given any thought to what is taking place? Have you any plans to ensure that industry is maintained? When some coal mines are in trouble, you have subventions. When the gold mines are in trouble, you have the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. When certain farmers need help, you come through to some extent. What we are asking is whether or not you have an over-all plan for the economy of Canada? I have never seen you help the farmers of British Columbia or the fishing industry of British Columbia or the coal mines of British Columbia. There are difficulties there, but there has been no mention of any of these problems in the minister's speech. I am saying that this government, because it is on a midterm basis, is doing nothing to try to resolve the problems of our country. I quite understand why you want a balanced budget. I maintain it is possible to have a balanced budget, if that is the criterion of success on the Conservative side, if you will take care of the problems which you have up until now ignored and make savings where you have refused to make them.

I know the logical question that one could ask at this point is: Where can you save money to take care of the planning for the depressed people and the depressed areas? I want to say that I, personally, and we in this group believe it is possible for a great deal of money to be saved in the Department of National Defence without any radical change in policy. Numerous statements from cabinet benches have made it clear already this session that the government's defence policy entails Canada being bound to NATO and NORAD. This, of necessity, means that Canada maintain a very close military and scientific relationship with the United Kingdom and the United States.

Canada now buys much of her military equipment from the United States, just as we used to buy it from the United Kingdom. In my opinion, therefore, it is not logical that we should be spending so much money on our defence research board when the same investigations and the same studies are being made by our allies in the United States and in the United Kingdom. I cannot understand why Canada should be doing the specialized research which is being done in other countries with whom we are so closely related.

I must be even more specific because if I say something should be done about planning and assistance for the unemployed and low income groups and the depressed areas, then of course I must show where the savings can be made. I find it difficult to understand why Canada should develop its own Heller anti-tank rocket launchers; why we should be spending money to develop a solid fuel for missiles when Canada has no missiles. I should like to know why in our present estimates we are asked to spend so much money on research, design and development which has already been undertaken and, in some cases, concluded in the United States and the United Kingdom. I would ask the Minister of Finance, through you, sir, or perhaps the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes) why we are wasting so much money on what he terms "unification".

Two years ago the estimates committee made a recommendation on unification to the Minister of National Defence, related to the medical and religious branches. This year we have been told unification has been completed. I have made a study of the answers and information from the Department of National Defence on this subject, and what do I find? I find that in the unification of the medical and chaplain corps the government seemed determined it would do its best to make no savings whatever for the taxpayers of Canada. In so far as the chaplain corps is concerned, the establishment was 273 before unification and it is still 273 after unification. Of course, there is one difference. Two junior ranks were removed but two new brigadier chaplains were appointed at headquarters in Ottawa. In the medical corps at unification we found that the number of medical officers was reduced from 477 to 472; but at the same time headquarters was padded by two additional lieutenant colonels. The result was that under government policy unification costs more than it did before.

I am convinced that if the Minister of Finance and the government believes in economy and efficiency it is possible to save millions of dollars, not only by a proper unification of the medical and chaplain corps but by the unification of all the armed services. This would make available the money which we say should be available under a balanced budget to help old age pensioners, veterans and the disabled, and in particular—I emphasize this—to take care of distressed areas and do some real planning. This has been completely ignored by this government and is emphasized by ignorance, incompetence and impotence in the budget speech of the Minister of Finance.

These points I have mentioned regarding planning policy are not the only matters left out of the speech the Minister of Finance made the other night. I know I speak on behalf of our group when I say that I feel the minister, irrespective of the time he took, did not give any indication that he was taking the people in general and this House of Commons in particular into his confidence as to problems of the present and the future. I know, it is not too difficult for one to raise a little bit of Cain about the present, but my major worry is that there was nothing said about the future, except the wishful thinking that we are going into a time of prosperity and boom, which is denied by actual facts.

I would note from the remarks of the Minister of Finance that because of the way he is balancing the budget now the federal government will not have to go on a major borrowing spree this year. That will enable the provinces and the municipalities to have a more open door on borrowings than they have had in the past. I should like to ask if the Minister of Finance and the government have given any real thought to this problem of dominion, provincial and municipal governments having to go into the borrowing market. I should like to ask whether any consideration has been given to a new policy. I present this as my personal belief, but I do not think that our confederation in Canada is so parochial or provincial that it is not possible for the federal government and the provincial governments to get together on their borrowings, thereby reaching an understanding of the situation in the borrowers' market. Already I notice the Minister of Finance shakes his head and scowls.

Is there any difference between our nationalism in Canada and that in the commonwealth of Australia? In Australia every year the prime minister of the commonwealth and the premiers of the states get together and discuss their borrowing needs, reach an agreement, and then the federal government borrows all the money for the commonwealth and states by unanimous consent. That means a great deal. Then the federal government having borrowed all the money gives to each state the amount of money it requires at the same rate of interest as it had to pay. Then if the commonwealth government has a surplus, it loans the money to the states, which we call the provinces.

I spoke to ministers in five of the states of Australia. I spoke to one of the ministers of the commonwealth and he said it had been a wonderful system. There is just one borrowing by the commonwealth government on behalf of all states. I should like to suggest that this be considered by the minister. Is it impossible to believe that we cannot do a co-operative job in Canada on the same basis? I merely offer that as a suggestion.

My time is getting short, but I should like to say that the question of taxation is a serious one to governments and to the people. The question of income tax and corporation tax is serious, as is also the question of plugging the loopholes. I do not go for all they do in the United States, but I do agree with the committee they have set up comprised of both houses which discusses matters of financial policy, does research and makes recommendations. I have been most interested to note that in the past 12 months in the United States very serious consideration has been given by the joint committee on internal revenue taxation and house committees on ways and means to try to arrive at a basis of income tax and capital gains tax to remove all loopholes, to give equity to everyone and to see that government receives its proper and fair return on the income of all people from the lowest standard of living to the highest.

I want to say that my reading of the work of those two committees in the United States leads me to believe that they are facing up to the facts and realities of taxation. I should like to suggest to the Minister of Finance that instead of things being done behind closed doors he place greater responsibility on committees of the House of Commons, on the Senate or on joint committees; that they should be able to conduct research on matters of taxation in order to see whether we, too, cannot come up with recommendations which will make our taxation laws less complicated, less iniquitous and will plug the loopholes.

I am led to believe that they think they can find the answer in the United States where the laws are somewhat different from ours. I do believe that the same principle if applied here under the leadership of the minister would mean a great deal to unity and understanding. What I think is required is a new taxation policy for Canada with regard to income tax and corporation tax. We have not yet a capital gains tax which I think is required if we are to have taxation according to ability to pay.

I notice that my time is almost up. May I conclude with these few words? Perhaps the minister and the government do not think that many of the proposals which we put forward are possible or conceivable. May I say that impossible things are simply those which have never yet been done. I state that with understanding, sincerity, knowledge and diligence the minister should go beyond his budget speech and endeavour to do things which we think are not impossible and not improbable, but inevitable in the interests of all the people of this country.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

PRIVILEGE

CORRECTION OF A VOTE CAST BY MISTAKE

Mr. Marcel Boivin (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege. I deem it necessary to inform you that just now I inadvertently voted in favour of the amendment to the amendment, in the belief that I was voting for the amendment submitted by the official opposition.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Benidickson.

Mr. E. A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, in rising to participate in this debate I wish initially to state that I intend to be brief, and I shall certainly make another reference to brevity in speaking in the house before I am finished.

Like others, I am justly proud of the budget presented in this house by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming). It is, I believe, a statement of true fact that the minister is the most capable minister of finance that this parliament has ever had. I know that he is accepted as such in financial circles, and even the minister's critics across this country will in due course appreciate his tremendous abilities in his present position, and I know it will be evident in the management of the affairs of this country.

To support my belief it is not necessary for me to search far following the presentation of the budget. Indeed, many of the headlines back up what I have just indicated. They also support the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) when some of the headlines forecast "more cash jingles in Canadian pockets." Then, we have the word "courageous" and other such headlines. I would add to that just plain common sense. This, of course, is in direct opposition to what the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) thought.

Then, further, a few days following the budget, we also noticed that the headlines were running a little more in the right direction. We know that defence costs are declining and that the cost of living index has declined for the fourth straight month. I do not doubt that less complimentary headlines could be found; but I am one of those—and I know anyone who has read the statistics involved in the presentation of the budget knows it full well—who believes that the compliments I have referred to are well founded.

There is good reason for confidence in this year's business as a result of the minister's forecast. Even in the light of the fact that many of the expenditures which he indicated in his white paper were considerably higher than the year previous, even with the decline in the deficit—and I am sure that the trend will continue—to mention but a few of those to indicate how the government has acted and how the minister's forecasts have worked out in regard to expenditures, I would like first of all to refer to the expenditures for agriculture. I will not make these comparisons throughout but they are all figures obtained from the white paper presented by ministers of finance and mostly, of course, by the present minister.

In 1956-57 the previous government spent $5,019,000 on supports; in 1957-58 it was $5,988,000; in 1958-59 it was $15 million; and in 1959-60, $57,700,000 was spent in support of agriculture. To assure the leader of the C.C.F. party that the door is open at all times I think the trend indicated here would support that thinking. I know from my own experience with the minister, and certainly with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) that such has been the case. After all, the expenditures that were made on behalf of my constituents in regard to compensation for rabies which was not an inconsiderable amount of money.

Then, we move on to university grants, provincial subsidies, tax-sharing arrangements, farm supports, health grants, hospital insurance, veterans' affairs and a great host of others. These expenditures have increased. I think we can assure the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) that the veterans' welfare will also be looked after, as well as all other phases of our social program.

As announced by the minister, this government has now substantially removed itself from the money market. It might be wise to comment on what the results can be and will be. It is now becoming quite evident that the interest rates are dropping and the inevitable benefit will redound to every level of government in its capital spending. Also there will be a tremendous benefit to industry and I would expect that our exchange position with the United States will improve in the immediate future. I think the indications are that way now. This, of course, will be most desirable on the part of industry.

What about the projected surplus? This morning we heard again about how small it was, how insignificant it was and so on. The opposition have tried to point out that the trend is maybe one of wishful thinking rather than planning. Although in my own estimation the percentage to the total budget may be small, yet the trend is correct and we can be justly proud of the minister's efforts. As a matter of fact, it would not surprise me if at the end of the current fiscal year the surplus was about 10 times as great as he forecast.

The minister and the government have made one point very clear in financial matters, namely that they did not adopt the attitudes of the previous government by suggesting to the Canadian citizens that they cannot look after their own affairs. They have spent the money in the interests of Canadians and of the entire economy. They did not, as one hon. member mentioned this morning, take $50 million and stick it here and another $50 million and hide it there and another $165 million and hide it some place else. We are spending the money that we take in in taxation on the citizens, in their interests and in the interests of Canada. I am sure that as the forecast of this budget indicates the minister will go on to repair all of the damage that has been done in the past and that we shall have a very sound economy again in the very near future.

The opposition critic was very generous in giving credit to the minister on two points, as reported at page 2863 of Hansard. But, of course, what most amazed everyone is the fact that he could not complete the 20-minute period that was left to him on budget night. With all deference, I think that mere conformity to tradition would lose him a tremendous number of points in anybody's view. We are all concerned with any of the situations that are brought home to us but it has been evident in this debate that the members of the Liberal party have been very hard pressed to find any criticism that is sound; indeed, the entire party, not only the critics, have been dashed in their hopes of a much higher deficit, with increased taxation, in the budget. I think this is very evident, Mr. Speaker.

I should like to join with the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) who stated that Canada has been most fortunate in that most of the members of parliament who have held the position of minister of finance have been of good sound character, have been good citizens, and so on. This is indeed true, and it is most certainly true of my predecessor who was also the predecessor of the minister now in office. I note, however, Mr. Speaker, that this gentleman is making public statements similar to those of his party members and I should like to quote from the Owen Sound Sun-Times of March, 1960. I regret I have not the date, but I have the clipping before me. It says:

> Harris says deficit may be $600 million.

This is an indication that they were all hoping to enjoy something like that, a little more doom, a little more gloom. We know now this was wishful thinking, but Mr. Harris went on to say that the:

> —deficit will come as a shock to the Conservatives unless they can find some money pretty fast.

They were going to be embarrassed. It seems to me that he, like other members of the Liberal party, would do anything in his power to make the Canadian picture and the Canadian scene bad. They are prognosticators of nothing but ill for Canadian citizens. We must conclude that they would stop at absolutely nothing to regain power. It is a difficult thing for me to understand that Mr. Harris would be such a protagonist of the Liberal cause after the treatment accorded to him by his party supporters at the leadership convention in Toronto such a short time ago.

In making his criticism the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River stated that if he were in power he would consult the experts on what to do and then, of course, he would do something, he said. Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, and hon. members, what one very well qualified expert has to say. I refer to an article in a morning paper today reporting a speech made in Vancouver on April 7. The article says that a prominent Montreal analyst said:

—Canada has suffered from very poor financial and fiscal policies. The Bank of Canada, he said, eased money in 1955 when other countries were tightening up on money.

"I don't think they should have," said Mr. Bolton. "It was an error which has hounded us ever since."

I do not think we have to go too much further to agree that this is the case and that the present situation in which we find ourselves is only emerging from all of those things with which we have had to deal.

I should like to refer for a moment to trade. Trade, of course, will play a most important part in the coming economic upswing. I know that the figures published for January and February show an increase of 27.1 per cent and there is no reason to believe that this upswing will alter. Indeed, although I have not been able to get a firm figure from the bureau of statistics, I have a statement here made by the Canadian association of purchasing agents that orders placed in the month of March are 27 per cent ahead of a year ago and in all industries reporting production is ahead by 33 per cent.

The minister has indicated that he is aware of the importance of imports and the impact they will have on our economy, and it cannot be other than good planning and salesmanship that the increase is of such great proportions. We all know what foreign imports, which are usually made in a much cheaper labour market, mean to us and we would not want the impact on our industries to be as great as has occurred in other countries. I note that the New York News of March 29 reports that many small businesses in the United States have been forced to close their doors and that even the big boys are feeling the pinch. Allow me for a moment, by making reference to that paper, to indicate the situation there. We note, for instance, that 12 years ago the United States, such a large country, imported only 1,500 foreign cars and at that time exported 261,000 cars. Last year they imported 668,000 and exported a new low of 117,000. So goes the whole picture. Four million radios were imported and exports were negligible by comparison.

Another important point I note is that one of the oldest sewing machine companies in the United States, established over 80 years ago, threw in the towel three years ago and now distributes only a foreign-made product. We do not want this sort of thing to happen in Canada, and I am sure that the ministers concerned will take the necessary action to see that this does not occur. We would also not want a socialistic atmosphere to present itself because to live under such circumstances would create chaos. Let us not forget that after socialism comes the hammer and the sickle.

I believe that members of the opposition—apparently they do not like to listen to what I have to say—would rather engage in the sort of talk that breeds great lack of confidence and we know, of course, that their discourses are strictly for public consumption. I should like to say that on this particular point alone they are damaging to a great degree some of the possibilities that exist and by no stretch of the imagination are they contributing anything that would be constructive.

I should now like to make a few remarks regarding local industry in my constituency. I have mentioned before in the house that in the main it is furniture manufacturing and, as in other industries, we note a very rapid rise in the rate of imports of furniture. This is an industry that does not and has not had the good fortune of enjoying an export market. There is a possible market in the United States but the tariff and the export procedure make shipments almost impossible. We note that the sharpest increase in imports is from the United States, a market which, as I have said, it is difficult for us to enter. However, there is an alarming increase in imports from other countries in the world and it is necessary for me to mention this matter because if a situation arises in the future where things become impossible I will have to bring this matter to the attention of the government with much greater force.

I should like to refer to a report in the Montreal Gazette of April 7 of a speech in Montreal by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin). The article is headed, "Join Free Trade Area, Martin Urges". I can only say that we in the constituency of Grey-Bruce know full well what this means now and we would be remiss if we did not remind the people of the country and the government that this is not the time to consider such a move. What would they have us do? Destroy secondary industry in this country? Allow the farming industry of the country to be torn to shreds by producers who can snow us under? We have heard enough of this already today. I congratulate the government on any move they make which will support local and domestic industry against unfair competition such as we are beginning to experience in our own way.

I might also mention that I live in an area which is very close to lake Huron and Georgian bay. It is a sad reflection for me to see the deterioration of our once great fishing industry in these waters. The participants in the industry are now almost all out of business due to the lack of fish.

A comprehensive picture was given in the house by my colleague, the hon. member for Grey North (Mr. Noble), and I think it would be wise for the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. MacLean) to investigate the possibility of planting fish that are known to thrive in such waters and are able to resist the eel and the smelt. Also, and I appreciate that this is primarily a matter of provincial concern, some action is necessary to stop the reinfestation of these waters from the sea. This is a program which I believe could be done very easily and at small expense. Inasmuch as funds are appropriated by the government for the support of the great lakes fisheries commission it would not be beyond the bounds of reasonable expectation for the minister and the department to give some consideration and leadership in this matter.

Finally, I should like to refer to the cost involved in speaking in the House of Commons. As was indicated previously this session, I believe it is in excess of $1,820 an hour. In consideration of the suggestions regarding economy—I hope I am being brief this afternoon in consideration of others who would like the floor—may I say that I am of the opinion that we should amend the rules of the house in some way to cut down the time that I feel is wasted. There may be some who think that I have wasted time today, but it is with that purpose in mind that I am speaking. I believe that a great waste of time is also brought about by people who are impressing their views upon the house and the country unnecessarily. I refer to the filibuster that we are experiencing these days. There are ways and means of putting one's feelings vehemently before the right authorities without wasting the time of the house and depriving hon. members of the opportunity to bring worth-while private resolutions and bills before the house.

Mr. Alan Macnaughton (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) forecast a surplus for the fiscal year 1960, modest though it may be, all Canadians were pleased. The minister's determination to abandon deficit spending, which has been the feature of his last two budgets, is a step in the right direction, at least one step in setting the government's house in order. The deficit spending of the present government for the past two years has been causing grave concern to a great many Canadians who consider this policy a threat to our future economic prosperity. All the people who hold this view, and I list myself amongst them, complain in particular that the country is not receiving the benefits which should have accrued from this deficit spending.

Experts are generally agreed that government spending of the nature and the scale of the past few years—I should say perhaps for the past three years—is not the most effective way of fighting a short recession. Such spending leaves in its wake many economic difficulties. The president of the Royal Bank, Mr. James Muir addressing the shareholders at their annual meeting on January 8, 1959, said:

> Last year, as in previous recession years, and while the economy was still on the downgrade, I urged tax cuts by government and price cuts by business. Instead of tax cuts last year, which would have encouraged business activity while reducing pressure on prices, we got increased government spending. Instead of an immediate deficit last year, timed to coincide with the depth of the cycle, we find ourselves today with a delayed deficit which has timed itself to coincide with the present recovery and the emergence of a new inflationary potential. For it is the great disadvantage of government expenditures as a cure for recession and it is both ponderous and irreversible; it takes time to get projects under way, and once started they must be completed.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Would the hon. gentleman give the date of that?

Mr. Macnaughton: Yes, certainly. The date of that was January 8, 1959, the report of the president of the Royal Bank to the shareholders.

In his statement on tax policy, which appears on page 2681 of Hansard of March 31, 1960, the Minister of Finance said:

> As I said a year ago, and as I have repeated in this house and elsewhere on a number of subsequent occasions, sound tax policies must be flexible and adapted to changing economic conditions. The onset of the 1957 recession called for lower taxes, higher expenditures and heavier capital commitments in order to offset the downward trends in the private sector of the economy and the decline in the external demand for some of our basic products; and I put such proposals before the house in December, 1957 and again in June, 1958.

It strikes me as very strange indeed that the minister now acknowledges that lower taxes was one of the specific features of his program to deal with the recession in 1957-58. If memory serves me aright, I recall how vigorously the minister opposed and condemned, both on the hustings and in the house, the Liberal policy of tax reductions as a means of stimulating economic activity. I find it equally strange that the minister did not remind the members of this house that he withdrew a good part of the benefits of these tax reductions in the 1959 budget.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not for the people in the low income brackets.

Mr. Macnaughton: However, that is all in the past. What about the future? In my opinion, the minister is taking a big gamble in forecasting a modest surplus. First, he is assuming that there will be no decline or hesitancy in the rate of our economic growth. Second, he is assuming that each department of government will rigidly control its expenditure. Third, he is assuming that our export trade will continue to grow.

With regard to the first assumption, the minister chooses to ignore some of the danger signals in our economy which suggest that the rate of growth may be slower than that which he predicted. He rejects the warnings of the leading economists in the government service, in the academic field and in business, for most economists, I think, agree that rough economic weather is ahead for late 1961 and 1962. An increasing number of economists fear that the first wind of the storm may come in the last quarter of 1960 and the beginning of 1961. In other words, our Canadian economy may be bucking strong winds during a good part of the last half of the 1960 fiscal year.

I do not intend to quote these authorities, as many of them have been cited in this debate so far by other members. However, I do want to point out to the house that a slowdown in our economic growth could easily turn the minister's modest surplus into a deficit and thus could force the government to borrow substantially more than the estimated amount of $210 million.

The minister's second assumption is equally risky. He is demanding departmental control of spending which does not allow even for a normal and expected degree of overspending. There is no margin for the unexpected necessary expenditure. While the minister is certainly to be congratulated for asking for strict control throughout government departments, I wonder if he is being realistic, considering the smallness of the surplus he anticipates?

Have we any hope that the minister may have suggested to his colleagues in the cabinet that we have reached a plateau with regard to government spending and that the various government departments must remain on this plateau for several years to come? I think we should all keep in mind that the basic problem is not only balancing the budget, but at what point or where do you balance the budget? There is no purpose in talking about a balanced budget if in each succeeding year the budget is balanced at fantastically higher and higher levels. This is, in effect, only kidding the people.

The minister's third assumption is, perhaps, his greatest gamble. Canada's export trade, for the past few years does not encourage many people to share the view of the minister or of his colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill). Here, the two ministers seem to be in a dream world of their own. Perhaps the Minister of Finance has ventured there so his colleague will not be lonely. I will have more to say about trade shortly. At the moment I merely want to say that the Canadian exporter finds it increasingly difficult to get a fair share of the increase in overseas markets. The economic vitality of western Europe and the United Kingdom, the entry of Russia on a large scale as a large and vigorous trader, is producing a degree of competition in international trade unknown since the end of the second world war.

Our exporters find it harder to retain their traditional markets and harder to acquire new ones. A real increase in our export trade may be slower in the future than it has been in the past.

These are the gambles the minister is taking. As Canadians interested in the economic well-being of our country we wish the minister luck, though many of us feel he has balanced the budget with a hope and a prayer.

I have spoken of the favourable aspects of the budget. Now let me comment on some of the disappointments. The minister has announced no policy or program to deal with the serious deficit in our international accounts and the problems which our exporters are encountering in the international markets.

Surely the minister realizes that responsible government demands leadership. Three weeks ago the members of this house discussed international trade. We were told by the Minister of Trade and Commerce that all was rosy in the garden. He failed to define government policy. Now the Minister of Finance has spoken and he has failed to state a policy or outline a program to ease our situation. This I find very strange indeed.

The minister is the one member of the government, apart from the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) who can direct and stimulate our economy by the policies he persuades his colleagues to adopt. Government departments and agencies can act effectively if the economic policy of the government is known.

The Bank of Canada, for example, can manage our monetary system and has done so brilliantly and successfully for many years; but the Bank of Canada cannot manage or direct our economy. That is the job of the government.

The deficit in our international account is serious. The minister himself acknowledges the fact. He urges us to work and save but does not tell us what he intends to do about it. His attitude appears to be the well known attitude of laissez faire.

What can be done about it? Are we importing too many consumer goods? If so, I suppose the importation of consumer goods could be controlled by a quota system. But a quota system is not acceptable to Canadians, and furthermore it would only antagonize our friends and customers. A quota system would invite retaliation and could lead to economic isolation. The problem of the deficit in our international accounts could be remedied to a degree by various government controls, such as government control of exchange and by the formation of a capital issues committee. But controls in any form are not acceptable to the Canadian people. The institution, and furthermore the administration of such controls would be complex. Experts also doubt that they would be as effective in application as they appear to be in theory, and I doubt if the advantages would outweigh the disadvantages.

The adoption of such controls would be contrary to the trend abroad where currencies have been freed and public and private investment encouraged. I believe such controls would lose us many friends and certainly as many customers. The minister has, quite rightly, rejected all these proposals, but what alternatives does he suggest? He certainly has not told us of any.

If we are going to import goods and capital at our present rate we must earn more abroad on the sale of Canadian goods. We must sell more in our traditional markets. We must find new markets for our traditional export products. We must encourage the export of new products in raw or semi-finished form which are not now being exported in sufficient volume. We must seek new markets abroad for all our products, industrial as well as agricultural.

It is almost trite to say that competition has become an increasingly important factor in world trade, but how very true it is. Other countries are no longer forced to shop in the North American market as they were in the years immediately following the war. They can now purchase their goods from a number of suppliers. We are in a buyer's market, no longer a supplier's market. Our ability to export is no longer measured by our ability to supply foreign markets. Our productive capacity permits us to meet almost any foreseeable demand. Canada's ability to export today and even more so in the future will be measured by our ability to meet competition and our success in opening and developing new markets abroad.

Our new exports, uranium, iron ore, petroleum and now natural gas have helped to expand our exports and smooth over the rough spots encountered by our traditional products such as wheat, base metals and forest products. But the loss of our uranium market has been a serious jolt to our foreign trade. The export of natural gas, which we all greeted with much hope and approval, will only offset a part of the loss of our uranium markets. May I remind the house that we will not experience the full benefit of the exportation of natural gas until the next 12 to 18 months.

We have reached the crossroads in international trade. The question is whether regional trading blocs will dominate or whether multilateral trade will continue. We have seen the formation of two regional blocs in Europe, the, inner six and the outer seven. There is talk of similar blocs being formed in Africa and South America. The creation of these blocs present real problems for Canada and demand initiative on the part of the Canadian government.

What has the minister to say about this? I would like to quote at length from his speech as reported on page 2673 of Hansard of March 31, and I have a reason for giving this long quotation. He said:

> In recent years the western European economy has been enjoying particularly rapid and substantial growth. More than one quarter of our exports go to western Europe including the United Kingdom. A prosperous, politically stable and expanding European economy will provide increasing opportunities for profitable Canadian trade. We have been concerned, however, with the possible political implications of economic disagreements within western Europe. We need also to take all practical steps to ensure that our trading position is not adversely affected.
> We have therefore been giving very close attention to the problems that are arising from the emergence of the two regional trading groups in Europe; the European economic community of six countries and the European free trade association of seven countries. We have been anxious that these arrangements should not lead to inward looking and discriminatory practices and should not weaken the world wide trading system which has been built up so patiently and so successfully in recent years. We are therefore seizing every opportunity to put forward the Canadian view at meetings with representatives of these groups and with our other trading partners. Moreover, we are participants with the European countries and the United States in discussions relating to, and have declared ourselves ready to become members of, a reconstituted organization for economic co-operation and consultation, O.E.C.C.; and further we will press that such organization shall subscribe not only to the principles of the international institutions governing trade and payments but also that members shall honour their obligations in these institutions. In particular, we are continuing to urge European countries to resist the growth of European tariff discrimination by extending their tariff reductions to other countries on a most favoured nation basis. We have found that our views are shared by many countries in other parts of the world, and particularly by those in the commonwealth.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest that long quotation is not a statement of policy. It certainly does not indicate the seizing of initiative by this government. All the minister has told us is that the government is holding a watching brief and will protect our interests if this becomes necessary.

This is a negative approach. It is being static in a dynamic situation, and the situation demands more than this. I believe, that the government must—and I emphasize must—take the initiative without delay and submit a plan which would offset any danger or threat to our trading position. That plan must be fair and reasonable so that it will have the broadest acceptance.

The seizing of initiative is not new to Canada. Canadian governments in the past have played this role successfully. The nations of the world accept Canada in this role. We have by our actions in the past earned the title of honest broker. If there is to be acceptance of any plan for international trade, perhaps a plan incorporating wherever possible the advantages of the two concepts "multilateralism" and "regionalism"—and the Liberal party has consistently advocated a North Atlantic trading pact—Canada has the best chance of securing some sort of agreement along this line. However, the government's responsibility—and it is the responsibility of the government—is to assume active direction and it should take the initiative in this matter.

I maintain, that Canada must show a different posture to the world in the field of international trade than it has shown for the past three years. There is uncertainty outside of Canada as to the political objectives and as to the trade objectives of this government. The attempt to divert trade to England, for example, on the one hand, yet blaming the United States for not taking more of our exports on the other hand, means that we are riding a hobby horse in both directions.

The opinion which people outside our country hold of Canada is of vital importance for the future development of our international trade and for the obtaining of the capital needed to carry on the investment in, and the development of our natural resources.

I suggest, for example, that the government should increase our trade representation abroad immediately, not by sending one or two persons to one or two countries but by sending as many new trade commissioners or sellers of Canada if you wish, as potential new markets may require. Recently the United States, which is far less dependent upon export trade for its economic well-being than Canada, increased its foreign trade representation by about 50 per cent.

markets in new areas and markets for new Canadian products among our traditional customers. We should realize the real potentiality of trade fairs, and we should do a better job than we did at the Brussels fair.

However, it is not enough merely to increase the staff. We should send out from this country men aggressive in the selling of Canadian goods and capable of discovering

I come, now, to a threat to our trading position which only the Prime Minister among all the members of the government has seen fit to acknowledge. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has shown no great concern. The threat is that of Russia. While I admit the threat may not become real for a year or two, I do say it cannot be ignored. Above all, we cannot afford to sit and wait until something happens. I emphasize the need for prompt and imaginative action by the government in formulating a trade policy and securing a trade market for our goods which we can retain.

What is the threat, and how has it come about? Perhaps the clearest description of the change in Russian policy and the best definition of what it means was given by Mr. R. M. Fowler, president of the pulp and paper association of Canada in an address on January 29, 1960. Under the heading "Russian economic competition", Mr. Fowler said:

> First, however, in the context in which Mr. Khrushchev was writing, the area of international relations, you will note that by the change of one word he has changed the whole concept of relations between the east and the west and once again has seized the initiative. We usually speak of "peaceful co-existence", which is a static concept. It gives a picture of two opposing groups making some necessary accommodations so that they can get along somehow by staying apart. You create curtains and barriers and protective devices so that the two groups will meet no more than necessary and thus can avoid getting into a fight. But when you replace the word "co-existence" by "competition"—"peaceful competition" in place of "peaceful co-existence"—the whole concept becomes a dynamic one. Mr. Khrushchev is saying that Russia is prepared to meet us and face the test of comparison with our system, our methods, and our beliefs. If they were ever afraid of us, the fear has gone. You cannot compete, peacefully or otherwise, unless you meet your competition: tearing down barriers, taking your chances in a free exchange of strength and skill.

I believe that Mr. Fowler speaks with authority and reason, because of his competence, and also because his industry, the pulp and paper industry, will run headlong into the competition which Canadian exporters will encounter from Russia. Indeed, this competition is being felt at the present time. Speaking of the difficulties Canada will face, Mr. Fowler said:

> This emerging problem of Russian economic competition is the great basic issue that will face the western world in the coming decade. It is quite clear that it will affect Canada more directly and seriously than any of the other western partners and may well affect our pulp and paper industry most of all. At the moment, we have a respite while Russia is building up capacity for domestic needs. But by 1965 or 1968 their domestic requirements, which they can rigidly control, may be sufficiently met, and Russia may then emerge as a major exporter of pulp and paper products. Against this mounting tide of Russian competition, Canada faces two basic difficulties. The first is that the two countries are very much alike in their natural resources; they are both rich in forests and in waterpower, the two essential resources for a large pulp and paper industry. This may not in the long run be too serious because growing populations and increasing economic activity throughout the world may well require all the pulp and paper that both Russia and Canada can produce. But here we run into the other difficulty. In Russia, they can not only control domestic requirements, turning on and off at will the volume of use at home, but they can also control costs of production, and there is clear evidence that the Russian planners are determined to carry out their economic programs without inflation and indeed with a lowering of costs and therefore of prices. In Canada, we have no such control over either domestic use or production costs and no one would wish to exchange our free economy for the regimentation and restrictions of the Russian system. But when the full impact of Russian competition in world markets strikes us, five or eight years hence, we may find that our costs meanwhile have increased and pushed our prices up to levels where we cannot compete in world markets. It is what we do this year, and over the next five years, that will decide if we can run in the race at all.

Dr. J. J. Deutsch, the vice principal of Queen's University, speaking to the members of the Montreal board of trade, on March 8, 1960, had this to say:

The Soviet industrial system is the second largest in the world. The significance to international trade lies in the fact that the Soviet economy is very large, is highly self-sufficient and is highly controlled. The ability to intervene in world markets is extremely powerful, and this ability is an important factor in determining the kind of world trading community in which we now live. In the sphere of economic relations there is no iron curtain in front of which the rest of the world can, unhindered, order its own affairs by the traditional methods of free societies. The long arm of the Soviet union reaches out to the Middle East, to Southeast Asia, to Africa and to the Caribbean whenever it is expedient to do so, and it can change the course of events, both economic and political.

Dr. Deutsch described the entry of Russia as "a massive and dynamic factor". I have quoted Mr. Fowler and Mr. Deutsch at some length because I value their opinions and because of my grave concern as to what Russian competition means to Canada. Russia will flood the world markets with goods identical to those sold by Canada; in particular, with goods which we have considered to be our traditional exports, such as base metals, aluminum and forests products. The time may come when Russia will export wheat without adverse effects on the Russian people.

[Mr. Macnaughton.]

The Russian threat demands that our government recognize the possible consequences to this country and begin to take appropriate action which would include the immediate study of the long range effects of Soviet competition on Canada's export trade. Canadian exporters have every right to expect some guidance as to the nature of this threat. All we ask is that the government show a sense of urgency such as the situation warrants. Surely Canadians have a right to expect far more from their government than what has been done so far. A mere indication that the situation is being watched and that the government will protect our interests if necessary is not enough.

Canada's economic life blood is dependent upon the vigour of its foreign trade. This is Canada's historical position, as professor Hugh G. J. Aitken said in a seminar at Duke University in the summer of 1958 under the heading "The Changing Structure of the Canadian Economy". I should like to quote his words, because I think they are very significant—

Canada, from the beginning of its history, has been a vulnerable economy, exposed to pressures and stimuli from more advanced nations. Its development has been geared to external demands and external challenges.

This government has failed to appreciate this economic fact. It has failed to appreciate, too, that Canada needs a favourable international trading climate more than any other nation. That is why Canada must take the initiative in advancing plans for the basis of international trade.

We sometimes fail to realize the size of the markets being created by the regional trading blocs. Mr. John McCullough, a prominent United States chartered accountant, put out a private booklet on the financial implications of the common market. It was written for the public of the United States, but what he describes is applicable to Canada to an even greater extent. Mr. McCullough had this to say:

Many a corporate financial executive will decide in 1960 what his company is going to do about the vast new mass market now evolving in the common market countries of Europe. Among the factors impelling this decision are:

First, it is expected that the common market will evolve into a mass market of 170 million people by 1970 with a progressively increasing standard of living; that the gross national product of the common market countries will increase by then to $400 billion (ours was $442 billion in 1958);—

He is referring to the United States.

—and that there will be a tremendous increase in demand for consumer goods and concomitant capital goods. Substantial sums of European and American capital have been expended or are planned for expenditure on the basis of these expectations.

Then in paragraph No. 6 he says this:

Finally, corporate financial executives must consider the projected effect of foreign competition upon their United States business and their foreign business outside the common market. Development of know-how, increase in efficiency and improvement of economic position, superimposed on lower wage rates, has materially strengthened foreign competition in the United States domestic market. Already, some American manufacturers have not been able to meet this competition and there is reason to believe that others will suffer.

Other regional groups can be equally large. Unless Canada is aggressive and imaginative in its trading policies and particularly in its negotations with other countries, it could well be that we would be shut out and driven into economic isolation.

The situation demands a sense of urgency on the part of the government. It is my hope that the Minister of Finance whose responsibility it is to guide and direct our economy will initiate without delay a polcy to deal effectively with our deteriorating international position in trade and our deficit on international account.

Mr. Pallett: In view of his last statement, will the hon. member answer a question?

Mr. Macnaughton: I should be glad to answer.

Mr. Pallett: Has there not been a tremendous upsurge in January and February of this year?

Mr. Macnaughton: I do not think it is fair to take one or two months. You might as well say there is a tremendous upsurge of employment in the summer time. Of course there is, because of geographic and weather conditions. The same thing applies to trade. I could read the hon. member an article which was discussed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce on a question of privilege. It appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press. I have it here but I will not waste time by reading it. I should like to finish as I have a few more minutes left. I should like to conclude my speech because I am sincere about the necessity of there being a sense of urgency on the part of the government to initiate, to undertake and to explain to the Canadian people, to do something about a trading policy which they have not had for the last three years and which has gradually crept up on us and will eventually destroy our position in the European market.

I am not alone in thinking this. Mr. John Meyer, the financial editor of the Montreal Gazette, on Monday, April 4, wrote as follows:

The budget would have given finance minister Fleming the opportunity to give direction to the economy had he recognized there was a need for direction. In standing pat on tax levels, he also stood pat on the tired assumptions that everything will come out right in the end. That posture is not one which can much longer be afforded.

Then he concludes with this paragraph:

But surely the budget is not intended as a catalogue of the difficulties confronting action on this point. Rather, the difficulties should constitute the challenge. Mr. Fleming, unhappily, does not seem to be aware that the challenge has been offered.

I hope sincerely that the Minister of Finance will recognize this challenge of trade, deficit financing, the need to hold the line, the need to control expenditures except in those cases in which we decide in this house that they are socially necessary. I hope he will hold the line and accept this challenge that he give us a trade policy, a financial policy, and do something about the threat of Russian trade competition.

Mr. Harold Hicks (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like very much to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) and also his parliamentary secretary (Mr. Bell) on the very fine budget brought down by them and on the way in which it was brought down. Of course, that is exactly what everybody expected would happen. It has been well received in the press and over the radio. In view of that fact I do not intend actually to discuss the budget very much. However, I want to read one article. I quote from the Ottawa Citizen of April 2, 1960 these words. This article may have been quoted by somebody else when I was not in the house. However, it is such a good article that it will not hurt one bit to quote it a second time. It is headed "U.S. Politician Praises Our Balanced Budget". I may say that this is the best authority in the United States on Canadian affairs. It reads as follows:

One of the most knowledgeable men in the U.S. congress on Canadian affairs Friday praised the Canadian budget for "resisting temptation to intervene artificially" with Canada's trade imbalance and the foreign premium on her dollar.

Representative Frank Coffin of Maine says that the budget required "a good, long respectful look northward" by this country's authorities.

He was speaking, of course, of United States of America.

"Although an increase in expenditures of about 3 per cent is contemplated, with defence, civil service pay raises and social security accounting for the increases, the forecast is for a balanced budget," Coffin said in a statement.

At the same time Canada expects to continue her remarkable growth rate of about 6 per cent, about twice that of the U.S. in recent years.

"The government has also set a good example for the U.S. in resisting temptation to intervene artificially to attack Canada's trade imbalance problem and the dollar premium problem, while responding more selectively to special problem areas such as textiles.

"All in all it should hearten us in the U.S. to know that Canada's outlook for the future is that of a growing economy playing a significant and responsible role in the world of trade."

Mr. Speaker, you will probably recall that when the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) was speaking in the debate on the speech from the throne he mentioned the establishment of a House of Commons committee to consider the rules under which parliament operates. I refer you to page 65 of Hansard of January 18. Later in the debate on the speech from the throne as reported at page 402 of Hansard the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Smith), having in mind similar ideas, gave seven or eight suggestions about changing the rules of the house. A proposal I should like to make is the installation of a projector by means of which a member could use slides or even a position where a good map could be hung in this House of Commons. I know that many hon. members would ask, where are you going to put a map in this house so that we can all see it? I think we could see it all right if it were up over that clock. Perhaps that would be a good place to put it now because time is a factor and I have quite a few things to say.

In fact I find myself at the moment in need of a large map of British Columbia as I wish to speak for a few minutes about three rivers. I refer not to the city between here and Quebec but to three great rivers of British Columbia, and I wish to point out the terrible flood danger of the lower Fraser river, as seen by me in 1948.

One of the rivers is in the southeastern section of the province; I refer to the Columbia river. The first river I wish to discuss is the Columbia river with about a third of its length in British Columbia. It rises in Columbia lake about 70 miles north of Cranbrook, British Columbia and north, of course, of the U.S. border in the Rocky mountain trench. It flows north to Golden, thence in a horse-shoe shape to which the Big Bend highway corresponds and back south. At the most northern end of the Big Bend is the Mica dam site, the largest storage site for power in the project. Then it goes south to Revelstoke and takes in the drainage waters of the Arrow lakes and also goes south and takes in the Kootenay lakes and river and other valleys and crosses the 49th parallel into the northeast portion of the state of Washington. Thence it flows south to Portland and flows into the ocean there. It flows in British Columbia a distance of 480 miles. Its flow is in total length 1,225 miles and the total fall is 2,655 feet. The total British Columbia basin is 29,500 square miles, and the total United States basin is 5½ times that much, namely 219,500 square miles.

The Columbia river is one of the really great rivers of this continent, with its length and run-off only exceeded by the Mississippi going south, by the Mackenzie going north and by the St. Lawrence going east. As we know, the power potential of this great river is enormous. As negotiations are under way at the moment among the United States, Canada and British Columbia I do not care to say more at the present time about the Columbia except that we must avoid overflooding of valuable land in certain areas.

The Mica dam is the important dam to build from the Canadian and British Columbian point of view. This morning I received a resolution put out by the Revelstoke board of trade and I wish to read three sections of this resolution:

> Whereas construction of Mica dam will provide large land reclamation areas in the Columbia basin as opposed to flooding resulting from construction of the high Arrow dam, and
> Whereas construction of the high Arrow will delay commencement of Mica dam for a period of many years, and
> Whereas Mica dam will provide British Columbia with an ample and lasting supply of low-cost public power and control of water,—

And so on. They are very much in favour of having the Mica dam built.

For a very brief moment I want to turn to the Peace river. This great river originates north of Prince George, almost in the centre of the province of British Columbia. The Parsnip flows north, and from the north the Finlay flows south to Finlay Forks, where it meets the Parsnip to start the Peace, which in turn flows east and crosses the British Columbia-Alberta border into Alberta and continues on in a northeasterly direction to enter into the Slave system. The source of the Peace is the home of the famous, or some people even call it the infamous, Wenner-Gren project.

The Peace River Power Development Company was incorporated in October, 1958. The company's proposed hydroelectric project for the generation of four million horsepower of electricity is situated at two proposed dam sites at Peace river canyon, 80 miles west of the British Columbia-Alberta border. It is planned that the proposed development of power will be in three parts.

First, present projects; there are two dams at the Peace river canyon, an ideal place for dams, near Portage mountain. The first dam is 600 feet high with a 7,000 foot crest. The second dam is a few miles further downstream and is 150 feet high with a 1,700 foot crest. The second project is two additional dams still in British Columbia, further down the river, and the third downstream dam is in Alberta along the Peace and the Slave rivers.

The unique feature of the project is the size of the reservoir lake which will be formed. It extends 70 miles above the canyon and 200 miles in the rocky mountain trench. This huge lake will provide great storage capacity, more than the present storage of all hydro dams in British Columbia, as well as the three nearest in the United States. It is estimated that this lake 2,250 feet above sea level will take seven years to fill and by that time it will be able to develop 750,000 horsepower. The estimated cost is $700 million.

Storage in the reservoir is provided for 88 million acre feet of water, which is six times that of Grand Coulee dam. The 200 mile long reservoir lies in a northeasterly direction in the rocky mountain trench, with its southerly end about 63 miles north of Prince George or, in other words, it is something like 50 to 70 miles from the Fraser river. The average width of the reservoir is four miles and the area about 900 square miles.

The big objection to this project is the fact that the power is manufactured so far from where it will be required unless, of course, business and industry move to where the power is. It is 600 miles from there to Vancouver, where most of the power would be used under present conditions, and it goes by Prince George, Quesnel, Williams lake and follows the Fraser to Vancouver. There is also objection to the fact that so much arable land is being flooded.

The third objection is that there is very severe criticism of the handling of this project.

Having said this about the two great rivers, the Columbia and the Peace, I want to turn to the Fraser and to give hon. members some idea of what flooding has done in the past and show that things are not safe at the present. We certainly do not want to have a repetition of the 1948 flood.

The Fraser river is entirely within the province of British Columbia. The basin contains 90,000 square miles and that is about one quarter of the entire province of British Columbia. The area drained by the Fraser is all inside the great mountain system known as the American Cordillera.

The Fraser originates in the area around Yellowhead pass, or mount Robson, and after 70 miles in a northwesterly direction in the main trench it turns south from the trench at Prince George, where it is only about 60 miles from, as I said before, the storage reservoir of the Peace, and flows some 400 miles. At Lytton, the Thompson river enters the Fraser. It cuts through the coast range in a deep canyon, passes through Hell's Gate on to Hope, where it is then 100 miles from its mouth at Vancouver. From source to mouth it flows 850 miles. In the north it drains such lakes at Taka and Stuart and the Nachaka river, and further along, Quesnel, Chilcotin, Bridge River, Lillooet, Thompson and the lower Fraser valley are all drained by it. Over 70 per cent of the area of the basin lies above the 3,000 foot range, which is the limit for agricultural crops; hence, the importance of the fertile agricultural lands in the short lower Fraser valley area. The great flood danger lies in the last 80 miles of its course after it has passed through Hell's Gate and gone on down past Hope, about 20 miles.

On May 24, 1948 I was attending a Rotary convention in Bellingham, Washington, about 20 miles south of the border, and I felt rather uneasy, knowing that the water was coming up at Agassiz, where I was situated at that time. I decided I would go home the next morning. I got out and going down to see what was going on I saw the dikes. I found there a flow of about 10 feet deep, 20 feet wide, just gradually pouring in over the farm land and the people were beginning to move their cattle. The people were beginning to move out of the area. At the time I thought it was a terrible thing that this could happen. Actually, I felt that this might not be too bad at all because the water would come in gradually that way and it would not be a case of breaking the dike and chasing people out.

On that day the reeve of the municipality came to me and said, "You know quite a few people, employees or officials, of the Canadian Pacific Railway; I wish you could arrange to take charge of evacuating all the people out of the Agassiz valley except, of course, the people we want to work." I took charge of that work. We got a lot of the older people and the women and children out. It just so happened that the old hotel in Vancouver was vacant at that time and the Red Cross took over and looked after the people. A day or two after this the railroad washed out just west of Agassiz and we had to send more people out by Harrison lake down to Harrison river to a station further down and then on into Vancouver. A few days later the river burst through the C.P.R. right of way at Hatzic and the highway and as soon as this happened the water began to recede a little in the Agassiz area.

Shortly after I had been given a charge of evacuating people Premier Byron Johnson of British Columbia, came to me one day and asked me if I would take complete charge of all the work at Agassiz. My terms of reference were something like these: "You are in charge. Help the people. Anything you want to have done, initial it, pass it on and it will go. Do what you can to help all the people and save all the money you can without anyone getting hurt."

At that time we had moved cattle into a cemetery roughly two miles by one mile in size. There were 700 cattle there and approximately 100 people had their tents right among the graves. About the third day afterward, I believe, I went that way and I could hear the catle bawling a mile away. Feed had run out and I actually saw cattle there straddling shrubs as they went looking for food. They would straddle a shrub, pin the top down, and eat the leaves. That is how hungry the cattle were.

We at the experimental farm were a little more fortunate because the C.P.R. right of way had helped to hold the water back until it got by Agassiz. We had our office and our whole herd there and we were able to get clean water that ran down the mountain. It was a wonderful source of water supply for the people left there. I think that 17 people slept in our house one night.

I am telling you these things to place before you the importance of controlling flooding on the lower Fraser river. As the flood receded you can imagine the work that had to be done. Where the water had got inside houses it had raised floors and shoved sills out and when the houses dried out the sand left on the floor was as hard as cement. I want to pay a tribute to the provincial department of health. They inspected all the houses, wells and so on before people were allowed to go back to their homes again.

Agassiz is a cesspool town and the town, of course, was flooded. I actually saw fish going in the back door of the butcher shop and swimming out the front door and some of the ladies were catching fish in the main street.

Mr. Fisher: B.C.

Mr. Hicks: B.C. That is right. At that time we wondered what we would do, but the wonderful thing about it all was that there was not one single case of disease or one casualty in the area during the flooding, which lasted for three weeks, that could be traced to the flood. The waters flooded all the area taking in Dewdney, Hatzic, Nicomen island, Barnston island, Pitt Meadows, Sumas and Matsqui. Five years later in driving through some of these areas you could see the high water mark on the side of the buildings just below the eaves.

The 1950 flood in the Fraser valley was not as bad as the 1948 flood. By that time, of course, the dikes had been repaired and we also had the help of the army. I hold in my hand a booklet entitled, "Nature's Fury". It contains the stories of the newspaper reporters who saw the flood at that time and if any hon. members are interested in looking at it there is a copy in the library. I wish I could show you some of the pictures in the booklet. This one shows where the railway and the highway were washed out at Hatzic. I do not suppose you can see it from where you sit. Here is a dead cow floating in a pasture field and here there is water up to the eaves of a barn. These are the things to which I refer.

Whose responsibility is it to see that a flood like this does not occur again? The federal and British Columbia governments have good reasons for joint participation in studies of the Fraser river development such as have been going on since 1948. The province's reasons for participation are, first, that British Columbia is concerned with flood control and hydro power. Second, the Fraser river lies wholly within the province. Third, the administration of water rights and other national resources close to the river is the responsibility of the province.

The reasons for federal participation may not be quite so readily understood, but Canada is responsible for navigation and coast and inland fisheries. This, of course, means salmon. Canada is compelled to take action whenever any national emergency occurs by flooding, the two great floods having been in 1894 and 1948. Canada is interested in hydro power development and if any such development appeared to threaten navigation and fisheries Canada would, of course, intervene.

Diking has been carried on in the lower Fraser valley for almost 100 years. At first the work was characterized by cheap construction methods and poor planning. This era reached its height at the time of the 1894 flood. The great damage done at that time certainly demonstrated that a comprehensive system of diking must be undertaken, and it was beyond the ability of private owners to finance the scheme.

Although much had been done on the building of dikes up to 1948 the great flood of that year wrecked many of the dikes. It has been said that losses totalling $20 million occurred in the lower Fraser valley flood of 1948. At that time the commander of the Canadian army in British Columbia was given control after Premier Johnson issued a proclamation declaring a state of emergency. Many agencies, including governmental, co-operated to improve the situation. When it was all over it was agreed in Ottawa that Canada would pay 75 per cent of the flood fighting costs, 75 per cent of the reconstruction costs and 50 per cent of the rehabilitation costs. The provincial government met and passed a couple of bills.

I should like to make two brief quotations from the report of the Fraser valley diking board. They had this to say:

> By careful engineering methods, one can restrain the river in spots, one can nudge it here and push it there, but never, without fabulous expenditures, can the lower Fraser river be harnessed and controlled by a system of dikes. In designing this new system of dikes, the board had to compromise, striving after maximum security consistent with reasonable economics.

I think the main feature of the report of the board is the fact that dikes are not the complete answer to flood control of the Fraser river. After some study and consideration by a larger board, in 1958 the membership of the board was decreased to four members as it is now. The members from the province are the controller of water rights and the surveyor general of surveys and mappings, and from the federal government the members are the director of the water resources branch of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, who is chairman, and the director of the Pacific area for the Department of Fisheries. This board has made several studies of four known ways to control floods; diking, flood detention reservoirs, river diversions and channel improvements. It seemed obvious to the board that the first two are the most effective. In the interim report presented by the board seven recommendations were made.

We should all realize at this point the enormous potential of the Fraser river basin for hydro power. We have been made aware of this aspect of the Columbia river and the Peace river in British Columbia, but what has not been emphasized is the fact that the Fraser river can produce more power than the Columbia and Peace combined, or about 45 billion kilowatt hours annually. This is about 4½ times the total power presently being produced in the whole province, and does not include power already coming from the Fraser.

The preliminary report mentions three system studies by which the great majority of power could be developed. No. 2 provides the best benefit-cost and includes a power site and storage at Moran. This would create a lake 150 miles long upriver from Lillooet. However, in spite of all the fine things that can be said about a project of this nature, it cannot be undertaken because of the threat to the salmon industry. The salmon industry has an annual value of about $34 million, about $20 million goes to Canadian fishermen and the remaining $14 million to United States fishermen. It is easily understandable, therefore, that projects of the kind mentioned cannot be undertaken for power or manufacturing and flood control.

I will, therefore, move on to another portion of the report put out by the board. They mention four requirements for partial development. The first is to provide flood control to non-damaging levels in the lower Fraser valley. The second is to form an integral part of a comprehensive plan for the basin in which all the economical power sites would be fully developed. The third would be compatible with maintaining anadromous fish runs and the fourth to be economically self-supporting through power production. It is worthy of note that flood control in these systems could be provided in an early stage of the development.

I should like to mention specifically at this point the lower Fraser valley dikes, some 223 miles in length. It is estimated that these dikes will withstand a flow of 375,000 cubic foot seconds of water past Hope. To build up the dikes to withstand this amount of flood would cost about $17 million with about $2 million annual in maintenance costs. So, Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes I have left I should like to give you a few quotations from some of the local newspapers emphasizing how badly they feel about the fact these dikes are not as they should be at the present time. The alternative suggestion now would be to put up storage dams in the Clearwater area.

The Agassiz Advance said:

> The B.C. Progressive Conservative association, meeting in Vancouver last Friday, adopted a policy calling for an immediate start on Fraser river flood control dams as recommended by the Fraser river board.

On February 24, 1960 the Fraser Valley Record recognized that the storage dams should be built immediately to help control floods. On March 11, in the Progress, we find a note that the membership of the board of trade is expected to endorse a resolution calling on the provincial and federal governments to implement plan A recommended by the Fraser river board.

Last, but not least, the Fraser valley milk producers association which, of course, is a huge dairy co-operative in the Fraser valley with annual sales of over $27 million, passed a resolution to urge the federal and provincial governments to relieve the annual flood threat to the Fraser valley by hastening their adoption of a policy of flood control of the Fraser river which is now under study by the Fraser river board and is known as plan A. The plan, as recommended by the Fraser river board, shows that an alternative system of storage dams would be available and would not interfere with the fish runs and would, at the same time, effect the desired measure of flood control.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I just want to say that I, personally, am very much in favour of having these dams built to control the high water. I am also very much in favour of protecting our fish business in the Fraser valley in every way possible, and I am convinced both can be done successfully.

Mr. Granger: Since there are only a couple of minutes left before five o'clock, may I call it five o'clock?

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member leave to call it five o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVATE BILLS

OMER THERRIEN

The house in committee on Bill No. SD-36, for the relief of Omer Therrien—Mr. McCleave—Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. McCleave: The first bill to be considered this afternoon is the petition of a 40-year old workman who has been separated from his wife since 1946. Despite humble means he has managed to bring up three children who are now in their teens. His wife has been living with another man for some time, and he is asking the House of Commons for a divorce.

Mr. Howard: In so far as Bill No. SD-36 is concerned, the hon. member for Halifax has been kind enough to make a few comments about the circumstances surrounding it. I think this is a commendable approach because it assists in bringing to the attention of the members of the committee some of the circumstances surrounding this particular bill.

There are, however, some additional matters to those which the hon. member for Halifax has mentioned. I might point out that there are three children involved and, naturally, we should concern ourselves with their welfare. The three children are in their teens, one being 18, one 16 and the other, according to the evidence, either 15 or 14. It is possible that the birthday of the child is close to the particular date on which this evidence was given before the committee and this would account for the confusion.

The couple involved have been separated since 1946, and the children have been maintained in a boarding school by their father. There were some proceedings for separation prior to this particular petition for divorce being filed. Mr. Joyal, the counsel for the petitioner, asked some questions about this. In this instance I do not know whether Mr. Joyal is acting as agent on behalf of another counsel who was initially retained, or whether he is the prime counsel. However, he does inquire about some separation action which was not taken by the present petitioner but by his wife, the respondent in this case. At page 11 he asks these questions of the petitioner:

Q. Has there been any action taken between you and your wife in the courts in Quebec to determine who was going to have custody of the children?
A. She took action to separate.
Q. When did she take this action?
A. I think in 1958.
Q. 1958?
A. Or 1957.
Q. Did the matter proceed to trial?
A. No.
Q. There has been nothing further done in connection with any action?
A. No.

So apparently the wife sued for separation proceedings two or three years ago but proceeded no further with that particular action. Why, I have no idea. Whether she felt she would be unable to get a favourable decision from the courts, or whether she just declined to proceed further, is open to speculation; and I do not think it is important in this case, except for this, that if the action for separation was taken by the wife, now the respondent in this case, and the ground alleged was adultery, it would naturally be adultery on the part of the husband who is the present petitioner. If that is the case the situation is now reversed so far as these divorce proceedings here are concerned.

If that is the case and that was the ground for the separation asked for—as I say I do not know whether it was or not, although as I understand it adultery would normally be the ground upon which one would petition or take action for separation in Quebec—perhaps there was some indication of adultery on the part of the man or the wife. But as I say, this is pure speculation.

With respect to the children there is again extensive examination.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I think the Chair has allowed the hon. member to refer to the children for quite long enough. As the hon. member knows, this bill has nothing to do with the children whatsoever. I am sure the hon. member can refer to the children, but I would not want him to discuss the children.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I thought this would be in order. I appreciate this ruling was made some time ago that custody and maintenance of children is not within our jurisdiction and we cannot deal with them. But I would submit that in the Senate committee, there was extensive questioning by both counsel for the petitioner and hon. senators with regard to the children and their maintenance, their upbringing, their maintenance in boarding school, as well as the question of action for separation to which I referred. It was only to that extent that I made my remarks and confined them to what had occurred in the other place. I have no intention of going beyond what the hon. senators discussed in the other place. As I said, the hon. senators did give extensive consideration to this question.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I think perhaps this committee had better look at its own rules.

Mr. Howard: I certainly agree with that, Mr. Chairman, that we have rules which apply to these cases. But it is unfortunate that we can only concern ourselves with divorce and must completely disregard what happens to the children, even though in the other place the hon. senators seem to ignore this rule and concern themselves with it. They seem to be acting in a manner which indicates they are concerned with the maintenance of children and what will occur to them afterwards. I would probably go a little further and say that it is an excellent attitude for the senators to take, to disregard the rules as they apply to the maintenance of children, because it is something they cannot close their eyes to. Evidence is given about them. While I do not know offhand about other cases, this petition states that there are three children. That is point number five of the petition which is dated April 27, 1959. It states:

> 5. That after the said marriage, your petitioner lived and cohabited with the said—and there are three children born issue of the said marriage, to wit:—

Giving the names of the three children. I think to the extent that this is a subject matter of the petition, and that the petitioner says to us, in asking for—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I must ask the hon. member to refrain from discussing the children. This committee has no jurisdiction over the children, as he has already agreed. Therefore I must ask him to refrain from discussing the children.

Mr. Howard: I wonder if I could raise a point of order, Mr. Chairman, as the result of that. I do not mean as far as your ruling is concerned because I understand that that ruling was made before, but I mean as to the validity of a particular petition which makes reference to children being born issue of a marriage when this house and the Senate apparently have no right whatsoever to concern themselves with the children. I would think if that is the case—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I do not see any point of order in that. This committee cannot make new rules and regulations; we have to go by what is laid down for us by the house.

Mr. Howard: My point of order is that the reference in the petition to children having been born has no place here whatsoever. If we are not entitled to concern ourselves with it, it should not be in the petition and has nothing whatsoever to do with the divorce proceedings which are being asked for.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. This committee has no jurisdiction to say what will go in the evidence and what will not go in the evidence. That is beyond our power. We have no jurisdiction over that at all.

Mr. Howard: I do not want to run contrary to the rules except to conclude my remarks on the point of order, without moving any amendment to the bill and as to what we should do with it. But it certainly seems completely out of order when a petitioner makes reference to children for hon. senators in the other place to concern themselves with them if it is something over which we have no jurisdiction and is not germane to the case. To the extent that reference is made to the custody of the children and its relationship with action that the wife took initially for legal separation I think we are probably concerned or should be concerned with taking notice of it. I think this committee should undertake to communicate with the members of the other place and ask them to refrain hereafter from asking any questions about children or their maintenance, their upbringing or their care, because it is no concern of theirs and should not clutter up the record.

An hon. Member: It is too late now; they have all gone home.

Mr. Howard: We can probably communicate with them after Easter. This has been going on for many years. We can look back at the records in 1926, 1927 and 1928 and see questions asked about this particular result of the marriage, and probably the Senate is in error—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I think the Chair has been very lenient in reminding the hon. member that this committee has no jurisdiction over the children. Therefore, the question of the children should not be discussed in this committee.

Mr. Howard: I agree with your ruling completely, Mr. Chairman, and it is extremely unfortunate that we cannot concern ourselves with the children. Let us return to the evidence on page 13; I imagine this is within our rights. Evidence is again given by Charles Charron, with whom we are familiar in these cases, and his occupation is given as that of investigator. He is questioned by Mr. Joyal, and I would point out that Mr. Charron, in accordance with the ruling given in this house, makes no reference to children. He makes reference only to the things he discovered, or which it was arranged for him to discover as the case may be. I imagine that Mr. Joyal and other counsel who subsequently appear before the committee of the other place will take notice of the ruling made here that no discussion is to take place regarding children. I imagine that in future no reference will be made to the children, that we shall be as heartless and as cruel as we can in these instances. But Mr. Joyal asks Mr. Charron:

Q. I show you a photograph, which is Exhibit No. 2. Who is the person shown in that photograph?

The answer is:

A. That photograph was supplied to me by someone in the office.

The witness does not say who supplied him with the photograph. He merely says it was supplied to him. Then the evidence continues:

Q. Where did you meet Mrs.—?

I assume that though it is not made clear here, the photograph is that of the respondent. I might as well make sure, in this regard, that exhibit 2 is, in fact, shown to be a picture of the respondent as identified by the petitioner. But even though Mr. Charron does not say this, does not say that it was a photograph of the respondent, I take it we can assume it was a photograph of the respondent. Anyway, in reply to the question: "Where did you meet this woman?" an address in Montreal is given. The record continues:

Q. What date?

A. April 16, 1959.

Q. Describe to the committee the circumstances under which you saw Mrs.—at that time?

A. I was there around 5 o'clock. At 6 o'clock I saw Mr.—come in. He went into the house, so I stayed until 10.30 when I saw the light go out at 10.30. I called my assistant, Mr. Lacombe, to come and meet me, and he came at 11 o'clock and we went to the door and knocked several times before Mr.—came and opened the door slightly. When he opened the door he had on a pair of maroon pyjamas and a grey dressing gown. I walked into the bedroom then.

Q. You went into the bedroom?

A. Yes. Mrs.—was sitting in the bed and she had on a blue top of pyjamas. I asked her who she was and she admitted that she was Mrs.—. I showed her that photograph that I had, and she admitted it was one taken of her, so I said to the man, "You are Mr.—? You are living here as a man and wife with this lady?" He said, "Yes, what is it all about?" I told him it was divorce proceedings. He got a little mad and we went out.

I submit again that this is a highly unlikely thing to have occurred but I am sure every hon. member would agree that this situation would not normally occur. Incidentally, I point out that it is strange how often the time lag in these cases is half an hour between the time the lights go out and the time the investigators knock at the door. It is not 35 minutes, or 15 minutes; for one reason or another, it is half an hour. Perhaps it is considered that half an hour is enough time for people to have engaged in whatever they might have been engaged in after the lights went out.

According to the evidence, the two men went to the door and knocked several times before the door was opened. The man who opened the door had on a pair of pyjamas and a dressing gown. The next thing that happens is that the two men walk into the bedroom. There are no preliminaries, apparently; no pushing their way in; no explanation that they had come to check the gas meter; no question such as "how are you fixed for oil", or "how are you fixed for razor blades". They just walk through into the bedroom and find a lady sitting on the bed wearing a blue top of pyjamas.

These two complete strangers spoke to this lady who had apparently been in bed for half an hour since the lights went out. They asked her what her name was, and she said her name was so-and-so. There was no question raised: "Who are you?" or "What are you doing here?" addressed to the investigators. Then the two visitors asked another question, whether the two were living together as man and wife, and the man replied: "yes, that's right".

No one in his right mind, I submit, who is engaged in this kind of activity whether it is of a long term nature, where people are living together as man and wife, or whether it is one engagement only—and that occurs sometimes by arrangement, in divorce cases—would behave in this way. Unless these people knew that a certain thing was going to occur at eleven o'clock, or whatever time it was, and that someone was going to knock at the door, they would not open the door and allow two persons to come in and ask questions of the nature which were asked in this case, and then, only after the questions were answered, get a little mad.

I have grave doubts about this case. I submit from the evidence that was given here that what happened was this: there was some difficulty at home. The couple was separated in 1946, as the evidence shows, and there had been trouble in the family. The two people could not get along together and in addition there was in-law trouble. Then, possibly, this woman or wife was going out with other people. These are the reasons why the divorce is sought; these are the reasons why it should be granted.

However, adultery is what we insist must occur, so couples must make arrangements accordingly. Lawyers must make arrangements, private investigators have to make arrangements either with the people concerned or with the lawyers for the sole purpose of arranging a situation where adultery might reasonably be supposed to have taken place or might have taken place. I say there is a great deal of hypocrisy about forcing people to do that sort of thing to make divorce possible when the situation is such that if they were living elsewhere—in the province of Nova Scotia, for instance—it would all be unnecessary. If these people lived in the province of Nova Scotia they could get a divorce on the basis of cruelty. If they lived in another country to which we are very close they could get a divorce on grounds of desertion. I think it is most unfair to ask that these people make these arrangements and set them up in order to meet that strict test upon which we insist, namely circumstances which could lead one to believe that adultery had taken place.

As I said before with respect to Mr. Charron, after reading and considering evidence in other cases with which we have dealt just prior to this time, these are the stereotyped answers that he gives. He knocks on the door. There is no question about what he wants or who he is. It is stated who answers the door. There is no questioning of the person who answers the door about coming in. He merely walks in, walks into the bedroom, asks whoever happens to be there what their names are. They do not hesitate to tell him "we are living as man and wife" or "this is my wife" or "this is my husband." There is no question at all about the impropriety of that sort of thing. It is just as though they had gone to a dress rehearsal in order to make sure that when they made their entrance, everything went according to plan. After it is all over, in order to give it an air of authenticity, as if these people had been disturbed, he uses this phrase "He got a little mad and we went".

I submit that it is asking the committee to stretch its imagination quite a bit to expect it to believe that this is precisely what occurred. I say this without intending any reflection upon what they concern themselves with but I submit that if the hon. members of the other place had applied themselves as assiduously to examining Mr. Charron about his activities that night as they did to examining—and quite properly; I think they should examine and question on this matter—what will occur to the children after this divorce is granted, they would have found out a few other things about the adultery arrangements which probably are not shown in the particular evidence given here.

Again at the risk of incurring your wrath, Mr. Chairman, I say that the action of the Senate in the examination of the petitioner with respect to the teen-age children is an example, and is something they should do. I think the Senate should do this time and time again, regardless of these contrary rules. It shows that apparently the Senate also think the same way. It shows that they are not just concerned with rubber stamping some sort of arrangement because it meets some solemn test with respect to adultery but that they are also concerned about the welfare of other people who are affected in these particular divorce proceedings.

I may as well give you fair warning, Mr. Chairman. As I say, I do not want to incur your wrath, but I say with sincerity that, even though you have made this particular ruling, I think you should allow a fairly relaxed bit of discussion, thought and examination by members of the committee of the whole affair with respect to the children, even though the rules say something different. I hope, Mr. Chairman, I can push in that direction as much as you will allow without incurring your wrath. I would not think it would be right for members of this committee to rise on points of order, as some are wont to do from time to time, because the strict rules are not exactly followed, rules which they themselves do not follow when they are speaking about particular matters.

But when it comes to the matter of children, I think this is something with which we should concern ourselves a great deal more than we do. I submit that it is unfortunate that the jurisdiction is divided. The province itself has some jurisdiction over this matter but then we are asked to split asunder or to cut the marriage ties without concern for what certainly concerns the petitioner and the respondent, namely what occurs to the children after this divorce is granted. The children should have accorded to them far more concern and consideration than is given at the moment.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I must refer the hon. member to standing order 59 (2) which reads as follows:

Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

The Chair can go no further than that. I therefore once again ask the hon. member not to refer to the children.

Mr. Howard: Because of what I have said previously and because of the references in the evidence—and because I think it is most unfair to put in the evidence and in the petition references to something which we have no right to discuss—I would move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

The Deputy Chairman: Will the hon. member put the motion in writing?

Mr. Howard: Yes.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the hon. member mean "ask leave to sit again either this day or next sitting of the house"?

Mr. Howard: Later this day or next sitting of the house as the case may be.

The Deputy Chairman: The motion is the following one:

That the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again later this day or next sitting of the house.

Motion negatived: Yeas, 5; Nays, 28.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the motion lost. Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Peters: I too have been greatly concerned in this particular case about what is going to happen to the children. Because the children were discussed in this evidence—

Mr. Lambert: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. In discussions in this committee may we please have conformity with the rules? There have now been four rulings by Your Honour on this particular point and once again we are seeing an attempt being made to breach the rulings made by Your Honour today and on previous occasions in connection with petitions of this nature.

Mr. Howard: May I say a word upon the point of order raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West, Mr. Chairman, and point out that it is not an attempt to breach the rules. It is an attempt to act in a moral fashion and to consider the welfare of people who are not otherwise considered.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. That is not a point of order.

Mr. Howard: I did not raise a point of order.

[Mr. Howard.]

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Are you lecturing us on morals?

Mr. Howard: You do not know what morals are.

The Deputy Chairman: The Chair has already ruled that the children are not to be discussed in this committee as they do not come under this bill or under the provisions of any of the causes of this bill. I will therefore again ask hon. members not to refer to them or I shall be obliged to ask them to resume their seats.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I cannot agree with the—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The chairman has made his ruling and I shall be obliged to ask hon. members to abide by it.

Mr. Winch: Do I understand it is your ruling that in any divorce case the children shall not be the concern of the House of Commons?

The Deputy Chairman: I can only go by what the rules say. The debate must be relevant to this bill and there is no reference to children in the bill.

Mr. Winch: Will you explain why in the evidence which is before us, which has to do with a report of the committee on divorce, it is mentioned that there are three children?

The Deputy Chairman: Order. This committee can only go by the bill in front of it. There is no reference to the children in the preamble; therefore, the committee cannot allow a discussion on children.

Mr. Winch: This is the first time that I have ever heard that children do not interest the House of Commons.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to disagree with your ruling, but I shall be happy to try to meet the point without referring to the children, although they have been discussed widely in the evidence.

The hon. member who spoke a moment ago when he rose on a point of order mentioned rules. He has been in parliament long enough to know that we are not operating under rules as they affect this particular case. This is an act, and an act must take into consideration the results of its operation.

It would seem to me that there are two or three questions the sponsor of this bill should answer. I concern myself mainly with the fact that previously there was an attempt made to obtain a separation order in the superior court of the province of Quebec. It is my understanding that if this order had been granted by the superior court in the province of Quebec and a separation obtained certain considerations would have entered into the matter. The court would have decided whether the wife was to get alimony and what the alimony was. Second, the court would have taken into consideration the children in this particular case. These two considerations would have been met in the case of a separation.

We are not too happy to discuss the matter of delay, but it would seem to me that the sponsor of the bill either should give some reason why this delay has taken place, or he should meet the charge that the reason that this act was presented to parliament at all was so the wife would not be able to continue her separation order and thereby get maintenance for the children through a civil court.

It is my understanding that if we grant this divorce then obviously there cannot be a separation order, and if there cannot be a separation order then there can be no maintenance granted by a court under a separation order. It would seem to me that if this is so then we are taking away the rights of those children and the wife to obtain support in the superior court.

It may be that we are not allowed to talk about the children here. It has been of importance to the Senate and the Senate have ruled. They have rules that govern what they do in a particular divorce action. They themselves, I believe, are capable of and have the full right and responsibility for changing the rules as they see fit. The reason you are advising the committee that we have no right to discuss children is not that you object to our discussing them, Mr. Chairman, but that you simply object to our discussing the maintenance of the children.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The Chair has no objections to anyone discussing anything that is before the committee. As I said before, I can go only by what is before the committee. It is not that I am objecting to anything; I do not object to anything that is pertinent to Bill No. SD-36. I hope I make myself perfectly clear.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, it is my opinion that this case is in a very weak position. As I say, I think that the granting of this divorce will mean the end of the separation proceedings in the province of Quebec. There are certain considerations that we believe must be taken care of, and whether they have been implemented with or without consent is not of much importance. But I think it is important to know the background of this particular case.

It would be wise for us to read the evidence in this particular case, since we are passing an act to dissolve the marriage of these people. It may be that some of the Conservative members do not want to see any issue of this marriage. They wish to think in their own minds that this is an annulment and that the marriage never happened. That is all right if that is the attitude they wish to take. Possibly that is the way their law is constituted. If this is true, then we should take up the actual case itself and find out what led up to the request for the dissolution of the marriage in the first place.

In the evidence taken by the Senate the normal questions were asked, such as whether any arrangements were made between the husband and the wife for obtaining the divorce and that sort of thing. The answers are as one would expect, because they were asked by legal counsel for the petitioner. Senator Barbour asked these questions:

> Q. What was the cause of the trouble?
> A. We used to live with the mother-in-law, and I wanted to take a house so that we could live by ourselves and she didn't want to come with me so she said to me if you are not satisfied to stay here you can go. I couldn't live with her any more.

I guess because she told him he could go. I continue:

> My mother-in-law was there and there was trouble all the time.
> Q. Who was there?
> A. My mother-in-law. She wanted to stay with her mother and did not want to come with me and there was too much trouble in the house.
> Q. Were you living in her mother's home?
> A. Yes.
> Q. And did you try to get her any home of your own?
> A. Yes, that is what I wanted to do, and she would not go with me and because there was too much trouble in the house I wanted to go. So I took my house, but she didn't want to go.
> Q. I am not clear as to where the children are.

We will not give the answer to that question, Mr. Chairman, because I do not think the committee wants to know where they are. From the answers to these questions one can judge that the mother-in-law was at fault and that it did not have anything to do with the lady running around or the husband running around, or anything of that nature. It was purely domestic trouble. A question was asked by Senator Taylor. Again, there was some questioning about the children but we do not talk about that. Then, this question was asked:

> Q. There is no hope of reconciliation at all?
> A. I don't think so.

This is the first case we have had where the parties have said they did not think there was any hope of reconciliation. It would indicate that the man had not made up his mind yet. It would also indicate that he may have been advised that if he had not made up this mind and if there was some chance of reconciliation probably the Senate would not see fit to pass the bill.

Mr. Bigg: I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member who is speaking is imputing to members of this committee negligence in their attitude toward the children of these particular people. I take this as not only a personal insult but as an insult to the whole committee. I wish he would substantiate his remarks or withdraw them.

Mr. Peters: There was a vote a few moments ago. The hon. member did not support us when we wanted to discuss the children. I do not think I have to go any further.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The Chair has ruled that the children cannot be discussed in this committee. They are not referred to in the bill.

Mr. Peters: That member got up and supported it.

Mr. Winch: You attack us. Why are you not interested in the children?

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Peters: He goes on to ask if consideration has been given to changing her mind and coming back to live with him, and Senator Taylor continued with this question:

> Q. You kept on in the hope that she would come back and live with you?
> A. She lived with another man.

Then Mr. Joyal, the lawyer in this particular case, as in the last three or four or more cases we have had before us, made what in my opinion is a very startling statement. It is not a question but a statement by counsel. He says:

> I don't think we will have evidence of actual cohabitation, but there is common knowledge that the respondent and correspondent are more or less living together, if not living together as man and wife.

Here is a very odd statement made by a lawyer, one of those people who are always so definite and are paid to be definite. They either believe the person is guilty or not guilty and they are not the least bit above setting out to prove their belief. We have Mr. Joyal, a barrister at law, presenting this petition and making this statement:

> I don't think we will have evidence of actual cohabitation, but there is common knowledge that the respondent and corespondent are more or less living together, if not living together as man and wife.

It seems to me this is further indication that this case was brought before parliament, not because the parties particularly wanted a divorce but for the simple reason that it was a method of getting around the problem of separation which would have required consideration of things that we are not even going to talk about. There are further reasons why I suggest that this matter should not have been allowed to have been delayed the length of time it was. We mentioned the question of delay in divorce proceedings in a very superficial way the other day. As in other types of court procedures, delay is a discretionary bar and will prohibit the prosecuting of a case that has been subject to unreasonable delay. In the book, "The Law of Divorce in Canada", I find the following:

> "Unreasonable delay" within the meaning of said act of 1857 is such a delay as indicates that the plaintiff acquiesced in the guilt of the other party or was insensible to the loss of his or her spouse, or is of such long standing as to compel the conclusion that there has been condonation. It does not need to amount to connivance for that is an absolute bar to relief under section 31; but lack of concern and long delay may be taken into consideration as evidence of conduct conducing to later adultery. In the Shaw case—

Mr. Speakman: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, the member is not discussing the bill at all.

Mr. Peters: We are trying to indicate some of the things that are involved in the bill and that the action should not and could not be allowed in a court of law.

Mr. Speakman: Which court of law?

Mr. McCleave: How do you know? You are a bunch of vigilantes.

Mr. Peters: I am not giving this out of my head. I am reading what somebody else has said which is more than some of the other members have been doing in the last few days. If they were to follow somebody else's advice they might do a lot better. I continue:

> In the Shaw case ... McLaurin, J., whose dismissal of the action was affirmed, held that standing by and doing nothing for a long period amounts to unreasonable delay and acquiescence within the meaning of the section. He disagreed on this point with Zaharia v. Zaharia.

This may satisfy the other side of the argument.

> In that case the respondent wife left the petitioner in 1927, bore the corespondent an illegitimate son, and the proceedings were not instituted until 1942. The discretion was exercised against the petitioner by McPherson, C. J. K. B., and the court of appeal reversed him and granted the decree on the grounds of public policy and in the interests of morality.

We are not suggesting that we follow the same grounds that they have in Great Britain where the grounds for divorce are different from ours. We are not suggesting changes at this time but we are pointing out that there is an indication that this petition was not necessarily brought before the house in the same manner that other actions have been brought in that it was brought as a method of preventing action for legal separation in the superior court of Quebec being proceeded with or contemplated in the future.

In my opinion it has not been clear for some time just what members of the committee will accept as constituting adultery. This matter has been discussed by the authorities and they mention those things that constitute adultery and those that do not. I would suggest that members of the committee familiarize themselves with the evidence that is necessary to prove an adultery charge. Because some of them probably cannot read or have not the time to read literature such as "The Law of Divorce in Canada" it may be necessary for me to read it in its entirety at some later date. But it is pointed out that adultery does not take place between two single people, between two women or two men. A number of things are necessary in order to prove that adultery has taken place.

An hon. Member: Is that right?

Another hon. Member: What is your authority for that?

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, apparently some members of the committee would much rather hear what is in this book so I will go ahead and read it. Even the lawyer in this case admitted that he did not think that there would be evidence of actual cohabitation and he is the one who is trying to make a case before us today. Here is the definition of adultery as found at page 306:

> Adultery is not defined by the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, or the divorce acts of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick or Prince Edward Island and its meaning has varied in different countries and under different systems of law. There is no doubt, however, that in divorce and other matrimonial causes it means voluntary sexual intercourse between a married person—

The Deputy Chairman: There is nothing in this bill asking for a description of the word "adultery". I, therefore, ask the hon. member to come back to the bill.

Mr. Peters: I suggest that there is something here that mentions adultery.

The Deputy Chairman: I would be very happy to hear it, if you could make it relevant to this bill.

Mr. Peters: I am just trying to find the prayer to the petition. It reads:

> An act for the relief of—

Then, we will skip the name.

> Whereas so-and-so, domiciled in Canada, and residing at the city of Longueuil, in the province of Quebec, has by his petition alleged that on the first day of September, A.D. 1941, at the city of Montreal, in the said province, he and Maria Rossi were married; and whereas by his petition he has prayed that, on the ground of her adultery since then, their marriage be dissolved; and whereas the said marriage and adultery have been proved by evidence adduced and it is expedient that the prayer of his petition be granted: Therefore, Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:

I would suggest that if we are going to admit this bill, which has the word "adultery" in it, then I am pointing out we are not aware of what adultery actually is. I suggest we should consult authorities higher than ourselves. I think it is only fair, since this is really a court procedure, that we be allowed to quote the leading authorities in Canada and the leading cases. We have an admission by the lawyer in this case that no adultery took place and yet we have a statement in the bill that adultery took place. It seems to me that this lawyer needs to know actually what constitutes adultery. He has been before us on four or five cases, and I am sure the committee should have the benefit of the authority I am citing. I suggest it is relevant to this particular case. I should like to complete the definition of adultery that I was given.

The Deputy Chairman: I will certainly listen to the hon. member and if he strays away from this case, I will advise him.

Mr. Nesbitt: We may as well waste time this way.

Mr. Peters: In so far as that last remark is concerned, I would say that if some hon. members just listened they might learn something. Some of them have been in this house a long time without learning very much. I continue the quotation:

> There is no doubt, however, that in divorce and other matrimonial causes it means voluntary sexual intercourse between a married person and a person of the opposite sex other than his or her spouse.

There is a reference then to the Oxford dictionary definition.

> It seems that, under the canon law, where one of the parties was unmarried he or she did not commit adultery, but merely fornication but the use of the word "adulterer", without more, in section 28 of the act of 1857, which provides that a husband petitioner shall make "the alleged adulterer a corespondent, unless—"

Then, there are some asterisks.

> —would indicate that this distinction does not prevail in our divorce law. Since the intercourse must be voluntary in order to constitute adultery the woman does not commit adultery in a case of rape; nor in the case of carnal knowledge of a girl under a certain age where her consent is no defence,—

An hon. Member: Is that right?

Mr. Peters: I am very interested in hearing the interjections. I am pleased to know the hon. member is obtaining some information. The citation goes on to mention a number of other very interesting definitions, but I rather think hon. members would do well to read them for themselves. I have given what I consider to be the important part.

In any event, I think it has been made quite evident through this definition that actual sexual intercourse must take place. If we accept that as the definition of adultery, then obviously the evidence will have to go farther than it has in this case. Certainly, there has been no indication that this was not an arrangement, and there has been some indication of collusion between the corespondent and the respondent in this case in the obtaining of this divorce, perhaps so they could get married. I do not believe that adultery, in any way, shape or form, has been proved.

I suggest that before this bill is carried by the overwhelming majority when it comes time to vote on these bills the lawyer be recalled before the committee of this house and queried as to why he should make a suggestion that no adultery had taken place, why he should bring that type of evidence before the House of Commons.

Mr. McCleave: He did not say that. Do not misread the evidence.

Mr. Peters: What he says is:

> I don't think we will have evidence of actual cohabitation, but there is common knowledge that the respondent and corespondent are more or less living together, if not living together as man and wife.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Mr. Winch: I should like to ask—

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Mr. Winch: I should like to ask a question of you, Mr. Chairman, concerning the procedure when a divorce case reaches this stage in the House of Commons and you have information that the spouse asked to appear before the Senate or House of Commons committee but was not notified, and is prepared to give sworn evidence that there was collusion between the lawyer and the other spouse. I should like to know what procedure we take.

Mr. McCleave: I rise on a point of order; obviously, that has nothing to do with this case.

The Deputy Chairman: I can only rule with reference to this bill, and anything else should be given to another source.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

CIVILIAN TRANSPORTATION ALLOWANCES, RENOUS DEPOT, N.B.

Question No. 309—Mr. McWilliam:

1. Have changes been made in transportation allowances for civilian personnel engaged at the Renous naval ammunition depot, Renous, New Brunswick?
2. If so, what are the changes?
3. What was the date of the last change in transportation allowances and what were the changes?

Answer by: Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence):

1. No changes have been made in transportation allowances for civilian personnel engaged at the R.C.N. ammunition depot at Renous, N.B., since July 1, 1955.

2 and 3. On July 1, 1955 the daily transportation allowance for civilian employees residing 21 miles or more from the unit was reduced from 80 cents to 60 cents.

FOREST INVENTORY, N.B.—FEDERAL PARTICIPATION

Question No. 321—Mr. McWilliam:

1. Is the federal government presently sharing the costs with the province of New Brunswick of a new forest inventory, including aerial photos?
2. If so, what is the estimated federal cost for the completion of this inventory?
3. What is the estimated period of time to complete this inventory?

Answer by: Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources):

1. Yes.

2. An initial federal-provincial forest inventory of New Brunswick was begun in 1951 and completed in 1958 at a federal cost of $129,328. Since 1958, inventory maintenance costs have been shared under an agreement which provides for a continuing inventory progam up to March 31, 1961, when the present agreement expires. It is estimated that at that date the federal cost since April 1, 1958 will amount to a little over $51,000.

3. See answer to part 2.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

SOUTH AFRICA—ARREST OF CANADIAN NEWSPAPERMAN—REQUEST FOR EXPRESSION OF VIEW ON APARTHEID

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in asking the Prime Minister whether he can report to the house on the steps that have been taken to protect the interests of a Canadian citizen, Mr. Norman Phillips, arrested in South Africa for carrying out his duties as newspaper reporter, may I also ask him a related question supplementing those I previously asked on March 25 and 31, namely whether he would make provision, as was done last Friday in the parliament at Westminster, so the views of this parliament can be expressed, through a resolution, on the policy of apartheid.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in so far as the first question is concerned, when information was received by the government to the effect that a Canadian newspaperman, Mr. Norman Phillips, was being detained, the matter was taken up with me, acting in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and as a result the Canadian High Commissioner was instructed to inform the South African government that the arrest and detention of Mr. Phillips could not but add to the widespread public indignation already felt in Canada at the measures which had given rise to recent violence and loss of life in South Africa.

The high commissioner was instructed to make strong representation to the South African government with a view to securing the release of Mr. Phillips. Those representations were made. While I am not in a position at the moment to report finally as to what the result may be, I have reason to hope that Mr. Phillips will be released from detention.

There is however, a suggestion that to that release may be added an indication on the part of the South Africa government that Mr. Phillips' presence in that country would no longer be considered desirable by the government of South Africa.

In so far as the second question is concerned, the Leader of the Opposition has referred to a resolution which came before the House of Commons of Great Britain on Friday last. If the house would allow me I might refer to the pertinent portions of that resolution:

> That this house, deploring the present racialist policies now being pursued by South African government, under which non-Europeans are consistently denied normal human and political rights, including the right of campaigning for a peaceful change in the laws under which they live, and the recent declaration of a state of emergency and the many arbitrary arrests, fearing that a continuation of this repression is threatening the security and welfare of all races living in Union of South Africa and good relation between members of the commonwealth, urges Her Majesty's government to take the opportunity at the forthcoming commonwealth prime ministers' conference to bring home to South African government the strong feelings of British people; and restates its firm belief that peace and tranquility in South Africa can only be secured in the long run on the basis of freedom and equality and a full respect for the inherent dignity and humanity of all men.

Now, sir, speaking on behalf of the government and people of Canada, I have stated that we deplore the situation which brought about the bloodshed in South Africa. I have stated that whatever one's personal feelings may be—and I do not have to state what mine are in this regard, for they have been stated and restated in the past—respect must be had for the situation which might arise in a commonwealth prime ministers' conference if in advance there was an indication that this matter would be included in the discussions. There is no official agenda for the prime ministers' conferences, but I am sure hon. members will realize that in the informality that prevails at those conferences, and with the prime ministers of India, Pakistan, Ceylon, Ghana, Malaya, and other countries of the commonwealth present, it may certainly be expected that the views of the various commonwealth governments will be made most clearly evident.

The Leader of the Opposition asked whether an opportunity might be given for the introduction and discussion of such a resolution as was brought before the United Kingdom House of Commons three days ago. While there is no opportunity now, having regard to the order paper, the fact that we are discussing the budget and also the fact that we have fully before us the very tragic happening of last Saturday, I can say that immediately after recess, when the condition of affairs in South Africa will at least not be as turbulent, we hope, as it is at the moment, we might then give consideration to doing that which the hon. member has suggested so that the views of Canada's House of Commons, with respect to which there is no difference from the point of view of party affiliation or position in the house, might be expressed.

I would also point out that if I were not sitting where I am, with the responsibilities that are mine, I would express myself somewhat differently from the way I am at the moment. But looking ahead to the prime ministers' conference, while there must be the clearest consideration and the frankest discussion of those things that affect all parts of the commonwealth, and though bound together by no pact or treaty we are free to discuss as we will, I fear for the future of the commonwealth if, while never failing to make clear the viewpoint of each of us, the prime ministers' conference should become the judge and jury of the conduct of member nations.

In saying that I also express the hope—my predecessors Mr. King and Mr. St. Laurent have also spoken strongly of this matter—that while there should be nothing done among the member nations to cause division and dissension, some day the members of this great group of nations will be able to bring about a declaration of basic, accepted principles with regard to human dignity so that together all the nations of the commonwealth, having a similar heritage, may hold, in so far as these basic, fundamental things that touch sacredness of the human person are concerned, a common basis for agreement.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I will not be out of order, or if I am you will excuse me, if I express the appreciation of our party on the Prime Minister's statement that an opportunity will be found at the earliest convenient date to express the views of this parliament on apartheid through a resolution. May I also express the view that this resolution should include an expression of the hope of this parliament that, before it is too late, some way out of the distressing situation in South Africa may be found, before further violence makes any peaceful solution, founded on right and justice, impossible.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Speaking on behalf of a party that abhors violence in all its forms, I want to say we support the proposal made by the leader of the official opposition that this house be given an opportunity to discuss the South African situation, such as was provided to members of the House of Commons at Westminster. We have evidence once again, Mr. Speaker, of the fact that Britain leads the world in speaking with a united voice against tyranny.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that while we are glad to hear the Prime Minister's statement that at a later date we will have an opportunity of taking a course of action similar to that taken in Great Britain, we would prefer him to take that action now so we can support Great Britain's united stand in opposition to typranny in South Africa.

Before I sit down I should like also to say that the attempted assassination of the South African prime minister was a most unfortunate event. This attempt on his life is evidence of a grave social conflict arising from the practice of tyranny in South Africa. So long as this tyranny remains there can be no peace in the hearts of freedom loving people of the commonwealth or elsewhere in the world. We suggest, Mr. Speaker, that now is the time for the Prime Minister of Canada to speak up for Canada.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question. Can the Prime Minister say whether Canada has been approached by any country or any group of countries with regard to the suggestion that a special assembly of the United Nations be held regarding this matter?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I cannot say definitely, although the information I have would not bear out this suggestion on the part of the hon. gentleman. I would ask to be allowed also to say to the hon. member for Kootenay West that the Prime Minister's views have always been made known with regard to these matters that are concerned with discrimination, and those views have never been muted. However, at a time like this outspoken criticisms may have the effect of making the situation more serious, deplorable as it already is. It is for this reason that there has been, on the part of this government, a sense of restrained responsibility, without failing to recognize the needs of the moment.

AIR TRANSPORT

ICAO—INQUIRY AS TO ADOPTION OF UNITED STATES NAVIGATIONAL SYSTEM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport, notice of which I have sent him. Did the international civil aviation organization adopt the United States VOR-DME navigation aid as a standard for world air lines, despite protests by Canada that the system was inadequate, untested and inaccurate? What effect will this decision have on the very high frequency directional range now in use in our country?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I wish to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question.

I understand that the council of ICAO last Friday, by the necessary majority vote, accepted what is known as the distance measuring equipment as a standard for addition to the already accepted visual omni range system which is at present an ICAO standard. Canada did not vote in favour of this move at the time, since while we were prepared to accept the DME specifications as a standard we felt the requirement for its installation should be on the basis of what is known as an ICAO recommended practice rather than an ICAO standard. The full report on this discussion, and the formal ICAO recommendation, have not reached my department yet, and I am therefore not in a position to comment until the documentation has come in and we have had an opportunity to consider it.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to ask a supplementary question with regard to the VOR ranges that are now in operation. Are they all installed, and what will happen to the 18 new ones that it is the intention of the department to establish? Will they still go on?

Mr. Hees: As far as I know. However, I should prefer to wait until this whole matter has been fully considered before giving a final answer.

POWER

EAST SAINT JOHN, N.B. THERMAL PLANT—PERMISSION TO TABLE CORRESPONDENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. Can the minister inform the house on what date a reply was given to the request of the government of the province of New Brunswick for permission to table an exchange of correspondence in connection with the East Saint John thermal power plant? Can the minister also state whether the reply was in the affirmative?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Acting Secretary of State): As to the exact date, I have not that information at the present time. However, I will take the question as notice and supply the information as soon as possible. As to whether the minister can state whether the reply was in the affirmative the answer is yes

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Robichaud: I have a supplementary question. In view of the minister's reply, and also in view of the recent denial by the premier of New Brunswick of having received such permission, as reported in the newspaper L'Evangéline of April 6, will the minister also undertake to find out on what date such permission was received by the premier of New Brunswick and report to the house accordingly?

Mr. Balcer: This matter is outside my jurisdiction. I shall be pleased to supply the date on which this reply was sent, but I cannot tell on what date it was received.

Mr. Robichaud: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. My question of privilege has to do with the rights of members of parliament to get truthful replies to their questions.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Robichaud: There is a controversy here, and this has to do with my question of privilege. On March 30 I asked a starred question and a reply was given by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness). The question was:

1. Has a request been received from the government of the province of New Brunswick asking for permission to table in the New Brunswick legislature the exchange of correspondence between the New Brunswick government and the federal government, in connection with East Saint John thermal power plant?
2. If so: (a) on what date was such a request received; (b) has a reply been given; (c) what was the nature of the reply?

The minister replied as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the answer to part 1 is yes.
The answer to part 2 (a) is February 26, 1960; (b) yes; (c) the government of Canada has no objection to the tabling of documents which are not of a privileged nature, provided the government is informed which documents the provincial government proposes to table.

In the New Brunswick legislature, as reported by the press last week, the premier of New Brunswick denied having received such permission. I think the house has a right to know whether permission was given to the premier of New Brunswick, and on what date it was received.

Mr. Balcer: On the point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think the hon. member's question of privilege relates to the supplying of information in the New Brunswick house.

Mr. Robichaud: It relates to information which was supplied to this house and which is being denied outside of this house.

[Mr. Balcer.]

PRIVILEGE

MR. PICKERSGILL—ALLEGED INCOMPLETE RETURN RESPECTING PAYMENTS TO PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): In wonder if I could ask the Acting Secretary of State whether he has yet had an opportunity to look into the return I mentioned on a question of privilege last Tuesday. The return was obviously incomplete, and I asked that the matter should be looked into.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Acting Secretary of State): If I remember correctly, this return was made available on the same day the hon. member intervened, or the day after.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the hon. gentleman is thinking of another return. Would he have another look into the matter?

Mr. Balcer: Would the hon. member be good enough to tell me what subject his question dealt with?

Mr. Pickersgill: It was on the subject of federal payments to the provinces.

Mr. Balcer: I will look into it.

AGRICULTURE

BUTTER, CHEESE AND SKIM MILK—REQUEST FOR STABILIZATION PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. On two occasions I asked him whether he had a statement to make about support prices on dairy products such as butter, cheese and milk powder. I was not given any satisfactory answer by the minister. Now I see in "Le Bulletin des agriculteurs" an official announcement concerning butter—

(Text):

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: So far, the hon. member has been volunteering information rather than asking a question. The rules do not permit arguments or speeches. If the hon. member has a question to ask, would he please ask it?

Mr. Starr: Learning from the hon. member for Essex East.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was about to ask my question. I should like to know whether reliance can be placed on that announcement, made outside the house, to the effect that the price for butter has been set at 64 cents, that for cheese at 31.5 cents in the province of Quebec and at 32 cents in Ontario, while that for milk powder is reported to be 10 cents.

(Text):

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): I do not know what announcement the hon. member has in mind. It certainly is not within my knowledge, and whoever may have announced it has apparently done so entirely on his own responsibility and without any foundation.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, for the minister's information, and in order that he may be better posted on the matter, I will send him the newspaper clipping I referred to.

(Text):

Mr. Harkness: All I can say is that I am not able to read all the newspapers in Canada; therefore I have no knowledge of what this particular newspaper may have said.

[Later:]

Mr. Harkness: In connection with the question asked by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska, may I say that the announcement to which the hon. member referred, and of which he has sent me a copy, is an announcement I made a year ago, an announcement to apply to the dairy industry on May 1, one year ago. The hon. member seems to be a year out of date.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker: the announcement in "Le Bulletin des agriculteurs" is for 1960, and not for last year.

PORK—DISPOSITION OF SURPLUS HELD BY GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a supplementary question. Can he say whether it is a fact that the government intends to turn back to Canadian packers some 90 million pounds of pork and, if that is done, what steps are being taken by the government to make sure that the price to be charged the consumer will be reasonable and fair?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): That is not the situation Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is confused. He is referring perhaps to a news dispatch which I saw, I think, in a newspaper on Friday last—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Saturday's Winnipeg Free Press.

Mr. Harkness: This news dispatch evidently made no distinction between the canned pork we are holding and fresh pork. I should like to remind the hon. member and the house that on March 8, as reported at page 1836 of Hansard, I announced that starting April 18 the stabilization board would offer stocks of canned pork—may I emphasize "canned pork"—for sale in the domestic market.

At that time I also stated that it was not expected that the sale of canned pork into the domestic market would have any significant influence on the hog market, the reason being that canned pork is a specialty product representing only a very small portion of the total pork sales, and does not compete directly with the normal sale of fresh and cured pork products.

Further, now that pork products may move freely between Canada and the United States, the most important influence in determining hog prices in Canada is the price level in the United States and, regardless of the volume of offerings of Canadian product, hog prices will not drop below the general level of the United States market.

Actually this is a straight matter of putting back into the market products which we purchased when we were under the old form of price support. As I am sure hon. members realize, it would be completely uneconomic for the government to hold millions of pounds of canned pork and for packers to can more when they are able to sell in the market all the fresh pork they are now securing from current hog deliveries.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This is the consequence of the government's repudiation of policy.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member of course is completely out of order in making a statement of that kind. There has been absolutely no repudiation of policy.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister give the approximate quantity of canned pork involved in this offering?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I announced to the house some time ago that we had at that time about 100 million pounds of canned pork. We have made gifts for international relief and for distribution to needy cases in Canada since that time representing a considerable volume of pork, something over 20 million pounds at present. I refer to canned pork, of course.

The amount of canned pork we now hold will be released into the market in keeping with the demand for it. The canned pork we have left will not be thrown on the market in one fell swoop, but will be fed into the market gradually as and when the market is able to absorb it without having any effect on current hog prices.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. In view of what the minister has just said and all that it entails, will he be kind enough to inform the house why Canada imports canned pork?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think we are going beyond the range of proper questions on orders of the day. This may be a matter for debate.

Mr. Harkness: Perhaps I should answer that question if I may, Mr. Speaker. The point is that normal trade goes on between Canada and other countries. Other countries have been sending a limited amount of canned pork of specially prepared types to this country for many years and are continuing to do so.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

OTTAWA—SAFETY CONDITIONS OF NO. 8 TEMPORARY BUILDING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Public Works. I may say that this would normally be a question for the order paper, but I understand there is no time for that. In the light of the imminent move of the trade mark office to No. 8 temporary building, could the minister inform the house whether adequate notice has been taken of (a) the design load of the building, (b) the actual load of the office, and (c) the safety factor?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): I will be very happy to accept this question as notice.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR LATEST STATISTICS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): The Minister of Labour made an interjection a moment ago, and that caused me to remember that I have a question to ask him. Can the minister give us the latest figures for unplaced applicants as of March 31? If the hon. gentleman has not these figures available, will he kindly supply them by tomorrow, or before we adjourn in order that the country may have an appreciation as to whether this problem continues to be the serious one I believe it to be?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): I do not have these figures available. As soon as they are available I will give them to the house.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will the hon. gentleman try to have the figures available by tomorrow?

[Mr. Winch.]

Mr. Starr: I receive them; I do not issue them.

ALBERTA—REPORTED PROTEST AGAINST RAILWAY EMPLOYMENT CONDITIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Unfortunately I have not been able to give him notice, and I shall be content if he answers it on another occasion. Has the right hon. gentleman received a letter from the brotherhood of maintenance of way employees, Alberta lodge, protesting against the abolition of sections, and also the drastic cut being made in maintenance of way forces, in which it is urgently requested that the Prime Minister use his good offices to inquire into these employment conditions? Has the Prime Minister made such inquiry and, if so, with what result?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I shall have to look at my files to see whether I have received the message in question. Having done that, I shall be able to give the hon. gentleman an answer.

Mr. Chevrier: It was sent on April 4.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

CONSIDERATION OF PROCEDURAL AND ADMINISTRATIVE TRIBUNALS ANNOUNCED BY PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I wonder whether the right hon. gentleman could let the house know before the Easter recess what the government's plans are with respect to the three procedural and administrative tribunals which, he said, would be the subject of government action; the scrutiny committee, the procedural commission and the royal commission on the civil service.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I am trying very hard to get on with the business before the house. We have made some progress in the last few days and in the 63 days we have sat so far. When we conclude the budget debate, immediately after the recess we shall be in a position to deal with these very important matters.

FINANCE

REPORTED BANK DECISION TO CHARGE DISCOUNT ON U.S. SILVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance the following question. In view of the statement carried in many Canadian newspapers relative to the decision of the chartered banks to charge an additional discount on United States silver coins, will the minister inform the house whether he or his department was consulted on this question, and what effect the decision may have on monetary policy and on financial relations between Canada and the United States?

Mr. Speaker: I do not think that is a matter which is the administrative responsibility of the minister, but the minister himself may have different views and, if so, I shall permit an answer to be given. But it seems to me this is a matter which is within the jurisdiction of the banks.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Precisely so, Mr. Speaker. This is a decision which the banks have evidently made within their own sphere of responsibility. There has been no consultation with the Department of Finance as far as I am aware.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): A supplementary question. If there had been any consultation, what would have been the attitude of the Minister of Finance?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Constructive, as usual.

HOUSING

NORTHERN ONTARIO—REPORTING OF BONUSES BY MINE WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. O. J. Godin (Nickel Belt): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Public Works. Is it true that applicants for loans under the provisions of the National Housing Act—and I am referring now to people resident in northern Ontario—have to report the bonuses paid to mine workers, an amount which is unascertainable from year to year? if this is so, would the minister not consider having that regulation withdrawn and the question removed from the application papers?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): I found it difficult to follow the hon. member, but I shall be very glad to accept his question as notice.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): May I put a question to the Minister of Public Works. Would the minister be good enough to try to make available before the Easter recess the return relating to the housing development at St. John's, which was ordered a few days ago?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): I will certainly do my best to oblige the hon. member.

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): I wish to address a question to the Acting Secretary of State, and ask him if he is now in a position to answer the question I put to him on Thursday April 7 in reply to which he said he would inquire and give an answer later.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Acting Secretary of State): I think the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources will answer in my place.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): I have been away for a few days. The return asked for by the hon. member will be tabled right away.

(Translation):

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Postmaster General.

Almost two months ago, on February 15 last, I put a question on the order paper that was passed as an order for return on February 17, 1960. It was about the organization of flying squads in Montreal by the Post Office Department. Can the minister tell me if I may expect an answer shortly?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): I hope to get an answer during the week end, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Chevrier: Let us not forget that the house adjourns on Wednesday.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Before Wednesday, then.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Friday, April 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Benidickson.

Mr. C. R. Granger (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, debate on the budget fortunately allows one to comment not only on what the budget contains but on what it does not contain. The budget seems to lean toward the latter to such a degree that it could in fact be called the vacuum budget.

However, there was a nostalgic reminder of the past in the budget speech. Certainly when the Minister of Finance praised the qualities of thrift it was like a voice from the past. "Thrift" is a word we do not hear much nowadays, and I thought it might have been dropped from the English language. During the golden age of Liberalism it was not needed much, but like other words which have fallen into disuse—"unemployment", for instance—it has been been brought back into current usage by the Conservatives. Doubtless the language is the richer for it, even if the people are the poorer.

Thrift is doubtless a good thing. There is no doubt but that many of us would be better off—if we practised it, or if we made it a motto to make things do and to wear them out, but what would happen to an economy based on spending I would hesitate to say. Certainly there are many people in Canada today who have to practise thrift whether they like to or not.

The rosy description of our soundly based economy was heartening, and no doubt it must be comforting to the multitude of unemployed to know they are living in the midst of such prosperity. However, it is not considered good form to mention unemployment. In fact, to do so is to court the charge of being a Jeremiah. Unemployment must be ignored. Officially it does not exist.

I noted with interest what the hon. member for St. John's East said regarding the position of Canadian citizens working on United States bases. I am pleased, as he is, to hear that their status in respect to pension rights has been recognized. I trust that this includes those working on the Goose Bay air base in Labrador. I feel I should point out that the base in Labrador was not included in the original bases deal, and part of the air base at Labrador has been leased by the Canadian government to the United States under different circumstances.

I also noted with interest the hon. gentleman's comments on vocational training. I would ask him to use his influence with the Minister of Labour to adopt the proposals of the Liberal party as put forward by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, namely that the federal government should itself bear the full cost of vocational training for the unemployed instead of trying to push half of it on the provinces which already provide the vocational training schools.

So much has been said over the years about the fisheries, and particularly the salt codfish section of the industry, that I rather hesitate to discuss it further. But I believe so strongly in the importance to Canada of the fishing industry that I ask the patience of the house while I refer again to Canada's oldest industry, which is still very valuable and which can be much more valuable in the future, both to Canada as a whole and to the individual fishermen.

From time immemorial fishing, like farming, has been one of the basic industries of mankind. The fisheries were very important to the countries of Europe away back in 1497, when John Cabot sighted Bonavista and in reality discovered Canada. When he returned to England he reported that the waters of the new found land were full of fish, and the very next year English merchants were outfitting ships to voyage across the Atlantic to the new fishing grounds. Soon the French, the Portuguese, the Basques and the Spanish were fishing in the waters of the new world. From that day to this the waters of Canada's east coast have been fished by many nations. Today, as in the closing days of the fifteenth century, the flags of many nations dot the seas off the coasts of Newfoundland and Labrador, and over the years the fishing industry has been a very important factor in the economy of eastern Canada.

However, less attention is paid to the fisheries today than in the past. There is reason for this. The industrialization of central Canada, the wealth which industry has brought, and the huge agricultural industry of the west have drawn public interest away from the old maritime pursuits, the fisheries of the Atlantic provinces. This is understandable, but it could be fatal to a large segment of our population. I do not dispute for a moment the right of the more prosperous and populous parts of Canada to press their problems and to advertise their progress. Rather, I applaud them for it. As Canadians we are all proud of the might of industrial Canada and of the glorious productivity of our land. What I do regret is the lack of public support for an industry which is vital to the survival of the Atlantic provinces.

It has been said in criticism that if the fishing industry cannot support itself it had better disappear; that if fishermen cannot make a living catching fish they should get better jobs elsewhere. On the face of it such criticism appears to be just. In any case, that is what is happening; and if the trend continues—and the downward trend is confined not only to the fisheries—the end will be the depression and depopulation of the Atlantic provinces. But in a nation growing at the rate Canada is growing we cannot afford to let any industry disappear. Every part of our national wealth must be exploited, and the waters off the northeastern coast of Canada are wealthy with food. There is no need for the Atlantic provinces to be a depressed area; there is no need for the fishing industry to disappear.

It is granted that the industry is an old one, but age in itself is no yardstick of vitality. For instance, the wine industry is one of the oldest in the world, but today it is not considered to be a bad investment. The fishing industry has had its ups and downs, but so has every other industry. The real trouble, sir, is first, that the fishing industry has changed too litte over the years; it has failed to embrace modern methods quickly enough; second, it is facing heavily subsidized competition. Canadian fishermen must compete with the Portuguese, the French, the Icelanders, the Russians and many others, all of whom have the benefits of substantial government subsidies. Somehow we must effectively solve these two problems.

With respect to the former, the need for modernization of the fisheries, much has been done in recent years. We can take some satisfaction from the vast changes which have taken place. True, they came late but much progress has been made in the industrialization of the fisheries in recent years. Prior to the last decade or two there had been very little change in the way of catching fish. Looking through an old history of Newfoundland some years ago I saw some old drawings of fishermen of the sixteenth century, showing gear, stages, dress, and so on, and I was shocked to note that little change had taken place. To try to operate a fishing industry today, using ancient methods, is like trying to run a modern farm with hand implements, like attempting to meet the world need for grain with hoes and the single furrow plow.

It is no wonder that fishermen found it difficult to make ends meet and often quit the sea to get jobs ashore. But in recent years, and almost too late, the cod fishery has been partially industrialized. With provincial and federal aid modern plants have been built, handling both fresh and salt fish, and where these plants are operating the way of life has changed. While the industrialization of the fisheries was getting under way many fishermen quit the fisheries. Young men are not making fishing their profession because of the bad economic history of the industry. I am convinced that a danger point is being reached. Industrialization has come too late to save the industry without additional steps being taken to complete its rehabilitation. While a commercial revolution has been taking place, the fishermen have been disappearing. I would impress this upon hon. members. You can make a farmer into a miner, you can make a labourer into a mechanic, but a deep sea fisherman has to be bred to the job.

Now, mark you, most fishermen and sons of fishermen would prefer to follow the sea, with its freedom and rich experience. This is not just a pretty story but is in fact the truth. I have met many fishermen and sailors who want to continue to follow the sea, but who quit it because they could not make a living at it. While the good effects of the industrialization of the fisheries are spreading out to the remote areas, something must be done to encourage fishermen to continue fishing, to make it possible for them to continue fishing, or one of these days we will find ourselves with modern plants and no fish for them. If we lose a generation of fishermen we will lose a great industry in Canada.

But this need not be so. Action can be taken to save the industry, speed up the industrialization and make a profit for Canada. The good work being done by the federal Department of Fisheries and the provincial department of fisheries in research, active aid, and so forth must of course be continued. But of immediate concern is making money available to fishermen so they can continue to fish.

Let me illustrate. On the Labrador coast today—and the waters of Labrador are one of the great sources of supply; I will come back to this later—there are many fishermen who have lost stages and fishing property through storms. Their boats and gear are worn out. Salmon nets are ragged; cod traps are full of holes. It is beyond the ability of the fishermen to get the necessary materials to repair their nets and traps, to build new boats, to buy engines and equip themselves to be able to prosecute the fisheries efficiently. It is impossible for them to do this without help. There is need, and need now, for active federal assistance to fishermen to replace worn-out gear.

Money must be made available by loan or grant to see them through this difficult period. Present loan schemes are neither ample nor workable. Capital must be made available. It must be made easier for fishermen to get up to date equipment. Believe me, it will pay the nation to do this. The community stage program must be continued and extended. It must include Labrador, because the fishing plants of Nova Scotia and Newfoundland have to look more and more to Labrador for their supply. Within a few years I predict that Labrador will be more important than ever to the fishing industry. If we do not recognize what the Russians and others are even now capitalizing on we will regret it forever. At all costs there must be more attention paid to the Labrador fisheries. The replacement of property is of tremendous importance. Several of these community stages must be built in Labrador this year.

The bait service, considerably improved, must be extended rapidly. A perennial shortage of bait has cost this country untold millions over the years. Research into artificial bait should be stepped up. The building of more fish plants must be encouraged. There must be more fish plants, with more fishermen fishing more efficiently and making more money per man. These things can be done at comparatively little cost. Let me repeat that the two great enemies of our oldest industry are tardiness in accepting change and the heavy government subsidies paid to our competitors. Certainly we can beat them both.

However, the fate of the industry rests right here. Only if the representatives of all of Canada make the fishermen's business their business and the Atlantic provinces' business their business can we hope to save a vital industry and a noble region of Canada. If for no other reason, national pride should make us want to do something about looking after our own interests.

Last fall while I was in northern Newfoundland there was a large ship and a flotilla of smaller ships inside the Grey islands. They proved to be a Russian supply ship and a fleet of Russian trawlers. It is known that Russian ships were still fishing in Labrador waters in February of last year. French and Portuguese trawlers come into St. Anthony for supplies. And I could go on. The ships of many nations are fishing Newfoundland and Labrador waters. In summer in my home town of Catalina on the northeast coast, sometimes the bay outside the harbour looks like a city as the lighted ships of a foreign fleet fish at night inside the three mile limit. Canadian waters are a happy hunting ground for the nations which know the value of the wealth in our waters. This is something that most Canadians apparently do not know and, what is worse, do not seem to care about. I think the proposed 10-year delay in protecting fishing rights in our coastal waters is regrettable and dangerous.

We stand to lose our fishing industry on the northeast coast of Canada. We stand to let the Labrador waters be lost to Canada in every practical sense. I say we cannot afford it. No matter how wealthy Canada is, she cannot afford it. The cost of rebuilding and making the Labrador fishery profitable is trifling compared with the reward. I say we cannot afford not to do this; and yet the Labrador coast is neglected. Despite the trifling cost of inexpensive radiotelephone sets, the fisher folk have little or no means of communication. They try to survive under primitive conditions, without aid or interest, while the efficient ships of Russia reap the wealth of their waters.

However, while the coasts of Labrador await the attention necessary to development, the interior of Labrador, practically unknown and unexplored since creation, is now beginning to yield up its secrets and its wealth. The developments now in process in this unknown territory promise to make it one of the most important and wealthiest parts of Canada and, indeed, of the world.

A great change has taken place in the public attitude toward this unknown land in recent years, though I do not believe the scope of exploration and development is yet fully appreciated. Early explorers were astonished by the forbidding, fortress-like coasts of Labrador, the vastness of the Labrador wilderness and the barrenness of its northern mountains. It was early dubbed "the land which God gave to Cain". In 1770 Captain George Cartwright, who voyaged to Labrador, wrote:

> One is insensibly drawn to the conclusion that this country was the last which God made, and that He had no other view than to throw together there the refuse of His materials as of no use to mankind.

However, despite that bitter observation Cartwright continued to voyage to Labrador for 16 years, and it is interesting to note in his journal that he thought he had detected the presence of iron ore. There were valuable materials in what Cartwright called the refuse of creation, for today the iron ore deposits of Labrador are of unimaginable importance to the economy of North America. In my opinion Cartwright did not do justice to this vast and impressive land, for no one can visit Labrador without being impressed by its grandeur, its iron-ribbed strength and its brooding immensity. In Hamilton inlet, where the great fortress of Goose Bay is located, even the weather is extremely good.

In recent years a modern saga of exploration has taken place in the Labrador. The bush plane on floats or skis, the men with sleeping bags and parkas, are the modern pioneers of a new front for civilization. There was little in the way of recorded data to go on, but huge deposits of iron ore and great potentials of water power were thoroughly investigated.

The water power of Hamilton falls is stupendous. The capacity is estimated to be about four million horsepower or more, with a possibility of another two million horsepower being available after the upper water power has been developed. That is a potential of six million horsepower, and the lower tributaries may well add another five million horsepower. The British Newfoundland Corporation has spent several million in exploratory work, and in 1956 an access road was built from the Quebec, South Shore and Labrador Railway to the Hamilton river, a distance of 104 miles. I might add that 56 miles of this road were graded to a standard adequate to handle wheeled traffic.

This year the company will build a 120,000 horsepower hydro plant near Hamilton falls. The surveys have been completed and the preliminary work started. The project, including transmission lines, is scheduled to be finished in 1962. The power generated by this plant will be used at the new iron mines which are opening up in the Wabush lake area of Labrador, 110 miles away. Thus two of the great natural resources of Labrador have been linked together. The Iron Ore Company of Canada and Wabush Iron Company Limited will be the customers.

The great iron ore deposits of Labrador are being developed. A railway is being built there. A pilot plant is in operation. A town is springing up, and soon in what was once wilderness a modern town of several thousand people, with modern schools, hospitals and all the appurtenances of civilization, will live, move and have its being in what was once a remote and unknown land. It may be that God did not give this land to Cain after all; he gave it to Canada.

Here are northern development and the northern vision being fulfilled. We have heard much about visions and northern development during the past two years, but while the great northern vision of the administration seems to be fading like a disturbing mirage, in Labrador there is vision and fulfilment. I am not one to scoff at vision. I deplore the lack of it. The proof of what vision and patience can do exists today in Labrador. It is a great vindication of the vision of the premier of Newfoundland and others who believed in the practicability of northern development.

I would hate to see the northern vision, of which we heard so much during the prophetic winter days of 1958, die until the need for prophecy arises again. I believe the northern vision must go to meet the northern lights in Labrador. Here is a great new country of proven wealth. Here are known resources to be developed. Here is a region so large that a great agency like the federal government is needed to bring it the necessary public services. Here is a need for roads to known resources. Here is a place for federal enterprise in opening up a great new and wealthy land. Federal roads to resources, such as a road from Seven Islands on the St. Lawrence to Goose Bay, Labrador—these are the things to inspire and challenge the vision of a great new northern development even now coming lustily alive.

I have talked much of Labrador, Mr. Speaker, and of the old industry declining on its coast as well as the new industry beginning to flourish in its interior. Both have a great potential for our nation, and I am sure all Canadians, as they get to know this new land of Labrador, will be proud to count it as part of their country, even as I am proud to be its representative in parliament.

Mr. C. F. Kennedy (Colchester-Hants): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I should like first to congratulate the Minister of Finance and this government upon the budget. Being one who is proud of at least some of the thinking of my Scottish ancestors, it gives me very great satisfaction to see that the forecast is that we will come out on the right side of the ledger. Those in responsibility on this side of the house have every right to be proud of the fact that they have directed the public affairs of this nation and given the leadership necessary to bring us through a period of difficulty. Now we are in a position to indicate to the people of this country that they can look forward to prosperity and development on a pay as you go basis.

The position we have now reached as a nation has not come about by mere chance but is the fruit of careful planning and prudence, coupled with the unselfish application of the resources of our people in every walk of life. It is gratifying also to observe, especially during the last few years, not only the growth and progress economically but also the trend toward moulding a more united nation, made up of so many ethnic groups and based upon our British and French heritage. Let those who have assumed responsibility, and indeed this should include every citizen of this country, not accept all these blessings lightly and become complacent. There are many influences around us which, if we are not on our guard, will seek to destroy the high standards and principles which have become ours, not only through our own efforts but as a result of the sacrifices of those who pioneered in this great country.

In the last few years there has been a tendency for more and more people to call upon the government to enter more and more into business and private lives. I hasten to point out that it is generally recognized that the more we demand from government, the more of our individual freedom we sacrifice. The strength of a nation, I submit, lies not in regimentation and control but in the initiative and industrious capabilities of the individual, working in an atmosphere of free enterprise.

The geographical location and nature of this country while having many advantages, also has some disadvantages. First, Canada stretching across the northerly part of North America is subject to extremes in seasonal climatic conditions, and this tends to raise many difficulties in the competitive production of many of the goods required on world markets. Because of this fact we have always been faced with a problem in providing year-round production in many things and this results, of course, in the problem of maintaining steady and full employment for all classes of workmen. Our climatic factor also concedes advantages in the seasonal production of various items to our great neighbour to the south and, in this regard, contributes in no small way to the present trade deficit with our neighbour. If we are to continue to enjoy the luxury of many consumer goods which because of climatic conditions can be produced earlier or only in the south, we must contiually open up new developments here and streamline production in such a manner that we can sell more to bring our trade ledger more into balance.

Second, this country stretching from sea to sea for a distance of nearly 4,000 miles has many transportation problems. The bulk of our population and manufacturing industries have been concentrated in the mid-eastern section. This, of course, has created many difficulties, both in distribution and marketing, for the lesser populated areas which lie in the western and Atlantic areas. If, for example, we who live in the Atlantic provinces are to develop our economy and enjoy the full resources of the country, it is necessary that steps are taken to realistically equalize this cost of distribution so it will be shared by all Canadians. When this great country was brought together in confederation it was intended that all citizens should share equal rights and privileges. Since that time we have shouldered the burden imposed by protective tariffs, and we in the Atlantic provinces have not been afforded equal treatment in that we have been, and still are, bearing additional burdens brought about by continued costs in transportation.

Before confederation, because of access to the water trade routes of the world, transportation was not a problem. However, after confederation tariffs robbed us of access to this trade in order to protect manufacturing which was mostly located in central Canada. Import tariffs, the benefits of which accrue to the national treasury, are nothing more than a form of subsidization, because the one who buys the product thus assessed pays the shot. Why then, I might ask, are we who live in the extremities of the country not entitled to subsidization which would make us equal in the other respects?

For example, let us look at the distribution of products which are manufactured locally but sold on a national scale. It is my considered opinion that if it is not reasonably possible or practical economically to diversify some of these factors, then the products produced in this manner should bear the same price tags at distribution points all across the country. For example, let us consider the standard automobile. The standard automobile costs over $100 more in Windsor, Nova Scotia than it does in Windsor, Ontario. If these prices were equalized it would only mean a slight increase to the many buyers in Ontario, but would mean a major reduction in price to the buyers in the extreme areas.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Excise taxes should be eliminated, and that would help a great deal.

Mr. Kennedy: I am sure that unless some steps are taken to rectify this situation with regard to these types of manufactured products, their customers located on the seaboards are going to look more and more to the advantages of buying imported articles; and I am sure everyone will agree that this procedure will not help to keep the factories going in this country. It is my opinion that this matter might bear close examination by the manufacturers concerned.

Last Friday the hon. member for Vancouver East, in speaking of the heroic town of Springhill and mentioning the few industries introduced into that community in the last year, was either unaware of or deliberately failed to mention the following fact, namely that a Nova Scotia company is opening a new mine in the town which will employ approximately 200 men. The company is being assisted in great measure by the very progressive provincial government of Nova Scotia.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. MacEwan: He would not listen to me. Don't give him the floor.

Mr. Winch: May I ask a question?

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Winch: Very well.

Mr. Kennedy: A good deal has been said during this debate with regard to the government's attitude toward the civil service. Some of those affected in my constituency express pleasure in that, since this government has taken office, they have already received two substantial pay increases and a good medical plan for which the government pays half the cost. The empty arguments of some hon. members opposite only show that they still have not learned that grass is better fodder than brass.

Hon. members opposite have had a good deal to say with regard to Canada's participation in continental defence. Surely they must realize that we are receiving a great degree of protection in view of our modest contribution. It is unthinkable that the people of this country could bear the burden of a go it alone plan. If they examine the present arrangement carefully they will find that under the policy of this government we are not only receiving reasonable defence but are also sharing in the production program to a extent which means a great deal to the economy of our country. In this age of missiles and electronics, techniques and defensive designs are changing so rapidly that the implements under development are liable to be obsolete before they reach the practical stage. It is therefore necessary to gamble to a certain extent beyond the foreseeable future.

Some hon. members opposite, in being critical of our program, seem to forget the colossal blunders made by the former government when they sat with it on this side of the house. I wish to remind them of one which hits close to home. For instance, the establishment of Camp Gagetown in New Brunswick, at a terrific cost to the public, certainly could not be justified, and so far as I am concerned involved the spending of huge sums of taxpayers' money and resulted in the ruination of the economy of such communities as Debert and Aldershot in Nova Scotia where facilities to meet the required military need already existed to a large extent.

Earlier I referred to our trade deficit with other countries. It is to be noted that we also have a considerable deficit in our tourist spending. It would be a terrific boost to our economy if we could encourage our own people to spend their vacation dollars within the boundaries of this country and, as a matter of fact, it should be possible to attract more tourists from other countries. I wonder whether we in the Atlantic provinces have explored all the possibilities. I am thinking at the moment particularly of the hundreds of miles of ideal bathing beaches along our shore lines, which I daresay are practically unknown to the people a few miles inland. If hon. members of this house and their families have an opportunity to spend a week or two in partaking of the pleasure of salt water bathing and sunshine on one of these beaches, I am sure they will wish to return every year thereafter. Many of these beaches could be made more accessible and attractive by the owners themselves and at little cost.

I would commend the exploration of these resources especially to the municipalities as a field in which they could well increase their revenues at little or no cost. Local boards of trade also might well study the economic value of such developments to the locality concerned.

We in Nova Scotia are deeply grateful to this government for the special financial assistance which has enabled our municipalities more or less to hold the line in taxation and at the same time expand social, educational and health services. I am firmly convinced that under the positive policies of this government and the dynamic leadership of Premier Stanfield, Nova Scotia will continue to forge ahead even more rapidly than in the past year.

Mr. Winch: I wish to ask the hon. member a question. I waited until he finished his speech in order to do so. May I ask the hon. member whether the company which he said was going to open a mine and employ 200 men in Springhill is the same company that received from the government of Nova Scotia a financial contribution for drilling, and has now made an additional application for more money but has given no indication of doing anything beyond drilling? Is that the same company he has in mind?

Mr. Kennedy: Not to my knowledge.

Mr. Speaker: I recognize the hon. member for Beauce.

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder whether I might put a question to the hon. gentleman. Can the hon. gentleman give us the dates of those two measures providing for salary increases to civil servants to which he referred as being introduced since the present government came into office?

Mr. Kennedy: No, I have not that information. One was just the other day.

Mr. Hellyer: The $15 million one the other day?

Mr. Kennedy: That is the one.

Mr. Winch: Will the hon. member answer this question? Because of his statement when he challenged my statement in the House of Commons, will he give the name of the company which is going to provide employment for 200 men in a coal mine operation in Springhill? Will the hon. member do that?

An hon. Member: You made your speech.

Mr. Speaker: I recognize the hon. member for Beauce.

Mr. Winch: Will the hon. member do that? Of course he does not dare do it.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): We are not in committee.

Mr. Speaker: I recognize the hon. member for Beauce.

(Translation):

Mr. Jean-Paul Racine (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my contribution to the budget debate, may I take this opportunity to express my deepest sympathy to those of my constituents who have suffered hardship from the Chaudiere river floods. I know that a number of my constituents have again been affected this year and have sustained considerable losses.

I cannot help sympathizing with them, and I also hope that those who are still worried will not suffer further losses, whether they are city dwellers or people with farms along the river banks.

I also hope that some agreement may be reached between the responsible government and the federal government to eliminate this annual danger.

Mr. Speaker, there is a very legitimate tradition for taxpayers, i.e. to wait with some anxiety and impatience for the budget speech because they want to know the policy of the government and the prospects for the coming year.

This year, as in the past, the Canadian taxpayer was wondering what changes would be introduced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), if any change was to be expected at all, as under this government, we have got used to annual deficits, which, of course, prevent the minister from providing any reductions in personal income tax.

The budget presented by the Minister of Finance on March 31, does not contain any important fiscal change, as the minister himself has admitted, but he is optimistic and hopes that 1960-1961 will show some improvement.

He believes, for instance, that Canadians will earn more and pay the government $1,750,000,000 in 1960, instead of $1,555,000,000 as in 1959.

This prosperity, according to the minister, will also extend to business corporations which will pay the federal treasury $1,340,000,000 instead of $1,140,000,000 in 1959.

The minister also hopes that customs revenues will rise by $51 million during the next financial year and that the sales tax will also bring in $59 million more than in 1959.

Consequently, the greater portion of additional revenue which the government hopes to raise during the financial year 1960-61, i.e. an amount of $591 million, will come mainly from direct taxes on individuals and corporations, representing an amount of $395 million, i.e. a percentage of 66.

Individuals will therefore account for one third and corporation for another third of the additional income which the minister hopes to secure in order to reach a $12 million surplus.

I hope, as do all taxpayers, that those forecasts will materialize, because at that time, they would indicate improvement in our economy, at least from the point of view of gross national product.

But I am inclined to agree with my colleague for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson), that we will face another deficit and that the supplementary estimates will be higher than foreseen by the Minister of Finance.

Since this government has been in office, it is the first balanced budget that the Minister of Finance has attempted to introduce, and here again we will have to wait until next year to know whether he has achieved his ambition or if he has been over optimistic.

However, in spite of the minister's optimism, we can hardly forget that right now there are more than 800,000 unemployed in Canada.

We cannot forget either, that the net income of farmers decreased by 7 per cent in 1959.

Those are two fields for which the Minister of Finance does not foresee any rapid solution which could warrant his hopes for 1960-61.

In his budget speech, according to page 2685 of Hansard for March 31, 1960, under the heading Summary and Conclusions, the Minister of Finance admits that the total loss of revenue from the relieving amendments could add up to as much as $2 million, and he admits also that those changes represent only some corrections. Therefore, there are no exemptions, and the 1960-1961 budget is based merely on optimism, in so far as the balancing of the budget is concerned. Supposing the hopes of the Minister of Finance do not materialize completely, I wonder what will happen to the unemployment insurance fund, because if business does not improve or at least does not improve sufficiently, there will still be unemployment unfortunately. We know that in the last fiscal year and during this one, the Conservative government has not taken, or does not want to take, any steps to eliminate the economic evil which is unemployment.

In agriculture, for the year 1960-61, will the government maintain support prices at their present level? We all know how much farmers are disappointed and anxious over the new system of deficiency payments. That is the reason why they have been urging the government to maintain support prices on butter and cheese, and to establish a new support price on milk powder. I sincerely hope that the government will give special consideration to these highly justified demands of farmers.

We also note that, in the last fiscal year, imports rose by 9 per cent, whereas exports increased only 5 per cent. This means that, from this angle, the Tory government has done nothing to reduce our trade deficit, and if the yield of customs duties in 1960-61 is $51 million more than last year's, as expected in the budget, it means that we can expect a further rise in our imports, and therefore our trade deficit will be still larger in the next fiscal year.

We, in Canada, have the facilities for greater production, because we have the manpower and the raw materials. What is lacking is markets. Yet, according to an item which appeared in Le Soleil for April 29, 1957, here is what the Prime Minister of Canada stated:

Mr. Diefenbaker accused the Liberal government of partly destroying our economic independence by allowing an unfavourable trade balance to accumulate between Canada and the United States, a balance which now reaches the figure of $1½ billion, an all-time record, and by allowing foreign capital to invade Canada to such an extent that the Financial Post, that great business newspaper, wonders how long Canada can retain its separate entity, in view of the increasing control of foreign capital in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, those were the words of the Prime Minister in 1957. We are now in 1960, and he has been in power ever since that time, and yet he has not done a single thing as far as our trade deficit is concerned.

Here is what he said on the same subject in Brockville, on May 8, 1957, as reported by the Globe and Mail for May 19:

(Text):

In a major policy statement, John Diefenbaker tonight outlined the steps the Conservative party would take to counteract Canada's increasing unfavourable balance of trade and to assist small business.

Steps must be taken immediately, he said, to encourage the development of Canadian production to reduce and ultimately eliminate adverse trade balances.

To encourage trade, he underlined, Canadian individuals and institutions should be encouraged to participate to a greater extent in the equity ownership of foreign-owned Canadian corporations.

One of the best ways to produce this result, Mr. Diefenbaker added, would be the revision of taxation laws to encourage a larger degree of Canadian investment.

(Translation):

Those are the words of the leader of the Conservative party and, at the time, he surely did not know that the voters would try him out by electing him Prime Minister.

What is the Conservative government doing to alleviate this problem? Absolutely nothing.

In another field, we see that during the last fiscal year, the federal government paid over to the provinces $149,800,000 for hospital insurance purposes. This amount, for all practical purposes, comes from taxes collected by the federal government to be redistributed to the provinces under the hospial insurance plan.

It is unfortunate that the province of Quebec, while sharing in the costs of this program, does not yet share in its benefits.

This hospital insurance program came into operation, in fact, in 1959-1960, when all provinces except Quebec decided to participate.

In the province of Quebec, because of the inertia of the Union Nationale government, the measure has not yet gone beyond the study stage.

The financial situation of the government shows us also that expenditures increased by 6 per cent to a record amount of $5,706,800,000.

But here is what the Prime Minister had to say about this. According to the Toronto Telegram of May 2, 1957, which reported a speech made in Truro, Nova Scotia, the day before, he said:

(Text):

Mr. Diefenbaker pledged that a Conservative government would set up a commission similar to the Hoover commission in the United States so that the "unnecessary and wasteful federal expenditure could be eliminated."

(Translation):

And yet, since the Tory government has been in office, expenditures have kept going up.

Since the Conservatives got in, there has also been a money crisis; nobody can borrow except at prohibitive rates.

Yet in this regard, according to the London Free Press for June 7, 1957, the Prime Minister said in Woodstock on June 6:

(Text):

The Conservative leader criticized the government for its tight money policy which, he said, had paralysed the lumber industry, had levelled prosperity in certain provinces and had jeopardized or ruined small businesses.

(Translation):

And what about tight money? No later than April 7 last, we learned in La Presse that the school board of St. Johns, in the Iberville constituency, was refused a loan by a bank in St. Johns.

The article reads as follows:

The Iberville school board needed a $61,000 loan, but it was turned down by the bank with which it had been doing business, although permission to borrow had been granted by the municipal commission. This amount would have been used to pay interest dues on debentures and to pay the teachers' salaries.

It was to be a short term loan, to be repaid in December 1960. The board was counting on its taxes and statutory grants to repay it.

Mr. Speaker, you have there another vivid example of the difficulties encountered by our school boards and our municipal corporations when it comes to borrowing, even for the retirement of loans and urgent work projects.

I have referred to the case of that school board in particular but I must point out that this is by no means an isolated one. I only had to open a recent newspaper to see that similar cases are to be found everywhere.

The tight money situation affects all fields of our economy, including schools, municipalities and industry.

Think of the farmers who, as I said while speaking during the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, went to the banks for loans under the Farm Improvement Loans Act to buy tractors and were told that money was available to customers only. If that is not a tight money situation I wonder what is.

That is the kind of situation created for many of our farmers by the policy of a Tory government which has not tried to solve that problem.

With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words about the financial situation of our municipalities.

[Mr. Racine.]

In the last few years, the federal and provincial governments have been increasing their taxes, while municipal taxes also went up pretty steadily every year in the form of higher land and sales taxes. Municipal corporations also have a budget to balance, and they only have one field of taxation on which to rely, that is property taxes, a fact which the other governments seem to worry very little about.

I feel that the provincial governments, as well as the federal government, should seek an answer to various municipal problems.

I do not wish to suggest that our governments should meddle with the internal affairs of our municipalities, but I think that the federal government could exempt our municipalities from the excise tax.

I know that many items are now tax-free, but this tax exemption should not cover those items only, but also all purchases that municipalities must make during the year.

Many reasons would justify such a policy on the part of the federal government. In the first place, the federal government does not pay any taxes and, second, the taxes it imposes are deductible for income tax purposes.

We may also consider that taxes collected by the federal government are subject to collection charges. Now, in the present case, collection charges have not been reduced because the government must still control items only, but also all purchases that municitax.

In my opinion, if it has been found advisable not to tax some specific items, this excise tax abatement should be extended to all purchases made by our municipalities.

As I was saying, I am entirely against the federal government intruding or interfering in the internal affairs of municipal administration.

However, since the Prime Minister will convene a federal-provincial conference very soon, we are justified in asking ourselves what part municipal representatives will play at this meeting.

The Prime Minister declared on March 28, in this house, that a federal-provincial conference would take place on July 25, 26 and 27. Following that announcement the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) asked the Prime Minister, in view of previous statements with regard to the matter, what would be the municipal participation in the conference. We are still waiting for the Prime Minister's answer. Consequently, it is quite plausible to think that municipalities will have no say at that gathering.

If the government realizes the present position of municipal corporations, if it is aware of the trouble it caused them by grabbing all available funds to cover its own deficits, it has, in return and in all fairness, the responsibility of granting them full deduction of the excise tax on all their purchases.

Of course what I am advocating for municipal corporations I also want for school boards, for they are now in a position which is similar, if not worse.

In fact, practically every week we read in newspapers about the troubles of many school boards. At times, they even have to face strikes by teachers whose salaries they are unable to pay.

If I am urging the federal government to remove this excise tax, it is not only because I consider it could thus be of help without interfering in the municipal and school fields, but I consider it could in this way legitimately subsidize, under the constitution, the requirements of those municipal and school boards that are now in great need.

Mr. Speaker, you will perhaps find it strange that I should emphasize the fact that the deduction could be made without interference by senior governments, but precisely, I consider it an advantage to be able to help them without asking them anything in return, as a certain Quebec government is doing when it infiltrates itself into those corporations to better control them for political purposes.

It was rather amusing to note how certain Conservative members tried to make the best possible use of this debate on the budget.

The first one to do so was the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Bell) who, following the custom established by the Conservatives, did not fail to ask suggestions from the opposition. The Conservatives keep asking: "What would you do?" As if they were not the ones who had to fulfil the many promises they made to the Canadian voters.

The Conservative member for Laval (Mr. Bourdages) stated, according to page 2905 of Hansard, that this was the most sensational budget that we could hope for as far as textile products are concerned, and he went on to say:

> This last budget has caused enthusiasm in cities where the textile industry will now become prosperous.

That is not the kind of comment we read in La Presse for April 1, in which it is reported that the reaction of representatives of the textile industry ranges from dissatisfaction to resignation, and that they are disappointed because the protective tariffs for this industry have not been raised high enough.

As for the Conservative member for Vaudreuil-Soulanges (Mr. Bourbonnais), he said very little about the budget. He chose instead to praise the Union Nationale, thereby forgetting that the subject matter of the debate was the budget of the Minister of Finance, his Conservative colleague.

He went on to give us the old story which is well known in the province of Quebec, and told us about the number of schools that were built not by the ratepayers, those who pay taxes, but by the Union Nationale, a party of Conservative trend, as he said according to page 2949 of Hansard.

On the other hand, the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Tremblay), as if it were appropriate for him to do so, took the opportunity to give us a lesson in ethics.

We conclude from this budget that the Conservatives hope that spring will bring about a solution to the unemployment problem; otherwise, as the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) stated, if spring does not bring any solution, the fund will be depleted by 1962.

We also note from the budget that there is nothing to show that the Conservatives intend to keep the promises they made to Canadian voters in the last two elections.

We note that there is nothing to show that farmers can expect a rise in their incomes, which dropped 7 per cent in 1959.

We note further that housebuilders are concerned, according to a statement made on April 4 by the chairman of their association in Montreal, and I quote:

> The housebuilding industry, Mr. Holmes stated is now going through a very serious crisis, such as it has not known for a number of years.
> In the first three months of 1960, he added, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation approved four times less mortgage loans than in the corresponding period last year. This year, it has approved 2,800 loans across Canada, as against 8,900 last year.
> Mr. Holmes blames the situation on three factors: the attitude of C.M.H.C., the refusal of banks to grant mortgage loans; and the increasing indifference of lending firms.
> The housebuilders association realizes that it is up against competition from industry and business, which are more attractive to moneylenders because they offer a higher rate of interest, whereas the rate is generally restricted to 6 per cent on mortgage loans for housing purposes.

Civil servants are also dissatisfied because their demands have only been partially met, and because the salary increases apply only to certain classes. Postal employees will not be satisfied, since this salary increase does not apply to them; in fact, those 20,000 postal employees, or so, are not included in the 50,000 civil servants who will benefit from an increase retroactive to April 1.

In other words, nobody, except Conservative members, seem to be satisfied with the administration of this government, and if, here and there, we hear rumours about the Conservatives going to the polls in 1961, perhaps it might be a good thing to suggest to them that they do it as soon as possible, because the people would be ready to get rid of them this very year.

Mr. Theogene Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, allow me, at the beginning of my remarks, to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) on the efficient way in which he fulfils his task as Canada's great treasurer. The balanced budget he introduced in the house, on March 31 last, is evidence of his great ability and, at the same time, of the firm determination of the present Conservative government to give the country a sound economic leadership.

I was glad to hear, the other night, the Minister of Finance open his speech with the following words, uttered in my mother tongue:

> In presenting my first budget on June 17, 1958, I drew attention to the fact that never since confederation, had any portion of the budget speech been delivered in this house in the French tongue. I expressed my surprise that in a parliament with two official languages enjoying complete equality every portion of this budget speech has always been delivered in English.

As a member of a constituency where 99 per cent of the people are French speaking, I think it is my duty to thank very sincerely the Minister of Finance for this courtesy towards the racial group to which I belong. His attitude confirms the determination of the present Conservative government to give the French language the place it rightfully deserves in the proceedings of our nation's parliament.

Mr. Speaker, when the minister spoke the words I quoted a moment ago, I stole a glance at my Liberal friends, sitting on my right, who never miss a chance to ask questions whenever anyone makes some slight error or a minor slip.

It was most amusing to see how humiliated and disappointed they were after the lesson the Minister of Finance had taught them. The lesson was the harder to swallow as it came from a member of a Conservative government which in the past, they used to represent as the arch-foe of everything French Canadian. Therefore, in the days following the budget speech, our hon. friends, the Liberals, did not particularly try to play up this incident in the press. They chose instead to minimize the whole thing.

Mr. Speaker, I listened with great attention to the speeches made by hon. opposition members since the beginning of the session, and more particularly since the budget speech. I was surprised to see how upset they were by the minister's budget speech on March 31 last. It was particularly sad to witness the superhuman effort of my good friend and desk-neighbour, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson), trying to criticize the budget submitted by the Minister of Finance. It was certainly a thankless task, as he had to criticize a budget which was most welcome to the remainder of Canadians.

Our people heard with great pleasure that there had been no tax increase. Textile workers in my district and in the remainder of the province rejoiced about tariff protection which, following the report of the tariff board, was announced in the budget speech. And now, Mr. Speaker, allow me to quote from an item, i.e. part of an article published by Le Courrier de Saint-Hyacinthe on the budget presented by the Minister of Finance. The title, and I quote, is:

> A balanced budget in Ottawa. Forecast of a $12 million surplus.
> The budget presented by the Hon. Donald Fleming, Minister of Finance in the cabinet of the Hon. John Diefenbaker, Prime Minister of Canada, is full of optimism, dispels all gloomy forecasts, and hushes all the cries of dismay and hypocritical innuendoes of the Liberal opposition.
> Not only does it forecast a surplus for the new financial year, but it reassures the people in respect of the question marks which are always present at this time of the year with regard to taxes and taxation.

Further on, it reads:

> The strange thing is that the Liberal politicians who proclaimed themselves infallible throughout the country, failed, in their smug complacency to rouse themselves to an awareness of imminent economic perils.
> Though they had been warned by their own financial and business experts, who were cautioning them against a future which might cause some uneasiness, they did not even take the trouble to listen to them nor to attempt any preventive gesture.

If we were to believe my hon. friends in the opposition, Canada is a rather poor country where life is rather dismal and hard. According to them, there is nothing in Canada but unemployment and extreme misery caused by a tremendous load of taxes and duties.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is the picture.

Mr. Ricard: To listen to Liberal speeches—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is right.

Mr. Ricard: Industries are declining, farmers are facing ruin, workers lead a miserable existence on the verge of bankrupty and so on.

According to them, these are the blackest years Canada and Canadians ever knew.

Some hon. Members: So they are, so they are.

Mr. Ricard: On the other hand, if we were to believe the Liberals, there has never been either progress, or prosperity or happiness in Canada under any but their own rule.

Some hon. Members: That is right; it is true.

Mr. Ricard: They alone are responsible for all beneficial legislation enjoyed by Canadians. All good comes from them.

Mr. Lessard: And so it does.

Mr. Ricard: And all evil, all that is wrong, is blamed on the Tories.

Mr. Lessard: That's true, that's it.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, the Liberal troubadours, in their dirges—

An hon. Member: The troubadours—

Mr. Ricard: —make the most of a few weaknesses in our economy. They have not a word for the action taken by this government to correct the poor situation we inherited in June 1957. They are particularly careful not to go back any farther than the last world war. They boast about extraordinary and essential accomplishments under their regime and claim credit for a prosperity which was unavoidable in wartime.

They like to refer to the prosperity which prevailed under Liberal administration and made it possible for them to reach a high level of employment.

Our Liberal friends, while tooting their own horns, quite intentionally forget something. During the next few minutes, I should like to refer to those very details which they chose to leave out of their speeches.

Mr. Speaker, the Liberal members did not utter a word about conditions that prevailed during the years 1926, 1927, 1928, 1929, 1936, 1937, 1938 and up to 1939 when the war got them out of the mess they were in. Farmers remember that in 1928 and 1929, hogs were selling at $4.50 a hundredweight, eggs at 8 to 10 cents a dozen, and butter at about 20 cents a pound.

An hon. Member: When was that price for butter?

Mr. Ricard: On the other hand, workers that are over forty today well remember that, at that time, there was a good deal of unemployment, that it was very hard for heads of families to find work and earn a living and that they had to be satisfied with wages of 10, 15 or 25 cents an hour.

The Liberal members might have added that verse to their dirge.

I have looked through Hansard—

An hon. Member: 1930-1935.

Mr. Ricard: —and I found that, at the time, the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) was not getting up every morning to ask the Minister of Labour if the number of unemployed had increased during the night. Oh, no, it was at the time of the Liberals, when there were 600,000 unemployed.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The situation is much more serious now. That is why.

Mr. Ricard: Ten per cent of the labour force was unemployed, and our Liberal friends were sleeping, sleeping a deep sleep. At that time, therefore, they were ignoring the workers but now that they have lost the power, they just love the workers. Yes, they love them so much they are pressing them closely on their hearts so as not to hear their impressions on the conditions which prevailed when they were in power.

Here, Mr. Speaker, in support of what I just said, I would refer to a passage from a book entitled: "Official History of the Canadian Army, Six Years of Wars", by Stacey.

> Another factor, probably less important in practice, made conscription seem unnecessary in Canada in 1939. The country had not fully recovered from the depression which had begun a decade before, and there was still a great deal of unemployment. Estimates of the number of unemployed at the outbreak of war run as high as 600,000, and the federal government at this time was still making large contributions to unemployment relief.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out again that that was under a Liberal government.

Mr. Speaker, in contrast with the dark picture presented by the Liberal members of the present economic situation, I should like to make a brief review of what has been done by the present Conservative government since it has been in office.

In the field of agriculture, which is the most important basic industry of this country, legislation was introduced right at the first session in order to correct a situation which was detrimental to the agricultural class. The farm price support act, which farmers had been expecting for a long time, was adopted in order to stabilize the prices of farm products. In order that the act, designed to help farmers, might be applied efficiently, a revolving fund of $250 million was set up.

Mr. Speaker, you will no doubt be glad to learn that, as a result of the policy adopted by the government which I have the honour to support, on price support, farmers of my constituency have received more than $262,000.

The sugar beet industry has enjoyed a support price from which it gained an amount of $41,390.70; the subsidy of 25 cents per hundredweight of processed milk, in ten dairying establishments, has yielded to the farmers an amount of $221,523.04. Added to that are deficiency payments on hogs and eggs, which will be paid later in the year.

An amount of $345 million was voted to pay cash advances to western farmers for farm stored grain. Those surpluses had piled up almost entirely under the Liberal administration.

The Canadian Farm Loan Act has been greatly improved. Under the former act, the maximum loan was $15,000, as against the present amount of $20,000, and the percentage of the loan has been raised from 65 to 75 per cent of the assessed value of the farm.

In July 1959, the Conservative government enacted the crop insurance act. The Animal Contagious Diseases Act was also amended to give greater compensation to farmers whose animals are slaughtered under a tuberculosis and brucellosis control program. Mention should finally be made of the amendment to the Farm Improvement Loans Act. An amount of $300 million was voted for that purpose.

One has to be extremely biased to claim that the present Conservative government has done nothing for the farmers. It has done more in three years than our predecessors in the 15 years before their defeat.

Now let us look at the working class. Let me mention first that an act was passed granting paid vacations to all workers under federal jurisdiction. The unemployment insurance regulations were amended to remove any discrimination against married women. In 1957, an amount of $13 million was paid to 250,000 workers when the period of seasonal benefits paid under the unemployment insurance act was extended from 16 to 24 weeks. Then another extension was granted in 1958, which enabled approximately 200,000 workers to receive an additional amount of $14 million in benefits.

Again in the field of unemployment insurance, the benefit period was extended to 52 weeks, to help workers who are forced to remain idle because of the unavailability of jobs.

At this stage, Mr. Speaker, may I make a few remarks on economic conditions prevailing in Canada, and particularly in my constituency, just to brighten up our friends in the Liberal party, who see everything through dark glasses. I should like to draw to the attention of the house certain indications of Canada's economic recovery, and just to prove my point, I shall quote from articles which appeared in various newspapers.

For instance, in La Presse of Tuesday March 22, 1960, we find the following:

> Canadian companies will pay out this month in dividends an amount of $81,583,100, as compared to $77,878,900 in 1959 and $75,628,100 in 1958; the first quarter total reaches $195,794,000, that is 4 per cent more than in 1959 and 5 per cent more than in 1958, according to figures compiled by J. R. Timmins & Co.
> Industrial firms are accounting for $48,444,000, a little more than last year but a little less than two years ago.
> Due to the increase of the dividends of the International Nickel Company, the mines will distribute $21,979,200 this year, against $19,929,200 in 1959 and $17,119,100 in 1958.
> Public utilities and financial institutions will pay out a little more this year than in the two previous years.

And, Mr. Speaker, here is an article from the Gazette of April 8 1960:

(Text):

> Greater Activity is Shown in Manufacturing Industry.
> A further improvement in manufacturing and processing activity, following a significant increase in February, is reported for March by the Canadian association of purchasing agents.
> New orders were higher than in February, according to 37 per cent of the association's respondents.

(Translation):

And a little futher on it states:

(Text):

> Employment edged ahead in the latest month with 23 per cent reporting more employees, more than offsetting the 17 per cent reporting a decrease.

(Translation):

In Le Devoir of April 6, 1960, I find the following:

Bright outlook for Ford of Canada.

Though sales so far in 1960 have not been as good as expected, it will be a good year however, said Mr. Rhys M. Sale, president of Ford of Canada, at the annual meeting of the shareholders.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to deal with things which concern more particularly my district and, to do so, I will quote from Le Devoir of March 25, 1960:

Construction of a $15 million plant in Tracy.

Work will start this spring on the construction of a $15 million plant in Tracy, near Sorel, for the British Titan Products (Canada) Ltd.

The plant will have a capacity of 23,000 tons of titanic oxide a year and will require a regular working force of 250 people.

I read now from page 15 of Le Yamaska of March 9, 1960, the following title: "Southern Canada Power declares a 9.2 per cent increase for its gross revenue. The subhead reads:

More than one million kilowatt-hour sold. Sixty-four new industries established in this area in 1959.

You hear that, Mr. Speaker; 64 new industries. It is quite different from the gloomy picture that the members of the opposition are constantly describing.

In the speech he made last week, the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger) dealt with the textile industry and tried to make us believe that this industry started to decline in 1957 only, after the Conservative government assumed power.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to put on the record some information with regard to the textile industry. This is an excerpt from the publication Quebec Industriel of May 1957 On page 16, it says:

Employment in the primary textile industry has fallen from 98,000 in 1951 to 81,000 in 1956.

If my memory does not fail me, Mr. Speaker, I think that our hon. friends from the Liberal party were then in power. Therefore, the textile industry had begun to decline in their time. A little farther down, on the same page, we read:

Whereas in 1955 the total amount of profits for Canadian corporations were slightly higher than in 1950, those of the textile industry had fallen to about a third of what they were.

On page 18 we find:

And as the salary factor represents a significant proportion of production costs—costs being what they are in Canada—it is a stimulant to importation.

That was still under Liberal rule, Mr. Speaker.

That is why, from 1950 to 1954, approximately 70 companies had to close down, which resulted in the lay-off of 21,000 workers.

We did not hear the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger) say anything about that. No, it could not be, because orders or rather the watchword of the party requests its members to present an entirely gloomy picture of things under Conservative rule.

Yet, I take much pleasure in referring again to the publication I already mentioned, and in quoting the title on page 24:

A disastrous tariff policy.

That was again under the Liberal government of the time, and it says:

For the last 20 years (except for the depression period of the 30's) there has been a gradual decline in Canadian tariffs on textiles from abroad: in fact, those of 1954 were lower than those of 1928. The decline was even higher than that of any other country. Consequently, our imports have increased at a faster rate than our production. The part of the national market that domestic production has satisfied has decreased from 67 to 57 per cent from 1950 until this year—

That is to say 1957, under a Liberal regime,

—while it was 71 per cent in 1930.

Those, Mr. Speaker, are a few bits of information that my friend, the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska could probably have given the house.

I have never denied it. I even pointed it out myself. I said that the Gotham Hosiery, which lost its markets because it so stubbornly persisted in making full-fashioned hosiery that other firms took over the market, and when it was ready to switch to seamless hosiery—which women prefer—it was just too late, the market had been taken over by its competitors. However, instead of quoting from anonymous letters, my hon. friend could surely have mentioned that in my own town, four new industries have started. He made no mention of this, because again, it would have shown the situation in its true light, and this would have weakened the case of the Liberals.

I had jotted down a few notes on this subject, but I seem to have mislaid them. He said, for instance, that the Gotham Hosiery employed 400 persons, whereas the official report I have here, and which I have received from the St. Hyacinthe city hall, states that Gotham Hosiery employed only 225 workers.

More half-truths, similar to the ones we heard a few weeks ago from the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis), when he said that Penman's Limited was on the point of closing down because of competition from imported Japanese sweaters. On the following Saturday, I immediately got in touch with Mr. Covert, manager of Penman's Limited, who informed me first that the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville was not authorized to make such a statement, and furthermore, that it was utterly false. He added that such statements only served to spread panic, anxiety and fear among the employees. He also asked me to put the record straight by mentioning in the house that sweaters only make up a very small part of the production of Penman's plant in St. Hyacinthe.

Those are all half-truths, used in attempts to minimize the achievements of this government, and to promote to some extent the ever doubtful chances of the Liberal party.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is what you are hoping.

Mr. Ricard: That is what we know, and that is what is extremely painful to all Liberals, starting with my good friend, the hon. member for Essex East.

Mr. Speaker, I see that my time is running short, but I would like to go over a few notes I have jotted down, to tell the house that in the years when the Liberals were in power, employment and workers' salaries were not at the level they are today. You know there are more people at work today than ever before. As far as salaries are concerned, the average salary has increased substantially since the Conservative government has been in office. It is as follows, for the years 1955 and 1959, under a Conservative regime:

Textile industries	51.92	60.65
Housing industries	62.11	77.18
Industries in general	61.05	73.57

Our hon. friends the Liberals have said repeatedly that workers had never paid so much taxes than they are paying now, under a Conservative regime.

If you want facts, Mr. Speaker, I will examine those figures, while comparing our record with that of the Liberal members.

I have used the table of deductions No. 8, for 1952 and tables No. 12 and 12a for 1959. Now, according to those tables, the weekly deductions levied at the source for a salary of $60 a week, were as follows—the year 1952 was under a Liberal regime, while the year 1959 was under a Conservative regime:

	1952	1959
Single without dependents.	$8.15	$6.05	$2.10
Married without children .	4.05	2.75	1.30
Married with 2 children eligible for family allowances	2.90	1.40	1.50
Married with 4 children eligible for family allowances	1.80	.05	1.75
Married with 6 children eligible for family allowances	0.70	—
Married with 8 children eligible for family allowances	0.15	—

There you have, Mr. Speaker, the record I would ask Canadian workers to judge, and say which of the two, that is the Conservatives or the Liberals, have taxed them more.

(Text):

Before closing, I should like to read an article which appeared in the Montreal Gazette of July 2, 1958. It gives a good account of the contribution of French Canada toward the maintenance of true Canadianism.

(Translation):

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This is from bishop Carrington?

Mr. Ricard: Yes. I quote:

(Text):

"After 23 years as bishop and archbishop of Quebec, I can devoutly thank God for the courtesy, kindness and understanding which have been accorded to us by the bishops and clergy of the Roman Catholic Church, and the general goodwill of the provincial authorities."

These words were heard on Sunday in St. Paul's Cathedral in London. Most Reverend Philip Carrington, the Anglican Archbishop of Quebec, now in London to attend the Lambeth conference, was the invited preacher.

He was speaking as one having authority, for, as he said, he was speaking out of 23 years of experience. He described the Anglican population of his diocese as "very minute" and as living in a province with several million French Canadians. But the achievement of co-existence is not merely a legalistic accommodation, but the development of a spirit of wise adjustment.

And a great achievement it has been. "I wonder," said the Archbishop, "whether there is anywhere else on the face of the earth where two races have lived together so successfully in mutual respect and affection."

(Translation):

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is the statement of a good man.

(Text):

Mr. Ricard: Any reasonable person not blinded by political partisanship, deceit and racial prejudice will admit that such an accomplishment could not have taken place under a dictatorship, as was suggested by certain members of the opposition. May I make a special appeal to the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) to forsake his narrow-mindedness and ponder these words and the words which I have just quoted. I am glad to let the hon. member know that French Canadians have witnessed many such attacks and survived them easily.

(Translation):

Mr. Racine: Before the hon. member resumes his seat, perhaps he would answer a question?

Mr. Ricard: Certainly.

Mr. Racine: He has quoted from the Le Courrier de Saint-Hyacinthe, in which opposition members are referred to as hypocrites. Could he give us the name of the writer of that article?

Mr. Ricard: My hon. friend can look up the newspaper, and he will find out.

Mr. Racine: What newspaper?

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, it is customary to try to say something nice about the minister during the budget debate. This was practically impossible this year when we look at this budget. When we look at all the problems facing the country and we see that they have been completely ignored it is very difficult for one to have any kind words for the minister.

However, there is one thing on which the minister should be complimented. He has continued the practice he started of giving his budget speech in the two official languages of this country. This is all to the good.

We face a great danger of being completely overwhelmed by our giant friendly neighbour from the south. The fact that we are so friendly increases the danger of losing our Canadian identity altogether.

In my opinion, the greatest bulkwark against this is the fact that we are a bilingual and bi-cultural country. Canadian citizenship requires that we speak either one or the other language. Our objective should always be to speak both.

It matters not if we are French who cannot speak English or English who cannot speak French, whichever we are, we are that much short of being the Canadian we should be because then indeed we would be truly distinctive from the United States.

The minister is setting this good example and he must really have been working on his French because it shows marked improvement. But maybe he has been working too hard on it because as his French gets better so his budgets get worse. Might I suggest he work as hard on his budgets in the future as he appears to have on his French in the past and maybe he can bring about a similar improvement in them. Might I say that his French is adequate now to give a much better budget than he has given so far to this house.

(Text):

Mr. Pigeon: I should like to put a question to the hon. member. What does he think about the declaration made by his colleague, the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher)?

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I think it was distorted to a greater extent than anything I have seen in the newspapers across this country for a long time. It is unfortunate that the extremists in both our languages should take a football like this and kick it around to the detriment of Canadian unity.

On the subject of the budget, I see that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) is up to some of his old tricks again; he likes to have things both ways. If we look at pages 2669 and 2670 of Hansard we find that, first of all, he had this to say:

> In spite of a period of credit strains and in spite of some unfortunately prolonged industrial stoppages both at home and abroad, Canada has had a good year.

Then on the next page, he says:

> Average per capita wages and salaries of workers in trade and industry reached a new record of $3,773, an increase of 4 per cent over 1958 and of 10 per cent over 1956.

The minister goes on to say that the increase nationally amounted to a satisfactory figure of 3 per cent real income. Here is the old story of a man trying to have it both ways. In one sentence he regrets that there have been industrial stoppages, though this is the only method by means of which many employees can get a raise in pay. But he goes on with the next breath, to take credit on behalf of his government that they did get a raise. Similarly, if we look at page 2671, we find this paragraph.

> Any inflow of capital raises questions as to ownership and control of Canadian industry and resources, and also the question of the servicing of debt. As to ownership and control, this government's position is clear. We welcome capital into Canada if, when here, it is willing to act as if it were Canadian and not as if it were foreign. During the past two years there has been increasing evidence, in many quarters, that foreign capital in this country is becoming increasingly conscious of its Canadian responsibilities. This is a subject that has been vigorously brought to the attention of foreign investors by the Prime Minister and others. It would be better if the desired result were achieved by such persuasion than by legislation.

I have read that over five or six times and have not the foggiest notion what it means. Stripped of its double-talk it amounts to nothing more than mealy-mouthed balderdash.

How times have changed since the halcyon days of 1957. In those days even some hon. members of the opposition had something kind to say for the Minister of Finance when he brought in his baby budget. In 1958 and 1959 many Canadians and many newspapers still remained loyal to the government but in 1960 almost without exception the newspapers have deserted the minister and the government. Read through the newspapers from coast to coast and you will find scarcely a kind word for this government. Some newspapers made a big issue of the fact that the minister was interrupted 44 times by loyal members pounding their desks as a sign of approval but I suggest this shows not so much enthusiasm on their part as good training.

We have seen one after another of the Tory backbenchers rise and praise the government and the minister but it has been apparent too that more and more frontbenchers have joined with the opposition in criticism of the government. We have to look no further than the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) and the perpetual thorn in the side of the government, the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Van Horne) for proof of this. While the latter hon. gentleman is not considered a frontbencher he sits in the front row, even if next to the door.

The minister and the government must have nostalgic memories of those days when they found kind words about them in the newspapers. It is interesting to examine why the newspapers have turned against the minister and the government. I suggest that the first reason is because of unemployment for which the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) has tried to find an answer. I recall the ringing words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) when he said on television, "we have met the problem of unemployment." The right hon. gentleman did not say where he had been that week but he could have met unemployment anywhere. He could have met it in the maritimes, on the west coast or on the streets of Ottawa. I do not know of any place in Canada where he would not meet the problem of unemployment. What we wonder about is when he and his government are going to do something about it.

The second reason is because of the attitude of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes) and the defence policy of this government. In today's Globe and Mail there is an article that clearly indicates why newspapers and many Canadians are taking a second look at this government. I wish to quote a few extracts from the article entitled "Misgivings on Defence":

> Evidence of deep unrest among Canadians over this country's defence policy grows stronger day by day.

Reference is then made to the comments of the hon. member for Greenwood to which I have already referred, and to statements made by the president of the University of Toronto. The article continues:

> In the fiscal year that has just begun, Canada is spending $1,593 million on defence. What are we getting for it in national safety? How much of it is going to buy and maintain obsolete weapons, to pursue outdated defence concepts? Could not the same degree of national security be obtained by spending, say, half the money? These are essentially the questions Canadians are asking.
> They see the obstinate way in which the government sticks to the highly dubious Bomarc missile which represents, for Canada, a total investment of about $125 million.

The article goes on in the main to criticize the Liberals but that is not my job here today. In fact the only kind word the article had to say was about the C.C.F., and I quote:

> Mr. H. W. Herridge, C.C.F. member for Kootenay West, told the commons Thursday that elimination of wasteful defence spending could yield a saving of $300 million a year to start with. There is nothing wild in this estimate.

It is not too often that we find suggestions of the C.C.F. being commended to the Canadian people by this newspaper. The article continues:

> Parliament cannot go home until Canadians are provided with answers to the many and legitimate questions they are asking about defence policy.

I will not go into that subject at length, but with respect to the Bomarc I will say this. I am told that as you come out of North Bay proceeding north on highway No. 11 you pass over a hill called Thibeault hill. As a result of the Bomarc project I am informed that a tunnel now cuts through Thibeault hill and comes out right beside the insane asylum at North Bay. I would say this is a fitting monument to the Bomarc.

The third reason relates to the proposed bill of rights. We watched the Prime Minister and the government take a firm stand a couple of years ago supported by the whole house with respect to the situation in Hungary. We thought this action was in line with this great fighter for the bill of rights. A chink appeared in the armour of the hon. gentleman when he failed to take the opportunity of doing away with the repressive labour legislation in the province of Newfoundland. Today all Canadians and most newspapers are wondering why the Prime Minister has been so reluctant to take a stand on the South African situation. Britain and the other commonwealth countries have raised their voices in protest. No doubt the Prime Minister's reluctance to take a stand is interpreted by the black people in South Africa as an indication that the Prime Minister is on the side of the government there.

The fourth reason is because of the treatment accorded war veterans and pensioners. I do not know how many hon. members have received letters from legionnaires in their riding but I have received quite a few in the last several days and they are appropriate to the subject I am now discussing. I wish to place one letter on the record:

I am writing you because I believe the time has come when we must realize that changes in the Pension Act and the War Veterans' Allowance Act are long overdue.

As you know the Legion have made representation to the Prime Minister and cabinet, and have appeared before the parliamentary standing committee on veterans affairs explaining why, in our opinion, our requests are justified. Indications now are that it is not intended by the government that there will be any amendments to the Pension Act at this session of parliament.

I believe our requests are just and that the government should take action to grant the points raised in the legion briefs.

I believe that the increases they have asked for are reasonable, and it is a fact that the disability pensioner today is not in as favourable a position as in 1920 or in 1946 when compared to wages paid to various classes of Canadian employees.

I would appreciate your doing everything in your power to assist the veterans in obtaining improved legislation this session.

This is all the more serious, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Aiken: Will the hon. member indicate the source of these letters?

Mr. Martin (Timmins): This is a form letter from the Canadian Legion British Empire Service League, Timmins branch No. 88, Timmins, Ontario. It is signed by Harold W. Richardson, member, branch 88, B.E.S.L., Timmins, Ontario. This is only one of many I have received. I think it is all the more serious when we realize that last year many of the veterans who were down here making representation to this government went home with the feeling that they had a definite promise from the minister that they would be given some consideration this year.

Then we find another reason why this government is losing its popularity. We have only to turn to the farmers of this country. The other day I picked up a copy of the Western Producer, dated April 7, which contained the headline:

The Next Move Up to Farmers
Alvin Hamilton Says

This is very interesting to the farmers because it is about the sixth or seventh move that has been up to them. I imagine they are wondering what kind of game of checkers it is they are playing. Their first move was representation to this house. That did not work. Therefore they tried another move. They elected 47 or 48 western Conservative members but they had no luck that time, either. They received no help so in their third move they sent a delegation 1,100 strong to make representations to the members. Still nothing happened. The fourth move was more representations. Now it says here that the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Hamilton) says that the next move is up to the farmers. I suggest there is only about one move left to the farmers and that is the proper move when the next election comes along.

Then I go on to the next reason for the lack of popularity of this government. All we have to do is to turn to housing and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker). I was home over the week end and I attended a meeting of the northeastern Ontario development association. A pretty grim picture, a pretty grim outlook was painted by the construction people in that association. People who originally planned to go ahead with about 100 or more houses this year told me that under the present legislation, the present picture drawn up by the minister, they are going to cut back their program and not build a single house they intended to build.

I would suggest that the Minister of Finance apparently decided this year to balance his budget at all cost. He can balance it only by postponing the payment of debts. He is also balancing it at the expense of the war veterans, the old age pensioners, the farmers, the unemployed and the civil servants. I do not think this is a laudable way for the Minister of Finance to balance his budget.

I should like to go on and make reference to another minister who I believe should receive some attention at this time. I refer to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mrs. Fairclough). Not too long ago I received a letter from British Columbia which contained a copy of the Birmingham Mail, a newspaper published in Birmingham, England. It was dated January 27. Unfortunately, I have not the copy with me; I believe I have mislaid it. I will have to quote from memory what was in the advertisement in that paper. As I said, the paper was dated January 27, 1960. The headline of the advertisement read, "Canada Needs Immigrants." With 700,000 unemployed in this country, we need immigrants. The advertisement went on to expound on the opportunities in Canada and the assistance available. They could get interest free loans to come here; they could get assistance after they get out here. For what purpose? To join the unemployed? I should like to read from just part of the letter which accompanied the copy of this newspaper. This letter was written by an immigrant who has been in this country about two years. He came from the British Isles. He says:

> What really bothers me is the fact that there are four pages of jobs vacant in this same paper, and as you will see there are literally over a thousand different advertisements offering several thousand jobs in all occupations, both skilled, unskilled, white collar and professional. In Canada we have widespread unemployment with over 700,000 men looking for jobs. Also here we have exorbitant rents, with a high cost of medical care and dental care (which hits us British immigrants hardest of all).

Mr. McCleave: On a point of order, surely the hon. member cannot read a letter into Hansard without giving us the name of the author. I think this is covered specifically by the rules.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I am quite sure the gentleman would have no objection to my giving his name. It is signed by John O'Sullivan, and his address is 4728 Bond street, South Burnaby, British Columbia. I wonder whether the minister ever stops to ask whether this is fair to the immigrants who come over here? Certainly, neither myself nor my party has any objection to immigrants, provided they are given a fair break and the Canadian citizen is given a fair break in regard to immigration policy.

I wonder whether it is fair to bring immigrants over here and turn them loose in a labour surplus market? They are cursed and reviled through no fault of their own. Instead of receiving a welcome as neighbours they will be considered by the unemployed people, and even by the employed people who are afraid of losing their jobs in this surplus market, as a menace to their jobs and to their security. We had an example not long ago in Timmins. With all the unemployed miners returning from Elliot Lake a newcomer from the British Isles started at one of the mines with no mining experience whatsoever. In fact, the information on his card said that his previous occupation had been that of an instructor in a trade school. He was going to work underground in the mines when literally thousands of unemployed hard-rock miners were coming back from the mining fields of Elliot Lake, Bancroft and Uranium City; men who had been working in the uranium industry.

What the immigration policy of the minister is doing is just compounding the difficult position of the Minister af Labour in his endeavours to try to solve the unemployment problem. What kind of immigration policy is this? Is it any wonder that the newspapers are going after this government every day?

Another thing they do not tell these immigrants when they go over there to lure them away from gainful occupations—because they have full employment in Britain; they have not the backlog of unemployment that we have here—is that Canada has not adequate health services as they have in England. They do not tell them that we do not have the educational opportunities that they have in England, and they do not tell them they are coming to a country where there are 700,000 people unemployed, 10 to 20 per cent of the population, depending upon which area you are in.

I should like to deal with one more aspect of this matter and point out why I consider this budget is not an adequate one. There are five giant evils in our modern industrial society, and this budget not only does not try to grapple with them, it does not even recognize them at all.

The first of these evils is ignorance or inadequate educational facilities. This is not news to the government. It has not only been brought to their attention by members of the opposition but has also been brought to their attention by members of their own party on more than one occasion. Do we see any recognition of the problem or provision for it in the budget?

The second one is idleness or inadequate opportunities for gainful employment. If this has been a secret to the present government it should not be any more because they have heard sufficient about unemployment in this session of parliament. The figures that the Minister of Labour presents to the house show that it is not a seasonal problem but a recurring, chronic cancer in our society, one with which no government, past or present, has ever seemed to be able to cope.

The third evil is squalor or poor living conditions. No matter to what city we go from coast to coast we find this condition. Every city has its slums. What provision is there in the budget even to recognize that such a problem exists? The only action on the part of the government is to cut back last year's house construction by 50 per cent.

The fourth evil is disease, or inadequate provision for health and medical care. We did break our hearts a couple of years ago and brought in a sort of helter-skelter hospital plan that varies from province to province, but apparently there is no thought of taking any steps toward getting a health insurance plan throughout the country to look after the health of our citizens. We do not make this known to British immigrants when they come here. In a British newspaper, the Daily

Mail, of Tuesday, March 1, 1960, there is an advertisement containing these words:

> One of Canada's most rapid and far-reaching social changes is hospital insurance, which is now sweeping the country from coast to coast.

I am sure that would sound very amusing to the British people if they knew the facts inasmuch as they have had complete hospital, health and dental care for the last 15 years.

Mr. Aiken: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Certainly.

Mr. Aiken: Were the advertisement to which he is now referring and the previous one published under the authority of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mrs. Fairclough)?

Mr. Martin (Timmins): The name of the author of the article is not given but there is a short note in the middle of it in these words:

> This article has been contributed by the Canadian government immigration service.

Finally, I come to the last of the five giants—want, or inadequate income for a minimum standard of living. This condition is not confined to any one class of our citizens; quite a number fall into this category. There are people working today for 40 or 50 cents an hour and being exploited by unscrupulous employers. There are the people receiving old age pensions who have waited for so long for the further increase promised by the government back in 1957. They are still waiting. The same is true of people receiving other forms of pensions. I just read a letter having to do with people receiving war veterans allowances. All these people fall into the category of those who have inadequate income to meet a minimum standard of living.

There, Mr. Speaker, are the five giants in our society with which our government should be coping. Yet the budget makes no provision whatsoever even to recognize them, let alone to grapple with them and try to improve the situation. As found on page 2669 of Hansard of March 31, the minister used these words:

> We can look forward optimistically to another year of solid expansion and balanced growth.

I wonder what the people I have mentioned think of the minister's words that this is a year of solid achievement and balanced growth. I suggest that the budget is not the trumpet call of achievement that the minister and the government supporters would like to make us believe it is but that stripped of its double-talk is nothing more than an abysmal and abject confession of failure. I also suggest that the newspapers will become even more critical and continue to be until a disillusioned people have a chance to vote and correct the mistake of 1958.

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased indeed to have the opportunity of taking part in this debate because there are a number of subjects I should like to bring to the attention of the house. First of all, let me say how gratifying it was to listen to the very eloquent address a week ago last Thursday night by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming). I am sure we were all very pleased with what we heard. I am fully aware that it is an accepted fact that budget speeches generally will invariably invoke loud criticism from the opposition benches, but in my opinion this budget address was clearly indicative of a high sense of realism and responsibility. I do wish to point out that I am not entirely satisfied with certain aspects of government expenditures and I do have a few strong complaints regarding the policy of some crown corporations. It is my intention to voice my complaints as often as I possibly can until these problems cease to exist.

I am particularly pleased, however, that Canada has experienced such a good year and that there is such a buoyant outlook for 1960-61. The prospect of a budget surplus and the decision not to raise taxes will be welcome news to all, I am sure. The wage increases amounting to $15 million for approximately 50,000 civil servants and the forecast surplus of $40 million in the old age pension fund, the first surplus incidentally in its nine-year history, are further evidence of the capabilities of the Minister of Finance.

I mentioned before that there is bound to be a certain amount of criticism, but in my opinion it is often far more amusing than disconcerting to analyse some of the remarks of those who seek to spread gloom and despair. For instance, I am certain that we were all very interested to hear the minister forecast an increase of 6 per cent in the gross national product and to learn from figures made public last week that we experienced a 6 per cent rise last year.

This seems to be in direct contrast to the moaning and wailing we have been listening to from the opposition benches for the past year and a half. I cannot quite figure out just who they are trying to scare, but it is quite apparent to me that they have not made much impression at all on anyone who is remotely associated with contributing in any way to the gross national product. If all their rantings and ravings were in any way consistent with the general state of the economy in Canada, the gross national product would be a red ink issue. If these prophecies of doom and despair were offered in a spirit of warning of some well-founded, imminent danger, there might be some justification for them. However, I am certain it must be quite evident to the people of Canada that this line of talk is nothing but a fervent hope.

I think Mr. Charles Templeton cleared this up conclusively on a television program last night when he probably expressed the views of the Liberal party in mentioning that he hoped Canada was about to experience a drastic economic recession as it might be of some assistance in the resurgence of the Liberal party.

Following further along this line of criticism, and showing just how ridiculous it can become at times, I should like to read a portion of a news article which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of Friday, April 1, in which the writer is referring to the fact that the Minister of Finance proposed no change in the rates of personal income tax. The writer says, and I quote:

> All the same, the average Canadian will pay more taxes because, if the government forecasts are correct, his income will be higher.

I must say that the writer's deductions are logical. I wonder how much you are going to scare people by telling them they are going to get a rise in pay?

I believe the government has accomplished a number of outstanding feats since taking office in 1957. Many of the people I am honoured to represent derive their livelihood from agriculture. I must say that these people have been and still are confronted with a number of problems. The farmers of the Swan river area in Manitoba are a hard working, economical group of people with whom I have had many opportunities of discussing their business problems. I have many valid reasons for believing that further agricultural legislation is needed. However, I also have good reason for believing that with the advent of the further farm legislation which is planned by this government our over-all agricultural program will be of great benefit to the people engaged in farming.

In so far as our foreign trade is concerned, I feel that this picture has improved steadily since this government took office. I believe there are a number of cases where our trade balance has diminished slightly, but there are many signs which lead me to believe this is a good thing in many respects. The farmers in western Canada are genuinely concerned about our trade with Japan. It is only natural that they are anxious to have a healthy volume of imports coming in from that country so that Japan will be able to continue to purchase our wheat. This government not only hopes Japan will be able to continue purchasing our wheat, but that sales can be increased as time goes on.

It is gratifying to see the improvement in our trade with Japan over past years. In 1954 Canada exported to Japan goods valued in the neighbourhood of $96 million and our imports from Japan in 1954 were in the neighbourhood of $19 million. In 1959—this is an estimated figure—exports to Japan will amount to $140 million, while Japan's exports to Canada have climbed to an estimated figure of $105 million. I think that is very gratifying. As I mentioned before, so long as Japan can continue selling to Canada I am sure our wheat trade with Japan will not only hold up but may even increase.

In so far as financial contributions to the provinces are concerned, I think it is sufficient to refer to page 2676 of Hansard for March 31 of this year. There we find that the total contributions to the provinces from the federal government have increased as follows: In 1956-57 contributions from the federal government to the provinces were $689.4 million; in 1957-58 they increased to $837.2 million; in 1958-59 they rose to $1,037.6 million; in 1959-60 they rose to $1,252.5 million; and, in 1960-61 the estimated contributions to the provinces will be $1,300 million. This is almost double the amount in 1956-57. I think these tables alone are sufficient to show that this government is very much concerned about the welfare of the provinces.

In so far as opposition criticism is concerned, I should like to read into the record the words of an editorial which appeared in the Winnipeg Tribune of April 8 of this year. It is captioned "Liberal Criticism", and reads:

> During the past few weeks Liberal supporters inside and outside the commons have subjected the financial program of the Diefenbaker government to increasingly bitter criticism. Among other things, the Conservative administration is being charged with reckless deficit financing during the past two years and with excessive borrowing that brought the country near financial chaos.
> Just to keep matters in balance, the Liberal financial proposals for the period should be taken out and reviewed.
> At the moment the Liberals have no known financial program as an alternative to that brought forward by Finance Minister Fleming in his budget speech. The opposition is content to criticize without offering a different course of action.
> But the policies the Liberals proposed in 1958-59 are a matter of record. It will be recalled that when Prime Minister Diefenbaker was elected to office in 1957 with a minority government he cut taxes by $178 million. After a short special session an election was held. During the election campaign Liberal Leader Lester Pearson outlined his fiscal proposals.
> He promised that taxes would be cut by $400 million. Income tax was to be reduced by $275 million, with a special deal for newly-weds; the excise tax on cars was to be abolished with a tax saving of $60 million; corporation taxes on small businesses were to be reduced by $25 million and so on.

And this was to be done while increasing social security measures—sickness insurance, old age pensions for unmarried women at 60, family allowances to children up to 18 years of age. No suggestion was made for cutting expenditures through reduced services or by effecting economies.

There is no reason to believe that Mr. Pearson was not being completely sincere in his promises. If he had been elected to office it must be assumed that the tax cuts would have been made.

Thus it is fair to say that in 1958-59 there would have been a deficit of at least $400 million more than that reported by the Conservative government for the year. Instead of the Conservative deficit of $600 million, a government headed by Mr. Pearson would have had a deficit of more than $1 billion in 1958. Moreover, unless Mr. Pearson increased taxes drastically in 1959, he would have had a further deficit of more than $800 million for the 1959-60 fiscal year.

The Liberals would have made Mr. Fleming look like a piker in the deficit department. Naturally this would have involved much greater borrowing by a Liberal regime. Canada would have experienced tight money and inflation much more severe than anything seen during the past year.

This should be borne in mind when assessing the present bitter Liberal criticism of the Conservative financial record for the past two years.

I should now like to deal with one or two problems which are of extreme importance to the area I have the honour to represent. The first problem is one that I have raised in this house on various occasions and it is an important one. I refer to the failure to date of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to supply television services to the northern areas of Manitoba. For almost three years we have been endeavouring to get from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation some assurance that this project will be undertaken. As I have mentioned previously, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is set up under a statute as a national system. Their purpose is to provide a national system of television and radio broadcasting for Canada.

At the present time the constituency of Churchill, which is comprised of roughly 180,000 square miles, has no television services whatsoever. In the Dauphin-Swan river area a satellite station is planned as an extension to the Yorkton station and it will give certain coverage to the people of that area. Many people feel that this satellite station is not going to give adequate coverage, but that matter remains to be seen. However, the people in the area of The Pas and Flin Flon are anxious to receive consideration of their problem at the earliest possible moment. In their words—and they are quite right—they pay the same taxes as does anybody else anywhere in Canada.

I have been told on many occasions that it will involve a large expenditure to get this system into northern Manitoba and that the people in other parts of Canada should not be obliged to pay the cost of providing us with television. At the present time the people of these areas are paying, as they have been doing for many years, their share of the cost of the television services enjoyed by the people in other parts of Canada. Many people who have had television for a good number of years seem to think that this is not an important subject. However, when it comes to Grey cup time, world series time or National hockey league time, I notice that they are all quite concerned as to what is going to be done about those particular broadcasts. I am quite sure they would rise up in arms if the C.B.C. decided it was not going to carry these programs and, as I said before on another occasion, would say, "We want those programs regardless of what they cost". We must never lose sight of the fact that the people in the northern and outlying parts of the country that are not serviced are going to be paying their share of the cost of those programs.

I know there are in Canada many areas desiring this service. One of my criticisms of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is the fact that there is coming from them no indication as to when these areas will be served. They tell us—as I suppose they tell everybody who approaches them—that if the government will give them enough money they will service all these areas. However, in any of their budgets I have yet to see enough money asked for specifically to service these areas and that is why I criticize them. I criticize them for not asking for this money and specifically saying that it will be used for servicing these areas or, failing that, for not at least coming up with some kind of a capital expenditure program over a period of years so that these areas would have some idea as to when they were going to get this service. I might say that all town councils, chambers of commerce, service clubs and groups of various kinds in the area which I represent are interested in this subject and have all made representations to the C.B.C. with regard to it.

I should like to say that this specific subject of television can be related to a number of other problems. We can even relate it to the problem of unemployment. In northern Manitoba I have noticed—and it is a strange thing—what happens on many occasions when construction programs are under way in that area. The people seeking workers send out a call for so many workers. They might send out a call for 150 men. Two days later four or five men will arrive. Many of the men that have been interviewed in the other parts of Canada will not go north because television and other amenities of life are not provided for them. The people in the north do without many things. I think they should be given further consideration with regard to this one important subject.

I note that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) has made many representations on behalf of the people in northern Manitoba. I find that fact rather amusing. If my findings are correct, he was obliged to leave Manitoba and go down to Newfoundland in order to get elected. I do not think the people of Manitoba are too greatly concerned about his worrying over their problems.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): He could have a seat anywhere.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Simpson: The people who are without these services are doing a very good job in bringing the matter to the attention of the C.B.C. I think possibly the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate might be better advised to go back to his constituency and study his own problems. I do not know what kind of mileage he figures he is making out of this attempt; but if he wants to make some mileage, perhaps he could follow my footsteps to some of these departments day after day, and then he would really make mileage.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Simpson: At six o'clock I was discussing the problem raised by the complete absence of television services in northern Manitoba, and the desire of the people of that area to secure such services. I should like to say that the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Forbes) and the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski) have worked closely with me on this problem for a long time.

In bringing this point once again to the attention of the house or to any who may feel that these services are not of great importance, may I say that it is my feeling that the people who live in the more densely populated areas of Canada probably do not realize how few of the amenities of life the people of the north country have at their disposal. As I said earlier, these people are pioneering these areas, and at the same time, paying their full share of the taxes which are necessary to keep these amenities in being for the benefit, largely, at the present time, of the people who live in the more populated centres. People who live in or near the big towns have a lot of these benefits handed to them. There is the trans-Canada highway, for example, which is financed by the federal government jointly with the provinces. People who live in the thickly populated areas take a service such as this for granted and feel they are entitled to it. That is just one example.

People who have enjoyed television since its inception by the C.B.C. have possibly come to the conclusion that radio is not as important as it was some years back. Speaking of radio, I maintain that over the years since the C.B.C. began its radio broadcast we in northern Manitoba have continuously made representations in favour of an improved service. Under the old dominion network system which was serviced by land lines many people felt there was a better calibre of program carried at that time, and we were serviced by the trans-Canada network. There is a transmitter at Watrous, Saskatchewan which feeds radio stations in outlying areas, but reception is often poor, and as a result we were never in receipt of a program of good quality. At the present time, we have a station at Flin Flon. I understand that because of the fact that a Winnipeg station has increased its power to 5,000 kilowatts there is a great deal of interference with our local radio station at Flin Flon. There is still no land line service of the C.B.C. radio network north of Brandon, Manitoba. I think this constitutes another reason why despite the fact that there are many areas in Canada which cannot receive television programs, Manitoba should have some priority when plans are made to extend the television service.

It may take some time to reach the stage where these areas can be served, but it might be a good idea for the government to study the possibility of introducing a program designed to bring some of these amenities of life to the outlying areas—a program much on the same lines as the present roads to resources scheme, that is, through federal and provincial co-operation financially. At the present time I know of no provincial government which is contributing toward the cost of providing television services. However, I think if the federal government could introduce a scheme of this nature some of the provinces might be interested in assisting.

It should not be forgotten that these areas which do not enjoy the facilities which I have mentioned are precisely those which are faced with a higher cost of living, while the people who live there are paying the same taxes as everyone else. All these things should be taken into consideration. As to the higher cost of living, the government recognizes this as being a factor, because it pays a northern allowance to its own employees who work in the north. Thus, all things considered, I believe these areas should be served as quickly as possible.

Now I should like to touch on one or two other subjects of interest which I have come across lately. I should like to mention at this point that I recognize the servicing of D.E.W. line operations—the delivery of foodstuffs and other necessary supplies—to be, possibly, an obligation of the United States government. However, I should like to draw one thing to the attention of this house because I believe it would be possible for the government to pass this on to the government of the United States as a matter of liaison. I understand that the eastern D.E.W. line sites are currently serviced with foodstuffs from Montreal, and that the western sites are serviced from Edmonton. This may have been found the best way of carrying out this operation. However, it is interesting to look at some figures with which I have been provided. These are figures of transportation costs under the present system of serving eastern D.E.W. line bases from Montreal, and hon. members will find that the cost of sending one plane load of food consisting of 15,000 pounds from Montreal via Churchill to Foxe, which is a D.E.W. line base is $8,566.80.

I maintain that these supplies could be sent by rail from Montreal to Churchill and then flown into the bases. In that case, the same load would cost $4,299.10. I am raising this question because I believe that these supplies could very easily be purchased in Manitoba, sent by rail to Churchill and then flown in by existing carriers. That plane load could be sent into Foxe at a cost of $3,934.60, which is a saving per plane load of $4,632.40. I cannot imagine the United States government not being interested in a saving of this order and I suggest that the proper authority should bring this matter to the attention of the United States government which could then decide whether the supplies could not either be purchased in Manitoba and sent by rail to Churchill and then flown in or, if they could be purchased more cheaply in Montreal, sent by rail to Churchill and flown in from there.

There is one other point I should like to bring to the attention of the house and that is the importation of diesel oil and fuel oil to Churchill from foreign markets. I am raising this subject for two specific reasons. First of all, I think with respect to the general economy of Canada it would be very beneficial if Canadian products could be used at Churchill. There is a vast amount of fuel oil used there by various government departments including the Department of National Defence. Not only am I concerned about having Canadian products used in that area but I am interested in exploring the possibility of achieving a reduction in the cost of this fuel to consumers in the town of Churchill.

I understand that a number of years ago the Imperial Oil Company was given the operation of the marine tank farm at Churchill and as a result of that, I am told, quite substantial savings were effected by the Department of National Defence in their purchases of fuel and diesel oil. However, previous to this western Canada products were used at these establishments. I think it would be well to investigate this situation to see if there is as large a saving effected as we think.

I understand that in September of last year there were 4,072,540 gallons of diesel oil shipped to Churchill at a price of $355,554. The cost loaded on ship at Aruba, Netherland Antilles, expressed in Canadian dollars in relation to Canadian gallons was 8.73 cents per gallon. In October, 1959, 3,489,411 gallons were shipped to Churchill at a cost of $306,589. The price, loaded on ship at Aruba, was 8.786 cents per gallon.

I understand that the Department of National Defence is receiving this oil at a very reasonable price. The oil is landed on board at the price I mentioned but I understand that when you add on the transportation costs it brings it up to about 12 cents a gallon landed at Churchill. At the present time individual consumers at Churchill are paying approximately 26 cents a gallon. There is a rather large spread there, and I think additional savings to the consumer could be made.

I am informed that the price to the consumer went down to some degree when this method was adopted but in following this course a foreign product rather than a Canadian was introduced. I believe we also have to take several factors into account when assessing the value of this saving. Previously a crown corporation, Canadian National Railways, was in the business of hauling this western oil to Churchill. We therefore have a loss of revenue to one crown corporation and possibly a saving in one government department. We must also take into consideration the men who would be employed on the railway and the maintenance and supplying of tank cars. All in all we might learn that we have lost a market for western products to a foreign fuel and that there is not too large a saving at all.

Before concluding I wish to briefly touch on one or two other subjects. I shall deal first with Canadian National Railways freight rates. Despite the fact that the president of the C.N.R. has suggested that members of parliament should keep their noses out of the C.N.R.'s business, I think there are one or two things that should be brought to the attention of the house.

I have mentioned before that in many of the northern areas some of the services that are taken for granted in the larger centres are not available, or at least not prevalent. In many places there is a great interest in receiving the free pickup and delivery of express and L.C.L. freight. When the railways have been approached on this question they have said that the cost is too prohibitive. My experience has been, however, that as soon as roads are built into an outlying area and truck competition enters the picture these services are hastily provided. I believe this is something that should be investigated. The outlying areas should be given the same services by crown corporations as are provided to people in the larger centres.

As my concluding point let me mention that it has been gratifying to me to see that some of the problems of the people at Churchill have been investigated and action is being taken. I should explain that the people at Churchill are there as a result of government establishments. They do not live in a municipality but in unorganized territory. If it were not for certain government establishments there would probably be no people at Churchill. For many years the people there have been urging the federal and provincial governments to provide a sewer and water system, additional power and other necessary services. It is a source of satisfaction to know that at the present time the Manitoba power commission in conjunction with the Department of National Defence is setting up an adequate power system for the people of that area and that the required additional power should be available this summer.

When I first came to Ottawa I learned that nothing had been done for years. In fact, I was informed that such things as an additional water supply were considered unnecessary and out of the question in relation to Churchill. I am pleased to know that the Department of National Defence is presently investigating the possibility of a new water supply for Churchill and it is hoped that it will be constructed during the course of this year.

I am glad to see that these things are being done in my constituency and it is my hope that the other problems that exist there will be solved just as quickly as possible.

[Mr. Simpson.]

Mr. O. J. Godin (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I am indeed very happy to be able to join with other hon. members in participating in this lengthy budget debate. On behalf of the constituents of Nickel Belt I should like to express certain views which I have had occasion to discuss with the citizens of my riding.

To assist hon. members in following the course of my remarks I should like to remind the house of the wording of the motion we are now debating by reading the amendment presented in this chamber on April 4 by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) because my remarks will relate to this amendment. It will serve as the theme of my address, as it were. The amendment reads as follows:

> This house regrets that the financial policies of the government will produce a fourth consecutive over-all deficit in a year of "so-called prosperity", while at the same time offering no solution to the problem of rising prices, rising trade deficits, a continued high premium on the Canadian dollar, increased pressure on provinces and municipalities to borrow outside Canada, declining farm income, and high and rising unemployment.

In presenting his budget the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) expressed an attitude similar to that he has expressed on previous occasions since I have been a member of this house in attempting to convey the impression to hon. members that budget night was the loveliest night of the year. The reception given to the budget by hon. members in this chamber and by newspapers throughout the country does not bear out the impression the minister sought to create. I noted that during the course of his remarks the minister sought to add colour to the drab speech he delivered on that occasion by employing a Maurice Chevalier accent and introducing a few paragraphs in the French language.

Some hon. Members: Shame, shame.

Mr. Godin: It became obvious to the house and to the country that evening that either in English or in French the budget had very little in the way of hope to offer to the Canadian people. It did not turn out necessarily to be the loveliest night of the year.

Since then the budget has been discussed in many newspapers in the country. It has been analysed, as I will have occasion to indicate, by people who know much about the economic situation of the country. The gist of the remarks and the studies indicates that the Canadian people are not satisfied with the budget presented by the Minister of Finance.

How should I approach the budget tonight, Mr. Speaker? I am following some hon. members who have made a great contribution to this debate. Certainly I will not find inspiration in the budget speech. It has been referred to as a stand-pat budget, as a stay-put budget, as a do-nothing budget, as a budget of omissions. I read with great interest —and it has certainly been my impression of the budget speech—the remarks quoted by a person who has great knowledge of financial affairs, the financial critic of the Financial Times, published in this country. In the issue of April 8, which I received this morning, I read this headline:

Stand Pat Budget Avoids Problems
Opportunity Missed for Providing Fiscal Leadership
By Minister

This article was written by E. J. DeSeau. I will quote one paragraph which definitely expresses my opinion.

Finance Minister Fleming's budget, of which so much was expected, in the end turned out to be a thoroughly disappointing document. Mr. Fleming had a wonderful opportunity to give the sort of fiscal leadership which he has demonstrated he is capable of but, for one reason or another, he ducked the challenge.

Instead, he stood pat, a posture which has little to recommend itself in these times.

Further down it says:

Mr. Fleming's budget sins are both in omission and commission.

The evening on which the Minister of Finance delivered his budget address, which we are now debating, happened to be the second anniversary of the date on which this government was elected with such a large majority and was the day before April Fools' day. I think the Canadian people on this occasion appreciated the significance of the April Fools' day as possibly many of them did two years ago. One of the most outstanding things in the budget speech on the second anniversary was that it indicated that this government in the short period of two years has brought about, not a second anniversary measured by time but a doubling of the liabilities of the country. Furthermore, they have cut down to half many of the assets which this country enjoyed only two years ago. This would be a very serious statement for an hon. member to make if he could not prove it. I am asserting it a this time and I intend to prove exactly that. I intend to show how the assets of our country have been cut in half and how the liabilities have been doubled in two years. A while ago the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) took us back to 1928. Surely we can discuss the economic condition of our country today without going back to 1928 to prove the point.

Mr. Denis: What about the period from 1930 to 1935?

Mr. Godin: That is one period they love to skip. They talk about the 1928-29 period but they skip the period 1930-35. Anyone who wishes to read the speech of the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot will undoubtedly see that he was willing to forget the years 1930-35.

Enough has been said about unemployment to make us realize that it is an important problem in this country. I will give some information to show this liability has doubled since this government came into power. I hold in my hand an article—

Mr. Ricard: There are more Canadians at work now than ever before.

Mr. Godin: —which is dated February 17, 1958. It is from Brantford, Ontario. The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) made a speech on that occasion. This article refers to the Prime Minister in these words:

He charged that the Liberals were trying to "fill Canadians with fear" by saying there were 800,000 Canadians out of work. The actual number, he contended, was only half that.

The Prime Minister of this country, the leader of the government, stated on February 17, 1958 that the unemployment figure was 400,000. I will quote an article which appeared exactly two years after, on February 18, 1960. It is from the Toronto Star. The report is dated March 4, and is from Ottawa:

There were 800,494 unplaced applicants for jobs in Canada as of February 18, Labour Minister Starr told the commons yesterday, in reply to Osias J. Godin, Liberal, Nickel Belt.

Therefore, we have the words of the Prime Minister of this country and of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) that unemployment, this great liability that we are trying to overcome, has doubled under this regime.

Permit me to say a word about housing. Housing is an asset which we would like to see increased. What has happened to it? This morning I received a document from the dominion bureau of statistics, issued by the Department of Trade and Commerce. It is volume 28, No. 14 and I quote the following under the item "Housing":

Starts on the construction of new dwellings in urban centres in February declined to 2,130 units from 4,021 a year ago.

This is the anniversary that we are now discussing. From the statistics made available by the government itself we find that this asset has been reduced by one half. I will have more to say about the problem of housing in a moment.

I now come to trade. What is the situation there? What have we done about our trade position? This will be interesting to the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), who spoke the other day in favour of higher tariffs, and so on. What has happened to our trade? I intend to prove this. In the Bank of Canada report for 1959 at page 22 —and anyone can refer to these figures— we find that the balance of payments in our dealings with the countries of Europe, putting aside the United States and so on, were, as of March 31, 1957, plus $144 million. What has happened since then? The same report indicates that in 1959 the figure not only was not plus but had become minus $224 million. That is what has happened to our international trade.

Let us take our trade with the United Kingdom and see what we find. May I refer hon. members to the dominion bureau of statistics monthly summary of foreign trade. If hon. members will refer to page 2 they will find there a table indicating our balance of trade with the United Kingdom for the years from 1952 to 1959. In 1952 the figure was plus $391.3 million. What had happened by 1959? As of December, 1959 the figure was plus $200.5 million. We see that our exports balance to the United Kingdom has been cut in half.

I stated that I wanted to prove the allegation that the people of Canada are realizing that our assets have diminished very quickly by half and that our liabilities have doubled. I should like to refer hon. members to the public accounts for 1959. It is a 1,000 page book. I do not wish to have it made an appendix to Hansard but I should like to refer to a few figures to be found on page 121. If hon. members will do the proper calculations they will find that the over-all surplus accumulated by the Liberal party from 1946 to 1947 amounted to $2,305 million, but now we find it has been cut in half to $1,053 million. In three years the surplus has been cut to less than half what it was—

Mr. Ricard: We have increased pensions.

Mr. Godin: —at the time the running of the affairs of this country was taken over by the Conservatives from the Liberals.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, after my few remarks in English, I should also like to speak briefly in French. I hope the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) will not begrudge the fact that on this occasion, I have not spoken in French first.

Mr. Speaker, allow me first to commend you for the part you have been playing in the Alliance canadienne, an organization which is bound to play a major role in fostering goodwill between the two groups which make up our nation.

Mr. Speaker, just recently, I had the opportunity to attend certain meetings in Sudbury which led to the formation of such a group. I am sure that in setting up associations of that type across Canada, we shall be able to obtain the co-operation of the various groups and to promote a more peaceful coexistence.

Also, I am pleased to mention to the house that this year is the 50th anniversary of the Association Canadienne Française d'Éducation d'Ontario; the event will be celebrated next week. Like my fellow Canadians, I am pleased with the great part played by that association in the educational field in Ontario. I feel sure that in future years, this organization will play an increasingly important part in our province.

We in northern Ontario have also had the opportunity, recently, to celebrate the anniversary of the newspaper Le Droit, northern edition. As I said at the time, we wish that newspaper, which is gaining new readers day by day in the bilingual areas of the north, all the success it deserves.

The newly established University of Sudbury, an institution of higher learning which raises great hopes in northern Ontario, will render great services to our fellow Canadians, thanks to its bilingual nature. That institution, under a system of federation to the Laurentian University which has been set up in Sudbury, will offer specialized education to many of our young people who, in past years, had to go outside to get this type of education.

I note that our people are putting much trust in that institution of higher learning, but none the less they are also showing some concern. In fact, I had the opportunity of reading more or less bitter criticisms about this new institution.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, we should, first of all, believe that those who went to the trouble of setting up that institution, took the necessary steps to ensure that possible alternatives were considered in order to prevent any difficulties which might have cropped up.

To people who criticize those who have set up that institution I would say that they should have clearly pointed out, at that time, any shortcomings which, in their opinion, might have existed.

Mr. Speaker, although, for several years I have had the opportunity of taking part in the development of the bilingual group in northern Ontario, I did not have the opportunity of taking part in this achievement, but I think that with the co-operation of all concerned, that institution could be in a position to render great services to our country, in an atmosphere of harmony.

Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that the setting up of a bilingual university in northern Ontario is more difficult than setting up one in the province of Quebec, or the setting up an additional faculty at the University of Ottawa.

For those reasons, I should like to congratulate my compatriots who have given the matter their most careful consideration, and particularly the reverend Jesuit fathers.

(Text):

I indicated a moment ago that I should like to say a few more words about the problem of housing. For the last year at least housing in northern Ontario has been a very grave problem, and the reason is easy to understand. In that area we do have productive mines. The miners are working steadily but housing has been crippled in the last few years. I venture to say that the problem of unemployment is due in large part to the fact that housing activity has diminished and in addition the lumbering industry has not been operating on the same scale as it had been previously. We were told that the housing act would bring about a certain amount of incentive. That is true, but as the minister had occasion to be told last week, the problem is in relation to this arbitrary decision to set a $5,000 income ceiling for a person applying for a government loan. This is not satisfactory. I should like to refer to the regulations which were sent out a few days ago which indicate the manner in which applicants will calculate their income in order to qualify for the loan.

As I have said, this $5,000 is the basic figure. However, I am told that the questionnaire which has been sent out will require companies to indicate, especially mining companies, not only the hourly rate paid to employees but also all bonuses paid. We all recognize that these bonuses vary from year to year. It has been calculated that in my area a worker may have a salary of $4,400, and in a good year his bonus may put him above $5,000. This person would then be ineligible for a housing loan, and would have to stay put until possibly he does not have quite as good a year. On the other hand, if a worker's combined bonus and salary is below $5,000, he will qualify.

I realize that there is a need to set up a standard. However, I believe that the standard by which we measure should be of such a nature that it will take care of all these varied problems we have throughout Canada, such as a variation in the level of the cost of living. It is a well known fact that in certain areas people do not earn the same amounts in the same occupations, and the cost of living is not the same as in other areas. Zones have been established under the industrial standards act to take care of variations in minimum rates of pay in various occupations.

I understand this regulation will work in such a way that a furnace worker will be able to apply for a loan because his salary is possibly $4,500 or $4,600 and yet in the same city and on the same street a man who is a mucker in the mine and whose income is only slightly more but whose need for a home is equally great will not be eligible for a loan. It is possible for a store manager in one area to be making less than $5,000 and thus able to qualify for a government loan, while in another area such a store manager may be making more than that and not be eligible. If some assessment were made of income levels and cost of living levels in certain areas, it would be found that bank managers, managers of department stores might not make $5,000 in some areas, while in other areas the same occupations would bring a return of $7,000 or $7,500 a year. As I have said, there should be a flexible standard established which would permit a worker in a particular area to obtain a government loan if he needs one.

I am informed, and I have received representations from my area, that it is the intention of the Minister of Finance, working with the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan), to change the sales tax so that it will affect the tinsmiths in this country. They are not a powerful group. They are not big income companies, as a rule; these are small firms which operate in various cities. I should like to quote from a memorandum which was sent to me by Mr. McCoy, a member of the firm of Morrison Plumbing & Heating in the city of Sudbury. This letter will indicate the views of these people to the minister, and I quote:

> Under this regulation many heating contractors will be forced to close their fabrication shops and to buy all sheet metal pipe and fittings for their warm air heating installations from large manufacturers.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Will the hon. member permit a question? Is he not aware that this is a matter of regulation, and the regulation about which he is speaking was withdrawn some time ago?

An hon. Member: He has not found out yet.

Mr. Godin: I am not too sure that this house has been advised of what the minister is now saying. If that is so, I am prepared to accept his word. Is the minister prepared to say that tinsmiths will not be included in the class in question which would oblige them to pay sales tax? Is the answer in the affirmative?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, this is probably completely out of order, but I shall be glad to set the hon. gentleman right. This is not a matter of legislation at all. There is no budget resolution dealing with the matter of tinsmiths. What the hon. gentleman is referring to, apparently, is an interpretation of a regulation made some time ago, and that interpretation has been changed and corrected. There is nothing now affecting this situation at all involved in the budget. The hon. gentleman, I am afraid, is proceeding on information that is very stale, indeed.

Mr. Peters: It is in your budget speech.

Mr. Godin: I realize the Minister of Finance had two hours to explain his problems to the house, but I have only about 40 minutes to try to explain some of the problems of my constituents. What the minister has said is still not clear to me. Does the minister mean that this regulation, which was interpreted in one way a few months ago, has now been cancelled? The tinsmiths of this country have a great fear of the interpretation of the regulation and have taken the trouble to write to members of parliament about the problem. It is surprising that the big change which the minister has indicated is still not clear to the people who have been in this business for years. If that is true, I can only say that I do not believe this house has been informed that the regulation has been changed in any way. Perhaps the minister, in a later statement, can tell the house what the situation is.

Here is what these people have to say about the problem, and I quote further from this document:

> It has also been estimated for residential work where the tax has not been applicable, that the expense of extra cost records and bookkeeping required under the regulations plus the sales tax (estimated at $10 to $15 per house) and plus mortgage interest on both of these, adds approximately $40 to the ultimate cost of each Canadian home.

I see that my time is coming to a close, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Godin: I realize that hon. members, especially those to my immediate left, do not like to hear the facts about the affairs of this country in 1960.

Mr. Ricard: You are not the one to give them; you are distorting the facts.

Mr. Godin: I am sure that if I went back to 1928 or thereabouts hon. members on my left would like that but I am not too sure that I would achieve much to assist the house.

I should like to say something about the problem—

[Mr. Godin.]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has not yet expired.

Mr. Godin: I could say something about the position of the veterans in this country. I believe all members of this house have received memorandums from our Canadian Legion wherein it was indicated that this government had mentioned that a revision would be made. I am no expert in the matter, but surely if this budget indicates any surplus—and it indicates the little one that was mentioned by the Minister of Finance—it is possibly owing to the fact that some of these people have not been attended to; and we are informed that the government does not now intend to bring about at least a study of the pension structure for our veterans.

Much could be said about our farmers and I have quite a few of them in my riding. However, that matter has been dealt with by many hon. members in this house, as has also the uranium situation and the situation at Elliot Lake which is close to my riding and affects my riding in many ways. But I realize that competent people have dealt with this matter also.

One problem, possibly a more specific one, That I should like to bring to the attention of the house is that of taxation in municipalities. One often hears the phrase tax on tax. We all admit that we have three levels of government, namely federal, provincial and municipal but that we have only one group of citizens to pay the taxes at these three levels. Surely if it was true two years ago that the Liberal party was overtaxing by $120 a year, one way in which this government could have kept its promise to reduce taxes would have been to ascertain that the municipal taxes paid by the citizens of this country and paid toward the services they need—schools, sidewalks, waterworks—be deducted from federal income taxes. One group of citizens must pay to the three levels of government. It would have been easy for this government, in fulfilling the promises it made, to reduce taxes to permit citizens to deduct the municipal taxes they pay to that level of government from their income taxes.

The rise of interest rates and the difficulty of borrowing experienced by the municipalities are a further indication that this should have been done. The house may be surprised to know that the municipal and provincial borrowings of this country which have been made from funds in the United States of America are in the amount of $400 million for 1959. This information will be found in the dominion bureau of statistics quarterly review on international accounts.

An hon. Member: What page?

Mr. Godin: I do not have the page here but that is the figure that anyone in this house can verify. If the interest rate had not gone to the height it has, and if this government had not been responsible for taking away every available dollar in this country by its conversion loan, the municipalities would not have been faced with the obligation to go to another country, namely the United States of America, in order to borrow $400 million. I am told—and I am no specialist—that this $400 million would be sufficient to bring our money to par if we had not to borrow this money in the United States of America. That is something to which this government should pay attention. It should at least be willing to listen when someone brings to the attention of this house the fact that through the action of this government our municipalities and provinces have been obliged to borrow from strangers and that it has forced them into that position through the conversion and other loans.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Godin: No. I am sorry, for I do not have all the time that is available to the minister.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Is the hon. gentleman not aware of the fact that the conversion loan did not take a cent from Canadians? It was not a cash offering at all.

Mr. Godin: My time is limited whereas that of the minister is not.

Another thing of which I should like to remind the Minister of Finance is that the costs for municipal services vary in Canada. That is one means by which some equity could be brought about. I note that the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Labour is laughing, but it is true that in my area public works cost much more than they do in other areas. How are we going to surmount the difficulties created by that situation?

I wish to say something about mining centres, and I have had occasion to say this previously. In northern Ontario miners must build and live in a rocky country. In other areas of the country municipal services are not as costly. If municipal taxes in the areas to which I have referred were deductible from the federal income tax it would bring about a reduction in taxes and one which would bring some equity with respect to the burden that our citizens are obliged to bear.

I realize that my time is just about up, Mr. Speaker. In conclusion I may state that last year we heard certain references to badges. I myself have read badges being worn by some of our citizens when walking in the streets; they read, "Don't blame me; I voted Liberal". I must tell the Minister of Finance that yesterday when I was walking down the street I had occasion to see a citizen whom I did not know wearing one of these badges. A friend of his walked up to him. Of course, as I walked by I noted that they shook hands and I had occasion to see the card on the lapel of the other fellow. The gentleman who approached him, reading the card, mentioned this phrase: "Please forgive me; I voted the other way".

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I must inform him that his time is expired.

Mr. Brunsden: I should like to ask a question of the hon. member who has just resumed his seat. As one of the other authorities on agriculture in the official opposition he made references to farm problems.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Brunsden: I am asking a question of the hon. member who has just taken his seat.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member is asking a question, I am sorry to inform him that the hon. member who has just been speaking used up all his time and there is none left for questions.

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I could add anything to the well deserved laurels that have been heaped on the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming). As we know, budgets are judged by time. I think history will record this as the finest budget for Canada that we have ever had.

I should like to take this opportunity of commending the young hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Simpson) for the marvellous contribution he made to this debate.

The other day the financial critic for the opposition, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson), was referring to what the government had not done and among those things he included the fact that we had not set up a committee of research. He very kindly referred to me a couple of times because of my interest in research. I do not think it is necessary for me to remind him or the house that there is on the order paper in the name of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) a resolution to set up such a committee. I hope and expect that we shall have that committee functioning after the Easter recess.

I should also like to remind the hon. member who referred to this research problem that while we were in opposition for six years I tried to have a committee such as this set up; and on more than one occasion we could not even get a debate on the matter through the manoeuvring of the members of the then government.

I am one of those who are very proud indeed that we are going to have a committee set up—and I am sure it will be non-political—to study not only the policies but also the administration of these three different bodies; Chalk River atomic energy commission, the national research council, and Eldorado Mining Company. I think a great deal of good could emerge from the discussions. I remember sitting on one of these committees studying different subjects years ago, and in the end that committee made one of the greatest contributions which, I imagine, any committee has ever made toward improved administration. I expect this group will do the same.

There are three items with which I should like to deal, two of them only briefly. We have heard recently about these airquakes, or the effect produced by planes which crack the sound barrier. We had an illustration here in Ottawa and there was another at Montreal a while ago. I am going to tell the house this: last fall one of these planes, apparently from Selfridge air base near Detroit, performed the same feat in my area. I happen to live on lake Huron, and a friend of mine telephoned to inquire about 30 feet of his bank which had dropped three or four feet. We had some geologists out there, and we ascertained the exact time of this drop. It was caused, according to these geologists, by this plane cracking the sound barrier. That drop of three to four feet, 30 feet back from the brow of the bank, extended for over two miles. I am going to suggest to this government that it is about time we took heed of this practice. It may be necessary but, if it is, let that practice be carried on where it is not going to do any damage. There are plenty of areas in the United States, as well as in Canada, where that can be done without flying over populated areas such as has been done on the three occasions I have mentioned.

The other item to which I wish to refer briefly has implications which discourage me very much. In the first speech I ever made in this house some 16 years ago I dealt with the tourist industry. As we all know, the set-up in this connection was introduced under Bennett and there has been a kind of autopsy ever since. We were informed recently that the revenue derived by Mexico from the United States in respect of the tourist industry exceeded the revenue received by Canada from the United States. To me that is very disturbing.

We are taking a very negative approach to this problem. We talk about trade deficits, and we have them. There is one way in which we could get another $500 million, and that is by developing the tourist industry. I think we have to make a more positive approach to this problem. Where I live I am within one day's drive, on the United States side of the border, of more people than are living in the whole Dominion of Canada, yet we are getting very little tourist traffic as I see it. Unless some change is made, we shall get even less.

On the same subject, a couple of years ago when they opened the new Canada House in New York, where the travel bureau had its office on the main floor, the United Kingdom travel bureau also had an office with about twice the space. Although Britain's revenue from United States tourists is less than ours, the United Kingdom is opening up more offices in the United States. As a matter of fact, the director for the United Kingdom received a citation—an order—from his government because of his success in promoting the tourist industry in the United States. I think the sooner we take an aggressive attitude toward the development of that industry the better it will be for our economy.

The other part of my speech deals with a subject which I think will concern many hon. members of this house. I referred a few moments ago to my living on lake Huron, one of the great lakes, which have an area of some 90,000 square miles. We were disturbed in that area on account of a platform which was being constructed by an oil and gas drilling company for the purpose of supporting drilling equipment to be used to drill for either oil or gas. The platform happened to be about 2,000 feet from the Sarnia shoreline and just a little farther from where the town has its water intake. As hon. members know, large areas of western Ontario obtain their water from lake Huron. I will say without hesitation that it is only a matter of 10 or 15 years before Georgian bay and lake Huron will be supplying water to the area from Toronto to Windsor, because it will be the only body of pure water left.

As I say, we were disturbed about this drilling operation because we knew what effect it would have upon the tourist industry, upon the beaches, upon fishing and upon health. As a matter of fact, I happened to get the idea that the company did not have the proper permit which is required in order to build a platform of that sort. The federal government can grant two types of permits and, as we also know, under the British North America Act the provinces control the land under the water but the federal government controls the water. On coming to Ottawa to see the then new Minister of Public Works I was advised that the company did not, in fact, have the proper permit, and that the permit which had been granted was not transferable. Through the co-operation of the minister and through his action that platform was dismantled within a very few days and there have been no drilling operations attempted since.

My point is this: we are not satisfied. We know that on lake Erie there are some 13 gas and oil companies with licences and leases for drilling. We do not want that to happen on lake Huron or lake St. Clair. We feel—and rightly so—that these waters should be kept as pure as possible. The purity of these waters is more important than a few million extra barrels of oil or a few million extra cubic feet of gas, because we are certainly not short of gas and oil in this country, and we shall not be for centuries.

The government of Ontario, since Mr. Macauley took office as minister of natural resources, has taken a very active and constructive attitude with regard to this serious problem. Mr. Macauley set up a committee headed by Dr. Langford, one of the best known geologists on this continent, to make inquiries regarding oil and gas drilling on the great lakes. As a matter of fact, the committee is sitting in Sarnia during Easter week and it is also going to Lansing, Michigan. As hon. members may know, the Ontario legislature recently introduced some amendments to the energy act giving the government power to prohibit drilling for oil and gas in certain areas. What I am suggesting here is that this is the concern of several of our departments of government. Looking over the treasury benches I am reminded that almost every government department is affected including the Department of National Health and Welfare, the Department of Fisheries, the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, the Department of Public Works, the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys and the Department of Transport, as well as, probably some others.

My suggestion is that the two governments now get together in view of the proposed legislation in Ontario and work out a solution so that there will not be any drilling in the areas in the great lakes where there is not now drilling and so that the existing leases will not be renewed when they expire in relation to those areas where they are now operating. In this way we will probably have a greater body of fresh water. It is amazing to learn upon reading some statistics that 15 of the great rivers in the United States are so polluted as to be unfit for use by humans. No chlorination is adaptable for the impurities of those streams.

I hope the government will take notice of this problem. The Navigable Waters Protection Act was first introduced, I believe, in 1882 or 1886. Certainly oil and gas drilling did not constitute a problem then because it had never occurred on the great lakes up to that time. I believe that legislation is due for an overhauling.

One fortunate aspect of the situation is that we are receiving excellent international co-operation. This matter began to brew in August and, as a matter of fact, a meeting was called at my suggestion by the mayor of Port Huron. He was being visited by some United States senators and others together with our mayor, the city manager and so on. Protests were sent by the governor of the state to Premier Frost and also to his own state department at Washington who alerted the Canadian Department of External Affairs with the result that they were represented at any hearings held before the Ontario fuel board.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) on February 12 of last year announced that a national conference on conservation would be convened and several cabinet ministers have referred to the necessity for conservation not only in relation to water but in relation to land use and all that sort of thing.

There are also some very alert bodies on both sides of the border interested in this problem. We have the great lakes commission composed of members representing the states of Wisconsin, Michigan, Minnesota, Pennsylvania and Illinois. That body has been formed to conserve and develop the water resources of the area. They believe the time has come to require all ships, large and small, to have spillage collection and storage systems. Speaking of spillage from ships, I think this must be corrected. I believe that ships will have to be required to provide containers so that they may empty their spillage at the proper places and at the proper times.

We had an illustration of the need for this some few years ago in the Parry Sound district when one of the Imperial Oil Company tanks burst. As I recall it, it took three years to clean up the mess and finally a good deal of the sand had to be removed and replaced with fresh sand. If I remember correctly the cost to Imperial Oil Company was about $1,500,000.

While a person could speak indefinitely about pollution it is not my intention to do so. We had last summer a spillage of oil in lake Erie and the beaches were rendered practically useless. Not many miles from where the platform was built last fall in lake Huron there was a well on land in the state of Michigan that gushed. Over 100,000 barrels of oil were spilled before the well could be capped. If that had happened where the platform was being built the oil would have gone into the shipping channel of the river and with the amount of freight that passes up and down in that area it would have resulted in considerable damage to property and a considerable loss of life.

Here again, just a few weeks ago, we had another gusher. We had to send to Texas for one of the men whose business it is to cap wells. It is my contention that these experts could more easily cap a well on land than on water. While it has been the stated policy of the Ontario government that it will not permit any drilling in this area if there is any danger of pollution, I feel I should point out that no system of drilling has been perfect to date to such an extent that a drilling operation is free from pollution. It is useless for the government to say, "We will permit it as soon as we are satisfied there will not be any pollution." Our contention is that we simply should not take that chance.

Another aspect of this problem is the situation already confronting some of the cities. It is amazing to learn that some of the large United States cities have had to close their beaches because of pollution. What concerns me are the changes required in the Navigable Waters Protection Act because of the possibility of fire. Because we are now having such marvellous co-operation on the part of the government of the province of Ontario and the government of the state of Michigan and of the other states bordering on the great lakes, it is time for us to get together on a high level at a conference involving the two federal governments as well as the governments of the states and provinces concerned to bring our legislation up to date. Certainly it has needed revision for a long time.

I believe that you, Mr. Speaker, and indeed many hon. members in this house live not too far from lake areas. We have on the great lakes' system hydroelectric developments at Niagara Falls and along the St. Lawrence river which are among the world's largest. The shores and waters of the great lakes provide a vast fishing, hunting and recreation area for millions of people, both residents and tourists. I mentioned a while ago that the contamination of our beaches would crucify the tourist industry, and I am satisfied that it would. Expert evidence reveals that oil on the beaches becomes jellied and most difficult to dispose of. I referred to the instance at Parry Sound a few moments ago.

We have been supported, also, by some 75 municipalities in our efforts to prohibit drilling. The Canadian-United States water pollution committee of which I have the honour to be chairman has appointed legal counsel to represent it at the hearings of the Ontario board on April 21. Counsel was directed by the executive to ask for the prohibition of drilling in lake Huron, lake St. Clair and the connecting waters. If we accomplish this we hope we can take action with respect to other areas such as lake Erie at a later date.

I am very glad to have the opportunity to bring this problem before the house. It is a serious one; it affects everybody. The water problem in this country and in this world is one of the greatest problems that we have to face. There is no question about that. The time to take action is now, before it is too late. Beaches that were good 10 or 15 years ago are not useable now, even in the large areas. I am sure that the many departments concerned, realizing the importance of avoiding any damage to property or loss of life, will consider the episode which happened in Michigan within the last few months because, as I said before, and I repeat, if that had happened where the drilling platform was being erected it could have scuttled probably 100 ships in the St. Clair river since you can always stand on the bridge and see maybe 30 or 40 ships going one way or the other.

It is too serious a matter for us to ignore. With the co-operation of the different states and their willingness and determination to try and cure this evil, I think we can work together to obtain the necessary results.

(Translation):

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, after hearing the hon. gentleman who preceded me in this debate one would swear that our Conservative friends are really not as noisy as they sounded at the time of the budget speech by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming).

You certainly recall the racket that was raised in this house on that occasion. It got so bad, Mr. Speaker, that at one point I thought that your furniture was in danger and I suggest that you might have the desks checked to see if they are as solid as before the budget speech.

Mr. Martel: You are quite surprised to see that they are.

Mr. Denis: According to one newspaper, our friends opposite found 44 opportunities for applause during that speech which to me was odourless, colourless and tasteless.

An hon. Member: Mr. Martineau, listen.

Mr. Denis: What worries me most is the fact that our friends opposite applauded just about anything, at any time.

An hon. Member: That surprised you so much you did not dare talk about it.

Mr. Denis: Even when the minister talked about a deficit, the Conservatives were applauding wildly. The same thing happened in the case of hypothetical surpluses. The same attitude also toward our three quarters of a million unemployed. Our friends the Conservatives applauded to such an extent that I was afraid that group had become hysterical and unable to distinguish between good and evil.

However, in all fairness to them—

Mr. Ricard: The hon. member cannot distinguish between good and evil.

Mr. Denis: The Minister of Finance was applauded when he had the courtesy to say a few words in French.

Mr. Ricard: That hurt you.

Mr. Denis: You see how the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) reacts in the face of the Minister of Finance. He does not want national unity.

An hon. Member: Oh.

Mr. Denis: I should like to congratulate the minister for his delicate attention.

Mr. Ricard: It took a Conservative government to do such a thing.

Mr. Denis: He referred to those few sentences in French as "part of the budget speech". Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance is already well grounded in French; he is even able to exaggerate in French as well as in English.

Mr. Fortin: You will not forgive him for having spoken in French.

An hon. Member: Look at little Fortin.

Mr. Denis: I suggest to the hon. member for Montmagny-l'Islet (Mr. Fortin) that he mind his statements about the Union Nationale. He has spoken about it in a way that is not appreciated at all, especially when he said that "the province of Quebec is in no way different from the others", and particularly when he stated that the present premier, Mr. Barrette, was a premier—

An hon. Member: You are sorry about that—

Mr. Denis: —was a man of great prestige. As for the Minister of Finance, he exaggerated when, speaking in French, he gave us to understand that it was "part of his budget speech". You will agree with me, and the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot will agree with me, that those seven short sentences in French, out of a total of 35 pages of English text, were more a mark of courtesy than "part of the budget speech".

Mr. Ricard: Your ministers of finance have not made budget speeches in French.

Mr. Denis: We are grateful for that—

Mr. Ricard: He is crying.

Mr. Denis: We want to thank him for his friendly attitude, but he might have given us more tangible and more positive proof of his willingness to help his French speaking fellow Canadians. For instance, he might have used his influence to raise the number and importance of French-Canadian representation within the cabinet. I am reminded of an article which appeared in Le Devoir for June 22, 1957, from which I should like to quote tonight, because I think it fits the occasion. I quote:

> Mr. Diefenbaker had better not try to run an election in Quebec with one or two French-Canadian cabinet ministers in secondary departments. No matter how pleasant he tries to be and how praiseworthy his efforts to deliver speeches in French, it will not work.

That is exactly what happened, Mr. Speaker, it did work.

In the Conservative party, there are no doubt French-Canadian members who have talent, prestige, personality—

Mr. Ricard: They all have.

Mr. Denis: —who have personality and who could fill important positions in the cabinet.

You have some Conservative French Canadians who might fill the post of minister of justice as Mr. Lapointe did.

There are also some who might head the Department of Public Works, as did Mr. Cardin in Liberal days.

We also have the transport department which was so efficiently directed by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier).

Mr. Fortin: And Mr. Marler.

Mr. Denis: And why should the Department of Finance not be entrusted to a Conservative French Canadian? He surely could not do any worse than the present incumbent.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what happens is—

Mr. Martineau: He could not do better, either.

Mr. Denis: Our fellow citizens have been given secondary appointments. We get beautiful phrases in French but when it comes to the important posts: nil.

In fact, one is a minister to prisoners, and one is a store clerk; the first is a stone crusher and the other is a batman to the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Fortin: The hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) would certainly not appreciate those words of yours.

Mr. Denis: May I ask the Minister of Finance and the government to show confidence to a greater number of my Conservative French-Canadian friends, That unity which the Minister of Finance referred to during his budget speech would be all the better for it.

Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher), who unfortunately is not at his desk tonight, not to worry about Canadian citizens in the province of Quebec. He should not waste his time listening to outcries by some of our Quebec politicians who criticized people or another race or the central government for the sole purpose of winning elections. They depicted Ottawa as an enemy, as a bogey, to the sole end of winning the election.

Mr. Fortin: Such was the position in the days of the Liberals.

Mr. Denis: And yet, there are today, among the Progressive Conservatives, as many English speaking people as in Liberal times.

Today, the Ottawa Conservatives are members of the federal parliament as were the Liberals at that time. How did such union come about? You will find, Mr. Speaker, that our friends of the Union Nationale have nothing against the English or against the central authority. They are opposed to English Liberals, Liberal members of parliament, and they would even be against our friends from the C.C.F., if that party had any significance. Such is not, as you will see, the reason for which some of our Quebec politicians used to denounce Ottawa. It was not for racial reasons, but simply because, formerly, the Liberals were ruling this country and speaking of autonomy at the time. However, such autonomy does not exist any more. It has been entirely reversed.

Mr. Speaker, I want to put on record a statement which also explains another attitude taken by some of our Quebec friends. That statement was published in the paper Le Devoir of April 7, 1960. It is a statement by Mgr. Maheux, a career professor, lecturer, historian, archivist and well-known author. That is what the article says:

[Mr. Denis.]

The thesis of Mgr. Maheux is that 80 per cent of French Canadians are normally people who want to survive as such, without hatred, without prejudice, without acrimony.

Twenty per cent would be nationalists who have difficulty in accepting co-existence. Others are very vocal ultra-nationalists. As soon as they make some wild statement, they make the headlines in the papers of the rest of the country, and that is the way we are judged, as if we were separatists.

The same thing happens in reverse: if some Ontario Orangeman rants against Quebec, he gets wild publicity in Quebec as in the rest of the country. This is childish. All that only serves to keep prejudices alive.

It is thus, Mr. Speaker, that since the Conservatives have been in office, the misunderstanding which existed between Ottawa and Quebec has become co-operation. It is the leader of the Union Nationale who recently made that decision and stated that he wished to co-operate, hand in hand with Ottawa. Consequently, the autonomy of former years should still exist, or else it was simply an autonomy serving a definite purpose.

Mr. Speaker, you have heard the remarks of the hon. member for Port Arthur. We have there the makings of disagreements which might grow into something bigger, and for which our friends from Quebec would have to take their share of responsibility. For flaunting their phony autonomy to win elections they will be responsible for causing the province of Quebec to lose hundreds of millions of dollars in federal grants. They refused those grants for the sole purpose of winning elections.

I have here a list of the amounts that were voted by the federal government and which the province of Quebec could have accepted just as did the other provinces. That list includes the construction of the trans-Canada highway and I now hope the Quebec government will co-operate with the federal government to get back a part of the money we have been paying to the rest of the country in the form of taxes, and which is being distributed across Canada while we are not getting anything, thanks to the Union Nationale.

The list also includes the winter works program carried out to reduce unemployment in municipalities, which has been rejected by practically every municipality in Quebec, as a result of the Union Nationale government's refusal to contribute, and also of its delayed authorization. It also includes the development of camping and picnic grounds, the construction of access roads to certain resources; forest fire protection; reforestation for forest inventories; practical forestry work; access roads to forests; development of national parks; forest protection against the spruce budworm; unemployment assistance; hospital insurance; civilian rehabilitation; farm labour; youth training; apprenticeship, training of foremen and supervisors, and many others.

As a result of this notoriously phony autonomy, the province of Quebec has been refusing over $100 million a year from the Ottawa government.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not sure that the hon. member does not think he is in another legislature because it seems to me that the grievances he is bringing to the attention of the government relate to another government entirely.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Speaker, I humbly submit that in the budget there are some problems relating to the provinces and the federal government and those problems must be interrelated. If the province of Quebec, for instance, is against the federal government no doubt the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) cannot do much to help the province of Quebec, to which province I belong. I think it is my duty to explain to the house the hundreds of millions of dollars that have been refused and to refer to the various reasons for these refusals.

Now that we have a Conservative government in Ottawa which is friendly to the present government in Quebec and in view of the fact that the premier of Quebec has decided to co-operate hand in hand with the federal government, I humbly submit that I should be entitled to give a few examples of things that should be corrected in the interests not only of the province of Quebec but of the whole of Canada. It seemed to me that the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) wrongly thought that the people of the province of Quebec were against the federal government or the other provinces.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member perhaps misunderstood me. My suggestion was that he direct his review of federal-provincial fiscal problems, if he wishes to discuss them, to the federal responsibility and not to the attitudes and actions of the province of Quebec which is the other side, as he says, but whose acts are not strictly relevant.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Speaker, I will abide by your ruling. I should like to speak for a few minutes about the budget but unfortunately there is nothing in the budget. I have proof of that because the hon. member who spoke before me did not talk much about the budget at all.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I was saying that the Minister of Finance gave us a colourless, odourless and tasteless budget speech. Unfortunately, his budget speech made me live over a year of deception, a year of deficit, a year of high cost of living, a year of high interest rates, a year of trade imbalance, a year of reconversion, the notorious reconversion which had the effect of reaping the money of the people, with the result that our manufacturers could no longer find the required money to keep on operating their small industries. Therefore, the government made me live over a year of deception, because it dealt with anything but what was important, necessary and urgent. This budget advises me moreover to be prepared for another similar year, a year of deception, since the budget is about the same.

There has been no change worth mentioning and we will go on living just as last year.

They will continue to play the administrator. Important problems will be put aside and will be left unsolved next year just as last year. They are playing and they will continue to play the administrator, but they will take great care of their publicity.

The important problems, to our Conservative friends, are to stay in power, take care of their publicity, control radio and television, visit the world, travel—this looks good in the newspapers and it seems truly important. But what good does it do to have consulates, agencies, paid representatives in different countries to take care of our affairs? The minister has to go there just the same, even if it is only to see if our representative is a Conservative or a Liberal.

And we will spend weeks dealing with the Jacques Cartier bridge issue. That is something to give work to our unemployed; that is something that will lower the national debt, the interest rate, the cost of living, the credit restrictions. That is not important. What they need is a little scandal so they can throw up a smoke screen to hide a bad administration. We will talk for days about capital punishment. Who discussed capital punishment during the last election campaign? Nobody. That matter had no importance then.

In 1956, a committee of members of parliament and senators of all parties reported on the matter after considering it for many months. The committee heard the evidence of jurists, of an executioner, of wardens, constables, policemen, etc., and came to the conclusion, in 1956, that capital punishment should remain on the statute books. Well, it happens now that this government, while there is unemployment, while the national debt and the cost of living are increasing, extends the debate for one, two, three and four days more to deal with capital punishment. That is what is important to them, because it works as a smoke screen, helping to make us forget the bad administration of their government. Newspapers are full of articles about that; we are shown photos of the electric chair, photos of the scaffold, and everyone explains to us the reactions of the condemned, five minutes before he goes to the scaffold, five minutes before and after. That is what we are concerned with, instead of concerning ourselves—

Mr. Allard: Tell us something about economy.

Mr. Martineau: Tell us something about post offices.

Mr. Denis: Besides, I am not the only one to criticize the budget speech of the Minister of Finance. I have read some editorials, some leading articles of certain papers.

An hon. Member: Is that true? It does not show.

Mr. Denis: I should like to place on the record not only the views of Liberals, not only the views of the opposition, not only those of the C.C.F., but also those of the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) and of the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Nasserden) who, on the subject of agriculture said the present government has enacted backward legislation.

On April 1, the Montreal Star—

Mr. Fortin: It was an April fool.

Mr. Denis: The Montreal Star, as I say, published an editorial. This is not a Liberal, a Conservative or a C.C.F. supporter speaking, it is a newspaperman discussing the budget. I quote:

(Text):

This may not be what the man in the street must look for in a budget—

(Translation):

Here is what Le Devoir of April 2 had to say:

A report on the budget, why?

The Montreal Matin of April 4 reported:

—a disappointment to those who expected a reduction in the taxpayers' tax burden.

La Tribune added:

—a dull and uneventful budget.

The hon. member from Montmagny-L'Islet who has been interrupting me for some time would be doing something more useful if he went and supervised the winter works program in his constituency—

Mr. Fortin: I have just been there.

[Mr. Denis.]

Mr. Denis: —for there is a possibility that there might not be any. It is a ridiculous program, but he might go and see what is happening and report to the house on what the winter works program is good for.

Mr. Fortin: I have just been there.

Mr. Denis: I was referring to La Tribune. Let us see now what Le Droit had to say:

—to Mr. Fleming who had extolled the huge reconversion loan program as being sound management of the debt; Le Droit: "Perhaps the greatest blunder ever made by a government".

La Presse of April 1 had this to say:

—an unstable balance.

(Text):

To Mr. Fleming, telling that Canadians can increase their own domestic capital by the practice of productivity and thrift: "It is a pity Mr. Fleming and his colleagues did not set an example a little sooner."

(Translation):

Mr. Flamand—

Mr. Fortin: Give us your opinion.

Mr. Denis: What I am giving you are my views on an odourless, colourless and tasteless budget speech.

The Winnipeg Free Press says:

(Text):

Mr. Fleming is still a long way from the $500 millions tax reduction which his party cheerfully promised the nation three years ago.

(Translation):

This is what L'action Catholique said:

—if the budget speech does not grapple directly with farm and unemployment problems, the same may be said about our trade deficits and the imbalance of our international payments.

Le Soleil—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Of what date?

Mr. Denis: One or two days after the Fleming budget which was colourless, odourless and tasteless; on April 1, April 2 or April 3.

(Text):

In order to save time I did not mention the dates, but I have the dates here...

(Translation):

Le Soleil of Quebec had this to say on April 2, 1960:

—one wonders if the federal government has done all it could to reduce its expenditures.

And L'Événement Journal said the following, on April 2, 1960:

—the government seems to have adopted a kind of wait-and-see policy.

Here is what Le Nouvelliste of April 2, 1960 said:

It is still a far cry from the Liberal surpluses which so annoyed the opposition at the time.

Well, Mr. Speaker, for all those reasons, and others that I cannot mention for lack of time, I will wholeheartedly support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) that:

(Text):

This house regrets that the financial policies of the government will produce a fourth consecutive over-all deficit in a year of "so-called prosperity", while at the same time offering no solution to the problem of rising prices, a continued high premium on the Canadian dollar, increased pressure on provinces and municipalities to borrow outside Canada, and high and rising unemployment.

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, in this sixth day of the budget debate there is little left to be said. I want to take this opportunity of congratulating the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) upon a job well done. To have taken over the financial difficulties which were building up prior to 1957 and to have balanced the budget in three years is an achievement of which the minister and this government can be very proud.

As the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) stated in his address in the house, while the Minister of Finance had hoped to balance the budget this year, this has been accomplished. Commenting on this accomplishment, the hon. member for Greenwood stated as reported at page 3006 of Hansard:

I think as one looks back one can see that it has not come about by accident but was based on long term planning and tenacity.

I certainly agree with this statement. Judging from newspaper headlines and editorial comments the balanced budget has been well received in all parts of Canada. Most people realize that after the period of deficit financing that stopped the threat of recession, a balanced budget will bolster the confidence in the Canadian economy. Even opposition speakers have more or less admitted this fact through their more than moderate criticism in this budget debate.

Canada's financial growth is graphically illustrated in a chart which appeared in many newspapers across Canada and which was headed "Awakening Giant of the Twentieth Century". It shows a graph of the gross national product as it continues upward, and it has been climbing more steeply in the last two years. Underneath the chart are these words:

Nothing so dramatically reveals Canada in the role of the awakening giant of the twentieth century as a glance at the chart above which shows the spectacular jump by which the country's gross national product has soared upward...to a prodigious 34.5 billion in 1959...Canada has emerged from an industrial fledgling, bursting with purpose and activity, to take her place as one of the great industrial nations of the world.

I suggest that it is the policies of this government and, as has been stated, the long term planning and tenacity of the Minister of Finance that have made this chart possible.

Comments from my own city of Moose Jaw in Saskatchewan indicate, I believe, the general opinion on the effect of the budget in this new fiscal year. I have here newspaper statements from interested parties. The president of the Moose Jaw chamber of commerce said that the budget semed to be a reasonable one. The secretary of the local branch of the joint action committee and secretary of the local of the civil service association of Canada said that he was most pleased with what he had heard about civil servants' pay. He added that it was a step in the right direction. I might add that prior to coming down here to Ottawa I had dealings with the civil service. I found them to be very reasonable. I told them that the Minister of Finance had said that when the occasion arose the government would treat the civil servants in the various categories as well as it was possible to treat them.

The first vice president of the Saskatchewan wheat pool who lives in Moose Jaw said, "There seems to be little in it for the farmers". From personal acquaintance with him I know he is a reasonable man; and I am sure he will admit that farmers as well as other segments of our economy will benefit from the confidence in our future inspired by a balanced budget.

The mayor of Moose Jaw said that he was glad that the taxes on the people had not been raised. He also said he hoped the statement that the government would be getting out of the money market as much as possible would help municipalities with their financial problems.

In connection with municipal financing, I should like to re-emphasize what others who have spoken have said about the greatly increased grants of money the federal government is now making to the provincial governments. The Minister of Finance outlined how much more money is now going to the provincial governments in the table which appears at page 2676 of Hansard. I should like to refer to that table for a moment. I will just outline the totals. This table shows unconditional payments, conditional payments and extra payments. The unconditional payments estimated for the new fiscal year 1960-61 total $870.1 million as compared with $552.7 million in 1956-57. The conditional payments estimated for this new fiscal year total $389 million as compared with $111 million in 1956-57, the last fiscal year of the Liberals. Then there are extra payments, such as university grants and grants to municipalities in lieu of taxes on federal government property totalling $41.8 million as estimated for this new fiscal year as compared with $25.7 million in the 1956-57 fiscal year.

The grand total shows the picture much more plainly. In this fiscal year 1960-61 the federal government is giving to the provincial governments by way of grants $1,300.9 million compared with $689.4 million in 1956-57, the last year of the Liberal administration. In other words, the federal government is paying in grants this year almost double what was paid by the Liberal government in the fiscal year 1956-57.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I inquire from the house leader whether he is in a position to give the business when the house resumes after it adjourns on Wednesday this week?

Mr. Churchill: When the house re-assembles on April 25 the order of business for that week will run as follows. Monday is a private members' day. On Tuesday we will start off with No. 8 on today's order paper, second reading of Bill No. C-56, to amend the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act, followed by No. 9 on today's order paper which is second reading of Bill No. C-57, an act to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act. The third item is No. 10 on today's order paper, the resolution in the name of the Prime Minister dealing with the tenure of office of judges. The fourth item would be the motion in the name of the Prime Minister to set up a select committee on the procedure of the house.

Mr. Chevrier: What number is that item?

Mr. Churchill: That is item No. 15 on today's order paper. The fifth item is No. 11 on today's order paper, being the motion in my name to set up a select committee to consider the national research council and other matters as there outlined. Then those items of business being completed, we would continue with budget resolutions. That would be the business of the house for Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday. If completed by that time we would then take up the estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

AVERAGE EGG PRICES, 1947-59

Question No. 274—Mr. Boulanger:

What was the average price for eggs of each grade for the period, 1947 to 1959 inclusive, (a) in the three prairie provinces; (b) in all ten provinces?

Questions

Answer by: Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture):

The records of egg prices presently maintained do not include an average for each grade as requested. However, a record of the weighted average price for all grades combined is presently maintained and for grade A large size only. These records do not include Newfoundland as such records have not been available in that province until only recently. A copy of these records, which are available for the period since 1949, are attached.

Questions

C.N.R. REPAIR SHOPS, MONCTON, N.B.—PERSONNEL

Question No. 286—Mr. McWilliam:

1. How many men were employed at the Canadian National Railways repair shops, Moncton, New Brunswick, in each year, 1952 to 1960 inclusive?
2. Will there be a reduction in staff when the hump yard is put into operation? If so, by what number?

Answer by: Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport):

The management of Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1.

Year	Average number for each year
1952	2277
1953	2148
1954	1739
1955	1885
1956	2011
1957	1769
1958	1613
1959	1631

2. It is not anticipated that the operation of the hump yard itself will have any effect on shop repair forces. (A hump yard automatically sorts freight cars by destination in order to speed up movement of traffic.) Equipment maintenance and the amount of staff required depend on fluctuations in traffic, car utilization and handling and, also, improved work methods.

C.N.R. TIE PURCHASES

Question No. 287—Mr. Pickersgill:

2. What quantity of railway ties produced outside the Atlantic provinces was purchased for use in the Atlantic provinces by the Canadian National Railways in each of the calendar years, 1956, 1957, 1958 and 1959?

Answer by: Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport):

The management of Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1.

Year	Quantity ordered	Quantity delivered
1956	993,206	573,658
1957	977,420	833,825
1958	841,303	728,550
1959	578,748	487,110
Total ...	3,390,677	2,623,143

2. It is not the policy of the railways to purchase ties outside of the Atlantic region for use in the Atlantic region.

TAXATION OFFICE, WINDSOR—TEMPORARY PERSONNEL

Question No. 340—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

1. How many temporary office workers are at present employed by the district taxation office in Windsor, Ontario?
2. How many such workers were employed between January 1, and May 31, 1959?

Answer by: Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue):

Number of seasonal (temporary) employees at Windsor district taxation office:

1. At 31st March, 1960, 8.

2. At 31st January, 1959, nil; at 28th February, 1959, 26; at 31st March, 1959, 27; at 30th April, 1959, 27; at 31st May, 1959, 20.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, April 12, 1960

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

STANDING ORDERS

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Miss Margaret Aitken (York-Humber) presented the second report of the standing committee on standing orders, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has unanimous consent to move concurrence in this report later this day? Perhaps some arrangement might be made to dispense with the reading of it, because it is a long report. If the conclusions or recommendations are read, will that be satisfactory?

Mr. Chevrier: What is it?

Mr. Speaker: It is a report of the standing committee on standing orders with respect to various petitions for divorce which were technically imperfect and required consideration by the committee. Is it agreed that we dispense with the reading of all but the recommendations?

Some hon. Members: Agreed; dispense with all.

Mr. Speaker: Dispense.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BOULANGER REFERENCE TO STATEMENT IN DEBATE BY MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. On going over yesterday's Hansard I find that the Minister of Agriculture gave the impression that I had based my question on a report dating back to 1959.

Although I was sure that such was not the case, I took the trouble of again checking the report from "Le Bulletin des agriculteurs" to which I had referred, and I repeat that the item was indeed dated March 1960.

I hope that, in the meantime, the Minister of Agriculture had an opportunity of checking on the accuracy of his gratuitous statement in my regard.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has given an explanation. It does not seem to raise a matter of privilege; it is an explanation of a matter reported in Hansard.

TRADE

RUSSIA—ANNOUNCEMENT OF CONCLUSION OF AGREEMENT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, negotiations for a trade agreement between Canada and the U.S.S.R. have now reached a stage where a basis for agreement has been established. The delegation of Canadian officials which has been in Moscow during the past week now reports that the final stages of the negotiations have been completed and that the agreement is ready for signature.

The last agreement was signed in Ottawa. On this occasion the agreement will be signed in Moscow. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has been given the authority to sign on behalf of the government of Canada. He will leave for Moscow tomorrow, and it is expected that the agreement will be signed on Saturday.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the house will be gratified to learn that at last this agreement is about to be signed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in Moscow. I assume that the agreement will be submitted to the house for consideration before ratification.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, the members of this group consider this a welcome announcement, and hope this will be an omen of agreement on other questions to come.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce arising out of the announcement made earlier today about his trip to Russia to sign the proposed Russian-Canadian trade pact. My question is this. Is he in a position today to give any information as to what will be in the trade treaty, particularly with reference to wheat?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the details of the trade agreement, of course, will be brought before parliament in due course for ratification, but substantially the agreement amounts to a plan to enlarge the trade between the two countries on a two to one basis. In other words the U.S.S.R. has agreed that for every dollar's worth of Russian goods purchased by Canada they in turn will buy two dollars' worth from us.

Our trade last year with the U.S.S.R. amounted in round figures to $2¼ million of imports into Canada. Our exports to Russia, again in round figures, amounted to about $12¾ million. The agreement provides for the purchase by Russia of about 7 million bushels of wheat. Depending on the grade that is purchased, the value of that wheat would run say from $10 to $12 million. Correspondingly, then, Canada would require to import from Russia goods to the value of from $5 to $6 million. The agreement looks toward a higher figure for trade generally in other commodities.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether this agreement is not on a much smaller scale than the previous agreement in which the ratio of Canadian purchases was less and the ratio of Canadian exports was higher? May I also ask the minister whether in the proposed treaty Russian-made automobiles are included among the commodities to be purchased?

Mr. Churchill: I am not aware of the ratio that the hon. member mentions—

Mr. Pearson: Five to one.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That was not provided in the agreement.

Mr. Pearson: It was the effect.

Mr. Churchill: There was a separate letter with regard to purchases of wheat over a three-year period. There is a target set in this agreement of purchases by Canada of $12½ million as against $25 million to be purchased by Russia. We have not specifically mentioned any article other than wheat in the agreement.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister what arrangements have been made under this agreement to ensure that this proportion of Russian imports do in fact come into this country?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, we are not a state trading nation, and the Canadian government cannot ensure that the proportion desired comes into the country from Russia. This is a matter for the businessmen of this country who are alert to seize business opportunities.

TRANSPORT

CHANGE IN DEPARTURE TIME OF TORONTO TRAIN ON APRIL 13

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have an announcement that will be of interest to members travelling to Toronto and western Ontario tomorrow afternoon by train. The pool train that usually leaves at 3.30 p.m. will leave at 3.45 p.m. in order to give members a chance to get aboard.

Mr. Chevrier: Following a good precedent.

IMMIGRATION

EAST GERMANY—STATEMENT CORRECTING NEWS REPORT RESPECTING REFUGEE FARMERS

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is important that I correct an erroneous news report which was prominently displayed in virtually all newspapers and broadcast several times over the radio in the Federal Republic of Germany yesterday to the effect that German farmers who have recently fled from the Soviet zone cannot emigrate immediately to Canada.

This statement is contrary to fact, since our officers in West Germany deal without delay with the applications of persons who have fled from the east zone of Germany and who have been classified as refugees by the authorities of the federal republic.

It is a matter of record that Canada has accepted many thousands of refugees from Germany. It would be most unfortunate if this erroneous news report should act as a deterrent to the movement of agriculturists from East Germany, who are welcome in Canada and for whom excellent settlement opportunities continue to exist.

TRADE

REPORT OF STUDY GROUP ON TRANS-ATLANTIC ECONOMIC ORGANIZATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask either the Minister of Finance or the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he can make any statement to the house on the report of the four experts to the 20-nation body dealing with European economic co-operation, which report apparently was made yesterday in Paris.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have not the actual text of the report yet but I had some intimation of the nature of the report that was likely to be made. Canada made her views known to the four men in question some weeks ago, along with the other countries that were concerned. I do not think it would be appropriate for me to go beyond that at this point.

SPORTS

HOUSE OF COMMONS—CHAMPIONSHIP BOWLING TEAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General on behalf of the hon. member for St. Denis. In view of the fact that within the last hour the hon. member's team has won the House of Commons bowling championship, will the Postmaster General give consideration to issuing a stamp commemorating this event, which is an outstanding feat for the master of the left-handed screwball?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I received no notice of this question. I am sorry that we cannot issue a stamp for this purpose, but I would express my gratification that the hon. member for St. Denis seems to make more strikes outside of the house than he does inside.

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): I must thank my good friend the Postmaster General for his kind words of congratulation. May I assure him that I did not win as the result of theft.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT BY ADVISORY COMMITTEE ON HOLIDAY AND SEVERANCE PAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I ask the Minister of Labour whether he has yet received a report from the unemployment insurance advisory committee in respect of regulations 172 and 173 of the Unemployment Insurance Act?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): No, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

Mr. Regier: I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Will he explain to the house the reason for the long delay in the report of the unemployment insurance advisory committee reaching his office? Is he taking any action to obtain an early delivery of that report?

Mr. Starr: I can only repeat what I said last week and on a number of occasions prior to that time, namely that I have had communications with them urging them to bring in this report. They held another meeting on Friday and the report is not in yet.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

ROCK 'N' ROLL PASSION PLAY—PROPOSED PRODUCTION DURING EASTER WEEK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Pratt (Jacques Cartier-Lasalle): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue in his capacity as spokesman for the C.B.C. I have received a protest from one of my constituents against a proposed television production during the forthcoming Easter week by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation of what is described as a rock 'n' roll passion play. Could the minister inform the house whether he has received a similar complaint or whether, to his knowledge, the C.B.C. has received complaints in any significant numbers with reference to such a program?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was good enough to send me notice of his question this morning, which gave me an opportunity to inquire of the corporation about this matter.

In the first place, I have received no such complaints whatever, nor has the corporation. The C.B.C. has no intention of producing anything which could be called a rock 'n' roll passion play. The first intimation the corporation had of this was when they read the news story in the papers this morning. I am advised that it is without any foundation in any shape or form.

NATIONAL CAPITAL PLAN

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF CHAIRMAN OF COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): I should like to ask the Minister of Public Works whether an appointment has yet been made to the position of chairman of the national capital commission.

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): I thank the hon. member for the question, and I can tell him that Mr. Alan Hay has been appointed chairman of the national capital commission for a temporary period.

Mr. McIlraith: What is the significance of the addition at the end of the answer of the words "for a temporary period"? Does that relate to the time only, or does it relate to the authority of his office?

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, two months.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DISARMAMENT—INQUIRY AS TO CANADA'S AGREEMENT TO LONG ADJOURNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the apparent failure of the members of the 10-power commission to make progress in the matter of disarmament, I should like to ask whether the Canadian government consented to the long adjournment of the commission about which Secretary Herter complained; or was Canada's agreement made on the sole initiative of the spokesman for the Canadian delegation?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The hon. member for Essex East should not be so downhearted about the disarmament negotiations. I am leaving tonight for Washington to attend a meeting of the five foreign ministers of the western nations which are members of that commission. I am hopeful that some progress can be made at that time. Any adjournment made would have been with the consent of our representative at the meeting in Geneva.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I thank the minister for his statement: May I ask him whether we are to conclude that because of his intended visit to Washington, there will be grounds for optimism?

Mr. Green: I hope so. Certainly there will be no grounds for all the pessimism the hon. gentleman from Essex East shows.

VISIT OF FRENCH PRESIDENT—LIAISON OFFICERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Louis Fortin (Montmagny-L'Islet): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Would the minister give the house the names of those who will act as liaison officers to the President of the French republic, General de Gaulle, during his visit to Ottawa, Montreal, Quebec and Toronto?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Jean Belleau and Mr. J. W. Hughes of the national film board will be accompanying the press party throughout. In Quebec city they will be assisted by Mr. Jean Pelletier, press secretary to the premier of Quebec; in the city of Montreal by Mr. Pierre Jérôme of T.C.A., and in Toronto by Mr. Jack Berry of the C.P.R.

IMMIGRATION

IRENE REBRIN—PAYMENT OF DEPARTURE EXPENSES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Is the hon. lady now in a position to answer the question I asked on Friday?

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Yes, Mr. Speaker. When the hon. member asked me the question on Friday I was not too sure just where the suggestion had originated with reference to Miss Rebrin's departure. On looking up her record I find that it was her solicitor who informed officials of my department that she did not have sufficient funds in order to leave voluntarily. They were subsequently informed that the department would be prepared to assist in paying for her departure provided this was accomplished before deportation arrangements were made by the immigration department. This offer was made under the provisions of section 70 of the Immigration Act.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL ADVISORY BOARD—REQUEST FOR OVERHAUL OF REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the very critical comment contained in the annual report of the deputy minister of health and welfare of the province of Ontario, can the minister inform the house whether it is the government's intention to sit down with the federal-provincial advisory board with a view to overhauling its regulations in this matter?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am not just too sure to which portion of the report the hon. member is referring.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I am referring to page 11.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I have not read the report as yet, I am sorry to say. However, I shall be glad to do so and let the hon. member know.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR LATEST STATISTICS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, I asked the Minister of Labour whether he could give us the latest available figures in the offices of the unemployment insurance commission covering the number of unplaced applicants. Is the minister in a position to give us that information today?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The number is 834,990, as of March 31, 1960.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In view of the increase in this figure may I ask the minister whether he is aware that the figure he has given represents an increase of 53,400 over the same date last year?

Mr. Grafftey: That is a statement, not a question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member is asking for a reply to the obvious, and that he is making a statement rather than asking a question.

ELLIOT LAKE—STATEMENT ON VISIT BY MINISTERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask either the Minister of Trade and Commerce or the Minister of Labour whether they will be in a position soon to make a report on their week end at Elliot Lake.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I could report briefly now.

The Minister of Labour and I visited Elliot Lake on Saturday and Sunday. We were exceptionally well received by the people of that area, had a long conference with representatives of the various organizations in town who presented half a dozen briefs to us in the course of Saturday afternoon, drove round the community and saw the dwellings there, the schools and the hospital, and met ever so many people. We reviewed the situation generally, and are taking into consideration the suggestions made by the citizens of Elliot Lake with regard to the present situation there and the future.

The problem requires action on a broad front, and that action is going forward. In the first place the citizens themselves have shown commendable initiative in organizing the community with the intention of attracting to that area industry from other parts, and in generally looking after the welfare of those who are disturbed because of the employment situation. The mining companies are taking an active interest in the situation and are endeavouring on their own account to make plans for maintaining employment in the area, and increasing it similarly by encouraging other industry.

The provincial government of Ontario have indicated in the legislature their very keen interest in the welfare of Elliot Lake and are similarly making plans to assist. The dominion government is also considering ways and means of coming to the assistance of a community which through no fault of its own is facing circumstances which for some of the people there are rather trying, to say the least. I think it will be possible within a very short interval to provide from our sources—that is from the dominion government—some assistance to Elliot Lake, and the other organizations I have mentioned will also be doing something very soon.

It is a model community situated in the northern part of this province. It represents the type of effort that is being made in developing northern parts of Canada through the mining industry, and it has great possibilities for the future. It is recognized that the uranium industry is now suffering a contraction, but the evidence that can be produced by experts in the field indicates that within a few years the demand for uranium may again increase and, that being so, there will be a good future for the industry in Elliot Lake and in other areas that produce uranium. Unfortunately there is at present a time lag between the period of 1963 or 1965 and 1970, and in that interval certain things will have to be done to sustain the community.

There is no doubt whatever that the government is keenly aware of the problems affecting the people of Elliot Lake and is anxious to do everything that is reasonably possible to meet that situation. In my opinion the people of Elliot Lake are showing great initiative and remarkable courage under trying conditions.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, in thanking the minister for his statement may I ask him whether the federal government is in a position at this time to put forward any concrete proposals for assistance to this community?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I gave an assurance when I was there that by the first week of May an announcement would be made by the federal authorities. I think that assurance will be fulfilled and that an announcement will be made in due course.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

OTTAWA—SAFETY CONDITIONS OF NO. 8 TEMPORARY BUILDING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Yesterday the hon. member for Timmins asked the following question:

In the light of the imminent move of the trade mark office to No. 8 temporary building, could the minister inform the house whether adequate notice has been taken of (a) the design load of the building, (b) the actual load of the office, and (c) the safety factor?

The answer to (a) is yes; the answer to (b) is yes; and the answer to (c) is yes.

Inquiries of the Ministry

HOUSING

NORTHERN ONTARIO—STATEMENT ON REPORTING OF BONUSES BY MINE WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): While I am on my feet may I reply to the question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Nickel Belt, and which was as follows:

Is it true that applicants for loans under the provisions of the National Housing Act—and I am referring now to people resident in northern Ontario —have to report the bonuses paid to mine workers, an amount which is unascertainable from year to year? If this is so, would the minister not consider having that regulation withdrawn and the question removed from the application papers?

The answer is as follows, Mr. Speaker. Applicants for N.H.A. loans under the present direct lending policy are obliged to disclose all sources of income except family allowances. In determining eligibility for a loan, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation considers the income, including bonuses, of the applicant during the 12 months immediately preceding the date of application.

It is not intended to change the method of computing income at this time.

PRIVILEGE

MR. PICKERSGILL—ALLEGED INCOMPLETE RETURN RESPECTING PAYMENTS TO PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Secretary of State has been able to look into the question of the return I asked about yesterday, because I would like very much, if I could, to get this information before the Easter recess.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Acting Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, it will be tabled later today.

Mr. Pickersgill: Thank you.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO SHORTAGE OF CANADIAN SILVER COINS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. As the minister and the house are aware, the chartered banks are withdrawing from circulation all United States coins, which are reported to amount to as much as 25 per cent of the total silver in circulation. Will the minister inform the house whether adequate steps are being taken to ensure that there will be no shortage of Canadian coins?

[Mr. Walker.]

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Well, Mr. Speaker, I trust that the hon. gentleman will not suffer from any shortage. If he does, we will do our best to see that the need is met. I have no reason to think there will be any shortage.

[Later:]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the Minister of Finance whether the offer he just made to the hon. member for Timiskaming to relieve any shortage of coins he might experience applies equally to all hon. members.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am quite sure I would not deny that assistance to special favourites of mine, Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. Pickersgill: Very well, Mr. Speaker. I will let the minister know my requisition.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Monday, April 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Benidickson.

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, at the ten o'clock adjournment last night I had congratulated the Minister of Finance for a budget job well done. I had pointed out that this year's balanced budget would bolster confidence in Canada's economy. I referred to a chart which graphically indicated the country's financial growth, showing an increase in the gross national product to a record $34.5 billion in 1959. I said this tremendous growth was due to this government's policy and to the long term planning and tenacity of the Minister of Finance.

I drew attention to the great increase in federal contributions to the provincial governments since the present Minister of Finance assumed office. Unconditional payments, conditional payments and special payments to the provincial governments will total $1,300,900,000 this fiscal year compared with about half that amount, $689,400,000, paid in 1956-57, the last fiscal year of the Liberal government.

In connection with these federal contributions to the provinces, I would like to continue with an assessment of what Ottawa is paying to the Saskatchewan government under these arrangements. I have here a break-down of these federal payments to the Saskatchewan government for the 1960-61 fiscal year showing a comparison with what the Liberal government paid in the last fiscal year during which it was in office, 1956-57. Unconditional grants to the Saskatchewan government this year will total $43,068,000 compared with $29,562,000 in 1956-57. Conditional grants to Saskatchewan will total $27,894,000 compared with $7,723,000 in the last fiscal year of the Liberal government. Nearly $71 million is being paid to the Saskatchewan government this year by way of conditional and unconditional grants, compared with $37,285,000 paid by the Liberal government in 1956-57.

Saskatchewan will receive nearly $41 million this year from tax rental and equalization payments, compared with $27,432,000 in 1956-57. The equalization payments are designed to pay to the provinces the difference between the tax rental payments per capita to the provinces of Ontario and British Columbia and the tax rental payments per capita to each of the other provinces. In the case of Saskatchewan this difference for 1960-61 is estimated at $24.76 per capita, which means that $22,680,000 will be paid to Saskatchewan under this agreement.

In connection with this greater federal payment to the provincial governments the mayor of Saskatoon recently made a very interesting comment, as reported in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix. He said:

> Saskatchewan municipalities are in urgent need of more financial assistance from the provincial government to ease the increasing burden of municipal taxes. He hoped that the Saskatchewan government would share the increase in tax rentals from Ottawa.

The Saskatchewan mayor is reported in the newspaper to have said:

> The Saskatchewan provincial government might be able to claim a reduced provincial debt, but the debt reduction was due to a shift in the tax load from the provincial to the municipal governments.

Earlier in my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I referred to the fact that the great industry of agriculture, like all other economic groups, will benefit at least indirectly from sound government financing and a balanced budget. This government has provided many benefits to agriculture, and there will be a great many other farm benefits arising from the government's long term agricultural policy. In the course of a speech in this house the Liberal member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger) made a very interesting comment on this government's farm price policy. Here is what he said as reported at page 2464 of Hansard of Friday, March 25. I shall read the translation. He was referring to the supplementary estimates brought in by the Minister of Agriculture, and he said:

> Under this item, we are asked to vote an amount of $57,661,176 under the heading "Operating Loss Sustained by the Agricultural Prices Stabilization Board." That, Mr. Chairman, is the highest amount Canada has ever spent to support farm prices, since the passing of the Agricultural Prices Support Act in 1946.
> If we look at the report, we find that the total amount spent under the act since 1946 is approximately $100 million, including the losses arising from the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease, mainly in the western provinces, and which accounted for $70 million on that amount.
> Under the Liberal administration, from 1946 to March 1957, the Agricultural Prices Support Act cost $25,052,806.98.
> Now if you look at the expenditures for the past three years, that is since the Conservative government took over you find that in 1958, Canada spent close to $6 million, and in 1959, $15,124,000. Now, for the year 1959-60, we are asked to vote $57,661,176.
>
> That means that since the election of the Conservative government, it has cost the taxpayers the substantial amount of $78,773,819 to support agricultural prices.
> In short, therefore, it can be said that in the last 12 years of Liberal administration, it cost us $25 million to support those prices, while in three years of Conservative administration, the amount expended was $78 million.

An hon. Member: That is why there is not a Liberal from west of the great lakes.

Mr. Pascoe: This statement by a Liberal speaker certainly endorses the government's agricultural policy.

Mr. Hellyer: Did he mention the millions the farmers had lost through lower prices?

Mr. Boulanger: What did the farmers get?

Mr. Pascoe: Coming from a prairie farm region and an area principally devoted to grain raising, I naturally consider that bolstering the position of the western wheat farmer is one of the main problems facing this government. It is not a problem of this government's making; it is a problem that has been building up for years. The Leader of the Opposition made this clear when he said, according to a report in the Edmonton Journal of October 3, 1958, that agriculture had not had a fair share of the national income for the past 10 or 15 years.

This government's long range farm policy, Mr. Speaker, is the first real attempt at a national agricultural policy. Its full impact may not be felt for some time. That is why I believe some action of a more immediate nature should be taken this session to ease the problems of particular groups, such as the western wheat farmers. I use the term "immediate action" to differentiate between it and the long range farm program.

First I want to deal with this long range program. I know I am not making an original statement when I say that farming, which once was regarded as a somewhat individual way of life, has now become a business proposition, with all the problems of high cost operations and also with at least some of the hopes of the financial returns offered in business. When I say farming is now a business proposition I do not mean that farms must necessarily become big farms. Personally I believe in the preservation of family farms that can become economic units. Such family farms were the backbone of the economy in Saskatchewan in earlier days, and I am hoping the federal government policies will help to maintain these family farms in the years to come.

In the government's long range farm policy there are three main points of attack on present problems, and here I speak as a western farmer of the problems of western grain farmers. The first point is more adequate long term credit to help put farms on the necessary business basis. The second is a guarantee of a minimum yearly grain income through crop insurance, worked out in co-operation with provincial governments. The third is continuing efforts, through the Canadian wheat board, to sell more wheat both on the export and on the domestic markets. In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I was very pleased to hear the announcement by the Prime Minister of the trade agreement with Soviet Russia, which will take more of our wheat.

Great interest is now centred on this government's long term credit plans, especially among young farmers and among those who would like to be farmers. It is almost impossible today for a young man to start on a farm without sufficient credit, or for older farmers to expand or reorganize their operations without such credit. In commenting on this situation an editorial in the Family Herald of March 12, 1959 had this to say:

> Credit is essential. The problem is to learn how to use it as a tool, and to lessen the risk. There was a day when the necessity of borrowing was thought to be the last mark of disaster for a farmer; when keeping out of debt was a mark of honour. Since then, farmers have learned that credit is a tool that may be as helpful to them as any other tool. Farming, besides being a way of life, is an industry and a business, and it must operate as such. The wise use of credit is just one of the business skills that farming requires. And a hearty welcome awaits any sound scheme that will make credit easier to get.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that under this government's new policy we certainly have made more credit available to farmers. This government believes it has worked out a sound farm credit program that will operate under the Department of Agriculture and help young farmers, through some form of supervision, to see that credit is used in the best way possible. The 47 prairie members on the government side can take some credit —if I may use the term in another sense—for this new credit plan, especially for keeping the interest rate at 5 per cent. The 5 per cent interest rate is quite a contrast to the interest rate of 6½ per cent charged under the farm credit plan for young farmers set up recently by the Saskatchewan government.

The second part of this government's long range farm program, a crop insurance plan, would guarantee a minimum level of annual grain income and would fit in with the credit program. The Saskatchewan government at first rejected the crop insurance program as an insult. That was the word used. Now it has changed its mind, possibly because of pressure from farmers and farm groups, and is going to follow the lead of the Manitoba government and set up test areas to see how crop insurance can be worked out. The federal government will pay one half the cost of administration and 20 per cent of the insurance premiums. This is the same rate of contribution that is made by the government to the unemployment insurance fund. I emphasize this point, Mr. Speaker. Unemployment insurance contributions from the federal government are in practically the same proportion as has been agreed to for crop insurance.

On the third front of the government's farm policy, aggressive action to sell more wheat, the Minister of Trade and Commerce gave the house an outline of what has been accomplished. It was a good report, despite the attempts of the opposition to minimize the export figures. Canada has held her position as the world's leading exporter of wheat in commercial markets, with cash sales in the last crop year exceeding the cash sales of United States wheat by 125 million bushels. In this crop year Canadian wheat exports have been running about 10 million bushels ahead of last year. I have a chart here which shows that situation. It indicates an increase each month over the same month last year. Increased world production of wheat, continued restrictive measures in some countries and the pressure in other countries to dispose of wheat surpluses are obstacles to greater wheat board sales; but, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce points out, the high quality of Canadian wheat is the chief sustaining feature of our world trade.

These three points have been mentioned in the house on other occasions, Mr. Speaker, but I make no apologies for outlining them again. They contain the three essentials of an integrated farm program of particular interest to the prairie; namely, more adequate credit facilities to establish farms on a business basis, some assurance of annual income through crop insurance, and continuing efforts to sell more wheat.

It is recognized that this is a long range policy and that its benefits may not be fully felt for some years. Saskatchewan members have suggested on other occasions, and I take this opportunity to suggest it again, that help of a more immediate nature could be given prairie wheat farmers through a two-price system for wheat sales. A two-price system would mean that wheat sold on the domestic market for human consumption, at present about 50 million bushels, would be sold at a price higher than the price on the world market and more in line with other Canadian prices.

If the 50 million bushels of wheat for domestic consumption sold for $1 a bushel above the export market price, this would mean an extra $50 million for distribution to grain growers through the Canadian wheat board. It is my personal view that under such a plan the additional money could be distributed on either a limited acreage basis or on the basis of a limited number of bushels for each farmer, say on the first 2,000 bushels delivered by any one farmer. Under this arrangement the smaller farmers would receive a good share of the additional money.

In connection with the domestic market for wheat, I want to refer to the decreasing consumption of bread. Based on its nutritional value, bread is one of our cheapest foods. In view of this is it surprising that in Canada, where we grow the best milling wheat, the per capita consumption of bread is going down. As a farmer and the member for the constituency of Moose Jaw-Lake Centre, where probably the best bread-making wheat in the world is grown, I am disturbed over this situation and consider that something should be done about it.

I have been amazed at the growing practice in eastern Canada, the area east of the great lakes, of not eating much bread at meals. I have been at a loss to understand why, and have gone to considerable trouble to seek an explanation from the planners of meals, the wives and mothers. It appears to be the young wives and the young mothers who are the leaders in the curtailment of bread consumption. The one answer I get is that they really like bread but that it is not on their slimming diet.

Out on the prairies, Mr. Speaker, the young wives and mothers know the value of bread consumption, both for their health and for the welfare of the wheat producers who are either themselves or their neighbours. Many of them bake their own bread. One of the great pleasures of visiting in my constituency is to go into a home where there is the smell of home baked bread. I know of one young mother with four sons who must bake a dozen loaves of bread each week. Her boys are the picture of health, and she is just as slim as those who avoid bread in their diets. What I am attempting to emphasize is that a larger consumption of bread would raise the domestic sales of flour milled from our good western wheat, and this would help to reduce our wheat surplus.

I have some figures for the United States which I think can be converted into comparable figures for flour consumption in Canada. Consumption of flour in the United States at the present time averages 119 pounds per year per capita, compared with an average of 160 pounds per capita in the period from 1935 to 1939. If Americans were consuming flour at the 1935 to 1939 rate it would mean using an additional 165 million bushels of wheat a year for milling purposes, or well over 1 billion bushels of wheat in the past 10 years. On the basis of the same estimate Canada, with a population about one tenth that of the United States, would have used an additional 100 million bushels of wheat in the form of flour in the last 10 years; and I think, Mr. Speaker, we would be a healthier people.

I have here a food chart issued by the health league of Canada. It is headed "Canada's Food Rules", and at the bottom is this notation:

> Approved by the Canadian council on nutrition, nutrition division, Department of National Health and Welfare, Ottawa.

It is true that the chart was issued before the present government came into office, but in this connection I think the government in office at that time was on the right track. Foods are shown for a balanced diet, and the chart goes on to say:

> These foods are good to eat. Eat them every day for health. Have at least three meals each day.

Under the heading "Cereals and bread" there is the following:

> One serving of whole grain cereal and at least four slices of bread.

If each person in Canada, Mr. Speaker, ate four slices of bread a day the wheat marketing problem would be very much easier for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I should like to have that statement on the record as one way in which the Canadian people can help to reduce the wheat surplus.

Before I conclude I feel I must make reference to remarks made by the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) about a divided Canada through what he referred to as "Quebec provincialism". The hon. member's remarks perhaps should not be taken too seriously, because he delights in making statements that receive headlines. In this particular case he probably was disappointed because the headlines were not too many or too large. I am sorry he is not in the house to hear these remarks.

Quebec has shown little interest in his party at any time, and perhaps that is the reason for his statements. To me it is the old game of divide and conquer, or should I say attempt to divide and attempt to conquer. As I see it, the hon. member for Port Arthur realizes that the party of which I am a member is the one truly national party, the party of unity, the party of one Canada. His party thrives on disunity, on divided segments in our economy. His latest speech can be considered as an effort to drive a wedge between Quebec and the rest of Canada now that the two are coming closer together as a united Canada under the Progressive Conservatives.

Mr. Speaker, I do not need to speak for the Quebec members; they are well able to speak for themselves. As a member from a predominantly English speaking province I have been impressed with the way in which we have been able to work with our French speaking colleagues. I believe this holds out the best hope for Canadian unity; one Canada under this Progressive Conservative national government.

The hon. member for Port Arthur says Quebec members have little interest in national problems and are concerned only with Quebec matters. I do not agree with this view. I have found Quebec members very interested in our prairie problems and anxious to help us do something about them on a truly national level. I cannot speak too strongly against the regrettable statements of the hon. member for Port Arthur. He may speak for his group of eight members in this house, but I am sure he does not speak for the members of our party, nor does he speak in the interests of Canadian unity.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I may not have agreed with everything my hon. friend who has just taken his seat has said, but I certainly do agree with him in his last remarks. In this debate we are dealing primarily with the economic health of the nation, and we are talking about facts and figures which bear on that particular subject. However, in his last words the hon. member has made us aware of the fact there can be no prosperity, no stability, no economic progress or progress of any kind in this country unless we have national unity, something which I should like to think every member of this house, without exception, is interested in strengthening.

Mr. Herridge: You are quite right in that assumption.

[Mr. Pascoe.]

Mr. Pearson: My hon. friend will forgive me if I do not follow him in his very interesting discussion on how to eat wheat and grow slim and healthy. But like him I will be, in my contribution to this debate, using some facts and figures which have already been used and, like him, I make no apology for doing so because of the importance of the situation which these facts and figures portray.

On March 31, in his third budget the Minister of Finance, after previous budgetary deficits totalling more than a billion dollars and cash deficits totalling $2,300 million, announced that he was budgeting this year for a surplus of $12 million on an expenditure of $6,330 million. There remained, however, an estimated cash deficit for the current year of $210 million. This, Mr. Speaker, is in contrast to the experience of his predecessor who after three cash surpluses in a row and out of expenditures of $5,072 million had, in his last budget in 1957, a budgetary surplus of $258 million and a cash surplus of $424 million.

When we pointed out this contrast in the budget debate last year and expressed some anxiety about what these contrasting figures represented in terms of economic development in our country, we were accused by the minister and other members of the government and the government party of indulging in gloom. But the predictions made on this side in the budget debate last year as to what was likely to happen in the ensuing 12 months have been borne out by events. I remember saying, as recorded on page 2913 of last year's Hansard, in reference to the prediction made by my hon. friend:

> I suggest his prediction of a 7 per cent increase—

He added, when he made the prediction, "with stable prices".

> —may well be too optimistic, and that if the hon. gentleman is wrong in this calculation the effect on employment opportunities in 1959 and 1960 in this country will be very bad indeed.

What are the facts? Well, the gross national product increased in volume by 3.5 per cent.

In so far as employment is concerned I said, as recorded on page 2914 of Hansard for last year:

> If only a 4 to 5 per cent increase in the volume of the gross national product is achieved . . . that would mean that during the current year we would have, on the average, more than 300,000 people unemployed in this country which would be the second highest level in the post-war period.

What are the facts? The average number of unemployed during 1959 was 350,000, 50,000 more than the prediction I made which was considered to be too pessimistic.

In so far as inflation is concerned, I said I believed prices would rise in the current year. The dominion bureau of statistics reports an increase of 2.3 per cent in final prices in 1959 as compared to a rise of 2.2 per cent in 1958. So, Mr. Speaker, predictions of that kind which were made last year, and which were criticized as being too pessimistic, have in some respects turned out to be not pessimistic enough in the light of events.

On March 31, 12 long days ago, we had from the minister the forecast of things to come in his budget speech this year. It was, of course, the minister's night, and I should like to congratulate him on his presentation. He made a fine appearance, and it was a fine presentation. There is, of course, as much difference—I know the minister will agree—between appearance and achievement as there is between a beauty queen parading in a bathing suit and swimming the English channel. Now the minister is in the swim, in the waters between Scylla and Charybdis, that is in the cold waters between Coyne and Churchill, pulled and pushed by opposing currents. On this occasion, however, on March 31, I think he was more Churchillian than he had been on previous occasions.

There have been some noticeable differences between the statements of the two ministers in the past few months on economic and financial matters, and on the nature and seriousness of our economic problems. There have been not only differences but there have been contradictions, and those contradictions on a few points have extended even to the facts. An example of this is to be found—this is only one example—by comparing a sentence from the minister's speech on March 31 and one from a speech made by his colleague on the same general subject on March 21. The minister is reported in Hansard, page 2672, as saying:

> Since 1950 . . . the rate of increase in our net foreign indebtedness has exceeded the growth in national output.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce, as reported in Hansard, page 2281, on March 21, 1960 said that the rate of economic expansion had surpassed the rate of increase in Canadian foreign indebtedness. Well, which minister is right? You pay your taxes and you take your choice.

The difference between the minister, as he spoke on March 31, and the views of the governor of the Bank of Canada is somewhat more surprising because of the statement the minister had previously made, which seemed to harmonize with statements the governor of the Bank of Canada had been making. The governor of the bank said a few months ago in Winnipeg as follows, and I quote from his speech on that occasion:

> Canadian savings and the machinery of the Canadian capital market can now supply all the capital funds needed by government and business combined to carry on a capital expenditure program as large in total as is sound and healthy for the Canadian economy to sustain in any one year.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce, of course, has not agreed with that statement, and has insisted in more than one statement that United States capital, in present circumstances, is necessary and desirable. The Minister of Finance himself on March 31 was not so much worried about this matter. He said, and I quote from Hansard at page 2674:

> The economic expansion which Canada is now experiencing is soundly based.

He would go no further in caution on that occasion than this, and I quote from the same speech:

> I do not anticipate that if we manage our affairs prudently and properly—

And what a government escape hatch that is.

> —Canada will indefinitely continue to rely on capital from abroad as heavily as in the last few years.

That statement may be found at page 2672 of Hansard. There is quite a gap between the view of the governor of the Bank of Canada and the minister on that score. What a contrast between the attitude taken by the minister on this occasion and the Conservative election manifesto of 1957, which had this to say on this point:

> In 1956 Canada achieved a frightening and perilous adverse balance of trade with the U.S. of $1.2 billions.

I would call the attention of hon. members to that expression "balance of trade". That is an expression which, when I used it in a debate some time ago in this house, was contradicted by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who said it was inaccurate and wrong. But on this Tory occasion it refers to trade both tangible and intangible. At that time in 1956 it was supposed to be frightening when the adverse balance of trade was $1.2 billion—"frightening and perilous" were the words used—but now when the figures are much higher they apparently no longer frighten hon. gentlemen opposite. The minister stated as follows:

> We can look forward to another year . . . of balanced growth.

That statement is to be found at page 2669 of Hansard. What a contrast that is not only to the election manifestos but to the minister's own speech of June 17, 1958, when our total deficits were much less than they are now but when he said, and I quote from a speech made in this house as reported at page 1237 of Hansard of that year:

—carry serious implications for the future health and economic independence of our country.

In the same speech the minister added:

The chronic nature of our massive trade imbalance with the U.S. requires . . . energetic corrective measures.

That was at a time when the imbalance was not as serious as it is now. I ask whether this budget shows that we have or are getting these energetic corrective measures. That is our chief complaint or our major criticism against this budget. However, the minister tempered his optimism somewhat a week ago Thursday evening by this statement, which I quote from his speech. He said:

But, as my colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, says: "We must not be complacent".

In singling out the Minister of Trade and Commerce as an exemplar of cautious realism, the minister has proved at least one thing, namely that he has a sense of humour, something about which there has apparently been some doubt in the past.

As I have already tried to point out in previous discussions of this matter, not only the amount but the nature of our unfavourable balance must cause anxiety. Last week in his budget speech the Minister of Finance said this:

What is important is that a substantial portion of these resources—

That is investments from abroad.

—should be put into new capital investment rather than into consumption and that this new investment should be of a character that will promote the efficiency and productivity of our country.

Then he added:

Broadly speaking I believe that this objective is being attained.

The facts show, Mr. Speaker, that it is not being attained nearly to the extent that it was being attained a few years back. Indeed, the facts show that the trend in the last year or two has been in the opposite direction.

Having delivered himself of some cheerful but, as we think, unrealistic predictions, the minister found that some of the figures he used in his own speech and some of the figures in the budget papers rather spoiled the effect of those predictions; because they showed—and I am going to mention only one or two of them—that in 1960-61 not only would Canadians pay nearly $600 million more in taxes than in 1959, but that in spite of these payments we would have a fourth consecutive cash deficit of about $210 million.

As a consequence of this, the minister said he was not announcing but was looking forward to the day—and I quote from him——when we can undertake a measure of orderly reduction in our public debt.

That statement is to be found at page 2682 of Hansard. That was something we on this side of the house, when we were on the other side, could look backward to and not merely forward to. A budgetary surplus is, of course, a good thing, even a little one, provided it is achieved in the right way, through the right policies and of course not at the expense of even more important things than balancing the budget. In order to bring about his baby budgetary surplus the minister delayed action on any increases in civil service and armed forces salaries and then reduced such increases, when they were made, to a minimum. Further adjustments—and they undoubtedly will and should be made—will convert the present small budgetary surplus into a deficit. Indeed, other supplementary estimates may have that effect on the minister's already shakily balanced budget. How shakily it is balanced I shall hope to show by referring to some parts of the minister's statement itself and to the accompanying budgetary white paper.

The general situation, says the minister, is one of "balanced growth". But is it? The gross national product increased 3.5 per cent in volume in 1959. That is the first real increase since 1956, and of course it is welcome. But it is below the post-war average, and it is about one half what the minister himself estimated.

Mr. Pallett: Oh, no.

Mr. Pearson: It is about one half the minister's own figure of what he estimated.

Mr. Pallett: No; that is Martin figures you are using.

Mr. Pearson: That is the figure which is taken from the national accounts, income and expenditure. If my hon. friend who is sceptical about the matter will look at page 7, percentage changes in value, volume and price, he will see that the gross national expenditure volume in 1958 is up 3.5 per cent. Now, Mr. Speaker, a figure so far below the forecast for 1959-60 is surely not a very impressive basis for optimism based on predictions of a 6 per cent increase for 1960-61. If the minister is as far out this year as he was last year, the surplus will very quickly be converted into a deficit.

The minister gave us a good deal of advice in his speech. His policy to deal with any danger that might be ahead, particularly the danger of inflation on which he quite rightly spent some time and made some warning statements, is to advise us to work and save. That is good advice, but it is not as impressive as it might be coming from a government which in about four years will have produced four cash deficits amounting to $2.5 billion and which, contrary to all its promises, has upped expenditures from $5,218 million in 1956-57 to $6,470 million in 1960-61.

This exhortation to work and save also comes from a government that has failed to do anything effective to prevent mass unemployment. We had the latest figures this afternoon which illustrate what we mean by mass unemployment at the end of March. The figure for unplaced applicants was 835,000, 53,400 more than at this time last year.

Mr. Speaker, those without work cannot save, as has already been pointed out in this debate. But the minister's treatment of this problem in his budget speech was pretty casual, and I will quote the passage in his speech dealing with it. He said, as reported at page 2670 of Hansard:

> —as the result of an unusual increase in the number of persons estimated to be in the labour force, the estimate of the numbers without jobs and seeking work was 18,000 higher than a year ago.

It is more than that now. The minister then went on:

> I am confident, however, that employment will rise as the coming of spring opens up new job opportunities and as the economy continues its upward trend.

This might be called the meteorological approach to the problem of unemployment. It will go with the snow. I wish it were true, but the facts do not seem to bear out the prediction the minister has made. His assertion that the higher unemployment which he talked about was due to an unusual increase in the labour force is a misrepresentation of the facts. The increase in the labour force in 1960 was not unusually high. The increase in the labour force in 1959 was unusually low, and if the minister will take a look at page 26 of his budget papers he will find statistics there to show this. Mr. Speaker, the fact is, as we have pointed out from this side of the house time after time, that seasonal unemployment is not only unusually high but has now become a chronic and serious problem about which something must be done.

Mr. Pallett: What would the Liberal party do about it?

Mr. Pearson: When the Liberal party was in power there was never this kind of unemployment, but I will come to that later. We had our recessions in the period after 1945, and I will be very glad to show my hon. friend later in my speech how we dealt with the kind of recession and unemployment we had then, which was not nearly as high as it is now. Mr. Speaker, you would never realize this problem is as serious as it is from the minister's speech. "The coming of spring" is the only hopeful sign he can bring forward.

What about agriculture, about which the hon. member who preceded me had a good deal to say in his speech? I think I am right in saying that it is completely omitted from the minister's economic picture. The gross national product last year is up in value by 6 per cent. The net farm income, as has been pointed out more than once in this house, is down by 7 per cent. The estimated increase in the gross national product in the current year is another 6 per cent. The estimate for agriculture is another decline, I think of 7 per cent. That surely does not represent a balanced growth in a vital sector of our national economy. But there is not a word about this problem in the minister's statement.

Mr. Speaker, what about the Atlantic provinces? Is there balanced growth down there? We did not get a progress report from the minister in his budget statement on the realization of the Atlantic charter. And we know why. Since the 1958 election it would be difficult for the minister to point to anything that has been done for the Atlantic provinces except the establishment of royal commissions. It would be difficult for the minister to prove that economic conditions are not deteriorating in the Atlantic provinces at this time, especially in the coal industry, where I think the situation will be admitted by just observers to be about the worst in 50 years.

I know the minister was down in the Atlantic provinces not long ago. I was there a week after he was, in Halifax. The minister mentioned 21 things which had been done by this government for the Atlantic provinces, 18 of which had been initiated by the previous government. He included the construction of the Canso causeway. I am sure the 100 pipers who filed by Angus Macdonald on that great day were not participating in the realization of a Conservative vision.

That is perhaps one reason why the minister was silent about the situation in the Atlantic provinces. Of course he did say there would be a reduction of the sales tax on electrical heating equipment to permit—and I quote—"this method of household heating to compete for the market on the same terms as other methods of heating". That may be a very desirable thing to do, but it is no help to the coal industry in the Atlantic provinces except perhaps to help them to live better electrically. Yet we are told that balanced growth has characterized the progress of the last year, and that our economic growth is soundly based.

Mr. Speaker, let me examine this policy in respect of the balance of payments situation and the premium on our dollar. I have already touched upon the minister's dilemma in this matter as illustrated by his own speeches, on some occasions as an economist and on other occasions as a politician. In these speeches, especially the one on budget night, he seems to me to be, as I have suggested, balanced uneasily between the warnings of Mr. Coyne and the hosannahs of Mr. Churchill, with one eye on the red light of the governor and the other on the green light of the minister. In a friendly way I would warn him that it will be difficult to maintain this ambiguous posture. It will require all the political and economic gymnastic ability of the Minister of Finance.

One aspect of this imbalance which has political as well as economic significance is the problem of foreign ownership and control, of course primarily by the United States. The passionate anxiety of the minister and his colleagues of other days has dwindled to the modest preoccupation with this particular subject shown in the budget speech. He indicated that no legislative or governmental action was required, that no special steps were necessary to encourage Canadian as opposed to foreign control. He suggested that we might leave it all to the Prime Minister's (Mr. Diefenbaker) great gift of persuasion, that gift of bedazzlement which at times deteriorates into a genius for befuddlement.

An Indian delegation visited the Prime Minister not so many weeks ago, and I think this was referred to by my friend the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson). A member of the delegation is reported to have said with reference to the Prime Minister: "He is a great talker. He can almost make you forget what you came here for."

So the minister forgets his worries about swollen deficits and foreign control and assures us that our growing foreign-held debt can easily be borne. He does that, as some of his colleagues have also done, by making what can only be described as a phony relationship between the foreign-held debt and our gross national product, as if the latter—the gross national product—represented any adequate measure of our ability to pay our debt in foreign currency.

The minister is not too worried. I quote again from his speech at page 2674 of Hansard:

> So long as our access to foreign markets is unimpaired and we are able to keep the cost and the quality of our products and services thoroughly competitive, we need have no fears for the future.

But there are others who are more worried than the minister and they are not all members of the Liberal opposition. Indeed, they included the minister himself on earlier occasions and they certainly include the governor of the Bank of Canada. There are people in this country who are worried about our increasing total trade imbalance, our increasing foreign-held debt and the high external price of our dollar which is a special problem especially in connection with export trade which must increase if we are to go ahead.

The minister expressed the other night the thought that the premium on our dollar could be reduced without the necessity of any form of governmental action even though I suggested governmental action—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, is the hon. gentleman saying that I said that?

Mr. Pearson: Yes. I am saying that the minister said he hoped this situation could correct itself without any form of governmental control.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Well, that is different.

Mr. Pearson: But the minister did not suggest any governmental action that might be taken to correct it, either.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We took it.

Mr. Pearson: The minister made no suggestion for any kind of governmental action to correct the situation. He did say it should not be done by any form of governmental control but I suggest to the minister that governmental action is largely responsible for this particular situation and I will try to explain how.

Our money supply, as the minister knows, has been stable since October, 1958. Out of this constant supply the government borrowed in 1959, $871 million or 52 per cent of all the bonds marketed in that year. That governmental demand, of course, was a major factor in creating a scarcity of funds for others, in pushing interest rates up so high and in bringing about tight money. The result of that was that the provinces and municipalities had to borrow their money in the United States market. In 1959 the net amount so borrowed was $400 million which is a record. It represents 27 per cent of our net import of foreign capital that year. That itself is a major cause of our dollar premium and for that the federal government must accept much of the responsibility.

What about the situation in the current year in regard to borrowing? Of course, it should be much easier for the provinces and municipalities. They have no desire to go to the United States money market to satisfy their financial needs. If they can get their money in Canada at reasonable rates it is not necessary to urge or compel them to do that. All that is required is to leave them some room in the Canadian market, to stop hogging it and to stop pushing interest rates up. I suggest that that would be a very simple way of reducing the premium on our dollar without recourse to controls which, I quite agree with the minister, should be put into effect only in an emergency and as a last resort; that is, a complete system of government exchange control.

I certainly do not advocate that in the present circumstances. The borrowing requirements for 1960-61 represent for the federal government—they come from a cash deficit—about $210 million but of course they may be more. Even if they do not increase they represent a substantial but I agree it is well below last year's figure which was approximately $900 million. That should be all to the good in regard to financing in Canada but I should like to call the minister's attention—and perhaps it is not needed—to a new factor which is arising and which will hinder this development and which is in its turn, if I may use the expression, a hangover from that conversion loan about which the minister and the government still boast.

To ensure the success of that loan the Bank of Canada had to buy very substantial amounts of the outstanding bonds which it converted into long term conversion bonds. In fact, by the end of October, 1958 the Bank of Canada held more than $1,200 million of all bonds with maturities of 10 years or more compared with $300 million before the conversion loan was undertaken. The bank naturally found itself subsequently in a very illiquid, inflexible position. Its holdings were mainly of bonds not maturing for several years.

The Bank of Canada is apparently at the present time attempting to correct the situation by selling long term conversion bonds to the public and with the proceeds buying treasury bills and other short term securities. That is driving down the treasury bill and the bank rates, already weakening under lessening demand, and is keeping the long term interest rates higher than they otherwise would be. It also means that the bank is now doing what the government did last year, competing with the provinces and municipalities for long term money in Canada.

This policy of the bank if it is continued, along with the necessity for the government to meet its own cash requirements, may well mean that the provinces and municipalities will not find it much easier in 1960 than in 1959 to satisfy their borrowing requirements in Canada and they may be forced once again to go to the United States market thereby keeping up an artificially high premium on our dollar.

Therefore, instead of trotting out the bugbear of controls the minister should have faced up to this problem realistically and responsibly because the government is largely responsible for it. It is one of the problems that should temper the excessive optimism about the situation in the current year.

On what does the minister base this optimism? As I have said, for the coming year the minister forecasts a gross national product increase of 6 per cent. He leaves out the condition that this will occur if it is a year with stable prices. If that 6 per cent is meant to be an increase in volume it will probably turn out to be optimistic. If it is a 6 per cent increase in value, and if the price level moves about the same this year as it did last year, it would means about a 3.5 per cent increase in volume. I would think that might be a reasonable forecast. But, if it turned out to be a reasonable forecast it would mean that for the fourth consecutive year the gross national product increase would be below the post-war average. Is that a reason, then, for booming optimism?

For the year as a whole all the main components are expected to rise: new investment, 4 per cent; total business investment, excluding agriculture and fisheries, about 7 per cent, although in the United States it is 14 per cent; but in constant dollars it will be lower than in 1957, and yet the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) says: "Business confidence is high" and all is well.

One thing is sure, Mr. Speaker. Even on the basis of the minister's own forecast these trends, prospects and estimates are not sufficient ground for hoping for any material improvement on the unemployment front. In 1959 employment rose 2.7 per cent but unemployment was higher than in any postwar year except 1958, and almost equalled that. That situation would have been worse but for the lowest increase in the labour force experienced in recent years, not an unusually high increase, but the lowest increase in the labour force experienced in recent years, an increase of 1.6 per cent as against an average of 4 per cent in 1957. The minister can get these figures from his own budget papers at page 27.

With a normal increase in the labour force this year the average level of unemployment in the current year might well exceed that of 1959, and surely that is a cause for worry and no ground for complacency of any kind.

The minister may say, "Well, the gross national product increase will take care of it". Even on the basis of the minister's own estimates, this well may happen; especially in view of the minister's statement, and I quote from page 2674 of Hansard:

> The rate of increase we have experienced in 1959 should be maintained throughout the year.

I suggest that prophecy is of doubtful validity. I should like to explain why I suggest the minister may be too optimistic in his view of the prospects.

The so-called short business cycle, mainly caused by fluctuations, I suppose, in inventories, has always been quite a regular feature of our economy. If we accept the years immediately after world war II, we are now going through the third of those cycles in the post-war period. During this post-war period we experienced recessions in 1948-49, 1953-54 and 1957-58, each one worse than the one preceding it. We are told by experts—and I think the facts bear it out—that we have been on the upturn since April, 1958. Past experience and certain trends indicate that a fourth post-war cycle may develop again soon. Surely, Mr. Speaker, we should be prepared for it; surely, we should plan against the danger of its recurrence before long.

Economic forecasters themselves agree that we shall have a recession soon, but most of them differ as to its timing. I am quoting now from economists who have certainly no political axe to grind in this matter. The most optimistic outlook for the future was presented by the economic advisers of the Department of Trade and Commerce. Dr. Firestone, in a speech on October 24, 1959, said this, and I quote one paragraph from his speech:

> Looking ahead to the immediate future, we can see a fair rate of increase in economic activity for 1960 and possibly 1961 . . . If anything, the problems that we may be encountering as we go into 1962 may be more difficult to deal with than those we encountered in the post-war period. What I am implying is that the recession we may be facing in 1962 could be more extensive than anything we have yet experienced since the end of world war II, and it may require quite vigorous action to reduce its extent in terms of length of time and the severity of the economic downturn.

That is Dr. Firestone in a speech last October, but since October other expert economic analysts have produced more and more evidence that another recession may begin sooner than expected by Dr. Firestone. In its tax memo on the federal budget outlook published in February, 1960, a document with which I am sure the minister is quite familiar, the Canadian Tax Foundation refers to the possibility of a downturn in the current fiscal year. The same warning is given in the last three business forecasts issued by General Research Associates from Toronto. Here is what these experts had to say in January about general economic conditions that we may expect in 1960, and I quote from their forecast. They say:

> The chances are better than ever that the next business cycle peak will occur in the fourth quarter of 1960 or the first quarter of 1961. The more rapid the intervening buildup—and the more closely it is related to inventory building—the greater is the probability of the earlier downturn.

That was their January bulletin. They followed that up with their March bulletin, when they were a little more precise. They had this to say:

> In general summary, there has been little evidence to suggest that the current prosperity will last much beyond the third quarter of 1960. Such evidence as has appeared in the last two or three months would suggest, if anything, an earlier downtrend.

That is from their March bulletin. Their latest forecast for April, which has just come out, had this to say:

> The contrast produced by the shades of light and dark is typical of the turbulence that occurs just prior to the end of a business upswing.

These expert and objective forecasts do not support the rosy picture which is painted by the minister and the government. Perhaps the trade and commerce "hidden report" would be equally cautious if we were allowed to see it. Perhaps it may have warnings which explain why it has been secreted, although the issues of 1957 and 1958 were made public in dramatic circumstances.

I ask the Minister of Finance, does the government recognize any of those omens, or does it merely intend to bury its head in the sands of self-satisfaction? Does it not realize that the financial position is such that the government will be seriously handicapped in facing any new recession which, according to Dr. Firestone, may be more extensive than any we have experienced since the end of world war II? These problems are not imaginary. To apreciate them we have only to look at the year 1960, not in isolation but in relation to the recent past.

Compare the business cycle through which we are going with the one before, both in regard to changes in the gross national product and in the financial position of the government. For the purpose of making the comparison I should like, if the house agrees, to insert in Hansard at this point two tables taken from official statistics, one giving the actual changes in the volume of the gross national product since 1953, expressed as a percentage of the previous year. The other table is the budgetary and cash position of the Canadian government since the fiscal year ended March, 1954.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member leave to insert these two tables at this point in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Churchill: Are they D.B.S. figures?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, they are from D.B.S. figures.

[Editor's note: The tables referred to above are as follows:]

Table 1. Annual changes in the volume of gross national product since 1953 expressed as a percentage of the previous year.

Year	Percentage Change	Year	Percentage Change
1953	+3.8	1957	—0.3
1954	—1.0	1958	+0.7
1955	+8.6	1959	+3.5
1956	+8.6	1960 (Estimated)	+3.5

Table 2. Budgetary and cash position of the Canadian government since the fiscal year ending March 1954.

In millions of dollars

Year	Budget Surplus or (—) deficit	Cash Surplus or (—) deficit	Year	Budget Surplus or (—) deficit	Cash Surplus or (—) deficit
1954	45	370	1958	— 38	—165
1955	—152	67	1959	—609	—1,273
1956	— 33	125	1960	—406	—900
1957	258	424	1961	12	—210
Total	118	986	Total	—1,041	—2,548

Mr. Pearson: The first table of the two which I have been given permission to put on Hansard shows the percentage change in volume of the gross national product in the last two cycles, that is, since 1953, and the second table gives the changes in the budgetary and over-all financial position of the government during the same two cycles. The first table shows that the percentage change in the volume of gross national product during the four years of the earlier cycle, 1953, 1954, 1955 and 1956, averaged 5 per cent. There was an average increase during the cycle of 5 per cent, but in the cycle 1957-60 the average increase in the volume of gross national product was somewhat less than 2 per cent. Surely, Mr. Speaker, as we face what is certainly likely to be an uncertain future, that comparison is disturbing, an increase of 5 per cent against one of less than 2 per cent. The earlier recession was milder and shorter than the one we have just come through and the recovery from the earlier one was more spectacular. I ask, therefore, is this trend, as Dr. Firestone suggests, to continue, and is the next recession to be longer and more severe?

The second table is also disturbing. It shows that during the cycle from April, 1953 to March, 1957 we had an over-all budgetary surplus of $118 million and a cash surplus of $1 billion. Therefore the government at that time was in a relatively strong financial position to meet the 1957-58 recession. But contrast that with the position in which we find ourselves in the current cycle. Instead of a surplus in this cycle we have had an over-all budgetary deficit of $1 billion and an over-all cash deficit of $2.5 billion. Surely that supports the argument that in facing any danger that may arise we are not as strong financially as we were.

But the government gives no sign of serious concern on that score. Instead, the Minister of Finance lectures us on the need of flexibility in the field of fiscal policy. As found at page 2681 of Hansard, he said:

> —sound tax policies must be flexible and adapted to changing economic conditions.

It is largely because his government did not learn that lesson earlier and in 1957-58 committed us to new, large and long term financial responsibilities that we are today in that inflexible fiscal position which is so worrying and so weakening, that we are committed to high, long term interest rates, that even in a year—perhaps the last year in this cycle—of expansion, we are unable to balance our over-all accounts.

In the minister's speech the other evening he ignored these current problems. In that speech there was no awareness of, let alone any policy for a serious unemployment situation. In contrast to the position when the last recession began, and this is a contrast which should worry him, we have now at the peak of the current business cycle a large, accumulated, hard-core mass of unemployment.

So what will happen if we have to face another and more severe recession or pause, if you like to call it that, when we have a situation which, according to the government, is rosy but which nevertheless includes declining farm income, a growing imbalance in total trade and payments, a high premium on our dollar still persisting, particularly depressed conditions in the Atlantic provinces, unsettled fiscal relations with the provinces and growing dependence in defence and development on the United States of America?

The minister's budget speech and the budget itself ignored these problems. So I ask the minister to tell us, if a recession should recur—

An hon. Member: Wouldn't the Liberals be glad.

Mr. Pearson: —with the government's financial position weaker than at the beginning of the last one—that, of course, was quite an unworthy comment by my hon. friend. When we point out these possibilities which are also being pointed out by men who are not interested in politics at all hon. gentlemen not only accuse us of gloom and doom but of playing politics in doing our duty and indicating what may happen. So I ask the minister, and I make no apology for asking him, if a recession should recur, with the government's financial position weaker than it was at the beginning of the last one and with a continuing high level of unemployment, what are the government's plans and its policies to meet that contingency in a way which will recognize its responsibilities to maintain full employment and financial stability?

Will the government once again fall back on a series of huge, unplanned deficits which add new rigidities to our economic and fiscal structure, higher interest rates, without creating anything like full employment? That has been our experience in the last few years. Will the government once again rely on solemn sermons and emotional appeals, while getting the Bank of Canada to bail it out through another round of rapid credit expansion and monetary inflation?

If the minister cannot answer these questions, what right has he to claim, as he did in his budget speech, that he is "fully aware of the role of leadership that falls to the federal government"? If the government is really aware of its role of leadership, why are we not getting it instead of expedients designed to paper over the cracks or, to cite an analogy a little more topical in Ottawa at this time, to fill up the potholes? Surely there is no leadership in waiting for something to turn up, which this budget does; or the philosophy that we will jump off that bridge when we come to it. I quote from an editorial in the Hamilton Spectator of April 6, a newspaper that is not notoriously friendly to the Liberal party:

> Mr. Fleming may be accused of lacking leadership. In a sense he has stepped to the sidelines and left us to look after our salvation with a mild word of advice.

[Mr. Pearson.]

There is no leadership in merely telling Canadians to manage their own affairs better, to show self-restraint and caution, to work and save. As the Globe and Mail, another newspaper not notoriously friendly to this party, put it on April 4:

> We wish Mr. Fleming would manage his own affairs as prudently as he exhorts the Canadian people to manage theirs.

In default of plans and policies of their own to deal with these matters the government look at us and implore, what would you do? In the first place we would have put into effect three years ago fiscal policies which would have prevented many of the difficulties in which we find ourselves now, those Liberal fiscal and financial policies which met previous recessions successfully. They have been put forward more than once and proof of their effectiveness is found in the history of Canada from 1940 to 1957. One reason we are now facing the difficult problems which we are facing in this field today is that this kind of financial policy was not followed.

I have tried to state what the difficulties are, even if the minister has not. To face them frankly, to be aware of them, is the first and indispensable step in their solution. Hon. members are continually saying, what would you do? On several occasions in this session we have said what we would do about unemployment; we have said what we would do about agricultural conditions, support prices for eggs, hogs instead of deficiency payments; we have said what we would do in trying to stimulate our export trade. When we have made these proposals we have raised them in concrete form. What does the government do? It ignores them completely. When we try to raise these problems in the field of defence, where we are spending $1,500 million which would be a great help in meeting some of these financial problems, what does the government do? It refuses to even give us the right to discuss these problems effectively. Then they continue to say, what would you do? When we tell them what we would do, they ignore our suggestions or refuse us the right to even discuss them.

There is one more point I want to emphasize before I conclude. In defence, and in every other form of governmental activity, every single dollar of unnecessary expense must be eliminated. This, however, does not mean, as we see it on this side, that for desirable social purposes, such as the restoration and development of depressed areas, the government should hesitate to spend the money which is required where private enterprise cannot do the job alone or at all.

Furthermore, in a general economic emergency, not the kind of recession we have had since world war II, but in a general economic emergency which I hope we will not have, the kind of emergency we had in the 30's, with massive unemployment even worse than we have today, no government should be afraid of a deficit, provided that deficit is planned and designed to achieve the social and economic purposes in mind and is not one accumulated through the implementation of un-co-ordinated political commitments, as were the deficits of my hon. friend in the last two years. There should also be the proviso that it be made clear, in any proposal that is made, that all expenditures can only come, either immediately or ultimately, from the pockets of the taxpayers. There is no other way. It is important to balance our national budget. It may be important, in certain circumstances to budget for a surplus. But there is an objective of government more important even than these, to keep free people working and a stable country expanding. Good social purposes should not be subordinated even to fiscal policies. The two must go hand in hand, each one supporting the other. This requires wisdom, imagination and courage on the part of governments at all levels. It requires hard work and common sense on the part of the citizens. This is a combination, Mr. Speaker, that should underlie Canada's development in the years ahead and can ensure, in so far as national policy can ensure, a good future for our country.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I welcome more than I can adequately say the opportunity of following immediately after the speech by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) this afternoon. Before I address myself to replying to some of his observations, may I turn back to these seven days that the budget debate has progressed and express to many hon. members who have spoken in the course of this debate my very deep sense of gratitude for the most kind things that they have said about the budget and the effort that was devoted to it. These things mean a great deal to me, and I do wish to convey my sense of appreciation of them.

The debate has, by this time, come to be impressed with several features. In this respect I think probably we have had less contributed to the features of this debate by the opposition than is usual in this annual debate. It is evident, I think, that the dominant note throughout this debate has been a positive and constructive note struck by those hon. members supporting the government who have seen fit to speak of the budget and the fundamental objects in the Canadian economy which this budget is designed to serve. But if there has been a contribution to this debate by hon. members of the official opposition I say, Mr. Speaker, that it has been distinguished by two features. The first is that the opposition has no alternative and no policy to offer to the Canadian people. The second is that they are lost in gloom of their own creation.

Let me enlarge on these two points. We have been waiting patiently during these seven days of debate for some indication, at least some outline, of what hon. members opposite say ought to be done in these circumstances by a budget that this budget does not do, or what a budget ought not to do that this budget has done. We have waited, even to the last minute of the speech by the Leader of the Opposition, for some statement of the policy of the Liberal party and what they say they would do under those circumstances were they transferred to this side of the house. We have been waiting, and we have not heard.

A glorious opportunity was given to the financial critic of the opposition, not only when he spoke to the house a week ago yesterday, and it was a great opportunity that was given then, but also on a certain television program in which that distinguished hon. gentleman participated during the same week. If I may attempt to summarize the course of the press interview on the television program, it came down to this: Time and again those who participated in the questioning urged, asked, begged, the hon. gentleman to answer this question, what would you do under these circumtances? Two things emerged crystal clear from the replies of that hon. gentleman. Oh, how constructive were those replies, Mr. Speaker. He said in the first place,—and I tell you this is a constructive answer—"We would consult the experts".

Mr. Pickersgill: It might have been a good idea if you had done so.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is rather hard on Professor Lamontagne. The financial critic certainly down-graded the Liberal professorial brain trust. But he did not stop there. Oh, no; he had a second answer, firm, courageous and constructive. This is what he said. When pressed again with this question "What would you do?" his answer was, "We would do something". That is the content of the whole press interview as to what he would have done or what his party would have done under these circumstances.

We have now heard the Leader of the Opposition. He has had the benefit of another week to think over this problem. He has had the opportunity of many more days in which to consult such experts as he sees fit to consult. He has had the benefit of some well-meant admonitions from many of the organs of the Liberal press in this country. What does he come up with?

It was in his final paragraph that he reached the great peroration in his remarks this afternoon. Oh, how thrilled we were. He was going to answer this question. We waited. We moved to the edge of our seats. We pricked up our ears. We became tense. Excitement rose, I am sure, in every bosom. Our hearts began to beat faster. At last we were going to be let in on the great Liberal secret and be told what they would do in these circumstances. Then out came the answer. How profound it was and right to the point. How forthright it was. There was no beating about the bush. Here is what he said. He said, "We would have put into effect Liberal fiscal policies three years ago".

Then he was asked from various parts of the house what those policies were. He did not have an answer and we are still waiting to hear it. We know just as much about what those policies are as we did before the hon. gentleman came to the beginning of his peroration or indeed before he began to speak this afternoon. He is still going on talking. It is the same old Liberal tactic. He talks about Liberal fiscal policies but he does not come down to earth and tell anybody what they are.

Then when he was pressed again by hon. gentlemen on this side of the house who said, "Tell us what are these policies", the best that anybody could get out of him was this; and I remind the house that he had unlimited time in which to speak today. He was not the least bit hurried. He had ample time in which to answer that question. He said, "We have said what we would have done". Does anybody remember his having said anything that they would have done under these circumstances? One can only conclude—and I am sure that this is a conclusion that only those among us most charitably disposed toward the Leader of the Opposition would reach under these circumstances—that what he is saying is that the policies they would have put into effect are those Liberal fiscal policies which led this country into the recession of 1957-58 and which the people of this country rejected in 1957 and again in 1958 at the polls in the most decisive manner.

I said there was a second feature contributed to this debate by the Liberal participants in it. It was indeed the contribution of gloom. To those who believe in the two-party system I must say in deep earnestness that it fills some of us with deep concern to see the Liberal party wallowing in gloom concerning Canada. Perhaps it is not unnatural for them, on looking at their particular situation, to be afflicted with feelings of despondency. But why do they have to go further and try to transfer that gloom to Canada? In any event, I believe their efforts are not being crowned with success. Indeed, they are being crowned, on the part of the Canadian people, with the displeasure and disapproval which those tactics on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite so abundantly deserve. All their chagrin and all their disappointment at the failure of their gloomy predictions will be no justification in the minds of the Canadian people for their efforts to pour gloom and pessimism over the Canadian scene.

Indeed, hon. gentlemen opposite have not been satisfied with the facts. The facts are not in accord with the kind of conclusion they want people to draw and so they must put a gloss on the facts. We have witnessed some extraordinary things in this debate. It evidently matters not in their calculations whether what they say does harm to Canada as long as it serves the partisan interests of the Liberal party. I suppose this procedure makes no great impression in this house. We have heard them previously. We have seen them indulging in these tactics which have become chronic on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite since they went into opposition. I suppose there are not too many Canadians who do not see through this political game. But I believe that these statements do Canada's name harm outside of Canada.

I had occasion last summer when in London to be confronted with a number of articles concerning Canada in some of the economic journals in the United Kingdom. They were dismal in their reading of the trends of the Canadian economy. Where did those impressions arise? They certainly did not arise from the facts for at that very time Canadians were earning more than ever before, saving more than ever before, spending more than ever before and more were employed than ever before. One could point to a host of other facts. These facts had not registered there but the gloom had made some impression. If that had any relationship with facts in this country I can trace it to one source and one source only and that is to the kind of statements that have come from the Leader of the Opposition and his followers.

But the matter did not stop there. It has just gone on in the same way. In recent days they have endeavoured to quote back to us—and the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) did so a week ago yesterday—some of the articles in newspapers in the United Kingdom based not on the facts but on the kind of statements that have emanated from hon. members opposite. I think the situation has reached the point where hon. members opposite owe it to themselves as well as to the country and to the two-party system to examine themselves and to examine the tone and the trend of their remarks. I tell you that this kind of gloom in which they are indulging is not the kind of thing that is going to enable the Liberal part to fulfil its function and the future it thought it had in the two-party system.

I am speaking in this debate, Mr. Speaker, as one who is a firm believer in the two-party system and does not wish to see the Liberal party dig its own grave in dismal gloom. This has reached the stage of irresponsibility. Remember it is not so very long ago, just a year ago in the budget debate, when the Leader of the Opposition, as reported on page 2912 of Hansard for April 21, 1959, was saying:

I tell him—

That is the Minister of Finance.

—and the government that the word of Canada does not mean as much now as it did.

He was not satisfied to say that things were not going right; he was impugning the honour of this country in saying that Canada's word was not as good as it used to be. There seems to be—

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, this has been brought up before. If the minister wishes to be fair he will explain that when I made that statement it was with regard to a repudiation of a contract made by an agent of the government of Canada for the purchase of pictures for the national gallery. Perhaps the minister will explain that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, it is quite true that the hon. gentleman went on to cite as evidence the contract to which he now refers. But he did not, as he is trying to pretend now, content himself with that. After making this bold, brazen charge I have just read, he went on to say, "I can get lots of evidence to support that statement". Then he went on to choose one example, namely these R.C.M.P. contracts. He referred to "lots of evidence". I can understand why—

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister permit a question?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I can understand why the Leader of the Opposition—

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No. I can understand why the Leader of the Opposition is so—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The minister will not accept a question so the hon. member should resume his seat.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sorry, I could not hear his answer.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the tactics of the hon. gentleman in selecting what they want to hear and what they do not want to hear is a fine example of the "pick and choose company".

Mr. Pickersgill: I was just going to ask about repudiating the constitution.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) has just said something which makes it evident he is seeking to support the statement made by the Leader of the Opposition which I have just quoted from Hansard. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I am—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): He is supporting the bold, brazen charge impugning the honour of Canada.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am rising on a question of privilege. I am seeking to support it, and I am seeking to support it because this government repudiated the good name of Canada in its constitution.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is taking liberties with his question of privilege. What he says is purely a matter for debate.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, no one knows better than the hon. gentleman that that was no ground for intervention. Anyway, we have him lined up—I think it is interesting to see this—in support of a statement made by the Leader of the Opposition which it is evident the Leader of the Opposition now wishes he had never made and which he now wishes to back away from—

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: —on a question of privilege, I am not trying to back away from the statement. I stand by my statement, and there was a breach of the word of Canada in three respects which I mentioned at the time. Now, carry on with your budget.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, it is quite clear the Leader of the Opposition cannot suppress the statement that is so clearly on record and which will be there never to reflect creditably upon him as long as he continues to support it and as long as his loquacious supporter to his left, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, undertakes to support it as well.

Mr. Pickersgill: Any time you want to debate term 29 I am ready.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is very agitated. I guess there must be something on his mind or his person that is bothering him.

Do not take my word for it. Let us hear what the Toronto Star has to say about the course of the participation of hon. members opposite in this debate. This is what the Toronto Star said on April 7—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The other day Your Honour ruled, when an hon. member on this side of the house sought to quote an editorial reflecting on a debate going on in this house, that it was out of order. I submit that the same rule should be applied to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) as was applied to this side of the house.

Mr. Speaker: That is quite true. If the minister does seek to quote such an editorial it would be proper to call him to order, but so far there has been no indication in which direction the editorial is heading.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I recall that the Leader of the Opposition read quotations this afternoon from various editorials.

Mr. Pearson: Not dealing with the debate.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am talking of the conduct of hon. members opposite. They say that it is all right to read editorials concerning the budget. Mr. Speaker, allow me to make reference to a Liberal source. I am sorry they do not like this kind of Liberal source any more in its references to them and what they lack in the way of policy. That, I think, is well within the rules of the house. If there is any doubt about it, then I say at once that I adopt the sentiments expressed in this very interesting piece of writing as my own. The heading is: "Liberals Keep 'Em Yawning", and it states:

> The Liberal party had better get some policies or else stop holding press conferences.
>
> This conclusion was forced on us by watching three parliamentary correspondents diligently but vainly trying to extract some clear answers from William Benidickson, Liberal financial critic on the C.B.C.'s televised "Press Conference" Tuesday night.
>
> In the Commons, Mr. Benidickson had called Hon. Donald Fleming's budget a "do-nothing" budget. Then what, asked the correspondents, would Mr. Benidickson have done in Mr. Fleming's place?
> If he knew, Mr. Benidickson wasn't telling. He was true to the Liberal high command's policy of no-policy, of criticizing the government's action without offering alternatives. This is producing some of the most barren press conferences on record.
>
> Would the Liberals raise taxes? No. Would they cut taxes? Well... perhaps some taxes on production.
>
> Mr. Benidickson replied to some topical questions by recalling bold, wise moves the Liberals had taken in comparable circumstances when they were in power. For example, their emergency import restrictions to conserve American dollars in 1947.
>
> We have news for Mr. Benidickson and the Liberal strategists: The voters don't care a hoot what the Liberals did in 1947. They just might be interested in Liberal remedies for the country's ills in 1960.
>
> Mr. Benidickson viewed unemployment with justifiable concern. But he didn't say what the Fleming budget should have done about it.
>
> Like other Liberal spokesmen, Mr. Benidickson offered two excuses for his unresponsiveness:
> (1) The duty of the opposition is to criticize, not originate policies; (2) The opposition, being out of power, lacks access to the facts on which to base policies.
>
> These excuses won't wash. It's true that the main job of the opposition, in parliament, is to expose government errors and omissions. But when a politician calls a press conference, or accepts an invitation to one, people expect some information, some constructive opinions. Fence-sitting and round-about evasions make dull copy and dull T.V.
>
> As for the excuse of lacking access to the facts, this might justify—but only in part—the Liberals' uncertainty on defence policy. The government does reserve important information in this field. In the others, plenty is known.
>
> Unless the Liberals have some ideas and the courage to state them, they had better stay off television, for the sake of the party, as well as the viewers.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the minister permit a question now?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If you will not call it five o'clock for a moment, Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to answer.

Mr. Speaker: Order, it is five o'clock.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Perhaps I could take it this evening when we resume again.

Mr. Speaker: There will be another opportunity.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock, the house will now proceed to the consideration of private and public bills, the former having precedence pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15.

Mr. Peters: With the unanimous consent of the house we are prepared to waive the private members' hour.

Mr. Pickersgill: We in the Liberal party are perfectly agreeable to that.

Mr. Morton: We who are sponsoring bills on behalf of certain companies are anxious to have them dealt with and despite the fact that the C.C.F. may be tired of discussing divorce bills we feel we should deal with these bills. We will agree to deal with them as expeditiously as possible and after those bills are dealt with we could revert to government business.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, in the exceptional circumstances I think the hon. gentleman's proposition is a very reasonable one and if the C.C.F. would agree to it we would be prepared to accept his proposal.

Mr. Howard: That is agreeable.

Mr. Speaker: If I understand the unanimous order that the house is prepared to make it is that we will proceed with private bills other than divorce bills and when they have been dealt with we will return to the debate. Does the house give unanimous consent to this proposal?

Mr. McCleave: No, I cannot agree to that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock, as I have already intimated, the house will now proceed to the consideration of private and public bills. Obviously there is not unanimous consent.

PRIVATE BILLS

HELEN ELISABETH MILLAR RAMSHAW

The house in committee on Bill No. SD-37, for the relief of Helen Elisabeth Millar Ramshaw—Mr. McCleave—Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. McCleave: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, is it not the usual courtesy to give the sponsor of the bill the first word?

The Deputy Chairman: The Chair has already recognized the hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Howard: I am prepared to waive that recognition if the hon. member for Halifax wishes to comment first.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I was simply going to say that this is a case of a 25-year old woman looking after two children ages 2½ years and 14 months, with an income of between $250 to $300 a month. The husband is a poet and is incapable of providing any assistance. It is a very worthy case, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Howard: I thank the hon. member for his concise assessment of the facts. Because the hon. member made reference to the evidence given before the Senate committee and because there is doubt that we can consider that evidence I would at this stage ask that the committee give unanimous consent to allowing a discussion on the evidence given before the divorce committee of the Senate which will permit expansion of the comments made by the hon. member for Halifax. May we have that understanding?

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry but the committee is bound by standing order 59 (2) reads as follows:

> 59 (2) Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, on the point of order we feel that the rules should be very rigidly adhered to.

Mr. Howard: Only when it suits your purpose, I gather.

Mr. Pickersgill: Exactly.

Mr. Howard: I appreciate the rule, Mr. Chairman, and the fact that the hon. member for Halifax contravened it in mentioning the children. I do not mean that in a derogatory sense but it indicates that the hon. gentleman shares our concern that there are more people involved than the petitioner and respondent.

It is my understanding that the committee cannot suspend the standing orders by unanimous consent. I think we have a right to make requests for special considerations. Taking that approach we might obtain authority from the house with Mr. Speaker in the chair to suspend the standing order and permit the committee to consider the evidence submitted to the divorce committee of the other place in order that all relevant facts may be properly dealt with in considering this case.

To do this I feel we must indicate orally the desire of having the Speaker take the chair and move a motion to that effect. The motion would be that the committee rise at this stage for a moment or two to ascertain if the house would by unanimous consent suspend the standing order and give the committee an opportunity to discuss the evidence given before the divorce committee in this case. I therefore move:

> That the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again later this day.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, may I say—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The motion is not debatable.

Motion negatived: Yeas, 3; nays, 49.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the motion lost.

Mr. Winch: Children must be ignored in divorce cases.

Mr. Howard: I do not want to reflect in any way upon the decision of the committee; it is certainly an overwhelming majority which desires not to concern itself with the children and the effects on them. I am not reflecting on the wishes of the committee; I expressed my own feeling by voting as I did, and in my remarks prior to making the motion.

I come now to the petition. I think it is proper for us to make reference to particular items in order to see whether certain things have been proved.

The petition says in paragraph 1:

> That on the 24th day of January, 1957, your petitioner—was lawfully married to the said—in the city of Pointe Claire, district of Montreal, in the province of Quebec.

There is evidence in paragraph No. 4 that the petitioner and the respondent lived and cohabited together. In paragraph No. 5 it is indicated that two children were born of the marriage. To the extent that it is necessary to prove, or to indicate that the marriage was consummated, this is one way in which consummation is proved. Since children were born of the particular marriage, to that extent we are duly bound to take cognizance of the particular material shown in the petition itself, and also of the corroborating evidence given later on.

Paragraph No. 6 of the petition makes reference to a certain matter which by itself does not seem to be in keeping with the orders of the other place relating to divorce, but I expect this is cleared up and permits us to overlook the fact that it does not comply with the standing orders of the other place. Paragraph No. 6 states:

> That in the month of June 1958, your petitioner became suspicious that the said—had previously on divers occasions committed adultery with divers women whose names are unknown to your petitioner.

It is this reference which I submit is not in keeping with the rules of the other place relating to this matter. However, paragraph No. 7 is more specific, and makes reference to adultery having taken place on a particular day with a particular person and at a particular address. I would imagine that this is the reason why the members in the other place overlooked the conflict between this paragraph and the previous paragraph which refers to adultery in a sort of general way. Without discussing it, I am assuming this is the reason they overlooked the conflict with their standing orders.

[The Deputy Chairman.]

In order to prove this particular point, certain questions are asked by the clerk of the committee of the petitioner. The first proof required is that of the marriage having taken place. The petitioner was sworn and the clerk of the committee asked these questions:

> Q. Are you married and, if so, to whom?
> A. Yes, I am married to—.
> Q. When were you married?
> A. January 24, 1957.
> Q. Do you remember by whom?

The name of the clergyman and the name of the church were given. I continue:

> Q. I show you a document. Do you recognize this?
> A. Yes, it is my marriage certificate.
> Q. Are the names and dates correct?
> A. Yes.

There is reference in the petition to the fact that two children were born, and the petitioner gives evidence to this effect, as was indicated by the hon. member for Halifax, and by the questions asked of the petitioner by Mr. Leggat, Q.C., counsel for the petitioner. He makes reference to the children having been born. For instance, on page 9 he asks this question:

> Q. Did you have the baby?
> A. Yes, I had the baby in August of 1957.

At various places throughout the evidence questions are asked as to the children, their ages, and other facts regarding them, to indicate that consummation of the marriage had taken place.

There is also a great deal of reference, as was indicated by the hon. member for Halifax, to how the children were to be looked after, what was the financial position of the petitioner and whether she would be able to care properly and adequately for them. There was reference to her being an ophthalmologist and to the fact that she was living with her mother. She is not working on a full-time basis. She has worked in a number of cities in eastern Canada. The amount of her income was referred to. There was also reference to the fact that her mother is caring for the children while she is away. A baby sitter does come in and does work but the mother is there most of the time.

There is also reference to the fact of the mother raising two small children, which indicates she is not sure whether she will have any difficulty in raising them. On page 12 she says:

> As long as I am able to continue this work.

Senator Taylor questioned her about her present income, and she indicated that if she were sick or had to stop work it might be awkward but she is sure some arrangement could be made. There is extended reference to the children.

I submit that to some extent we should consider the fact that there are children is proof that the marriage has been consummated. We should consider the children to that extent, although we are forbidden by the rules and by a vote of this committee to concern ourselves any further with their welfare.

In this particular case, as the hon. member for Halifax indicated very succinctly and clearly, an extremely strange relationship existed prior to the actual case coming before us with respect to adultery having been proved. There is a great deal of reference about the physical and mental condition of the husband. I think we should concern ourselves with the aspect of mental cruelty which might lead up to adultery having taken place.

The evidence indicates that they lived at a particular address; that she was a student at McGill and he was working at Canadair. I am reading from page 9 of the evidence. The evidence says:

> But he soon left Canadair and he wasn't working at all, he was sitting around writing.
> Q. Writing what?
> A. Poems.
> Q. What happened during the months of February and March, 1957?
> A. Well, I wasn't allowed to see anybody or talk to anybody. He was always arguing with me and swearing at me and calling me names and beating me up and he wouldn't let me out of the house and he wouldn't let my mother see me or come to see me.
> Q. Did he virtually keep you a prisoner in the home?
> A. It was pretty well like that. I suppose I could have skipped lectures but I was a student and he knew what my timetable was and if I didn't come right in on the dot he would beat me up or something. Then I was pretty worried too because I was pregnant and I was afraid that I would lose the child or something like that.

Then there is a question by Senator Isnor and the answer is a reiteration of the date when this occurred. Then Mr. Leggat continued:

> Q. Did he ever actually cause you any bodily harm?
> A. Yes, he did. He hurt me very badly and he made my ear bleed once, I remember. I was always covered with bruises. So I went to Mr. Leggat to see if I could do anything about it, and he said we could try to get a separation.

Then there is some reference to a separation. There is also indication of the respondent's lack of concern for the welfare of his wife and the two young children. There is evidence that would lead one to believe that he has a completely irresponsible attitude which in my submission is a form of mental cruelty. The respondent left at one stage and she did not hear from him for some time. When she did hear from him after the first child was born he was in British Columbia. She had this to say as found on page 9 of the evidence:

> A. I saw him once or twice in the spring of that year—

I would think that would be 1957.

> —and then he left in June and then I heard from him again at the end of August after the baby was born, from British Columbia, and he had a job lined up there for teaching the following year and he asked me to go out and bring the baby and live in Prince George, British Columbia, but he didn't offer to pay for me to get out there or to pay the doctor's bills for the baby or for the hospital when the baby was born, or anything for my keep in all that time.
> Q. And did you go out and try to make a go of it in British Columbia?
> A. Yes, I did. I went out at the end of September, 1957. I had hoped if he was working again things would be different—

Then she indicates that he did pay some expenses for the upkeep of the house and herself there. She goes on to say:

> He had been there about two months before I arrived and he had his group of friends and everything and he had various women who would drop around to the house quite frequently, and whenever they were there he seemed to ignore me and he would get very irritated if the baby cried and interrupted his conversation. Again it was the same thing, arguing with me and beating me.

So there is a repetition of what had happened before so far as cruelty is concerned and lack of concern for the wife and the child. In one instance he left in 1957 and she did not hear from him for some time. Then she did hear from him and she went out with the baby to Prince George, British Columbia. Then she was asked this question:

> Q. What happened in the spring of 1958?
> A. Eventually he suddenly told me one day he had given notice to the landlord and I would have to leave, and he wasn't going to keep on this house that we had and I might as well go back home, that he didn't want me. I suggested finding some other place and he really blew up then and he said no, that I could go back to my family in Montreal.
> Q. He sent you back?
> A. Yes, he pretty well did.
> By Senator Barbour:
> Q. Did he pay your way back?
> A. No, he didn't. I borrowed money for that.
> Q. He really abandoned you out there in the west?
> A. It was pretty well that. I didn't know anyone there. There was no one I could stay with and he made no alternative arrangement. He just sort of dropped me.

Following that the young lady returned to her mother in Montreal in April, 1958. She is asked a question about the next time she saw the respondent, her husband and she gave this answer:

> A. He came back to Montreal in June of 1958 and he phoned me up one day to say he was in Montreal but he didn't say what he was doing or anything, and he was not working. I had another baby coming in November but he didn't show any interest particularly in that or in the child we already had, and he would call me up from time to time. He came to see me once and to see the little boy and he didn't offer to support me or anything or to pay any of the medical expenses and he wouldn't tell me what he was doing or anything, and I asked him and he said he was just sitting around in his room doing nothing.

So we can assume that as far as the attitude of the husband is concerned it is a case of desertion. We are not duty bound to grant divorces on the basis of adultery and neither is the other place so even though there appears to be an unconscious desire to insist that some evidence of adultery be presented I submit that desertion would be the ground for the granting of a divorce in this case. I think the members of the committee of the other place gave the greatest weight to the questions of cruelty and desertion. I have only made reference to the evidence in that regard to show how extensive it was and how much the members of the other place were concerned with cruelty and desertion and with the lack of consideration by the husband for the welfare of the wife and the children.

I submit that this evidence influenced the members of the other place to a much greater extent than did the evidence of adultery and I think it is evidence which would properly influence us in granting this petition for divorce and dissolution of the marriage. But inasmuch as there is a desire to prove that adultery did in fact take place there is evidence given to this effect. I should like to make one or two comments about the evidence and the manner in which it was obtained. Evidence was given by Mr. George Roland Faucher who is an investigator and appeared as a witness on behalf of the petitioner. He was questioned extensively by Mr. Leggat and by the senators as found on pages 13, 14, 15 and 16. I might add that while there were two investigators involved in this case one of them died subsequent to the investigation and before the evidence was submitted to the committee so that only one individual gave evidence on behalf of the petitioner. He indicates that on a particular day they appeared at a certain address and noticed certain things. He was questioned by Mr. Leggat, as found on page 14:

Q. Do you know the apartment number?

The reference is to the particular address where adultery was supposed to have taken place or where it was indicated that it could have taken place.

A. Apartment 4 on the first floor, just to the right of the staircase.

Q. What did you do after you met him at 9 o'clock?

A. We waited until about 10.45 and decided we would try to go in and if he answered the door and was fully dressed we would use an excuse and walk away. We made our way to the first floor and I knocked at the door which was opened a few moments later by Mr. Ramshaw, who was wearing a dark brown dressing gown and a pair of soft shoes. As the door opened toward the left we were able to see to the right that the woman was in the room—

Here again is evidence, I think, of illegal entry on the part of some of these investigators in their attempt to get evidence in order to prove certain circumstances which might lead us to reasonably assume that adultery could have or may have taken place. He said:

—and I pushed in and was followed by Mr. Maisonneuve—

This is the other investigator.

—I asked him to close the door behind me. As he opened the door I asked him if he was Mr.—, and he said yes, and I seen the woman and we both rushed in and I asked Mr. Maisonneuve to close the door.

There is an indication of illegal entry or trespass, pushing their way into someone else's private sanctum. I submit this is an invasion of the rights of the individual which should not be countenanced. I believe it is a criminal act, contrary to the Criminal Code, and that charges could be pressed for trespass or illegal entry. At least, as I have had this section of the Criminal Code explained to me I have been led to believe this could be done when evidence of this nature is given. These men both rushed in. You do not use the word "rush" or "push" if there is an invitation from an individual to enter. I continue to quote:

I then produced this photograph and asked him if it was one of himself, and he looked at it and said yes. He wanted to know what it was all about and I proceeded to tell him but he was angry—

I would assume that under normal circumstances he would be angry if two strangers were to push their way in or rush in and close the door. Up until this time, if this was not an arranged case, the respondent did not know that these particular investigators were coming to visit him at this particular time. He could come to the conclusion that all sorts of things might be the case. It might be an attempted robbery. I do not know what thoughts would go through his mind, but certainly there was reason for him to be angry.

—he was angry by the fact we were both in the room, and the woman was to our right in the bed and, as far as questioning our legality, we have a warrant—

I do not know whether or not, legally, they would be entitled to obtain a warrant for this particular type of activity. I would assume that warrants are granted to official police constables from time to time by the courts. I could not say whether or not these gentlemen would have a warrant, but I would doubt it very much. In any event, the evidence goes on:

> —and as I tried to calm him down and explain the purpose of the call he became angry, and I finally threatened him that if he didn't quieten down and listen to me I would call the neighbours and Mrs.—, who I think was the home operator.

So we have here, one, invasion of rights contrary to the Criminal Code; enforced entry, pushing your way in; two, if they did not have a warrant, and I doubt this very much, then there was a lie and threat and, finally, there is a threat of certain action if the person did not quieten down and listen to him. Unfortunately these are three things which investigators do from time to time in complete disregard of the rights of the individual in his home or apartment, wherever he happens to be. They do these things in order to obtain evidence which would indicate that the circumstances were such that adultery may have taken place. It is unfortunate, as I say, that these things occur, but they do. I do not believe we should countenance them. I would expect that in a court of law if evidence of this nature were given of having pushed their way in, the judge might well take account of that and make some comments to the individual who gave that sort of evidence, that this was contrary to the statutes of Canada.

I would imagine, also, that the individual whose apartment this was would have cause for complaint. He could quite properly suggest that an arrest be made, on the basis of the Criminal Code, the person not having been invited into his apartment. These investigators are in an advantageous position at certain times because the individuals do not want any undue publicity given to their activities. This might result in the investigators being more forthright in their disregard of individual rights than might normally be the case. You could ask any individual in this committee if, at 10.45 in the evening, two strangers came knocking at his door and, when he went to the door they rushed in, closed the door behind them and began to ask particular questions, would he not become angry?

It is possible for these investigators to make errors from time to time and get into the wrong apartment. I had one case recounted to me in which this happened, not this particular case about which I am speaking now. The investigators made an error and broke in on somebody else, a man and his wife who were very much upset by this intrusion. I submit it is only because these investigators have an advantage that they are able to get away with this sort of nonsense of pushing into an apartment. It does not matter whether it is a hotel room or an apartment, an individual rents it and has a right to privacy there. These investigators should not be allowed to barge in and violate the law in order to get some evidence. There should be some other arrangement made.

I submit that in this case, as I said earlier, primary consideration was given by the other place to the question of cruelty and to the matter of desertion. When I refer to "cruelty", I mean both mental and physical. Primary consideration was given to the fact he kept this woman almost a prisoner in his home. These were the things to which primary consideration was given by the committee of the other place. There was her evidence of having been beaten and covered with bruises and a separation action having been commenced; evidence of desertion, about not caring for the family. There is a reference to the husband here by one hon. senator as a bohemian or beatnik type of individual. These were the things that weighed rather heavily in the minds of the committee members of the other place in reporting favourably on this bill. Since we are not bound by any strict legislation that says adultery must be proven, these are the things that should be given the greatest amount of consideration by this committee in giving passage to this particular bill.

I should like to return to this question of the pushing in, the rushing in. I have noticed, Mr. Chairman—I hope I will be allowed to make a comment or two on this—in other instances where evidence has been given by investigators that they forced their way in, that they rifled through someone's private property such as a purse in one instance that I recall; that they engaged in thievery by taking a nameplate off a door in order to say "This is the nameplate that was on the door, so it proves that is that particular person's abode"; that they used threats in dealing with—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I must advise him that his time has expired. Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Peters: I presume that the sponsor of these bills is more familiar than are some of the rest of us with the law, he having a degree in law. I presume that he has given some consideration to the legal stipulations necessary for this committee to handle and process a divorce under the rules and regulations prescribed by the Senate. I would ask the sponsor whether he has given consideration, and, if so, in what manner to the domicile of the woman and to the domicile of the husband in this particular case.

Mr. McCleave: It is true that the husband was a bit of a wanderer. The evidence as given shows that they lived for a while in Quebec and also for a while in British Columbia and that the husband apparently when last heard of was in England. The practice has been to bring the case before parliament only when the husband is domiciled in Quebec or Newfoundland. Change in domicile is defined within the law. If a man establishes domicile in one place and then turns into a bit of a nomad, there is no reason to think that he has changed the domicile he has unless there is very strong evidence to that effect. On looking at the facts here fairly, I think the domicile is established as in Quebec. While he may have lived for some time in England, he had not lived there sufficiently long to show that he had changed his domicile.

Mr. Peters: I believe it is true that he has been a bit of a nomad and has wandered considerably. But as we read the evidence it would indicate that the place where he established a home or a residence and permanent domicile—and the only place in which he did this—was in the province of British Columbia. The only place in which the wife indicates that any support or reasonable support took place was in the province of British Columbia. At the same time I believe it has been clearly pointed out that this man lived in England, was raised in England, that his natural domicile of origin is England and that he has now returned to England. During the questioning there has been no indication that he has any intentions of returning to Canada or to the province of British Columbia or to the province of Quebec.

I think the sponsor of this bill is probably aware of the fact that domicile under the divorce laws of Canada can be established outside of the jurisdiction of the husband which I would submit is England in this case. It can be established outside of that jurisdiction if two years have elapsed. Because of the desertion charges which are also indicated and suggested in the evidence, after two years the wife has the right by law to take the domicile of her considered residence and no longer has to come under the domicile of the husband.

This matter has been given some consideration. It not only has caused a problem where we have had to decide in Canada, for purposes of establishing domicile, that each province will be considered to be a country and that the domicile of the husband, is always the domicile of the wife whether or not she is living with the husband, even in those cases—and this appears to be a fact in this case—where a legal separation has been granted by the court and then consideration has again been given to the marriage by the two parties and they have lived together on a number of occasions. It has been pointed out that in the case where a wife has been deserted the situation is as follows, and I am quoting from page 287 of W. Kent Power's book "The Law of Divorce in Canada":

> The decision of the privy council in Cook v. Cook and Attorney General for Alberta (a) that a wife deserted by her husband cannot acquire a domicile separate from him so as to give the courts of that domicile jurisdiction to dissolve the marriage, even though she was judicially separated from him led to the enactment by the dominion parliament of the Divorce Jurisdiction Act, 1930, chapter 15, which provides:
> "A married woman who either before or after the passing of the act has been deserted by and has been living separate and apart from her husband for a period of two years and upwards and is still living separate and apart from her husband, may in any one of those provinces in Canada in which there is a court having jurisdiction to grant a divorce a vinculo matrimonii, commence in the court of such province having such jurisdiction proceedings for a divorce a vinculo matrimonii praying that her marriage may be dissolved on any grounds that may entitle her to such divorce according to the law of such province and such courts shall have jurisdiction to grant such divorce provided that immediately prior to such desertion the husband of such married woman was domiciled in the province in which such proceedings are commenced."

I believe that the sponsor of this bill has an obligation to the House of Commons, and I believe he will readily admit to me that the place in which they lived together, and the only place in which they were really domiciled in the true sense of the word, was in Prince George in the province of British Columbia. It would therefore be impossible for the wife to start proceedings in the province of Quebec through the parliament of Canada when there was already recourse open to her by law in the province of British Columbia and an opportunity to get a divorce.

If the sponsor says this is not true, then I think we would have to apply our minds again to the fact that if we were to grant—and I do not agree but I say if we were to do so—that the jurisdiction of the domicile will fall within the province of Quebec, we have still not established a separate domicile from the husband in another country, namely England. This divorce was applied for on April 17, 1959. The last time these people had met and had some discussion—and the evidence does not disclose whether or not they had a closer relationship than that—was in January, 1959, only a few months prior to this application. If we establish the last domicile of the couple, the last time they had cohabited, the last time they had lived together as man and wife, then I think we shall have to agree that this was in the province of British Columbia and that that took place in 1958.

The law does not say that the decree can be granted two years after that. It says that two full years must go by before application is made. Quite obviously, even if we use the earliest possible date of April, 1958, we would find that we are already only in April, 1960 and that this divorce was applied for a full year ago. Hence this lady would not be eligible during that period of time to apply the Canadian divorce court act as it relates to the disallowance of marriage and she would not be able to use this as grounds for obtaining this divorce.

There are other factors in this case. I could point out that there are many problems raised in the evidence which are worthy of some consideration by the committee. I could point to the fact that there were two investigators in this case originally, that one died before he could give evidence, and therefore we have only the unsupported testimony of one investigator who in my opinion is not very reliable and has not proved to be reliable in previous cases. It is quite true we could go into all these things and discuss them at some length, but I think this is much more fundamental than a discussion of the evidence given in the Senate, namely that we are being asked to grant a divorce which in my opinion contravenes the very law passed by the house in 1930, the law of divorce in Canada.

Mr. McCleave: Would the hon. member like an explanation of this point?

Mr. Peters: Yes, I would.

Mr. McCleave: The evidence clearly shows that of some 11 years spent in Canada before returning to England all but 8 months were spent in the province of Quebec, which I think clearly establishes domicile in Quebec. The two year rule, as far as I can see, has no application whatsoever.

Mr. Peters: The matter of domicile is established in several ways, but not necessarily by living in a particular province. As I understand it, you could live in any particular province. You could even make a formal declaration that you were going to live in some particular place and never establish that. As the hon. member for Halifax knows, it has been pointed out on many occasions that people have indicated they would live in one province and have lived in another for a number of years. The fact that they made a formal declaration that they would live in one particular place has not made much difference.

There are many cases which indicate this. There is a case reported in Dicey's "Conflict of Laws", 5th (Keith's) edition, page 54 which illustrates what I mean:

> With regard to the United States, an intention indefinite as to locality to live somewhere in the United States is in itself inconclusive where the question at issue is: Has A., the person whose domicile is in dispute, taken up residence in a given state with the intention of residing permanently in that state? Residing in Philadelphia with the intention, not of making his permanent home in Philadelphia, but of making his home in Philadelphia, Baltimore, or Washington, could not be effective to displace the domicile of origin.

In this particular case it has not been indicated—certainly the evidence does not indicate—that this gentleman had any intention of establishing domicile in Canada or in any particular province in Canada. He lived in the province of Quebec. He moved to the province of British Columbia and then back to the province of Quebec. Then he moved back to the United Kingdom where he was raised and had lived before, and he appears to have got a job. His wife was asked on page 8 by Senator Taylor this question:

> Q. Just a minute, now, is he living in Montreal?
> A. Yes—I beg your pardon, I misunderstood the question.
> Q. Is he living now in Montreal?
> A. No.
> Q. Where is he living now?
> A. He is in England now.
> Q. Do you know if he intends to stay there?
> A. I don't know.
> By Mr. Leggat:
> Q. When did he leave, do you know that?
> A. Yes, he left—well, I heard from him in the fall of last year that he was in England and I guess he had left some time during the summer.

Then the questioning was continued later and she replied that she did not know if he intended to return or not.

I suggest that this man's domicile in the true sense of the word has not been proved and that when he came to Canada he had not made up his mind where to live. He neither formally nor informally informed his wife he would make his residence permanently in Canada, and from the evidence and the cross-examination I suggest that his domicile is now England and that it always has been England.

It should be noted that the fact that they have applied for this divorce has not prejudiced their position in relation to the two-year waiting period. If they withdraw this particular petition then the two-year period can be established, and the fact that after one year one of the parties has petitioned for divorce will not make it necessary for them to requalify for the period of desertion.

Mr. McCleace: What a humanitarian.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member says, what a humanitarian. I do not think we are discussing humanitarianism here; we are discussing a particular divorce case and discussing it as closely as we can within the legal requirements—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being six o'clock, shall I rise, report progress and request leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT BY THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Benidickson.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I believe the minister was going to permit a question. The question I was going to ask is this. As I understood it the hon. gentleman said he made his own everything that was in that editorial from the Toronto Star with which he edified the house—

Mr. Kucherepa: The part he read.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, the part he read. The editorial concluded with a statement to the effect that the Liberals should not be allowed on the C.B.C. Does the minister agree with that view and, if so, could the minister arrange to have the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) put on again?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I know that you do not expect accuracy from the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. The hon. gentleman has just given another demonstration of his chronic inaccuracy because the extract I read from that excellent editorial in the Toronto Star does not say what he attributed to it at all. I am glad to have an opportunity of repeating the final paragraph for his special consumption. It reads:

> Unless the Liberals have some ideas and the courage to state them, they had better stay off television, for the sake of the party, as well as the viewers.

Never did the Liberal party receive better advice.

Those hon. members who were members of this parliament a decade ago will remember that after the 1949 general election questions were raised as to the future of the C.C.F. party. It will be remembered that on one occasion Mr. Coldwell, the much respected leader of that party, was asked what was the future of the C.C.F. His answer was that the C.C.F. might some day gets its chance in the event of a depression or recession.

I make no further comment on that particular statement of the time, but I draw attention to the similarity between the view entertained at that time with respect to the C.C.F. and a view which is now being entertained and expressed with respect to the Liberal party.

Mr. Pickersgill: By whom?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Only in Conservative circles.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I will have ample evidence from Liberal sources to satisfy all intelligent members of the house.

Mr. Pickersgill: Self adulation.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is too early in the evening.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Some hon. members of the house saw a television broadcast within the past week in which one gentleman who is regarded as a rising star in the Liberal party was interviewed on a subject close to the one I indicated a moment ago. I refer to Mr. Charles Templeton, a man whom many of us respected very highly in his former calling. On this particular program Mr. Templeton, who is now regarded as certain to be a Liberal candidate in one of the Toronto or York ridings in the next election, whenever that might come—

Mr. Pickersgill: Eglinton?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If he wants to come to Eglinton, I can assure you he will be welcome. There has not been for many years a Liberal candidate in a federal election in Eglinton riding who lived in that riding. They have always had to go outside to find one.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the present member live in that riding?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): He certainly has made that riding his home since the year 1933.

Mr. Pickersgill: I can produce some evidence to the contrary.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On this particular program Mr. Templeton who, as I say, is regarded as one of the rising stars in the Liberal party—there are even those who refer to him, if the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) will permit me to say so, as the possible next leader of the Liberal party—

Mr. Pickersgill: Is this a vision or a hallucination?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate should not laugh at that.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was asking the minister if that was a vision or a hallucination.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The dialogue ran to this effect. Mr. Templeton was being interviewed by Mr. Cohen.

Mr. Pickersgill: Who is Mr. Cohen?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Cohen addressed this question to Mr. Templeton:

Mr. Cohen: Mr. Templeton, I know that politics interest you. Off the record, do you see a revival on the federal scene of the Liberal party? Do you see them staging a comeback?

Mr. Templeton: This is off the record on television?

Mr. Cohen: Off the record on television.

Mr. Templeton then replied—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, since the minister has said this is off the record could he indicate from what source he is quoting?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am quoting from the remarks made by Mr. Cohen and Mr. Templeton on the television program in question.

Mr. Pickersgill: Where did the minister get it? Is this another secret document?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is a plain statement of fact and consequently obviously is over the head of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. I shall go back because I do not wish the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate to lose the thread of this dialogue.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is yarn, not thread.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Cohen began by asking Mr. Templeton this question:

Mr. Cohen: Mr. Templeton, I know that politics interest you. Off the record, do you see a revival on the federal scene of the Liberal party? Do you see them staging a comeback?

Mr. Templeton: This is off the record on television?

Mr. Cohen: Off the record on television.

Mr. Templeton then replied as follows:

The only thing I would say about that is that there is a chance of a Liberal revival if there is the economic recession predicted by—I hope accurately—by a number of well-known economists.

If that is not the kind of statement that ought to bring shame to any Canadian, I hope we will never hear a worse one than it on television.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Do you remember your speech of March 22, 1955?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Pardon?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Does the hon. gentleman remember the speech he made in this house on March 22, 1955, a copy of which I have before me?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not remember all parts of it but if the hon. member does I congratulate him and I commend it to his serious perusal and contemplation. You see, it is an interesting diversion. The hon. member for Essex East does not like this reading from the dialogue that occurred on television—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is not as good as this one.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —and this statement on the part of a rising star of the Liberal party. I accept that statement of Mr. Templeton. I think it may be a franker statement than some we have been accustomed to listen to on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite. The fact is that the Liberal party has now chosen as its tactic in the hope of improving its political fortunes either to create or to sow in the minds of the public the idea that a recession is coming or that a recession has come. It is now a party with a definite recession complex.

Because they are eager partisans it is perfectly clear now that they seek to persuade the people of this country that another recession is on the way. For lack of facts anything does, even emanations from the Martin bureau of statistics.

I think it is in the knowledge of hon. members that you can create some of the elements of depression, let us say, some of the effects of depression by creating in the minds of the public the belief that there is a depression. You can have the psychological elements created by that kind of talk, and it does not matter in the minds of hon. members opposite that this hurts Canada, or hurts Canada's interests, as long as it improves the political prospects of the Liberal party.

The whole theme of the speech of the Leader of the Opposition this afternoon was that the Minister of Finance ought to be worrying—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hear, Hear.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The echo from Essex East, the hollow echo. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate should not laugh at that.

I hope that as long as I am privileged to hold this portfolio I shall always be prepared to be realistic and look facts in the face. I think that will be evident to any intelligent member who read the budget speeches of 1958 and 1959; but I do not propose to be led into a worried frame of mind by the misleading statements that have been emanating from the benches opposite in the course of this debate. I do not believe that that is a realistic or responsible approach to the economic scene today.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): With pleasure.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the minister really think that the Canadian public is so easily misled as he suggests?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I certainly believe that the Canadian public is not as easily misled as hon. members opposite seem to think.

Mr. Pickersgill: Why is the minister worried, then?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I just pointed out that I did not intend to be worried by the misleading statements that have come from hon. members opposite, and I reject the invitation that I received this afternoon from the Leader of the Opposition to be a worried man.

Having made those restrained comments on the thoroughly irresponsible attitude taken by the Leader of the Opposition and other hon. members about him, let me point out some of the things that have been said by hon. members opposite in the course of their comments from over a period of time with a view to creating the impression that things are worse than they are, much worse. Do I need to remind hon. members opposite of the course of events from the budget speech in June, 1958 until the budget speech of April, 1959.

In that budget speech of 1958 I indicated that I thought the deficit was going to be $648 million. That was increased to $650 million, by some tax changes that were made when the bills were before the house and I indicated later in the session, by reason of some additional commitments that were then approved by parliament, that I expected the deficit would amount to some $700 million. But that was not enough for hon. members opposite. So they went out and said, "This is a billion dollar deficit". If a billion dollar deficit in fact could have done harm in this country, in disturbing confidence or for any other reason, hon. members opposite would have created that same harm in Canada by their assertions up hill and down dale throughout this country that the deficit was going to be $1 billion or more than $1 billion.

Mr. Pickersgill: What was the cash deficit?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The deficit—

Mr. Pickersgill: The cash deficit?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We are talking about the deficit.

Mr. Pickersgill: You are always talking about something else.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We are talking about the deficit. It was the deficit that the Leader of the Opposition was talking about when he was making misleading statements on this very subject.

It may be of interest to hon. members to recall some of the statements that were made by the Leader of the Opposition in that respect. On October 6, 1958, he was quoted in the Winnipeg Free Press as having said at Regina—do I hear the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate take exception to the reading from this newspaper?

Mr. Pickersgill: Just another hallucination on the part of the minister.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Did he take objection to the accuracy of this newspaper?

Mr. Pickersgill: No; it was just another hallucination on the part of the minister.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I just looked for it naturally. This is the extract:

> "The deficit for the current year will be much greater than the $700 million forecast by Finance Minister Donald Fleming. My guess is that it will be close to $1 billion," Mr. Pearson said.

Then, on November 12, 1958, he was quoted in the Toronto Globe and Mail as having said in the course of a speech in Toronto:

> We are now reaping the whirlwind of a $1 billion deficit.

That is the sort of thing they were going about in their irresponsible way and saying in the course of the year 1958. It must have galled them greatly when the accounts were complete for 1958-59 and it transpired that the budget deficit was $609 million and not the $1 billion that they had been talking about. It must have been a disappointment to them.

Then, Mr. Speaker, we move on to 1959. You will, I am sure, not need to be reminded of their gloomy attitude toward the budget at that time. I think hon. members may well test the accuracy of hon. members opposite in their gloomy forecasts today by the touchstone of what they said last year with reference to last year's budget. It will be remembered that at that time, namely, April, 1959, I estimated a budget deficit for the fiscal year 1959-60 of $393 million. It recently transpired that the budget deficit was $405.6 million. I will come back later to this matter of accuracy in that respect.

But hon. members opposite were not satisfied with this; they were not satisfied at the time. They said the deficit was going to be much greater; that I had overestimated revenues; that I had taken much too optimistic a view of the economic outlook and so they said it was going to be much worse. There is the actual fact. They carried this game on all through the year. Here is my distinguished predecessor, Mr. Walter Harris, speaking quite recently. The house will recall the quotation which was read here last Friday by the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Winkler) where Mr. Harris said just a month ago that "the deficit may well be $600 million." This, of course, is 50 per cent out and it just shows how far Liberals can err in their estimates when they have not the benefit of the advice of the experts that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River indicated he would fly to if he had the opportunity.

Then this afternoon we were treated to a most harrowing tale of an imminent recession by the Leader of the Opposition. He must have sent the chills up and down our spines as he pictured the horrors of this recession. It is quite clear that the Leader of the Opposition just cannot wait for the next recession to come. He is talking of it now and if he can bring it on by his talk he is certainly going to do it. He has exaggerated unemployment, just as hon. members opposite have been doing this long time, and he has created gloom so thick that he has lost his own way in it now. He is simply groping about in gloom of his own creation. There is a couplet, Mr. Speaker, from a hymn that I am sure the Leader of the Opposition must remember.

> Take up the torch and wave it wide,
> The torch that lights time's thickest gloom.

I commend that to the Leader of the Opposition. I hope the next time he undertakes to sing he will sing that hymn. It is No. 384 in the hymnary of the United Church.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister quote the next two lines?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, but I can quote from another hymn that speaks about "the encircling gloom". The Liberals were wrong in 1957; they were wrong in 1958; they were wrong in 1959; and they are wrong again now in 1960.

Mr. Robichaud: And so are you.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The Leader of the Opposition was so anxious this afternoon to get everybody talking recession with him that he was in effect asking the Minister of Finance what preparations he was making for the next recession. The best preparation that can be made for the next recession is to continue the present government in office. That is the surest guarantee of avoiding a recession. I will say this to the Leader of the Opposition, that we will not find this country in the position in which it was in 1957 when the recession induced by the Liberals at that time came upon the country.

Mr. Pickersgill: We certainly will not.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In one respect we can be thankful that the financial position of the government will be very much better and I mention it in passing in view of what has been said about the conversion loan by the hon. but not too well instructed members opposite. The average debt of this country will not be maturing nearly so soon, thanks to the conversion loan, as it was when we came into office in 1957.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was also being paid off when you came into office.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I come now to another subject that interests me very much, the subject of accuracy in estimating. I noted with not less than passing interest this afternoon a remark made by the Leader of the Opposition. He said: "If the minister is as far out this year as he was last year his surplus will quickly melt into a deficit". That is quite a remarkable statement to come from the hon. gentleman. It perhaps is an echo of the statement made by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River as found at page 2703 of Hansard. Referring to myself he said:

> Did he get discouraged from the poor estimating that was done last year?

Let us examine the estimating that was done last year in the light of the figures as we have them at the present time. They are not complete, but they are estimates that were made as of the last week of March. I have reminded the house that the deficit estimated by me in the budget of April, 1959 was $393 million. It proved to be $405.6 million, an increase of $12.6 million or a little less than 3 per cent over the estimate.

Is this a departure that indicates inaccuracy in budgeting, that calls for the kind of comment that was made by the Leader of the Opposition this afternoon or the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River a week ago yesterday? Evidently the Ottawa Citizen does not think so, for in an editorial which appeared on March 31, the day that the white paper was tabled in the house, I read the following with reference to the figure of $405.6 million:

> The figure is higher than Mr. Fleming thought it would be when he made his budget forecast last April ($393 million) but it is not far out as these matters are measured.

That is an interesting comment. I ask hon. members opposite to consider what was the estimate and what it was based on. In the budget speech of April 9, 1959 this is what I said about the basis of the estimate, as found at page 2409 of Hansard:

> —I shall be basing my budgetary policy and my revenue forecasts on a gross national product of about $34½ billion which is about 7 per cent above the average level achieved in 1958.

Hon. members opposite have been laying great stress on the 7 per cent. They have been saying latterly, "Oh, but the figures now show it was only 6 per cent". I have a comment to make upon that. Let me remind the house that I based my budget estimate on the forecast of a gross national product of $34½ billion. I commented that that was 7 per cent above 1958. We actually reached a figure of about $34.6 billion instead of a figure of $34.5 billion. When the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River referred to this forecast in speaking in the house a week ago yesterday he did not say anything about the $34.5 billion. He took half the sentence and he chose the half with a view to leaving out the figure. He simply said that I had based the budget forecast on the view that the gross national product in 1959 would show an increase of 7 per cent over 1958. As it turned out we exceeded in gross national product the figure on which I based the budget forecast.

But that turned out to be only an increase of 6 per cent over 1958. And why? When hon. members opposite use this figure they ought to be frank enough or informed enough to tell the whole story and to give it to the house. The fact is that the figure calculated on the 1958 gross national product was advanced during the year by the dominion bureau of statistics. There was a change in the calculation and it was the 1958 figure that was advanced. The 1959 forecast was reached; indeed, it was slightly passed. It was the change of the 1958 figure that accounts for the fact that the increase was only 6 per cent instead of 7 per cent over 1958. That did not affect the forecast, as the figures have shown.

But let me not dwell unduly on that. Let me turn now to what the opposition had to say about the increase in the gross national product for 1959 over 1958 when they were engaged in the budget debate a year ago. Here is the Leader of the Opposition speaking on April 21 last year, as found at page 2912 of Hansard. He referred to my forecast of $34.5 billion or a 7 per cent increase and he continued:

> He made no attempt then to justify this optimistic forecast, and he made no attempt to justify it this afternoon. It is a forecast which has been dismissed by many experts, and I will name mine, although he did not name his this afternoon. They include the Canadian tax foundation, the financial editor of the Montreal Gazette, and indeed the Canadian chamber of commerce, which in its submission to the government forecast a gross physical output in 1959-60 of approximately 1 per cent, not 7 per cent.

That was the forecast of the Leader of the Opposition and I suggest that his forecast today and his comments on the forecast upon which the 1960 budget is based can well be judged in the light of his errors as revealed a year ago in the budget debate. But his characteristic pessimism in opposition did not end there. He went on to say at page 2913:

> My calculations on this point last year, as stated in my budget speech, were that the minister was too optimistic.

"Too optimistic", that has been their cry. Further down in the paragraph he said:

> He does not give us any basis for his optimism.

I am content to have the 1959 budget forecast judged in the light of events. I do not think you can get any better or more searching test than that. I am quite prepared to have my forecast tested by the facts. I do not think the Leader of the Opposition would wish to have his tested by the facts. He had the temerity this afternoon to say in one of the more extraordinary statements in his speech, that his predictions last year have been borne out by the events.

Mr. Robichaud: Sure, they have.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We will not expect too much from the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud). If 7 per cent and 1 per cent are the same thing to him, I do not think any of us can do very much to help the hon. member. The Leader of the Opposition poured scorn on our forecasts last year, but I think they have been borne out by the facts. Let us not judge these hon. gentlemen opposite by their despondency in these days in opposition. Let us go back and judge the accuracy of the forecasting and budgeting that has been done for the last three budgets as contrasted with the period when the Liberals were in office. I do not want to take the house back over the whole record, so let us start with the post-war period.

Let us start with the fiscal year 1946-47. In that year, they forecast a deficit of $300 million, and they were just out $674 million in that estimate. There was an error of 22.4 per cent in the revenue forecast and 25.6 per cent on expenditures. I am prepared to make allowances for that year because it was the first full fiscal year of peace. I expect it was a very difficult year in which to make forecasts. I am prepared to make allowances for that year. Let us go on to 1947-48. They forecast a surplus of $190 million and they finished up with $676 million, for a difference of $486 million. In 1948-49 they were out by $107 million; in 1949-50, they were out $47 million; in 1950-51, they were out $196 million. So it goes, on down the line. I do not know whether or not hon. members can stand much more of this. If you want something in the way of a comparison, go back to these figures in past Liberal regimes. You can check the margin of difference between the actual figures and the figures forecast.

If hon. members want more of this I can say that in 1950-51 the difference was $196 million; 1951-52, $218 million; 1952-53, they were close that year, $15 million; 1953-54, $35 million; 1954-55, $156 million; 1955-56, $127 million, and 1956-57, $145 million. Yet they talk about inaccuracies in my budgeting.

The Leader of the Opposition says that if the present minister is as far out this year as he was last year his surplus will quickly melt into a deficit. All I can say is that we have budgeted carefully. We have made the most careful forecasts that we can, and I would not have submitted this budget to the house had I not believed it is an honest, straightforward budget that will stand up to the test of the best estimating possible at the date on which the budget was introduced.

I will come back to say some things about this matter of records. We were told this afternoon by the Leader of the Opposition and we have been told by others, that, after all, this surplus of $12 million that has been forecast is nothing. Apparently it was not even worth announcing in the house in the view of hon. members opposite. The $12 million does not hold the record, even in recent years, for the smallest forecast of a deficit or the smallest forecast of a surplus. I am sure hon. members opposite will be glad to have their faltering memories refreshed if I recall to them that in the fiscal year 1954-55, the last budget of Mr. Abbott, now Mr. Justice Abbott, he forecast a surplus of $4 million. Did hon. members opposite rise in holy horror and say, this is too small; this should not even be announced? No, they came forward then and said it was an honest estimate.

I might just mention in passing what happened that year. Perhaps it was this experience that gave rise to some of the cynical comments by hon. members opposite as to what might happen this year. In place of that forecast surplus of $4 million, at the end of the year there was a Liberal deficit of $152 million.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This was not the only year in which a small surplus was forecast. In the previous year, 1953-54, the surplus forecast at the time of the budget was $11 million; in 1952-53 it was $9 million forecast in the budget; in 1950-51, $20 million, later changed to $15 million. So let it not be said that this 1960 surplus is the albino of its breed. There are numerous precedents for a forecast of a relatively small surplus.

I may say that the comments by the Leader of the Opposition on the forecast surplus have been interesting. He is reported in a Canadian Press dispatch of April 2 as having said in Toronto that my budget will have to be tested by time. That was a profound statement indeed. I had thought that every budget had to be tested by time. I hope my budget will be tested by time and not by the vagaries, errors and caprices of hon. members opposite.

Before we leave this subject of the derision that they have heaped on this budget surplus of $12 million, let me say this, and I address my comment particularly to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. He wanted to add to the 1959-60 deficit the deficit in the old age security account. It will be interesting to see what the hon. gentleman will say next year in the budget debate when that old age security account shows, as we expect it will, a surplus on next year's operation of perhaps $40 million. I am sure he will be the first to come forward and say, I insist on adding the $40 million to the announced budget surplus, as announced by the Minister of Finance in the white paper.

Mr. Benidickson: Because you have added taxes of millions and millions of dollars last year for this account.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Apparently the hon. member cannot keep his seat. There must be something contagious in that seat over there.

It was his seatmate the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate this afternoon, and I suppose these things spread.

We were told this afternoon that there are some surpluses that are good. There is virtue in some surpluses, but not the Conservative kind. We were told that in times past the Conservatives had not approved of surpluses. This is poppycock.

Our quarrel with the surpluses in the days of easy financing in the post-war period before this Liberal induced recession was that they did not budget properly and they did not plan for debt retirement. It was always on a hit and miss basis, and the surpluses were not those for which they budgeted. The budgeting was inaccurate in many of those years. Never once did they set out at the first of the year to make plans for debt retirement. It was always catch as catch can. Never was there any planning in that respect. Having heard the Leader of the Opposition this afternoon talk about orderly debt reduction and say that they look back to orderly debt reduction on the part of the Liberal administration, may I just say this. He is looking back and he is seeing things that just are not there. One can understand why there is nothing for him to look forward to.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Oh, always.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the minister really think it is a really terrible thing to pay off a little bit more of the national debt than you thought at the beginning of the year you were going to be able to pay off?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, but I like to see these things done in an orderly and planned way and not the arrival at surpluses at the end of the year by errors and consequent over-taxation. That was where the over-taxation occurred, namely because the country was not being given proper budgeting.

Mr. Pickersgill: You are taking a billion dollars more than the Liberals took in 1956-57.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Where we are quarrelling with hon. members opposite is that they never planned for any orderly debt reduction at all. They are simply seeing things now that did not occur at all.

I wish to pass on from these agitated and garrulous gentlemen to talk about the subject of muddle. They have been talking lately about the muddle. Unquestionably there is a muddle but it is not where they think it is. The fact is that they are so muddled and befuddled that they think everybody else is muddled and befuddled because they are. This is a psychopathic situation.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Has the time not come for the minister to discuss the serious business of the nation?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What was that remark?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I was just saying this to my hon. and dear friend. Does he not think, as Minister of Finance, that the time has come in this house when he should discuss the serious business of the nation?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I have been—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If I might interject here, I should like to say that it seems to me that far too many bright thoughts are being expressed at the wrong time tonight and that it would be better if the house would give to the minister who has the floor the full use of it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have been discussing what hon. members opposite have been saying in the course of this debate. By the definition applied by the hon. member for Essex East apparently what they have said was not serious business of the country.

Hon. members opposite have been completely, utterly and hopelessly self-confused. In the course of this debate we have seen on their part confusion thrice confounded. We do not know yet whether these hon. gentlemen advocate today a balanced budget or a deficit. They have all had ample opportunity to speak in the course of this debate. The Leader of the Opposition left us in a complete quandary on this subject at the end of his remarks today. He was on both sides of the question. Indeed, he was on both sides of every question that he allowed himself to touch upon in his remarks today.

It remains an unresolved mystery as to whether the official opposition in this situation believes that the government should budget for a balanced budget or a deficit. To use an expression that was coined by a president of the United States about 50 years ago, to try to get some sense and some clear expression of opinion from the Liberals on this question you might just as well try to nail jelly to the wall. We have witnessed on their part hopeless floundering or else calculated double-talk. We thought the Leader of the Opposition this afternoon was going to come close to saying something. But having reached the point where it seemed that he was coming close, he backed away and went off on a tangent. What did he say? This is what he said this afternoon. He said that today no government should be afraid of a deficit if related to a plan and not due to un-co-ordinated circumstances.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is not all of it; that is not the whole sentence.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is just half the sentence.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That was as much as I was able to take down; and believe me, of the sentence uttered by the Leader of the Opposition, this is much the better part.

Mr. Benidickson: Dishonest as usual.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): He said that today no government should be afraid of a deficit. Did he mean to convey the idea that he was advocating a deficit? Is that what he meant?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): He was talking about social need. I am surprised at my hon. friend.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Benidickson: He sits in the front pew of a church and then says this kind of thing.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If hon. members have views to express they might at least rise in their places.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The Leader of the Opposition, having permitted himself to say that today no government should be afraid of a deficit—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. You have asked us to rise and I think you are quite right in giving that direction. This is the third time in the last half minute the Minister of Finance has misquoted the statement of the Leader of the Opposition. The Leader of the Opposision related deficit to the problem of social need—

Mr. Pickersgill: And depression.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —and the possibility of depression and further recession. The Minister of Finance has misquoted the words of the Leader of the Opposition in a shameful manner.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the correction might more appropriately have been made at the end of the minister's speech. Will the minister proceed?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think the house will have taken note—and everybody is glad to see it—that the hon. member for Essex East is laughing and snickering at himself now. He does not laugh at his interventions half as much as do the rest of us in this house.

I compliment the hon. member for Essex East on having greatly improved the speech made this afternoon in this respect by the Leader of the Opposition. That is what the Leader of the Opposition said this afternoon about a deficit.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): He did not say that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have his words here. I trust my note of them much better than I trust the failing memory of the hon. member for Essex East unless he was the man who wrote the speech of the Leader of the Opposition. He said that today no government should be afraid of a deficit—

Mr. Pickersgill: That is half of the sentence and the minister knows it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Here is the rest of it; if related to a plan and not due to un-co-ordinated something or other.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is not correct. This is a thoroughly dishonest performance.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I know the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate would be the first to object to an interjection of that kind and I hope he will make the proper correction.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I quite deliberately said that was a thoroughly dishonest performance and it is my opinion that it was a thoroughly dishonest performance. I listened carefully to what the Leader of the Opposition said. What he said was that if we had a real depression, a government should not be afraid of a deficit. If the Minister of Finance was not listening carefully he should not quote half a sentence. I give the minister credit for not having been deliberately misquoting the Leader of the Opposition because he has said that he did not hear it all. But when he says he did not hear it all it seems to me it is a dishonest performance to treat it as though it were a full sentence.

An hon. Member: Withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure whether I understood the hon. member. I thought he began by withdrawing the words "dishonest performance" because in my view "dishonest performance" means a deliberately untrue statement. The hon. member knows that it is not permissible, within the standards of debate which we set for ourselves, to impute deliberate untruth and dishonesty to another hon. member.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I think you will agree I have always respected your rulings. If there is any imputation that I suggested that the Minister of Finance was deliberately dishonest—although I think he was carelessly dishonest—if the word "dishonest" should not be used I will say he was shockingly misleading.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I ask for an unconditional withdrawal of the word "dishonest".

Mr. Speaker: I understand the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has unreservedly withdrawn the word "dishonest".

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, quite; I have unreservedly withdrawn the word "dishonest".

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Then we are making progress, Mr. Speaker. I wonder how much more the hon. member feels like withdrawing.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If hon. members would allow the minister to proceed I am sure the debate would be more progressive.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister should not provoke us.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am sorry to be provoking to the hon. member. Believe me, nothing is further from my thoughts than that I should be provoking to the hon. member for Essex East.

In asking ourselves about this muddle on the part of hon. members opposite and where they stand on the question of a deficit or a balanced budget, I recall that in 1958 they attacked our planned deficit. In 1959 they attacked our planned deficit. In 1960 they went back and re-attacked the deficits we had had in 1958 and 1959. And now also, Mr. Speaker, in 1960 they have attacked our balanced budget for 1960-61. Where is the sense in all of this and where is the consistency? These hon. members are in a muddle and are just wildly attacking everything which the government puts forward; that is the explanation.

Here again I recall what the Leader of the Opposition said in his Toronto speech of April 2. This Canadian Press dispatch says:

> While admitting the government's balanced budget might be all to the good—

Did we hear him say that this afternoon? Did we hear him say that the government's balanced budget might be all to the good? No, Mr. Speaker; no one opposite has even admitted that this balanced budget might be all to the good. I have marvelled at some parliamentary performances, but I think Houdini in his best and palmiest days might well have envied this rubber-jointed, double-jointed performance on the part of sleight of hand artists opposite.

Mr. Benidickson: What are you reading from?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Something you would not understand; it is plain English. It is because they are in this horrible muddle and do not know where they are going that they keep on contradicting themselves.

I spoke of their position in times past. In 1958 they were advocating or having good words to say about the idea of budget deficits. On January 19, 1959, as reported on page 35 of Hansard, the Leader of the Opposition said:

> The previous administration did not hesitate to budget for a deficit when there was a threat of recession.

Apparently it was all right for them to do it, but it was not all right for us to budget for a deficit in 1958 and 1959, coping in the first year with recession and in the second year with the continuing effects.

I will defend, as I have defended before, the measures that led us into deficit financing in 1958 and 1959. We coped with that recession and spent money to increase the social security payments in this country, and in that way we increased consumer purchasing. We spent a good deal of money to stimulate housing, and not only helped the housing situation but as well reduced unemployment very greatly. We increased our expenditure on public works and provided employment in that way, and we went down the line in that way to put forward constructive measures to help the country out of the recession.

Mr. Benidickson: And into more unemployment than last year.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River cannot stop.

The Liberal party is not at one on this subject because the Liberal leader in the province of Nova Scotia has had something to say about our deficits in the years 1958 and 1959.

Mr. Pickersgill: Tell us about Mr. Roblin.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If you do not mind, may I make my speech and talk of the former Liberal premier of Nova Scotia, Mr. Henry Hicks. I hope the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is not above hearing what Mr. Hicks has to say.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is it about federal affairs?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On page 55 of a booklet issued by Mount Allison University, publication No. 4 on Canadian politics, which booklet contains speeches delivered at Mount

Allison summer institute last August, this statement is attributed to Mr. Henry Hicks:

> Furthermore, whatever view we may have as to the financial policies of the present government of Canada, I do not believe that as a matter of practical politics the huge deficits of the past two years will be counted against the Diefenbaker government at all.

We heard something said this afternoon about quotations from the white paper, but there is one which has missed the attention of the Leader of the Opposition. If he will look at the top of page 40 of the white paper he will see the results of the past six years. If he will put the present year alongside, leaving out the year 1957-58 in which the two parties shared power, it will be seen that the last three years of the Liberal regime showed two deficits and one surplus. The Conservative administration in three years has shown two deficits and one surplus.

Mr. Pickersgill: Anything more misleading than that—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There he goes again. It is too bad; he just cannot help it.

I have spoken, and I will remind hon. members, about the difficulties of the situation we have to contend with, and how we were prepared, in order to help out the provinces and the municipalities, to weaken our own fiscal position in order to help theirs.

Mr. Pickersgill: You sent up the interest rates.

Mr. Benidickson: That is the biggest laugh.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Hon. members opposite would not recognize a serious statement, I am sure. We incurred two deficits and now the budget is balanced, but some apparently want a deficit again. They have been busy all this year attributing what they call tight money and high interest rates to the deficit and blaming the government for it. Now they attack the balanced budget. Is it because of their own reasoning that they seem to want to have what they have called tight money and high interest rates? We of the government do not. We have here firm and constructive measures in this budget to bring about a balance so that that situation may be firmly met.

We have heard many things said today about the premium on the Canadian dollar. It is regrettable that memories on the other side of the house are so short. The Leader of the Opposition talked about this subject and reached the point of saying that apparently it could only be dealt with by over-all control measures. But he was not advocating that. What was he advocating? We are left wondering again.

On this subject let me quote the remarks of Liberal ministers in the days of the Liberal regime and test what is being said now by hon. members opposite and some Liberals outside the house. Mr. Walter Gordon talked in Toronto about the devaluation of the dollar, calling on the government to devalue the dollar. Apparently that hon. gentleman, a royal commissioner of a few years ago but now evidently on the hustings for the Liberal party, has forgotten things which were said under more responsible circumstances by Liberal ministers. This is what Mr. Harris said in his budget speech of April 5, 1955, as reported on page 2729 of Hansard:

> There has been no change in the policy of the government to allow the rate of exchange to be determined by the sum total of the forces operating in the exchange market, including of course the influence of fiscal and monetary conditions. The resources of the exchange fund are not used to reverse persistent trends but only to contribute to orderly conditions by limiting excessive short-run movements in either direction which might otherwise occur.

Mr. Abbott in one of the last speeches he made in this house as reported at page 6545 of Hansard of June 23, 1954, said:

> I am not one of those who believe in the competitive depreciation of currencies.

And further:

> I do not believe that any action which the Canadian government might take to put a fixed exchange value on the Canadian dollar could possibly be successful without pretty drastic exchange controls. I for one would not be prepared to recommend at this time a return to that form of control.

Mr. Howe, as reported at page 448 of Hansard of November 30, 1953, stated:

> The fact that the exchange rate has remained strong is, I suggest, evidence that confidence in Canada has not been at all impaired by the change in the current account position from a surplus to a deficit. It is not unusual for a country in Canada's position—prosperous and building up its productive capacity at a rapid rate—to experience a moderate deficit on current account, financed by a net import of capital.

Why did not the Leader of the Opposition quote that?

Mr. Pickersgill: He agreed with that; he said the same thing.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Why did not hon. members opposite quote this a few weeks ago when they were railing about a balance of payments deficit?

Let me pass on as quickly as I can to say this of the balanced budget, that it is the fruit of planned policy. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River talked about a long series of un-co-ordinated decisions. It is too bad that the hon. gentleman had not been better acquainted with the facts because this balanced budget is the outcome of co-ordinated decision and planned policy over a period of time. We have followed a consistent policy. The program adopted from time to time has been flexible to meet changing conditions, but this has been a goal and it has now been attained.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister permit a question at this point. Would the minister say whether this government two years ago deliberately planned to increase the debt of this country by over $2 billion?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman knows the answer to that question before he asks it. He knows very well, if he will be frank with the house and with himself, that he has no basis today for quarreling with fiscal policies enunciated in the budget of 1958, or those enunciated in the budget of 1959, or those enunciated in the budget of 1960.

Mr. Pickersgill: Why not answer the question?

Mr. Benidickson: You steered away from the question.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I dealt at some length with the subject of debt in my budget speech and I will commend to hon. members opposite both the table that I put on the record of the house in this respect and the comments I made upon it. I pointed out that as a percentage of the gross national product of this country the net debt of Canada in 1960 is with the exception of the year 1958 the lowest in the country's history.

Mr. Cardin: Now answer the question.

Mr. Pickersgill: Rubbish.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This, happens to be the fact and the comment of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is a comment on the fact because I have given the house the fact. There is the fact.

Mr. Pickersgill: Why not answer my question? It is simple.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is interesting to see that in the view of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate parliamentary debate has now become a matter of dialogue. I presume that if he is entitled to carry on a dialogue with me he is entitled to do so with anybody in the house. I presume that the rules of the house have been bent to accommodate the hon. gentleman and his insatiable love of hearing his own voice.

Mr. Benidickson: You would not answer the question.

Mr. Pickersgill: I cannot compete with the minister in that field.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There, he is at it again. He has been talking incessantly.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I should intervene at this point. The minister is complaining about interruptions. Undoubtedly there has been a great deal of interruption from both sides of the house and I cannot say that the minister who has the floor is himself entirely blameless. Some of the things he has said have perhaps inspired some of the interruptions. However, that does not excuse hon. gentlemen.

One practice which is developing which I think should definitely be cured if we are to maintain an orderly and dignified debate is the practice of hon. members speaking from their seats. If hon. members wish to raise points of order or questions of privilege the least they can do is rise and secure the floor. It is intolerable to have four or five different interrupters speaking from their seats at one time. It renders the debate impossible.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I come now to make just a brief comment on the subject of balance of payments. I shall deal with it briefly because I discussed this subject at considerable length in the budget speech. The Leader of the Opposition this afternoon appeared at one stage of his remarks to say that his chief criticism was somehow or other related to this subject and then he trailed off into vagueness again and no one could keep up with his thought.

I suggest that it is high time for the Leader of the Opposition to come out and say whether we should take the kind of measures that would have to be taken to prevent the importation of capital into this country. At a time when he is talking about unemployment let the hon. gentleman not indulge in these vague statements but let him come out and be specific and straightforward and tell us what he has to say about this subject instead of being on both sides of this subject as on all others.

The Liberals were not even aware of the existence of this problem until they pounced upon a passage in the annual report of the governor of the Bank of Canada. I repeat, they were not even aware of it. Now they have seized on that and have tried to make a political issue out of it. Let me say very briefly to them on this subject that the government is meeting this problem by sound fiscal and trade policies reflected in the balanced budget and in the handsome increase in our export trade.

Hon. gentlemen opposite have had a great deal to say about unemployment, and I have been chided because I did not discuss this subject at length in the budget speech. It is evident that hon. gentlemen opposite like long budget speeches. I was trying very hard to shorten the budget speech this year after the long ones of 1958 and 1959. Let me now comment on this subject.

What hon. members opposite have had to say on this subject has throughout this entire session been characterized by gross exaggeration. Here is a statement made by the Leader of the Opposition. Can you imagine anything more irresponsible than what he is reported to have said in Toronto on April 2, as quoted in a Canadian Press dispatch:

> We're not going to rejoice over a balanced budget when we have 800,000 unemployed.

The Leader of the Opposition ought to know that we have not 800,000 unemployed in this country. When he was talking this afternoon about the figure of unplaced applicants he knows perfectly well that is not a figure of unemployed in this country. He and the hon. member for Essex East in bandying these figures about and using them in this misleading way reflect no credit upon themselves in my opinion.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. My hon. friend has said I used figures in a misleading way. Is the hon. gentleman not aware that on March 22 he used exactly the same standard when he talked about unemployment. The figure used by the Leader of the Opposition—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member, I take it, is endeavouring to correct what he considers to be a misleading impression given by the hon. gentleman who has the floor. If so, he should defer it to the end of the address, if he takes issue with what has been said, otherwise he must raise a point of order and he has not done so.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No hon. gentleman, I say with great respect, has the right to say that one hon. member has misled the house, as the hon. gentleman said I had and as he has suggested the Leader of the Opposition had. I was simply saying in defence of the position I took that we were using the same figures—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have no doubt that the allegation that an hon. member has misled the house is offensive and certainly our rules are against offensive language, but it has been a practice that is well established that unless there is more than a simple statement that a member has been misleading, it is not regarded as being unparliamentary.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The figure of unplaced applicants, as every hon. member in this house ought to know, is not the figure of unemployed in this country. I did not ignore—

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the minister permit a question about this?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No. I did not ignore this subject in the budget speech. I expressed my belief in an early improvement in the unemployment problem, and I still do. I believe that the policies that have been reflected in this budget will aid substantially in improving the problem of unemployment in this country.

I have something to say as well on the subject of trade. In this situation we have had desultory remarks on this subject, jibes from hon. members opposite, not all confined to the budget debate, but appearing from time to time in the course of questions on the orders of the day and in other passages which might, I should have thought, have been better put forward in straightforward speeches if those were matters of conviction on their part.

I am not going to repeat what I said in the budget speech about the tariff proposals; I simply draw attention to the fact that when we have heard talk in this house about trade questions we have heard double-talk on the part of the hon. members opposite. One member of the opposition rose and posed as an apostle of free trade, and a seatmate or someone near him from the ranks of the same party rose and posed as an apostle of protection and high tariff. This is not new.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am raising a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Your Honour will recall that at the time the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River made his amendment some objection was taken by the Minister of Finance to certain parts of it and certain parts were removed at the direction of the Chair. It would appear to me that anything that was not the subject of the amendment could not be the subject of debate. The Minister of Finance is clearly here seeking to revive a debate on a subject on which the house made a decision on a motion to go into supply. I do not think he should be allowed to proceed on this line, in view of the fact that we were stopped.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. gentleman, of course, has forgotten that the budget does contain some proposals with respect to customs tariff and proposals that do affect trade. The hon. member has just revealed the condition of confusion to which I was going to point in the evidence that I was about to adduce. Perhaps it is not necessary now; the hon. member has proved my point.

Mr. Speaker: The minister does propose to continue to discuss the matter of trade?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, I have something to say on the subject.

Mr. Speaker: Then we shall deal with the point of order. It is quite true that the formal amendment was amended in two particulars: one, to remove the item as stated by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, but the debate itself has not been restrained either in that or in any other way. Perhaps it is an inconsistency in our practice, but the amendment was corrected so as not to put the house in the untenable position of having an amendment on a matter on which it had already voted.

I have not sought to restrain the debate itself. In fact the minister, when he made his budget speech, discussed these same matters. I have not attempted to restrain any others. I hope the hon. member will accept it as a condition of debate that is not strictly logical, having regard to what was done with the amendment.

Mr. Pickersgill: I accept willingly, sir.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member is most gracious.

I have reminded the house of the resolutions that relate to tariff proposals and how they affect the textile trade in certain regards. This leads me to make a comment concerning our trade relations with Japan. Attempts have been made on the part of hon. members opposite, not in a very straightforward way, more by stealth than otherwise, to make a political football out of this question. Let me make it as clear as I can that we in the government will do all we reasonably can to avoid matters pertaining to Japanese trade becoming a political football in this country.

Our relations with Japan are very friendly. We desire a valuable two-way commercial relationship in our trade with Japan. I pointed out before that our desire is for trade growth on an orderly basis. Orderly growth is the feature of the trade policy we pursue with respect to Japan. Our position in this respect has been brutally misrepresented, particularly in western Canada. Papers like the Winnipeg Free Press and the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix have been seeking to mislead western Canada into thinking that the policy of the federal government is somehow going to hurt the Japanese market for Canadian wheat and other products. There is not and there never was any foundation in fact for that attempt to mislead the people of western Canada. This has been misrepresentation.

I can cite some facts in this regard and I shall do so; but let me first of all comment on the fact that export quotas are applied by Japan with respect to shipments of certain commodities to Canada. Where did the system of export quotas originate, and when? Let us have an end to the double-talk from hon. members opposite. Those quotas originated in the time of the Liberal government in this country. The quota on cotton blouses and sportshirts was applied January 1, 1956; the quota on cotton fabrics, on April 1, 1956; the quota on cotton damask table cloths applied September 1, 1956; the quota on cotton coats and slacks, February 1, 1957; the quota on cotton knitted wear, February 1, 1957; the quota on cotton pillow cases, February 1, 1957. Now, when we are negotiating the application of quotas for 1960 on this and on spun rayon and other products you would think we were throwing to the winds all concern for the export markets of western Canada in Japan. Did you ever hear anything more hypocritical than hon. members opposite who were the authors of most of the system of export quotas applied by Japan in its shipments to Canada? The story does not end there.

The trade of these two countries is carried on in pursuance of an agreement that was entered into between these two countries in 1954. I do not need to remind you what party was in power in Canada in 1954. I may remind you that the Japanese trade treaty was fully supported by the Conservative party in this house in the debate on this measure in 1954. That trade agreement was accompanied by an exchange of letters, and a letter written on March 31, 1954 to the ambassador of Japan to Canada contains this statement:

> On the occasion of signing the agreement on commerce between Canada and Japan, I have the honour to inform Your Excellency that the government of Canada reserves the right to establish values for ordinary and special duty purposes in the following terms:
> 1. If, as a result of unforeseen developments and of the effect of the obligations incurred by Canada under the aforesaid agreement, any product is being imported into its territory in such increased quantities and under such conditions as to cause or threaten serious injury to the domestic producers in its territory of like or directly competitive products, Canada will be free, in respect of such product, and to the extent and for such a time as may be necessary to prevent or remedy such injury, to establish values for ordinary and special duty purposes.
> 2. In determining whether values should be established in respect of any product pursuant to paragraph 1 and in determining the level at which such values should be established, Canada will take into account the prices of like or directly competitive products, if any, being imported at that time from other countries.
> 3. Before Canada takes action pursuant to paragraph 1, it will give notice in writing to Japan as far in advance as may be practicable and will afford the latter an opportunity to consult with it in respect of the proposed action. In critical circumstances, where delay would cause damage which it would be difficult to repair, action under paragraph 1 may be taken provisionally without prior consultation, on the condition that consultation shall take place immediately after taking such action.

Perhaps I should read the balance of the letter. There is only a paragraph.

I have the honour to state further that in the view of the government of Canada these provisions are consistent with the general agreement on tariffs and trade and that the government of Canada will regard these provisions as continuing to be applicable in the event that the general agreement on tariffs and trade is applied between Canada and Japan.

That is a letter written on March 31, 1954, a letter that stipulated the right on the part of Canada to apply fixed values for duty, special values for duty, on Japanese imports into Canada where there was a threat of serious injury to domestic producers in Canada as a result of imports in increased quantities. Do you know who signed that letter, Mr. Speaker? Who set up the provision in this regard that gives Canada the right to impose fixed values for duty on imports from Japan under this treaty? Oh, Mr. Speaker, think of it. The name appended to this letter is L. B. Pearson, secretary of state for external affairs.

Mr. Pickersgill: How dramatic.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Will we be treated to more of these questions by hon. members opposite suggestive of their shock and horror at the idea of our negotiating in a friendly way agreed export quotas to be applied by Japan on the shipment of goods to Canada where grave injury is threatened to Canadian competitive producers? I think it is well to remind hon. members opposite that it was they, that it was their leader of this day who wrote into the agreement with Japan a covering letter under which he reserved on the part of the government of Canada the power to apply fixed values for duty in any such circumstances. Is it not time that there was an end to the hypocrisy that we have had to listen to as hon. members opposite have wrung their hands on this subject?

The proof of the pudding is in the eating. Let us look at the facts. Is there anything in the facts that gives warrant to any person in this country to think that the government is losing any of its concern over the export market in Japan for products of western Canada? Let me give very briefly some simple facts in this respect. We have said that there is no foundation for the fears that hon. members are conjuring up about the loss of our export markets in Japan. Here are the figures of Canadian exports to Japan:

Year	Amount
1956	$127,870,000
1957	$139,152,000
1958	$104,891,000
1959	$139,857,000

Are we losing any markets in Japan? Canada's exports to Japan in 1959 were the greatest on record and they are still increasing. Here are the figures for the first two months of 1959 and 1960. In 1959 the figure was $17,250,000 and in 1960 $27,462,000. They are going up by leaps and bounds.

What about all this talk about the loss of our export market in Japan for wheat from the Canadian prairies? Let us ask ourselves if anyone can seriously suggest that there has been any loss or any reason to fear a loss of our export market for wheat in Japan. Here are the figures:

Year	Amount
1956	$56,677,000
1957	$53,673,000
1958	$62,773,000
1959	$69,165,000

Our wheat exports to Japan have been rising steadily since this government came into office.

Mr. Pickersgill: And before.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): And they are still going up. Here are the figures for the first two months of 1959 and 1960. In 1959 the figure was $6,792,000 and in 1960, $12,082,000. These figures demonstrate very clearly even to hon. members opposite that our exports to Japan in the first two months of this year were almost double what they were in the first two months of 1959. This government has no lesson to learn from hon. members opposite, the remnant of the Liberal regime of earlier years, in the matter of concern for and determination to preserve and extend Canada's export markets abroad for good Canadian wheat.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate will be wringing his hands before we are through with the budget bills and resolutions about all the injury that this government, by its fiscal policies, has done to Canada's export trade. He wanted to wring his hands—I said his hands—a couple of years ago about the injury that we were going to do to our export trade to Italy. When we adjusted the tariff very slightly on imported woollen fabrics from Italy in 1959 one would have thought that all doors in Italy would be closed to Canadian exports and particularly exports of codfish. That slight increase in duties became effective on April 10, 1959. Did it result in or was it followed by a cataclysmic drop in our exports to Italy?

Here are the facts, Mr. Speaker. In 1959 total exports to Italy were up about 8 per cent compared with 1958, and increases were general throughout most of the major commodity groups, including agricultural and fisheries products. The value of exports to Italy of codfish—light and heavy salted codfish and frozen codfish blocks, combined—increased from $763,000 in 1958 to $987,000 in 1959 or an increase of 30 per cent. How wrong can a man be?

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the minister permit a question? Has the minister seen the tariff that the common market is proposing to put on codfish, which will have a very deleterious effect on these exports if something is not done about it?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On various occasions in this house the efforts that the present government has made in dealing with this situation have been reported to the house in detail. But I wish to say this to the hon. member, that what is being proposed with regard to the averaging of tariffs on the part of the six in Europe has nothing whatsoever to do with the very slight increase that was applied by Canada in April of 1959 on imported woollen fabrics from Italy, and the figures I have just given the house show how wrong the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was in his gloomy and doleful prognostications.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, I hope I was.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You were.

Mr. Pickersgill: We will see.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have little to add to what I have been saying. I shall just remind the house that each year I have given in relation to the proposed changes in the customs tariff what I call a box score on the changes. I have always made it clear that this is not a complete picture of the effect of the changes, but it is interesting as one test when we are pictured as voracious high protectionists who are not the least bit concerned about Canada's export markets.

I point to the fact that Canada's export trade under this government in 1959 reached an all time record. Here is the box score on tariff changes. In 1958 there were 17 increases, 46 decreases and 64 others that are of a mixed nature that perhaps do not lend themselves to simple classification. In 1959 there were 32 increases, 40 decreases and 70 other formal changes of a mixed nature. In 1960 there were 16 increases, 38 decreases and 69 formal changes of a mixed nature. The composite box score for the three budgets is 65 increases, 124 decreases and 203 formal changes of a mixed nature.

Mr. Benidickson: What does that mean?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It just gives the answer to the nonsense or exposes the nonsense talked by hon. members opposite.

I have made no apology for what I have said to the house concerning the reasons for confidence in the Canadian outlook. I do not share at all the gloomy statements which were made this afternoon by the Leader of the Opposition. He did not give a fair, a balanced picture in what he said about our current accounts balance of payments.

As I tried to follow him this afternoon I think he was speaking about 1956, and he said the balance against us was $1.2 billion. He left the impression, as I understood his remarks, that this applied to all transactions and he said that today the balance of payments deficit was increasing. However, if I correctly apprehended his remarks, the Leader of the Opposition is quite wrong. Let me give him the figures for 1956 in relation to our current balance of payments deficit with the United States. In 1956, the last full calendar year of Liberal rule, the deficit in our merchandise trade with the United States was $1,167 million; our deficit on non-merchandise items was $472 million in that year; our deficit on both accounts with the United States was $1,639 million. He left the impression that this condition was growing worse, so I lay alongside those figures the figures for 1959 in relation to our balance of payments with the United States. In 1959 the merchandise balance deficit was $518 million and the non-merchandise deficit totalled $718 million, a total of $1,236 million. This represents an improvement by way of reduction in the deficit in our commercial relations with the United States between those two years of $403 million. This just accidentally escaped the attention of the Leader of the Opposition.

In so far as the extraordinary statements he made this afternoon about the actions of the Bank of Canada in relation to the purchase and sale of bonds are concerned, either the Leader of the Opposition did not understand the situation at all or he was proceeding on quite erroneous information. I do not direct the operations of the Bank of Canada in relation to its purchases and sales of bonds. The Minister of Finance has no authority to do that. The bank reaches its own decisions in that respect. Indeed, while they may occasionally acquaint the minister with what they are doing in that respect or what they are aiming to do, they do not consult him in relation to their own decisions in this respect. He has no authority over them in that regard. When reference is made to the fact that the Bank of Canada has been selling long term bonds, then apparently the Leader of the Opposition is not aware that this has the effect of increasing the yields of long term bonds and widening the spread between long term and short term interest rates; that this, in turn, has the effect of stimulating saving by giving more incentive to investors to hold long term bonds. In its operations, I think the Bank of Canada has been proceeding in a way very different from that described to the house this afternoon by the Leader of the Opposition.

In my concluding remarks, let me say this: There is a sound basis for confidence in Canada today. All the gloom that the Leader of the Opposition and his associates are creating, if people would listen to them, is not going to change the facts and these are facts that give reason for solid confidence in Canada.

Let me remind the house very quickly that, in the first place, inflation has been contained. As I said in the budget speech, many of the inflationary factors are quiescent. We cannot rest on our laurels, however. We have to be vigilant in this respect at all times. It is well, however, to proceed on facts, not on errors, as hon. members opposite have been doing. They would have you believe that we have not been successful in our efforts to grapple with inflation.

Here are the figures. The consumer price index in January, 1959, was 126.1 and in March, 1960, 126.9. Does that sound as though things got out of hand in 1959? Here is what the Leader of the Opposition said a year ago in his doleful prophecy about inflation. According to page 2914 of Hansard for April 21, 1959, he said this:

> This year there should be less, but still serious, unemployment and a greater danger of inflation.

How wrong can he be? Here are the figures for the general index of wholesale prices. In January, 1959, it was 229.7 and in March, 1960, 229.6. Does that sound as though inflation got out of hand in 1959? These are the facts, and the incontestable facts.

Next, in speaking of trade, I have pointed to the fact that in 1959 Canada's export trade reached an all time record of $5.2 billion, and the rapid increase has continued in 1960. In the first two months of 1960 domestic exports of this country reached a total of $832 million as compared with $655 million in the same two months a year ago. This represents an increase of approximately one third in our exports in the first two months of this year over the first two months of last year. What shall we say of the hon. member for Essex East who, according to the press, used this expression in Montreal on April 6: "The stagnation in Canada's export trade". We have apparently an all time record, with rapid increases, but to the hon. member for Essex East this means stagnation.

Hon. members are now aware of the decision that was announced last week in relation to the export of gas and what this is going to mean in terms of the expansion of the Canadian economy and again in contributing to a better balance in our commercial relations with the United States.

Mr. Benidickson: Two years too late.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This decision was reached after having satisfied ourselves by an exhaustive inquiry that the needs of Canadians would first be assured.

Mr. Pickersgill: After having satisfied yourself that C. D. Howe was right.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The last point to which I have time to refer is the fact that benefits have already accrued to the Canadian economy from this balanced budget. The fact is that it has brought renewed confidence to the Canadian people and to the Canadian economy. In the budget speech I said that it is going to make it easier for the provinces, the municipalities and business to borrow in Canada because the federal government will be largely withdrawing from the role of a net borrower. Already benefits have been experienced in this regard. One has only to look at the reception accorded to a recent province of Ontario bond issue at a lower rate of interest than that at which they were borrowing quite recently.

Mr. Benidickson: You promised that two years ago.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You see this renewed confidence expressed in that way. There are other benefits that are going to follow from the budget and from this withdrawal of the federal government from a net borrowing position. There will be less occasion than there was—if indeed there was any justification—for provinces and municipalities to be going to the United States to borrow, with all the dangers in that respect of which I have attempted respectfully to give warning. Already we are seeing benefits in this respect. It is only about a month ago that the premium on the Canadian dollar was five cents. Today it is less than three and a half cents.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being 9.45 o'clock p.m. it is my duty, pursuant to subsection 5 of standing order 58, to interrupt these proceedings and put forthwith the question on the amendment now before the house.

C.N.R. ROUNDHOUSE, L'ISLET COUNTY, QUE.

Question No. 263—Mr. Bourget:

1. Did the Canadian National Railways sell or lease a roundhouse at Monk station, Tourville, in the county of l'Islet, Quebec?
2. If so, to whom, and what are the terms of the sale or lease?

Answer by: Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport):

Questions

The management of Canadian National Railways advise as follows:—

1. Yes.

2. As a result of dieselization certain land and roundhouse facilities became surplus to needs. Through the efforts of the C.N.R. industrial department an industry was established, which employs about 50 men, by the leasing of the facilities to N. Gagnon and Fils Ltee. The lease dated January 1, 1959, provides an option to purchase the enginehouse only during the period of the lease.

3. If so, will the Minister of Transport make a report to the house regarding these negotiations?
4. Are further negotiations contemplated in the near future?

Answer by: Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport):

AGRICULTURE

DAIRY PRODUCTS—ANNOUNCEMENT OF PRICE SUPPORT PROGRAM

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the government has authorized the agricultural stabilization board to continue the present levels of price support for the dairy industry during the period May 1, 1960 to April 30, 1961.

The price support for butter during the dairy year May 1, 1960 to April 30, 1961 will be 64 cents per pound for Canada first grade creamery butter scoring 40-93, basis delivery Montreal, with appropriate price differentials for other grades and qualities.

The price support for Ontario cheese, Canada first grade waxed, f.o.b. warehouse, will be 32 cents per pound; and for Quebec cheese, Canada first grade waxed, basis delivery Montreal, 31½ cents per pound. In addition, 25 cents per 100 pounds will continue to be paid for whole milk delivered for manufacturing purposes, exclusive of milk from producers who sell a portion of their milk in the fluid, bottled milk market.

During 1959 butter production totalled 324 million pounds, 20 million pounds in excess of the consumption of 304 million pounds, and total stocks of butter as of May 1 will approach 75 million pounds. In view of the potential surplus of butter the agricultural stabilization board is also being authorized to purchase some quantities of whole milk powder as a means of reducing butter production and thereby bring production into a more realistic relationship with consumption. Production of whole milk powder will divert milk from the manufacture of butter and skim milk powder. The total quantity of whole milk powder that will be purchased will depend on the trend of butter production during the year.

The agricultural stabilization board will not purchase any skim milk powder, but the purchase of whole milk powder will not only reduce the potential supply of butter, but will at the same time reduce the amount of skim milk powder manufactured. Ten pounds of whole milk powder is equivalent to approximately 3 pounds of butter and 7.5 pounds of skim milk powder.

During the past two years there has been a progressive decline in butter consumption in Canada, both in total quantity and per capita The Department of Agriculture will therefore undertake a publicity and advertising campaign with a view to stimulating the consumption of butter.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the statement of the Minister of Agriculture follows, as the house will recall, what now proves to be the wise interrogation the other day of the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska, who in effect, has already made the announcement which the minister made today to the thundering applause of his supporters. It is regrettable that the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska is away from the house at this time and not able to hear this confirmation of his own wisdom.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Eyewash.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Minister of Finance interjects and says this is eyewash. All I can say, after the long speech of the Minister of Finance last night, is that he established himself as the best authority of what is eyewash.

The Minister of Agriculture, in the announcement he has made, has given encouragement to those of us who now hope the government will not go further in repudiating its policy of price support by adopting, as it did in the case of hogs and eggs, the principle of deficiency payments.

Mr. Harkness: There is no repudiation there.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is regrettable that the Minister of Agriculture has not taken advantage of the opportunity, before the recess, not only of announcing that present levels on dairy products are to be maintained under the Agricultural Prices Stabilization Act but has not announced the floor prices on some other products. I for one would like to know what the floor price will be on sugar beets, and it is regrettable that corn is not included. In any event, this announcement by the minister will be carefully scrutinized, and we in the Liberal party are very happy over the contribution made by one of our members toward this announcement today.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I think I should correct what appears to be a complete misapprehension on the part of the hon. member for Essex East as a result of this announcement. The announcement is not what the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska stated the other day. The statement he made was exactly the statement which I made a year ago in connection with this matter. This is quite a different statement and has totally different implications, as the hon. member will discover when he studies it.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker on behalf of this group I wish to say that judging from the sustained applause this is the first welcome announcement made by the Minister of Agriculture this session. This group will study the proposal and make certain the applause was justified.

STARRED QUESTIONS

INCOME TAX DEDUCTIONS, HOSPITAL COSTS

Question No. 106—Mr. Michaud:

1. Are the basic costs of hospital treatment in a province participating in the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act deductible from income for federal income tax purposes?
2. If so, to what extent?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the answers to these two questions are rather involved and technical and contain legal terms. I could read them, but with the consent of the house I would ask that they be printed in Hansard rather than attempt to read them at this time.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house unanimously agree that the answers should be printed without being read?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: the answers referred to above are as follows:]

1. Where, pursuant to section 3 of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act, any agreement entered into by and between a province of Canada and the Minister of National Health and Welfare provides for the payment by Canada to that province of contributions in respect of the basic costs of insured hospital services or treatment incurred by the province, the said basic costs of hospital treatment are not ordinarily deductible for purposes of federal income tax. In the majority of instances the participant is not liable to pay for treatment received or, if he is, he is entitled to reimbursement under the provincial plan. In neither case would the expense incurred be deductible for purposes of federal income tax.

2. Where, however, in any such province as above indicated, additional costs for hospital treatment to cover the difference between the basic costs as prescribed by provincial law (e.g. standard ward care) and, for instance, the cost of semi-private or private ward care, have been incurred and paid by the taxpayer or reimbursed to him pursuant to the provisions of any other hospital treatment plan, the additional costs so incurred are, subject to the provisions of section 27(1)(c) of the Income Tax Act, deductible for the purposes of federal income tax.

Moreover, hospital expenses incurred in the province by a taxpayer who is not a participant in the plan would also be deductible, subject to the provisions of section 27(1)(c) of the Income Tax Act.

UNCONDITIONAL GRANTS TO PROVINCES

Question No. 111—Mr. Pickersgill:

1. What is the total amount paid annually to each of the provinces in unconditional payments, apart from payments made under the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act?
2. At what date was each such payment originally made in each province and what is the statutory authority for each such payment?
3. Is a terminal date prescribed for any such payment or payments and, if so, what is the terminal date in each case?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the answer to these involved questions occupies four long pages of single-spaced typing. I do not think it would be practicable to read it particularly as it involves the citations of some dozens of statutes. May I suggest that it be printed in Hansard without being read?

I simply offer the observation that I think this raises a serious question as to whether this a suitable question to be made a starred question.

Mr. Speaker: It should have been made an order for return perhaps. Does the house agree to having the answer printed in Hansard without being read?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: The answers referred to above are as follows:]

2. and 3. In the following table the fiscal year in which each payment originally commenced is given as well as the statutory authority under which the payment was made in 1958-59 which is often not the original authority. It has not been possible from the public accounts of Canada to determine with certainty the fiscal year in which Canada began to pay the interest on debt allowance to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. With respect to the 50 per cent of federal income tax on certain public utilities, the 1958-59 payment was the last authorized by 1 Eliz. II c. 49 (1949) but the payment has been continued by a vote in the Appropriation Act.

AUTAIR HELICOPTER SERVICES LIMITED

Question No. 117—Mr. Chevrier:

1. Did the licences issued by the air transport board to Autair Helicopter Services Limited restrict this firm to the use of small helicopters?
2. If so, did Autair Helicopter Services Limited apply for a removal of the restrictions and was the application denied by the air transport board?
3. Did Autair Helicopter Services Limited appeal from this decision to the Minister of Transport?
4. If so, what decision was made by the minister and for what reason?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answer to part 1 is yes.

With regard to part 2, Autair Helicopter Services Limited applied to the air transport board for removal of this restriction from its licence No. A.T.B. 887/58 (H) which authorized the licensee to operate a class 4 charter commercial air service from a base at St. Eugene, Ontario. This application was denied by the board by decision serial No. 1275 dated June 1, 1959.

The answer to part 3 is yes.

As to part 4, the appeal was granted as I was satisfied, after giving due consideration to the submissions of the appellant and the interveners in the appeal, and after reviewing air transport board decisions serial Nos. 1111 of July 18, 1958, and 1198 of November 17, 1958, and after further considering the general problem, that the public interest would not be served by subjecting the operation of the type of service proposed by the appellant to the restriction contained in its licence and that the additional competition which the appellant company would be able to provide if the restriction were to be removed would not only be of benefit to the using public, but in the long run would be in the best interests of the industry itself.

1. Has Mr. M. T. Keam an employee of the Department of National Revenue, been sent to the U.S.S.R. by the federal government?
2. If so, what is the purpose of his trip?

BOMARC BASE TENDER, MONT LAURIER, QUE.

Question No. 119—Mr. Hellyer:

1. Has a tender been let for the initial construction work at the Bomarc base near Mont Laurier?
2. If so, what is the reason for the delay?

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, the answer to part 1 is no. The answer to part 2 is that tenders have been received and are being reviewed by Defence Construction (1951) Limited. They have not yet been submitted to treasury board.

RECRUITMENT INSTRUCTIONS, LIGHTHOUSE TENDERS, B.C.

Question No. 120—Mr. Howard:

1. Since April 1, 1959, have any instructions been issued to the marine agents in either Prince Rupert or Victoria, British Columbia, with respect to the recruitment of personnel for lighthouse tenders?
2. If so, what are the contents and purpose of each such instruction?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answer to part 1 is yes. Instructions were issued to the district marine agents at Victoria and Prince Rupert on the procedures to be followed with respect to recruitment of personnel for lighthouse supply and buoy vessels.

As to part 2, these instructions fall in the following three categories:

(a) Instructions to the district marine agents concerning promotion competitions for officer positions on new departmental vessels. The purpose of these instructions was to give departmental employees an opportunity for promotion in accordance with established departmental policy.

(b) Instructions regarding procedures to be followed by the district marine agents in reviewing the qualifications of existing staff and in effecting transfers of qualified staff from older vessels to the new vessels. The purpose of these instructions was to provide as far as possible continuity of employment for qualified existing staff and at the same time provide experienced personnel for the new vessels.

(c) Instructions to district marine agents on the procedures to be followed in interviewing applicants for employment on departmental vessels. The purpose of these instructions was to provide for the filling of any vacancies remaining after promotional competitions and transfers of existing staff had been determined.

CHIGNECTO CANAL—ECONOMIC STUDY

Question No. 122—Mr. McWilliam:

1. Did the premier of New Brunswick make a formal request to the federal government for a full scale economic study by the federal government to determine the economic feasibility of the Chignecto canal?

2. If so, what action has been taken?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman would permit I would like to answer questions 121 and 122 together.

While no formal request was made by the premier of New Brunswick along the lines indicated in the two questions, informal discussions have taken place from time to time and strong representations have been made by Premier Flemming for action in connection with the Chignecto canal. Recently he advised me that the province of New Brunswick had set up a body to make an economic investigation of the feasibility of the canal. That report is expected very shortly, and following that report a formal request will be made along the lines indicated in the two questions.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

WHARF CONSTRUCTION, MALARTIC RIVER, QUE.

Motion No. 83—Mr. Dumas:

For a copy of all payrolls showing the names of those employed, the period of employment and the amount paid to each person, in connection with the reconstruction, during 1959, of a wharf located on the west bank of the Malartic river, range 4, in the township of Malartic, Quebec.

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I was under the impression the last time this motion came up that it was to stand till after the Royal Canadian Mounted Police had completed its investigation.

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that this investigation is not concluded, I wish my motion to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Is the motion to stand until the matter mentioned by the Minister of Public Works has concluded?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion stands.

RECRUITMENT INSTRUCTIONS, LIGHTHOUSE TENDERS, B.C.

Motion No. 90—Mr. Howard:

For a copy of all instructions issued since April 1, 1959, to marine agents in British Columbia, and dealing with the recruitment of personnel for lighthouse tenders.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): The subject matter of this motion has already been dealt with in the answer made today to starred question No. 120 in the name of the hon. member for Skeena, and full information given.

With regard to the motion itself, I would point out that such instructions are in the form of intradepartmental memoranda from head office to the district marine agents, and consequently fall clearly under the heading of privileged papers. It is the recognized and long established practice that intradepartmental memoranda should not be produced, and I hope the hon. member will therefore be agreeable to withdrawing his motion, particularly as his starred question has been answered in detail.

Mr. Howard: I will withdraw it, not on the basis of the starred question having been answered but in the light of the minister's statement that these so-called memoranda are privileged.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house consent to this motion being withdrawn?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn and order discharged.

DISALLOWANCE OF LABOUR LEGISLATION, NFLD.

Motion No. 93—Mr. Winch:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged, during the past twelve months, between the federal government, or any agency or branch thereof, and the province of Newfoundland; and any interdepartmental correspondence and documents, dealing with disallowance or otherwise of labour legislation passed by the legislature of Newfoundland.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): This motion really consists of two parts, one asking for a copy of correspondence which passed between this government and the government of the province of Newfoundland, and the other for the production of interdepartmental correspondence and documents.

With respect to the second part, these documents, I submit, fall clearly within the class of documents the production of which is not in the public interest. They are interdepartmental and have always been regarded therefore as privileged. I suggest to the hon. member that if he is prepared to drop that part of his motion, we should be prepared to accept the first part covering intergovernmental correspondence subject to the usual reservation with respect to ascertaining the attitude of the provincial government. If the hon. member is not prepared to follow this course, then I regret I will have to oppose the motion.

Mr. Winch: I appreciate the remarks made by the Minister of Justice with regard to the position he has taken, but in view of the fact that there are indications that in the past such documents have been produced I would ask the minister if he would allow this motion to stand for the present.

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: The motion stands.

Motion stands.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NATIONAL DEFENCE

BOMARC MISSILE—REPORTED CRITICISM BY UNITED STATES SENATOR

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Has the minister been advised of the latest developments in the United States in respect to the Bomarc missile and, if so, has he any report to give the house?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): I have no further report to make since the one I gave on March 28.

Mr. Hellyer: A supplementary question. Has the minister seen the statement by Senator Chavez, chairman of the United States Senate appropriations subcommittee on defence, which implies that Canadians are getting an inferior weapon "which is not good enough for us"?

Mr. Pearkes: Yes, I have seen that statement. It is a personal opinion expressed by a Democratic senator, an opinion not dissimilar to those which have been expressed from time to time by the hon. member for Trinity.

Mr. Hellyer: I agree with Senator Chavez. Would the minister assure the house at this time that he is still confident that the Bomarc alone is the best defence for Canada?

Mr. Pearkes: I have never at any time claimed that the Bomarc alone was the best defence for Canada.

Mr. Hellyer: Have we anything else?

POLICY RESPECTING ESTABLISHMENT OF SCHOOLS ON SERVICE BASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. I put it because of the number of inquiries I have had by mail. Is the minister in a position to inform us what consideration is being given to the policy of his department with respect to the setting up of religious or non-secular schools on defence bases or establishments for the children of service personnel?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): The policy of the Department of National Defence with respect to schools at service bases is that those establishments must conform to provincial laws. There are separate Catholic and Protestant schools established at bases in the province of Quebec. In all other provinces there are joint schools.

Mr. Fisher: What is the situation with respect to schools that are beyond provincial jurisdiction? There are a number of such cases, as the minister is aware.

Mr. Pearkes: As far as Europe is concerned, the schools there are public schools and conform to the educational standards of the province of Ontario. In no case outside of the province of Quebec is there established in any camp what are generally known as separate schools.

[Later:]

Mr. Pearkes: In case I left a wrong impression in my answer to the hon. member for Port Arthur, may I say that these schools were established some 10 years ago and that there has been no change in policy since then. This applies to the schools in the province of Quebec, the schools in the other parts of Canada and in Europe.

IMMIGRATION

IRENE REBRIN—REQUEST FOR PERSONAL REVIEW BY PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to ask the Prime Minister a question. The question is also in the nature of an unspoken appeal on behalf of a thousand university people who are concerned with this case.

In view of representations made to the right hon. gentleman by the faculty association of the University of British Columbia on behalf of Miss Irene Rebrin, respectfully asking him to personally review the documents and evidence in her case and to give Miss Rebrin an opportunity to provide answers to any specific evidence against her, will the Prime Minister give favourable consideration to the representations of this faculty association and other groups lest, as they suggest, an injustice be done?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I need hardly assure the house that the government is most concerned to see that no injustice is done. Such actions as we take in this field are scrupulously examined, to the end that in administering and complying with the laws, as is our responsibility, not only is justice done, but justice is tempered with mercy wherever possible.

As the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mrs. Fairclough) emphasized when making her statement in the house on April 7, as reported at page 2993 of Hansard, Miss Rebrin's case was most carefully examined from this point of view. This examination was directed first toward seeing whether the order was properly made on valid and substantial grounds, and whether the dismissal of her appeal was made on valid and proper grounds. Having been satisfied on this point, the government then considered whether any discretion vested in the minister under the act should be exercised to vary or rescind the order. For the reasons given by the minister in the statement to which I have referred, the government is satisfied that this is not a case where the order should be interfered with.

This is a case where our responsibility to the national interest is paramount. I should like to add this. I did receive the message in question from the faculty association. In February last, when this matter was under consideration, a representative of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration called on the president of the University of British Columbia, Dr. N. A. M. MacKenzie, to discuss the matter with him. At that time Dr. MacKenzie said, "I will go along with the decision without any question or protest".

Mr. Herridge: He is a jellyfish.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I should like to ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question. As the champion of a bill of rights will he tell us whether an opportunity will be given to one found guilty to know the basis on which she has been found guilty, and also an opportunity to present her case?

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me the hon. member is asking a rather hypothetical question. He is referring to the bill of rights..

Mr. Winch: I am asking whether a person, having been found guilty, will be allowed to present her case and know the charges that have been made against her?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order I suggest, sir, that if this is not a hypothetical question certainly it is very close to it, because the hon. member is phrasing his question in words which suggest something which is not the fact. On that basis I suggest that it would amount to a hypothetical question.

Mr. Winch: I am sorry; I am not asking a hypothetical question. I am asking whether an opportunity will be given to the person involved to know the charge against her and to reply.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member's question does make a statement that is not in accordance with what has taken place as I understand it from what I have heard in the house. The question has been fully answered on two occasions now. I am afraid

I cannot accept the supplementary question in the form in which the hon. member asks it.

Mr. Winch: Then may I ask the Prime Minister this question. Has the person involved been informed as to the substance of the charges against her which make her ineligible to remain in Canada?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, when a question of security arises, and when a review has been made of the evidence, or the basis for the conclusion in that regard, I cannot go further, in the public interest.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Has the government satisfied itself that it is practicable to carry out the deportation in this case? Has the government also satisfied itself that there is some country that is willing and able to receive the proposed deportee?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I think the answer is in the affirmative. I would not want to go into further details, but what I know of the question indicates that there is such a country.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I might be permitted to ask a further supplementary question. In view of the very grave considerations involved, can the Prime Minister assure the house that this person will not be deported to any communist country?

Mr. Henderson: That is where she belongs.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the country I have in mind is not a communist country.

AIR TRANSPORT

(Translation):

T.C.A.—ADVERTISEMENT RESPECTING LANGUAGE QUALIFICATIONS OF HOSTESSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport? The last issue of the magazine In Flight has an article about Trans-Canada Air Lines hostesses and their qualifications. The fifth basic requirement, as set out therein, has to do with language. It reads as follows:

(Text):

Applicant must be able to read, write and converse fluently in English. French is an additional requirement on T.C.A.'s overseas services.

(Translation):

Would the Minister of Transport see to it that the section restricting French to overseas services be amended so as to place French on the same footing as English, in the matter of language requirements?

(Text):

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member for Sherbrooke brought this matter to my attention I immediately got in touch with Trans-Canada Air Lines, and I have been assured by them that in future advertisements appearing in the publication In Flight the fifth basic requirement for hostesses for overseas service will read:

Applicants must be able to read and converse fluently in English and French.

NATURAL GAS

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES—INQUIRY AS TO NEW REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arthur Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources whether the government are yet prepared to announce their new Northwest Territories regulations for oil and gas. In replying, perhaps the minister might comment on the number of leases or reservations which currently have been issued for the territories or the Arctic islands.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, the new Canada oil and gas regulations have been passed. Promulgation will occur some time today, but in view of the importance and significance of the new terms in the regulations concerning participation in the financing and ownership of those resources by Canadians, there will have to be a full statement made by myself as soon as I can possibly arrange to do so.

In regard to the second question, I can only speak from memory. The permits out on the mainland at the present time cover in excess of 96 million acres; the permits out on the Arctic islands and on the continental shelf approximate now, I think, about 146 million acres. There is a total of some 243 million acres now out under permits or application for permits in the north.

UNITED NATIONS

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON PROCEDURES FOR MEASURING RADIOACTIVITY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): In the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs may I ask his parliamentary secretary if he is in a position to report to the house on his visit last week to the United Nations, pursuant to the criticism made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs as to the follow-up by the United Nations of the procedures for measuring world radioactivity levels, under the Canadian resolution and initiative at the last assembly of the United Nations?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, last week, as the hon. member knows, I was in New York looking into this matter at the request of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The United Nations scientific committee on radiation has been authorized to send a letter to member nations requesting those nations to forward samples of food, air, soil and water to various nations which have offered facilities to analyse these samples with a view to ascertaining their radioactive content. A number of countries have volunteered to the United Nations scientific committee on radiation to analyse these samples, Canada, of course, being one of the first.

There have been some slight delays in the United Nations scientific committee sending the letter, but these delays were largely unavoidable as the contents of the letter proposed to be circularized had to be submitted to the specialized agencies of the United Nations such as the world health organization, the international atomic energy agency and the like. As a result the letter was circularized to all member nations last Friday, and there should be no additional delay. I would point out that most of the delays were unavoidable, and I should like to add at this time that the co-operation of Dr. Ralph Bunche, who is in charge of the operation at the United Nations, is certainly much appreciated by the Canadian government.

REPRESENTATIONS BY CANADIAN WELFARE COUNCIL RESPECTING REFUGEES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that this is the last day we will be sitting until quite late in the month, and particularly in the light of the statement made yesterday by the premier of Ontario on this subject, can the Prime Minister say whether the government has reached a decision with respect to the submission of the welfare council regarding medical and welfare care of potential refugees who would be privately sponsored?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in so far as the statement made by the premier of Ontario in the legislature yesterday is concerned, no representations have been received by the government of Canada in this regard. All we know is what we have read in the morning newspapers. So far as the wider context of the problem of the refugees in question is concerned, that is still receiving the consideration of the government.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Pickersgill: May I pose a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. Has the suggestion I made, which he will recall, been brought to the attention of his colleagues, and is it also receiving consideration?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): All matters that arose in the course of discussion of the final supplementary estimates which I said I would bring to the attention of my colleagues have been brought to the attention of my respective colleagues in accordance with the undertaking I gave to the committee of supply.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister be prepared to answer the second part of my question, as to whether the suggestion is receiving consideration?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think that question could properly be directed to the minister of the department concerned.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I could ask the parliamentary secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether that suggestion has received consideration. The suggestion was that after a period of say a year, any residual medical or welfare care should be a charge on the federal exchequer.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs): I think perhaps the hon. member might direct his question more properly to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would be very happy to do so.

Mr. John Charlton (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Obviously this is a matter which is the responsibility of the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DISARMAMENT—REPORTED WESTERN REJECTION OF RUSSIAN PROPOSAL ON NUCLEAR WEAPONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Prime Minister, and I apologize for the very short notice I was able to give him. In view of the western delegates' rejection of a Soviet proposal on Monday last in Geneva that the nuclear powers should pledge not to be the first to use nuclear weapons, and in view of the expressed opposition of the Pentagon in the United States to the Soviet proposal, would the Prime Minister inform the house whether the Canadian decision was influenced by the United States point of view?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member said in his opening words, no notice was given of this question except after the opening of the house. However, I have been able to secure an answer.

The hon. gentleman has prefaced his question with a misleading suggestion. There has been no separate Soviet proposal in the current negotiations along the lines suggested by him. What happened was that in response to western probing the Soviet representative offered to rearrange the original Khrushchev plan so as to give earlier priority to a proposed pledge respecting the use of nuclear weapons. This proposed rearrangement has not altered the western five-power judgment that the Khrushchev plan as a whole is unacceptable as the sole basis for negotiation.

The stand taken is an agreed western position which does not detract in any way from the unchanged Canadian desire for agreement on early measures of nuclear disarmament under appropriate safeguards. What has happened is in accordance with an agreed western plan to the end that measures leading to disarmament may be secured.

AIRPORTS

NORTH BAY, ONT.—CALLING OF TENDERS FOR NEW TERMINAL BUILDING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister advise when tenders will be called for the new terminal building at North Bay airport?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Plans for a new terminal building at North Bay were completed, but it was then found necessary for technical reasons to change the location of the control tower. This entailed alterations of plans, and as soon as these are completed tenders will be called.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

REPORTED ADVERTISING FOR RECRUITS OVER U.S. RADIO STATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Is the minister in a position to comment on a Vancouver dispatch to the effect that the Royal Canadian Air Force is advertising for recruits over radio station KVOS, Bellingham, a United States radio station?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Station KVOS is located at Bellingham, Washington and has coverage over the southern part of British Columbia. Fifty per cent of its programs are Canadian sponsored. Some commercials having reference to the R.C.A.F. have been broadcast without cost or obligation to the Department of National Defence. On its own initiative and without the knowledge of the R.C.A.F. the station management has undertaken this activity.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I ask a supplementary question. Does the minister really think it is consonant with the independence and the dignity of this country to be advertising for recruits for the armed forces over a radio station of another country?

Mr. Pearkes: The R.C.A.F. is not advertising over a station in another country. As I explained, the station did it on its own initiative, without any obligation to the Department of National Defence or the R.C.A.F.

Mr. Pickersgill: And without knowledge?

PUBLIC SERVICE

PRINTING BUREAU—REPORTED PRINTING OF STAFF NOTICES IN ENGLISH ONLY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Secretary of State (Mr. Balcer). Has it come to his knowledge that, of late, notices issued to employees of the printing bureau are printed in English only, the last one being the holiday regulations?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Acting Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I was not aware of the fact mentioned by the hon. member.

Mr. Caron: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the Acting Secretary of State promise to see that this situation is remedied?

Mr. Balcer: I shall see it.

HOUSING

INQUIRY AS TO NUMBER OF STARTS IN FIRST QUARTER OF 1960

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Can the minister tell us the number of housing starts that have been made in the first quarter of 1960?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the returns have not yet been compiled. We expect they will be ready later this week, and I will be glad to send my hon. friend a copy.

[Later:]

Mr. Garland: I should like to direct another question to the Minister of Public Works. Would the minister care to comment on the statement made by the executive vice president of the national house builders association to the effect that housing starts this year may be down 30 per cent from the government estimate of 125,000, and if so it will mean 70,000 jobs?

Mr. Walker: No comment, Mr. Speaker.

TRADE

RUSSIA—POSSIBLE REDUCTION IN AMOUNT OF WHEAT PURCHASED

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but before doing so I should like to express to him my best wishes for a safe journey to Moscow.

Mr. Churchill: What about the return?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And, I hope, a safe return. May I ask the minister whether it is a fact, as reported in today's press, that the treaty which he is going to Moscow to sign represents a major reduction in Soviet union wheat purchases from Canada as compared with the 1956 agreement?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): It will depend on the development of trade between the two countries. The last Soviet purchases of wheat from Canada, in the last crop year, were only in the neighbourhood of seven million bushels. In the two previous crop years they were higher than that. There is an opportunity for that amount of purchase on the part of Russia, and an even greater amount, depending on the development of the trade.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Tuesday, April 12, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance will excuse me if I do not discuss the budget speech he made the other evening, or if I do not comment on the very flamboyant and inaccurate speech which he made yesterday. I desire to speak about another subject which is of paramount importance. I shall try to deal with this subject calmly and quietly, leaving aside all considerations of a political nature.

An hon. Member: That will be something new.

Mr. Chevrier: I shall try to deal exclusively with the judicial, technical and other aspects of the problem. The facts which I shall give I believe to be true. They were obtained in part from official documents tabled in this house, in part from answers to questions, in part from personal checks which I have made, and in part from reliable information, information so reliable that I could not, as a member of parliament, refrain from bringing it to the attention of the house. If I am inaccurate or incorrect or unfair in my assessment of the situation I am sure the ministers involved will put me right. If I am correct, I hope immediate action will be taken. I hope the ministers will do me the courtesy of hearing me out and making their comments after mine, since both the ministers have been advised of my intention to raise this matter.

I want to discuss Autair Helicopter Services Limited, a corporation which has been in existence in Canada since June, 1957 only. It has little or no experience in the field of heavier helicopter equipment. It was given a licence to operate the S-55 Sikorsky type helicopter contrary to the ruling of the air transport board and against its decision, after having defied its authority. It now holds an important contract to do helicopter work in northern Canada on the polar continental shelf, where men and equipment will have to be moved under difficult and trying circumstances.

What are the facts? On January 25, 1958 an application was made by Autair Helicopter Services Limited to operate (a) a class 4 charter commercial air service, and (b) a class 7 specialty commercial air service restricted to the operation of single helicopters of the Bell-47 and Sikorsky-51 types from a base at St. Eugene in the province of Ontario. The air transport board held a public hearing on this application in Montreal on May 16, 1958. Although it is the practice of the board to move quickly on these applications, it withheld its decision during the latter part of May, all of June and a large part of July, presumably because a change of policy was under consideration by the government.

It is well known, however, what the views of the board were. It was felt that there were enough helicopters in Canada to satisfy the demand. There was no additional helicopter service needed in Canada, according to the evidence; and upon the evidence adduced at the hearing it is reasonable to believe and conclude that the board would have turned down the application.

On July 14, 1958, in answer to a question by the hon. member for Vancouver South, the Minister of Transport announced the decontrol of group C, or the opening up to competition of non-scheduled commercial air services involving the use of small, light aircraft and helicopters. He stated, as reported on page 2207 of Hansard for that date, as follows:

—the government has accordingly decided that it would be in the public interest that licences for air services using only this small type of aircraft be granted freely on request.

On July 18, 1958, exactly four days after the minister announced this change of policy in the house and pursuant to this policy the air transport board by decision serial No. 1111 gave approval to Autair to operate a class 4 charter commercial air service and a class 7 specialty commercial air service from a base at St. Eugene, Ontario, restricted to the operation of single helicopters of the Bell-47 and Sikorsky-51 types.

On November 17, 1958, by air transport board decision serial No. 1198, approval was given to (1) amend licence No. A.T.B. 887/58 (H) to authorize the operation of the additional class 7 recreational flying specialty and (2) for a licence to operate at Quebec city and Montreal a class 4 charter commercial air service and a class 7 specialty commercial air service, restricted to the operation of single engine helicopters of the Bell-47 and Sikorsky-51 types.

On November 26, 1958 an application was made by Autair for the removal of the restrictions to operate single engine helicopters and for permission to operate the heavier and larger type equipment known as the Sikorsky S-55. On June 1, 1959 this application was denied by the air transport board under decision serial No. 1275 on the following grounds:

(a) That Autair was directed to advertise its request in accordance with board procedure but had failed to do so.

(b) That Autair file with the board proof of financial responsibility which it refused to do.

(c) That Autair give to the board certain information requested in letter from the board dated February 4, 1959 which it also refused to do.

(d) That Autair has consistently refused to provide the board with the information requested and continues so to do.

(e) In these circumstances the board must judge the request for the removal of the restrictions in the light of the evidence adduced in Montreal on May 16, 1958.

(f) The board is not satisfied that it would be in the public interest to authorize the applicant to operate with larger aircraft than those permitted under licence A.T.B. 887/58 (H) and the licensee's request is denied.

This decision was appealed to the minister and the minister allowed the appeal on August 20, 1959, as he indicated in his answer to my starred question this morning. The minister stated that in his opinion decision serial No. 1275 should be set aside and the board should issue a licence to the applicant to operate the services requested with no restrictions as to the size of the aircraft in such service. On September 1, 1959 the board complied with the request.

My contention is that the minister ought not to have interfered with the decision of the board, for the following reasons. First, the board in denying the application was exercising a judicial function, and the minister ought not to have interfered with the board in what was regarded by them, I am sure, as a judicial matter based upon the evidence adduced at the hearing in Montreal. That is borne out, too, by the fact that when the Aeronautics Act was introduced in this house it was clearly stated that so far as judicial matters were concerned there should be no interference in the decisions of the board. The minister ought not to have interfered with the decision of the board, in my opinion, because Autair had categorically refused to advertise its application in accordance with board procedure and refused to furnish proof of financial responsibility as required by the board. Autair still continues to ignore the judgment of the board in that respect. That is my second reason for thinking the minister ought not to have interfered.

My third contention is that Autair had been operating helicopters commercially without a licence, according to information in my possession, in contravention of the Aeronautics Act prior to July 18, 1958. With respect to the specific period from April to July 18, here are the facts. Three helicopters operated on a contract for the Quebec government, which contract began in June, 1958. One helicopter operated for a private company under a contract which began on June 4, 1958. Still another helicopter operated for another department of the Quebec government under a contract beginning April 9, 1958, all in contravention and in violation of the Aeronautics Act.

The president of Autair in his evidence before the air transport board stated that these helicopter services were operating on a demonstration basis only, and that no remuneration was being received for these flights. However, these flights were expensive. The monthly tariff for work of this kind is I am informed $4,500, but he flew for nothing. A compilation of the cost of these flights indicates that three helicopters operated from June, 1958 to July 18, 1958, equalling one and one quarter months or three and three quarter aircraft months. One helicopter operated between June 4 and July 18, 1958, equalling one and one half months or one and one half aircraft months. One helicopter operated between April 9 and July 18, 1958, equalling three and one quarter months or three and one quarter aircraft months. This equals eight and one half aircraft months at $4,500, a total of $38,225. Autair therefore flew five aircraft without charge for which he would be entitled to receive the sum of $38,225 prior to obtaining his licence in July of 1958. Thereafter, I am informed, he increased his tariff from $4,500 to $6,000 per month so as to recapture the loss encountered prior to obtaining the licence.

A fourth reason why the minister ought not to have granted the appeal is because of the safety factor. Autair is not an experienced helicopter operator. At pages 14 and 15 of the evidence given before the board the president of the company stated that he had 35 hours of helicopter time. That has since been increased to 50 or 60 hours, I am advised. Also, as found at page 79 of the evidence, it was proved at the time of the hearing that at least one of the S-51 helicopters had outstanding liens against it, which information had been filed with the Department of Transport by the United States owner of the equipment.

The Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys has granted a contract to Autair for helicopter services in northern Canada, namely on the continental polar shelf. The date of commencement of this contract is imminent, if it has not already started. It is a most important contract, located as it is on the northwest side of the Queen Elizabeth islands. Furthermore, this is extremely dangerous work. It is to move supplies and persons, including surgeons and geologists, to that area. Great care should be taken to see that lives are protected. Helicopter operations are delicate and experience means a lot. Few operators in this country have the experience required to fulfil a job of this nature.

I believe the air transport board, the body charged with the responsibility of determining these technical matters under the Aeronautics Act, thought that in the public interest they should not grant these people a licence. The Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys apparently thought otherwise, and has given them a contract.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

The Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys in my opinion ought not to have recommended the contract to Autair for work on the polar shelf for the following reasons. A careful analysis of the sessional paper which the minister tabled in the house, No. 235 tabled on March 25, 1960, indicates that the tariff filed by Autair was not the lowest. In December, 1959 the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys informed five companies, Autair, Kenting, Okanagan, Pacific and Spartan that the department would require one Sikorsky S-55 helicopter and two Bell 47-G helicopters for their polar shelf program during the summer of 1960. The requirements were set out and the companies were requested to advise the department if they were interested and to enclose with their replies copies of their relevant tariffs as filed with the air transport board. All five companies did so signify and sent copies of their tariffs. Pacific was eliminated because it did not operate the S-55 type of helicopter. Strangely enough Autair was not so eliminated, although it had not operated S-55 helicopters and did not own any such equipment.

On February 9, 1960 Autair, I am informed on reliable information, was told by the departmental officers of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys that Okanagan had the lowest tariff and that a decision had been made the day before February 8, to give the contract to Okanagan because of their greater experience and stable record. As a matter of fact, Okanagan were given a letter of intent from the department covering the operation.

The next day, February 10, Autair filed a new tariff with the air transport board which brought their rates down from the highest of the four companies to the following, as set out in the return tabled by the minister, and which upon examination indicates, first, that on the minimum rates they were tied with Okanagan and Spartan; second, that on the 50 hours of operation per month they were a little higher than Okanagan and Spartan but lower than Kenting; and third, that on the 100 hours of operation per month they were slightly lower than Okanagan and Spartan.

A submission was then prepared at the request of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys recommending the contract to be given to Autair as the company with the lowest rates. This was done in spite of the fact that Autair possessed no S-55 helicopters; had never operated them; had never operated in the Arctic at all; had rates, even under its new tariff, that were the same as or higher than its competitors except when flying over 100 hours per month per machine, a rather unlikely figure under extreme Arctic weather conditions. This was done under the minister's direction, and Autair was given the contract on the basis of a tariff filed the day after all four companies had been told the decision was made.

Autair thus knew exactly the rates they had to beat, and since none of the other companies could know that the minister had changed the award these other competitors had no opportunity to file competitive tariffs. Thus the contract was handed by the minister to Autair without any chance of interference by the other companies.

The Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys ought to have been more careful in granting a contract to be carried out in that strategic area of Canada for another reason. At this stage I would like to put on record information which has already been made public by the United States magazine Newsweek, which information to my knowledge has not been contradicted. Here is what is said in the issue of January 30, 1950 at page 33, in an article entitled "How Pan Am plane parts were smuggled behind the Iron Curtain":

Newsweek has uncovered a striking example of how desperately the satellite states still are trying to open a chink in this American economic iron curtain. The state department suspected that Czechoslovakia had been obtaining essential American airplane engines and parts for its fleet of DC-3s. And last week the state department discovered to its astonishment that some illegal shipments had originally been purchased from Pan American World Airways—apparently the victim of an extraordinary case of international double-dealing. Edward Weintal, Newsweek diplomatic correspondent here gives the full story.

Mr. Speaker, because of time I can only quote a part of this story. I continue:

For some time the operations of the Czechoslovak air lines have been under constant scrutiny of various agencies of the United States government. The line is believed to be operating under Moscow's orders and used for transporting Cominform agents . . .

Virtually all planes of the Czech line are American DC-3s. All western European governments have been warned by the state department to be on the lookout for Czech-bound DC-3 engines and parts. But despite these warnings the Czech line did not show any signs of shortages.

Evidence from various sources pointed to Belgium as the origin of American engines and spare parts for the Czechoslovak air lines. Howard Railey, the state department's aviation expert normally stationed in Paris, was ordered to Brussels. Railey's preliminary survey confirmed the state department's suspicions. The Belgium government was asked to investigate and urged to tighten up its own export controls. But before the Belgium government had a chance to comply, Railey found that some supplies for the Czechs were being purchased from Pan American World Airways by an unknown concern going by the name of Global Aviation of New York.

I now pass over a number of paragraphs because it is not possible to read all this article; I read only the pertinent parts.

Little is known about the Global Aviation Co. It is believed to be a partnership made up of D. W. Connor—

Who incidentally is the president of Autair, which has received this contract to work on the polar continental shelf.

—a former Canadian air force pilot, and E. F. O'Mara, a United States-born naturalized Canadian citizen.

(Translation):

Mr. Fortin: In what year was that published?

Mr. Chevrier: I already mentioned the date of publication—

Mr. Fortin: I did not get it.

Mr. Chevrier: —but let me repeat it—January 23, 1950.

(Text):

Having said that, I would add that these statements are of a most serious nature. They are made in a reputable magazine. I have no means of knowing whether they are true or not, but the public is entitled to know before this company is given a government contract and a licence to operate. Did the air transport board know about this? If it did, this may be one of the reasons why it turned down the application. The government should not have given a contract until it had fully investigated the story.

Now let me quote from the evidence which the Minister of Transport was good enough to table in this house in answer to my request. This man D. W. Connor, president of Autair Helicopter Services Limited, was examined before the air transport board in Montreal on May 16, 1958 on application for a licence. At page 14 of the evidence he was asked:

Q. How many hours have you?
A. About 35 . . .
Q. You have never operated a helicopter company prior to this?
A. Prior to last year, no.
Q. You say you are a resident of Westmount. When did you return to Canada?
A. In December of last year.

That would be 1957.

Q. Prior to that time you had been living in England?
A. Yes.
Q. Since 1948?
A. No. I lived in Switzerland until 1952.
Q. From the time of your discharge from the R.C.A.F. you have lived in Switzerland and then in England?
A. England, Switzerland and England, in that order, if you want to be exact.
Q. The air engine service group commenced operations in 1952?
A. Yes.
Q. Prior to that you said "We operated a delivery service for aircraft". Who do you mean by "we"?
A. The Connair Corporation.

Q. Were you associated with any other companies?

A. Yes. I was at that time also president of Global Aviation.

Q. What did Global Aviation do?

A. It ferried and delivered airplanes around the world.

Q. Did it buy and sell airplanes at all?

A. It did.

Q. All over the world?

A. In certain countries.

Q. To what countries did Global Aviation deliver airplanes and equipment?

A. You tax my memory after ten years, and it seems quite irrelevant, but South America, South Africa, Sweden, Norway, Belgium, Egypt, certainly Pakistan and Yugoslavia; generally anywhere you could find a market for the airplanes.

Q. That is commercial business?

A. Yes.

Can anyone believe that the president of this company would have mentioned Pakistan, Egypt, South America, Yugoslavia, and not have remembered the story in Newsweek about Czechoslovakia? This is a most serious matter. I cannot believe that either of the ministers concerned had read this story in Newsweek or the evidence before the board. That is why I consider it my duty to bring the matter before the house. Much of it, if not all, is already known in the aviation industry, and much of it has already been referred to in the press. If these statements which I have brought before the house are accurate, immediate action should be taken by the government, and in any case this company should not be allowed to proceed with this work until a thorough investigation has been made.

Mr. Pearkes: May I have permission to revert to motions?

Mr. Speaker: I see the Minister of National Defence is asking for leave to revert to motions. Is that agreeable to the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

BOMARC MISSILE—REPORT OF SUCCESSFUL FIRING

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, in case I should have misled the house in my reply to the hon. member for Trinity with regard to the Bomarc missile, may I say that at six minutes past twelve today I received information that a Bomarc B had been fired from Eglin field and that it was completely successful. I did not have that information when I was replying to the hon. member.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): In view of the fact that the house allowed the minister to make this statement, I hope I shall be permitted to say that we on this side are pleased that at least one of these Bomarc missiles has proved successful. I should like to add, however, that it does not establish our confidence in this missile by one iota. We still feel that for Canada to continue the installation of this missile system is a complete waste of the taxpayers' money and that, further, such pressure as this country is putting on the United States is, in addition to our own money, wasting $250 million of the United States taxpayers' funds. So we urge the minister not to be too reassured by this single example of success by this Bomarc, and suggest that he should consider the immediate cancellation of the whole system on the ground that it is of no further military value.

Mr. Speaker: If the Minister of Transport would defer for a moment I will hear the hon. member for Port Arthur commenting on the statement which has been made.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): I should like to congratulate the minister on his guess —because it has been a guess—and I also wish to agree with the statement made by the hon. member for Trinity. Although this firing has been successful, we are not in agreement that Canada should pursue the installation of the Bomarc defence system even though one test has been successful—and on that we congratulate the minister.

Mr. Speaker: May I call attention to the fact that I recognized the hon. member for Port Arthur, but it turned out to be the hon. member for Timiskaming. The rules require hon. members to rise in their own places. The same applies to the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Fortin) who has been contributing to the debate from a seat not his own.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT BY THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) that Mr. Speaker now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I intend to speak very briefly, because there is nothing very much in the speech made by the hon. member for Laurier which requires a reply. I think the hon. gentleman's speech could best be termed much ado about nothing. The impression had been given that this was going to be an earth-shattering speech, but as far as I can see it brought forth nothing which had not already been made known by myself on several occasions, and in particular, when I announced the introduction of this new policy last fall.

The hon. member asked me specifically about the part played by my own department. He asked me why I, as minister, had overridden a decision of the air transport board regarding the Autair application. The air transport board had been operating under a policy laid down by the former government, a policy which favoured monopoly, and which denied competition. This present government, as I have said on several occasions, believes that it has a responsibility, not only to the aircraft industry but also to the users of air services. This government believes that competition among charter air services leads to the provision of better and cheaper services to the public, and also serves as a healthy stimulant to the industry itself.

It was for that reason that I, on behalf of this government, introduced a freeing-up with respect to the granting of licences in the charter field. I made it very clear that I did so because it was the basic belief of the government that this would be a good thing for the industry, and no detriment; that in fact it would stimulate the provision of more of these services for the public. That, and that alone, was the reason I overrode the decision of the air transport board.

In this case, when the application was denied, it was denied in conformity with the policy imposed upon the board by the former government, a policy with which, in this regard, the present government does not agree. That is the reason the application was granted, and that is the reason we are now operating under a much freer system of granting licences, one which we believe will be of benefit to the industry itself.

I think that is all I have to deal with in connection with my own department and the air transport board. I am sure the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys will deal more than adequately with matters which relate to the operations of his department.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister permit a question? Would he say whether, when he overrode the decision of the air transport board, he was aware of the fact that this company had not complied, as the hon. member for Laurier said, with the request of the board to provide statements of financial responsibility and other information which the law requires any company to provide?

Mr. Hees: I was aware of that and the impression I had of that requirement was simply that the provision of charter air services is in no way different from the provision of so many other services provided by other industries to users in this country. Under the free democratic system, which we fought several world wars to preserve, a man has the right to enter business and lose his shirt, if he wants to, and nobody stops him doing it. If I want to go into business, in any line of business at all in this country, I can do so. Before going into business I do not have to prove that I have a certain financial stability. I have the right—and we jealously maintain that right in a democracy such as this—to go into business, and if I fail it is my own sorrow. For that reason the requirement referred to seemed a ridiculous requirement in these particular cases, where the service provided is not that of a scheduled air service, which is a definite service to the public. This is a charter service where those providing the service do so under no compulsion, and before contracting to provide a service they are satisfied that the terms under which they will be providing that service are satisfactory to them.

For that reason I felt that the requirement under which the board was operating in this particular regard was one which I did not agree with and, therefore, I considered it did not affect me in any way in granting this licence.

Mr. Speaker: I am disposed to regard the matter before the house, raised by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), as a separate subject, and therefore I would recognize those who wish to speak on that subject in priority to others. The minister wishes to speak on the subject?

Mr. Comtois: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: Are there any other members who wish to speak on this subject. I may be mistaken in the procedure I am following, but it is my view that when the motion before the house is that I leave the chair, with no amendment outstanding, we are really under grievance procedure as we would be on a motion for the Speaker to leave the chair to go into committee of supply. That, I think, is the reason why the rule calls for a vote before the maximum time limit of the debate is reached. If hon. members agree with me on that I will follow that course for the remainder of this debate.

(Translation):

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, I just wrote down a few notes during the speech made by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), who was kind enough, this morning, to notify me of his intention of dealing with the matter of a contract awarded to Autair Helicopter Services Limited.

The hon. member for Laurier has an axe to grind. That is obvious. And I even wonder whether his intervention today, and the grievances he voiced, are not perhaps related to the fact that one of the top officials of Okanagan Helicopters is the former election organizer for ex-minister Sinclair. There might be some connection between the two circumstances. However, I would not like to vouch for it, because I have no information to that effect. If I am mistaken, so much the better.

The hon. member for Laurier, it seems, wants to raise a storm in a tea cup. He imagines there has been a scandal, that there were false representations, in other words something irregular in the contract awarded to Autair Helicopter Services Limited. My department has nothing whatsoever to do with licences or prices submitted to the transport commission. That is not our job. It is the responsibility of the Department of Transport, and the minister replied to that. He said what he had to say with regard to the duties of his department.

With regard to matters that concern us, we were called upon to award a contract in the north for a survey and inspection expedition in the Arctic. We asked companies having the required qualifications to submit prices. We did not call for tenders because, as I had the opportunity to say in reply to a question asked in this house, prices are established in advance by the transport commission, and the duty of my officials is to determine the best possible price so as not to pay more than required, that is, to obtain the most economic price to the department, to the government and to the whole country. That is what we did. There was no intention, as stated by the hon. member for Laurier, of awarding the contract to the Okanagan Helicopters Company. That letter was never sent, so I am informed by my department. Therefore, when the hon. member states that the letter was sent, I think he was misinformed.

Second, I asked that the tenders sent in by the various companies be examined, and that the matter be fully considered, always in keeping with the economic aspect of the contract. It was established that for a hundred hours of flight a month by a Bell-47 G the Kenting Helicopters Limited submitted a price of $97,560, whereas the Autair Helicopters Services Limited, quoted $93,600, the Spartan Air Services Limited, $91,200 and the Okanagan Helicopters Limited, also $91,200.

Therefore, as far as that part of the contract was concerned, the price quoted by Autair Helicopters for a Bell-47 G plane was of course, not the lowest. However, with regard to the S 55 plane, the Autair Helicopters Company had asked for an amount of $109,200 whereas the Okanagan Helicopters Limited, the Spartan Air Services Limited as well as the Kenting Helicopters Limited were quoting $115,200. Therefore, the Autair Helicopters Co. had submitted the most favourable price, that is, $109,200. When awarding contracts, the department has to consider the total cost of the expedition, and this was done.

We acted in a perfectly proper way. I wanted to avoid any unfairness.

Mr. Speaker, I must point out that I am totally opposed to monopolies, and I can say quite frankly that having gone over the file, I found that Okanagan Helicopters Limited had always got the contracts, on the basis that it had a monopoly on experience. Thus the government was at the mercy of a firm which claimed to be alone in having the required experience in the north—

Mr. Chevrier: There are three others.

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Speaker, if there are three others, one of them is the Autair Helicopter Services Limited. It has as much experience as any other, because it is a matter of piloting, and if the pilots of that firm have experience in the north, they are just as qualified as those of Okanagan Helicopters Limited or of any other firm. That type of experience can be compared to driving experience; a good driver avoids the hazards of the road.

Mr. Parizeau: Let him have it, Mr. Minister.

Mr. Comtois: The pilots of Autair Helicopter Services are as qualified as those of Okanagan Helicopters Limited, of Spartan Air Services Limited or of Kenting Helicopters Limited.

We took every proper precaution, and decided to grant the contract to Autair Helicopter Services. Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, I might say that I do not know the president of that firm. I had no confession certificate to expect from him.

Mr. Parizeau: He was not your organizer.

Mr. Comtois: I have not gone into the matter that far; I am not interested in the personal life of company presidents. I do not care whether he had been in some other country, across the border or even abroad. We are dealing with the directors of the company and we are satisfied that we will get excellent service.

We followed the standard practice and the lowest tender was accepted. That is the course my departmental officials decided to follow. No other consideration than the lowest tender entered into the award of the contract to Autair Helicopter Services Limited.

I am glad that this course was followed, even if the president of that company is not one of the friends of the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), nor a friend of the hon. members opposite. I did not ask the president about his political affiliations. I do not know what they are. But now the Okanagan Helicopters Limited will not be the only company with experience in the north.

The pilots of Autair Helicopter Services Limited acquired experience on the D.E.W. line, and I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, there is not much difference between the D.E.W. line and the areas where those aircraft will fly. I believe that to get Arctic experience you always have to start somewhere and if, each year, we keep saying that we must carry on only with people who have previously worked in the area we might just as well not call for tenders from any one and tell the Okanagan company—

Mr. Parizeau: It had been a Liberal monopoly.

Mr. Comtois: — "You have the monopoly, so go ahead." Mr. Speaker, I felt we had to be fair to everybody and that we should consider the tenders in the light of the projects we had in mind. Everything has been done on the up-and-up and there is nothing further I can say on the subject.

(Text):

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words on the subject raised by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) simply in reply to what has been said by the two ministers who have spoken. I do think that the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Comtois) would have been well advised to follow the example of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) who treated this subject seriously, dealt with it on its merits and did not make unworthy insinuations about there being any political matters involved here.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Does the truth hurt?

Mr. Pickersgill: I might also draw hon. members' attention to the fact that when the two ministers were speaking we listened to them with politeness and without interruption.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): As the hon. gentleman did last night?

Mr. Pickersgill: It seems to me that on a matter as grave as this, hon. gentlemen on the back benches would be well advised to speak when their turn comes.

An hon. Member: We will.

Another hon. Member: What did you do last night?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I trust hon. members will observe the rule against interruption while the hon. member has the floor.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have no new argument, Mr. Speaker, but I want to debate what has already been raised by my hon. friend from Laurier. The Minister of Transport said that when he overruled the air transport board he thought that these conditions having to do with financial responsibility and capacity to perform, about which I asked him a question, were unimportant, and that anyone in this free country was perfectly entitled to enter freely into any kind of business. Of course, that is not true. One cannot enter into the railway business without getting a charter from parliament or from a provincial legislature. I am also reliably informed that one cannot go into the taxi business in most large municipalities without satisfying a board of one's financial competence and one's capacity, and in many cases the supply is limited so that the public will have some assurance of the capacity of the operators and also some assurance that the people who are operating the taxis are reliable members of society. One could go on to give many other examples both in the federal and provincial fields and under governments of every political complexion.

Mr. Hees: On a question of privilege, may I correct a misapprehension? I was not dealing with the ability to operate; I was simply dealing with the amount of finances behind the company. With respect to ability to operate, my department has very strict safety regulations, and any company that cannot comply at all times with these safety regulations is not allowed to fly.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am very glad that the minister has made that correction because I do not want to be unfair in any way about this matter. But I will draw the minister's attention to the fact that the hon. member for Laurier made certain very precise statements on this point. He said that this company, at the time the minister removed the restriction against it with respect to the use of large helicopters, did not own any large helicopters at all. He went on to say that Autair did not own any large helicopters at the time they were asked by the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys to bid on this business.

Mr. Hees: Would the hon. member permit a question? I should like to ask him how a company could ever operate with large helicopters before having obtained a licence? Why in the world would they ever buy these large helicopters until they had obtained a licence to operate such large helicopters? Otherwise they would simply have a lot of white elephants on their hands which they could not use.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the minister had listened carefully to the hon. member for Laurier I think he would have had the answer to that question. This company does seem to have had an unenviable record of operating small helicopters for some considerable time without any licence on the pretense that they were operating them for demonstration purposes, but at the same time taking good care to recoup themselves for those operations later, if my hon. friend was correctly informed, from the government of Quebec. It does not necessarily have to be the case, but I think there is something in the contention of the Minister of Transport that perhaps this company would not have acquired helicopters until it was assured that it would have a licence to operate.

That does not at all dispose of the other statement by my hon. friend, namely that in 1960, many months after the minister had quashed the decision of the board, this company still had no large helicopters when it and these other four companies were invited to bid on this survey work in the north. That is what my hon. friend alleged, and he also stated that one of these companies, Pacific, I believe, was ruled out of the bidding because it did not own any large helicopters. I think the house and the country are entitled to know why Pacific was ruled out and Autair, in exactly the same circumstances with no large helicopters, was not ruled out. They had had a licence for some time but they had no large helicopters. That is quite serious.

Moreover, it was shown in the evidence before the board, which my hon. friend read, that this company had very little experience in operating small helicopters and did not even own a large helicopter. Yet they were preferred over three experienced operators qualified in every way to do this work. It does seem to me that in this contract there was no question of private enterprise. Maybe if some private company was going to hire Autair there perhaps would not be the same concern about the matter. I say "perhaps"; I am not sure about that. But what is the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys going to do? He is going to send these people up to the polar shelf. He is going to send public servants in these aircraft and endanger their lives. Their lives will be endangered no matter who does the work because those of us who have had some experience of travelling in helicopters know that this is not quite the safest form of travel. It does seem to me, that before the minister allows this to happen, allows the lives of these public servants to be in danger, in the light of what my hon. friend from Laurier has placed before the minister there should be the fullest investigation of every allegation put forward this morning. No one should make light of these allegations.

There may be nothing in this story in Newsweek. It may have no foundation whatever. My hon. friend from Laurier made it very clear he did not know whether or not it was true. We all know that this is a very reputable publication. We all know that the diplomatic correspondent would not just publish gossip and hearsay. This magazine is subject to the libel laws and other laws of that kind in the United States. It does seem to me that if the two ministers, or either of them, did not know about these statements beforehand they should now be very hesitant about sending this company, in the face of that story, up to the Arctic, right on the edge of the iron curtain. They would be sending someone who, according to this reputable United States publication, at one time was supposed to have been smuggling aircraft parts behind the iron curtain.

I do not believe we should prejudge this case; that is the last thing we would ask. But we think it should be investigated and cleared up. The minister should remember what happened in this house earlier today in connection with this unfortunate woman in British Columbia who is going to be deported from this country apparently merely because of a suspicion she may be a danger to the security of the country. I am not questioning that at this moment. I am saying when we take that kind of precaution in that case, surely it is not asking anything excessive when my hon. friend from Laurier, as he did in his closing words, requested the members of the government to clear this thing up and clear it up without any equivocation, before we let a company headed by a man against whom allegations of that kind were made in a reputable United States journal undertake this kind of work on the polar shelf.

Then, there is one other statement with which the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys did not deal. I refer to the very serious statement made by my hon. friend from Laurier. The hon. member says he is informed—he did not say that he knew but that he was reliably informed—that five bids were submitted originally. One was disallowed and the other four were considered. A decision was reached by the department in favour of one of those companies and unfavourable to Autair, and then a change was made and Autair was allowed to make a second submission while the other companies apparently were not. I do not know anything about whether or not that is true. I have not the faintest idea whether or not it is true because I have made no personal investigation into this matter at all. I listened to the hon. member for Laurier as he was speaking, and I tried to listen very attentively. I think that is what he said. I believe, that is a point that should be cleared up, and cleared up seriously, not brushed off with a suggestion there are some petty politics in this matter.

It seems to me that these are the five points. First, this company has refused to demonstrate its financial worthiness to the air transport board. Is it financially competent to carry out a contract with the government of Canada? Surely the minister or the treasury board would satisfy themselves about that. When we ask a contractor to build a small post office in the maritime provinces, as my hon. friend from Levis (Mr. Bourget) knows, we satisfy ourselves he is financially competent to do it. According to the evidence before the board, this operator refused to satisfy them of his financial competence, refused to answer their questions, and to the best of our knowledge that has never been cleared up. Yet he has been given a contract which was refused to other companies with demonstrated financial competence.

Then there is the question of safety, the fact that this company has never operated one of these large helicopters. This company is preferred over other companies to carry scientists and other public servants into this area. Then there is the very grave question of national security. It seems to me before this contract proceeds these matters should be cleared up and cleared up to public satisfaction.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I should like to raise a point of order, and I do so because of the doubt which Your Honour expressed as to the correctness of the procedure which we have been adopting. I ask that this procedure should not be considered a precedent until Your Honour has had an opportunity to give mature consideration to it.

It seems to me when the house has before it a motion to resolve itself into committee of ways and means, the budget, that the procedure on supply motions in respect of grievances is not appropriate thereto. I venture to submit to Your Honour that it is incongruous on the eighth day of the budget debate that any hon. member should be able to raise a subject which is totally unrelated to the budget and should thereby preclude discussion of the budget itself. It is true that under the ordinary motion for the house to resolve itself into committee of ways and means, under citation 234, on Monday and Tuesday, it is possible for any member to ask for the redress of any grievance. I suggest, however, that does not apply where the situation is as set forth in standing order 58, subsection 2, which provides for the debate on the motion for the house to resolve itself into committee of ways and means, the budget. My submission is that this motion related as it is to the budget is different from the ordinary motion which is referred to in citation 234.

I rise only to speak at this time so that this procedure will not be considered as a precedent before Your Honour has had an opportunity to give mature consideration to the problem.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to speak to the point of order, if I may.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps we might call it one o'clock. Will the hon. member be here after the adjournment?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at two o'clock.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to argue this point of order at any length because I do not think I am too much in disagreement with the hon. member who raised it. The only purpose of my rising on the point of order is to make it quite clear to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the house that I had a perfect right to discuss anything that I felt like discussing on the budget because, after all, the letting of a contract and the expenditure of public moneys comes entirely within the budget. Whether it is a specific matter or a general matter, I do not think makes any difference. That was really the only purpose of my rising.

On the other hand, if I may add this, it may well be that because of the right I feel I have and because of the point that has been raised by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) Your Honour may feel that this is a point to which Your Honour should give consideration and if Your Honour did feel that way certainly I would be quite happy to abide by that decision.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I do not disagree with the hon. gentleman's right to raise the particular issue he did. My point of order relates only to the question of whether, when the hon. gentleman raises that issue, all debate thereafter on the eighth day shall be confined to the issue which he raised.

My submission is that in a case where it is a motion to go into committee of ways and means, the budget—and that I emphasize—there is not that confinement to the particular grievance that has been raised by a particular hon. gentleman. The hon. member may raise whatever he wishes although I may have some views as to the wisdom of a senior privy councillor doing so.

Mr. Chevrier: I have been trying to be friendly to my hon. friend in not disagreeing with him but the position a senior privy councillor takes is his own decision and should not be reflected upon by the junior hon. member for Carleton.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say just one word. When this point was first raised I found it difficult not to agree with the position that had been taken on the other side with regard to the interpretation of the rule. I think there are occasions when we should seek to strengthen our procedures by not being afraid to assert positions that are taken by those who sit opposite. This may be one of those occasions.

My submission is that if there has been a violation of the rules the violation was not on this side. The violation would consist in the participation by two ministers, one after the other, without observing the traditional practice of this house of providing for alternations between the various parties.

Mr. Speaker: I take full responsibility for the order in which hon. members spoke in this matter. Perhaps I was presuming too much on my own authority in suggesting the procedure we followed today which was not the procedure followed last year, the year before or in fact since the rule was amended in 1955.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

I have given some thought to the question of what happens after the amendment has been disposed of on the motion to go into committee of ways and means, the budget. It struck me—and I think perhaps hon. members who were on the committee which revised the rules may be able to verify this—that the reason the vote was provided for on the seventh day, leaving a full day for further discussion, was to provide on the budget debate an opportunity for a discussion of this kind. A motion of this nature like a supply motion is connected with the voting of moneys for the crown and is preceded by the airing of all the grievances parliament has to air. However, as this debate has been entered upon in the expectation that it would follow the usual pattern I think it would be very imprudent for me to attempt to change horses in midstream and that we should conclude the debate in the way it has been done in the last few years.

Perhaps if and when the committee is set up to consider these matters some thought might be given to the wisdom of the course which I have suggested earlier today because it makes a connected discussion of a grievance possible. It concludes that grievance and another is then entered upon. And then, in supply motions, it gives more members an opportunity to speak than happens when hon. members are speaking at large.

Therefore I quite readily accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) that this matter be given further consideration. There is time for perhaps only two more speeches and unless some other hon. member has something to say on this subject we shall proceed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I am impelled to say just a word or two on this point of order by reason of the reference to the committee which revised the rules of the house. I think I am the only hon. member in the chamber at the moment who was a member of the committee which revised the rules which became effective in 1955. That committee sat through three sessions.

I may say that the reason for providing for the votes on the subamendment, the amendment and finally on the main motion on different days was not the reason that you purported to assign to it at all. It was to avoid a situation which had become altogether too common where the debate purported to continue on the submendment and then, when the debate had run its course, there were three votes taken in quick succession on the subamendment, the amendment and finally on the main motion. It was thought in the committee it would be better to space out the votes. It was not done at all, I assure you, on the part of the committe with any thought that by having provided that the vote on the main motion should come at the conclusion of the seventh day the debate on the eighth day should change its nature. It still continues as part of the debate on the budget. It does not change its character and become assimilable with the normal procedure on a motion to resolve the house into committee of supply or a motion to go into ways and means in which case we would have the normal provision for airing grievances.

I think on the eighth day the house and the debate are in much the same position as at the time of launching the debate originally on the part of the first speaker from the opposition side of the house. He ranges widely, usually over many matters, and then winds up his speech by offering an amendment. I think the amendment and the subamendment now having been disposed of, the debate is in the same position as it was at that time. It is still a debate on the budget and is not a new debate of a different nature, resolving itself simply into a matter of raising individual grievances and exhausting each before another is raised.

Mr. Speaker: May I refer to Beauchesne's fourth edition, citation 229, which rather bears out the contention raised by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell):

When an amendment for the Speaker's leaving the chair has been negatived, no further amendment can be moved thereto; though general debate on the main question can be maintained by those members who have not exhausted their right to speak to that question.

The other citation which is relevant is citation 234, which rather supports the view I have taken.

Mr. Speakman: Mr. Speaker, may I raise a question of privilege. Immediately before the luncheon adjournment the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) rose and left the implication that Conservative backbenchers particularly were guilty of discourtesy while he was speaking, this coming from a member who interjected 62 times during the address of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) last night.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I very cheerfully apologize to anyone whose feelings were hurt.

(Translation):

Mr. Roland English (Gaspe): Mr. Speaker, almost two weeks ago, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), presented his budgetary estimates. All the galleries of the house were jam-packed.

Mr. Chevrier: Jam-packed?

Mr. English: People had tuned in on the radio or were staring at their T.V. sets. The message was, indeed, important. A thunder of applause greeted the minister's arrival; then there was silence.

Mr. Chevrier: Where was the brass band?

Mr. Pigeon: Not on the Jacques Cartier bridge, surely.

Mr. English: You are being the brass band right now. In a calm voice, the Minister of Finance spoke the first lines of his text in impeccable French. There was another thunderous burst of applause.

That man, Mr. Speaker, had just made a friendly gesture toward the Canadian population which welcomed that expression of understanding on his part. I am saying "Canadian" because the reaction was favourable, not only in Quebec but throughout the country.

Though, unaware of it at the time, the Minister of Finance was replying to a vicious and unfair attack by a C.C.F. member, for whom I have no animosity, but who does not seem to know the province of Quebec at all and who does not seem to wish to know it. That attack came a few days later. The conclusion to be drawn from that, Mr. Speaker, is that we must blame the one who has a sense of responsibility, but forgive the one who has none. Why attack a population which has always worked in co-operation with other provinces, for the greatness and progress of Canada as a whole and in favour of a sound national unity?

Recently, Hon. Antonio Barrette, the premier of Quebec confirmed what I am now saying by expressing the real feeling of the province of Quebec, when he met in Toronto with hon. Mr. Frost, the premier of Ontario and the hon. members of the legislature.

Hon. Mr. Barrette did something which is much more eloquent than any words can say, and I will simply quote what the Globe and Mail of Toronto reported on April 8, 1960:

(Text):

For the first time since confederation the premiers of Ontario and Quebec yesterday stood in the same legislative assembly.

And the pledge of eternal friendship and partnership that was associated with the union of 1867 was enunciated again clearly by Premier Frost and Quebec's Premier Barrette.

Symbolicly the two premiers stood near the Speaker's throne over which is inscribed the date of the first pledge of national unity made 93 years ago.

Premier Frost said that it was with a deep sense of honour that the Ontario house greeted the Quebec premier, who represents "our neighbours and partners from the beginning."

"They have always been our good partners, our good friends... We ask you, sir, to take back to your people our affectionate regards," said Premier Frost.

Premier Barrette told the legislature that he had intended to speak from notes.

"But I put them aside and very simply speak to you from the bottom of my heart," he said.

"We are partners," he said. "We have always been partners, even when we sometimes thought that we were not. We have fought together... we will remain partners."

Premier Frost said that the challenge of 1867—to build a nation of French and English culture—has been achieved.

And opposition leader Wintermeyer said that the present Canadian challenge is the same as that faced by Macdonald and Laurier. They had fought to build a nation against all economic odds and with a union of two cultures. Today the challenge was to build an even greater nation from many different cultures besides English and French.

(Translation):

Is it not true, Mr. Speaker, that such a gesture deserves to be emphasized, and is it not another proof that all provincial premiers want to show to the country that they want to unite and co-operate in carrying out a wish close to the heart of each and everyone of us? I refer to the desire for mutual understanding and love and for co-operation in working for Canada's future and for the progress of every Canadian of any origin, race or creed.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, I would like sincerely to congratulate the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin) for having addressed a few words in the beginning of his speech in the chamber yesterday in I might add very good French. The hon. member gave an example of what we call real national unity.

(Translation):

Coming back to the Minister of Finance, I should like to quote an article from La Presse for April 1, 1960:

Fleming starts his speech in French.

Though not wearing a blue carnation on his lapel, as he had last year, but smiling broadly, Finance Minister Fleming was greeted in the House of Commons yesterday with thunderous applause.

The applause doubled when, directly in French and without any English preliminary, he opened his speech with these words: "Mr. Speaker, for a third time it is my honour and privilege to present to the house the annual budget". By this, the minister renewed a precedent set by himself in June 1958 when he brought down his first budget. In that year, it was the first time in Canada's history that a minister of finance delivered parts of his budget speech in French. Last year, Mr. Fleming confirmed the precedent by delivering three lengthy parts of his speech in French. This year, he went further and opened his remarks in the language which, as he said, "has so gracefully adorned the proceedings of this house and holds a secure constitutional position in the Canadian parliament."

[Mr. English.]

Apparently, the opposition is not too satisfied with the budget. That is probably due to the fact that it has too many qualities.

Its first quality is balance. Mr. Fleming has an acute sense of reality, and so far, his judgement has been born out by the facts.

Here is what the Gazette for April 1, 1960 had to say on the subject, and I quote:

(Text):

Mr. Fleming has decided that the trends and impulses set in motion by the tax changes for 1959-60 will be sufficient to reach the desired result in 1960-61. This result is, of course, a balanced budget.

(Translation):

This is what we read in La Presse of April 1, 1960:

Observers had unanimously forecast that Mr. Fleming would present a balanced budget. As a matter of fact, the Minister of Finance gave us, as we put it elsewhere, a super-balanced budget, providing a slim margin of $12 million on a budget of $5,892, million, without considering the $600 million or so which the old age security program would cost.

He did not even slightly increase taxes, trusting only in the continuance of the present economic rhythm.

In a serious effort, the minister was able to realize the miracle of foreseeing a surplus while not increasing taxes. The surplus is $12 million.

To balance a budget is one thing. Not to increase taxes and tariffs is even better. But to offer salary increases is just splendid. And that is what the Minister of Finance achieved in his last budget. The people owe him their gratitude, and deserving government employees joyfully welcome such generosity.

The Conservative party does not choose roundabout ways. It attacks in a straightforward manner problems that are sometimes very complex, and obtains results about which each and everyone can marvel and which throw the opposition into the deepest gloom. Now that is what Montreal-Matin of April 1, 1960 said:

Fifty thousand civil servants are benefiting from salary increases. When announcing the decision, Mr. Fleming however warned that the days of "across-the-board increases" were past and that such increases would from now on, be granted after thoroughly considering each category and the functions attached thereto. The increases, averaging about $300 a year, will be granted mainly to clerical and stenographic categories.

The last general salary increase granted to federal civil servants came on May 1st 1957.

The increase, which will be effective tomorrow, will cost some $15 million to the treasury.

Not only do civil servants benefit from the wise Conservative administration, but widows too can count on improved benefits. It is in time of difficulty that we recognize those who are sincere. The minister wanted to give some protection to this category, and rightly so.

The budget is also an example of shrewd administration. There is no more one-way contribution to the old age pension item. Quite the contrary, it is a period of prosperity. And that is something the opposition cannot get over. You can be sure, Mr. Speaker, that they will not say a word about it. I wish to quote La Presse of April 2, 1960:

First surplus for the old age security fund.

For the first time since its establishment in 1951, the old age security fund will have a surplus in 1960-61, Mr. Fleming announced in his budget speech.

This is due to the tax increases enacted last year and which became effective in April in the case of the sales tax, and in July in the case of personal and corporation income taxes (1 per cent).

Due to this tax increase, the deficit in 1959-60 was only $24 million.

In 1960-61, after a full year of increased taxes, the old age security fund will receive $630 million while its payments will reach $590.

The surplus will therefore be about $40 million and overshadow last year's deficit.

From January 1951 to March 1960, the fund accumulated deficits totalling $630 million.

On that amount, over $500 million were paid out of general revenue and in 1954 a sum of about $100 million was charged against the reserve carried under the productive assets account.

My purpose in quoting from various newspapers, Mr. Speaker, was to present a more representative sample of public opinion. That opinion is favourable everywhere. Members of the opposition form the only dissenting group. They are unhappy in Quebec, and none the happier in Ottawa. The population has long been wise as far as Quebec is concerned, and as for Ottawa it has at last become wise to the one-time-great Liberal party, a great party, Mr. Speaker, which has lived to regret its past glory.

In the speech he made in this house on April 8, 1960, the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres (Mr. Cardin), said that the unemployment insurance fund, which amounted to $874,574,000 in 1957 was down to $408,145,000 in 1960.

I understand, Mr. Speaker, and I am willing to admit that the number of unemployed has increased these last years, and members of the opposition also are willing to admit it, because they know quite well that in 1956 the recession was starting and promised to be worse.

They still remember quite well that they received a report from the economists and that, in order to win the election, they thought it advisable to hide that report somewhere in an office to prevent the people of Canada from knowing that things were looking bad.

But on the other hand, it must not be assumed that that increase in the number of unemployed is the only cause of this difference between 800 million and 400 million. It would be more proper to give the facts as they are, without attempting to mislead the public.

I shall therefore point out other facts that have contributed to this reduction.

The period of benefits has been extended from 36 to 52 weeks. This has tended to decrease the unemployment insurance fund. Unemployment insurance for fishermen, which has been in force since the fall of 1957, has greatly contributed to this decrease.

The increase in benefits provided by the present government has also reduced the fund to a great extent.

Moreover, the maximum salary allowing entitlement to benefits has been raised from $4,800 to $5,460 which had the immediate result of increasing by more than 80,000 the number of persons qualifying for unemployment insurance benefits.

Here again, Mr. Speaker, the increase in the number of those in receipt of unemployment insurance has also materially contributed to a decrease in the unemployment insurance fund.

There are also the married women who, formerly, could not get unemployment insurance benefits on account of certain restrictions. The Conservative government has removed all restrictions, so that today all those women can get unemployment insurance benefits like anyone else. There again, Mr. Speaker, that change brought about by the Conservative party, has helped to deplete substantially the unemployment insurance fund.

Mr. Speaker, we have also heard opposition members state here that several industries had closed down. I should like to say a few words about that matter which is, in my opinion, of a very great importance. I shall refer particularly to the province of Quebec and point out to the house that if some industries have shut down, there are several others which, for several years now, have been well rooted in Quebec.

Let us glance at a report entitled:

Industrial Progress 1958

On page 13, we read the following:

Investments in primary industry and construction rose by 21.1 per cent in 1958 compared to the average for the years 1948 to 1957. In 1958, investments in these two industrial fields are estimated at $241,000,000 and represent 9.4 per cent of total investments for the year.

In 1958, governments and institutional services made new capital investments to the amount of $429,800,000 or an increase of 37.9 per cent compared to the years 1948-1957 when the value of annual investments averaged $311,600,000.

In the trade and finance section, investments rose from the $133,500,000 average for the years 1948 to 1957, to $195,800,000 in 1958, an increase of 46.7 per cent.

Page 14

During the 1958 new capital invested in the manufacturing industries was distributed as follows:

Paper products	$71,400,000
Non-ferrous metal products	58,400,000
Chemical products	46,300,000
Food and beverages	43,100,000
Transportation equipment	41,100,000
Iron and steel products	28,200,000
Petroleum products	24,100,000
Electrical apparatus and supplies	21,300,000
Non-metallic mineral products	19,000,000
Textile products	18,000,000
Wood products	7,800,000
Other groups	71,000,000

New enterprises and enlarged establishments

Much is being said, with boastful joy, about industries having to shut down. Some seem to be happy about it. But I would suggest—and I am referring to the province I know quite well—that in the province of Quebec, there are new firms and several enlarged establishments. We read in that same report:

Concrete evidence of the rapid expansion our manufacturing industry is undergoing can be seen in the fact that, during 1958, more than 328 new manufacturing establishments went into operation in the province and 171 existing plants were enlarged during the same 12 months. These figures represent only new enterprises and additions to existing ones brought to the attention of the provincial industrial commission up to December 31, 1958. There can be no doubt but that a complete census would reveal much higher figures than those quoted.

During 1957, there were 262 new establishments and 159 were enlarged. Therefore, in 1957 and 1958 alone the total figures are as follows:

New manufacturing firms	590
Establishments enlarged	330

Numerous industrial projects

A great many industrial projects planned for the current year have already been brought to the attention of the provincial industrial commission; by the end of January 1959 the number had attained 139. Several of these are large undertakings. The few listed below represent a total investment in the neighbourhood of $300,000,000.

In proof of this, and to convince my hon. friends of the opposition, here are the names of some of those industries:

(Text):

Canada Iron Foundries Limited, Canadian Steel Foundries, Gattuso Corp., Canadian Car Co. Limited, Proctor and Gamble Co. of Canada Limited, Continental Paper Products, Avon Products Limited, British Petroleum of Canada Limited, Miron et Frères Limitée, Sogemines Consultants Limited, Montreal Cottons Limited, Steel Co. of Canada Limited, Quebec Iron and Titanium Corp., Lignosol Chemicals Limited, Quebec Cartier Mining Co., Walter M. Lowney Limited, Reynolds Aluminum Co. of Canada Limited.

[Mr. English.]

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I believe the situation is not so bad; and while much is being made of the few industries that have closed down, those are things which happen and which will always happen. It should not be said that it is due to the recession. There is one point, however, that we must take into consideration, and that is management. Some people are more experienced in management than others. And bad management may be a reason for the shut-down of a plant.

I should like also to say a word, Mr. Speaker, about mines. Here is what we find in that same report:

Since the end of the war, the province of Quebec's mining industry has expanded to a remarkable degree; in fact, the total value of mineral production rose from $91.6 million in 1945 to $443,808,980 in 1957, an increase of 384.5 per cent. During the same period, the value of metals increased from $48.1 million to $238.8 million, while that of industrial minerals rose from $29.0 million to $120.6 million, and building materials from $14.4 million to $85.0 million. Around forty thousand workers are employed in various branches of the mineral industry and their total earnings are in excess of $135 million a year. The same industry's expenditures for fuel and electricity amount to more than $50 million a year.

The total value of mineral production in Quebec during 1958 adds up to around $395.6 million, which represents a large increase over the average for the years from 1950 to 1956, which was $299.8 million. Half of this total value or 50.7 per cent represents that output of metals which reached about $200.4 million; that of industrial minerals was $107.3 million or 27.1 per cent and building materials accounted for 22.3 per cent $87.8 million.

And, Mr. Speaker, I still quote from the same report, where it says:

The mining of iron ore is by far the most important feature in the development of our mineral resources, and although shipping only began in 1954, iron ore has ranked ahead of all other Quebec mining products, from the point of view of value, since 1957. At present, the greater part of our output of iron ore comes from the huge deposits in the area around Schefferville. The working of these deposits necessitated a capital expenditure in the neighbourhood of $250 million.

A 350-mile long railroad had to be built between Schefferville and the shipping port at Seven Islands on the north shore; the mining town of Schefferville, which now has a population of more than 3,000 was erected; two hydroelectric stations were installed to supply power to work the mines and operate the harbour facilities at Seven Islands, where the ore is loaded on board cargo vessels which carry it to the large consuming centres on the great lakes and the Atlantic coast. Between July 31, 1954, and the end of 1957, the Iron Ore Company of Canada shipped around 34 million tons of ore on some 2,228 cargo ships.

Extensive work is being carried on preparatory to the development of large iron ore deposits in the area of Mount Reed, some 160 air miles north of Shelter Bay. This undertaking calls for large scale projects, including the building of a railway 312 miles in length to link the mines to the North Shore; a shipping harbour at Port Cartier near Shelter Bay; a central electric station on the Hart-Jaune river, as well as two new town sites. One of the most interesting aspects of this project is the establishment by the Quebec Cartier Mining Company of large mills to refine the ore before shipment. The annual output of the mills will be 8 million tons of concentrates grading more than 60 per cent iron.

And, Mr. Speaker, here is what we also find in the same report:

Asbestos produced in 1957 amounted to $93.6 million, or more than the total value of Quebec's mineral output in 1946. About 65 per cent of the asbestos produced in the free world is mined in the province of Quebec. In 1958, three new concerns went into production. At Black lake, Lake Asbestos of Quebec has almost completed the draining of the lake and begun to work the huge deposits under its bed. At the same time Carey Canadian and National Asbestos began to operate their new mills which can produce 2,000 and 3,000 a day respectively. Lake Asbestos of Quebec alone will produce enough asbestos to increase the volume of Canadian production by 10 per cent.

Well, Mr. Speaker, do the facts I quoted not prove that our country's economy is in good condition? If we leave hovering in this house an impression that our industries in Canada are on the verge of bankruptcy, is it not bad publicity, does it not tend to discourage our friends the Americans from setting up industries in Canada?

That is why I wanted to state the facts today and show the real position of our Canadian economy.

Mr. Speaker, I have made a summary of the budget speech delivered by the Minister of Finance, to which I added a few considerations.

I also wanted to point out the economic development of the province of Quebec, a development which is occurring in the other Canadian provinces as well. We would be remiss if we did not tell the truth and give our whole country the publicity which must be given to it by those who are entrusted with its administration.

(Text):

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Gaspe (Mr. English) on his profound admiration of the inconsequential.

An hon. Member: Who wrote that for you?

Mr. Peters: I have waited long and patiently to participate in the budget debate, and I and many other Canadians, I believe, are very curious about what took place in the house yesterday. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) spoke in the budget debate and I can agree with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) that he did not say anything particularly important.

Mr. Ricard: Would you understand it?

Mr. Peters: I have to ask myself this question. Why did the Minister of Finance rise in his place and take two and a half hours to tell the Canadian people that the Leader of the Opposition had not said anything of any importance and that his criticism was not valid? This would indicate to me that either the Minister of Finance did give some weight to the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition or he became so impressed with his own importance and liked to hear himself speak so much that he spoke for two and a half hours.

Mr. Ricard: Are you looking in a mirror?

Mr. Peters: It was not necessary for the Minister of Finance to do this on this occasion because he has proved in the past that he can speak at great length and that he has the ability to carry on a discussion of financial matters without saying anything new. He does not have to prove that.

We have had three budget speeches this year, two by the minister and one by his parliamentary secretary. I would have thought that in these three budget speeches we would have been able to find something to justify to some extent a feeling of exhilaration among the Canadian people as to benefits they could hope to receive. This may have been true for a very few people in the civil service but it is not true for many other people.

If we want to solve many of the financial problems facing Canada today I suggest we can do no better than to call on the Minister of Finance to resign and be replaced by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) who in speaking in the budget debate made a number of proposals that certainly were satisfactorily documented. He also did something that the minister has always failed to do. He pointed out that somebody is going to have to pay for increased benefits and that the money is going to have to come from some place. He went on to point out how the money could be raised.

It was interesting to listen to the remarks of the previous speaker. He pointed out that it was wonderful that the minister had been able to bring in a balanced budget and forecast a surplus of $12 million. He said that it was a most wonderful thing that some civil servants were going to get a raise and that the government was still going to be able to hang on to the $12 million. We all know that this is not correct. We all know that you cannot maintain the tax structure and increase benefits to the people.

We listened to the same argument last year with respect to increasing unemployment insurance benefits. Certainly we increased them but we only increased them for about one-third of the people while at the same time greatly increasing the premiums paid by everybody coming under the scheme. This year we have a balanced budget but how is it being balanced? It is being balanced through the simple expedient of not giving to the common people in Canada the things that they need and deserve. I speak of the veterans who are in need of an increase in their pensions. Increased family allowances are necessary to maintain the standard of living for the children of this country. I speak of the old age pensioners for whom a new form of contribution must be devised so that we can continue to increase old age pensions as needed.

We also balanced this budget at the expense of the farmers and the unemployed of this country. For example, in the matter of family allowances, hon. members will recall that the rates were set in 1945, and they were raised in 1957. We also remember that at the time they were raised in 1957 almost half of the categories were changed so that, in actual fact, only about half of those receiving family allowances received any benefit from the change. It seems to me the time has arrived when we should be again supplying families the amount we originally set in 1945.

I believe that in so far as the veterans are concerned, everybody in the veterans affairs committee agrees that the pension needs to be increased. I do not believe there is anybody in the committee who disagrees with that view. We have been hearing these same people agree with this view for three years now and yet nothing has happened. Elmore Philpott, writing in the Vancouver Sun, had this to say:

> When Canada set up the very first war veterans pension scheme back in 1919, the stated fundamental principle was very simple. It was that the basic rate of full pension for a single man was to be equal to the going pay of a day labourer. That is what was then commonly called a "pick-and shovel man". We took over this fair principle from the British.

Then he goes on to show how this has actually worked over the years. In 1919 the civilian wage was $900 and the pension was $900; in 1948 the civilian wage was $2,080 and the pension, $1,128; in 1952 the civilian wage, $2,810 and the pension $1,500; in 1957 the civilian wage was $3,520 and the pension remained at $1,800.

> Notwithstanding the three substantial increases which were given from 1948 to 1957, the disabled war veteran is getting less than half of what all parties agreed to in 1919 as the fair and reasonable basis.

Mr. Brooks: I wonder if the hon. member knows that the same Mr. Philpott he is quoting is the gentleman who voted against an increase in veterans' pensions which I recommended and moved in the committee in 1952?

Mr. Peters: No, Mr. Speaker, I did not know that, and I certainly accept the minister's correction. However, this does not in any way change the accuracy of what I am quoting, and I am in complete agreement with these statements.

Mr. Brooks: I can tell the hon. member that what he is quoting is quite incorrect.

Mr. Peters: I should like to finish this quotation:

> Nobody in any government or party planned to make the disabled war veteran the victim of the process of creeping inflation, but that is how it has worked out.

I do not think this is incorrect. The minister may have quarrelled with the amount, but in days gone by I believe we agreed that a pensioner who was getting a 100 per cent pension, whether it was a war pension, old age pension or a pension granted in compensation by the various provinces, should get a pension that bore some relationship to civilian wages of the day. I am not sure whether the minister agrees that is the relationship. The value of these pensions has decreased very rapidly until today pensioners, particularly those from the first war, are not getting enough to enable them to live. I think this is the type of consideration that has been given that has allowed the Minister of Finance to balance the budget.

When the hon. member for Kootenay West was speaking in this budget debate he said it is true that the C.C.F. has always been desirous of a balanced budget. However, we do not believe in balancing the budget at the expense of the Canadian people. There are times, and there will continue to be times, when it is necessary to spend money to create work that is necessary to provide jobs. The full use of the productive assets of our country is the only way to have a balanced budget or to have a satisfactory arrangement so far as the Canadian people themselves are concerned.

I should like to go on to another matter which relates to a letter put out by a club in British Columbia, and I think it should be brought to the minister's attention. I believe conditions might develop that would not be advantageous to the Canadian people, and I do not think they will be advantageous or fair to the particular baseball club that is affected. This letter refers to the Mounties, a well known baseball club in Vancouver, and refers to the fact that you can buy tickets to the various games, the cost of which will be deductible for income tax purposes. Here is what they say in the letter:

> Here are the various 1960 plans under which you can buy tickets for business—getting distribution to:
> 1. Your best customers
> 2. The people you want as customers
> 3. Your pro-company employees

I do not believe we can agree that you should be able to establish non-union employees, company stooges and the like, by allowing the cost of baseball tickets to be deductible for income tax purposes and allowing the tickets to be used to accomplish these purposes. This is something at which the minister must take a look. I am quite sure he would be willing to give consideration to changing this provision.

One of the special budget speeches was the one made by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) this year. He commented on the civil service and made a number of statements as to what he thought would be satisfactory to a large number of these civil servants. I should like now to deal with the salary policy of the government as mentioned by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech, and also by his parliamentary secretary. These increases cover only 43,500 out of roughly 170,000 classified civil servants. While these increases are certainly a step in the right direction, when they are looked at in relation to the whole civil service they must be described as a small step indeed.

There is grave doubt among many civil servants as to exactly what their position is regarding salary adjustments. I have carefully followed this issue, and in particular the demands of organized civil servants. I must say that I have been somewhat surprised at the restraint they have shown and also the reasonableness of their requests. As you know, the tendency in private industry is to seek flat, across the board increases. However, I should like to draw your attention to a submission made to the Minister of Finance on February 24 by the joint action committee of the public service organizations. This is the organization described by an hon. member opposite as one led by a group of bludgeoning, bullying leaders. This is a statement that is a little difficult to rationalize with the tempered and reasoning arguments put forward at all times by these people.

In that statement to the Minister of Finance there was no question whatsoever of a flat across the board increase. The committee made certain points which in my opinion are worthy of noting again. They are as follows:

(1) That the civil service commission recommendations—whatever they may be—in their latest salary report should be implemented.

(2) Priority should be given in the budget to providing the funds necessary to raise the level of civil service salaries to a position of comparability with the salaries of employees in private industry, a position that few classes in the service even begin to approach.

(3) That the government undertake to maintain civil service salaries at levels comparable to those in private industry by regular adjustments to any classification, or group of classes, shown to be 3 per cent or more behind comparable industrial salary levels.

Where in these statements is there any reference to flat across the board increases? Where is there any attempt to bludgeon the government? It has always been my view as an observer and one who has had experience in industrial negotiations that the civil servants in this country generally have asked for no more than fair and equitable treatment from us their employers. Has the Minister of Finance given them this in his overcautious budgetary announcement? I think not.

Let us look at what has been done to date. I emphasize that promises will not pay the rent, that implied increases for others will not meet doctors' bills, and that many civil servants are frankly concerned as to exactly what is their position regarding adjustments of their salaries. The government in its wisdom has arbitrarily selected April 1, 1960 as the date for adjusting salaries. Yet the present salary anomaly was proved to exist as far back as October 1, 1958.

This is not a matter of my opinion or the opinion of any association, but the result of study by parliament's own agency, the civil service commission through its pay research bureau. This means that even including those who have received increases effective April 1, every civil servant in this country has sustained an average loss in salary of anywhere from $500 to $800 for the period. This, in effect, amounts to additional taxation. I suggest this is another means by which the minister achieved a balanced budget.

The super caution on the part of the Minister of Finance in making piecemeal adjustments has only tended to cause unease, trepidation and wonderment in the minds of many civil servants. There are 45,000 relatively happy civil servants today but there are another 125,000 who do not know exactly what to expect. Great anomalies have been created by this announcement. There are offices today where supervisory employees with heavy responsibilities are being paid less than those who work under them. Technical, administrative and professional employees have seen traditional relativities destroyed by this piecemeal approach.

Hon. members who have studied the make-up of the civil service will recognize that it is a highly stratified society. Each class is divided into grades, and each grade on the scale is paid a higher salary than the one immediately under it. Such stratification means that there is considerable prestige attached to the position held. This prestige is part of the supervisory system and it is necessary if proper efficiency and discipline is to be maintained. Reduce the dollar spread and the whole structure is out of proportion.

The government must move with haste to restore the proper relationship between the various grades and classes. It is only fair that those civil servants in administrative and technical positions who have not received adjustment now feel that the government is completely unconcerned with maintaining or restoring the proper salary and supervisory relationships and differential in the various areas of the civil service. However, this particular situation is really not the true illness of government-staff relationships, but rather a symptom of something much deeper.

First of all, I think each and every hon. member of this house must accept some share of responsibility for the situation as it exists. How many of us have taken the time and trouble to truly study the problems of employment in the government service? How many of us have tried with sympathy to understand the position of the civil servant and his associations? How many hon. members actually have underlying feelings of resentment toward the civil servant and his organization for reasons that to me are vague? How many have truly studied the need for an effective system of collective bargaining within the government service? How many have taken the trouble to listen objectively to the viewpoint of the organizations? If we had, the present unsatisfactory salary situation of the moment would never have occurred. Does the government recognize the legitimate desire of government employees to have a form of negotiation that is honourable and fair to the employee, while at the same time protecting the rights of parliament in money matters.

I have taken the trouble to study the position of the associations on collective bargaining. Nowhere do I see them demanding the right to strike. In fact, none of the major organizations have suggested that the same legislation applying to the industrial situation should also apply to the civil service. With some minor exceptions, civil servants have no desire to strike or usurp the traditional and legal functions of this parliament to vote money to carry on the country's business. Nor have I seen any desire on the part of civil servants, either individually or through their organizations, to assume cabinet or management functions. To the contrary, they have never asked for anything more than a fair and equitable system that will permit them to sit down with their employer and discuss as equals the terms and conditions of their employment.

In the near future hon. members will be asked to consider a new Civil Service Act. The organized civil servants strongly believe that within the framework of this act there must appear legal provision for collective bargaining. I have not been impressed with the provisions of appendix B of the Heeney report. It is naive in its assumptions and, to my understanding, it completely ignores the legitimate aspirations of the employees. It has all the weaknesses of a unilateral compromise in that it fails completely to appreciate the need for participating in employment matters that now exist. It is too much concerned with maintaining outmoded traditional concepts that are useless in 1960.

There are definite precedents for bargaining for civil servants. The government of Saskatchewan has negotiated with its employees for 15 years. In Great Britain the Whitley system has worked well for many years. In Australia and New Zealand a form of negotiation has been worked out that does not for one moment usurp any of the rights or privileges of the government or parliament, but has provided the employees with a fair and honourable means of collectively solving their problems. In certain so-called backward countries government employees enjoy these rights.

How much longer can we keep our heads in the sand? Collective bargaining is an accepted fact of life today. Even the most reactionary private employers have accepted collective bargaining as being here to stay. This parliament has passed legislation to ensure that citizens at large, excluding our own civil servants, may organize and bargain collectively with their employers. Legislation in practically all provinces provides the same rights. By what logic, by what right, can parliament and the government deny its own employees the proper and accepted means of settling their employment problems in an honourable and dignified way?

Time will not stand still. Collective bargaining for government employees is inevitable. It cannot be achieved by unilateral decision but through a spirit of co-operation and honesty by the government and civil servants and their organizations. A fair method can and must be worked out. It is time that the government and hon. members recognized that organizations in the civil service are here to stay and that they cannot be treated as evils to be tolerated but not recognized. Common sense dictates such an approach. The civil service is vital to the country's welfare. It must be well paid and provided with proper bargaining procedures if its efficiency and loyalty is to be maintained.

We have been pointing out that there are a number of factors involved in the opportunity the minister took to balance his budget. We believe the budget has been balanced at the sacrifice of the Canadian people and that this type of balanced budget is not necessarily in the interests of the Canadian people. We believe that consideration must be given to all the civil servants. Consideration must be given to retroactivity in our dealings with the civil service if we are going to operate in the manner in which we have operated in the past. We believe that consideration must also be given to the increasing of old age pensions, family allowances and veterans' benefits because these people are the victims in every case, as are all those with fixed incomes, of inflation for which this government is entirely responsible. Mr. Speaker, these are factors which must be taken into consideration in balancing the budget.

In conclusion I want to stress that this budget takes no account of the needs of the recipients of old age pensions, the needs of the civil servants and the needs of others with fixed incomes. It fails to indicate any government plan to deal with the chronic unemployment situation or with our depressed areas such as Elliot Lake, and other places. It fails to offer any plan for dealing with our trade imbalance and with the potentially high, I might say dangerous, influx of foreign equity capital into Canada. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, this group will oppose this budget.

INCOME TAX ACT

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): House in committee of ways and means on a certain proposed resolution to amend the Income Tax Act. Shall I rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house?

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I take it that the business which the house leader was good enough to announce on Monday will keep us busy for some time after the Easter recess. If that is the case, then I should like to take this opportunity to extend to the house leader, with whom I get along very well, my best wishes for a happy trip to Moscow and return. I trust he will be successful in selling a lot of Canadian wheat. I hope he will not go to Siberia.

May I extend to the Prime Minister, to his followers and to all who sit on this side of the house my very best wishes for a happy Easter recess. To those, I should like to join the name of the Speaker, the Deputy Speaker as well as the staff with all of whom we have been so happy to co-operate during the course of this part of the session.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, may I thank the hon. member for Laurier for his kind wishes and, in reciprocating them, say to him and through him to the members of the party he represents and to all members of the house that the very best of Easter wishes go to each and every one of them. I express the hope that when we come back renewed by—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Rest.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —vacation rest the business of the house will advance with even more celerity than has been the case in the past.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to special order made Wednesday, March 30 last, this house stands adjourned until Monday, April 25 next at 2.30 o'clock in the afternoon, and may I wish hon. members much happiness during the intervening days.

It being 3.44 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put; pursuant to special order.

PENAL INSTITUTIONS—SOLITARY CONFINEMENT, ETC.

Question No. 314—Mr. Regier:

1. How many inmates are there in solitary confinement in each of the penitentiaries built by the federal government?
2. Has any inmate now in solitary confinement been so confined for a period in excess of one year? If so, how many, and for what lengths of time has each of them already spent in solitary confinement?

4. In how many penitentiaries are members of the medical profession permitted to operate a practice outside of their civil service duties?
5. In how many penitentiaries is provision made for a separate and distinct office for the work of the employees of the John Howard society?

PRIVILEGE

MR. CHURCHILL—CORRECTION OF NEWSPAPER REPORTS RESPECTING SALE OF URANIUM TO RUSSIA

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege pertaining to two articles written by Mr. A. I. Goldberg of Moscow, reproduced in various Canadian newspapers and commented upon fairly extensively. The facts should be recorded.

The first article, printed in the newspapers of April 15, reads as follows:

> Trade Minister Churchill said here Thursday that Canada would be willing to sell the Soviet union uranium from Blind River, Ontario, mines. Mr. Churchill, in Moscow to sign a new Russian-Canadian trade agreement, said, in reply to questions, that the Russians wanted Canadian uranium.

The second article, printed on April 16, reads in part as follows:

> He said there was a "misunderstanding" about a statement he made on his arrival here two days ago that Canada "would sell uranium to the Russians if they want it." This reporter asked, "Would you sell uranium to the Russians under your new trade agreement"? Churchill's reply was, "Yes, if they would want it."

The quotations I have read from the two articles are false in their entirety. The true story of this episode is as follows. Immediately on my arrival on the 14th of April at the National hotel in Moscow I met Mr. Goldberg in the corridor for a period of about 30 seconds. We exchanged greetings. Mr. Goldberg said he had been in the Blind River area a few years ago, and I said I had recently been there on a visit. There was no discussion of the uranium stretch-out program nor any reference to the proposed trade agreement as he writes in his article. He stated that Canada had a surplus of uranium, and I said "Yes".

Then he put to me the following question, and this was his only question: "If Russia wants to buy uranium from Canada are you willing to sell?"

Uranium is not a product to be dealt with lightly. It is used for nuclear bombs. The question was obviously a trap, so I did not answer it. My only comment was, "Canada has plenty of uranium". That was the end of the conversation.

Mr. Goldberg then proceeded to falsify his report and to invent an answer which I did not give and to invent a question which he did not ask, namely about the Russians wanting Canadian uranium.

The next meeting with Mr. Goldberg was on Saturday, April 16, at a regular press conference which lasted for almost 40 minutes. In his second dispatch, printed in Canadian papers on April 16, Mr. Goldberg does not mention the press conference nor quote from it, for the simple reason that he took no part in it. He asked no questions, he just sat silently. Uranium was not mentioned by anyone. He had ample opportunity. One of the correspondents asked, "What articles or products does Canada expect to sell to Russia?" I replied, "With the exception of wheat, no particular articles have been mentioned." At that moment Mr. Goldberg might have intervened to challenge my statement. He remained silent.

His report refers to a private meeting that I had with him after the press conference was over. His report of that private meeting reads in part as follows, as printed in the newspapers of April 16:

> Today Churchill said: "There was a misunderstanding. I am not here to sell any specific item and selling uranium to the Russians would be the last thing we would do."

The quotation I have just read from Mr. Goldberg's second article is false. Mr. Goldberg appears to have a very unreliable memory. The facts I will now give, based on notes I made of the conversation, for I knew that I would not be able to rely on the veracity of Mr. Goldberg. I had hoped that he would correct his first dispatch, and that was why I saw him privately. It was a vain hope. Instead of correcting his first false story he repeated it and embellished it.

I said to Mr. Goldberg that he obviously misunderstood the problems connected with uranium, for he was writing fantastic nonsense. To test his knowledge of the subject I asked him various questions with regard to uranium being on the list of strategic materials, about the necessity for bilateral agreements before it may be sold even for peaceful purposes, and about the supervision and control of uranium sales. His answers showed that he was well aware of all those matters.

I then said to him that the statement he had attributed to me in his Thursday dispatch was untrue and incomprehensible in view of the knowledge that he had of the restrictions placed on the sale of uranium. Then I added, "The last product that Canada would be willing to sell to Russia at this time is uranium". He said, "I will report that".

He twisted and distorted it. He twisted it to read that the last country to which we would sell uranium would be Russia.

Another paragraph of Mr. Goldberg's report of our private meeting, printed on April 16, reads as follows:

> Reminded of his Thursday statement and the context in which he made it, Churchill said, "Well, it was made in a joking way".

The Thursday statement has been given in three versions by Mr. Goldberg who is nothing if not versatile.

The first version was printed on April 15:

> Canada would be willing to sell the Soviet union uranium from Blind River, Ontario, mines and the Russians want Canadian uranium.

The second revised version was printed on April 16:

> Canada would sell uranium to the Russians if they want it

The third revised version of the same date:

> Yes, if they would want it.

I said none of those words at any time. My Thursday statement was simply, "Canada has plenty of uranium".

Goldberg attributes to me a statement that I did not make. Then he writes that he reminded me of that statement and that I said it was made in a joking way.

As I did not make the statement in the first place, in any of the three versions, Mr. Goldberg is obviously falsifying the record again.

There was never any joking on my part about uranium nor any statement by me that I had been joking.

I asked Mr. Goldberg what purpose he had in mind in inquiring about the sale of uranium to Russia. He would not answer that question. I then accused him of making a farce and a joke of a serious matter with a careless disregard for the consequences. No responsible person, knowing that uranium is the material that is used for nuclear bombs, would talk lightly, in this period of international tension, about selling it to any country as if it were just another commodity.

So that there may be no mistake about it, I would add that at no time during the course of the lengthy negotiations with the Russians either here in Canada or in Moscow was the subject of uranium mentioned by any one of the officials or the ministers on either side.

[Mr. Churchill.]

In conclusion may I express my surprise that in the midst of the turmoil that appears to have upset some editorial offices in Canada no contact was made with me. No representative of the press of Canada at home or abroad, no representative of any other news-gathering service, got in touch with me. There were no interviews, there were no cablegrams, there were no telephone calls.

It is regrettable that Mr. Goldberg's dispatches, on the vitally important subject of uranium, at a critical moment in the trade negotiations with Russia, were accepted in Canada without any attempt whatsoever at verification.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF PAKISTAN MINISTER

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the house would allow me I should like to refer to the fact that Hon. A. K. Khan, minister of industries, irrigation and power of the government of Pakistan, who joined President Ayub Khan's cabinet in November, 1958, is with us here today. In welcoming him we do so both for himself and the country he represents, one of our friends of the commonwealth with whom we have the closest relations.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may be permitted to join on behalf of this party in the welcome which the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) has just given to the minister of a sister nation in the commonwealth.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the C.C.F. wish to join with the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) in offering our sincere welcome to this distinguished guest from Pakistan. All Canadians, I am sure, will welcome his visit to our country.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VISIT OF GENERAL DE GAULLE—STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in view of certain events which took place during the Easter recess perhaps the house will allow me to make a statement, first on the visit of President de Gaulle and second on a return visit which I paid to Mexico.

The recent state visit of the President of the French republic and community, General de Gaulle, provided the Canadian government and people with an opportunity to pay tribute to one of the foremost statesmen of our time, the illustrious leader of one of Canada's mother countries. Together with my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green) and members of the cabinet, a most satisfactory exchange of views took place during the stay of the president in Ottawa. The international situation was discussed, as well as the question of disarmament, aid to underdeveloped countries and other subjects of equal mutual interest.

These exchanges of views served to emphasize the continuing need for full consultation among members of NATO on matters which affect the vital interests of the western world. Coming as it did just two weeks before the summit conference, an excellent opportunity was presented to make known to him the views of the Canadian government on the major subjects which will be discussed at the conference.

I will not go into detail with regard to those discussions except to say that they covered the range of those matters which are of peculiar and particular interest at this time. I need hardly add that relations between our two countries continue to be excellent, and a wide measure of agreement exists on current world issues.

Following the course of the past, and with the consent of the house, I move that the address which President de Gaulle delivered at the state luncheon on April 19, 1960 and the address delivered by the Prime Minister be included as an appendix to the official report of debates for the third session of this parliament.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I say that we agree with great pleasure to the inclusion of these addresses in Hansard. They will be a memento of a happy visit to our country of a great and towering figure of our times, a man who never lost faith, during what appeared to be defeat, either in the cause for which his country was fighting or in the destiny of that country which in a very special way is our country, too. It will be a memento also of a man who once again has been called to the service of his native land and to the service of peace in difficult times, and who once again has responded to that call with courage and devotion.

I am sure the President's visit to Ottawa and to other parts of Canada will serve to strengthen the bonds which are already so strong between our two countries.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): The visit of President de Gaulle to Canada was most welcome to our nation, and emphasized once again the very close relations between Canada and France.

Visit to Mexico by Prime Minister

President de Gaulle has earned for himself a very distinguished name among all the nations of the world which are interested in democracy and which played a part in defeating nazism. General de Gaulle became known to us in a large measure as the leader of free France. He continues to play a leading role in the unfolding of history as it concerns France and other nations.

The Prime Minister mentioned many subjects which were discussed with the President. I am certain that in the field of disarmament there was discussion of the desirability of the discontinuance of nuclear tests, as well as the subject of providing aid to underdeveloped countries. The President's visit was most welcome, as I have said, and we trust that such exchanges will continue in the future.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion made by the Prime Minister with respect to the printing of these addresses in Hansard?

Motion agreed to.

[For text of addresses above referred to, see appendix]

STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER ON VISIT TO MEXICO

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): As I said a moment ago, I returned the visit paid to Canada last October by President Lopez Mateos, the first Mexican head of state to be an official guest of this country. I did this during the Easter recess.

If the regard and esteem of a people for another can be gauged by the welcome given to their official representatives, the three days I spent in Mexico have brought home to me, more vividly than anything I had ever heard or read, a realization of the good will that Canada enjoys in this dynamic and rapidly advancing North American neighbour.

During this visit I had occasion to discuss with the President and with the foreign minister, Sr. Manuel Tello, questions of concern to both our countries, including international questions, and as a result of these conversations I can say there are no basic differences in our approach to world problems although our policies may not always coincide; and do not, with regard to the law of the sea, where the need to maintain historical rights confirmed by treaty makes it impossible, in the President's view, for Mexico to support the Canadian stand.

These conversations have further convinced me of the need for consultations at a high level with the political leaders not only of countries associated with Canada by tradition and alliance, but those of all other states whose similarities in background, outlook and interests are bringing them closer to us, in order to reach a wider and clearer understanding of the motives and requirements on which our respective attitudes are based, and to explore the possibilities of more effective collaboration.

I was glad to hear the views of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) a moment ago when he paid his tribute to the need for these exchanges. I can say one thing, that my visit to the various commonwealth countries was worth while in that it provided me with a knowledge and understanding of the attitudes of the other members of the commonwealth which could not have been attained in any other way.

On behalf of the people of Canada I made a presentation to the national university of Mexico of volumes relating to various aspects of Canadian life and achievement.

I could speak of the welcome I was accorded in many ways. As a lawyer I naturally was deeply touched by the fact that for the first time in its history a foreigner was made an honorary member of the illustrious and national college of advocates, a tribute by the bar of Mexico not to me personally but to the people of Canada.

There was a wide measure of public sympathy with the attitude of the Canadian government on matters such as disarmament and the suspension of nuclear tests, to which the hon. member for Assiniboia just referred, the need for international co-operation in the use and development of atomic energy for peaceful purposes, a reduction of discriminatory trade restrictions, the value of fostering cultural relations and an increase in the exchange of students through the granting of scholarships and other facilities.

May I summarize this. I think visits such as this contribute to good will, good fellowship and better understanding. There are no words I can use to describe the warmth of the feeling of the President, the government and the people of Mexico to Canada. I hope the President may be able again very soon to pay a visit to Canada so that we in turn may continue in that close feeling and warm relationship that prevails between our two countries.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all hon. members of the house, and certainly we on this side, were pleased when we learned that the Prime Minister was able to take time off from what might have been a vacation to return the visit of the President of Mexico. I am sure also that this visit has made its own contribution to the strengthening of the political, cultural and trade relations between two countries which over the years have built up a tradition of friendly relationships. After all, Mr. Speaker, there is a special bond between Mexico and Canada because, with the oceans, we surround the United States.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the C.C.F. believes that a visit such as the Prime Minister has made to Mexico is of a kind that is likely to lead to a strengthening of the relationships between our two countries. We would hope it would lead to an expansion of trade, and be viewed as an indication of Canada's growing interest in the development of good will between Canada and the Latin-American nations and an indication of our concern for their improved economic development.

The Prime Minister made brief reference to some words I used earlier. I want to tell him we feel that exchanges between Canada and other nations should be undertaken from time to time. We say that when these visits are considered the Prime Minister should have in mind their timing and duration, because the Prime Minister's attention to domestic matters as well as external matters is of great importance. We feel that the visit to Mexico was one that probably should have been made.

TRADE

TABLING OF PROTOCOL AND LETTERS RESPECTING AGREEMENT WITH RUSSIA

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I now table for the information of the house the text of the protocol signed in Moscow on April 18, 1960, which renews for a three-year period the trade agreement between Canada and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics of February 29, 1956, as well as the understanding set out in the letters which the two parties exchanged at that time concerning the right of the Canadian government to fix under the Canadian Customs Act values of goods for ordinary and special duty.

The protocol also provides that each of the two governments will give sympathetic consideration to any representations which the other government may make concerning the implementation of the renewed agreement and with regard to other matters which may affect their commercial relations. The protocol is in force provisionally from the date of signature. It is to be ratified as soon as possible, and will enter into force definitively on the date of exchange of instruments of ratification, which is to take place in Ottawa. An early opportunity will be provided for a debate in parliament, and a resolution of approval will be introduced to this end.

I am also tabling copies of letters which I exchanged with the Soviet minister of foreign trade, Mr. N. S. Patolichev, setting forth certain additional understandings concerning the development of trade between the two countries. If the house agrees, I suggest that the text of the protocol and of the letters be printed as an appendix to Votes and Proceedings.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house give concurrence to the proposal of the minister that the text of the protocol and the letters be printed as an appendix to Votes and Proceedings?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[For text of protocol and letters above referred to, see Votes and Proceedings of today]

Mr. Churchill: As hon. members are aware, the negotiations for renewal of the trade agreement with the U.S.S.R. took a considerable time. They were initiated before the 1956 agreement lapsed on February 28, 1959, and the early discussions were not without difficulties. However, common ground was eventually found, and the agreement is being renewed on terms which I consider satisfactory from the Canadian point of view, particularly taking into account the changed trading circumstances since the earlier agreement was concluded.

The house is familiar with the provisions of the 1956 agreement which is now being extended. In brief, Canada and the U.S.S.R. exchange most favoured nation treatment and, on a reciprocal basis, provide for non-discriminatory treatment of merchant ships in the seaports of the two countries. Either government may, however, apply prohibitions or restrictions of any kind directed to the protection of its essential security interests. Our strategic export controls are therefore not affected.

The protocol extending the agreement broadens the basis on which representations can be addressed to either of the two parties. Previously the two governments had agreed to give sympathetic consideration to representations concerning the implementation of the agreement. The scope for such representations has now been enlarged to include any other matters affecting commercial relations between the two countries. Should the necessity arise this would permit Canada, for example, to take up with the government of the U.S.S.R. any special problems which may be encountered in respect of the sale in world markets of Soviet products in which Canada has a substantial export interest.

The letter which I exchanged with Mr. Patolichev provides that in each year of the renewed agreement the Soviet foreign trade organizations will purchase Canadian goods up to a total value of $25 million Canadian, including not less than 200,000 metric tons of Canadian wheat, provided the total annual value of Canadian purchases from the U.S.S.R. is not less than $12½ million Canadian. Should the total value of Canadian purchases from the U.S.S.R. be less than $12½ million Canadian in any one year the Soviet undertaking to purchase from Canada would be reduced and would be determined on a two to one basis; that is, the Soviet union would purchase twice as much from Canada as Canada imported from the Soviet union, and wheat will constitute not less than half the value of such annual Soviet purchases.

It will be noted that no commitment to purchase Soviet goods has been made by the Canadian government. As in the case of trade with other countries, the level of our purchases will be determined by the commercial decisions of Canadian importers. The house will appreciate that the U.S.S.R. agreement to trade with Canada on a two to one basis represents a very substantial concession on their part, since the Soviet union normally endeavours to balance trade with each of its trading partners.

In addition to establishing the Soviet commitment to purchase Canadian goods the letter provides that the authorities of the two countries will meet at least once a year, alternately in Ottawa and Moscow, to consult concerning the implementation of the agreement and any other matters affecting Soviet-Canadian trade relations. It is the hope of both parties that trade will flow reasonably regularly in each year of this agreement. The annual consultations will provide the occasion for an exchange of views with respect to the operation of the agreement. They should also prove of value in building up greater understanding between the two countries with respect to trade matters.

The letter also sets forth an understanding that as a measure toward attaining the mutual objective of an expansion of trade the two governments will facilitate visits for business purposes between the two countries. It is my hope that within the framework of the renewed agreement, and in pursuance of the undertakings in the letter which has been exchanged, there will be a mutually advantageous growth in trade between the two countries. The actual growth in trade and the nature of the goods to be exchanged will depend mainly on the decisions of the businessmen and business organizations of the two countries.

The Canadian market is highly competitive, and it will be necessary for the Soviet export authorities to understand our requirements if they are to sell successfully in Canada. Similarly, it will be important for Canadian exporters to make known to the Soviet import organizations the products and goods which they are in a position to supply on competitive terms. In general, it will be necessary for there to be much closer contact between the traders of the two countries than has been the case in the past. To this end I have suggested, and the Soviet authorities have agreed, that a group of Soviet traders representing both export and import interests should visit Canada, and the Soviet authorities have indicated that they would welcome a comparable visit of Canadian businessmen to the Soviet union. I hope the necessary arrangements for these visits can be made during the current year. I have also invited the Soviet minister of trade, Mr. Patolichev, to come to Canada and this invitation is being considered by the Soviet government. I hope he will find it convenient to come at the same time as the visit of Soviet trade representatives.

As a further measure to facilitate the growth of trade, Mr. W. J. Van Vliet has been appointed commercial counsellor at the Canadian embassy in Moscow, where his main responsibility will be to assist in the promotion of our exports to the U.S.S.R.

The house will recall that under the 1956 arrangement the Soviet union undertook an annual obligation to purchase a specified minimum quantity of wheat, 400,000 tons. The new arrangement provides that at least half the value of the annual Soviet purchase commitment will be in the form of wheat. If Soviet purchases were to rise to the value of $25 million, our sales would include at least 200,000 tons of wheat. Accordingly, while the Soviet union will continue to purchase significant quantities of Canadian wheat, we may now look toward more diversified sales to the U.S.S.R. Both sides are aiming to diversify as well as to expand trade.

The house is aware that the Soviet union has greatly enlarged its production of wheat and is a regular wheat exporter. In the circumstances the amount of wheat which the Soviet union has undertaken to purchase may be regarded as satisfactory. I should add that I raised with the Soviet government the question of the approximately 200,000 tons of wheat still outstanding under the old agreement. Provided trade develops in a satisfactory manner, in accordance with the agreement and the letters exchanged in Moscow, I was assured by Mr. Patolichev that the Soviet union would endeavour to make up this deficiency so there would be no question of the Soviet union not having fulfilled the earlier obligation.

I should like the house to know, Mr. Speaker, that I was received with friendship and courtesy by the Soviet ministers and senior officials whom I had the opportunity to meet. In addition to Mr. Patolichev I had the pleasure of general discussions with Mr. F. R. Kozlov and Mr. A. I. Mikoyan, both first deputy premiers of the Soviet union. These gentlemen showed a welcome awareness of Canada's interests as a world trader and major exporter.

Our conversations were frank and constructive. The hospitality which was shown to me and to the other members of the Canadian delegation was generous and memorable. I believe that over and above the provisions of the agreement and the exchange of letters, a basis has been established for closer and more fruitful co-operation between the two countries in the field of trade.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, the statement made by the minister is somewhat longer than is usual on motions, and in addition to giving the factual information which we all welcome and which is properly given at this stage of the house proceedings on a subject of this importance, it also contains some debatable material. In so far as it contained factual information and related to the tabling of the documents relevant to the new trade treaty, we welcome it because this will give us an opportunity of examining the actual documentation to see precisely what the situation is. We welcome also the announcement that in due course the matter will be coming before the house for discussion.

The minister described the agreement, if I understood him correctly, as satisfactory in the circumstances. His later elaboration of it would lead us to believe it is not necessarily so satisfactory, because it does not even provide for the taking up of the requirements for wheat provided under the earlier agreement, although it is quite true that they may take that additional 200,000 tons and thus complete the earlier agreement. While he told us how high the obligation to purchase might go if our Canadian importers bought heavily from Russia, he did not tell us what I took from his statement to be a fact, that it could also go much lower than it has been if our importers do not buy.

I noted also the omission to deal with the list of prohibited goods for export to Russia.

Perhaps when we come to orders of the day we can get some further information on that point. Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, there is no purpose in making further comment at this time.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, our group was very happy to learn that the minister was in Moscow, and that at long last he was able to complete the renewal of our trade agreement with the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. We note with considerable interest that, unless I am in error, this is the first time the Canadian government has entered into what is in effect a reciprocal trade agreement, in that we agree to buy a certain amount of goods from another nation if another nation will buy a certain quantity of goods from us.

It is our hope that our government will realize its responsibility in this regard. We regret very much that even if the optimistic objectives that are aimed at under the agreement are realized, it will involve a reduction in Russia's purchase of Canadian wheat under the earlier agreement by 50 per cent. We regret very much this proposed reduction in Russia's purchase of Canadian wheat.

However, we want to emphasize, and to underline as heavily as we can, that for the first time to our knowledge, in signing a trade agreement, the Canadian government has morally, if not otherwise, accepted a responsibility. I noted the minister's announcement that a counsellor had been appointed to serve in Moscow to promote Canadian exports. I hope the government will realize that under the terms of the agreement, exports will automatically follow our imports. I hope the minister might see fit to exert considerable energy toward the promotion of Canadian imports from the Soviet union, and that those efforts might extend beyond the expression of pious pleas and platitudes to Canadian enterprise to actively consider the importation of goods made within the Soviet union, because our exports are so directly related to Canadian imports under the terms of the agreement. We hope the government will realize its responsibility in this regard and will not be entirely dependent upon the whims of Canadian importers.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SOUTH AFRICA—INQUIRY AS TO DISCUSSION OF APARTHEID

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, having regard to the statement on the matter made by the Prime Minister before the Easter recess, might I ask him now what arrangements the government proposes to make to bring about a discussion of apartheid in South Africa.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the house will recall that on April 11, during discussion of this matter, I stated as follows, as recorded at page 3088 of Hansard, when the Leader of the Opposition asked whether an opportunity might be given for the introduction and discussion of such a resolution as had been brought before the United Kingdom House of Commons three days before:

> —I can say that immediately after recess, when the condition of affairs in South Africa will at least not be as turbulent, we hope, as it is at the moment, we might then give consideration to doing that which the hon. member has suggested so that the views of Canada's House of Commons, with respect to which there is no difference from the point of view of party affiliation or position in the house, might be expressed.

Having given that consideration, I think it would be proper for some discussion to take place between the Leader of the Opposition, government representatives and other members in the house, to the end that a discussion might take place or could take place on this subject and generally on those matters which may come up for consideration at the prime ministers' conference which opens in London early in May. I shall be leaving, if my present plans eventuate, on Thursday next. Therefore, after discussion with the hon. gentleman and other members, if some mutual arrangement can be arrived at for discussion or a course of action determined in order to permit a discussion, that will be done.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I do not wish to transgress the rules of the house, Mr. Speaker, but any arrangements the Prime Minister might have in mind, as he has outlined, will be acceptable to our group.

FREIGHT RATES

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON CONTINUATION OF SUBSIDY—REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is the government in a position to announce whether it intends to ask parliament to provide for a continuation of the freight rate subsidy in order that freight rates may be held down until the report of the royal commission has been received?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I think I can tell the hon. gentleman that he is not the only one who has had that question in mind. There were two hon. members supporting the government and the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), all apparently activated by a speculative article which appeared in the Canadian press on Saturday last. All I can say in this regard is that the freight rate assistance act is in effect until August 1 next. Hence ample time will be given for consideration or determination of this matter, or at least for an announcement of the policy to be followed. Further than that I will not go at the moment, except to say that this is a question of government policy which will be announced in proper course.

Mr. Argue: I have a supplementary question. Can the Prime Minister say whether he has recently had discussions with the chairman of the royal commission on freight rates, and whether it is expected that the report of the royal commission may be received before August 1 or whether it will be later than that?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I had one chat with the chairman of the commission, and there was no indication as to when a report might be expected. As I have said on other occasions, having once gone out on a limb and suggested a target date for the report of a royal commission and having heard about it on a number of occasions since then as evidence of a lack of prescience on my part, I do not want to add a further example.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I ask a supplementary question. The Prime Minister will probably recall that before the house took recess on the 13th of this month I asked a question with reference to the extension of the freight rate freeze, and the Prime Minister answered the question. Then I referred to what appeared in the annual report of the president of the Canadian National Railways, that April 10 appeared to be the deadline date. The purpose of my question then, as it now, was to ascertain whether the government would make a decision with regard to the freezing of freight rates before the end of this month.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Again, Mr. Speaker, may I make this answer; and in the past I have heard the hon. gentleman, when he was minister, give the same answer. When a decision is made and it is proper to announce it, the announcement will be made in the house.

Mr. Chevrier: May I go a step further and ask the Prime Minister another question which arises out of the press release to which the Prime Minister and the hon. member for Assiniboia have referred.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Not a press release; press speculation.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Chevrier: I sent it to the Prime Minister. It is a statement which might qualify under that head. I will not take issue with the Prime Minister on that matter, but the point about which I should like to ask now is this. Is there any intention of granting an increase in freight rates by way of subsidy?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have stated that the article in question was a speculative one, and I do not intend to make any observations on speculative articles.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO EXTENSION OF SEASONAL BENEFITS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Is the minister in a position to advise the house whether there will be an extension of seasonal benefits under unemployment insurance? If not, what provision is being made to care for those who will come off that list on May 15?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): No decision or consideration has been contemplated by the government with regard to the extension of seasonal benefits beyond May 15.

Mr. Winch: As a supplementary question may I ask whether the minister has in mind any plans by means of which to take care of those who will be off the benefits on May 15 and still have no employment?

Mr. Starr: No consideration in that respect has been given. The situation will be as it has always been at that time of the year. When seasonal benefits end, then of course those who are on seasonal work are expected to be back at work.

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT BY ADVISORY COMMITTEE ON HOLIDAY AND SEVERANCE PAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour. Is the minister yet in a position to advise the house when he anticipates receiving, or being able to report on, the recommendations of the unemployment insurance advisory committee as regards holiday pay being classed as wages?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker; I expect to make a statement in the house tomorrow on this matter.

FINANCE

SUGGESTED EXPLANATION TO TOURISTS OF U.S. SILVER DISCOUNT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, or in the absence of the minister his parliamentary secretary may take note of it. In view of the annoyance experienced by tourists entering Canada owing to the discount on United States silver, which is causing considerable hard feeling, will the minister give consideration to giving every tourist entering at Canadian immigration points a letter containing a friendly explanation about the discount on United States silver?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Acting Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): In the absence of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources I will take this question as notice.

CODFISH—PROPOSED TARIFFS OF COMMON MARKET

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the minister a question. Could the minister say whether the government has made any representation with respect to the proposed tariffs of the common market on salted codfish, which would of course be exceedingly detrimental to exports from Canada?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the views of the Canadian government have been made known to all the countries concerned with respect to all the commodities which were proposed to be embraced in the averaging process of tariff arrangements contemplated by the Six to become effective on July 1. I think it is a matter of satisfaction to all hon. members that the proposed changes have been deferred by the Six until January 1.

This is in line with the views which were put forward by the Canadian representatives. It means that the GATT negotiations will have an opportunity to begin before the date on which the proposed tariff changes will take effect. This will afford an opportunity for discussion of all these questions, we hope, at the GATT meeting, which is in keeping with the view the Canadian government's representatives have expressed on various occasions hitherto.

Inquiries of the Ministry

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REQUEST FOR LATEST STATISTICS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the press release issued on Wednesday on the employment situation, showing an increase of 11,000 over last month in the number without jobs and seeking work and 41,000 over last year, can the minister now provide us with the latest figure in his possession for unplaced applicants in comparison with a month ago and a year ago?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The latest release shows that the number of unplaced applicants as of April 7 of this year is 828,000.

TRADE

URANIUM—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF STATEMENT BY MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce arising out of his explanation of the regrettable incident during his visit to the U.S.S.R., and concerning the statement he made earlier in the proceedings today about the reports of this alleged statement on the sale of uranium. My question is asked in order to get clarification of the earlier part of his statement.

As I have noted his remarks, I understood him to say that Mr. Goldberg asked him this question: If Russia wants to buy uranium, will you sell? To that question I understood the minister to say in his statement that he did not reply. He then immediately proceeded in his statement to say that he then said, "Canada has plenty of uranium to sell". What I want to clear up is this point. Was there any conversation between the question of Mr. Goldberg and the statement about Canada having plenty of uranium to sell?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I hope the hon. member for Ottawa West will not further complicate a matter which I hope is now abundantly clear. My statement on Thursday was "Canada has plenty of uranium".

Mr. McIlraith: Plenty of uranium?

Mr. Churchill: Yes plenty of uranium; period. I did not answer the question of Mr. Goldberg's. He wanted me to say yes or no. I have answered too many questions in the house here—

Mr. Winch: Very often we also want that and we do not get it.

Mr. Churchill: —too many loaded questions, to be caught in that way. Mr. Goldberg made a statement to the effect that Canada had a surplus of uranium, and I said yes.

Mr. McIlraith: What I am trying to clear up is this point. It seemed to me there was a gap in the statement read to the house by the minister at the opening of proceedings today. He described the question which I have read, and he stated that he did not reply. Then the minister went on to deal with this other matter, that Canada had plenty of uranium. What I want to know is this. Was there any conversation between those two statements? There seems to be a gap in the minister's statement. If he has the text there I think he himself will see it. It is clarification that I want.

Mr. Churchill: I will clarify the matter right away, but the hon. member will have an opportunity to read all these things in Hansard. The conversation with Mr. Goldberg lasted for 30 seconds. I stepped out of the elevator, moved over to the door of my hotel room, a distance of about from here to across this aisle, and in that space of time Mr. Goldberg said four things and I said four things, and I have reported them all in the statement. That was all there was to it.

Mr. McIlraith: Thank you very much.

REPORT OF STUDY GROUP ON TRANS-ATLANTIC ECONOMIC ORGANIZATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask whether it is proposed to table the report of the committee of four on European economic co-operation, which I think has now been made public?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): I shall be glad to look into that matter.

UNITED NATIONS

WORLD REFUGEE YEAR—INQUIRY AS TO ADMISSION OF WHITE RUSSIANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether the Canadian government will give consideration to extending the benefits of our world refugee year efforts to the so-called white Russians who are residing and have been residing for many years on the mainland of China.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the efforts of the Canadian government in world refugee year are directed toward bringing tubercular refugees from Europe to Canada, and that plan is proceeding very well. In addition, of course, we do provide funds to the high commissioner for refugees for use among refugees in China to whom the hon. member refers, but that is not part of our special contribution to world refugee year.

Mr. Regier: May I ask the minister whether he would explain to the house why there exists discrimination between people of European origin who are refugees residing in China, and people of European origin who are refugees in western Europe?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is asking one of those argumentative questions which I think is out of order at this time.

Mr. Regier: In that case perhaps I may reword my question. Would the minister explain the reasoning of the government, as to why they adopted a different attitude toward these refugees now living in Asia and refugees now living in western Europe?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, no discrimination has been shown. I think the hon. member is merely trying to stir up trouble. If he wants to follow this up, when my estimates are up for discussion I will be glad to deal with this question.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, meanwhile may I ask the minister if he could say how many additional families it is expected will be coming here under the government scheme?

Mr. Green: No, I cannot give that information yet.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

INQUIRY AS TO FRENCH NETWORK PROGRAM ON MARSHAL PETAIN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue or his parliamentary secretary, both of whom I see are busy with other matters. In the light of the statement made by the Prime Minister a moment ago concerning the visit of President de Gaulle, which I am sure the house welcomed, may I ask the minister whether he is aware that on the very day of the arrival of General de Gaulle in Canada the French network of the C.B.C. devoted a half hour program to Marshal Petain. If so, has the C.B.C. offered any explanation to the minister?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Acting Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I shall see that this question is drawn to the attention of the minister, who I know will have to ask the C.B.C. for an explanation in any event.

INDUSTRY

INQUIRY AS TO PROPOSED HYDROCARBON PIPE LINE TO LAKEHEAD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce; notice of my intention to ask this question was sent to his office.

Can the minister advise the house whether there are any negotiations going on between the government and promoters of a pipe line to move liquid hydrocarbons to the great lakes area? If so, will this proposed pipe line be a feeder line to United States industries, or is it being constructed for the purpose of building a petrochemical industry at the Canadian lakehead?

Mr. Speaker: I think the second part of the question is purely hypothetical, but perhaps the first part might be answered.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, a matter such as this should be directed to the national energy board, if I correctly heard the hon. member's question. I cannot give him a complete answer at the present moment, but I will inquire.

Mr. Badanai: Has the minister not received the copy of my question which was sent to his office?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON DISCUSSIONS WITH FIELD MARSHAL MONTGOMERY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of National Defence whether there is anything he can appropriately report to the house on his conversations today with another great soldier, Field Marshal Viscount Montgomery, whose presence we are delighted to observe in the gallery.

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): I am sure we are all delighted that Field Marshal Viscount Montgomery is here today, and is able to spare time to appear in the gallery. We had a very interesting discussion during luncheon.

IMMIGRATION

REQUEST FOR COMMENT ON STATEMENT BY EXTERNAL AFFAIRS MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the Prime Minister whether he has any comment to make on the propriety of the statement made on internal security by the Secretary of State for External Affairs during the television program "The Nation's Business", which has been widely interpreted in the press as a reference to a case before the courts.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have no observation to make with regard to that matter. Knowing the hon. gentleman as I do, I know he does not commit improprieties.

Mr. McIlraith: He did in that case.

OPPORTUNITY FOR PERSON TO ANSWER CHARGE OF BEING SECURITY RISK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the government is planning any action whereby an individual resident in Canada who has been labelled as a security risk may be able to hear the charges made against her, and defend herself and clear her name, if possible, of the charge laid against her by the Prime Minister in this house.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): In view of the fact that the question appears to concern a woman, I take it that it has to do with a case which is before the courts; therefore the hon. gentleman should know it cannot be referred to here.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the Prime Minister think it should be referred to by a minister outside this house?

Mr. Regier: On a point of order, may I ask the Prime Minister whether this is the issue which is before the courts, since I understand it has nothing to do with the issue before the courts?

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is not a point of order to complain about an answer which the hon. gentleman has received.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I would like to direct a question to the Secretary of State and ask him whether he will be good enough to look into a return to a motion made by myself on February 3 concerning the plans and specifications of an application made by Quebec Hydro for the development of power resources at Carillon. It was passed by the house on that day but I still have not received the return.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Acting Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I will look into that matter.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the Secretary of State if he will look into a return of mine, part of which was tabled on April 4. After that I raised a question of privilege, and after a couple of more inquiries another part was tabled on April 12, but the second and third questions are still not answered. As this return has to do with a matter now before the house, I hope the minister will expedite it.

Mr. Balcer: Could the hon. member give me the number of the question or the subject matter?

Mr. Pickersgill: The subject matter of the question has to do with federal payments to the provinces, and I think the Minister of Finance is very familiar with it.

ATOMIC ENERGY

INQUIRY AS TO DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING FRENCH NUCLEAR TESTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): May I address a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the Prime Minister gave a short resume of his talk with General de Gaulle, I wonder if the right hon. gentleman could tell us whether in the course of this discussion any mention was made of the nuclear tests in the Sahara, and whether the attention of General de Gaulle was drawn to the fact that after the recent explosions there was a sharp increase in radioactive fall-out in all parts of Canada.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I do not think that matter required to be brought to his attention. In so far as the radiation hazard is concerned, Canada's views in favour of an end of the tests were brought to his attention.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might ask the indulgence of the house to consider, by unanimous consent, a certain course of action.

On reviewing the evidence submitted before the committee of the other place in two divorce cases, No. SD-140 and another which has already passed this house, it has appeared to me that there is extreme conflict in the evidence which was presented. I have discussed this matter and reviewed the evidence with the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. McCleave), who has agreed with the course of action I am proposing.

I therefore wonder if I may ask unanimous consent to move that order No. 56 concerning Bill No. SD-140 be discharged and the said bill referred back to the committee on miscellaneous private bills.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house prepared to give unanimous consent to the hon. member for Skeena to make the motion he has referred to?

Mr. McCleave (Halifax): I have no objection, but I should like Bill No. SD-35 to be referred back at the same time.

Mr. Speaker: The proposal is that by unanimous consent the two bills which are standing for consideration in committee and which are items Nos. 35 and 56—

Mr. McCleave: The second item, the one I referred to, is item No. 217.

Mr. Speaker: —that items 217 and 56 on the orders of the day be discharged and the bills referred back to the committee on miscellaneous private bills. Is it the pleasure of the house to give unanimous consent to this course of action?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and orders discharged.

MARIE RITA DUBE HOULD

The house in committee on Bill No. SD-38, for the relief of Marie Rita Dube Hould—Mr. McCleave—Mr. Flynn in the chair.

Mr. Howard: May I make a comment on Bill No. SD-38, unless of course, as has been done on past occasions, the hon. member for Halifax wishes to say something before I do? I do not know whether he does or not. If not, I will proceed to make one or two references to this particular bill.

The petition in the bill which is before us, and the evidence relating to it, indicates that the marriage took place on July 17, 1954. As alleged in the petition, it is shown that adultery took place on May 13, 1959 at a particular hotel in the city of Montreal involving one of the parties to the marriage.

To bring out these statements in the petition a number of questions were asked by the subcommittee of the other place. In so far as proof of marriage is concerned, this information is contained on page 11 of the evidence, where a series of questions is asked by the clerk of the committee. The questions are directed to the petitioner, asking her name, her age, her address, and other material facts of that nature. The question is asked, "Are you married?" and the answer is "Yes". Then the name of the respondent is given. The questions and answers continue:

Q. When were you married?
A. July 17, 1954.
Q. Where?
A. Lachine, Quebec.
Q. By whom?
A. By Father Thomas Wardell.

Religion is asked about, and both the lady and her husband are Catholic. The evidence continues:

Q. Do you recognize this document I am showing you?
A. Yes.
Q. What is it?
A. It is a copy of my marriage certificate.
Q. Are the statements contained therein true and correct?
A. Yes.

Thus the fact of marriage having taken place as stated in the petition is proved to be the case. There is also proof of the consummation of marriage to the extent that a child was born of this marriage, and this information appears at the top of page 12. Questions are asked by Mr. Lieff, Q.C., who appeared as counsel for the petitioner. He is questioning the petitioner:

Q. Do you have any children issue of this marriage?
A. Yes.
Q. How many?
A. One.
Q. What is the date of birth?
A. January 9, 1956.

Further evidence follows with respect to a legal separation having been obtained, and some material factual evidence is given about the circumstances which led up to that legal separation. On page 12 the petitioner was questioned by her counsel, Mr. Lieff, as follows:

Q. And did you obtain your legal separation in the courts in Montreal?
A. Yes.
Q. Was there a judgment giving you that separation?
A. Yes.
Q. Did the judgment award you any money?
A. Yes, $100 a month.
Q. Did your husband pay that money?
A. Yes.
Q. Until when?
A. Until September, 1959.
Q. And what happened after September, 1959? Why was it not paid then?
A. I didn't want anything else to do with him and I contacted the air force and told them to stop it.

One could assume from the evidence that she entertained an intense dislike for her husband, which on the basis of the other evidence she adduced as to his conduct prior to the separation was perhaps justifiable.

Two private investigators were involved in this case, Mr. Lawrence Steele and Mr. Roy Humphries, both of Montreal. There is some question about the propriety of the attitude of one of the investigators whose evidence appears on page 13. After being sworn Mr. Steele was questioned by Mr. Lieff and asked if he could identify a photograph of the respondent, which he did. The questioning then continued:

Q. Did you investigate his behaviour?
A. I did.
Q. When?
A. I first started the investigation in February, 1959, but nothing really happened until May, 1959. He is with the air force and he would be flying in and out every other day of the week. On May 11 I had information that he was in town and I checked at the air base and found that he was in some hotel in Montreal. From investigation at the hotels I found that he was in the—hotel.

I assume the investigator contacted a number of hotels to see if the respondent was registered there. The evidence continued:

Investigation showed that he had been in there on the 11th but I did not see him until the 12th. There was a Mr. and Mrs.—registered in the—hotel, room—. In the evening I called Roy Humphries to join me at the hotel which he did about 7 o'clock. At that time I was in the restaurant and so were the subjects. When they came out Roy followed them upstairs.

Q. After he came back what did you both do?
A. We both sat around the lobby and they came down in the elevator around 10 o'clock. Mr.—and the woman who was with him. They went back about an hour later from the cocktail lounge. Roy followed them up again. We kept observation on that room until 1.30 a.m., which was then May 13. When I gained admittance to the room, after Mr.—opened the door, I showed him my identification card and also his photograph and asked him his name and he told me it was—. And then I told him the purpose of our visit.

One must wonder whether the officials of some of these hotels do not have full knowledge of what takes place in some of these cases. Apparently from 11 p.m. until 1.30 a.m. the two investigators wandered around the floor of the hotel where the respondent was staying keeping observation on his room. Surely a hotel employee encountering them there would inquire about their purpose. They could have been accused of attempting to break into rooms. That, however, is apart from the issue before us. The questioning continued:

Q. Did he have anything to say about the photograph?
A. He just nodded his head that it was him.
Q. And then you went over to the bed?

Hon. members will notice that Mr. Lieff did not ask a question but in fact made a statement. The witness would understand from that question that he was supposed to answer "yes", which he did. The questioning continued:

A. Yes, and I addressed the woman in the bed and told her, "You are not Mrs.—,what is your name?" At first she did not say anything and neither did he, but I said that we have ways of finding out and it would make it more unpleasant that way.

There is conflict of evidence on this point. Mr. Steele testified that he in fact threatened the woman, but Mr. Humphries testified that when asked her name the woman replied after a brief silence. These two people should get together on the evidence and prepare their notes more carefully. Understanding what happens in these cases I would suggest that there were some threats. Apparently Mr. Steele is the senior investigator and I would think that there were threats used to get the required information. In any event, the corespondent finally gave her name, and that name was on a postal order and other things that identified her as that particular person. This question was asked:

Q. Do you know what address she gave?
A. No, there was no address on that except a Shawinigan address. At this point he told me to get the heck—

I am quite sure that at this stage the respondent did not use the word "heck" and I think the investigator is probably not giving a factual account of what took place in the hotel room.

At this point he told me to get the heck out of there and he started being nasty so we left.

You will notice again that the pattern is the same. The anger starts after all the information is obtained and not before. There is no anger when the investigator knocks on the door or when the gentleman, apparently dressed only in a towel and nothing else, comes to the door. There is no anger or concern at that time. It always happens that either the respondent or the corespondent becomes angry after all the information is obtained, after there is no chance of a slip-up and not having the necessary proof such as the names of the individuals, who was wearing what clothing, whether the bed had been slept in by one or two people, whether the bed was mussed up when they looked at it. They are told to get out after the information is obtained. Anyone giving the matter a little thought will see that the pattern is always the same and come to the conclusion that things just did not happen that way but possibly were arranged.

I notice, Mr. Chairman, that you too are looking round the chamber. If it comes to my attention that we have less than a quorum in the committee I am not sure but what I will so advise you. At the moment I would think that we are running pretty close to a quorum. I believe there are 22 here now.

Mr. Pallett: It shows the interest in your speech.

[Mr. Howard.]

Mr. Howard: I know that my friend is not only interested in the speech I am making now but, when he is in the house, in most of the speeches that I make. But he is not carrying out his function very well because he should be outside the house rounding up members so that there will be a quorum.

An hon. Member: There are only two C.C.F. members here.

Mr. Howard: He should be trying to avoid the government being embarrassed by not having sufficient members present.

Mr. Spencer: We have a higher percentage than you have right now.

Mr. Howard: No, you have not. We have 25 per cent of our members here. I might say that I have never been a higher percentage of anything.

Mr. Spencer: I did not see the member behind you.

Mr. Howard: Oh, he is here. To get back to this gentleman giving the investigators heck and starting to be nasty after the information was obtained, reference is made to an address and I would point out something that has not been cleared up. I should like to refer to point No. 6 in the petition where reference is made to adultery having taken place. It reads as follows:

That on the 13th day of May, 1959, at Montreal—

Then there is reference to a particular hotel.

Mr. Pallett: The percentage is down to 12½.

Mr. Howard: Even so we can still handle the situation. Then the name of the respondent is given as well as another name by which he was known and it goes on to state that he committed adultery with the corespondent. The address of the corespondent is then given, being a particular district in the city of Montreal. But there is no reference in the evidence with respect to whether or not this was in fact the address of this woman. I think it is probably rather immaterial anyway.

Evidence is given about the number of beds in the room. There was just one. There was evidence given that the bed had been occupied by two people, and that the corespondent was covered up to her neck. Then there is reference to the furniture, a dress and clothing in the room. I would point out that there is a conflict in the evidence about a photograph, a photograph such as is normally used to identify the respondent. There are two or three references to a photograph being used and I should like to point them out. On page 11 the clerk asked these questions:

Q. I show you a photograph. Of whom is it a likeness?
A. My husband.
Q. Approximately when was it taken?
A. About three years ago.
Q. Is it a good likeness of him?
A. Yes.

Then the photograph was filed and marked exhibit No. 2. Then on page 15 Mr. Humphries, one of the investigators, was questioned by Mr. Lieff as follows:

Q. Until 1.30 on what date?
A. On the following morning, the 13th. We went upstairs and Mr. Steele knocked at the door. The door was answered by Mr.—wearing just a towel around his waist. He had no slippers or other garments on. He asked him his name and he told him his name was—. He asked him to look at a picture he had in his possession and he said it was a picture of himself.
Q. Is that exhibit 2?
A. No, there was a different picture. This one I saw was one of him in uniform.
By the Chairman (Senator Roebuck):
Q. And did you not have the picture, exhibit 2, with you at the time?
A. At the time I only saw a picture of him in R.C.A.F. uniform.

Senator Roebuck follows up the matter of the photograph on page 16 and says:

It is unfortunate that the witness and his colleague did not have at the investigation the same photograph as is now in our records as exhibit No. 2. However, exhibit No. 2 has been identified by the petitioner as being a true photograph of her husband, and these witnesses identified the person who they saw as the same person represented by the photograph that has been identified by the wife, so I think the situation is sufficiently clear.

I submit that this may not be the case. We all know that when pictures are taken of individuals they are not always a good likeness. Such factors as lighting arrangements, whether it is a profile of the individual or otherwise, whether black and white or colour film is used and the type of film, can result in the production of pictures that are not easily identified. The picture that was entered as exhibit 2 was in fact identified by the petitioner. The investigators say that this is the same person but they had a different picture. The picture, exhibit 2, will be found in the file relating to this case and is easily obtainable. Nevertheless the picture that the investigators used, the one with the gentleman in R.C.A.F. uniform, is not available and we are not able to compare the one with the other to see whether they are in fact good likenesses of the same individual. Even though my dear friend, Senator Roebuck, with whom I have exchanged comments in the newspapers, seems to think that exhibit 2 is sufficient, although he has not compared it with the other picture which he has not seen, I rather wonder about this matter.

I think that Senator Roebuck, because he expressed some concern about these two photographs, should not have allowed the matter to drop. He should have requested that the first photograph be produced in order to ensure, in his own mind, that there was a sufficient likeness between the two photographs that there could have been no misunderstanding as to the person in the pictures. Any person who has been a candidate in an election will know that you can have a photograph taken and say it is not good enough, not a proper likeness or does not flatter you enough, and you will discard it. This is true not only of candidates for political office but respondents or corespondents because, after all, they are people too.

Many of the pictures taken in these cases are not taken by professional photographers. Here is an instance which should have been followed up by the committee. They should have obtained the first photograph from the two investigators to make sure in their own minds that the two pictures were of the same person. Unfortunately the hon. senator appears to have satisfied himself that the two pictures were of the same person and that the situation was sufficiently clear. However, as I have stated, this is a subject upon which the hon. senator might have expanded in order to make sure that such was the case. I am not suggesting that it is not the case, that the two pictures are not of the same person. However, there is a possibility, especially if one is a picture of a person in uniform and another is a picture of a person in civilian dress, of a mix-up.

We all know how different a person would look in a uniform. You, yourself, Mr. Chairman, having a picture taken in your official robes of office as Deputy Speaker would look quite different from being pictured in a business suit. There is a possibility of error.

However, I think I am running close to my time limit. I would have liked to have gone into other matters connected with this particular bill but perhaps I will have an opportunity on another occasion.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, the applicant before parliament is a 30-year old private secretary supporting one child on an income of around $250 a month. My purpose in rising is not to bring these humane facts for the consideration of the committee, because I realize that it is of little use or purpose in considering the mischievous animus that activates a few people who have acted in this way for some time.

I was glad my hon. friend from Skeena did not bring up the point that there had been any lobbying in connection with this case because it might have had a very serious effect on whether or not this bill should properly go through parliament. The respondent's husband has been referred to as a member of the Royal Canadian Air Force. A few days ago he flew to Egypt. Before he went he had been in touch with me several times. He had arranged for a marriage again and quite a considerable sum of money had been spent. He asked whether it would not be possible for the C.C.F. to change its filibuster tactics and allow his bill to go through so that his money would not have been spent in vain. I told him of the rule against lobbying which I had propounded here on previous occasions, and told him definitely to stay away from the House of Commons, not to approach any members and to take his financial licking. Perhaps some day, not at this session but some other time, there would not be this mischievous behaviour on the part of a certain few denying the minority their rights. I gather he has done that and has left the country, poorer for having contracted a marriage and paid a large sum of money and not having been able to go through with it.

Mr. Howard: I should not say this is precisely new, but in one sense it is new. I had understood, not from the hon. member for Halifax directly but from someone else, that there was one particular case in this group with which we are now dealing, in which some marriage arrangement had been concluded based upon the hope that the petition would be granted. I did not know that this was the particular case. I knew nothing about it, or whether there had been any lobbying or importuning of members to hurry up or slow down or anything of that nature.

I would have liked to make some comments about the very things the hon. member for Halifax mentioned. As you know, it is my contention that in those cases where children are concerned we should give a greater degree of consideration to them. I refrained from doing that because the hon. member for Halifax raised a point of order on a previous occasion when I dealt with the question of children. You, yourself, sir, were in the chair at that time and ruled that we had no jurisdiction with respect to children or their maintenance. Your colleague, who is in the chair occasionally in your absence, also made a similar ruling. As a matter of fact, I think he made the same ruling with respect to me four or five times.

The reason I refrained from mentioning the fact that there were children, except to point out that there was one child which indicated the consummation of the marriage, was this ruling. However, there is reference to the income of the petitioner, the fact she looks after the child and that she is working.

All this information is in here. I am very pleased that the hon. member for Halifax did mention this subject. As I say, I did not because I did not want to run afoul of your ruling, even though I know that each member of the committee is vitally concerned about the welfare of the children in any one of these cases. By the ruling, however, we are forbidden to concern ourselves with that. I would say that on each occasion in which there are children concerned I will do the best I can to go as far as I can in the direction of wondering orally about the welfare of the children.

In this particular case, the petitioner has been given the legal custody of the child by the court. As the hon. member for Halifax indicated, the mother is a private secretary with an income of about $280 per month. The child is four, probably a little over four by now, and is looked after by an aunt while the mother is at work. The mother sees the child every night, and sees that he is properly looked after. If these circumstances persist it does appear that the child will get along fairly well in so far as material maintenance is concerned. If the woman marries again, there will be a father and mother for the child. The husband came to see the child very seldom.

As I say, I do not want to go too far in that direction and cause you, Mr. Chairman, too much exercise in getting up and down to call me to order, even though I know this is something that is in the minds of other members of the committee and even though they may vote against particular motions we might move at some time in order to ask permission to discuss the children themselves.

From the remarks of the hon. member for Halifax I took a certain inference. He made some reference to the mischievous few and said that because of the actions of that mischievous few some people were not having their petitions for divorce dealt with as expeditiously as they might have expected, having regard to the procedure in years past. From what the hon. member for Halifax said I also assume that he is referring to me as being one of the mischievous few and to the hon. member for Timiskaming as being the other half of the mischievous few. Whether or not this is so, he did not say, but I think I am entitled to take that attitude.

Seriously, may I say this? While the hon. member for Halifax may allege that this action is mischievousness,—a description which would indicate that it is not sincere—I think I should be afforded the opportunity of making a comment in rebuttal thereto in order to point out to the hon. member for Halifax that such is not the case. It is not a question of mischievousness. It is not a question of lack of care or concern for the individuals involved but rather of the greatest appreciation for the domestic problems they have and of great sorrow—in some cases more than in others, depending on the circumstances, of course—for the steps that these people are obliged to take in order to obtain relief from their marital problems. They are steps which are not available to people living in other provinces; they necessitate long delays, in many cases up to a year.

In this particular case, I find from a quick look, it is almost one year ago—May 13, 1959—that the adultery took place. In any event, even if we had not debated and discussed these particular divorce bills to the extent that we are discussing them, with the particular goal we have in mind, it would have been 10 or 11 months anyway before the petitioner here could have had any hope of getting a divorce granted or of getting relief from her problems. In some cases the time range is over a year.

This situation arises because this particular petitioner here and others must take the step of petitioning parliament, that parliament can deal with these petitions for divorce only when it is in session and that it is not in session all the year round. We set up rules governing the procedure. The other place does so and we do so by our standing orders. We set up rules with regard to private bills. These rules say that you must have your application in by a certain time. If you do not have it in by a certain time, parliament is not going to deal with it anyway. A person might find himself or herself just over that borderline of the time limit and having to wait until the next session. It is a question of costs which range in amount, on the average, to twice as much as they do in any other province. For these things we have great concern.

There are also other matters but these are vitally important ones. There is the question of the welfare and maintenance of children, a matter with which we have no right to concern ourselves or to deal with. We can grant a divorce but we cannot take any action to deal with the children themselves. This is another unfortunate thing. This jurisdiction should be vested in the same place so that—

Mr. McCleave: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Howard: Certainly.

Mr. McCleave: Does the hon. member feel that the laws of the province of Quebec dealing with the custody and maintenance of children are adequate or not?

Mr. Howard: I am not sufficiently familiar with them to answer that question. So far as I have had the matter explained to me as it relates to custody and maintenance of children I gather that there is sufficient provision. However, the same civil code in Quebec which allows a legal separation does not allow a divorce, even though the grounds are the same. In the second place, if a woman obtained a legal separation from her husband in the province of Quebec and was awarded alimony for herself—assuming there were no children and there is no provision for the children—the moment she obtains a divorce through this system, then she no longer gets alimony. It has nothing to do with whether she has married again. I see that my hon. friend shakes his head as if to say that it is not so. I wonder whether I might ask the hon. member for Halifax whether the shake of his head indicates that I am incorrect in that matter?

Mr. McCleave: No, it only indicates a terrific headache. I am sorry my hon. friend took that meaning from it. I dare say it will clear up about August.

Mr. Howard: You mean October. We will be back in session by then after the summer recess.

In any event, as I understand it that information is factual and is given in evidence by a lawyer from Quebec in another case that is before us. Therefore to that extent they are not sufficient. To the extent that the courts under those laws are able to deal with the maintenance of children, yes, possibly that is so. But as to dividing jurisdiction between divorce on the one hand and maintenance of children on the other hand, that is not fair to those individuals. We think there are alternatives to this particular matter which would be much fairer than the situation is at the present moment. We think there are alternatives to the present system of parliament having to deal with these matters.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I must rise on a point of order. I think there will be opportunity to discuss the general application of divorce either on third reading of this bill or other bills or on second reading of other divorce bills that appear on the order paper. However, I do not think there is supposed to be general discussion in committee on these matters.

Mr. Howard: If I may, I should like to make a comment on the point of order. It is done because the hon. member for Halifax referred to the mischievous few in this house. I tried to find out from him whether he is referring to me and to the hon. member for Timiskaming. I assume that he is referring to us. It was on that assumption that I was arguing the case and trying to point out that we are not mischievous, that we are vitally concerned about and interested in this question of divorce.

Mr. Pallett: You would be non-suited.

Mr. Howard: Someone says "nonsense".

Mr. Pallett: Non-suited; I said you would be non-suited if you tried to argue in that way.

Mr. Howard: In any event—that term escapes me for the moment—we are vitally concerned about this question and we should like to see something done about it. The alternatives are many. The problems are many now and they could be overcome. That is why I was arguing along those lines. I was doing so in order to point out to the hon. member for Halifax that even though that phrase "mischievous few" is a gentle and delicate one and certainly could not be considered to be unparliamentary, it is one which in the circumstances is far too strong for the hon. member for Halifax to think about or to use. That was the reason I was arguing along those lines, namely to point out that it is not mischievousness that causes us to follow this course.

We consider that it is the only method available to bring to the attention of the committee, to parliament and to the country the necessity for making alterations which will bring about conditions which will be more fair, just and equitable to those people in two particular provinces who find it necessary to petition the Senate and the House of Commons in order to obtain a divorce. As I said, there are many alternatives. Each one, if followed, would afford some measure of relief and relaxation of the burden which is upon individuals in those two provinces to obtain a divorce. The mere fact that the lapse of an entire year between the time adultery takes place—

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I again rise on a point of order. These points are very interesting and have merit, but surely they are meant for discussion on second or third reading, the appropriate times, not when the house is in committee on a particular bill.

Mr. Howard: May I speak to the point of order, Mr. Chairman. I would point out to the hon. member for Halifax that I think his point of order is right but his argument is wrong. We would be just as much out of order to discuss these things on second and even more on third reading than we are at the moment.

[Mr. Howard.]

The Deputy Chairman: We are more concerned right now with proceeding with our discussion in committee. The hon. member has strayed very widely again, and I ask him once more to come back to this bill.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, on the point raised by the hon. member for Halifax I would like to point out that while it is true we are concerned with each individual as he or she comes before us—and we appreciate the fact that the chairman of the committee has advised against lobbying as in years gone by—it still should be borne in mind that we weigh each of these cases on its merits, not on granting the divorce. It may be quite fortunate that in this particular case the divorce has not been granted previously, particularly when this gentleman is being transferred to Egypt, as I understand it. If he had not remarried by the time he left here, if he had obtained this divorce it is possible he would have been married in Egypt and his problem might have been international rather than just of a local nature.

In this particular case there was an alimony settlement made in the province of Quebec which awarded the wife $100 a month, and she drew that for a little over two years, amounting in all to about $2,400. If he had not paid this alimony or been in a position where he had to pay it, then he would have been able to pay $2,500 for the divorce and there would have been no problem.

As it is, if the chairman of the miscellaneous private bills committee checks up he will find he has been able to save $100 a month from September to May because the wife decided she did not want the $100. So there is that amount of money available as a down payment for this divorce in any event.

I do not think that any consideration should be given to the argument that delay is taking place. I think we should be ashamed of ourselves for what has gone on in the past rather than attach any blame to anyone for going into these particular cases. In this case we are concerned with a point made by the hon. member for Skeena, that the maintenance for the child has been discussed in a particular case, and we will find it in the 48th report. I would like to quote what the lawyer said because at that time he was referring to this matter. On page 12 senator Farquhar asked:

Q. If you get this divorce is he bound to continue paying that $75?

That is the amount awarded in the civil court in Quebec. Then Mr. Usher said:

Senator, probably I would be better able to answer that question. Under our jurisprudence, once there is a divorce the obligation to support the wife ceases, but the obligation to support the child remains. If there is a judgment rendered by the superior court of Montreal awarding alimony in favour of children a divorce in Ottawa does not affect that, because it is not an alimentary payment to the wife. Mr. Justice Mackinnon, I think it was, in around the year 1952 or 1953 rendered a judgment to that effect, that a divorce does not affect the alimony payable for children.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that statement, if it is factual—and I have no reason to think it is not—has and should have a bearing on what we do in relationship to payments to the wife and children, and particularly the desire we have expressed many times that the superior court in the province of Quebec should make these decisions rather than leave them to us in Ottawa when we have not the jurisdiction to make those particular rulings.

This case is an interesting case, as the hon. member for Skeena pointed out. There are a number of facts in this case which we have not been concerned with in other cases, and I think for that reason we should give some consideration to the problems arising from this source. I would like to read a short part of the evidence appearing on page 12 of the 47th report, as follows:

Q. But when did you stop living together as man and wife?
A. In the summer of 1957.
Q. What sort of life did you have with your husband for a year or two prior to the summer of 1957?
A. Very bad.
Q. What was the trouble?
A. He was not home very often and I saw a social worker.

To digress, I would suggest that very few people employed in the air force, particularly in certain fields, are home, and this does not always warn of bad relations unless other factors are hinted at which are not discussed at all in this case, and that is the complaint of mental cruelty. The report goes on:

Q. When did you see a social worker?
A. In the summer of 1957.
Q. Why did you see a social worker?
A. Because I was feeling kind of sick.
Q. Did you consult a doctor?
A. Oh, yes, I did.
Q. What did you learn?
A. I learned that he had given me a venereal disease.
Q. Did you take treatment?
A. Yes.
Q. Are you all right now?
A. Yes.
Q. Did you have venereal disease at the time of your marriage?
A. No, sir.
Q. From the time you learned about that—it was in the summer of 1957 that you learned about that?
A. Yes.
Q. —up to the present time have you lived with your husband as man and wife?
A. No, sir.

Mr. Chairman, this raises in my opinion, a number of questions. One of them is the question that some consideration should be given to these people in a social service way which would eliminate probably some of the disagreement which appears to have arisen from the employment of this particular airman and the fact that he had to be away from home for some time. I was interested to know what the effect would be in relation to this venereal disease charge, because I understand this is a factor in separation and divorce proceedings and has a connection with what the courts decide in these particular cases. On page 337 of Kent Power's authoritative work on jurisprudence in Canada appears the following:

Proof that the defendant husband is suffering from a venereal disease may be accepted, according to the circumstances, as sufficient evidence of adultery unless the contracting of the disease is satisfactorily explained.

Then reference is made to an Alberta case, L. v L., where the defendant husband was shown to be suffering from syphilis.

It was of recent origin and there was complete absence of evidence other than the testimony of the defendant to indicate that he might have been affected innocently. The court accepted as true the testimony of the plaintiff that she had not had sexual intercourse with any man other than the defendant. He also testified that he had not committed adultery with any person since his marriage to the plaintiff nearly five years previously. It was held that this statement of his was not of sufficient evidence in the circumstances to repudiate the presumption arising from the other evidence that he had committed adultery. Therefore an order nisi should be granted.

Reference is made to a number of other cases of that nature, and it is pointed out that in each of these cases sufficient evidence of this kind will constitute reason for a separation on the ground of mental cruelty. It is further pointed out on page 537 that where the communication of venereal disease is relied on as constituting cruelty it is not necessary to plead or prove that it was communicated wilfully, negligently or recklessly. Reference is made to the case of Browning v. Browning in 1911, where it was stated that in practice, unless a defendant is able to prove that he obtained venereal disease in a manner that would be acceptable to the courts, transmission of the disease is sufficient to constitute evidence of adultery.

This being an acceptable method of establishing adultery, I am surprised that the committee of the other place and the lawyer handling this case did not place more emphasis upon this aspect of the petition. It must certainly have led to medical attention being given at the time. If the facts are as stated it could probably be proved that this disease was communicated without any care being taken as to the results. If this is an acceptable method of establishing adultery charges—and the leading authority in Canada appears to accept it as such—I am surprised that a counsel with the experience of Mr. Lieff would go to the trouble of bringing in evidence of adultery at a later date. The court in the province of Quebec must already have given consideration to this matter; it awarded alimony and a separation on that basis.

To return to the evidence, the question is asked: Was there any agreement? The answer is given in the negative. Then questions were asked about reconciliation, as follows:

Q. Was there any chance of reconciliation between yourself and your husband?
A. No.
Q. Did you do all you could to make a success of this matter?
A. Yes.
Q. Did you give your husband any reason for running around with anybody else?
A. No, sir.
Q. While you were with him did you consult a psychiatrist about his behaviour?
A. Yes.
Q. Did you tell the psychiatrist your problems?
A. Yes.
Q. And about your husband's?
A. Yes.

I am surprised that the chairman of the Senate committee should have allowed these questions to be asked without seeking to arrive at the reason why the psychiatrist was consulted and what the result of the treatment was; whether the wife was to be treated for some quirk of a mental nature, or whether the husband was suffering from some such affliction. I am sure that if the Minister of National Defence were here he would immediately say that an airman would obviously not be so affected and that therefore it would be the woman who was benefitting from psychiatric treatment, because, certainly, air force personnel are not suffering in this way or they would be in a mental hospital or receiving treatment from another source.

I should like, now, to consider the evidence as given by Mr. Steele. I am particularly interested in knowing how they found out who this man was. There was a reference to the fact that they knew which hotel room they were in, No. 944—

It is quite all right. The hon. member can leave. I think there is a quorum.

The evidence at this point reads:

By Mr. Lieff:
Q. Mr. Steele, can you identify the photograph which has been filed as Exhibit No. 2?
A. Yes, it is Joseph Hould.
Q. Did you investigate his behaviour?
A. Yes, I did.
Q. When?
A. I first started the investigation in February, 1959, but nothing really happened until May, 1959. He is with the air force and he would be flying in and out every other day of the week. On May 11 I had information that he was in town and I checked at the air base and found that he was in some hotel in Montreal. From investigation at the hotels I found that he was in the Laurentian hotel. Investigation showed that he had been in there on the 11th but I did not see him until the 12th. There was a Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Hould registered in the Laurentian hotel, room 944. In the evening I called Roy Humphries to join me at the hotel, which he did about 7 o'clock. At that time I was in the restaurant, and so were the subjects. When they came out Roy followed them upstairs.
Q. After he came back what did you both do?
A. We both sat around the lobby and they came down in the elevator around 10 o'clock, Mr. Hould and the woman who was with him. They went back about an hour later from the cocktail lounge. Roy followed them up again. We kept observation on that room until 1.30 a.m., which was then May 13. When I gained admittance to the room, after Mr. Hould opened the door, I showed him my identification card and also his photograph and asked him his name and he told me it was Joseph Hould. And then I told him the purpose of our visit.

I call attention to the fact that they do not indicate how they found out where he was. The witness does not say he consulted the register. I am not aware whether a detective has a right to direct a hotel to produce the register or not. If he has, then I am surprised that the witness had not seen the handwriting of this man, or had not looked at the register. On page 14, the witness says:

Q. Did you see the registration?
A. I did
Q. You were not able to check the handwriting?
A. He did not leave it there very long.

I do not know to whom reference is made, but the Laurentian hotel must be a good one to stay away from if the hotel permits private dicks to wander around at will, make entry into rooms at will and conduct an examination of the registry, however briefly, at will. I was previously under the impression that the hotel had a good reputation. I did not know it catered to the divorce mill making its facilities available to detectives in cases of this nature. Perhaps the investigator represented himself as a detective in the employ of the hotel.

Canadians must be damn fools if when they are awakened in the middle of the night by an unknown joker they throw open their doors and welcome him with open arms. I could understand this happening in the bush where you may find a sign on a door inviting you to lift the latch and enter because you will be welcome at any time but this is not true of large cosmopolitan cities. It has not been my experience that you are admitted into homes at three or four in the morning.

Let me cite a personal illustration. In the town of New Liskeard my son recently rented the Legion hall for a teen town dance. After the dance it was discovered that the key to the hall had been taken home by another executive member. My son went to the homes of three members at a late hour in an attempt to recover the key but no one responded to his knocking at the door. He went to two or three other places but met with no success. Finally I had to get the telephone operator to ring for a long time the telephone of someone I knew before I could get an answer. It simply is not reasonable to ask us to believe that Canadians are so stupid as to welcome strangers at three or four in the morning wearing only shorts or a bath towel. There must be connivance, assistance from the hotel or misrepresentation on the part of the detectives. The detectives give the most flimsy, unsupported and incredible evidence and the chairman who handles these matters has the audacity to say that these bills are being held up unreasonably.

I wish now to deal with another important matter, the posiion of the corespondent in these cases. I have not asked what his position is but if I were a corespondent I believe I would fight the case because my reputation and good name would be at stake. If I did not defend the case it would mean one of two things, that the facts were as stated or that I was hired to do a certain job. It is not for me to decide whether this is connected with the divorce court or the morality set-up in Montreal but some consideration should be given to the corespondent.

In the present case there is some difference of opinion about the address of the corespondent. Mr. Steele in his evidence said that her address was Shawinigan Falls. I do not know where Shawinigan Falls is but I have heard of it and I am sure that a letter addressed there would reach the person for whom it was intended. Reference was made to a Blue Cross card on which the young lady's name was given as Lorna Challow, and her address as Shawinigan Falls. The chairman then asked where the lady was served and the clerk of the committee said she was served at 4132 Parthenais street in the city of Montreal.

What kind of clerk do we have in the Senate? Why would he send notice to her at an address in Montreal when on the basis of the evidence her last known address was Shawinigan Falls? There is no previous reference to the Montreal address. I have served summonses for witnesses and have always understood they should be served in person at the last known address of the individual. It is a serious matter if the corespondent in this case has not been served and does not know she has the opportunity to appear before the Senate and the House of Commons to defend herself.

We are certainly not interested in pressing any charges that could be laid as a result of her actions if she admitted them. On the other hand she may not have been served and she may be unaware she has the opportunity to deny the allegations. We have the obligation to ascertain if she ever received notice. Because her last known address is Shawinigan Falls we have no right to assume that notice would have been served at the Montreal address.

This is a serious matter. We are making charges in this case against a third party. In my opinion the third party in these divorce cases should be given the benefit of the doubt even if nobody else is. If this young lady wishes to give evidence to indicate that she is not guilty of adultery and had no part in it I think she should be allowed to do so. Everyone here is aware that there have been discrepancies in cases we have dealt with before. The hon. member for Halifax referred to one that he asked to have referred back. We know of cases where the evidence has not been true, where the respondent was not notified and did not know anything about the proceeding. We know that these cases exist.

We have been asked to deal with one and I suggest that we give the chairman of the committee handling these cases the opportunity to ask for unanimous approval to have this case referred back so that this matter may be cleared up. I should like to ask the sponsor of the bill if he will not agree that this is a matter of grave concern and that the third party may be an innocent party. We know that there are over-zealous lawyers and over-zealous detectives. In fact, in many cases the senators may be over-zealous because they are under great pressure when they have 500 cases to deal with. They also want to take a holiday of a month so they are under some pressure also. This pressure may be to the detriment of the corespondent in some of these cases. Would it not be in the interests of common decency and justice to refer this case back so that the co-respondent's wishes can be ascertained?

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I do not think that course is necessary in this case. Admittedly there should be an investigation of the methods of service. We are going to have the opportunity to do that in another case, but to proceed merely on the ground of suspicion seems to me a very poor judicial course indeed.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, there is one other matter I should like to draw to the attention of the committee. It touches to some extent on the comments made by the hon. member for Timiskaming because it relates to the conflict in the evidence given by the investigators in this case. It makes one wonder whether their evidence—I will not say it was untruthful—is a true reflection of what occurred in this hotel.

I have gone quite fully into the strangeness of someone appearing at the door in a bath towel and not objecting when two strangers walk into the room and ask a series of questions. That has been dealt with at sufficient length to say that it is more than just a coincidence. But there is one phase of the investigation conducted by these two gentlemen that makes me wonder. I gather that Mr. Steele is the senior of the two, at least in so far as giving evidence is concerned, because he gave his evidence first. In effect Mr. Humphries was only asked to corroborate and substantiate what had been said. I should like to refer to some questions asked of Mr. Steele by Mr. Lieff as found on page 13. I have mentioned this before, Mr. Chairman, but I should like to reiterate it and connect it with something else. I read the following:

Q. After he came back what did you both do?

He was referring to the time after Mr. Humphries followed these people upstairs in the early part of the evening.

A. We both sat around the lobby and they came down in the elevator around 10 o'clock, Mr.— and the woman who was with him. They went back about an hour later from the cocktail lounge.

This was about 11 o'clock since they were there about an hour.

Roy followed them up again. We kept observation on that room until 1.30 a.m., which was then May 13.

The room number is given in the evidence later on. I am quite sure there is no room in the Laurentian hotel opening on the lobby. It was upstairs off one of the corridors. Then he gives the rest of his evidence. Mr. Humphries was then called and sworn and was asked a number of questions. As found at the top of page 15, I read the following:

Q. When did you get there?
A. Approximately seven.
Q. Did you meet Mr. Steele?
A. No, not immediately. I went in the lobby, and he came from the side entrance to the restaurant that is directly behind and he signaled to me to follow two people, which I did. I followed them in the elevator and they went up to the ninth floor, and went into room—to the left of the elevator. I then returned to the lobby and spoke to Mr. Steele.
Q. Never mind what you told him, but after you spoke to him what did you do?
A. I remained in the lobby until 10.30 when they came down.

There is some conflict there. One of them says 10 o'clock and the other says 10.30. I suppose two people sitting in the lobby could be mistaken to the extent of half an hour, but if they are assiduous investigators, as I understand these investigators want to be, who know they are going to come before a committee and swear to things under oath, you would think they would have the sense to look at their watches or the clock on the wall to determine whether it was 10 or 10.30. That is one part of the evidence that is in conflict. I continue:

A. I remained in the lobby until 10.30 when they came down.
Q. Who did?
A. The man and the woman.
Q. Which man and which woman?
A. This man accompanied by a woman.

We still do not know which man. It is "this man".

Q. What happened to them?
A. They went downstairs into the Kiltie lounge, and remained there for approximately an hour, and again returned to their room.

It was a certain number on the ninth floor.

Q. What did you do?
A. I followed them up after they went up and taped up the door with a piece of sticky tape.

If the tape is still there the next morning it is supposed to be proof that the door was not opened in their absence. If it is gone then they can say that the door has been opened.

I then returned downstairs and we waited there until approximately 1.30, and then Mr. Steele and I went there together.

One investigator says that these people came down at 10 o'clock and went up an hour later which would be about 11 o'clock. The other investigator says that these people came down at 10.30, stayed about an hour and then went up. One investigator said that they kept observation on the room on the ninth floor from the time the people went up there at 11 o'clock until 1.30. I would assume that they saw the room, they looked at the room, they watched the room. The other investigator says that they came back downstairs and waited in the lobby until 1.30. Which is correct? Which is right? Are investigators such as these so used to giving sloppy evidence under oath that they do not care about looking at their watches to determine what time it is and do not worry too much about the degree of accuracy with which they give evidence in a particular case? I assume that because of past activities before the senate committee and the committee of this house these people have formed the idea that they can get away with almost anything and have become lax in getting evidence.

Thus we have a conflict as to the time, 10 o'clock or 10.30, on the part of two people who were both there and both of whom certainly knew, I submit, that they were going to have to appear in court as detectives or private investigators or whatever they call themselves and were going to have to swear under oath to certain things. Nevertheless, one of them says 10 o'clock and the other says 10.30. One says that they kept observation on the room, indicating they were upstairs on the ninth floor somewhere, and the other one says, no, we did not; I went up and put some tape on the door, then came back down and we waited in the lobby. There is such a lack of clarity as to what these investigators did that I would ask that at some subsequent time this bill be referred back to the miscellaneous private bills committee so that Mr. Steele and Mr. Humphries could appear and indicate to the committee whether it was 10 or 10.30 and whether they both went upstairs and observed the room or whether they waited downstairs until 1.30.

This conflict in evidence throws a great deal of doubt upon the evidence of these investigators. It causes one to wonder whether they have become sloppy over the years in the presentation of evidence before the Senate committee. Perhaps they do not care whether or not what they say is accurate so long as they get the evidence in about somebody opening a door and they ask the woman or man in bed what his or her name is and give evidence that they wore clothes or the lack of clothes, of such a nature as to indicate that adultery might have taken place. In view of this conflict I, for one, would suggest that this would be one of those cases that should be looked into more carefully. If the Senate committee, under the guidance of the Hon. Senator Roebuck, is so concerned about getting these divorce cases through here—one can see now why he wants to ram these things through.

Mr. McCleave: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. This is the third time this afternoon that offensive words have been uttered against a gentleman in the other place by the two members in that corner. This is clearly against the rules of this house.

The Deputy Chairman: Yes, I think the point is very well taken. The hon. member should refrain from making comments about a member of the other place.

Mr. Howard: Yes, all right; I shall refrain. I certainly do not want to transgress the rules of the house or cast any reflection upon members of the other place, particularly my good friend the hon. senator. However, the evidence which was obtained under his chairmanship would certainly call for a second look because of these conflicts which I have pointed out. There is the conflict about time. The two investigators were not sure whether it was 10 or 10.30, and they were not sure whether they were in a corridor on the ninth floor observing a room or whether they were down in the lobby waiting until 1.30.

With all respect, Mr. Chairman, I believe this is a case in which some steps should be taken, perhaps after the bill is reported, to refer it back to miscellaneous private bills committee in order that these conflicts in the evidence might be cleared up. In this regard, I might say I have great admiration for the hon. member for Halifax, with his legal training, his perceptive ability and his experience in these matters. Perhaps the hon. member might give the house the benefit of his experience in these matters and guide us as to whether or not he, as chairman of the committee and sponsor of the bill, thinks it would be wise to refer this case to the miscellaneous private bills committee in order to ascertain what the situation was that these two detectives found, and in order to clear up the conflict between them in the evidence.

Mr. McCleave: This is always a point in these legal cases. If witnesses give similar testimony, the opposing lawyer says there is evidence of conniving, they are acting in cahoots with each other. On the other hand, if there is a discrepancy in time of half an hour or thereabouts, then we have criticism such as my hon. friend has directed against these witnesses. I think his point of view is a reasonable one in that, at the trial, they should have been asked to account for these differences. However, I do not believe the differences in their evidence are so vital to the case that the course the hon. member suggests should be followed.

Mr. Peters: I am surprised, and concerned, that in this particular case we have not yet been able to establish whether or not the respondent or corespondent was notified as to the machinery available for his or her defence. We have, on occasion, had a corespondent come before parliament as a witness to attempt to prove the case on behalf of the respondent. However, we might find cases in which the situation was not as pictured. The corespondent in a particular case might not have been in the situation indicated by the evidence. He might have dropped into the hotel room for a drink and been framed into being the corespondent in a divorce case. In this particular case, he might not even have known that these proceedings were going on or that he had an opportunity to appear before the Senate or this committee and be heard.

Certainly, the Senate is O.K. We will not talk about the senators. However, I believe they have done a sloppy job. We do not need to mention them. There are only four of them on the committee.

Mr. McCleave: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. There has been a direct allegation made against members of the other place.

I submit that is definitely against our rules. I believe it is page 107 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, fourth edition, page 107, standing order 35, which says:

> No member shall speak disrespectfully of Her Majesty, nor of any of the royal family, nor of His Excellency or the person administering the government of Canada nor use offensive words against either house, or against any member thereof.

I submit this covers this particular instance.

Mr. Peters: On the point of order, I would submit that I certainly did not intend to make any reference to the character or person of any particular senator. I think the operation of the Senate committee which heard this case was sloppy, and I think we have proven that by reference to at least seven or eight discrepancies in this evidence. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that no slur was intended against any particular senator, but rather on the work of the committee of the other place. I might point out again why I believe that statement applies to this particular case and this particular evidence.

If you will check on the matter, Mr. Chairman, you will find that the evidence is signed by F. S. Lawrence and G. R. Baker, official reporters of the Senate of Canada, sworn reporters. I do not think that any evidence was given that does not appear here. I would have thought that the serving of a summons or a notice or whatever it is that is served on a corespondent should have been served at the place of last address. It was not served at the place of last address. It was served at an address not in Shawinigan but in Montreal. I am curious to find in the evidence any indication of where the committee received this information to send to this particular address. They did not get it from the evidence of the detectives. They did not get it from the evidence presented to us. Hence I am wondering if there ever was such an address or if any notice was ever sent to this address or if there was any intention whatsoever of giving an opportunity to this young woman to appear and defend herself against charges which may or may not be correct. In either case she may or may not wish to defend herself but I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that she should have the opportunity of doing so because she is a third party and an injured party in this particular case.

I mentioned the fact that this to me was sloppy evidence. Would it not be a good question to ask ourselves what happened to the original picture that was used in this particular case? Where did the detectives all of a sudden find exhibit No. 2 which is the second picture which is not a picture of a man in an R.C.A.F. uniform but a picture of another type altogether. Did it not occur to the Senate that it might be wise to find out what happened to the other picture, of whom it was a picture or any other factors?

It may just be possible that this address, the name and the incidents of the whole case, are nothing but a figment of the imagination. It is quite logical to make that assumption. We have one picture appearing in evidence and the picture that was used by means of which they identified the people who were in this hotel room is not the same picture at all. It may be of somebody else altogether because we did not see the picture. Nobody asked what happened to the first picture that was presented and why the second one was substituted in its place.

Let us look at another item in this evidence. I have been before a number of courts in another capacity. In these cases almost without exception when any evidence was being obtained, the least that was done by the detectives or the people that were getting the evidence was to get into the next room so that they could listen through the wall or go into the clothes closet. There was the old story about holding a glass up to the wall and listening to all the things that were going on in the next place. They tap the telephone if it is at all possible. They do all sorts of things. But no; they are not done in this case. The detective drives up to the hotel. He has free access to large hotels. He goes into the room and tells the man when he gets in that he is there for this purpose. He does not get thrown out. He does not even get insulted in most cases. In this case I think there are good grounds to say that this particular incident is like other incidents which we shall prove before the session is over. I think it can be indicated that the incidents in this case and in a number of other cases are figments of the imagination of the detectives themselves and that the situation as expounded by them does not now exist, has not existed and never did exist.

If this was not so, I am quite sure the Senate would have done as they did in other cases and would have asked questions that would have led us to know that they had given serious consideration to these matters. It is true they asked, "Is this the picture?" Then they are told, no, this is not the picture but it is a similar likeness. Who says it is a similar likeness? The wife and the two detectives. But does she say she has seen the first picture, the one on the strength of which the detectives made the raid? No; she does not say that at all. This question was not asked. There was no inquiry in this respect. She admits that the picture that is shown in the Senate is a likeness of her husband. I would suggest that there should have been some inquiry because it is quite likely that the respondent in this case could have made an appearance there. Certainly it would have been a very embarrassing situation if he had turned up for the Senate committee to see him and he was not the same person as that in the picture being presented to the Senate. If he had been the person in the first picture and had turned up there, there would have been quite a few questions asked and I think the detectives would have had to say, "We are sorry, but we are here with the wrong case; we will be back tomorrow with this one."

For this reason I think the evidence that is given in this case is unsubstantiated, and has not been documented and that no opportunity has been given for it to be disproved. I might go so far as to suggest in this particular case it was not until the last minute they knew whether the respondent had been invited to attend these hearings. If we are going to handle these cases, we are going to handle them with much more care than we have been exercising in the past. I do not mind how lazy, incompetent or careless Senate committees are. We are not going to be incompetent; we are not going to be careless; and we are not going to rubber-stamp their inefficiencies. We are going to ask these questions and we are going to find some answers or there is going to be a different system of handling them.

Mr. McCleave: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member has used adjectives which directly reflects on members of the other house and that procedure is contrary to section 107 of our rules. The words to which I refer are "lazy" and "incompetent".

The Deputy Chairman: It is quite right that the hon. member must not reflect on the other place. I am sure the hon. member for Timiskaming did not intend to do so. I was listening to him quite carefully and I was under the impression that he slipped a little bit.

Mr. Peters: I am certainly not referring to any of the senators as being lazy or incompetent. I am referring to this report or to the evidence we have. This report, this evidence and the whole presentation of this case bear out the correctness of the adjectives I used. I have no friends in the Senate. I do not know more than three or four senators. I certainly do not wish to reflect on any of them.

The Deputy Chairman: I would ask the hon. member to be more careful.

Mr. Howard: There is one matter—

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Howard: Here we have this insane rush again. May I say to hon. members that they should just relax. They are in a rush all the time and that is what gets them ulcers. During the course of this discussion I think the hon. member for Halifax has been most helpful in assuring us that the conflicts in the evidence, which were questioned by the hon. member for Timiskaming and myself, were not serious matters. However, in the discussion two or three fairly important points have been raised and I do not think they have been answered satisfactorily by the hon. member for Halifax or by anyone else.

One is the question of the two pictures. The hon. member for Timiskaming dealt with this matter quite thoroughly. He pointed out one matter and I mentioned it also. How are we to know whether one picture is the same as the other picture or whether they are both pictures of the same person? If they are both the same person, are they a sufficient likeness of that person? This we do not know. We are not sure. The evidence is absolutely unclear about it. The only comment we have is the reference to it by Senator Roebuck, that he thinks it is sufficient.

Second, the address of the corespondent is unclear. The hon. member for Timiskaming points out that the corespondent was served at 4132 Parthenais street, Montreal, but this is the only evidence in the report as to what the address is. The petition shows another address entirely. The petition states that she resided at No. 30, 956th avenue, Pincourt, district of Montreal. The petition states one thing and the evidence another; in fact, it is not evidence but only a statement by the clerk of the committee as to where she was served. So there is a conflict there.

I cannot say that I accept the comments of the hon. member for Halifax with respect to the discrepancy in the evidence of the two investigators, although I know he says that not everybody says the same thing and that the accusation can be made that their evidence is rigged because they consult each other. But in this case here are two investigators working on the case, and one phones the other and says, come on down to the hotel. Then the other comes down to the hotel and they both work as a team. Why in heaven's name should they not collaborate and so know whether it is the same time or not? You can cast more doubt on them not knowing it was the same time because they worked together on the case than you can on their saying it is the same time and accusing them of collaboration.

As the hon. member for Halifax pointed out, these are not two witnesses who are dissociated one from the other and who appear in court to give evidence about something which each of them saw separately and which they were not supposed to work together on. This is evidence of two people working together as a team. One phones the other and says, come along down, and he does and then each gave evidence supporting what the other did. Mr. Steele gives evidence that his partner Mr. Humphries came down and went into the restaurant and then followed upstairs. Then Mr. Humphries gave evidence that he got a call from Mr. Steele and went down to the hotel but did not meet him immediately. Then he got a signal from him to follow two people who were going up in an elevator. This is a collaborative effort, two people working together.

I submit that this requires a pretty thorough examination in an informal way of sworn witnesses which examination we in this house committee cannot do. Only the miscellaneous private bills committee of this house can do this. I might as well give an indication or notice of my intention in this particular case so that hon. members will be forewarned of it. If this case comes to the stage of third reading, and I suspect it might on a day such as this, because of the reasons I have given just now, indisputable reasons, questions which have not been answered, and certainly not answered but confounded in the evidence, questions which should be cleared up, I am going to move a formal motion based on these reasons that the bill be not read a third time but be referred back to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills in order that that committee may go more thoroughly into these queries and questions and unclear points and confused and contradictory evidence which has been given.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I am concerned with this matter. This is one of the few cases which we have discussed where the doubt in my mind rests not on one of the major parties but on the third party. We have a man in the air force who travels around and whose conduct at home to his wife has not been satisfactory. Yet we find he comes to the city of Montreal and rents a room in one of the large expensive hotels, and the events we have discussed follow.

It would seem to me that we are asked to believe that these things which have been pointed out took place, and that the results of the investigation made by these two investigators were factual. We are asked to believe the story the wife tells us, which is quite a story in itself, where somebody is mentally unbalanced, a psychiatrist is called in, they discuss their medical problems with a social worker and bring a doctor into the case. It is rather a muddled up mess as far as these two people are concerned and we can grant that there is good reason—not necessarily this reason but good reason—for a separation, although the grounds we are using in this particular case are not necessarily those grounds.

What really concerns me is the position of the hon. members of the Senate and House of Commons who are accepting evidence from two investigators, as they so call themselves. I do not know whether they are private detectives; I doubt if the one is, and I do not know about the other. I doubt if they are qualified detectives in the true sense of the word. Probably they are making a living off this particular racket and do not engage much in true detective work. But obviously they have an arrangement with the hotel because they do not even rent a room or pretend to stay there. This sort of evidence goes through without even trying to protect what in this case is a third party.

On page 13 of the evidence Mr. Steele says:

> When I gained admittance to the room, after Mr. Hould opened the door, I showed him my identification card and also his photograph and asked him his name and he told me it was Joseph Hould. And then I told him the purpose of our visit.
> Q. Did he have anything to say about the photograph?
>
> A. He just nodded his head that it was him.

He did not say it was him; he just nodded his head.

> Q. And then you went over to the bed?
> A. Yes, and I addressed the woman in the bed and told her, "You are not Mrs. Hould, what is your name?" At first she did not say anything and neither did he, but I said that we have ways of finding out and it will make it more unpleasant that way.

I would suggest that he probably meant that if she did not tell him he would twist her arm, beat her up, steal her purse, or do some of the things we have heard about in previous cases. I wonder why the committee of the other house did not ask him what were the ways. Do they allow blackmail? Do they have some method of going to the employer and asking him if she will be fired from her job? Have they methods in the city of Montreal for making things unpleasant? I can think of a great number of things which would be darned unpleasant if they happened through unscrupulous detectives, from the evidence they give of the manipulations they concern themselves with.

Anyway, they did get the information they wanted, and she finally gave her name as Lorna Challow. That name was on a postal order and other things to identify her. Normally we do not use the names of these people but I should like to use the name in this case for the reason that she may read what I am saying at some time, or read a report in a newspaper, and thus be informed that she, or someone using her name, is a corespondent in a divorce case taking place in the city of Ottawa of which she herself may have no knowledge.

There was no address except the Shawinigan address. I have pointed out already that Shawinigan is not a small town. It is well known to the people of Ontario and I assume it is fairly well known also in the province of Quebec. An address in Shawinigan Falls without any further detail would be a satisfactory address, and even if she had moved to Montreal within recent times it is quite likely there would be a fair chance of getting information to her that she had the opportunity to appear in Ottawa to defend her name against this particular charge. I assume she would have to move to Montreal because she would have to change her medical card and Blue Cross card.

The adultery charge is, of course, phony as it usually is:

Q. How many beds were in the room?
A. Just one. It had been occupied by two people. She was covered up to her neck.
Q. Did you see anything else in the room?
A. Yes, some articles of furniture, a dress and clothing on it.
Q. What kind of clothing?
A. A red dress we had seen on her earlier. That was on the chair.
Q. Please look at the petitioner and say if she is the woman you saw in the bed there?
A. I have never seen this woman before.

Talk about rushing things through. Talk about trying to establish adultery charges. I have read on previous occasions what constitutes an adultery charge, and it is not just thinking about it. However, this is the evidence they gave. This is the evidence which was given by the detectives. I am not too concerned whether the evidence given by one is corroborated by the other. Certainly it should be, because one guy hires the other guy and he has to give the evidence he is asked to give. He would not give evidence which would not confirm previous evidence unless he was incompetent, probably a young fellow who might be impressed by what he saw. It might be his first case. In this instance I have not checked. I do not know whether he has been in many cases.

Then there was this business about the handwriting. In no case did they establish that this was the airman they were looking for. The man never said he was. He did not have to impersonate anyone, because he did not answer the question; he only nodded his head. It seems surprising that this evidence should have been obtained away back in May, 1959 and that this particular detective could remember the guy nodding his head. But in no case have we established that this was the airman or that the corespondent was actually the lady who has been named, or that such a woman existed at all. It is not proved.

No indication has been given that the normal notice was ever sent to her. Perhaps the sponsor of this bill could give us an indication of what type of legal paraphernalia is gone through with regard to inviting these people to attend before the committee when they are involved in a case other than as a petitioner, to inform them that they do not have to testify if testifying might implicate them; that they could give evidence through a lawyer, and that this evidence will carry some weight if it consisted of a sworn statement. Such persons could go to the lawyer of the opposite party, I am told, and give him the evidence if they so wished and it would carry a certain weight and it would not allow them, I am informed, to be put on the stand and lead, possibly, to self-incrimination. They would, however, be able to get across to the committee the evidence which they wished to give without leaving themselves open to charges of perjury or adultery.

This is very important, especially to people who have not been warned about these possibilities. The sponsor of the bill shakes his head. I presume it is that headache of his, but in case it is not, may I say I should be very surprised to think that his nod means that he believes these people should not have the right to know what their rights are. That is not what the courts believe, and in support of this contention I quote from page 340 of W. Kent Power's work:

Although a suit for divorce is a purely civil proceeding, an admission of adultery is held to be incriminating because adultery was an ecclesiastical offence—

This will become an open field when we bring in the ecclesiastical side of it.

—and subject to ecclesiastical censure, and therefore the right to be protected against questions tending to show adultery exists apart from the statute or rule—

Then there is a footnote (d) which reads:

It is one of the principles of English law that a party cannot be compelled to discover that if which answered would tend to subject him to any punishment or penalty—

The Deputy Chairman: I wonder what the hon. member is trying to establish by that quotation.

Mr. Peters: I am pointing out that these people have the right to go before parliament. I am speaking on behalf of the corespondent in this case. They have the right to go before parliament or before a court and give certain information in various ways which would tend to disprove their adultery without leaving themselves open to a charge of adultery. They are allowed some leeway because if they gave evidence which tended to prove an adultery charge the court would feel it had tended to force the person into the position of committing perjury which would be a charge additional to the one charge of adultery.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member has a very fine argument, but I cannot see that it is relevant to this bill.

Mr. Peters: I am suggesting that the corespondent in this case did not appear before the Senate committee to indicate to that committee that she did not commit adultery. I am suggesting that the reason she did not appear was that she was not notified at her proper address. The sponsor was not very cooperative. The hon. gentleman could say I should know this—and I should—but I am not familiar with the methods the Senate employs in sending notices to corespondents that they can appear and defend themselves.

Mr. McCleave: Would the hon. member be satisfied if I were to assure him that exactly the same procedure that is used in the provinces is used in these cases as to the method of service and the sending of notice?

Mr. Peters: Does that involve personal service of a summons or service by registered mail to the last known address?

Mr. McCleave: In these cases I believe it has to be personal service.

Mr. Howard: As I understand it this procedure varies from province to province. I know you can quickly get into an argument by saying you have been advised by a lawyer and immediately 30 other lawyers will disagree with him, but a lawyer explained to me that service upon a respondent or corespondent in Ontario allows for the person to sign his name which in effect constitutes a receipt—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. We are discussing a Quebec case, not an Ontario case. I urge the hon. member to return to a discussion of Bill No. SD-38.

Mr. Howard: I would be pleased to. I will refer to the bill and read therefrom.

—and whereas by her petition she has prayed that, on the ground of his adultery since then, their marriage be dissolved; and whereas the said marriage and adultery have been proved by evidence adduced and it is expedient that the prayer of her petition be granted—

The reference is to adultery. A corespondent is necessary for adultery to take place. The question is whether or not the corespondent was properly served. I was telling the hon. member for Halifax that the procedure here is not the same as in the other provinces. If the procedure is the same as in Ontario there would be on record a copy of the notice which was received with the corespondent's signature on it, in effect a receipt that she received notice of this action.

Mr. McCleave: In this case I believe there would be in our files an affidavit indicating by whom she had been served and where the service had taken place. I cannot speak for this case but there would not necessarily be a signature on it to show that she had accepted service.

Mr. Howard: This raises another point. The hon. member made reference to files containing affidavits. Could this information be made available to the committee at this stage of the discussion? This would be useful in future cases so that if doubt arises the facts may be ascertained without having to guess about them. Would the hon. member explain how we could get that material here?

Mr. McCleave: If the hon. member would show up in committee he could obtain it there very easily.

Mr. Howard: My hon. friend is embarking again on these irrelevancies. The hon. gentleman knows I am not a member of that committee and if he does not know it he should not be chairman. I invite the hon. gentleman to tell us how this information could be made available to committee of the whole house. Membership on this committee is restricted and making the information available to committee of the whole house would assist hon. gentlemen who are not members of the divorce committee.

Mr. McCleave: I am sure it is not such a popular committee that a person could not find a place on it. However, the information could probably be obtained through the committees branch or the miscellaneous private bills committee, but I do not see the purpose that would be served in bringing the information here.

Mr. Howard: Because this is a delicate point in this case, could we postpone consideration of this bill until that information is brought before committee of the whole house?

Mr. McCleave: I have no particular objection to that, Mr. Chairman. I will bend over backwards. I have had my feet swept out from under me since this debate began. We could, of course, let this bill go to the end of the list and go on to something else and talk it out.

Mr. Howard: My hon. friend is misconstruing my purpose. He is attributing to us by innuendo something that is not so.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Howard: No sir. He has always followed this practice as an examination of Hansard will reveal only he is now man enough to stand up and say it instead of mumbling it from his seat. I made no reference to this going to the bottom of the list. The hon. member suggested we are trying to shove this to one side but we only want to stand this bill aside until we get the files here. That can be done with unanimous consent. My hon. friend is imputing incorrect and untrue motives to us. If he is willing to allow this bill to stand and then resume debate on it—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Howard: Some hon. members are saying, "No"—

Mr. McCleave: Perhaps I could explain what would happen if we met with the hon. member's request. I do not think our committee branch is open tonight and we could not get the files here and therefore this case would stand at the bottom of the list and we would take up something else. The hon. member seems to be reading into a simple remark like that a suggestion that he is bent on some mischievous course and I did not suggest that at all.

Mr. Pallett: Even if it is true.

Mr. Howard: I will gladly accept the hon. member's withdrawal.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, you will recall that at the dinner adjournment we were engaged in a rather lengthy discussion about a number of items, one of which was the residence of the corespondent and whether or not the corespondent had been properly served with a notice of this action. There was some discussion as to whether in the official files and documents relating to this particular case this information might be obtained. I hope the hon. member for Halifax will not feel upset if I undertake to perform some of the functions of a sponsor of a bill of this nature and relate to the committee information contained in the filed documents relating to this particular case which I was able to obtain during the dinner adjournment. Incidentally, this information was not in the custody of the committees branch in the west block. There is in this file a sworn affidavit relating to the question of whether or not the corespondent had been served. It is an affidavit sworn by a Mr. Rene Ouimet, a sworn bailiff of the city of Montreal, province of Quebec on June 25, 1959. In this affidavit he indicates that he served the corespondent named herein personally with a true copy of the notice which is attached, and left it with her at her place of employment. The address of her place of employment is given, and it is also referred to in the evidence earlier as information given by the clerk of the committee.

Therefore, it would appear from this that the corespondent was served personally. The only thing I wonder about was why the bailiff would undertake to make service of this nature which, as we all realize, involves a sort of complex domestic personal matter. I wonder why he would undertake to serve a copy of the notice on her at her place of employment. Her place of residence would appear to be the proper place in which to serve the notice rather than perhaps to indicate to her fellow employees where she was working that she was involved in an incident of this nature, especially when it is dated one month later than the date of the petition itself, which indicates what her actual residence number is.

At this stage I wish to make additional comments to show that it was possible to obtain the material, the documents and affidavits relating to this particular case in so far as service upon the respondent and corespondent is concerned and also copies of the notice and other documents which are designed to meet the rules of the other place with respect to these matters. I should like to indicate not only for the benefit of the hon. member for Halifax but also for the benefit of other hon. members and I am sure Mr. Dubroy does not mind my saying this—that these documents are kept in the office of the second clerk assistant and if anyone desires to obtain this information it can be found there because these documents will be kept in that office while the bills are being dealt with in this chamber. Once they are passed, all of this material, along with the evidence, will be returned to the Senate.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say that I have also seen what is considered to be, I suppose, the portfolio which contains the information in relation to the service of the petition and the notice of the serving. I have read them; they are contained here and I think they have allayed some of the suspicions that were voiced before the dinner adjournment. However, Mr. Chairman, I am still at a loss, after reading all of the official documents, to understand how the relationship was established between the Shawinigan Falls address and the subsequent serving of the copy of the petition on the corespondent. The evidence does not show it, nor does the complete report of the committee on divorce of the Senate show how they found out she worked at this particular address. It strikes me as strange that they should have been able to ascertain where she worked when they only saw her in the evening partly clad, at a different address altogether. I do not understand how they came to serve not a summons but a petition where she worked, and how they found out where she worked. It would appear to me that there is still some information somewhere, some method of eliciting the information that they were able to secure in finding out where she worked.

We also mentioned the fact that we were concerned that the corespondent, the respondent and other witnesses, who may be of importance in this particular case, were not given the information which would allow them to decide for themselves whether they could come to parliament or to the Senate committee and obtain protection, if they needed protection, because of the subsequent proving of the adultery charge and at the same time put in a defence if they wished to.

I am not as familiar with these documents as I am with the other ones but we shall be after a while.

Mr. Small: You are taking a correspondence course.

Mr. Peters: We are taking one.

Mr. Howard: We do not want to pass the exams.

Mr. Peters: In another one we shall know where to find this. It is quite simply the notice of the petition that they give to the corespondent. It does not indicate that they have the right to come before the committee and present their side of the case if they feel they have been wrongly accused.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, because of the practice in English law whereby a respondent or corespondent is given the opportunity of disproving the charges that are made against him or her, they should be given notice that they have the opportunity of appearing on this particular day in person. In my opinion, such information is not given in that notice. I believe that evidence should be given before the committee of the other place indicating that personal service was made upon these people by a bailiff so that we will not be troubled by lack of knowledge as to whether or not notice of the petition was given to the corespondent as well as the respondent in these cases.

Bill reported.

STELLA JEAN MARGARET NEWMAN LAMARTINE

The house in committee on Bill No. SD-39, for the relief of Stella Jean Margaret Newman Lamartine—Mr. McCleave—Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Howard: I should like to make a few comments about this particular bill before us, and relate them somewhat in the same way as I have the others, to the facts set forth in the bill itself, the marriage and adultery, and whether or not those facts have been proven. In doing so I should like to make reference to the petition itself which indicates in its first paragraph that a lawful marriage did not take place on March 8, 1928, and in the sixth paragraph that on May 25, 1959, at a particular address in the city of Montreal, adultery was committed. The names of the respondent and corespondent are given.

Evidence was given by the petitioner before the committee of the other place in substantiation of these allegations and by two witnesses, who were investigators, namely Mr. Etheridge and Mr. Paquette, to the effect that adultery was committed. According to page 9 of the evidence the petitioner appeared, was sworn and asked certain questions by the clerk of the committee concerning her name, age, occupation and where she lived. Then the next question asked of her is:

Q. Are you married, and if so to whom?
A. I am married to—

Then, she gives the name of the husband who is the respondent in this particular case.

Q. When were you married?
A. I was married on March 8, 1928.
Q. Where?
A. Montreal.
Q. By whom?
A. By the Rev. Mr. Clare.
Q. What is your religion?
A. I am a Protestant, Unitarian.
Q. And your husband, what religion is he?
A. My husband is a Unitarian also.
Q. I show you a document. Do you recognize this document?
A. Yes, it is my marriage certificate.
Q. Are the statements therein contained true and correct?
A. They are true and correct, yes.

This would indicate that the first requirement of the bill has been met, that is that the marriage did take place and it was between the petitioner and the respondent. There is proof of the consummation of the marriage also in the fact that there were three children born of this marriage. To the extent we are permitted by the rules to make reference to these children, I would read from the evidence on page 10. Mr. Usher, who is of the city of Montreal and who was counsel for the petitioner, asks certain questions which are as follows:

Q. Are there any children issue of the marriage?
A. There are three children.
Q. Would you state the names and ages, please?

The names of the children are given and the ages also, the ages being 31, 27 and 11. Then following that there is some reference to the fact the eldest child is married and the second child is living and employed in California. The youngest child, age 11, is living with the petitioner and has lived with her and remained in her custody ever since birth.

There are extensive questions here with respect to separation proceedings. There is a question asked by Mr. Usher which appears on page 10:

Q. Is it not a fact that we instituted separation proceedings for you before the superior court in Montreal shortly thereafter?

He means shortly after a quarrel between the witness and her husband in 1957. She answered, yes.

Q. And has he ever returned to the home—

Then, Senator Roebuck says:

Is that mentioned in the petition?

Mr. Usher replies:

No, sir, the petition was taken out prior to the introduction of the legal proceedings.

There is some reference to support, which relates to the separation proceedings. The witness is asked:

Q. Was he supporting you at the time?
A. He was supporting me partially. I had to work because there was not really enough money to live on.
Q. And after he left was he sending you any support?
A. He only paid the rent because he was, of course, obliged to.
Q. And is it not a fact that by judgment of the superior court you were awarded the custody of the child,—?
A. Yes.
Q. And an alimentary allowance of $75 a month for the maintenance of your child?
A. That is right.

There is some doubt, I might say here before proceeding into the evidence, whether or not this alimentary allowance was for the child or for the wife. Some reference to that will come along in a moment. The next question is:

Q. Has he been paying the $75?
A. Sometimes, and sometimes not; very frequently not.
Q. And is it not a fact that you have had to contact our office on numerous occasions to jog your husband's memory to pay this amount of $75?
A. Yes.

Then, Senator Roebuck makes some additional inquiries. He says:

Before we leave this, Mr. Usher, I should like to ask a few more questions.
Q. You got a judgment against your husband from the court ordering him to pay you something and I think you said it was $75 a month for the support of the child?
A. Yes.
Q. And was there anything for your support?
A. None at all.
Q. Did you ask for it?
A. No.

Then, Mr. Usher assisted the committee, not by asking questions but by offering information with respect to certain legal procedures and functions of the superior court relating to the separation proceedings and allowances. He explained this to Senator Roebuck. I made reference to this before, but there is additional comment by Mr. Usher on page 12 with respect to the payment of the allowance.

I think it would be well for the committee to have an understanding, if it does not have it already, of this particular circumstance which exists in the province of Quebec. I do not know whether it exists in other provinces. In any event, it was new to me when I read the evidence and found that it existed. I think it would be somewhat enlightening to other members of this committee, if not for particular use in this instance then for use later on when similar questions arise. Mr. Usher, starting first at page 12, gave some additional information in answer to a query by another hon. senator. He said this:

Senator, probably I would be better able to answer that question. Under our jurisprudence, once there is a divorce the obligation to support the wife ceases—

This is what I was saying earlier, as you will recall, Mr. Chairman, with respect to the case with which we have just dealt. The quotation continues:

—but the obligation to support the child remains. If there is a judgment rendered by the superior court of Montreal awarding alimony in favour of children a divorce in Ottawa does not affect that, because it is not an alimentary payment to the wife. Mr. Justice Mackinnon, I think it was, in around the year 1952 or 1953 rendered a judgment to that effect, that a divorce does not affect the alimony payable for children.

So presumably the child, who is now 11, will be financially provided for to the degree or to the extent of $75 a month regardless of whether or not this particular petition for divorce passes this place. I would assume that the lad will be fairly well looked after because additional evidence given by the petitioner, upon questioning by hon. Senator Roebuck, was as follows:

Q. The lad is going to school, is he?
A. Yes, he is going to—

And she gives the name of the particular school. The questioning continues:

Q. Are there any difficulties at home? You are out working. How old is he, did you say?
A. He is eleven.
Q. Is there any trouble in regard to taking care of him?
A. No, his school is a private school, and they are permitted to stay for sports and other different activities until 4.30. We live fairly close to the school, and he walks home, and I am home at about five o'clock. I also have the principal of the school living with me.

I would point out that subsequent questioning indicates that the principal of the school is a lady also, so there is no problem there. Mr. Usher, counsel for the petitioner, indicates he is honourary legal adviser to this particular school and that Mr. Frosst of the Frosst Chemical Company is the chairman. Everyone seems to think that the school itself is an excellent one and that the child will get a very good opportunity for education there and that the payment of $75 per month will assist somewhat in providing for and maintaining the child.

There were some events leading up to their actual separation or their actual splitting up, as it were, which, according to the evidence, took place in November of 1957 and following that, as I say, these divorce proceedings were instituted as well as separation proceedings. Mr. Usher, again with regard to the events leading up to this separation, asked the following questions:

Q. Prior to his leaving in November, 1957—

That is the respondent.

—were there any indications of immorality on his part at that time?
A. Yes, there were. I was quite certain that he was taking out some other woman at the time.
Q. What led you to that conclusion?
A. Well, I found lipstick on his clothing, and later I had a servant to take care of my child as I was working, and she said she would have to leave because of his unwelcome attentions.

That same thing occurred with the second servant in 1956. I do not relate this in order to make reference to any immoral conduct on the part of the respondent at all but for two other reasons. One is to point out that this led to some strained relationships in the family. Also, the reference to the servants being employed in the house and the reference just prior to this to the amount of rent that is being paid, notably $160 a month, which is rather a large amount to pay for rent for an apartment, would indicate that the family was fairly well off. I do not know for a fact whether or not this is so. I only mention the amount of rent being paid and the fact that the husband and wife were working—the husband being an artist and selling antiques and so on on an independent basis—as indicating perhaps that the welfare of the child will be—at least I hope so—properly cared for if this divorce reaches the stage of being passed.

There is evidence also that no connivance or condonation took place with respect to the adultery alleged or charged. Hon. Senator Roebuck asked some questions with respect to that matter as follows:

Q. That is, you have had no sex relations with him?

That is since November, 1957:

A. No.
Q. You are complaining of some acts of adultery. Did you ever encourage them?
A. No.
Q. Did you ever connive to bring them about?
A. No.
Q. Did you throw anybody in his way for the purpose of evidence in these proceedings?
A. No.

Then he asks about matters to which I referred earlier, about the child going to school and so on. So far as collusion is concerned, there is no evidence of it but I should say there is evidence to the contrary. However, there are some strange things again when it comes to proof of adultery. I must make rather extensive reference in this instance to the evidence that is here. It is lengthy evidence. It is lengthy as compared with evidence that we have read with respect to other cases. In order to prevent myself from being accused, as I have been on other occasions, of selecting evidence to show a particular case, I shall be obliged to give the full extent of it.

Mr. Ernest Gordon Etheridge, is well known to this committee—he is an old timer—handles some 50 or 60 divorce cases a year. I think it is 60 that he is investigating or has investigated for this particular session. He has quite a wealth of experience, I am sure not only in the field of how to present evidence, not only in the field of what evidence to obtain before it is presented to the committee, not only to have a complete and thorough understanding of the specific points which he will have to prove before the committee but I am sure he is well experienced also in the field of making arrangements for particular divorces in order to ensure that a couple is seen or caught, as the expression is, in compromising circumstances which could be grounds for proving adultery. In any event, Mr. Etheridge gave evidence, as found at page 13. To dispense with the preliminaries—that is to say, about when he was engaged and so on—and to get into the picture, he starts with the results of their investigation. Mr. Usher asks him this question:

Will you tell the result of your investigation?
A. As a result of our investigation, on the evening of Monday, May 25, 1959, I took up observation with Mr. Paquette.

Mr. Paquette is the co-investigator in this case, I suppose.

From Crescent Street we could see Mr.—

Giving the name of the respondent's green Ford station wagon, the licence number, 1959 Quebec markers. The respondent's studio and his living quarters were all in the one civic number, and he gives the number of the street in Montreal. He goes on:

During the investigation Mr.—

Giving the respondent's name.

—would use the front entrance one time out of ten possibly.

So you can see they took up rather a long vigil at this particular place if they could determine that he used the front entrance one time out of ten. I assume they had watched him on ten different occasions when the respondent had come in or gone out. He goes on:

When he would arrive and park his car in a private parking place off the laneway between—

Giving the streets.

—he would leave the car there and would go up the fire escape to his living quarters on the top of the building. They would never go around the building to go in by the front. On this evening we were there at 4.30 and about five minutes after eight we saw him leave to come down the fire escape with this woman we had seen him with on many previous occasions.

I do not know what type of fire escape it is, not having seen it, but it plays rather an important role in this evidence before us because it is the way Mr. Etheridge and Mr. Paquette, I assume it is, came to find the evidence they did. He goes on:

They parked the car on Mountain south of St. Catherine and had supper at Dinty Moore's and then they drove off as if looking for somebody in St. Lambert, where they spoke to a policeman as if trying to find an address. They finally turned around, came under the Wellington tunnel, up Mountain street and reparked the car in this parking section behind—

Then he gives an address at Sherbrooke street west. I have not given the address of this particular place where adultery is alleged to have taken place as yet, but I would point out that there is an error here in the number of the address; I think it is an error. In one reference the parking lot in the area where they lived is given—and I will only use the number—as 1330. However, when they came back again and made reference to the parking section the reference was to 1130. I assume that that is a typographical error or slip of the tongue on the part of Mr. Etheridge; in any event it is of inconsequential value to this particular case here. So they came back to this particular parking section and went up by the fire escape. Mr. Etheridge continues:

After a while we noticed everything was in darkness, about 11.15. We waited shortly until before midnight and we went upstairs by the fire escape, Mr. Paquette and myself, and when we got to the door at the top of the fire escape we knocked on the door.

The house had been in darkness for some 40 to 45 minutes, according to the evidence. They went up the fire escape, which I am sure we will all agree is not the usual means of access to a person's residence, and knocked on the door. He goes on:

Mr.—

Giving the name of the respondent.

—came and looked out—

There is no hesitation. In some cases you will notice that they knocked quite a few times after the lights had gone out for some three quarters of an hour or half an hour before somebody came to the door. But in this case the plan worked perfectly. They knocked and he came to the door just as if this was the cue after they had come up the fire escape at midnight and knocked on the door. The respondent looked out and they identified themselves to him. They stepped into the apartment after they had identified themselves. Here, Mr. Chairman, is a strange situation, as you can imagine. It is midnight, the lights had been out since 11.15, and presumably you are in bed. I am not talking about you yourself, Mr. Chairman, but through you I am speaking to the committee. You are in bed and someone comes up the fire escape, which is a strange method of getting to where you live. They knock on the door. Two strangers identify themselves to you and they step into your apartment. Then you admit who you are. In this case the respondent admitted he was so-and-so, giving his name. He also admitted that the picture in their possession was of himself. The evidence goes on:

He had come to open the door wearing the lower part of pyjamas only and he had on slippers.

Then Senator Roebuck asks:

He was nude from the waist up?
A. Yes. The living quarters consisted of a small kitchenette plus a sort of double room. It was divided with columns which separated the living room and the dining room. In the north section which was to our right with the head of the bed facing Sherbrooke street, this woman who had given us her name as—

Giving the name of the corespondent.

—was lying in the open studio couch on the side closest to the wall. We could see from where Mr. Lamartine had risen from his side of the pulled-out studio couch to come to answer the door.

Q. What was she wearing?

A. She was covered to the neck with a sheet. It was a warm night and there were no spreads or blankets on the bed—

And so on. Here again we are asked to accept point blank this sort of evidence. Two strangers come up a fire escape at midnight and knock on a door which is immediately opened. They walk in, identify themselves, show a picture to someone they do not know and who does not know them. He says, "Yes, that is I". He identifies the picture. Then they ask a woman who is in bed covered up to the neck with a sheet what her name is, and she without qualms or questioning says that her name is so-and-so. From the evidence we have read in other cases threats have been used, as they were in the last instance where the investigator said they had ways of making it tough for her if she did not tell them her name. We have had instances where the investigator has rifled through women's purses, in effect committing trespass, and in that case we might expect it. But in this particular case—

The Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Peters: Just one or two comments about this particular case, Mr. Chairman. In this particular case the lawyer, Mr. Usher, has done a service, I think, to the committee in his remarks regarding the connection between the House of Commons and a divorce granted in a legislative manner and those people in Quebec who were fortunate enough prior to their application to parliament to apply to the superior court of Quebec for relief for the female spouse and maintenance of the children. I think it is worth while to read what Mr. Usher said. He is asked:

Q. If you get this divorce is he bound to continue paying that $75?

Then Mr. Usher said:

Senator, probably I would be better able to answer that question. Under our jurisprudence, once there is a divorce the obligation to support the wife ceases, but the obligation to support the child remains. If there is a judgment rendered by the superior court of Montreal awarding alimony in favour of children a divorce in Ottawa does not affect that, because it is not an alimentary payment to the wife. Mr. Justice Mackinnon, I think it was, in around the year 1952 or 1953 rendered a judgment to that effect, that a divorce does not affect the alimony payable for children.

I am very pleased that Mr. Usher, a very competent lawyer, put this on the record, because I think it is advice that should be taken by those who are applying. In this case, as reported later on, it is evident that there are three children of this marriage. One of them is grown up and married, the other has a good job and is living away from home, and the third is a young boy who is attending a private school. The father is now paying $75 for his maintenance, and because this has been taken through the civil court in Quebec he will continue to receive the $75 for his education.

I think it would be a pleasure to meet Mr. Usher because I was interested in the remarks he made in this case. The committee will remember that he did ask a question about the husband's conduct and the chairman, Senator Roebuck, had to point out to him that he was not to put answers into the mouth of the witness. I think this is a common court procedure, and we do not hold that against Mr. Usher though we commend the chairman of the committee for his vigilance and for asking that the question be reworded and that it should ask for an answer rather than indicate an answer. It is amusing to read what occurs as reported on page 13 when the committee was discussing the school the boy was attending.

Mr. Usher: I might say that this is an usually good school. It is probably the leading school in Montreal. That is the private progressive school of which Mr. Frosst of the Frosst Chemical Company is the chairman, and I happen to be honorary legal adviser to the school.

There is nothing like tooting your own horn. He was certainly doing that. He was giving full credit to the firm he represents, to the school, and to himself, as well as to Frosst chemicals, and I would say he did very well as far as the handling of this case is concerned with regard to the welfare of the young lad who is still dependent on the support he is receiving from his father.

I was interested in reading this case to note that once again we have the same kind of stereotyped evidence as has continually been given in the cases we have examined so far. The investigator in this case is a particularly well-versed man, Mr. Etheridge, who has the record in the Senate for presenting these cases. His record is high, and he is one of the top two or three detectives, but again we are asked to give credit to evidence the nature of which stretches our credulity. In this particular case they talk about taking up observation with Mr. Paquette. That particular answer continues:

From Crescent street we could see Mr. Lamartine's green Ford station wagon... parked there. Mr. Lamartine's studio and his living quarters were all in the one civic number.

I notice that a great deal of questioning was done in relation to the studio and to the work of the respondent in this case. It is mentioned that he is an artist of one kind or another. Senator Roebuck himself asked a question about his occupation when the committee was discussing whether the money was being paid for the support of the child. On page 11 the following appears:

By Senator Lambert:
Q. Is he an independent artist, or is he associated with a commercial art firm?
A. He is an artist, and he also has been selling antiques.
Q. But he is not attached to a lithographing firm or any commercial art firm?
A. No.
By the Chairman (Senator Roebuck):
Q. He just sells pictures?
A. Yes, portraits, and he designs.
Senator Lambert: He is an independent artist.

On reading this I am forced to come to the conclusion that some discussion of this case must have taken place prior to the examination, and to the evidence which was given according to the transcript, because why are all these questions asked about what type of an artist this person is, where he worked, whether he worked for a lithographic firm or a commercial art firm, and so on? I suppose the temperament of people who are artists in the true sense of the word must vary. An artist with one kind of temperament may paint landscapes; an artist who paints portraits may have a different type of temperament and, again, a further type of temperament may be found in an artist who works for lithographic processes.

Nevertheless, I fail to see why all these questions were asked about the type of art work which was done, unless they were intended to establish the personality and mental attitude of the respondent. When Senator Lambert ends up, he says: He is an independent artist. In fact, he was answering a question which had been asked earlier by Senator Roebuck, which gives me the impression that more investigation was conducted into this phase of the personality of the respondent in this case than appears in the evidence, and I am curious as to whether this was done before the hearing; whether Senator Lambert may have had some knowledge of this particular person or if it was one of those affairs which sometimes happen and in this case I presume the Senate committee sat around a few minutes before the session opened and discussed a number of things and exchanged some information. Sometimes members come to an arrangement about how far they are going in questioning and what would be acceptable as a cut-off as far as questions are concerned. In court cases, quite often, they decide what they will settle for. In murder cases the lawyers and the judge may sit down and agree they will settle for second degree manslaughter.

Mr. McCleave: Has the hon. member one jot or tittle of evidence to back up such a serious statement? I know he would not wish to be unfair in this matter. Is there any evidence to support that allegation?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): It is a most unwarranted reflection on the other place.

Mr. Peters: No. It is the questioning itself. It is odd questioning, and I will just read what was said earlier with reference to alimony. The committee discussed first of all the proceedings in the Quebec court. The record continues:

Q. Is it not a fact that we instituted separation proceedings for you before the superior court in Montreal shortly thereafter?
A. Yes.
Q. And has he ever returned to the home—
The Chairman (Senator Roebuck): Is that mentioned in the petition?
Mr. Usher: No, sir, the petition was taken out prior to the introduction of the legal proceedings.
Q. Has your husband ever returned to your home since then?
A. No, he has not returned.
Q. Was he supporting you at the time?
A. He was supporting me partially. I had to work because there was not really enough money to live on.
Q. And after he left was he sending you any support?
A. He only paid the rent because he was, of course, obliged to.
Q. And is it not a fact that by judgment of the superior court you were awarded the custody of the child, Richard?
A. Yes.
Q. And an alimentary allowance of $75 a month for the maintenance of your child?
A. That is right.
Q. Has he been paying the $75?
A. Sometimes, and sometimes not; very frequently not.
Q. And is it not a fact that you have had to contact our office on numerous occasions to jog your husband's memory to pay this amount of $75?
A. Yes.
By the Chairman (Senator Roebuck):
Q. How far is he behind?
A. At the present moment he is one month behind.

Then they launched into a discussion of what kind of artist he is and they drew conclusions. I am not interested in this field but I do not think there is much connection between a lithographing firm, a commercial art firm, the selling of antiques and the work of artists as we know it. I may be drawing an inference that is not there but I am—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Not even intelligent.

Mr. Peters: —led to believe that there must have been some discussion beforehand about the kind of artist he was because the questions bear no relationship to those asked previously.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, is the hon. member suggesting that the Senate has cooked up the evidence in this divorce case? Is he suggesting that there was some impropriety on the part of the Senate in handling this case? If so, I think he should be compelled to state the grounds on which he bases his accusation.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): This is shocking.

Mr. Peters: If the hon. member had followed what I was saying he would know there seems to be some questioning that does not have any beginning. It may be that the committee sat around with the lawyers beforehand and not necessarily discussed the case but made certain references. That is what I am suggesting. I point out that this is done many times in legal circles.

An hon. Member: How would you know?

Mr. Aiken: Name where?

Mr. Peters: I say it is done.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): This is intolerable, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: I must say that the hon. member is coming very close to making improper references to the other place. I agree that he may discuss the evidence but he is going further than that in suggesting things that are not at all supported by the evidence. Although some parts of the evidence may not appear to be relevant the hon. member by discussing them cannot make them more relevant than would appear in the evidence itself.

Mr. Peters: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I think I will drop the whole idea. I did not think it was relevant before and I do not think it has got any more so. I am not sure I helped it any, either.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): This is not funny, it is shocking.

Mr. Peters: If we go on in the evidence we can see why the questions were asked. If he belonged to a firm that paid money by the month obviously he should be able to make the $75 payment but if he was selling something that may not be so easy.

Mr. Small: Is the hon. member suggesting that he was probably selling pornographic art?

Mr. Peters: It does not say that.

Mr. Small: That is what the hon. member is trying to get at.

Mr. Peters: No, I was not suggesting that. I was just wondering why the differences were indicated. It is of no importance to us whether the $75 is being paid because, as was pointed out, there is a right to collect it in the province. I am quite sure it will be paid. We are not changing that and I am pleased about it.

[Mr. Jones.]

The evidence about the rent is not clear. She said he paid rent because he was obliged to. I would point out that he did not live there any more so he could not be obliged to. Senator Farquhar asked questions about this on page 11 as follows:

Q. You mentioned the rent. Is that included in the $75?
A. No, at that time he did not pay me anything until the court order, but he had signed a lease, and in Quebec you cannot move out until the lease is completed.
Q. How much rent was he paying?
A. I think it was $160 a month.
By Mr. Usher:
Q. That was in 1957?
A. Yes, in 1957. He does not pay any rent now. I moved from there to a less expensive apartment.
By Senator Farquhar:
Q. He just pays you the $75?
A. Yes.

Mr. Usher asked some very leading questions in this case. I assume he is a competent lawyer.

Mr. McCleave: You called him one.

Mr. Peters: He asked questions as follows:

By Mr. Usher:
Q. Prior to his leaving in November, 1957 were there any indications of immorality on his part at that time?
A. Yes, there were. I was quite certain that he was taking out some other woman at the time.
Q. What led you to that conclusion?
A. Well, I found lipstick on his clothing, and later I had a servant to take care of my child as I was working, and she said she would have to leave because of his unwelcome attentions.
Q. That was shortly prior to—.
A. That was in 1955. There was then a second girl, a second servant, in 1956 who had the same difficulty with him.

Before the end of this session it is to be hoped that we will have some of these investigating officers come up before us so we can inquire into their capabilities and the methods they use. The evidence here, as in some other cases, is, to say the least, surprising. Mr. Etheridge testified as follows:

During the investigation Mr. Lamartine would use the front entrance one time out of ten possibly. When he would arrive and park his car in a private parking place off the laneway between Crescent and Mountain street, he would leave the car there and would go up the fire escape to his living quarters on the top of the building. They would never go around the building to go in by the front.

From reading the evidence I have not been able to establish if he could get in by any other means. As the apartment was laid out this would be the door normally used. I continue:

On this evening we were there at 4.30 and about five minutes after eight we saw him leave to come down the fire escape with this woman we had seen him with on many previous occasions. They parked the car on Mountain street off St. Catherine and had supper at Dinty Moore's and then they drove off as if looking for somebody in St. Lambert, where they spoke to a policeman as if trying to find an address.

I suggest they should have had the policeman stop the car behind them and find out why they were being followed around the city, but they did not. I continue:

They finally turned around, came under the Wellington tunnel up Mountain street and reparked the car in this parking section behind 1130 Sherbrooke street west and went up by the fire escape. After a while we noticed everything was in darkness, about 11.15. We waited shortly until before midnight and we went upstairs by the fire escape, Mr. Paquette and myself, and when we got to the door at the top of fire escape we knocked on the door. Mr. Lamartine came and looked out and we identified ourselves to him and we stepped into the apartment after we identified ourselves, and he admitted he was Mr. Gert Lamartine and also the picture in our possession was of himself. He had come to open the door wearing the lower part of pyjamas only and he had on slippers.

Is this normal procedure, Mr. Chairman? If somebody raps on the door at twelve o'clock at night is it not normal to ask who is there? I doubt whether there are many people, even in those areas where it is normal to leave the door unlocked, who would get up in the middle of the night, open the door and welcome in somebody whom they had not seen before. Even if he identified himself, the identification he would have to use would be a detective's badge, a driver's licence or something of that nature. I would be surprised if they do not use some form of intimidation, because with their detective's badge, or whatever they are issued in the city of Montreal or in the province of Quebec for this purpose, unless they use some type of intimidation I would be surprised if they would be readily allowed in the apartment. I go on with the evidence as to what they saw in the room.

Q. He was nude from the waist up?

A. Yes. The living quarters consisted of a small kitchenette plus a sort of double room. It was divided with columns which separated the living room and the dining room. In the north section which was to our right with the head of the bed facing Sherbrooke street, this woman who had given us her name as Nanette Lalonde was lying in the open studio couch on the side closest to the wall.

When did she give them her name as Nanette Lalonde? From my reading of the evidence I do not find that they had contact with her previously. This was the first time they had spoken to this woman—it would appear that way anyway—and yet he said:

—this woman who had given us her name as Nanette Lalonde was lying in the open studio couch on the side closest to the wall.

This is not very good evidence. They knew the name of the girl and they say that she had given her name to them previously. If we assume that—we will give the benefit of the doubt to the investigators—they may have used the wrong tense or something of that nature yet it would seem that they were familiar with the name of this young lady before they entered the room. This might indicate that she was either well known as a woman of the street which would not form the basis of an adultery charge in this case, as people of that nature are taken care of by civil law, or that the evidence in this particular is not correct.

Mr. McCleave: Will the hon. member permit two questions? First, is there any evidence to suggest that she was a woman of the street? Second, has the hon. member read the evidence at the bottom of page 14?

Mr. Peters: To answer the first question, I am not suggesting that. If I were suggesting that I would quote authorities to indicate that a divorce could not be granted if that were the case. I am not suggesting that.

To answer the second question, I have read the evidence on page 14 but the Senate committee had not heard the evidence given on page 14 when they were taking the evidence which appears on page 12. It would appear to me that you have to follow some pattern. What this witness is suggesting is that they knew her previously. We may even find it to be true that his partner had made inquiries. But in reading the evidence up to this point there is no indication that they had previously met her. I continue with the answer:

We could see from where Mr. Lamartine had risen from his side of the pulled-out studio couch to come to answer the door.

This is only an assumption; it is not a fact. It is an assumption that they could see from where he had risen to come to answer the door. They could not very well see that unless they had their eyes to the keyhole. They should have said that if they had. I would think that would be much better evidence than some of the evidence they have given. I continue:

Q. What was she wearing?

A. She was covered to the neck with a sheet. It was a warm night and there were no spreads or blankets on the bed, just the sheet.

By Mr. Usher:

Q. Was there any clothing about the place?

A. The woman's clothing was on a chair in the left-hand corner but we did not see any of Mr. Lamartine's clothing around at all.

Maybe he arrived from across the hall, or some place, in that kind of attire. If there were no clothes lying around and he went to the door wearing the lower part of his pyjamas probably he wandered in out of the hall or from some other place. I continue:

A. The woman's clothing was on a chair in the left-hand corner but we did not see any of Mr. Lamartine's clothing around at all.

Q. How many beds were in the room?

A. It was not a bed, it was a studio couch used as a bed.

Q. The woman you saw in the bed, was she Mrs. Lamartine who is sitting here?

A. No, I am seeing Mrs. Lamartine for the first time.

Q. But she is not the woman you saw in the bed that night?

A. Definitely not.

This is the kind of evidence we continually get. Why did they not ask where his clothes were? These people are willing to search purses and steal nameplates off doors, and do a number of other things. They threaten people and yet they did not look around to find out whether his clothing was there. Why did they not ascertain that? Why did they not see whether there was another door leading into that room because it would appear from the evidence that the only way you can get into that apartment is by way of the fire escape. It was a very small apartment. It would seem that is the door they used, the one that leads in off the back entrance. I continue with the evidence. Mr. Paquette, who has appeared on a number of occasions, was also questioned as to the events that evening.

Q. Were you in the company of the previous witness, Mr. Etheridge, on the night of May 25, 1959?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Would you look at this photograph already filed as exhibit 2 and state who that is?

A. I know this man as Mr. Gert Lamartine.

Q. Will you tell the committee what occurred on that evening when you obtained access to the premises of the respondent, Mr. Gert Lamartine?

A. We went up to his living quarters by the rear entrance that night, it was 11.50 p.m., to the same door as they went in previously during the evening. Mr. Etheridge knocked at the door and it took a minute or two before Mr. Lamartine came to the door. So we identified ourselves and we went into the kitchen. And after that we went into this room which is the living quarters, and in that apartment there was an open studio couch where we noticed a woman about 35 years old was lying in bed. Mr. Etheridge showed him the picture that he had in his possession and he admitted that was his picture, and he asked the woman in the bed what her name was and she said it was Nanette Lalonde.

It is surprising, Mr. Chairman, that this answer should have come from the assistant because he says that Mr. Etheridge showed him the picture that he had in his possession and he admitted that it was his picture, and he asked the woman in the bed what her name was and she said it was Nanette Lalonde. On the previous page of the testimony, the testimony of Mr. Gordon Etheridge, he said that she had previously given her name. Let me quote it:

—this woman who had given us her name as Nanette Lalonde.

In other words, Mr. Etheridge is indicating he had been previously introduced to this lady and now his partner is saying that Mr. Etheridge asked her what her name was and she had told him.

Q. What was she wearing?

A. She was covered up to the neck with the sheet.

Q. Did you see any of her clothes in the room?

A. Her clothes were on a chair beside the bed.

Q. What was Mr. Lamartine wearing?

A. The lower part of his pyjamas. We told Mr. Lamartine that Mrs. Lamartine was taking divorce action against him. Then, we took a sketch of the place and went out.

This is the type of evidence which, I would suggest, leads to only one conclusion and that is that this divorce evidence was framed. The whole thing worked out very well because the particulars had been agreed upon and the access to the apartment was of the easiest sort. In this connection I should like to ask the sponsor of this bill if he will accompany me to the Lord Elgin or Chateau Laurier, and at 12 o'clock we will rap on all the doors along one hall to ascertain how many rooms there are to which we gain access. Let us see how many people even ask us who we are or what we want. I am quite sure we will have the private detective from the hotel follow us and throw us out before we even get to the second door. I have been thrown out of better hotels than they have in Ottawa on various occasions, anyway.

Mr. McCleave: Will the hon. member permit me to decline the invitation? I do not mind being thrown out of high class hotels, but not under those circumstances.

Mr. Peters: This is in the interests of research. I am sure that if we rapped upon the doors of 10 rooms we could not get into more than one. We would probably find that there was only one person in the room. We will not find one situation of this type. If there are any of these situations in the better class hotels in Ottawa tonight we would not be allowed in those rooms. I am quite willing to try it. In every case we have handled lately there is a rap on the door at one o'clock in the morning, the door opens and somebody is invited in. They must be very hospitable in Montreal. I hope to go down to Montreal this week, and I hope that what I read here is true because I am going to see for myself. This comes under the heading of research. If it is this easy to make friends and carry on a conversation with people at one o'clock in the morning, when they are engaged in something that is a criminal offence—well, it seems to me that this just does not happen. I am quite sure it does not happen.

I believe that we have here another case in which the evidence has been prepared. I have no particular objection to this divorce being granted, but I have every objection to the members of this committee being used in this particular way. I have satisfied myself from reading the evidence that the only child who is under age is being taken care of properly and I think the wife can take care of herself. It has been pointed out that the respondent is not a very good artist. He does not work steadily and he has had trouble paying the $75.

The Chairman: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Bill reported.

LARRY ORSA

The house in committee on Bill No. SD-40, for the relief of Larry Orsa—Mr. McCleave—Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Howard: Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, I had better make sure that I return the notes from the last case so I will be relating my notes to the evidence that is before us and not to some other petition. I do not know that it would make much difference, in any event, because most of these cases are of a stereotyped nature, as has been ably demonstrated by the hon. member for Timiskaming, and as has been shown in practically every bill with which we have dealt up to this time. The evidence is obtained in a certain, set pattern, and the case before us is no exception except that the investigators in this instance really got their wires crossed when it came to giving evidence of what they had seen at the particular place where the adultery was alleged to have been committed.

In this instance the couple were married on February 14, 1953 and the adultery is alleged to have taken place on June 20, 1959. These allegations are shown in the petition, and proof of the marriage is given when the petitioner is shown a document which he identifies as his marriage certificate. In this instance we will not run contrary to the ruling of the Chair and the rules of the committee in so far as the discussion of children is concerned because there are no children as a result of this particular marriage. I assume that since that is the case we will have to come to our own conclusions as to whether or not the marriage was consummated. There is some comment in the evidence about that.

Some strange things did take place. I should like, if I may, to make reference to some of them by reading the evidence and relating portions of the evidence to other portions of the evidence concerning the circumstances and relationships between the husband and wife. The petitioner is being questioned by Mr. Usher, who is counsel in this instance for the petitioner, and they talked about the husband and wife living together. This continued from the time of the marriage until April, 1957 and then Mr. Usher says:

Q. What happened then?
A. Well, we were quite happily married until the year 1957, but previous to the day she left me life was quite different at home so I did not have the affection I used to have before. She used to come in quite late at night and I tried my best to help her and to see what was going on. She was carrying on night after night coming home later from work. She used to work for her father to which I objected and she said I am just helping my father, but I realized that was not right because she was coming late at nights and giving me all kinds of excuses and I tried to find out where she was going and she was not going to the movies where she said she was and therefore I asked her what was the matter. Then in April one day she said "I am going to tell you frankly I don't love you any more, I don't want to be with you, I want to leave you". I said, "Well, after all, it has been four years we spent together and now you want to leave me". She said, "I am sorry, I don't love you any more, I don't want you any more". I said, "Listen, let us do something to help ourselves, I was good to you, what is the matter?" And she said, "I am sorry but that is it". The next day when I came back from work the lady took all her belongings and she left home.

This is only part of it, but here there is an indication that the petitioner, prior to the wife leaving home, was concerned and wanted to effect a reconciliation. There is evidence about it later on, too. Another question is asked:

Q. Did you later find out where she went to?
A. Yes, I phoned her father at his residence and asked him where she was.

So apparently her father had told him where she was because he answered the query by saying yes.

Q. Did you later find out where she went to?
A. Yes, I phoned her father at his residence and asked him where she was.
Q. Did she ever come back to the home since then?
A. No, sir, I asked her several times to come back but she did not want to.
Q. What eventually developed?

There is more reference to these attempts to effect a reconciliation.

A. Well, I had been calling her up several times to come back and to help me in the house, and all she said was that she did not want to talk to me, that that was the finish. I called her several times more in 1958—

You will notice the use of the words "several times" in both years, I assume in 1957 and in 1958.

—and asked her if she wanted something in the way of help but she said, "I am quite happy and I am working and I don't want anything from you."

Later on the chairman, Senator Roebuck, made some inquiry about this self-same subject matter as follows:

Q. You had a number of conversations with her. Did she ever tell you what she was doing?

A. No. She said she loved somebody else and she did not want to be with me any more. I asked her who is it.

Q. Did she tell you who it was?

A. No, she would not tell me.

Q. Or where she was living or what she was doing?

A. No, she would never tell me, she said, "Don't bother me and don't call me any more."

Then they make reference to collusion with which I will deal later on but at this stage I want to confine my remarks to this bit of evidence here. You will notice, Mr. Chairman, that the petitioner says that on a number of occasions—several times in 1957 and several times in 1958—he phoned her or called her, that he phoned her father and from her father found out where she had gone. We assume that he found out where she was living or where she was working or something of that nature. As I said, he called her several times wanting to effect some reconciliation, wanting to see whether the difficulties could be smoothed over. But then when he is asked by Senator Roebuck whether he knew where she was living he says, "No, she would never tell me where she was living or what she was doing". It seems a bit odd that a person who is this much concerned—and I am not suggesting there is anything untoward in his evidence or in the manner of the presentation of it—who phoned her father and discovered where she was living, and had phoned her several times over a period of two years, should turn around and say that he does not know where she was living or what she was doing, —and that is what his evidence is here—that she would not tell him. If a person is that much interested in and that desirous of effecting a reconciliation of a disrupted marriage such as this man has been, and phones her several times and knows where her father is, it seems strange that he was either unable or unwilling, whatever the case may be, to take the next obvious step and find out where she was living or where she was working. However that may be, this is the evidence that is contained here.

I should now like to turn to the evidence about adultery. Mr. Gerard Daigneault and Mr. Jerry Brault are co-investigators in this particular case. They worked together and discovered that certain things existed. Starting at the bottom of page 11 Mr. Daigneault was asked some questions by Mr. Usher, counsel for the petitioner:

Q. I understand you were engaged to investigate the conduct of the respondent in this case,—?

And the name of the respondent is given.

A. Yes.

Q. Will you look at this picture filed as exhibit 2 and state if you recognize the person shown in it?

A. That is Mrs.—.

[Mr. Howard.]

And he gives the name of the respondent.

Q. Will you tell the committee the result of your investigation?

A. Our services being retained by you during the middle of May, 1959, at which time you furnished us with that photograph here and also gave us some particulars, and I found Mrs.—

And he gives the name of the respondent.

—to be living at—

And he gives the particular address.

—with a man.

Then the chairman, Senator Roebuck—a dear friend with whom I have had some conversation in the newspapers and probably will have some more—says this:

Wait a minute. That is a conclusion that you are drawing.

Then the senator asks this question:

Q. You found her living at—.

And that particular address is given. The question continues:

Tell us what you saw and heard.

A. As a result of this investigation, on June 20, 1959, at approximately 11.30 p.m., accompanied by Mr. Brault, we both proceeded to—

And this particular address and apartment number are given.

—where after knocking on the door a few times—

I notice that he is a little bit more up to date than are some of the other people. He has to knock a few times in order to get an answer.

—the door was opened by a man and at that time he was wearing blue pants and the top of his underwear and black shoes.

This colour combination had some relevancy—the blue pants and the black shoes—with which I will deal later on.

I identified myself to him and asked to speak to Mrs.—.

And the name of the respondent is given. The witness continues:

This fellow could not understand English very well and I asked him what nationality he was afterwards and he told me, Greek. So finally by asking him and showing him the picture we understood each other. So I walked into the apartment and there on an open studio couch used as a bed was Mrs.—

And the name of the respondent is given.

—lying on the righthand side of the bed. I asked her if she was Mrs.—

And he gives her married name.

—and she said yes, she was, and I showed her the photograph and she identified the photograph as of herself.

Then Senator Roebuck asked this question:

Q. She identified it as hers?

A. Yes, as her photograph. I told her she would be hearing, and I told this to the man too, from the real husband's attorney in the near future. I asked the man for his name and he answered—

And he gave them a name, the name of the corespondent.

Q. Did he spell it for you?
A. That is the way he gave it to me.

I therefore assume he did not spell it. Then Mr. Usher asked the condition of the respondent.

Q. What condition was she in, what clothing was she wearing?
A. When I spoke to her in the bed and she sat up she had on the upper part of blue and white pajamas.

If you will allow me to transgress for just a moment, I should like to ascertain whether this is what Mr. Brault discovered also, that she was wearing blue and white pajamas. From a quick look it does not seem as though he noticed what she was wearing. In any event, there was only one bed in the room. It was a one-room apartment. It was a studio affair that opens out into a bed. This was at 11.30 in the evening and there were only a few clothes that they noticed. Then Mr. Jerry Brault was called as a witness and sworn and was asked these questions by Mr. Usher:

Q. Mr. Brault, were you in the company of the previous witness, Mr. Daigneault, on the night of June 20, 1959?
A. Yes.
Q. Would you look at this photograph which has already been filed as exhibit No. 2 and state who that is?
A. That is Mr.—

Then he gives the name of the petitioner. There must be something wrong here unless they got the photographs mixed up in this case also. I suggest that when you get up in your eighties it is possible for this to happen. Exhibit 2 is supposed to be a picture of the wife, yet Mr. Brault identifies it as a picture of the husband or the petitioner. This is not the only error or confusion which exists in his mind as to what occurred on that evening. He is asked:

Would you state what happened that evening?
A. I accompanied Mr. Daigneault—on June 20, 1959 on a Saturday night. Mr. Daigneault knocked at the door and a man came and opened the door wearing grey pants and the top of his underwear and brown shoes.

Here we have Mr. Brault, one of the investigators identifying the picture as somebody that it is not. We are not seeing too clearly. We have him giving us identification of clothing worn by the respondent, namely that he is wearing grey pants and brown shoes, when Mr. Daigneault, the other investigator, says he was wearing blue pants and black shoes. There is a mix-up as to what was actually worn by the individual. Then he goes on:

Mr. Daigneault identified himself and asked to talk to him inside, so we walked in the room. Mr. Daigneault told the man that we wanted to see the woman who was in bed on the open couch. So Mr. Daigneault went beside the bed and asked the woman her name, and she admitted she was Mrs. —and admitted the picture in our possession was her picture.

I would assume it is a typographical error when he identifies the picture earlier as that of the petitioner, when it is in fact the picture of the wife. I do not think we can attribute to any typographical error the difference betweeen blue and grey and black and brown when it comes to identifying the clothing worn by the person who came to the door. Both these gentlemen, Mr. Daigneault and Mr. Brault, appeared as investigators and witnesses in a number of other cases, and in all probability they will appear as witnesses and investigators in a number of other cases as time goes on. They should certainly know if they are paying attention to what they are doing that they should develop their perceptibility and notice things they desire to notice about which they know they will have to give evidence if and when they appear before the Senate committee. Unless they have become so used to these particular cases being given just cursory examination in their passage through this house and the other place, and unless by habit they have fallen into error of being sloppy in their obtaining evidence—

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I let my hon. friend go unchallenged when he made a very snide remark about the chairman of the committee of the other place, but I do not think it is justice that a gentleman in that house should put up with that sort of language. It is a definite breach of the rules of the house, because as the hon. member knows one must not reflect upon the conduct of people in the other place who are not, above all, here to defend themselves. Two very serious remarks have been made. One was a very snide reference to a person over the age of 80 and then a remark about sloppiness, and I hope my hon. friend will have the grace to withdraw both those statements.

Mr. Howard: If I could speak to the point of order, Mr. Chairman, I would point out that I made no reference to the chairman of the committee of the other place.

Mr. McCleave: You did.

Mr. Howard: My hon. friend says I did. He has had his opportunity to raise his point of order and speak to it. He knows the rules are such that he can speak again to the point of order. So will he let me finish what I am saying and we will go on from there, if he wants to go further, and get into more difficulty than we are already. I made no reference to that. I made reference to these particular investigators being sloppy in the manner in which they obtained and presented their evidence, because as my hon. friend from Halifax knows, and as every hon. member of this committee knows, this is the first time that an extensive examination has been made by members of this house of evidence of this nature.

I would think that if more careful examination were given by members of this house in committee of the whole or in the house itself to these bills when they came before it this situation would not have developed and investigators would be more on their toes when they appeared before the Senate committee to give evidence. There are cases where investigators—I am not prepared to mention their names at the moment but I have positive proof of this—have either made damned fools of themselves or perjured themselves. And proof is there by way of conflict of evidence.

That is what I meant when I said that investigators are becoming sloppy, and I think an extensive examination of the evidence in case after case will be an indication that if parliament is going to continue hearing these cases—and I say it should not; I think there should be some other method whereby these difficulties are resolved—they should insist on the investigators being a little more careful in the manner in which they obtain and present their evidence to the house.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, may I speak again to the point of order, which I thought we were on. Rule No. 35 of the standing orders of the House of Commons provides:

> No member shall speak disrespectfully of Her Majesty... nor use offensive words against either House, or against any member thereof—

The hon. member, in my submission, has offended twice against that rule and has not withdrawn gracefully or otherwise either of his remarks which he directed particularly against the chairman of the Senate divorce committee. We all heard him make reference to that gentleman a few moments ago and the record of Hansard will bear out that his remarks about sloppiness were not directed, as he said, to the detectives but to another house. In both instances I submit he is offending against rule 35.

Mr. Howard: If I may make a comment, Mr. Chairman, I made reference to people over eighty, that is quite true. I would point out that this particular case was heard by the number one subcommittee on divorce. Present were the Hon. Senators Roebuck, chairman, Farquhar, Golding and Lambert. The ages of these gentlemen, which I have taken from the parliamentary guide, are as follows. Hon. Senator Roebuck is 82; Hon. Senator Farquhar is 85; Hon. Senator Golding is 80; Hon. Senator Lambert is 75. So my reference to "over eighty" could apply to three of them. I made no specific reference to the chairman of the committee.

Second, if I could develop this point of order which has been raised, I say again and again that the manner in which the House of Commons has dealt with divorce petitions in the past, as every hon. member of this house knows, is to pass them en bloc 50 or 100 at a time without giving any consideration to them. It is true that we have a miscellaneous private bills committee and it is true that that committee considers the evidence before each case. How carefully they consider it I know not, but I would imagine—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): You never attend.

Mr. Howard: I am not a member of the committee.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): And no other C.C.F.'er is.

Mr. Howard: Thanks for the invitation. I will ask our whip to contact yours and I will become a member of the committee. I have never yet had an invitation to be a member. Oh yes, the hon. member may be used to rushing in where he is not invited, but I like to be invited. I thank the hon. member for the invitation and if the house is pleased tomorrow afternoon to pass a motion accordingly I would be pleased to sit on the committee.

Mr. Morris: All you have to do is to ask your own leader.

Mr. Howard: We do not work in the same way as you—"what the leader decides". We are individuals in a democratic party.

Mr. Morris: Why did you not get on the committee?

Mr. Howard: The more questions the hon. member asks, the more he indicates he knows little about the subject matter. There are only a certain number of members established for each committee and on that number depends how many members each party may have on that committee. We have two members on that committee.

Mr. Morris: You cannot persuade one of them to give you his place?

Mr. Howard: I will try, because I have been invited to.

The Chairman: I think I should deal with the point of order which was raised by the hon. member for Halifax. The rule is clear that hon. members may not use offensive language against either house or members thereof. I do not say that a reference to the age of members of the other place is necessarily offensive, but there is certainly an implication, and I would say that the words used by the hon. member were not beyond criticism and I would ask him to avoid any reference to the other place. The evidence may be discussed, but I do not think the manner in which it is collected should be discussed.

Mr. Howard: Very well, Mr. Chairman. I still think the evidence given by these persons indicates an extreme amount of sloppiness on the part of the investigators. I trust this observation will not offend the delicate ear of the hon. member for Halifax or yourself, Mr. Chairman. I admit that in the past I have myself been negligent in considering bills of this particular type. I have been negligent in my duty as a member of parliament. The first session I was here I became a member of the miscellaneous private bills committee, and when I discovered that the committee spent almost its whole time dealing with divorce I said: I will not have any part of that, because I do not think it is a proper function of a member to do so. Later on, I began to wonder. I thought: maybe I have been derelict in my duty in not dealing with these cases. I think most hon. members of this house have been derelict in their duty in not paying attention to the evidence before them on this subject. We are passing laws dissolving marriages and we should give them extensive study. A ridiculous situation arises if we do not give extensive study to these cases—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Howard: Suppose we do not give extensive study to this particular case, and the bill is passed. It becomes law, and the marriage is dissolved. What would happen if one year from now, for the sake of argument, one of the parties were to come along and say: this divorce was obtained by perjury? Do hon. members think parliament would then turn around and repeal the bill which was passed dissolving the marriage? What a silly situation we would face then. The marriage would have been dissolved, and if the parties concerned got married in the meantime then, legally, they would be married to two husbands or wives. That is why it is so necessary for this committee to give extensive consideration to these cases, and it is in stressing this point that I say once again that the two investigators in this particular case were very sloppy in their presentation of evidence, especially when one says the man involved was wearing blue pants and the other says he was wearing grey pants and brown shoes—

The Chairman: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Peters: Since the hon. member for Skeena was not able to complete the point he was making, I am happy to say something on this particular point in order—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): In order to continue this sickening farce.

Mr. Peters: That is a remarkable statement. If the hon. member wishes to say anything I should be glad to sit down and allow him to say it.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I am not prepared to say anything.

Mr. Peters: You are not prepared to say anything at any time, so keep your mouth shut.

Mr. Harkness: You are a great example of parliament.

Mr. Peters: Sitting right behind you.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I would not get down to the level of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Peters: I suggest the hon. member is low already.

In this particular case we have heard a discussion on the evidence which was given and the discrepancies which exist in that evidence. I do not believe the evidence should be stereotyped and that everybody should have it down pat and written out, but I think there are certain considerations that should be taken into account, and that there should be some agreement. The investigators had to establish certain things, and if they made a mistake in one particular, perhaps that was an honest mistake. But in this particular case it would appear that when they discussed what this man was wearing they tried as far as possible to avoid saying the same thing in any particular. In the one case, the door was opened by a man wearing blue pants, the top of his underwear and black shoes. The assistant, asked the same question, said the man came to the door wearing grey pants, the top of his underwear and brown shoes. The only agreement was that he was wearing the top of his underwear. I suggest that the colour of the shoes may have been difficult to determine, but it is surprising the investigators should have mixed up the colour of the other garments.

Moreover, they did not indicate that adultery had taken place or that any adultery was taking place. They ended by saying that the man could not speak English very well.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Sounds like the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Peters: That may be true, but I am at least capable of standing on my feet to say what I want to say, rather than sitting on my back end. If the hon. member would stick to finance, he would do a lot better.

They carried on a conversation in English, I presume. The evidence states, in a series of questions and answers by Senator Roebuck:

Q. You did not speak to this man at all about whether or not he was living with this woman as man and wife?

A. I did, sir, but actually I mean it was hard to speak to him because he could not very well speak good English, but I tried to make myself understood. When we left he told me that he had been living with her for the past five or six months.

I submit that that is the conclusion they came to; it is not substantiated by the evidence, and this evidence in the nature of things follows the pattern we have seen established in almost every case which has come before us in the last month or so. The transcript states:

So I walked into the apartment and there on an open studio couch used as a bed was Mrs. Orsa lying on the righthand side of the bed. I asked her if she was Mrs. Larry Orsa and she said yes, she was, and I showed her the photograph and she identified the photograph as of herself.

By the Chairman (Senator Roebuck):

Q. She identified it as hers?

A. Yes, as her photograph. I told her she would be hearing, and I told this to the man too, from the real husband's attorney in the near future. I asked the man for his name and he answered Jimmie Botsaris.

Q. Did he spell it for you?

A. That is the way he gave it to me.

By Mr. Usher:

Q. What condition was she in, what clothing was she wearing?

A. When I spoke to her in the bed and she sat up she had on the upper part of blue and white pajamas.

By the Chairman (Senator Roebuck):

Q. What was the condition of the bed otherwise?

A. The left-hand side of the bed had been occupied, the pillow had an impression on it; it seemed like somebody else had slept in the bed.

Even if we take the evidence at face value, all that the detective is saying is that the left-hand side of the bed was occupied. He is drawing a conclusion of his own not substantiated by fact. He does not conclude, and rightly so, that the bed was slept in by the man who was in the apartment at the time.

This is the stereotyped evidence given by the detective. If the man had stated that he had lived with the woman for six or seven months for the purpose of enabling her to obtain a divorce it is likely the Senate would not have granted it.

Late on Saturday night the second questioner knocked on the door and asked to be admitted inside and walked into the room. The man who answered the door probably could not have said "Yes" or "No" because of his lack of understanding of English. The evidence continues:

[Mr. Bell (Carleton).]

I accompanied Mr. Daigneault—on a Saturday night. Mr. Daigneault knocked at the door and a man came and opened the door wearing grey pants and the top of his underwear and brown shoes. Mr. Daigneault identified himself and asked to talk to him inside, so we walked in the room. Mr. Daigneault told the man that we wanted to see the woman who was in bed on the open couch. So Mr. Daigneault went beside the bed and asked the woman her name, and she admitted she was Mrs. Larry Orsa and admitted the picture in our possession was her picture.

By the Chairman (Senator Roebuck):

Q. What picture is that?

A. The picture we had, exhibit No. 2. They both admitted they were living there for about six or seven months at the same address, and Mr. Daigneault asked the man's name, and he said: "Jimmy Bostaris." He had a hard job to talk English. Mr. Daigneault told both of them they would hear from her husband's attorney in the near future, and we left the house.

By Mr. Usher:

Q. How many beds were there?

A. One open couch which showed to have been occupied by two persons.

Q. It was a one-room apartment?

A. Yes, a one-room apartment.

This evidence would lead you to almost any conclusion you might wish to arrive at. There is prima facie evidence that the two people had been living together. The evidence could lead you to conclude that there was an arrangement between the parties and that there was collusion for obtaining the divorce. On the other hand, the evidence could also lead you to believe that the woman lived on her own. This detective has been involved in other cases where we have concluded there was collusion—

Mr. McCleave: Would my hon. friend permit a question? Would he name one instance. The hon. gentleman is very free in his use of allegations. I invite him to name just one instance. Smear, smear, smear.

Mr. Peters: We have had a number of these cases in which Mr. Daigneault was involved. I suggest they have all been the same.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Name one instead of smearing; name just one.

Mr. Peters: I do not keep the names of all past bills in my head.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): You have nothing in your head.

Mr. Peters: I am pleased to find the Postmaster General coming in with his nonsense. In view of the way he runs his department he is in no position to talk about anybody else. If he would look after the mail and prevent thefts he would be kept busy. I want to make it clear that I do not want to be Postmaster General—

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Do not worry, you are getting further away from it every day.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): You will not even be a member of parliament for very long.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): You have to be in parliament to be Postmaster General and you will not be here after the next election.

Mr. Peters: Someone may push me into it as they did you. Perhaps my town will need to be represented as yours did. It may be.

The hon. member for Halifax has asked a serious question and I can give two or three instances. I would be happy to name cases in which Mr. Daigneault was involved. I will get the evidence and bring it to the house the next time we discuss these bills. I will be happy to present this information to the sponsor of this bill. I wish now to call it ten o'clock.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the house leader if there is any change in the order of business which was announced before the Easter recess?

Mr. Churchill: No, Mr. Speaker, there is no change. Perhaps I might repeat it for the record. I will name eight items for consideration this week: (1) Second reading of Bill No. C-56, an act to amend the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act; (2) Second reading of Bill No. C-57, an act to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act; (3) the resolution in the name of the Prime Minister dealing with the tenure of office of judges; (4) the motion in the name of the Prime Minister to set up a select committee on the procedure of the house; (5) the motion in my name to set up a select committee to consider the national research council and other matters; (6) the budget resolutions; (7) the estimates of the Department of Agriculture; and if by a great stroke of good luck all this happens to be finished we would then take the estimates of the Post Office Department.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the house leader if any provision has been made before the departure of the Prime Minister for the conference in London for a discussion of the question of apartheid as raised by the Leader of the Opposition?

Mr. Churchill: Yes, Mr. Speaker. On Monday, April 11, the Leader of the Opposition asked the Prime Minister a question with regard to this. The Prime Minister said that after the Easter recess the government would give consideration to the suggestion of the Leader of the Opposition. The thought at the moment is that on Wednesday an opportunity would be given for a discussion of that problem.

It being two minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

8. The following is a summary of the actions which have been taken by the civil aviation branch of the Department of Transport:

The suggestions put forward by the board that the Department of Transport consider licensing of air carrier dispatchers has been thoroughly investigated by the department, and the conclusion has been reached that licensing of air carrier dispatchers in Canada is not desirable at this time. This view is supported by the Canadian air line pilots association and the air industries and transport association.

The recommendation that the Department of Transport institute regulations with respect to limiting hours of duty of flight crews has been under consideration for some time by a committee representing the Department of Transport and the industry.

The board has noted that in the weight and balance manifest of CF-MCF, there was no allowance or provision for the weight of the various articles in the commissary such as food, drink, eating utensils, etc., and has recommended that "a proper allowance be made in the weight and balance manifest of the aircraft for every item on board regardless of its weight". Air carrier inspectors have been directed to ensure that adequate provision is made by the major air carriers under their jurisdiction for including such items as commissary, tool boxes, extra equipment, spare parts, etc., in the load computation.

The board has recommended that "in all cases of secondhand aircraft imported for commercial operations a close check be made of the standard of their previous maintenance and service, modification status and recording, major changes to role, weight and balance and that the said aircraft be weighed before being put into operation".

Before formal registration and issue of a Canadian certificate of airworthiness, the aircraft has to be examined by a Canadian aircraft maintenance engineer or approved maintenance organization and certified as airworthy and in compliance with the pertinent specifications. The weight and balance report is then examined by this department for approval or otherwise.

APPENDIX

SPEECH BY RIGHT HON. JOHN G. DIEFENBAKER, P.C., Q.C., M.P., PRIME MINISTER OF CANADA AT A STATE LUNCHEON IN HONOUR OF PRESIDENT DE GAULLE, AT THE CHATEAU LAURIER, APRIL 19, 1960—REPLY BY GENERAL DE GAULLE, OTTAWA, APRIL 19, 1960

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker: Mr. President, Madame de Gaulle, distinguished guests, my first words must be to welcome you here as we gather to do honour to the President of France and I want to say to you at once, sir, within the hours that have passed since your arrival here, you must have felt the degree of Canada's regard and affection for you as the great leader of one of Canada's mother countries.

And most of what I say will be in the English language because I seem to recall that Sir Winston Churchill on a recent occasion when you conferred upon him the Cross of Lorraine stated that while in the days of war he did speak in French but the days of war were over and therefore he would only speak in English for the benefit of those that were listening to him. However, I do want to welcome you in a few words in the other official language.

(Translation)

Fifteen years ago the Canadian people welcomed the President of the provisional government of the French republic. Earlier in the war we had acclaimed the president of the French committee of national liberation. Today we welcome the President of the French republic and community. Now as before, however, it is to General de Gaulle that we offer our respect and admiration. We are happy to welcome you, as well as Madame de Gaulle who represents, in our eyes, the women of France with all their fine qualities of the heart and mind.

During those fifteen years France has recovered her elan; under your direction, France is a vital, dynamic and prosperous country which again holds the position she deserves among the great nations.

(Text)

Mr. President, when you visited London earlier this month Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth, who is our Queen, said to you that Britain and France were joined to Canada and the United States by ties of history, culture and language.

May I illustrate how truly and unforgettably Her Majesty's words applied to Canada.

Only a few acres from where you sit now, Mr. President, walked the sons of France, who more than three centuries ago began this nation's days—explorers like Samuel de Champlain, to whose memory stands a monument on a nearby cliff and missionaries like the immortal Jean de Brebeuf, who on his way to martyrdom camped for three days only a few miles from this spot; and those equally heroic souls, Father Gabriel Lalement and Father Jogues.

These were the men, Mr. President—and there were many others—who brought to this land and carried to its farthest frontiers the eternal verities of civilization—the men who in regions of darkness and terror and awful solitude endured for France and their faith—the men of whom the historian Parkman wrote:

> Men steeped in antique learning, pale with the close breath of the cloister, here spent the noon and evening of their lives, ruled savage hordes with a mild parental sway and stood serene before the direct shapes of death.

These were the men—the sons of France, of our first Canadian story—their treasurable contribution in our memories forever.

We remember, and will remember forever, that dread hour in 1940 when you, a lonely and desperate figure of destiny, clarioned the world for France and for freedom—that clarion call which, as Her Majesty said truly to you in London, matched the winged words of Sir Winston Churchill.

And we remember, too, sir, how in the long dark days which followed, those days when liberty was under siege, those days which tried through and through every quality and mystery of the human spirit, you stood as France incarnate, the valiant trustee of her ancient glory.

There is our remembrance that in the soil of France tens of thousands of our sons rest in the quiet of God's acre—our sons who, in two world wars, went out from us into the night for freedom. In many hundreds of plots throughout the hills and valleys of France lie our dead, in resting places dedicated forever to their memory and cared for tenderly by the people of France.

Those are our memories. Those are the thoughts that come to us on this day. You have truly brought a new strength to France at home and abroad. By your compatriots you have been entrusted with the responsibility of restoring the stability of the French state; through the courageous application of your powers, France is firmly embarked on a brilliant renaissance. You have opened the door to an honourable settlement in Algeria; and, in territories where the tricolor has flown for generations, you have been the builder of the community of independent states joined by a common loyalty to the traditions and ideals of democracy.

This visit is an important one in that it has provided an opportunity for a continuation of the discussions between us which began in Paris in November 1958. The intervening months have been fateful for our civilization. We are approaching a stage of decision, a time when the quality of leadership will be submitted to its sternest test. Personal contacts on the highest level have been multiplying since our last meeting and have been an essential preliminary to the formal meeting of chiefs of state and heads of government which you will attend in Paris a month hence. Although not a participant at the summit, Canada has none the less a vital concern with the outcome. We will be following with intense interest the discussions that take place and the decisions that are made.

Today in our discussions we have examined together the outlook for peace. You have learned something of the elements of our thinking on the great issues of foreign policy. None of them is greater than an end to the arms race with its financial burdens on national economies and all its grave dangers that armaments mean to peace. France and Canada are partners in the search for a disarmament agreement as members of the ten nations committee now meeting in Geneva. Our objective, as is your objective, is peace. I express the hope that if out of the summit comes a new understanding as between west and east and a realization that the insane waste of armaments must end, we may yet see the day when east and west may join together, join together in a major step forward, first in reducing armaments and secondly in raising the standards of men everywhere in a world offensive against poverty.

I can't express to you, sir, what this meeting has meant to my colleagues and myself, as you honoured us today by meeting with us in our cabinet. We will always have those disagreements, even the best families do, misunderstandings take place but above everything else, the leaders of the free world dare not forget that the consistent and continuing consultation at a high level is necessary at all times to assure the most effective cooperation and that unity which has been so apparent during your visit here and meant so much to me, when you honoured Canada in November 1958, when my wife and I were with you in Paris.

Canada honours you as the wartime soul of France and a realistic and idealistic statesman of his country's restored strength and power.

For these reasons, Mr. President, because of what you are, what you have been, and what you represent, and because you come to us as a tried ally and friend, on behalf of the Canadian people I salute you with admiration, and for them say to you with the heart of all Canadians, "Vive la France".

Mr. President, you have our full attention.

(Translation)

General de Gaulle: Mr. Prime Minister, the words which you have addressed to me have moved me deeply. In thanking you on behalf of France, I want to tell you of my own impression on coming in contact with Canada.

The first voice I hear in Canada is that of history. France will always pride herself in having brought to your soil, more than four centuries ago, the germs of civilizing progress and the breadth of the Christian spirit. If, later on, other developments and influences made their mark here; if there were rivalries, battles and dismemberments, nevertheless the seed sown by France in Canada grew strong, even though other harvests have also ripened. Briefly, just as one sees water plants rise to the surface, so I feel, rising from the depths of the past, all sorts of ties, attractions and similarities which draw the spirit and the heart of my country very close to those of yours.

This was made abundantly clear during the two world wars. How could we, Frenchmen, ever forget the talents displayed and the prodigious sacrifices of so very many of your soldiers during the first world war on the battlefields of Artois and Flanders, and the heroic ranks of those buried in the soil of France? How could we fail to bear in mind your exemplary participation, during the second world war, in the great battles of Normandy, of Picardy, of Belgium and Germany, which meant the liberation of Europe? How could I fail to keep alive the memories of the two visits I have previously made to Canada, one in 1944 when I saw you straining in your war effort; the other in 1945 on the morrow of victory; while you were already beginning to recover, and you were holding out the hand of help to a ravaged France? I cannot fail, in this regard, to hail the memory of Mackenzie King who led his country, while I was leading mine, through those glorious trials.

And now, how do you appear to us? Materially, a new country, of vast size, mighty resources, inhabited by a hard-working and enterprising people. Politically, a state which has found the means to unite two societies, very different in origin, language and religion; which exercises independence under the British crown and forms part of the commonwealth, which is forging a national character even though spread out over three thousand miles alongside a very powerful federation; a solid and stable state, as proven by the fact that, in the last twenty five years, only three Prime Ministers—my friends, Mackenzie King, Saint-Laurent and Diefenbaker—have headed its government; a state which, far from concentrating only on its internal problems, makes its voice heard and plays an active part in the great affairs of the world. Finally, on the moral plane, Canada appears to us as a people very sensitive on the one hand to an orderly society, and on the other hand to the liberty and dignity of men.

Therefore, be well assured that the country, the entity, the people that you are, arouse the highest interest, sympathy and confidence of France. Not only have Canada and France no dispute over claims or ambitions, no difference of fundamentals, but, on the contrary, the French feel in common accord with Canadians, both in their conception and handling of the problems of our times.

Moreover, France, a country with a thousand years behind her, is also a new country, a country finding herself again, reshaping herself, but whose stability and reviving strength underline still further her world-wide responsibilities, illuminate her ideal—that of desiring for others the same self-determination that she wishes for herself, and which fortifies her resolve to form a vital part of what we, the free peoples, represent.

But what is our objective? In truth, it is peace, even though we realize that, to achieve it, we will have to travel a long and difficult road. In this regard, my country welcomes the approaching meeting of the heads of state commonly referred to as "the big four". France believes that there should first be introduced among these four states—and hence between the two camps of which they are the leading spirits—a relaxing of tensions. This implies the avoidance, at present, of any debating stalemate, and especially of any threat regarding, for instance, the problems of the German people. The matter also calls for at least a beginning to nuclear disarmament, starting with missiles and aircraft that carry atomic weapons, and over which mutual control is still practicable. Finally, there must be organized a basis of co-operation that will transcend political rivalries in the development of needy peoples.

At all events, France believes that the future of peace—and on this hinges survival—depends essentially upon the whole of Europe and upon America, which cradled modern civilization and are its fountainheads. France believes that the existence of opposing systems—assuming that the course of events does not narrow the gap between them—should not prevent peaceful co-existence, failing which nothing could, in the long run, save mankind. France hopes that, in going to the summit, she will enjoy the direct support of vigorous Canada, so worthy and able, and which she holds so close to her heart.

WOOL—ANNOUNCEMENT OF SUPPORT PRICE FOR 1960-61

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): The agricultural stabilization board will support the price of wool produced in Canada for the period April 1, 1960 to March 31, 1961 at 60 cents per pound for the average wholesale price of western range choice, half-blood staple, and eastern domestic, quarter-blood staple combined.

The prescribed price will be approximately 113 per cent of the base price or ten-year average of the two grades, basis f.o.b. Toronto, which is a slightly higher percentage than for the 1959 clip for which the prescribed price was approximately 110.5 per cent of the ten-year average. The support price for the 1959 clip resulted in the board making a deficiency payment of 21 cents per pound on all eligible graded wool.

The support price for 1960 is the same as that provided for the 1959 clip. It is considered that this support price is necessary and justified in order to assist the Canadian sheep industry.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NORWAY—ANNOUNCEMENT OF ESTABLISHMENT OF WHEAT FLOUR STOCKPILE

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, by leave of the house I would like to make an announcement about the government's program for assisting NATO countries to set up strategic stockpiles of wheat flour.

Hon. members will recall that on June 1 of last year the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) informed the house, as reported at page 4189 of Hansard, of the government's intention to ask parliament for $10 million for that purpose. He recalled how he had brought forward at the meeting of heads of governments of NATO countries at Paris in December, 1957 a proposal for the establishment of a food bank among the NATO countries for use in the event of an outbreak of hostilities. He expressed at that time the willingness of the Canadian government to play its part in the establishment of such food reserves. The house was made aware of the facts of the matter on July 19, 1958 during the debate on the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Later, in October of that year, 1958, the terms of the Canadian offer were made known in detail to our NATO allies. During the course of last year, as the Prime Minister reported, discussions were carried on with interested countries, but these took longer than we had expected and no agreements were reached in time to enable us to make use of the $10 million voted for the last fiscal year. However, I am now able to announce, and I do so with pleasure, that an agreement was concluded yesterday with Norway under which Canada will provide 20,000 tons of wheat flour later this year for wartime emergency stockpiling purposes in Norway. In due course, when the supplementary estimates of my department for this year come before the house, an item will be included to cover the expenditures that will be involved in this agreement.

The agreement with Norway took the form of an exchange of notes between myself and the Norwegian ambassador. These set out the terms and conditions under which the wheat flour will be provided by Canada and stored by Norway. With your leave I wish to table copies of the notes.

Briefly, the agreement provides that 20,000 tons of flour suitably packaged for long storage will be delivered to Canadian seaports to be specified by the government, and that Norway will inspect and assume title to the flour at those ports with all expenses thereafter being borne by the Norwegian government. They will transport the flour to Norway where they will store it for emergency wartime use. When it is no longer fit for human consumption it will be replaced by Norway either by wheat or wheat flour so as to maintain the original level of the stockpile at 20,000 tons.

I may perhaps add that the ambassador of Norway expressed to me his government's appreciation for Canada's contribution to their food stockpile within the framework of our common NATO defence objectives.

Mr. Speaker, I would now ask leave to table copies of these notes.

Mr. Winch: One other C.C.F. proposal accepted.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all members of the house will greatly welcome the minister's announcement in so far as it refers to arrangements made between Canada and Norway by which we can help in this way a country with which we have worked so closely and constructively over the years in NATO and outside NATO, and which certainly deserves the kind of assistance the minister has mentioned.

However, I regret very much, and perhaps the minister does also, that it has not been found possible to carry out the original proposal, which went far beyond this present arrangement, for the establishment of a food bank in NATO. I would hope that this kind of assistance which is now being extended on a bilateral basis can be developed so that one day we will be able to do this sort of thing collectively inside NATO.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the announcement made by the government has the support of the C.C.F. group in this House of Commons. We feel that this is the right kind of emphasis for a policy undertaken in association with a NATO country. As the days go by I think more and more emphasis should be placed on economic assistance and collaboration rather than on the present excessive emphasis on military matters to the exclusion of important economic questions.

The quantity of wheat involved is not large. It is a relatively small quantity of wheat in terms of the quantity of wheat that Canada has made available in the past by way of economic assistance to the Colombo plan countries and other countries. We welcome this announcement, and we hope the government will consider taking similar action with regard to the Colombo plan countries so that in 1960 by way of economic assistance through the provision of wheat and flour we may at least equal the assistance we provided last year. At the moment we are very far short of doing so.

IRAN—EXPRESSIONS OF SYMPATHY FOR EARTHQUAKE VICTIMS

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as hon. members will have seen in the press, the town of Lars in southern Iran was struck on Sunday, April 24, by an earthquake which, on the basis of news reports, may have caused between 1,500 and 3,000 deaths and extensive property damage. The Canadian representative in Tehran has been instructed to convey to the Iranian government expressions of sympathy in the name of Canada.

I am sure all the hon. members of this house would wish to join me in expressing to the government and people of Iran our sincere condolences over this tragedy, which is evoking the deepest sympathy across Canada. We have been in touch with the Canadian Red Cross, which is making efforts to ascertain whether Canadian help might eventually be required for victims of the disaster. As yet no request for assistance has been received.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I am sure those of us who sit on this side will wish to join the minister in his expression of sympathy in what is obviously a terrible disaster. We feel also that this sympathy would be more impressive if we could follow it up by help through the Red Cross, as suggested by the minister.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): We in this group join with the minister in his expression of sympathy for these most unfortunate people who have suffered as a result of this momentous disaster. Like the leader of the official opposition we trust this sympathy will find material expression in the days ahead.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

STATEMENT ON HOLIDAY AND SEVERANCE PAY

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): A number of hon. members have recently expressed interest in the meetings which have been held lately by the unemployment insurance advisory committee dealing with regulations 172 and 173. I have also received a number of submissions in connection with this matter, and inquiries as to the effect of these regulations. In view of the interest thus shown I would seek the indulgence of the house at this time to make a brief statement.

As the house knows, the regulations were recently considered by the advisory committee, which then reported to the unemployment insurance commission. Following these considerations the matter was reviewed by the government, with the result that the position has now been returned to almost exactly where it stood before September 27 last when the last changes in these regulations were made. Holiday pay will continue to be regarded as earnings in the case of a general plant shutdown for holidays occurring within six weeks of a claimant's separation from employment. Payment for single holidays will continue to be regarded as earnings during a week of unemployment after separation. This will prevent payment of benefits to claimants who are on vacation.

For all other purposes, holiday pay upon separation will revert to the status which prevailed prior to September 27, 1959. Severance pay will no longer be regarded as earnings, and this will apply also to bonuses and gratuities either in lump sums or instalments. Thus to all intents and purposes the situation reverts to what it was before September 27, 1959. The regulations as now amended will be effective as from March 27 last.

UNITED NATIONS

CONFERENCE ON LAW OF THE SEA—DEFEAT OF CANADIAN PROPOSAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he would care to comment on the situation which has arisen at the conference on the law of the sea at Geneva, where the Canadian proposal was defeated yesterday so narrowly.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will have seen the press reports concerning today's vote at the law of the sea conference, at which by the narrow margin of one vote—in fact I think it was a percentage of a vote—the joint Canada-United States proposal failed to gain the necessary two thirds majority. The vote was 54 in favour and 28 against with 5 abstentions.

Efforts were made immediately after the vote to have the proposal reconsidered, but the motion for reconsideration was also defeated by a very narrow margin. As a result the conference has terminated without having arrived at a conclusion of any kind, and the international community is now left without agreement on a rule of law on the territorial sea and fishing limits. Naturally the government will now have to consider what action might have to be taken in the light of this failure.

I should like to pay tribute to Hon. George Drew, who led the Canadian delegation, and all his colleagues for the vigorous way in which they have dedicated themselves during the weeks of the conference and indeed for many months before in working for a formula which would provide for the orderly development of international law in this important field.

During the conference, as hon. members know, we reached a compromise with the United States and together with that country Canada has carried out one of the most extensive diplomatic campaigns we have ever undertaken in an effort to line up the necessary support. We have done everything possible to achieve a positive result. Both those in Geneva and in our missions abroad who worked toward this end deserve the highest commendation.

There has been one feature with regard to the Canada-United States compromise plan which I think has been misunderstood across the country. In the original Canadian plan we advocated a six-mile territorial limit and then a six-mile excluded fishing zone. The United States brought forward the same proposal with the proviso that in the outer six miles the so-called historic rights would continue in perpetuity. Canada has been willing to negotiate bilaterally or on a multilateral basis with countries fishing within twelve miles of our shores for a phasing-out period of these so-called historic rights. The compromise reached was that a ten-year period for phasing-out would be written into the convention.

The inference has been taken by some papers in Canada that we were willing to negotiate for a period beyond ten years; that is to say, perhaps for twenty years. But this was never the intention. We had been willing originally to negotiate for a period certainly not greater than ten years and preferably less; then when the compromise was reached the only change made was that that was to be written right into the convention rather than being negotiated. At no time was there any intention to have the so-called historic rights last for longer than ten years.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. If he does not have the answer readily available perhaps he could take this question as notice. Does the minister know whether any of the nations which have enjoyed these so-called historic rights in Canadian waters voted against the Canada-United States proposal?

Mr. Green: No, Mr. Speaker; I think all the western European countries voted for the Canada-United States proposal.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether in view of the result of the vote the Canadian government is giving any consideration to taking unilateral action under the Canada-United States proposal?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, it would be premature as yet to say what further steps Canada will take. Actually the whole question will have to be given very careful consideration. It might be possible for some sort of convention to be reached among the 54 states that voted in favour of the Canada-United States proposal, but we would have to look into all the implications of advocating a course of that kind. I am not yet in a position to say what we would do.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

MIGRATORY BIRDS—INQUIRY AS TO PROTECTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, as one conservationist to another I want to fire a double-barrelled question, purely for exploratory purposes, to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

My question is based on a report in this morning's Globe and Mail which indicates that a certain Mr. Elmhurst suggests that some of his hardwood timber has suffered considerable loss over the years from the depradations of great blue herons, which are migratory birds. He has been given a permit by someone authorizing him to shoot or otherwise destroy the birds. Since he is a good conservationist he refuses to do this.

My questions are first, who has the authority to issue permits for the destruction of migratory birds? Second, will the minister have this case investigated to make certain of the continued protection of these great blue herons, and also to see whether some arrangements can be made for compensation to this worthy conservationist?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): I should like to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of this question.

Under the Migratory Birds Convention Act and regulations the chief game officer of a province or, in certain circumstances, game officers appointed under the provisions of the act may issue permits for the destruction of migratory birds that are causing or are likely to cause serious damage to crops or other interests.

With regard to the second part, there has been an exchange of correspondence between Ontario and the Canadian wildlife service on this matter. The service has recommended that, when the birds come in the spring, attempts to scare them should first be made. If this is unsuccessful and damage continues, some of the birds could be killed under permit in order to protect this man's property.

I assure the hon. member that we will look into this matter further to ensure the observance of the best interests of the conservation of migratory birds, having regard also for the protection of private property from damage.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL ADVISORY BOARD—STATEMENT ON REQUEST FOR OVERHAUL OF REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, on April 12 the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin) asked me if it was planned to hold a meeting of the federal-provincial advisory board to consider changes in the regulations affecting payment of old age assistance, disability allowances and blind persons allowances.

As I informed the estimates committee on March 8 last, a meeting had in fact already been held, on September 28-29 last year. The changes which were discussed and tentatively agreed to at that meeting have now been circulated in draft form to the provinces, which must indicate their official concurrence before we can proceed further. As soon as the provinces have all given their official approval the draft amendments will be placed before the governor in council for final approval, and I hope this can be done shortly.

NATURAL GAS

REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING CONTROL OF OFF-SHORE RIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Has the minister received any complaints or objections from any of the provinces regarding those parts of the regulations affecting oil and gas development, which he announced several weeks ago, which involve sovereignty over and control of off-shore rights? If so, what is their substance?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, to my knowledge there have been no complaints as yet.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE FAIR

REPRESENTATIVES TO CONFERENCE—REPORTED STATEMENT BY POSTMASTER GENERAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. D. Crestohl (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address two questions to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can the minister inform the house whether the mayor of Montreal has been invited as an official representative to the conference to decide on the world's fair, which is to take place in 1967, being held in Montreal? Can the minister also tell us why the Postmaster General (Mr. Hamilton) announced in Montreal that Canada has a slim chance of having the fair?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Both these questions should be addressed to the Postmaster General, who has responsibility in this matter.

HARBOURS

LAKEHEAD—REPORTED REQUEST FOR STATUS AS OCEAN PORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister received requests from the joint transportation committee of the Fort William and Port Arthur chambers of commerce asking that the lakehead harbour be given the status of an ocean port? If so, can the minister tell the house whether the request is receiving favourable consideration?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. I have received no request of that kind.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ALBERTA—REPORTED PROTEST AGAINST RAILWAY EMPLOYMENT CONDITIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to repeat a question I put to the Prime Minister on April 11, before the Easter recess. It was whether the Prime Minister had received a letter from the brotherhood of maintenance of way employees, Alberta lodge, protesting against the abolition of sections, and also against the drastic cut being made in maintenance of way forces, in which it is urgently requested the Prime Minister use his good offices to inquire into these employment conditions. My question was:

Has the Prime Minister made such inquiry and, if so, with what results?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): My recollection is that I did receive such a letter, and it was acknowledged. Because of the fact that the Minister of Transport reports on these matters on behalf of Canadian National Railways, it was directed to him in order that he might communicate with the railways in the usual course.

Mr. Chevrier: I wonder if I could direct the question to the Minister of Transport. My only reason for asking it of the Prime Minister was that the communication was not directed to the Minister of Transport but to the Prime Minister alone. I wonder if I could ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Transport to ascertain whether these representations made to the Prime Minister by the Alberta lodge were passed on to the Canadian National Railways, and with what result.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): It is my recollection, Mr. Speaker, that I received such representations and that they were passed along to the Canadian National Railways, but I will check on that.

PATENT ACT

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION ON INDUSTRIAL DESIGN AND COPYRIGHT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Acting Secretary of State arising out of the statement he made to the house on April 4, when he tabled the report of the royal commission on patents of inventions, wherein he said that appropriate legislation would not be introduced this session but next session, and that interested persons would have a chance to make submissions. My question is this. Does the same policy apply with respect to the royal commission report on industrial designs and copyright? In other words, is legislation being considered in these fields as well?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Acting Secretary of State): Well, Mr. Speaker, when I tabled the report I made the statement that part of the inquiry was not carried on by the commission. As I said in the statement, the report on trade marks had been brought forward quite recently and there were some amendments, and it was for that reason we did not ask the commission to carry on with its inquiry on trade marks.

In so far as any suggestions are concerned that the public might have in connection with these matters, of course the department is always quite pleased to receive them.

Mr. Argue: I believe the minister misunderstood my question. My question did not have to do with trade marks but was related to the government's action, if any, with respect to the report tabled in this house in 1958 dealing with copyright and industrial design. My question is, is the government taking the the same attitude toward these two reports that it has taken with regard to the report on patents of inventions, namely that interested parties can make submissions on these two questions between now and the next session of parliament and that the government, at the next session of parliament, will consider appropriate legislation?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, that is a question of government policy, and it will be announced in due course.

Mr. Argue: As a supplementary question, may I ask whether the government is giving any consideration to legislation in these two important fields, upon which we have had reports since 1958?

Mr. Balcer: These reports are under consideration.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

INQUIRY AS TO FRENCH NETWORK PROGRAM ON MARSHAL PETAIN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I reiterate a question I asked yesterday in the absence of the Minister of National Revenue. Has the minister been made aware of the fact that on the very day the President of the French republic was in Canada, there was, on the French network of the C.B.C., a program having to do with Marshal Petain? My question was, is the minister aware of this program and, if so, has the C.B.C. offered any explanation to the minister?

[Mr. Argue.]

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): I was made aware of this matter by reading about it in the newspapers. No explanation, if one is possible, has been received from the C.B.C. I have asked for one, and I will be very interested in receiving it and passing it on to the house.

FINANCE

STATEMENT ON SUGGESTED EXPLANATION TO TOURISTS OF U.S. SILVER DISCOUNT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Yesterday in my absence the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Badanai) put forward a suggestion in the form of a question, to the effect that United States tourists entering this country be given some form of letter or document explaining the facts regarding the premium on the Canadian dollar.

I should like to point out to the hon. member that this is a good suggestion, and I appreciate it. However, we have had it in effect now for two years. Approximately a million and a half pamphlets entitled "Friendly Advice to American Tourists" have been given to tourists as they entered the country, through the co-operation of the customs department. In addition we supply copies of this booklet and posters to boards of trade in the cities and towns of Canada, and they distribute them to their members so that United States tourists entering these places of business can get this information from these pamphlets.

The third thing we do is issue a border crossing leaflet which explains the exchange problems and other matters of interest to the tourists in so far as travel in this country is concerned. The total distribution of these three items has amounted to some five million, so there has been a very widespread distribution.

The fourth thing we are doing is co-operating very closely with the Canadian tourist association in its program of public relations to make the tourists more aware of the problems relating to exchange.

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): May I ask a supplementary question. My question was whether the minister was going to write a letter explaining the situation with regard to silver. Two years ago we were not discounting silver.

Some hon. Members: Order.

INDUSTRY

STATEMENT ON PROPOSED HYDROCARBON PIPE LINE TO LAKEHEAD

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yesterday the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Badanai) asked me a question with regard to a proposed hydrocarbon pipe line to the lakehead. As I said yesterday, this is a matter for the national energy board. The board informs me that no application to construct such a pipe line is before them; consequently I cannot answer the second part of the question, which had to do with the building up of a petrochemical industry at the Canadian lakehead in connection with the proposed line. The question is still in the hypothetical stage.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

PENSION PLANS, INCOME TAX ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to address a question to the Acting Secretary of State. On March 23 last the hon. member for Kootenay West moved for the production of papers relating to pension vesting principles. I do not want to cause anyone any undue excitement or activity, but would the minister inquire as to when these papers are likely to be produced?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Acting Secretary of State): I will inquire.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF BROADCASTING COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I ask the Minister of National Revenue whether it is his intention at this session to put a motion on the order paper to set up a committee on broadcasting.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Yes, it is my intention.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister, in drafting his motion, have regard to the undertaking he gave to the opposition during the debate in 1958, so as to ensure that the first priority of the committee will be to carry out those inquiries that the minister said would be carried out?

Mr. Nowlan: Of course the scope and nature of the inquiry, subject to the rules, will be in the hands of the committee once it is constituted.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the minister misunderstood my question. I asked him whether in drafting his motion, he would have regard to the undertakings he gave to the house.

Mr. Nowlan: I always have regard to the undertakings I give to the house.

TRADE

STEEL—REPORTED NEGOTIATIONS FOR SALE TO MEXICO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce arising out of the Canadian Press report to the effect that negotiations are being conducted between Canada and Mexico for the sale of $10 million worth of Canadian steel to that country. Can the minister say what progress is being made in these negotiations, and whether the conclusion of such a sale depends on the provision of adequate export credit?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The negotiations are still being carried on, and I do not think it would be appropriate to go into any detail with regard to that matter at the moment.

Mr. Argue: I have a supplementary question. Can the minister comment on the part of the report to the effect that an agreement is likely or is imminent?

Mr. Churchill: Is which?

Mr. Argue: That an agreement is imminent or is likely to be signed almost immediately.

Mr. Churchill: I hope the report is accurate.

Mr. Argue: Does the minister not know? It is his department.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO CHANGE IN METHOD OF REPORTING PROCEEDINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce in his capacity as house leader. I do so because I do not know where else to direct it at the moment. In view of the fact that I have just noticed a Hansard reporter enter the house with a tapewriter in his possession, I wish to ask the minister whether it is the intention to move toward a different system of recording speeches in this house, from that of shorthand notes to the use of tapewriters?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I am told that it is a shorthand machine, not a typewriter.

Mr. Howard: I have a supplementary question. I have just had indicated to me by my friend the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) what the minister said. I did not catch his remark, but I understood him to say it is not a typewriter. I did not say it was a typewriter; I said "tapewriter".

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL TAX-SHARING ARRANGEMENTS ACT

ALTERNATIVE ARRANGEMENTS FOR UNIVERSITY GRANTS—EXTENSION OF INDIVIDUAL INCOME TAX RATE

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-56, to amend the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to repeat anything that was said at the resolution stage of this amendment. That resolution has already been the subject of a two-day debate, on March 18 and again on April 1. The resolution received the unanimous approval of the house. I thank the house for that approval and for the approving comments that were made in connection with the alternative basis proposed in relation to university grants. I hope the house will be able now to accord the same unanimous support to the bill.

Briefly, the bill has two features. The first concerns the increase from 10 per cent to 13 per cent in the provincial share of the yield from the personal income tax. That increase will, by the terms of this bill, become effective now until March 31, 1962.

The second feature of the bill concerns the alternative basis in relation to university grants. The statute as it is proposed to be amended will make provision for the payment of university grants equivalent to $1.50 per head of population in each province. If this bill is adopted, item 125 of the main estimates for the current fiscal year will be withdrawn. In the second place the provision becomes effective now on a statutory basis for two years. Hitherto it has been on an annual basis only, simply by reason of an item in the estimates.

The third comment concerns the alternative method that is now available to any province. The bill also makes provision for power to be given to revise any tax-sharing agreement which any province has entered into in the event that it now desires to resume the collection of the corporation tax for one or both of the two remaining years of the current five-year period under the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act.

I comment on only one matter that was raised in debate at the resolution stage. Attention was drawn to the fact that those who now constitute the government and its supporters in the house did not support this measure when it was introduced by the former administration in 1956; and yet, having come into office, the agreements that were entered into in pursuance of that statute have been continued in force and have been fully recognized by the government.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, we did not support this measure when it was introduced in the house in 1956. Indeed, we voted against it, and we divided the house on the bill. But I would point out, as I have had occasion to do in former debates, that in pursuance of the terms of this enactment, agreements were entered into by the former federal government with nine of the provincial governments. When we came into office and since then we have fully honoured and carried out the terms of those agreements and will, of course, continue to do so during the full period they are in force up to March 31, 1962. We are not the kind of people who repudiate agreements that have been entered into in pursuance of legislation passed by the parliament of Canada. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, we have greatly improved, for the benefit of the provinces, the terms upon which nine provinces entered into these agreements, and we have made those improvements for the benefit of the ten provinces both with respect to the tax rental features of the agreements and the principle of equalization which was written into the bill in order to aid the fiscally weaker provinces.

We made those improvements at the expense of our own federal fiscal position at a time when we were incurring deficits. I point out that this bill, if now adopted, will assure to the provinces for the balance of the present quinquennial period to March 31, 1962, the benefit of the increased federal payments.

Finally, the house is aware that the Prime Minister has invited the premiers of all of the provinces to meet in a plenary dominion-provincial conference to be held in Ottawa on July 25, 26 and 27 next. The continuing committee of officials drawn from both federal and provincial governments, which has done such useful work from which the ministers of finance and provincial treasurers at their meetings held in July and October of 1957 derived much benefit, will be invited to meet in advance of the plenary conference.

The matters to be submitted to the conference will concern financial relations between the dominion and the provinces in the period following March 31, 1962. It is therefore not anticipated that, if the house sees fit to adopt the present bill, further amendments to the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act will be required during the balance of the present period to March 31, 1962.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance stated that there was not much that he intended to add to what had already been said on the resolution. However, he reiterated some of the statements he made on that occasion and added one or two additional remarks which I do not believe change the substance of what he said during the course of the debate on the resolution. So this leaves the position, in so far the as the principle of this bill is concerned, exactly where it was when the discussion on the resolution terminated.

I would like to deal with this bill in several of its aspects, but before doing so I would like to say something with reference to the historical and constitutional aspects of the situation. In 1950 all Canadian universities requested from the federal government financial assistance with respect to their position as it was then found, and these representations were made to the Massey commission. The Massey commission was impressed by the representations which were made to it. It was impressed not only because of the need of the universities at the time and because of the fact that the representations pointed to the responsibility of the federal government in this sphere, but because there is no doubt that without any exception all Canadian universities at the time felt that assistance should be forthcoming.

So in 1951 the Massey commission made representations to this effect to the then government, and the government of Mr. St. Laurent accepted those recommendations and a special item providing for direct federal grants to universities was included in the 1951-52 estimates. All present Conservative members who were sitting on this side of the house at that time supported the measure.

Thereafter consultations were held with the provinces, and as a result of these consultations all provincial governments accepted the idea of direct federal grants to universities for the year 1951-52. So that what appears today to the Quebec Conservatives as a crime committed by the St. Laurent government was approved in the fiscal year 1951-52 first by all Canadian universities, next by all provincial governments, and also by all political parties in this house including the Conservative party. Therefore when the Quebec members accuse the St. Laurent government, they must not forget for one moment that they are also blaming their own party, including, of course, the present Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, who were enthusiastic accessories to the so-called crime of constitutional infringement.

Now I come quickly to 1956. It became evident to the former prime minister, Mr. St. Laurent, in that year that the amount which had been put in the estimates in 1951-52 was not sufficient and that the universities would require greater assistance, including those in the province of Quebec. Mr. St. Laurent therefore proposed to double the grants, and he asked the national conference of Canadian universities to assume the responsibility for distributing the money to each university so as to make sure that any interference by the federal government with the freedom of individual universities would be absolutely impossible.

Again all Canadian universities accepted Mr. St. Laurent's proposal, but this time the Prime Minister added another feature by providing that the funds would accumulate if a university decided to refuse the grants temporarily, and as a result of that provision the sum of $25 million has been accumulated for Quebec universities since 1956. I am sure those universities are today very grateful to Mr. St. Laurent for making that provision, because otherwise it would not have been possible for them to recoup the millions of dollars which then would have been lost.

When the new proposal was introduced in the house by the former government early in 1957 it was again approved by all political parties, including the Conservative party. The Quebec Conservative members should not forget the attitude taken then by their own party. For the second time, in 1957 as in 1952, Quebec universities had to refuse the annual federal grants after having approved the formula. Again they feared retaliatory measures by the Quebec government. This becomes quite evident when we realize that all universities outside Quebec, including French speaking and Catholic institutions, accepted federal assistance. That I think is a point which hon. members on the other side of the house, particularly from the province of Quebec, seem to forget.

This deadlock was also recognized by the present government, which during more than two years in office did absolutely nothing to solve the problem. Last October hon. Mr. Sauve took the initiative and started negotiations with the federal government. Because of his action a solution became possible, and the Minister of Finance acknowledged his contribution when he paid tribute to him in his speech in this house at the resolution stage.

So much for the historical aspect of the situation. I now turn my remarks to the constitutional aspect. Here I state, sir, without any equivocation that there is a clear and profound division of opinion on this question within the ranks of the Conservative party. There is a division of opinion on the one hand in so far as the older members of the Conservative party are concerned and, on the other hand, in so far as the newly elected members from the province of Quebec are concerned. The Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and the older Conservatives maintain that federal grants to universities are perfectly constitutional and that they should continue to be provided. On the contrary the newly elected Conservatives from Quebec argue that such grants are unconstitutional and that they are a clear violation of the constitution.

There is only one group which thus far has remained silent in the house on the issue, and that is the Quebec ministers in the government. Not one of them during the course of these debates which have come up in the house from time to time has had a word to say on this very important subject. The Solicitor General (Mr. Balcer), the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. O'Hurley), the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Comtois) and the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sevigny) have never uttered a word on this important matter in the house. As representatives of the province of Quebec in the cabinet they have a clear obligation to participate in this debate, and they must now define their attitude in this respect.

The Quebec ministers cannot avoid the issue. This bill provides for federal grants to universities, and they will have to take a definite stand when they vote on it. The only honourable course for them to follow under such conditions, it seems to me—and I say this with all deference—is to define and justify their attitude before they express it by their vote. Therefore we shall anticipate their participation in this debate with great interest.

I said a moment ago that the views of the older Conservatives were that federal grants to universities were perfectly constitutional. This cannot be disputed in any way whatsoever when one considers the attitude which was taken in 1951 and 1957 when those hon. members were in opposition; and since they have become members of the present government the introduction of this bill, for that matter, is another manifestation of those views which were clearly expressed by the Minister of Finance in this house on September 6, 1958 and again on March 18, 1960. The minister spoke in French when he said:

(Translation):

This government scrupulously respects the terms of the Canadian constitution and will always do. It is plainly recognized that education is a field of jurisdiction exclusively assigned to the provinces. The increased grants proposed by the government are merely a needed assistance to universities without any interference in any provincial field intended by the government.

(Text):

This can be found on page 2227 of Hansard. Such a statement could not be simpler or more clear, for the Minister of Finance, speaking twice on behalf of the present government, said that federal grants constitute a necessary assistance to universities and that the government does not thereby intervene in any provincial field. The Liberal party has expressed exactly similar views since 1951. The difference between ourselves and the Conservative party is that we have had the honesty and courage to make this statement from one end of the country to the other, including the province of Quebec. This is exactly what I said when I spoke in the house on July 18, 1959, as will be found on page 6678 of Hansard, and I quote:

(Translation):

Since they were established in 1951 we have always said that such grants were constitutional.

(Text):

For having said exactly what the Minister of Finance stated on September 6, 1958 and repeated on March 18, 1960, the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Dorion) chose to attack me as appears at page 2809 of Hansard, when he spoke on the resolution preceding this bill on April 1, 1960. I have only one question to ask the hon. member for Bellechasse, and it is this. Why did he not have the courage to attack the Minister of Finance and his own party when he spoke in the house on April 1, instead of attempting to convince the house that he was opposed only to the point of view adopted by the Liberals?

The Minister of Finance made a very important statement twice in this house; that the federal government is not intervening in a provincial field when it makes university grants. I hope that in the course of this debate the Quebec Conservative members will address their constitutional objections to him, and ask the Minister of Finance to justify the position he holds in this respect. Even the hon. member for Bellechasse was at pains, and in an embarrassing position, the other day when asked to reply to a question by my colleague the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill), when he stated that the Quebec government had the constitutional right to give financial assistance to universities outside Quebec. I am in agreement with the hon. member on this; but if the Quebec government can vote —and I quote his words—grants to universities outside Quebec at the request of those universities and with the consent of the governments of those provinces—and this quotation may be found on page 2813 of Hansard —although it has no jurisdiction whatsoever over education outside Quebec, then surely the federal parliament has the prerogative of voting similar grants to universities in any province without interfering in any way with the exclusive right of the provincial legislatures over education. The only constitutional limitations on such federal grants are that the federal government cannot finance them through a specific direct tax, and that it cannot use such assistance to impose compulsory regulations in educational matters or to encroach on the exclusive provincial jurisdiction in that field.

This was the position adopted by Mr. St. Laurent, and it is the position we are taking today. So far as the Liberal party is concerned we shall never tolerate any encroachment into this exclusive provincial field. The newly elected members from the province of Quebec still claim, however, that federal grants to universities are clearly a violation of the constitution.

Mr. Martel: That is true.

Mr. Chevrier: I am interrupted and told that is true. If that is true, I submit that if the hon. member and those associated with him honestly and sincerely hold such a view then they cannot support this measure. If they are of that opinion they cannot support a measure which is unconstitutional.

An hon. Member: This is not a direct grant; that is the difference.

Mr. Chevrier: This provides for federal grants to universities according to the St. Laurent formula, which the hon. member and his friends so violently opposed during the last electoral campaigns in Quebec. The only difference is that this grant, instead of being provided for by a vote in the estimates, will from now on be paid as a statutory item. This change, however, establishes these grants on a much more permanent basis than before. The government has stated its intention, and in fact this intention has been confirmed by the statement the minister made a few moments ago, that these grants will be carried on until March, 1962 notwithstanding the dominion-provincial conference to be held next July.

The fact that Quebec universities will not receive the grants on the basis of the earlier formula does not change the constitutional position in any way. In other words, if a formula is a clear violation of the constitution, the fact that it will not apply in one province does not make it constitutional, and all hon. members of this house have the obligation of preserving the constitution not only in their respective provinces but in the whole of Canada. The Quebec Conservative members, no matter how hard they try, cannot escape this responsibility.

Now I should like to come to the formula which is to be found in the bill, and to discuss it in a general way. I claim that the formula as found in the bill does not solve the constitutional issue which exists at present according to the Quebec Conservative members. On the contrary, as I will show later, it raises new and much more serious constitutional difficulties of its own.

At this stage, however, I should like to show that the new formula, like the present one, provides for federal grants for the purpose of education. The essential difference between the two formulae resides in the fact that they follow two different methods of distribution of the same federal grants.

Indeed, the Minister of Finance has always been consistent and frank in this matter. He believes that federal grants are constitutional. He never intended to abolish them, though he was prepared to change the method of distribution. That is what he said on September 6, 1958, and what he repeated on the resolution preceding this bill:

> I emphasize, Mr. Chairman, that in reference to this subject of the basis of distribution this present government makes no rigid approach. We adopt no take it or leave it attitude in regard to this basis of distribution.

Those words may be found at page 2227 of Hansard of March 18, 1960. In other words what the Minister of Finance said was this. We intend to continue to provide federal grants to help Canadian universities, but we are prepared to modify their method of distribution. That is exactly what the minister is doing in this bill. Here again he has been very clear and frank, when he said in introducing the resolution as reported at page 2225 of Hansard of March 18, 1960:

> The amendment proposed will simply provide alternative arrangements so that grants now paid by the federal government to institutions of higher learning under the authority of the annual Appropriation Act can be paid out of the federal treasury through the Canadian universities foundation under the authority of the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act or, under certain circumstances, when a province so desires directly, by that province.

Therefore, according to the Minister of Finance himself, the bill provides for university grants paid out of the federal treasury. In the one case these federal grants will be paid through the Canadian universities foundation and in the other through the province. The fact that such federal grants will be made to universities through the Canadian universities foundation or through the province does not in any way modify the constitutional position in this respect. According to the new method embodied in this bill the university grants will be paid out of the federal treasury through a tax abatement not exceeding $1.50 per capita and, if necessary, through a straight conditional payment to the provincial government.

The constitutional position in so far as section 93 is concerned is not changed or altered in any way by this bill. If, as the Quebec Conservative members claim, the federal government does not have the power to provide grants to universities, then this bill is clearly unconstitutional and ultra vires. These Quebec Conservative members have no escape, therefore; because surely no pretext can be used to justify the violation of the constitution. However, as I said earlier, there is a new constitutional problem created by this bill.

While the new method of distribution does not remove in any way the constitutional issue raised by the Quebec Conservative members in regard to the present basis of distribution it does pose a new and, in my opinion, a genuine constitutional difficulty. This problem is related to section 92 of the constitution, which provides that—> —in each province, the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to ... direct taxation within the province in order to the raising of a revenue for provincial purposes.

The press release issued by the Prime Minister on December 10, 1959 contains the following statement which has been embodied in this bill:

> If the government of a province requests the change to be made in respect of that province, and undertakes to provide additional grants to the universities in that province on a scale equivalent to the present federal grants of $1.50 per capita, then parliament will be asked to authorize an increase of 1 per cent in the abatement made in the federal corporation tax in respect of that province, from 9 per cent to 10 per cent. This increased allowance for a provincial corporation tax would be in lieu of federal grants for universities in that province. It would be necessary for the provincial legislature then to impose an additional corporation tax equivalent to the reduction in the federal tax and to authorize the payment of the additional grants to the universities.

In other words, the federal government in this bill is saying to a province "We will reduce our corporation income tax, which is a direct tax, by 1 per cent on the following conditions. The provincial government must levy a direct tax of at least 1 per cent on corporation income; the proceeds of that provincial tax must be distributed to the universities in the province, and the total grant must not be less than $1.50 per capita. If the proceeds of that tax exceed $1.50 per capita we, the federal government, will appropriate the surplus of those provincial revenues."

Under such conditions the federal government determines when a provincial tax will be levied, what will be its minimum rate, how it will be utilized for a provincial purpose, and what will be its maximum yield to the provincial treasury. For all practical purposes, therefore, as the Minister of Finance has said, university grants will be paid out of the federal treasury by the province.

But that is not the whole story. In addition, the arrangement to be made by the province with the universities will have to be in accordance with and subject to terms and conditions not inconsistent with those contained in any agreement entered into between the Minister of Finance and the Canadian universities foundation. Therefore the provincial government, in distributing its own money to universities within the province, will have to comply with conditions set out in an agreement to which it is not even a party and which will be determined, for all practical purposes, unilaterally by the Minister of Finance.

Finally, the Minister of Finance will be the only judge to determine whether the arrangements made by the provincial government with the universities within the province are satisfactory.

This is, to say the least, a fantastic piece of legislation. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that no other federal government or minister of finance since confederation has dared to intervene so emphatically, so evidently and so thoroughly in an exclusively provincial matter. The way a provincial government deals with universities within the province is not in any way the concern of the federal government. Under the proposed arrangement, however, the provincial government is not even in the same position as the Canadian universities foundation, which will at least have the opportunity to discuss the terms of its agreement with the Minister of Finance. The province will become a mere fiscal agent of the federal authority with respect to a direct provincial tax raised for a provincial purpose.

This arrangement amounts to a delegation by the federal government of a provincial power to a provincial government. This is surely the height of arrogance, because our courts have decided that even the delegation of a federal power to a legislature or vice versa was unconstitutional.

In this connection I would like to quote from a decision of the Supreme Court of Canada, the case of the attorney general of Nova Scotia et al v. the Attorney General of Canada et al, found at page 369 of Dominion Law Reports, volume 4, 1950. I should like to read just one sentence from the headnote and then a portion of the judgment of Mr. Justice Estey. The headnote of this case reads in part as follows:

> Neither the parliament of Canada nor the legislature of any province can delegate one to the other (to be exercised by that other as a parliament or legislature, as the case may be) any of the legislative authority respectively conferred upon them by the British North America Act and especially by sections 91 and 92 thereof.

At page 391 Mr. Justice Estey, among other things, had this to say:

> Moreover, the provisions of the British North America Act contemplate these legislative bodies will, at all times, in the exercise of their sovereign jurisdiction, act as principals. There is no express provision nor is there any under which it could be reasonably implied that these bodies were intended to act as agents one for the other.

It would appear that the position which I have been taking is confirmed by a decision of the Supreme Court of Canada.

According to the provisions of the present bill the provincial government will, for all practical purposes, act as agent for the federal government but in a provincial field. The new scheme, therefore, raises a very serious constitutional issue which is related to the exclusive right of the provinces to raise direct taxes for provincial purposes and to spend the proceeds as the legislature see fit. Our courts have already decided that the federal government and the provinces do not have the right to surrender by mutual consent a prerogative or a responsibility assigned to them by the constitution. If a province cannot transfer its exclusive constitutional powers to the federal government, it cannot by implication accept any specific limitation on the exercise of those powers imposed by parliament as the condition of an arrangement, because such limitation would amount to the partial surrender of those powers to parliament.

I have grave doubts about the constitutionality of the new arrangement embodied in this bill. I am not, of course, competent enough in constitutional matters to be sure that this new scheme is, in fact, ultra vires in its entirety, but I am quite confident that it is at least incompatible with the spirit of our constitution.

Moreover, there is another feature in the arrangement contained in this bill which appears to be an encroachment on the exclusive taxation powers of provincial legislatures. This is the provision:

> "There may be deducted from any payment to the province under this act or otherwise recovered as a debt due to Canada by the province, any amount by which one ninth of the standard corporation income tax as applied to the province for that fiscal year exceeds an amount calculated by multiplying the population of the province for the calendar year ending in that fiscal year by one dollar and fifty cents."

In other words, the federal government asserts under this provision that if the yield of the additional provincial tax of 1 per cent exceeds $1.50 per head, the excess of that provincial tax raised for a provincial purpose belongs to the federal government and will be recovered as a debt due to the federal treasury by the province. This, it seems to me, is a violation of section 92 of the constitution. Under our constitutional provisions the federal government does not have access to direct taxation raised for a provincial purpose. Such taxation raised for a provincial purpose belongs exclusively to the provinces. Moreover, revenues raised by a province under section 92 belong to the legislature of that province exclusively, and the federal government cannot claim any share of such revenues in the form of deductions or otherwise as if those were a debt due by the province to the federal treasury.

Here I should like to substantiate the opinion I express by a Supreme Court of Canada decision in 1930 in the reference "Troops in Cape Breton". The court, at page 562 of its 1930 reports, had this to say:

> The Solicitor General in his very candid argument did not contend that the duty to pay these expenses could be imposed by the dominion on the province in invitum and that, of course, would be a plain violation of the fundamental principle of the British North America Act. The revenues of the province are vested in His Majesty as the supreme head of the province, and the right of appropriation of all such revenues belongs to the legislature of the province exclusively.

The provision authorizing the deduction of moneys due by a province under these sections from the annual subsidy does not help the dominion. Obviously such a deduction could not constitutionally be made, unless the province was under an obligation to pay.

It is quite evident, therefore, that a share of provincial revenues produced by direct taxation, such as a corporation income tax, and raised for a provincial purpose, namely education, cannot be claimed as a debt due to the federal treasury by a province. Moreover, since there is no such debt, the province has no obligation to pay the amount claimed by the federal government. And since the province has no obligation to pay, the deduction that the federal government intends to make under the terms of this bill cannot constitutionally be made, as the Supreme Court of Canada has already pointed out in the decision of 1930.

It has been said that this bill is an improvement over the present situation, and that it is a step in the right direction. I certainly cannot agree with these views. On the contrary, I believe that several provisions of this bill constitute the worst intrusion ever attempted by a federal government in the affairs of a province. From that point of view I feel that it establishes a very bad precedent and that it is a step in the wrong direction.

In conclusion I should like to summarize the attitude of the official opposition toward the main parts of this bill. We support the increased payment to the provinces; that is, the extension of the rate of 13 per cent of the standard individual income tax for a further period of two years, although such an arrangement is not what the provinces were led to believe they would get from the present government before the last general election. Next, we are also in favour of the university grants paid out of the federal treasury, which were started by a Liberal government, and distributed through the Canadian universities foundation or, as I suggested last year, through a provincial universities foundation or council, because such grants are in the public interest; they are not financed by a specific direct tax, and they are not accompanied by any conditions affecting education.

So far as the constitutional basis of the proposed new arrangement for federal financial aid to universities through the provinces is concerned, we believe this is an attempt to go beyond the jurisdiction of parliament. We do not feel that anyone in this house should be an accessory to what seems to us a violation of the constitution, even if such violation were to last for a period of only two years. Therefore we feel that the government should either satisfy the house that the bill is completely constitutional or give us an assurance that the necessary modifications will be made during the course of the discussion to bring the bill within the jurisdiction of the federal parliament.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Does he intend to vote for the bill or against it on second reading?

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, that is the question which hon. members and the Minister of Finance ask from time to time and I will give him the same answer which he gave to us consistently when he sat on this side of the house. The conclusion I came to was quite clear, and the minister will find out in due course what the position is. In other words—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Does the hon. member not know now?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, right now. In other words, if the Minister of Finance can remove the constitutional objections which I have listed and which are now in the bill, then we will give consideration to the question.

Mr. Fisher: I have a question.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member who is just finishing wishes to accept it, all right.

Mr. Fisher: Are the objections of the hon. member to the bill identical to those expressed by the former member for Montmagny-L'Islet?

Mr. Chevrier: There is a Latin maxim which says in cauda venenum, that it is in the last part of the question that the sting is to be found. I presume my hon. friend had an ulterior motive when he asked the question. If my hon. friend had listened carefully to what I stated he would have found that I have gone much farther than the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Dorion) in stating that, in my opinion, some parts of this bill are entirely unconstitutional.

(Translation):

Hon. Leon Balcer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as a member of parliament and a cabinet minister from the province of Quebec, it gives me pleasure to rise in full support of the bill now before us. The problem of federal aid to universities is one that has been troubling public opinion in the province of Quebec for many years. It is a difficult problem, and in the last federal election, our party had promised to the people of Quebec that it would find a solution. The Conservative members had made that promise and they have kept it.

The solution was not easy to come by, but I think we have found a good formula, thanks to the co-operation of both the Quebec provincial government and the federal government.

The object of the bill is to enable the people of Quebec to receive their share of the millions of dollars raised by Ottawa to help the universities of the province.

The formula put forward by the former government was unacceptable and had been rejected not only by the government of the province of Quebec and by the Quebec universities, but also by the people themselves.

Such a piece of legislation, Mr. Speaker, which had the effect of isolating Quebec, was of course unsatisfactory and even harmful to national unity.

Mr. Bourget: Listen to the way he says that.

Mr. Balcer: It is obvious that Canada's universities play a vital role in the orientation of the free world, for the countries that form it are more than ever in need of elites, thinkers, scientists, intellectuals, economists, to help them find their way through the obstacles and ambushes which present international developments put in their path.

Never before have universities of all countries of the free world, and more specifically Canadian universities, been in greater need of financial assistance to carry on their task.

Up to that point, I do not hesitate to say that the Liberals themselves had understood, at the time, the serious problem which educators had to face. But, unfortunately, the previous government had come to the conclusion that it could settle all problems without due regard for the historical and political realities of our country, that is, the rights and duties of all concerned, or the fact that the province of Quebec is not a province like the others.

It goes without saying—

Mr. Boulanger: There is no unanimity on that point.

Mr. Balcer: —that if there had not been, in 1867, a province where a very large majority of the inhabitants were of French origin, it would not have been necessary to spell out, in the British North America Act, that there were any French rights in Canada; it would not have been necessary to say that the Canadian parliament, that the federal courts should be bilingual, as well as the legislative assembly of the province of Quebec; but it was recognized, a priori, that the province of Quebec was not, from the very start, a province like the others.

Besides, why should we have entrusted to provincial governments the exclusive power of looking after education, if the educational system had been the same in all the provinces which were to become members of the confederation?

Nobody will dare deny that the British North America Act, pact or contract, is a modus vivendi between French-speaking Canadians and English-speaking Canadians.

One has only to read the text of the constitution to realize that the fathers of confederation wanted the province of Quebec to be different from the others, with, for instance, its fixed provincial constituencies where English-speaking voters were in the majority at the time.

In their formula, the Liberals had overlooked historical facts, so vivid in the province of Quebec, with the result that even if English-speaking provinces could obtain the millions collected by Ottawa to provide assistance to universities, the people of Quebec were being taxed like all the others while its universities were compelled to turn down the largesses of the federal government.

People outside the French province, wondered when they found that, year after year, Quebec leaders were turning down federal grants. Our opponents went so far as to describe that attitude as "segregationism" but it was the Liberals, with their anti-constitutional formula, who applied a policy of intellectual segregation with regard to Quebec.

I would even say that they are responsible for the little anti-Quebec outbreak of the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) who, after all, only repeated in 1960 what the Liberals, for the last four years of their regime, had been saying to anybody who would listen. At the time when the university grants bill was introduced, the Liberals had come to believe that every evil which fell upon this country could only be blamed on the Quebec voters. At that time the Liberals did not dare to launch a straightforward attack against the hon. Mr. Duplessis and his autonomist policies. They relieved their feelings by attacking the province of Quebec of which Mr. Duplessis obviously had become the living symbol.

To stand well with the federal ministers from Quebec, it was necessary at the time to miss no opportunity to refer with pity or disdain to the backward French province which, it was claimed, was keeping to itself; where it was said people did not understand the general progress of Canada; where people allegedly refused to keep abreast of other Canadians. It was then that there was launched the famous formula from very high quarters and without the slightest provocation, after all the province of Quebec is a province like all the others.

Therefore, the hon. member for Port Arthur, who knows nothing about Quebec, only repeated in his own words, in 1960, what government members said in Ottawa in 1955. That attitude of national disunity and misunderstanding on the part of some Canadians with regard to the others, may, in all fairness, scarcely be blamed on the C.C.F., which has never taken root in Quebec—unlike the Liberals who were maintained in power for 22 years thanks to that province.

I insist on the fact that our universities were and still are in need of money, and Quebec universities as much and maybe more than those of other provinces. However, the Liberals' method of offering that money as grants from Ottawa was definitely unacceptable to Quebec. Indeed, the procedure imposed, and not merely suggested, by the Liberal party, was both a mistake and a danger to national unity.

The fact that it seemed adequate in nine out of ten provinces did not make it more acceptable in the French province. That is why it was unanimously rejected by the government, the universities and the population of Quebec, while the taxpayers in that province were nevertheless compelled to pay taxes for the benefit of all Canadians but themselves, despite the well-established principle "no taxation without representation".

Under the present arrangement, we want all Canadians, whatever their racial origin or their creed, to start off with equal opportunities. Our primary object is to offer all men and women in this country equal opportunity of winning university degrees enabling them to hold their own in the Canadian nation of tomorrow.

The present Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) was the first Canadian government leader to maintain that the French language and the culture that goes with it, are part of the basic liberties which are worth upholding, and this could never be accomplished so long as Quebec universities were compelled to exist under distressed abstention. That is why we have sought to develop a formula making for a fair treatment of both the taxpayers and the institutions of higher learning of Quebec. Consequently, this bill represents an arrangement based on the Canadian economic situation and the history background of the oldest Canadian province.

We realize that the population of the nine other provinces is satisfied with the system which has been in force up to now, but we offer an alternative, a realistic compromise allowing a province such as the province of Quebec, to grant to its university population the benefits which it was forced to refuse because of its scrupulous respect for the constitution and for autonomy.

An interesting feature of this alternative is that it is offered to any province which, of its own free will, wishes to avail itself of the new formula. Up to now, the province of Quebec has been the only one to do so, but any other Canadian province may act likewise if it sees some advantage in such a course of action.

Certainly, I do not suggest that the formula was easy to find or that we did not have many difficulties to overcome. But due to the good offices of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) and to the good will of the Quebec premiers, we have succeeded.

At this point, I wish to pay a tribute to Messrs. Duplessis, Sauve and Barrette.

I know that during the debate on the resolution, the opposition spokesmen tried to suggest that one thing, and one thing only, barred the way to an earlier settlement: Mr. Duplessis' uncompromising attitude for all that concerned, directly or indirectly, the constitution of Canada.

Well, I remind the house with pleasure that the initial negotiations for the settlement of this question were entered into with the hon. Mr. Duplessis. I do not want to lessen the extraordinary talent of Hon. Paul Sauve, whose very short term in office gave rise to so many hopes that are now becoming a reality. But I might say that Mr. Sauve, throughout his discussions with the federal government about the problem of aid to the universities of the province of Quebec, always stated that he was following in the steps of his predecessor whose thought he was only taking up again.

Last July, I personally had an opportunity to discuss with Premier Duplessis various propositions for the purpose of coming to an agreement.

A few days before his death, Mr. Duplessis stated that he would be in a position to submit, in October, a positive proposition to the ministers in Ottawa. It was the Hon. Paul Sauve who submitted that positive proposition. Federal ministers discussed it with Mr. Sauve and, at the time of his tragic death, only a few details remained to be worked out, which was done during a private interview between Mr. Antonio Barrette, Mr. Sauve's successor, and the Minister of Finance, sponsor of the bill which is now before us.

Therefore, we had claimed, under the Liberal administration, that it was possible to settle this problem in a constitutional way and to the satisfaction of the premiers of all the provinces. We have kept our word admirably, because Premier Barrette himself believes that this bill is consistent with the terms of Mr. Duplessis' proposal, which was submitted again by Mr. Sauve, and later by Mr. Barrette himself.

That solution was made possible through an increase in the provincial tax on corporations, deductible from the federal tax. Now the fact is that we were the promoters of the "deductibility" formula at the 1954 Conservative convention held in Ottawa. I remember defending the deductibility formula in the House of Commons, on April 26, 1954, when I replied to the arguments of the then minister of northern affairs and national resources, now leader of the Liberal opposition in Quebec, Mr. Jean Lesage.

The applause is rather muffled.

And those who would like to know exactly what was being claimed by the then Liberal minister, now disguised as a prophet of autonomy, and by the newborn infant of provincial autonomy, the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), can read two enlightening articles by Mr. Clement Brown, in Le Devoir of Friday and Saturday last. Le Devoir's parliamentary correspondent reports fully, word for word, the very terms in which Mr. Lesage objected to the deductibility of provincial income tax from federal income tax.

I am not afraid to say, as a federal minister, that this bill is the best possible way of solving the crisis for which the Liberals were responsible in the first instance. It is a formula which allows the province of Quebec to recover its place at the forefront of the provinces that form the confederation. It allows the universities of Quebec to develop and prosper like all institutions of higher learning in the other provinces of Canada.

If we now go back to twenty five years ago, we realize that, between 1936 and 1960, the old province of Quebec has developed more than it did between the time of the discovery of Canada and 1936. Thanks to Mr. Duplessis' energetic and bold policy, it has become a great provincial state and an industrial giant.

Messrs. Sauve and Barrette took over from their predecessor and, in less than a year, gave the province of Quebec a new trend, under the impetus of their personal leadership. That is why the provincial session which has just come to a close in Quebec city, will go down in history as the session of education.

The new leader of the Union Nationale has managed to come to an agreement with Ottawa and to obtain from our government the share which, by right, belonged to the universities of Quebec. The hon. Mr. Barrette introduced three bills in the Quebec legislature, one to recover the money accumulating in the coffers of the conference of universities, the second to increase provincial grants to Quebec universities, and the third to raise the income tax of business concerns to provide funds for education in Quebec.

The object of this bill is to make that tax deductible from federal tax, so that the people of Quebec will not have to pay more for the same services than is paid by the people of Ontario or of other provinces.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wanted to ask you if you would take note of citation 144 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms which states:

144. It is a rule in both houses of parliament that a member must address the house orally, and not read from a written, previously prepared speech—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Johnson: Why did not the hon. member object when the hon. member for Laurier was speaking?

Mr. Fisher: The challenge has been thrown out by a question asking why I did not object when the hon. member for Laurier was speaking. I quite agree that I should have done so. It seems to me that both these hon. members, who are veteran members of the House of Commons, are breaking this rule. I just wanted to draw that matter to the attention of the house.

Mr. Ricard: He is just following his notes.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) should read his speeches once in a while and that, if he did so, he would make fewer mistakes.

Mr. Fisher: On the point of order, may I say that that statement is nothing more than a bare-faced admission that the hon. member is reading his speech rather than consulting his notes. If that is the case it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that you should rule that he should not read his speech.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think the rule is quite clear that hon. members should not read their speeches. They are, of course, entitled to consult their notes. I know that the rule has not been very strictly applied generally but I would ask all hon. members on all sides of the house to remember that this rule still exists.

Mr. Pickersgill: After all, it is his maiden speech.

Mr. Balcer: The maiden speech of the hon. member for Laurier.

(Translation):

The purpose of this bill, Mr. Speaker, is to make the Liberal legislation on aid to Canadian universities legal under the Canadian constitution.

In future, the province of Quebec will be spending $175 million to help education in the province. Had he done nothing else, Mr. Barrette would go down in history as a very great premier—

An hon. Member: Since confederation.

Mr. Balcer: I am happy and proud, as a Conservative cabinet minister and as a member from Quebec, to be able to say we have contributed to this worthy cause by finding a solution to the problem of financial aid to universities. We have thus carried out an election promise, and more important, we have rectified a grievous injustice.

(Text):

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister will permit a question?

Mr. Balcer: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Did I correctly understand the minister to say—I was following him quite closely—that the Liberal formula for aid to universities was unconstitutional, or "anti-constitutionale", I think the word was? If the minister said that, how does he justify belonging to a government which is continuing the same formula in this bill which is now before the house?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, any legislation which finds its place in only nine provinces out of ten and is not acceptable to the tenth province leaves a very grave doubt as to its constitutionality. But by this new bill moved by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) we make it possible for every province in Canada to benefit from federal legislation. I know that in the other provinces people were considering this legislation as being constitutional, but in the province of Quebec not only the government but the people of the province have always regarded it as unconstitutional. When we took power we were faced with the facts and we decided to try to find a solution to this problem. It took us a certain time but I think we have come forward with a splendid solution.

(Translation):

Mr. Chevrier: Would the minister allow me a question?

Why did he not vote against grants to universities in 1951 and 1957?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, I do not remember about 1951, but I recall having been the only member to vote against them in 1957.

Mr. Chevrier: In view of what you have just said, why did you not vote against grants to universities in 1951?

Mr. Balcer: My recollection is not too good. I think I was not in the house at the time.

Mr. Chevrier: I have here Hansard for 1951 and 1957.

(Text):

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister a question. Is he now putting forward a new constitutional doctrine—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think this is turning into an exchange which will—

Mr. Balcer: I think the Leader of the Opposition is asking me a question.

Mr. Pearson: Yes. I would like to ask if the minister is now putting forward a new constitutional doctrine, the divisibility of the constitution?

Mr. Balcer: The legislation is not bringing forward divisibility of the constitution. We are proposing an alternative which is available to any provincial government which will be applicable all across Canada. The Liberal legislation was made applicable only to nine provinces out of ten.

(Translation):

Mr. Adrien Meunier (Papineau): Mr. Speaker, I would have liked the Sollicitor General (Mr. Balcer) to delve a little more into the subject matter of the bill, to comment upon it, and to examine the various clauses, and then to tell us what he thinks of them, instead of limiting himself to generalities, as he did. I want to point out some statements he made. He told us that the university problem was difficult to solve; that we had an indefensible policy; and that the university crisis was due to the Liberals.

Can the Solicitor General tell me if, from 1952 to 1957, any move was made or any action taken by the government of the province of Quebec towards the settlement of this university issue.

Mr. Balcer: And what about you?

Mr. Meunier: It has always been said and it was brought up at the resolution stage, that the Liberals had closed the door to any discussions; that they had not entered into discussions with Quebec leaders and that Quebec had not smiled at them. Besides, it was claimed that the Union Nationale government had opened discussions to settle that matter of universities only last year when Mr. Sauve came to Ottawa. It seems to me that in order to settle any problem, ordinarily two sides—two governments in this instance—must be satisfied, and some basis of agreement must be found. If no talks are held, if everyone refuses to budge, no problem will ever be settled. Now, in this case, the money was here in Ottawa, and it was up to the Quebec government to take the lead and ask the Ottawa government to settle the problem. Finally, it was settled, but in a haphazard way, as I will show in the course of my remarks. A settlement is proposed, but what type of settlement?

Mr. Ricard: That is under a Conservative government.

Mr. Meunier: I would have liked the Solicitor General to say a word about the bill and to tell us what he thinks about it. The purpose of the bill submitted to us is twofold. First, we are asked to extend for two years the rental of the provincial share of income tax; then, the bill provides an arrangement between Canada and the provinces for the sharing of corporation income tax with regard to federal government grants to universities.

I want to deal with this latter proposal, Mr. Speaker, because this proposed amendment is something new in this bill. At the resolution stage of this bill, several members spoke feelingly of autonomy or rather told us that the field of education belongs to the provinces. We all know that, Mr. Speaker, and besides, it is guaranteed by the constitution.

Others told us with deep emotion about the furrow of education in Quebec that the late premier had ploughed, a furrow that had been dug by someone else.

I agree, Mr. Speaker, that this cannot be made a matter of sentiment. It is a problem of common concern to the federal government and to the provinces. We have to face it as a whole, and know what it is all about.

This bill offers the provinces to take 1 per cent on corporation taxes and to subsidize their universities at the rate of $1.50 per capita out of the tax proceeds. If, however, the amount thus collected at the rate of $1.50 per capita is in excess of that allowed and worked out by the federal government, the surplus collected by the province shall be deducted from equalization payments.

Where the amount collected by a province is less than $1.50 per capita, the federal government will make up the difference.

However, for this agreement to come into effect and to become law, it is necessary, as mentioned in section 9a, paragraph (b), subparagraph ii, of the act that, > satisfactory arrangements exist in the opinion of the minister for the payment by the province directly to institutions of higher learning in the province, of amounts by way of grants.

It is therefore essential, under that act, that money collected from corporations by the province be affected to universities, and the federal government grants this permission on the understanding that this obligation will actually be fulfilled.

It follows, therefore, that if the minister is not satisfied with the use made of the moneys collected from corporations, he may withdraw the offer he makes under this act, and resume his taxation power over corporations.

In the final analysis, the federal government decides, when a provincial tax is decreed, what its rate will be, what provincial purpose it will serve and what it will yield to the provincial treasury.

Those conditions, Mr. Speaker, are onerous and are an encroachment on the autonomy of the provinces.

The formula we are being asked to approve is different from the old formula proposed by the government of Mr. St. Laurent and which was deemed unacceptable.

Under the previous formula, the universities were free to accept unconditionally the grants which were offered to them and to spend the money as they liked.

The formula of the St. Laurent government merely gave a definition of a university under the terms of the act, in order to limit the institutions which were to receive those grants. Indeed had the word "university" not been defined, some institutions or schools would have claimed their rights to those grants and we should have had confusion and imbroglios.

I want to rectify an article published in Le Devoir of April 9, 1960, under the signature of its correspondent, Mr. Brown, in which the latter stated that under the formula submitted by the St. Laurent government the minister of finance was "the ultimate judge with regard to grants, in that he was given the tremendous power of defining university education, universities, etc.," and there the author of the article stops, without going any further.

I have to tell that correspondent that his statement was false and inaccurate, because the formula submitted by the St. Laurent government did not at all define university education.

I have here before me the agreement concluded in 1957, between the then minister of finance (Mr. Harris) and the national conference of universities, and paragraph 8 gives a definition of the words "population", "province", "student", "university", "university degree", "university level", but there is no definition whatsoever of the expression "university education".

Since that agreement was renewed in January 1960, between the present Minister of Finance and the Canadian universities foundation, the same definition of the words "population", "student", "university", "university degree", "university level", can be found under paragraph 13, but there is not a single word tending to define the expression "university education".

Some of the terms used in the 1957 convention have been renewed in the 1960 agreement, which was signed by the present Minister of Finance.

I wonder if the correspondent of Le Devoir wanted to mislead his readers or whether he thought they knew nothing about this, but I can tell him, without having reached the degree of intelligence and superiority which he assumes for himself, that we are able to read a text, that we know the definition of certain words, and that we can tell an insect from an animal.

Mr. Pigeon: This is rather far fetched.

Mr. Denis: That is understood.

Mr. Meunier: I must say the present Prime Minister, and the Minister of Finance have been logical; that they have never attacked the constitutionality of the law; that they never claimed that it encroached upon provincial laws.

The hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) quoted the words spoken by the Minister of Finance in the house, in 1958, as reported in Hansard. I should like to repeat what the hon. member for Laurier said, but since the time at my disposal is limited, I will merely say that the hon. member for Laurier was repeating the very words spoken by the Minister of Finance, in 1958.

Here is what he actually said in 1960:

> As long as this government directs the destinies of this country, it will never interfere in the field of education, which comes under provincial jurisdiction.

That has always been his position, frank and clear. We knew where we stood.

But, considering his attitude today, we can well wonder whether the Minister of Finance has not changed his mind. Does he not see in his bill some interference on the part of his government in the provincial field?

The Solicitor General (Mr. Balcer) has told us about the needs of universities—we know all about those needs—and he has told us about the unacceptable formula submitted at the time of the Liberal regime, but to which, however, no counter proposal was ever made. He also referred to the crisis brought about by the Liberals. But I wonder whether it would not have been better for him to tell us about this bill and to tell us what he thinks about it. I also ask the other Quebec ministers, including the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Comtois) whom I see in his seat, and the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sevigny) whether they consider that the St. Laurent formula worked against provincial autonomy? Is the present formula not more dangerous?

Mr. Bourget: That is an invitation.

Mr. Denis: The ministers do not speak with one voice.

Mr. Meunier: The other point I wish to raise, and which I mentioned in fact at the outset of my remarks is that the excess amount collected by the province which chooses to exercise its option of collecting 1 per cent of the corporation tax will be deducted from the equalization payments to the province.

In other words, the province will become a tax collector for the federal government. The federal government says to the provinces: I authorize you to collect this tax, I order you to use it in such a way, and if you collect more than the amount agreed between us, you will return the balance to me in one form or another.

I would have liked the Solicitor General to discuss that aspect of the bill and tell us his views on the matter.

The hon. member for Laurier, a moment ago, quoted judgments from the supreme court of which I have a copy here. I shall refrain from going back over that, because I do not want to take up too much of the house's time. However, under the constitution, the provinces have the right to raise direct taxes for provincial purposes and to spend them as directed by the legislature. This also holds true for the federal government, which can raise any tax for its own purposes and spend the proceeds as directed by parliament.

That question has been settled by our courts and I shall not refer to it again.

The hon. member for Laurier quoted the judgment of Mr. Justice Estey—and Mr. Justice Taschereau and Mr. Justice Kerwin share that opinion—to the effect that no province nor the federal government may become each other's collection agency.

On the basis of that judgment of the supreme court, if a province cannot transfer its powers of taxation to the central government, it follows by implication that it cannot take orders or enter into any agreement limiting its powers, because in so doing it is surrendering part of its prerogatives.

That would seem to us a breach of section 92 of the constitution which provides that the central government has no right to direct taxation money levied for provincial purposes.

In fact, such tax levied for provincial purposes belongs exclusively to the provinces.

It was said that this bill is an improvement on the old formula and is a step in the right direction; I do not agree. On the contrary, I suggest the bill is a flagrant interference by the federal government in provincial affairs and a step, not in the right direction, but a serious and dangerous step backwards.

The provincial government has no right to act as the agent of the federal government to collect a tax, and the latter has no right to limit the provincial government in its taxation powers.

We all know that universities need money and particularly those of Quebec who were starving and were longing for the money put aside for them by the conference of universities. They are glad today to recover what belongs to them, but if they are able to do so, it is because a wise and farsighted government, under the leadership of the Right Hon. Mr. St. Laurent, had included a provision allowing those sums to be put aside so that our institutions could collect them when they decided to do so, and this, without any directions on the way to use them.

This bill includes formalities and obligations that I have already mentioned and which make it the worst encroachment on provincial autonomy. If this is the result of the word "autonomy" that we have heard during many years at every turn and in all occasions, that result is quite poor and small. I say that this bill is a bad bargain.

I would like to hear the other ministers from Quebec explain their stand on this matter, since the Solicitor General mentioned it a few moments ago.

I wonder, Mr. Speaker, how the Quebec ministers would be able to justify their stand in the face of the thesis they defended? They may say that universities today have the money they wanted—and that is true—but I shall answer that they have it at a price they denounced as dangerous, as an infringement of autonomy, not to mention the fact that if they voted in favour of this bill, they will trample under foot all the principles they advocated. If the ministers from Quebec are trying to refloat the Union Nationale by means of that legislation, they have not much to offer to that party. The effect might not be as considerable, nor as efficient as they thought.

Mr. Balcer: Are you trying to refloat Mr. Lesage?

Mr. Meunier: I beg your pardon? Often the desired result is not achieved.

Mr. Johnson: Are you referring to Mr. Lesage?

Mr. Meunier: It often happens, Mr. Speaker, that the desired result is not achieved, they try by every means to make us forget the disastrous policy of the Quebec government, and that is why somebody well known and close to the Prime Minister organized the visit of the premier of Quebec to Toronto, to show the people of that city that the Union Nationale party is not as noxious as it has been said or described to be.

Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for the maintenance of the payment of 13 per cent of the income tax to the provinces; but, with regard to the option offered the provinces in respect of university grants, I cannot accept it in its present form, and it should be modified so as to safeguard provincial autonomy. Autonomy is a big word which has been preached and the meaning of which has been developed over the years. I cannot vote in favour of this bill, in its present form, because it is dangerous and far-reaching, and because it affects provincial autonomy in a most serious way.

Mr. Pigeon: May I ask the hon. member for Papineau a question?

Mr. Meunier: Surely.

Mr. Pigeon: Does the hon. member share the views of Mr. Lesage? And what does "totonomy" eat in winter?

Mr. Meunier: I believe in autonomy. I shall answer you right away. You are asking me what "totonomy" eats; now I don't know about that—

Mr. Pigeon: It is going to eat up Lesage.

Mr. Meunier: One moment, please. You asked me a question and you would like me to answer it. What does "totonomy" eat in winter? I have not the slightest idea what "totonomy" eats but I know that at this time and as a result of Union Nationale "totonomy" there are in Quebec some 200,000 unemployed, and in Montreal alone 80,000. If the province of Quebec had all the money owed to it by the federal government and that it did not receive because of that "totonomy", well, there would be less unemployment in Quebec.

[Mr. Meunier.]

Mr. Robert Lafreniere (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, on this matter, several interesting speeches were delivered by talented speakers from both sides of the house. I must say, however, that interest does not necessarily mean truth. For many reasons, I should like today, on behalf of the electors of the constituency I represent, to express my views on this Bill C-56, concerning education.

One of those reasons, Mr. Speaker, is the fact that I represent a constituency where is located one of the finest institutions of higher learning in Canada, Laval University of Quebec city.

Mr. Speaker, do not fear that in saying this, I am having an embarrassing superiority complex, but be assured that I feel a deep and legitimate pride. Besides, I know that other fine universities exist in Canada, and to name but one, I will mention the University of British Columbia, which I visited about a fortnight ago with the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Taylor). All Canadians must also be proud of that university, especially western Canadians, because it is an institution dating from the second half of the nineteenth century and which has known, ever since, a continuous, glorious and successful development.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is necessary to stress any further the idea that education is, beyond any doubt, a provincial responsibility. The present government, through the voice of several of its ministers, time and again has clearly expressed its opinion on the matter, and the provincial authorities, at least in principle, have given their agreement. There is no doubt also, in my humble opinion, that the fathers of confederation were thinking of the universities when they put education under provincial jurisdiction, since several subsidized universities already existed at that time.

Besides, the term "education", to use philosophical language has an intention that goes much beyond what we call instruction, and applies to the whole training process leading to information and physical and moral formation of the individual. How then could we limit the term education when referring to university grants, and apply it only to primary and secondary schools?

In other words, Mr. Speaker, the term education, as it is used in the confederation act, applies, in my opinion, to university education, and the Liberal government should have taken that theory into account, when it set up the university grant system. Be that as it may, I will limit my remarks to the principle of the bill we are now considering.

Under this bill, the provinces would have an opportunity to pay the grants themselves by raising their own corporation tax. In my humble view, an important aspect of this legislation is the Conservative government's care to abide by the 1867 confederation pact by handing back to the provinces the possibility of raising the taxes required to meet the needs of universities through the deduction of a provincial tax from the federal tax.

Mr. Speaker, probably a number of Liberals will find weaknesses in this formula, but it is acceptable. Furthermore, it must be pointed out that we are repairing an old building which had been badly put together in the first place. The legislation is fantastic, to borrow an expression from the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), but it is legislation that it is long overdue.

In short, the true situation is not as described by the hon. member for Papineau (Mr. Meunier) who said that the provincial government will be the agent of the federal government. After all, what has the provincial government done, or rather, what has the federal government said? It has said: I give you the right to raise taxes. What has happened in fact is that the government of the province of Quebec, at least, has raised a tax and, for the first time in 25 years, the federal government has withdrawn from that field of taxation so as to abide by the spirit of the Canadian constitution.

What is surprising in all the discussions about this matter is the obvious about-face of certain Liberal authorities. Just to prove it, I should like to recall certain statements made by Mr. Jean Lesage, which are quoted in part by Clement Brown in an article which appeared in Le Devoir for April 23, 1960. I quote:

> In his speech of April 14, 1954, Mr. Jean Lesage described as consistent with the constitution "the distribution among the provinces of taxation revenues... by parliament". He quoted a few figures in support of his view.
> However, Mr. Lesage added: "I think that nobody will deny that, in order to maintain our system of government, every level of government must have the financial resources it needs to fulfil its constitutional obligations".
>
> The Liberal leader then went on to say that in the absence of federal grants, certain have not provinces would not be able to meet their needs.
> With regard to the tax legislation on personal incomes enacted by the Duplessis government, Mr. Lesage made the following distinction: (1) first, there is the tax legislation itself, and Quebec is entitled to enact it; (2) then there is the matter of the federal deduction of the new provincial tax, something to which Ottawa cannot agree.

Speaking to the Minister of Finance, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) said, as reported at page 4726 of Hansard of September 6, 1958:

> When he says they would welcome a formula which would make it possible for Quebec to accept this kind of assistance, I can assure him that when we were in office certainly we would have welcomed any formula which would have made that possible; indeed, we certainly sought such a formula.

May I add, Mr. Speaker, that I was surprised to hear another Liberal voice, that of the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Leduc) say the words we find at page 2816 of Hansard of April 1, 1960:

> It is my understanding that only the tax collector is changed, and nothing else.

Would the hon. member deny or consider only very lightly the theory of Sir Wilfrid Laurier who said "it does not make sense that a government should collect the revenues while another spends them".

Why, Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member not repeat also the theory of his former colleague, Mr. Lesage, that "to maintain our system of government, each level must have the financial resources it needs to fulfil its constitutional obligations?" I will repeat, Mr. Speaker, that in the principles and in practical application, the Conservative government has always been and is still the best safeguard of the rights of the provinces and may I add that this bill will benefit all the provinces which will want to take advantage of it.

I would not want to let this opportunity go by without, as a member from the province of Quebec, putting the record straight following the very unfair remarks made by the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis) on April 1, 1960 and which we find at page 2831 of Hansard. I quote:

> I cannot help remembering all the years we lost, when our young people might have enjoyed a university education which was refused them, under the pretext of protecting a sham autonomy.

Would this mean, Mr. Speaker, that for having refused the federal grants to universities, the provincial government failed to fulfill its obligations towards our universities? It is not quite the testimony of a former rector of Laval University, which I find in L'Evénement Journal, of Friday June 13, 1958. Here is what Msgr. Ferdinand Vandry, vice-rector of Laval University, said at that time:

> "It is a mistake", said Msgr. Vandry, "for the press to make so much out of the federal government's grants to Canadian universities, and a mistake to contend that we should accept those grants. Those grants amount to almost nothing compared to what we get from the provincial government, which, thanks to the broadmindedness and understanding of Mr. Duplessis, has made Laval what it is today."

And Msgr. Vandry goes on to say: "I have been the rector of this university for nine years, and I am now in a position to state that over a period of ten years the provincial government has given Laval University a total of $22,000,000. I think that those are things that should be said, because we must say them. The initiator of the 'Cite Universitaire', Msgr. Vandry added, is actually and truly Mr. Duplessis himself."

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock, the house will now proceed to the consideration of private and public bills, the former having precedence pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, before the orders are called, may I have the unanimous consent of the house to revert to motions?

Mr. Speaker: Does the house give the hon. member for Halifax unanimous consent to revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

AUDREY LOUISE BRYAN SEVIGNY

On the order:

March 4—House again in committee of the whole on Bill SD-18, an act for the relief of Audrey Louise Bryan Sevigny. (Without amendment).
—Mr. McCleave.

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax) moved:

That the order for: "House again in committee of the whole on Bill SD-18, an act for the relief of Audrey Louise Bryan Sevigny" be discharged and that the said bill be referred back to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills, together with the evidence taken and the papers produced in respect of the said bill before the Senate standing committee on divorce.

Motion agreed to and order discharged.

Mr. Morton: I should like to rise at this time and on behalf of those who are sponsoring bills concerning various corporations once again ask the unanimous consent of the house to deal with certain bills in the following order. There has been a discussion between the various interests concerned and an arrangement worked out which will respect those interests. The suggestion to which I am asking unanimous consent is that we deal, first of all, with items numbered 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77 and 78, and item 140 in committee first; then, deal with bills covered by items 230, 249 and 250. They are bills for second reading. Then, we could proceed to deal with the divorce bills for second reading so that they could be referred to the committee. I understand they can be dealt with in bulk all together.

I understand they include the following items, 141 to 180 inclusive; 183 to 229 inclusive; 233 to 248 inclusive; 252 to 275 inclusive and 277 to 284 inclusive. Then, we could revert to the order starting with item 68.

Mr. Speaker: The house has heard the proposal, which requires unanimous consent, to change the order of the items on the order paper. The suggestion is to deal in committee first with items 70 to 78 inclusive and 140, then report those bills and then deal with second readings of non-divorce and divorce bills standing for second reading. I think that is the substance of the suggestion.

Mr. Chevrier: I am not objecting to the procedure, but I wonder if the hon. member would explain what urgency there is for this procedure.

Mr. Morton: A number of companies concerned have intimated that they would like to start business on the first of May. They have their offices set up, but cannot do so until these bills are passed. Unfortunately, since the Senate will not be here they will be late anyway, but this will expedite the situation and, at the same time, it does get some of the divorce bills into committee where they might be dealt with.

Mr. McIlraith: A pretty poor precedent.

Mr. Speaker: Will the house so order, unanimously?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS

The house in committee on Bill No. S-13 to incorporate Canadian Reassurance Company —Mr. Morton—Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—Incorporation.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, as I understand this bill, this company is almost identical in name with another insurance company called Canadian Reinsurance Company, the only difference being in the one case the word "Reassurance" is used and in the other "Reinsurance" is used. I think this is an objectionable practice and one that ought to be discontinued. I am aware that this is done with the full knowledge of the superintendent of insurance, and I am aware that the owners of the companies are common owners. Since they are set up as separate corporate entities, however, they need not continue to have a common ownership. There is no obligation in that respect. This is a practice that I think is thoroughly bad and ought to be discouraged. There should be a distinctive name that is not confusing with other company names granted incorporation by this parliament.

There is one other practice that I find objectionable. It is no longer the practice in the incorporation of these companies to clear the names, to find out and report to parliament whether or not the name is objectionable from the point of view of similarity to other companies incorporated by letters patent. This practice was followed for a great number of years where incorporation took place by a special act. It was left, of course, to parliament or the appropriate committee of parliament to deal with it and decide whether or not a charter would be granted regardless of the similarity of names. This information was brought forward for the consideration of the committee concerned with the particular bill or for parliament itself. The discontinuance of that practice is something which, I think, should not be allowed to pass unnoticed.

I have no particular objection to this bill. I am merely seizing the opportunity of raising these two matters which I think are of importance.

EASTERN TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH COMPANY

The house in committee on Bill No. S-21, respecting Eastern Telephone and Telegraph Company—Mr. MacLellan—Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—Capital stock.

Mr. McIlraith: May I ask the sponsor of this bill what effect, if any, the use of the additional powers granted by this bill will have on this Canadian company earning foreign exchange?

Mr. MacLellan: The purpose of this bill is merely to increase the capitalization of Eastern Telephone and Telegraph Company in connection with building a second line to the continent of Europe for trans-Atlantic messages. The funds have already been advanced by the parent company in the United States of America for the doing of this work. This work is almost completed now.

Mr. McIlraith: My question had to do with the earning of foreign funds by this Canadian company and what, if any, effect this second line would have in increasing the balance of payments or bringing them more in our favour. It seems to me if that could be done, it is an extremely important thing. Regrettably, any earnings that will be brought into Canada by way of foreign exchange will to a large extent go out to the United States parent of this company and this opportunity of earning foreign exchange has largely been lost.

BRITISH COLUMBIA TELEPHONE COMPANY

The house in committee on Bill No. S-20, respecting British Columbia Telephone Company—Mr. Jung—Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—Acquisition of shares.

Mr. McIlraith: This bill was debated at the second reading stage and a good deal of evidence was given concerning it when it was before the standing committee. I am concerned with only one very narrow point and it is this. I must say that the charter of the British Columbia Telephone Company is a somewhat confusing document to understand. I therefore put forward my views with some hesitation. I defy anyone to be very precise and clear in his opinion of the exact legal position of that company after reading the relevant legislation concerning it.

In any event, it has been stated in debate in all of the three places where this bill was discussed that its immediate purpose was to enable the British Columbia Telephone Company to acquire another company operating in British Columbia, namely Northwest Telephone Company. As far as I am concerned, I have no objection whatever to that procedure. There can be no objection, as I see it, to the purpose of this bill as stated.

The British Columbia Telephone Company charter, as I read it, limits the British Columbia Telephone Company to constructing and operating lines in British Columbia. Then it has some incidental powers to acquire connecting lines going outside the province. But section 9 of the relevant legislation enables it to acquire shares in companies having similar objects. The bill now before us seeks to clarify that section 9 in order to make it clear—because it was not clear formerly—that section 9 enables it to acquire all the shares of any company or to acquire another company by purchase of its shares.

But the difficulty as I see it or the narrow point which concerns me is this. Both the British Columbia Telephone Company and indeed the company it seeks to acquire are largely United States owned corporations. I have no immediate objection to that fact. I recognize the need for foreign capital in this country as well as does anyone else. But by this amendment we are putting this British Columbia company in the position where it can go anywhere throughout the whole of Canada and acquire, through this amended bill, any other telephone companies in Canada.

There are many hundreds of telephone companies in all the other provinces of Canada except the three prairie provinces. It seems to me that a question of principle is involved as to whether or not—with the increased importance of telecommunications, with the developments of the last ten years and particularly their military significance—we are going to enable a foreign-owned and controlled company to acquire other companies and thus establish a network system across this country.

I think it is elementary to point out that our regulatory control of telephone companies—inasmuch as there is any control—is through the board of transport commissioners and the Railway Act. Indeed, the legislation refers to the Railway Act. I of course hold the view that with the changes that have come in this whole field in the post-war years, particularly in the last ten years, it is necessary to have that whole area re-examined or re-appraised and the appropriate changes made in the general legislation on this subject.

Certainly I would ask the government whether or not they have considered the question of principle raised by this amended bill. I should like to have their views. I have put my own views forward with some hesitation on the subject because, as a result of the old draftsmanship—perhaps I had better say that instead of "confusing"—of some of the clauses in the special act incorporating British Columbia Telephone Company there is a considerable degree of obscurity. If I am right in reading the amending bill now before us as enabling this company, which by its own charter is limited to British Columbia, to go into any or all of the other provinces in Canada and buy any other telephone companies and thus establish a national system across this country. I think it is something that the government ought properly to look at. The government has an obligation to the House of Commons to give its views on this point before the bill passes. I have no objection to any other features in the bill; I have just that one narrow point which I think should be considered and dealt with.

[Mr. McIlraith.]

Mr. Jung: Mr. Chairman, I have had the privilege of discussing this point with the hon. member for Ottawa West and I am grateful to him for having discussed this matter again before this committee. In view of what he has said about the complicated nature of the incorporating act, it would be almost an impertinence for a junior counsel like myself to dispute anything said by the hon. member who is a very eminent counsel. But because of the discussions that I have had with the hon. member for Ottawa West I took the opportunity of discussing this matter not only with the parliamentary agent of the company but also with the officials of the company itself.

I have been assured by the parliamentary agent that the question of the proposed expansion does not derogate in the slightest from the original principle of the incorporating act, and the original principle is not being altered by the bill. If it may satisfy the hon. member, I have a telegram which I received from the British Columbia Telephone Company which reads as follows:

> Douglas Jung, M.P., Parliament Bldgs., Ottawa, Ont.
>
> The company has no intention of enlarging its operations beyond the powers which it presently holds. It does however propose to extend northward into the Yukon to Alaska.
> British Columbia Telephone Co.

I think there was no withholding of information. The company frankly and honestly answered all questions put to it in the standing committee. It noted that it wished to take over the operations of the Northwest Telephone Company, and I think it would be a physical impossibility at this time for the company to come east and take over any or all of the 4,500 other telephone companies now in operation in Canada. From my discussions with the hon. member for Ottawa West I think he is more concerned with the rapid changes in communication and the fact that our legislation has not kept pace with this aspect. I think the hon. member has taken this opportunity to put his views on the record and I agree with him. It may be that in time we may have to set up a different board of control to look into communications, but for the purposes of this bill we must limit our discussion to the clause under discussion and I hope that what I have said this afternoon will satisfy the hon. member for Ottawa West.

Mr. Macdonnell: May we be informed whether this question raised by the hon. member for Ottawa West was discussed in the committee and if they were satisfied, or was there this sort of sketchy discussion which we have had now?

Mr. McIlraith: I am not on the standing committee, Mr. Chairman.

I thank the hon. member for Vancouver Centre for his courteous references, and I want to make it very clear that I think the company declared their intentions quite clearly before the committee. I think the proponents of the bill in this house and the other place also declared the intentions of the company quite clearly, and I think no question can be raised about that. I really wish to raise only the one question as to the wisdom of this parliament granting this kind of power when the company coming before parliament is not asking for it and does not intend to use it. It is a power that is very far-reaching and certainly one which ought not to be granted without consideration by the government of the day. I do not know whether the government has considered the point or not. I wish they would. I have no objection at all to what the British Columbia Telephone Company are seeking to do; I merely question the wisdom of parliament granting this power which is contained in the bill now before the committee and which I think goes much further than the power parliament ought to grant without government consideration, particularly when that wide power is not requested by the company.

Mr. O'Hurley: I should like to ask the hon. member for Vancouver Centre if this question was raised in committee and discussed?

Mr. Jung: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. McIlraith: I am not aware that this question was discussed in committee. I have the committee evidence here but I have been unable to find any discussion about it. However, perhaps it was.

Mr. Jung: I understand that the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam raised the question together with other members of the committee when they expressed the fear that the passing of the amendment would enable the British Columbia Telephone Company to go beyond the telephonic legislation of British Columbia. I think the parliamentary agent at that time dealt with that problem, and from what I have read into the record this afternoon, namely the telegram from the company itself, that possibility is precluded at the present time.

Mr. Jung moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): I do not want to reiterate anything I have said during the committee stage, but if there is no immediate urgency about getting this bill through before Friday I am wondering whether the government will consider looking at the point I raised. I put the point forward with some hesitation, but I do think it is worthy of consideration by the government. If there is no real reason for having the bill given third reading today instead of on Friday, I would ask the government to look at it in the interval.

Mr. Jung: Naturally, I would hesitate about having this bill delayed. I know of no pressing reason why the bill should not be given third reading today in fairness to this company, and I feel the company is entitled to have third reading now. I am sure there will be other opportunities to raise the point which was brought forward by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) and I can assure him that when that happens he will find a strong supporter for his views in myself. However, I ask the hon. member if he would not extend the courtesy to this company of regarding with favour the third reading of this bill now.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

SECOND READINGS

LAURENTIDE FINANCE COMPANY

Mr. Maurice Johnson (Chambly-Rouville) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-22, to incorporate Laurentide Finance Company.

Mr. J. T. Richard (Ottawa East): May we have some explanation of this bill?

(Translation):

Mr. Maurice Johnson (Chambly-Rouville): Mr. Speaker, this bill is being introduced under chapter 251 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, amended by chapter 46 of the Statutes of Canada, 1956.

It refers also to the Loan Companies Act, chapter 28, which applies almost entirely to this bill.

At present, only four companies are incorporated in this way, three of which are subsidiaries of American companies and only one being a Canadian company.

All petitioners of this bill are Canadian and the assets of this new company, the Laurentide Finance Company, in French La Laurentide Compagnie de finance, are wholly owned by Canadians.

I think the house is justified in passing this bill.

The bill is, of course, drafted as prescribed in the appendix of this act, that is the bill is drafted according to the schedule to chapter 251 of the revised statutes.

(Text):

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

INTERNATIONAL LOAN COMPANY

Mr. Murray Smith (Winnipeg North) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-23, respecting the International Loan Company.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the sole purpose of this bill is to change the name of the International Loan Company to that of the International Savings and Mortgage Corporation.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

ADANAC GENERAL INSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA

Mr. G. E. Halpenny (London) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-18, to incorporate Adanac General Insurance Company of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Halpenny: Mr. Speaker, Adanac will be a wholly owned subsidiary of the Delta Acceptance Corporation of London. That is a strong company, which also owns the Crescent Finance Corporation which holds a federal small loans licence and operates more or less throughout Canada. Most such companies have their wholly owned insurance subsidiaries and in order that Delta may protect its own investment and the collateral which it is financing it is necessary to have these insurance facilities.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

Mr. Speaker: There are a number of private divorce bills for second reading. Is it the pleasure of the house that they be taken in one motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

THIRD READING

MARIE RITA DUBE HOULD

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax) moved the third reading of Bill No. SD-38 for the relief of Marie Rita Dube Hould.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wish to remind the house of two points in this case which require clarification. The first relates to two photographs used in identifying one of the individuals involved, one photograph which was used by the investigators in attempting to establish adultery and a different one used in committee with no indication as to whether there was any similarity between the two photographs. The second point relates to a conflict of evidence between the two investigators, one of whom said that they kept a hotel room on the ninth floor of a Montreal hotel under observation for approximately two and one half hours and the other of whom said they came down into the lobby. I believe the miscellaneous private bills committee should investigate and ensure that the evidence was properly given.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters):

That Bill No. SD-38 be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the miscellaneous private bills committee.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Howard) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost. Does the house give unanimous consent to deal with third readings now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL TAX-SHARING ARRANGEMENTS ACT

ALTERNATIVE ARRANGEMENTS FOR UNIVERSITY GRANTS—EXTENSION OF INDIVIDUAL INCOME TAX RATE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) for the second reading of Bill No. C-56, to amend the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act.

(Translation):

Mr. Lafreniere: Mr. Speaker, towards the end of this afternoon's discussion on this bill, I had been quoting the testimony of a former rector of Laval University about the generous treatment received by Quebec universities during the period when the provincial government refused to accept federal grants.

To the figures I then mentioned I now wish to add that, since 1945, the Quebec government has paid to universities in my province the substantial amount of $112,036,297.38.

This continuing policy on the part of the government which was then headed by the hon. Mr. Duplessis, is, I feel, adequate proof of the consideration he gave to university education.

Before resuming my seat, I must express my regret with regard to some parts of the speech made in this house on April 1, 1960 by the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher). I am sorry that, because of a lack of information rather than ill intent, the hon. member, when dealing with Canadianism, should have spoken of the existence of a superiority complex in French Canada.

As a matter of fact, I do not see that many provinces, besides Quebec, have shown greater broadmindedness and greater respect for minorities.

No one can fairly claim that French-speaking Canadians have at any time tried to impose their language or their religion on the minorities which have chosen to live in Quebec.

I should like to quote here a page from a speech delivered by the Rev. Father Georges Desjardins, a Jesuit, on the treatments of minorities. Here is what he said in his book entitled: Quebec Schools

Other racial groups, upon settling in Canada, have had to accept the existing legislation. When they arrive in Quebec, immigrants find a confessional and Christian school system, either Catholic or Protestant, which has been officially recognized as such since 1846, but which in fact existed long before that date. They must therefore choose between Catholic or Protestant schools. The Jews have chosen Protestant schools. They are therefore regarded as Protestants for the purposes of distribution, as between Catholic and Protestant school boards, of provincial and municipal grants, and also of the undenominational tax (corporation tax).

The Quebec government has been so generous in the sharing of such grants and taxes that Protestant boards have, from time to time, been favoured to the detriment of Catholic boards which every year lose considerable revenues to which they are entitled. In any event, Jews have received from Catholic Quebec the maximum positive rights they could be granted. Under the tradition of the province, they can also require the authorities of Protestant schools attended by their children to arrange for the latter to receive the religious education to which they are entitled under natural law.

As regards Catholic minorities—Irish, English, Scottish, Italian, Hungarian, Syrian and others—they have always received a very liberal treatment from the Catholic committee on education and from Catholic school boards. None of those minorities pay double tax. All their children are educated at the expense of the Catholic taxpayers, without any racial discrimination.

In support of this, I might quote the words of an English-speaking Protestant, Mr. James Patton, secretary of the Quebec Protestant teachers' association. Here is what he said:

(Text):

We are well treated here. We get our full share of tax money. The Catholics go out of their way to be fair and even generous to us. We are only embarrassed because the Roman Catholic schools in other provinces do not get the same break—

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I believe those things should be mentioned in this house so that the province of Quebec may be considered as it should be, that is to say as an asset within the Canadian confederation.

As regards the bill we have been discussing since the beginning of this sitting, I shall merely sum up my views in saying that the present government has agreed to withdraw from a taxation field in which the provincial government can itself levy income which will have to be granted to universities.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that giving the provinces the taxation rights they need to fulfil their purposes is indeed the best way to respect the confederation pact.

May I say, in conclusion that the universities are, so to speak, the cultural yardstick of a people and that both the federal and provincial governments must protect their interests.

However, Mr. Speaker, it is also necessary that our people continue to live in an atmosphere of good understanding and harmony, for the safeguard of the Canadian confederation. The action taken by the present Conservative government is such as to achieve that purpose, and we commend the government for having done so.

Mr. Rodolphe Leduc (Gatineau): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to have an opportunity to take part in this important debate. Let me say, to begin with, that the grants to Canadian universities were first paid under legislation passed by parliament in 1951.

It was as a result of the report of the Massey commission that all Canadian universities and all Canadian provinces applied for federal assistance as a means of carrying on their work.

Mr. Ricard: It was much before that.

Mr. Leduc: Following the report of the Massey commission, the Liberal government at that time decided to make grants to Canadian universities.

The grant at that time amounted to 50 cents per capita and, in 1951-52, all the universities and every province in Canada accepted those grants.

Since 1952, the province of Quebec, or the universities of the province of Quebec, have not claimed federal grants until a few weeks ago.

In 1956, however, when the Liberal government, headed by the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, realized that the province of Quebec was losing millions of dollars every year because of the universities' failure to accept the federal grants, it amended the act by establishing a fund into which the moneys left unclaimed by the universities were deposited, so that the universities might claim them later on.

The attitude of the Liberals on the matter of grants to universities is known throughout Canada. It was stated by Mr. St. Laurent in this house that grants to universities are constitutional. At that time, all the Conservatives in the opposition, those from Quebec as well as those from other provinces, recognized, as they still do, that grants to universities are no impediment to provincial autonomy in the matter of education.

As for us, our attitude has always been logical. We, Liberals, have always maintained the same attitude since 1951. We have always made grants available to universities, and with no strings attached. Even the Conservative party, since it has been in office, has kept the same formula. The Minister of Finance himself, in his statement a few days ago when he introduced the resolution, said that the formula of grants to universities was constitutional.

However, I know one member, the only one from the province of Quebec, who is of the old guard, the Solicitor General (Mr. Balcer), who made a speech this afternoon.

Mr. Ricard: A magnificent speech.

Mr. Leduc: A speech which my friend says was magnificent.

Mr. Ricard: As compared to yours.

Mr. Leduc: But time will tell if his speech was magnificent. Mr. Balcer boasted this afternoon that the universities of the province of Quebec were very pleased to receive $25 million in aid from the federal government.

Mr. Ricard: And under a Conservative government.

Mr. Leduc: But, if Mr. Balcer had thought for a minute of the position he has always taken in the house, he would remember that he has contributed nothing to this grant of $25 million that the universities have received. And for a very good reason: because since 1952, Mr. Balcer invariably voted against the payment of those grants.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I remind the hon. member that he must not refer to his colleague by his personal name, but by the name of his constituency.

Mr. Leduc: The hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer) speaking in this house on January 29, 1957 on the subject of university grants made as reported on page 762 of Hansard for January 29, 1957, the following statement:

> Mr. Chairman, like all other hon. members who have spoken on this subject, I am greatly alarmed by the difficult situation which the Canadian universities are in at the present time. Like all hon. members in this house, I have the greatest respect for my own alma mater, namely Laval University. I can easily picture all the problems that face this great institution at the present time, having regard to the increase in the cost of living, the increase in the cost of materials, and various other difficulties which the authorities of this great university must face at the present time. However, I am sorry to be the only voice so far which has been raised against this vote.

Those words were uttered before the adjournment of the debate at five o'clock. The hon. member for Three Rivers resumed his speech later the same day when he said, as reported at page 772 of Hansard:

> —close to $700 million, unless it finds ways to hand money around so it will not have to blush about all that accumulated money derived from its reckless taxation over the last four years.
>
> I know that my colleagues from other provinces who are not as scrupulous or as touchy as I am, because they do not belong to a minority, are ready to welcome that federal assistance to universities, because they are thinking only of the problems of those institutions. This is also the case of other provincial governments and universities in other provinces which are also prepared to accept federal grants and even urge that they be made larger.
>
> Consequently, I do not want to insist that the universities of other provinces be penalized, but I do not believe that Quebec itself should be penalized because it attaches greater importance to the constitution than do the other provinces. Therefore, I ask the federal government to add an income tax deductibility clause proportionate to the amount which the Quebec institutions would have received if they all had accepted the offer of the federal government. The deductibility has already been considered in the past for other reasons, and I believe it might be possible in this way to help universities without encroaching upon the constitution.
>
> In this way the concern shown by the government and Quebec institutions for the letter of the constitution would be respected, and all the universities of this country would be treated on an equal basis.
> Without the addition of such a section, and in its present form, I believe that the item now under consideration is unacceptable. Consequently, I will have to vote against this item.

I must say that the member for Three Rivers hardly deserves any compliments from the universities of the province of Quebec.

Mr. Martel: It is his suggestion that is being put into effect.

Mr. Leduc: But I was amazed when I heard him talk this afternoon as Solicitor General, as expert legal adviser of the government, and expound his theory on "constitutionality".

I made a note of the question that was put to him by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill)—

Mr. Ricard: He did not realize what question he was asking.

Mr. Leduc: I also made a note of the answer of the hon. member for Three Rivers in which he expressed a new constitutional theory. He stated that when a bill is accepted by nine provinces but not by a tenth, it becomes unconstitutional.

Mr. Speaker, have you ever heard—

Mr. Ricard: You are the one who did not understand him.

Mr. Leduc: Have you ever heard—

Mr. Ricard: He did not understand.

Mr. Leduc: Mr. Speaker, have you ever heard so fallacious a theory expressed by a legal expert of the government?

Mr. Ricard: He has not been here very long.

Mr. Denis: Don't be silly.

Mr. Leduc: Mr. Speaker, not only is the theory a novel one, but I wonder how his fellow cabinet members will welcome it.

Mr. Ricard: You will never be able to understand that.

Mr. Leduc: During his remarks this afternoon, the hon. member for Three Rivers mentioned some educational legislation passed in Quebec, and he said that three new bills had been voted. He forgot one; there were four bills passed, and I shall mention them to him.

First of all, there was Bill No. 3, entitled "An act regarding university real estate investments". Bill No. 58 was also passed, entitled "An act respecting financial assistance to provincial universities". The legislature also voted Bill No. 50 entitled "An act authorizing the granting of subsidies to institutions of classical learning and certain other schools." And finally, they passed Bill No. 60 to establish a source of revenue in respect of universities, the education fund and the corporation tax.

Those four very good pieces of legislation were passed unanimously in Quebec.

Mr. Ricard: Even the Grits are obliged to vote with the government.

Mr. Leduc: The Liberal members of Mr. Lesage voted in favour of that legislation—

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Lesage did not vote.

Mr. Leduc: It was very easy for the Liberals to support such legislation because—

Mr. Ricard: The Union Nationale has never done anything but good.

Mr. Leduc: —because the government of the province of Quebec was implementing the policy or program of the Liberals.

Mr. Ricard: They have been in the opposition for 20 years.

Mr. Leduc: For several years—

Mr. J. A. Habel (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. Has the house reached the point where the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) can, by his shouts, impose his will upon other members of the house?

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order—

Mr. Bourget: Why don't you sit down and be reasonable?

Mr. Denis: Don't be a wet blanket.

Mr. Ricard: As you can see, Mr. Speaker, they are like a pack of wolves. When one of them is attacked, they have to bunch up, 150 together.

On the point of order raised by the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Habel), I think the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Leduc) is the only one to blame for lowering the discussion to this level. We have to meet the Liberals wherever they are, and if this means stooping, well—

Mr. Habel: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I can hear but one at a time.

I must point out that interjections have been made from all sides of the house, and I urge the members, wherever they sit, not to interrupt the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. Leduc: As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Lapalme, the leader of the provincial Liberal party, has advocated in Quebec for many years statutory grants for our universities, our colleges, our schoolboards—

Mr. Tremblay: And Mr. Lesage?

Mr. Leduc: Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to answer all the questions the Conservative members will want to ask me when I am through with my remarks.

Mr. Ricard: When the time for that will be gone.

Mr. Leduc: As I was saying, for many years Messrs. Lapalme and Lesage have advocated statutory grants in the legislature of Quebec, and this is known to all—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have no objection to a reference being made to legislation on education passed by the Quebec legislature, but in my opinion the hon. member is going a little too far at the moment, and I would ask him to revert to the subject of the bill at hand.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, on that point of order may I respectfully submit that this afternoon—

An hon. Member: Watchdog.

Mr. Chevrier: Would you please repeat what you just said?

An hon. Member: Quebec watchdog.

Mr. Tremblay: Cornwall refugee.

Mr. Chevrier: May I remind you, Mr. Speaker, that this afternooon the Solicitor General (Mr. Balcer) referred to Messrs. Duplessis and Sauve on several occasions, and so did the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Lafrenière). Since they were permitted to do so without any objection from the Chair, the hon. member who now has the floor should have the same right.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I remind the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) that the Solicitor General and the member for Quebec-Montmorency referred this afternoon to university grants by the Quebec provincial government. They did not discuss the principle of the legislation; they dealt with assistance in general in relation to the problem of the grants that the federal government is allowed to make through those subsidies or the bill which is being discussed, and this is entirely different from the position adopted by the hon. member for Gatineau who is dealing with the statutory grants system in the province of Quebec as it relates not only to universities, but to all the school boards and other boards which have nothing to do with the bill under consideration at this time.

Mr. Leduc: Mr. Speaker, I am willing to abide by your ruling but, in dealing with Bill No. C-56, I cannot help dealing with statutory grants in relation to it because one of the clauses of the bill states that an amount of $1.50 per capita must be granted to the universities by the province. Now for this money to be granted to universities, it is necessary under the new bill that statutory subsidies be provided, and that is why the principle of statutory subsidies was adopted by the government of Quebec. Those statutory subsidies in Quebec amount to $1.75 per capita as against a federal contribution of $1.50 per capita.

Mr. Speaker, I feel it will be readily realized that I am not at all out of order in dealing with statutory subsidies in the province of Quebec, since those subsidies have been established under an agreement between the provincial government and the federal government.

Actually the province of Quebec has come into all the money laid aside at the time of the Liberal administration headed by the Right Hon. Mr. St. Laurent for assistance to universities, that is $25 million, and this, through no amendment of the federal legislation since it has not yet been passed. In fact, we are still at the stage of the second reading of this bill. Moreover, the province of Quebec having passed four bills, and two in particular, this has enabled universities to collect the $25 million that was being retained here.

Mr. Ricard: Thanks to a Conservative government.

An hon. Member: The money had changed colour.

Another hon. Member: It had been promised by the same government.

Mr. Ricard: Thanks to a Conservative government.

Mr. Leduc: I am therefore justified in inferring, say what the Conservatives will, that the policy of the Union Nationale has changed in the last six months. It has changed considerably and continues to change every day.

Mr. Ricard: Enough to beat the next Liberal government.

Mr. Leduc: I hope that it will change enough so that the province of Quebec will be able to take advantage of all the federal grants which are available to all provinces in Canada. I have always been in favour of university grants. Our universities need money for their work. They have a part to play not only at the provincial level but in the national and international fields. And this is one of the reasons which justify the granting of federal subsidies to all our Canadian universities. And in granting these subsidies without imposing any conditions whatsoever, the government is in no way interfering with provincial autonomy. We all know that section 93 of the British North American Act gives the provinces exclusive jurisdiction in matters of education.

The federal government by its grants to universities does not interfere in the field of education any more than the province of Quebec interfered in that field by awarding special grants to the University of Ottawa, which is outside of the province of Quebec. Did the federal government infringe upon the rights of the province of Quebec in educational matters when the latter accepted federal grants towards technical and vocational training in that province? Certainly not more than the United States and the other countries when they award grants to the universities throughout the world. At this point, I think of the Rockefeller institute which grants research fellowships to our universities each year. The acceptance of such grants, whether they come from a government or an individual, does not constitute an encroachment upon the constitution.

I am in favour of university grants, but at the same time I do say that the bill as introduced in this house—and I made a careful study of it—is an encroachment upon provincial autonomy. And this, because the bill in its present form enables provincial governments to levy a one tenth tax on the profits of corporations, but under the condition that this tax does not yield more than $1.50 per capita. Should it yield more, the government reserves the right, under this bill, to deduct the difference from the equalization payments. In my opinion, this is an encroachment on provincial autonomy. Moreover, this act is unconstitutional. The Supreme Court of Canada has rendered a decision providing that when a province levies a direct tax for provincial purposes, the federal government has no right to claim any share of the moneys collected by the province. According to me, this bill is unconstitutional and unless the government gives an explanation to my satisfaction, I shall withhold my decision on this bill.

Mr. Allard: May I direct a question to the hon. member? Can the hon. member tell us on what section of our constitution he bases his statement that federal grants to universities are constitutional?

Mr. Leduc: The answer is very simple. The Minister of Finance himself, when he introduced his bill, stated that subsidies granted to Canadian universities are constitutional. The same view has been expressed by the Prime Minister of Canada and by all hon. Conservative members, except perhaps the Solicitor General before he became a cabinet member. In fact, they all shared the same view.

Mr. Allard: Would the hon. member answer my question and tell us on the basis of what section of our Canadian constitution he personally states whether those grants are constitutional or not?

Mr. Leduc: Mr. Speaker, in answer to the question put by the hon. member—

Mr. Ricard: Coming from the member for Papineau—

Mr. Leduc: —may I say this to the member for Sherbrooke:

> The government is and will always be scrupulously respectful of the constitution of this country. We recognize and respect the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces in the field of education. The increased grants proposed by the government are nothing but necessary assistance to the universities, without the government interfering in any provincial sphere.

Mr. Noel Dorion (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, on several occasions, since I have had the honour of being elected to this house, and particularly in the debate on the resolution which preceded this piece of legislation, I expressed my views as clearly as possible on the precedent which was created in 1951 by the federal government of the time.

I tried to show, both by historical facts and by references to the constitution, that the principle then established represented a serious mistake, and that only the provinces had rights and obligations in educational matters, at every level of the educational system.

I also emphasized the serious danger that Quebec was likely to run into had it yielded on that point.

In order to avoid repetition, I shall therefore try today not to deal again with those angles of the problem, though they may be of capital importance in the establishment of a national unity consistent with the constitution.

Since then, I heard various views on the subject and in spite of my sincere and loyal efforts, I found nothing in them which might shake my position or any of the arguments I used in support of my position.

In consequence—though it may displease those who do not share my opinion, and with all due respect for the views of others—I want to confirm once more, at the very beginning of my remarks, that federal grants to our institutions of higher learning in this country are obviously inconsistent with the imperative principles of our constitution and contrary to the rights, powers and obligations which are an exclusively provincial field.

It is with this reservation that I wish to deal with the legislation now before us, which tends to lessen the singularly serious effects of the 1951 precedent with regard to the only province which, in this matter, offered a resistance that was all the more vigorous and consistent for its being based on history, on the constitution, and on the firm will to preserve full and complete freedom of action.

Everybody is familar with the background of that legislation. Since 1951, the federal parliament has been called upon to vote annual grants to our universities, and thus to by-pass the provincial governments which are exclusively responsible in the educational field.

That precedent, which has recurred each year ever since, has become a kind of institution, so much more difficult to uproot that nine provinces out of ten have accepted it without the least objection; in fact they even declared themselves favourable to it. Only Quebec has consistently rejected it. It so happened, at a given moment, that the Quebec attitude did not please the authorities in Ottawa. By what means could its resistance be shaken?

So, in 1954, a method was resorted to which, it was hoped, would prove workable. It was stated that in so far as Quebec grants were concerned, they would accumulate in the treasury of the national conference of Canadian universities, in the obvious hope that such a Tantalus torment would give our institutions of higher learning such an appetite, would develop such an amount of gastric juice that in the end they would give in.

Fortunately, the nature and strength of the motives which had inspired Quebec were grossly misconstrued.

Beyond the purely material and financial point of view, there was a principle at stake, the principle of fiscal and constitutional liberties, a principle which, to a large extent, inspired the federative pact of 1867, and the ignoring of which would surely have brought about the abortion of the Charlottetown, Quebec and London conferences.

The accomplished fact brought about by that precedent of 1951 had none the less become a source of serious injustice towards the citizens of Quebec. Were they not contributing a large share of the taxes which were distributed in the other provinces by way of university grants?

Was there no possibility of a compromise that would take into account both the desires of the other provinces and the position so steadfastly held by the province of Quebec? Both the present Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the Quebec provincial authorities—who were also anxious to recover the share of taxes raised for provincial purposes, and to which in all fairness the province was entitled—devoted themselves to finding a compromise solution.

The legislation now before us is the outcome of those co-operative efforts. What does it amount to?

The best way to answer that question is to borrow the words of the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), in the speech he delivered on March 18 last, as recorded on page 2229 of Hansard. Here is what he said:

> In conclusion may I endeavour to summarize the effect of the legislation now proposed. In addition to assuring to the provinces till March 31, 1962 the benefit of the increase from 10 to 13 per cent in their share of the yield from the personal income tax, this measure will
> (a) offer all provinces equally an alternative to the present system of federal assistance to universities in the knowledge that none of them will suffer any diminution in consequence of the adoption by its province of the alternative plan;
> (b) place both the present system and the new alternative system on a firm statutory basis for the next two years conterminous with the period of the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act.

What is the nature of this alternative system referred to by the minister? It simply allows provinces which have made no arrangements with the federal government to rent their power to levy taxes on corporations or provinces which, though having entered into such an arrangement, now wish to terminate it with the federal government's concurrence, to receive an additional 1 per cent tax on corporations, a tax which can be deducted from the federal tax.

It may happen however, that the amounts recovered in this way by the provinces will either be greater than the amount that would have been paid to their universities by the federal government, or it may be less. In either case, there will be an annual adjustment, with the federal government either retaining the balance on equalization payments or adding to such payments to make up the amount. In that way, the provinces will receive equal treatment, without discrimination, whatever system they choose.

The essential requirement for any province to take advantage of this new system is that the province make satisfactory arrangements, in the minister's judgment, to pay its institutions of higher learning at least the equivalent of the sums they would have received if they had taken advantage of the method now in force. In other words, the province must actually discharge its obligations toward our universities.

Of course, this act is not perfect. It shows the effect of the factual conditions that brought it about. It stems from a precedent inherited by this government and for which the government must now make allowance, mainly in view of the attitude of nine of the ten provinces of the country.

Last year I pointed out those difficulties and I drew the fire of the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), a delayed fire since it came several months after the remarks I had made on this matter. He had then described as illogical and irrational the remarks I had made to this effect. Today, he wanted to act as our mentor and dictate the course we should follow. I admit that I am not at all inclined to accept his counsel, particularly after the constitutional heresies that crammed the speech he made this afternoon. I will truly feel in better company if I follow the counsel given on July 21 last by the editor of Le Devoir, a paper which surely cannot be suspected of centralizing tendencies. Here are Mr. Gerard Filion's views on this matter:

> The strongest argument is the will of the other provinces. Nine provinces want federal grants, as they want health insurance, as they want family allowances, as they want this and that. Therefore, no Quebec veto can impede progress.
> Important remarks could be made in that respect and restrictions indicated as well. However, taking it for granted that the will of nine provinces must finally win over the veto of one, there is but one solution left—setting up a special system for that province. For there is nothing in the constitution to compel Canadian provinces to accept a single procedure every time a step forward is to be taken. Diversity has no built-in evil and it may even become an asset.

That brings back to me the time of the union. While that constitution had been evolved in order to unite the two Canadas on a legislative and an administrative basis, what happened instead was that, throughout the existence of that system, there were three groups of legislation: one for Lower Canada, one for Upper Canada and a third one for the Union, it being utterly impossible and unnatural to amalgamate our two ethnic groups.

May I add that contrary to the hon. member for Laurier, Mr. Filion has the advantage of not being a mere layman in the matter of provincial autonomy.

This text from Le Devoir also provides an opportunity to point out to the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) how far we are from wanting to veto the stand taken by the other provinces. We readily understand that their interests are divergent and that they are entitled to hold views different from ours. It is ridiculous to imagine for a moment that we are attempting to impose on them a sort of one-way Canadianism steeped exclusively in our traditions, our customs and our aspirations.

But neither do we want reduced to a minimum the constitutional rights and freedoms which were granted to us by the act of 1867 and have enabled the province of Quebec to play its part as the centre of French culture in our country, a culture that is and will remain one of the elements absolutely essential to the existence and development of the Canadian people. And because the bill before us is along that line of thought, because it will enable the provinces which so desire to recover their power of taxation for educational purposes, I do not hesitate at all to support it as an improvement which the province of Quebec may rightfully welcome.

Some people—and it was their privilege to do so—paid particular attention to certain details of this bill and saw in them serious encroachments upon provincial autonomy. For example they took exception to it because it leaves it to the minister to ascertain that the agreements reached by the universities and the provinces wishing to take advantage of this bill are really consistent with its provisions.

I admit that, at first, that requirement disturbed me and that I would have liked a better formula. But on that objection, which I discussed with some of my colleagues, I was told: Is it not up to the minister responsible for the administration of the act to find out whether or not facts are consistent with the provisions of that legislation and if the latter can therefore be put into effect? Otherwise, who would be responsible for it? Mr. Jean Lesage, who has suddenly become the fiercest autonomist, suggested that the Canadian universities foundation could act as an umpire. Mr. Lesage, who is burning today what he worshipped yesterday, and who actively took part in establishing the precedent which is at the very root of the difficulties we are now trying to solve, has, as I say, the ardent enthusiasm as well as the deficiencies of a neophyte. Is he not aware that there is such a thing as ministerial responsibility and that the only three instruments of the state are the legislative, the executive and the judiciary? What principle would allow us to ignore one of those three when there is a question of arbitrating a possible conflict between two opposed jurisdictions?

Mr. Lesage seems to have a rather failing memory. He was there, as a member of the cabinet when chapter 29, Statutes of Canada 4—5 Elizabeth II, to which this bill is related was passed in 1956. Let him read over closely each provision of that text and he will see the extent of the powers specifically given to the minister of finance, whether for the purpose of setting up equalization payments, or stabilization payments or of making any necessary adjustments.

What strikes me especially in this bill is the fact that from now on, the minister will have no control over the structure of our institutions of higher learning and over the required conditions to be eligible for grants. It will not be up to him anymore, as had been decided in 1952 by Mr. Lesage and his friends, to define the terms "university", "student", "university degree", "university level". That problem will, from now on, be the responsibility of both the provinces and the educational institutions themselves.

This bill will therefore end such intrusions. While the Minister of Finance has the right to satisfy himself that the arrangements reached between the provinces and their universities are truly consistent with the requirements of the act—and it must be pointed out here that the term "arrangements" does not refer only to legislation, but has a much broader meaning—he will no longer, as in the past, be in a position to simply ignore the provinces, and to dictate directly to the universities the terms under which they may receive grants.

In my view, Mr. Speaker, that is a substantial and a very welcome gain. The Hon. Paul Sauve, whose political sense was justly commended by all, was the first to recognize this fact when, in his letter of December 14, 1959 to the Right Hon. Prime Minister of Canada, he wrote:

> My colleagues and I are pleased with your decision to offer an alternative to the present system of federal grants to Canadian universities, to take better account of the letter of the British North America Act.

Another aspect of this measure is that it represents a temporary compromise. On that point also, Mr. Sauve expressed satisfaction in the following terms:

> We are very happy that your letter indicates your intention to review the federal government policy in this matter, in the light of future discussions on the extent and nature of fiscal relations between the federal government and the provinces after March 31, 1962. It is therefore only a matter of considering a temporary modus vivendi which would obtain for the next two fiscal years only, that is until we take the decisions we shall be called upon to take and which will apply as of March 31, 1962.

The attitude of the late premier of the province of Quebec was, in this case, in keeping with the opinion of Rev. Father Ares, a prominent sociologist, whose authority in such matters could certainly not be questioned, and who, in January 1960, stated the following:

> This is a solution which, in spite of its basic defect, deserves consideration on at least four counts: (1) it is probably, in the circumstances, the only possible solution, in view of the attitude of the other provinces, which insist on getting federal help; (2) it is essentially provisional, since its duration is fixed at two years, and that in 1962 everything must be reconsidered; (3) it is in line with autonomists' claims, since it recognizes —under certain conditions, of course—the rights of provincial governments to levy a special tax, deductible from federal tax, and to earmark such a tax for the financial upkeep of universities; (4) it paves the way to the settlement of an extremely complex and delicate matter: that of the disposal of the sums which have been accumulating in Ottawa since 1952, in favour of Quebec universities.

At the purely practical level, that settlement affords Quebec invaluable advantages, and to convince oneself, one has only to consider provincial legislation passed during the last session, in anticipation of the provisional settlement assured by this measure. An educational fund had been set up in 1946, which was financed by miscellaneous sources. From now on, that fund will be increased by a tenth of the corporation tax, that is, for this fiscal year, by an approximate sum of $9,850,000. Out of that fund, in addition to the sums paid to school boards, as well as the basic grants which the universities and classical colleges are already getting, a payment of a sum equivalent to $1.75 per capita or 25 cents more than the proportion determined by the federal government will be provided for which will give a total amount of about $8,750,000.

At this point, a comment is in order, Mr. Speaker. In a conference he delivered recently before the students of Sir George Williams College, Mr. Lesage had in that respect the following remark to make:

> What a glaring breach of Quebec autonomy it is to let Ottawa itself set the amount of provincial taxes to be collected for provincial purposes.

I should like to know on what basis Mr. Lesage can possibly make such a statement. Where, when and how did the federal government ever set the amount of taxes that Quebec is entitled to collect to meet its provincial obligations and deal with matters of its own jurisdiction? The fact that during its last session Quebec chose to set the amount to be levied for the universities at $1.75 instead of $1.50 per capita is the best possible denial of such a contention. Where Ottawa has actually placed a limit in its legislation is in the maximum deduction on its corporation taxes, just as the Right Hon. Mr. St. Laurent had done in 1956 by recognizing the principle involved, the very principle that had been so violently rejected two years before by Mr. Lesage himself.

Finally, to come back to the legislation recently voted in Quebec, I shall recall that a sinking fund was created to assist universities and affiliated colleges which wanted to proceed with expansion and development projects. These capital costs will be financed by income tax revenue, as well as by the $25 million accrued at the Canadian universities foundation and paid out to Quebec universities for retransmission to the Quebec government, which is to use the money to this effect.

In other words, not only has Quebec rid its institutions of higher learning of a sword of Damocles hanging over their heads, but it made sure that henceforth there would be no more attempt on the part of the federal government to encroach upon the exercise of its rights, powers and obligations in respect of our educational establishments. From now on, it will carry out exclusively on its own the task deferred upon it, which consists in favoring the expansion of education and culture among the people for which it is responsible.

Mr. Speaker, those are the happy results of the compromise upon which rests the legislation now before us. That compromise has the advantage of deferring upon any province who would wish to do so, the responsibility of collecting on its own taxes for the financing of education without in the least hurting the financial and material interests of the other provinces. That seems to me a step in the right direction, a step towards the liberation from that kind of feudal system in which Ottawa has tried to keep the provinces of our dominion for the past 20 years.

Those considerations remind me of some statements made on December 17, 1940 to the Halifax Herald by one of the greatest statesmen of his time, the day after the publication of the Rowell-Sirois report, which is, to a considerable extent, the basis of the important change in the course of Canadian policy which took place at that time. These are the terms and conditions under which the Hon. Mr. Cahan, former member of the Nova Scotia legislature, secretary of state in the Bennett government, and one of the highest legal authorities of his time, thought it possible to maintain responsible government in each one of this country's legislatures. I quote:

(Text):

I have always believed that dominion-provincial relations will only be placed on a stable basis when the provincial government is made responsible for raising the revenues which it annually expends. That should be the ideal basis of responsible self-government. But this Sirois scheme makes the provinces more dependent upon grants and donations from the federal treasury, for the maintenance of provincial services.

The provincial legislature will come to exercise, year by year, the functions of a municipal council which is dependent, in matters of finance, upon the benefactions which it receives from the federal treasury. The dominion government will hold the purse, and financial control will gradually extend to the exercise of legislative and administrative control.

Many people would doubtless welcome that change, but the people of each province must decide for themselves whether the province shall become wholly dependent upon the dominion government, or whether, in the administration of provincial affairs, the provincial government shall continue to maintain a considerable measure of independence, which is usually described as provincial autonomy. That raises an issue which the electors of each province must decide for themselves.

(Translation):

Those, Mr. Speaker, were the words of one of the most brilliant statesmen of his generation. Such words were the result of a fruitful experience in public affairs, extensive knowledge of Canada's history and constitutional law, and a sharp sense of reality.

Though they were spoken nearly 20 years ago, those words are still surprisingly up to date. In my view, they contain the doctrine that should inspire all our leaders, whatever their party and whatever the sphere of influence in which they are called upon to exercise their activity. In returning to the spirit and letter of the 1867 act, we shall be working to insure harmony and peace among the various groups that have to live side by side in this country.

It cannot be overemphasized that the 1867 constitution which, before being a piece of legislation enacted by the imperial parliament, was first an agreement reached between the four pioneer provinces of our Canadian homeland, had been carefully drafted by wise and enlightened statesmen endowed with remarkably sharp foresight. While very different in background, religious beliefs and political views, they united their efforts and goodwill in an attempt to put an end to the fratricidal struggles which, for so long, had pitted our forefathers against one another, and to secure for our two ethnic groups the rights and freedoms which would enable them to live together in harmony and to develop each according to its own traditions, culture and personality.

In so far as we remained faithful to the creative spirit of those great ancestors, we had every reason to be satisfied with the relations between the provinces and the central government, and with those between Canadians of Anglo-Saxon origin and Canadians of French origin. God grant that this teaching of history will not cease to guide us and to inspire us in the settlement of conflicts such as the one which the legislation before us today aims to bring to an end, as well as in the general administration of the public affairs of the country.

In this way, we shall be for the whole world an example of a great country where segregation, even in its most insidious form, has no hold on us, of a country different from all the others because of its particular features, of a country that has remained faithful, both in spirit and in heart, to the two great civilizations from which it has risen and inherited such great and noble traditions.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the hon. member for Bellechasse? If the hon. member for Bellechasse deems it completely constitutional to levy a provincial corporation tax for educational purposes, how can he explain that the federal government should, under the same bill, have the authority to compel the province of Quebec to return a portion of the same tax? Is that provision in the bill not the very contradiction of Mr. Cahan's statement?

Mr. Dorion: I am willing to assume that the hon. member has paid close attention to what I said. However, he leaves me with the impression that either I did not make myself clear or he misunderstood me. I rather believe that I was not quite clear.

At the beginning of my remarks, I very definitely stated that in my opinion the federal government is not allowed under the constitution to subsidize universities. I said that we were faced with an accomplished fact and that we try to evolve a temporary solution through a compromise. That is my view on the bill now before us.

Mr. Gabriel Roberge (Megantic): Mr. Speaker, in recent years, I had become used, generally, to speak before the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Dorion). Due to the tradition of alternation, it so happens to-night that I have to speak after him. I must tell you that this makes me very happy since I will have the opportunity to take up certain assertions he made about statements of mine in the past.

Until this afternoon, we believed on this side of the house that there were only two protectors of the constitution on the side of the Conservative members from Quebec. I refer to the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard) and the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Dorion), who spoke just before me. But we realized this afternoon that we had a new protector of the Canadian constitution in my hon. friend and university classmate, the Solicitor General (Mr. Balcer). I will come back a little later during my remarks to the statement my friend the Solicitor General made this afternoon about the constitution.

First of all, Mr. Speaker, I would like to take up certain assertions, and to make the record straight about what I said previously in this house on the subject of university grants. According to page 2648 of Hansard of April 13, 1959, unrevised English version, the hon. member for Sherbrooke referred to what I had previously said. He was then taking part in the debate on the budget and I had made a speech on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Well, on that occasion, in January 1959, I had given my views to the house on this matter of university grants. After having tried, in my humble way, to expound the Canadian constitution, I said the following that I quote from the speech of the hon. member for Sherbrooke:

> Therefore, I repeat that in my opinion the fathers of confederation, in good faith, did not think in terms of universities when section 93 was enacted.

And according to what he said—I hope he did not have a text—the hon. member for Sherbrooke added:

> Mr. Speaker, I must reply to that statement made by the member for Megantic that I have never heard such superficial and inadequate interpretation of the Canadian constitution.

And he went on...

> In 1867 in addition to Laval University—

I must say that, through the reference to that quotation which at that time seemed to be the very words of the hon. member for Sherbrooke, I realized when he spoke that I had read that somewhere. But the hon. member for Sherbrooke corrected himself a few days later and indicated that the text he mentioned referred to an article published in Le Devoir of March 14, 1959, over the signature of Mr. J. Rodolphe Thibodeau, under the heading: "The reader's views."

Both statements are absolutely identical. I do not want to insinuate, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Sherbrooke arrogated somebody else's writings to himself. I only want to point out that at that time he did not indicate that somebody else had written that in a newspaper.

I wish to refer to his statement that my interpretation was superficial and inadequate.

Since then, I have found that I am not the only one to have expressed that opinion and I have here the brief submitted by McGill University, in Montreal, to the royal commission on constitutional problems which, if I am not mistaken, was known as the Tremblay commission.

That brief does not carry any signature nor any indication of the author's name, but I have every reason to believe that it was drafted by somebody who is considered as an expert in constitutional law and who is precisely a professor in constitutional law at McGill University.

As can be seen on pages 14 and 15 of the brief:

(Text):

Section 93 of the British North America Act makes no specific mention of universities nor does it touch upon the problem of financing their development. So far as we know, the subject of universities was not once discussed at any of the meetings of the fathers of confederation, and if we think of the situation that existed in Canada in 1867 we need not be surprised that the universities received so little consideration.

(Translation):

As you can see, Mr. Speaker, I was not the only one in 1959 to think that the fathers of confederation never had universities in mind when drafting the Quebec resolutions and later on the London resolutions which are the basis of the British North America Act.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as I said in the beginning, I am privileged and sorry to see that the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Dorion) is not in his seat as I want to refer to what he said the first of April 1960 concerning the resolution when he referred to certain things I had said in January 1959.

I am now quoting the very words uttered on the first of April by the member for Bellechasse and which can be found in the French Hansard, page 2940:

In the first place, Mr. Chairman, contrary to what the hon. member for Megantic seems to think, Laval was not the only Quebec university in 1867.

And he then refers to what I had said in January 1959.

And Mr. Speaker, here is what I did say in January 1959. I quote from the English Hansard of January 20, 1959, page 133.

I had just expressed my humble opinion that the fathers of confederation had not foreseen in 1867 what could happen in 1950 or 1960 and I said:

Besides, if I am not mistaken, universities...

Universities, note the plural.

—at the time were private institutions. At least, it is a well known fact, in so far as the province of Quebec is concerned, where, for instance, Laval University has been established in 1852 by the Quebec seminary.

I did not refer then to the other universities which might have been established in the province of Quebec, namely McGill and Bishop's Universities, because I only mentioned Laval University as being a private institution.

An attempt was made, unwittingly I am sure, to restrict the import of the statement I made at that time.

Mr. Speaker, coming back to the topic which the hon. member for Bellechasse dealt with on April 1, 1960, in an effort to show that I had erred in 1959 when I expressed the view that the fathers of confederation in drafting our constitution, and particularly the section on education, in 1867, had no thought for universities, I want to say in all fairness to him that the statement he made on April 1 is based on facts which are true and on statutes then existing and which nobody denies.

It was based mainly on schedule 4 to the British North America Act.

One may ask where that schedule 4 came into existence. That is one question I shall try to answer, Mr. Speaker, very modestly and probably in terms as indefinite as are the documents and papers we have to enlighten us on the early days of Canada.

I have here a work by Joseph Pope which was published in 1895 under the title: Confederation Documents. Everyone knows that Joseph Pope has also written the memoirs of Sir John A. Macdonald. It can thus be said that this author knew our history and also the life of the man who was our first prime minister.

I was unable to find in this book any clue as to the source of this schedule 4 of the 72 Quebec resolutions. I read carefully resolutions 54, 55, 56 up to 60, and others too, but in not one was there to be found anything like schedule 4. There may be the 59th resolution which I am going to quote now. It is to be found on page 50 of the work I just mentioned and the resolution was as follows:

(Text):

The several provinces shall retain all other public property therein subject to the right of Canada to assume any lands or public property required for fortifications or for the defence of the country.

(Translation):

But I am unable to find anything in those resolutions resembling what later on became schedule 4.

I also looked at those texts called the "London resolutions", and more particularly numbers 53, 54, 55, and so on, up to 58. There again, I find nothing similar to schedule 4, or to the clauses of the British North America Act which we know and on which that schedule is based.

Then I read the first, second and third drafts of the British North America Act and, again, there was nothing of schedule 4. The first time I found something approaching, was on page 194 in the fourth draft of the British North America Act, in section 61, which reads as follows:

(Text):

The assets enumerated in the schedule to this act belonging at the union to the province of Canada shall be the property of Ontario and Quebec conjointly.

(Translation):

And, in schedule B, all that we find, according to page 211 of the same book, is this:

(Text):

Schedule B—Substantially the same as the fourth schedule of the British North America Act.

(Translation):

There is nothing in this book that I got from the library to indicate where schedule 4 comes from. But, when we read section 113 of the British North America Act, we see, except for two words, or rather for one word, the substance of what I have just said about the draft. Section 113 reads as follows:

(Text):

The assets enumerated in the schedule to this act belonging at the union to the province of Canada shall be the property of Ontario and Quebec conjointly.

(Translation):

This had to do, Mr. Speaker, with the distribution of the assets held by the government of the united Canada, a distribution that did not involve education; it involved many things; the following are some of the assets included in schedule 4:

Upper Canada Building Fund.
Lunatic Asylums.
Normal School.
Court Houses in Aylmer, Montreal, Kamouraska, Lower Canada.
Law Society, Upper Canada.
Montreal Turnpike Trust.
University Permanent Fund.
Royal Institution.
Consolidated Municipal Loan Fund, Upper Canada.
Consolidated Municipal Loan Fund, Lower Canada.
Agricultural Society, Upper Canada.
Lower Canada Legislative Grant.
Quebec Fire Loan.
Temiscouata Advance Account.
Quebec Turnpike Trust.
Education—East.
Building and Jury Fund, Lower Canada.
Municipalities Fund.
Lower Canada Superior Education Income Fund.

But, Mr. Speaker, one may wonder why certain assets were assigned to Lower Canada and certain others to Upper Canada, which afterwards became members of the confederation, that is the province of Quebec and the province of Ontario.

Coming back to the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Bellechasse on April 1, I shall attempt to discover the reasons why those sums of money, those assets were distributed to one province in particular. The hon. member for Bellechasse said this, as reported on page 2810 of Hansard of April 1:

Besides, the grants were being drawn out of specific funds and distributed under existing laws.

I shall only repeat the very words of the hon. member for Bellechasse who went on to say:

In fact, if we refer to the revised statutes of lower Canada, 1860, chapter 15, part 3, we find there an "act concerning a provincial allowance in favour of higher education—

It concerned—I have the reference here—the assets confiscated from the Jesuits. Is it surprising, when we examine the question of the Jesuits' assets, that the fathers of confederation, in distributing those assets, should have decided that the money derived from them and the assets themselves should return to the province where they came from? That was elementary justice. They were, at the time of the Union Act, the property of the united Canada. They had to become again, at the time of the separation of both Canadas, the property of the province of Quebec. But, did that necessarily mean, for the fathers of confederation, that only the province of Quebec could give grants to universities, institutions of higher learning?

You will find, Mr. Speaker, that such was not the case. The hon. member referred to that royal institution for the advancement of science, the royal institution referred to in the article of Le Devoir, by Mr. Thibodeau, and to which reference was made in Hansard by the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard) last year. But, what was that royal institution?

The royal institution starts in 1801, under the constitutional act, and I draw this information from a treatise on education in Lower Canada, by Mr. J. B. Meilleur, former superintendent of the department of education of Lower Canada.

At page 10 of his treatise, Mr. Meilleur says:

To clarify the matter and to spare the reader the trouble of looking it up, here is the list of education acts to which I referred, in the following memorial:

1. Act 42, George III, chapter 17, adopted in 1801, providing for the establishment of elementary schools under the direction of the royal institution. This act is still in force, but legislative funds are no longer appropriated especially for its purpose.

At page 119 of the same book, Mr. Meilleur said:

Now, although the act concerning the royal institution schools has not been repealed it is nowhere operating.

That was 20 years later. The writer continues:

Its properties and all the schools which had been established under its auspices came under the control of the school trustees under the provisions to that effect of clause 21 of the present act, passed in 1846, to establish primary schools. However, the royal institution corporation still exists, and each year the provincial legislature grants a special subsidy of £147 15s. 4d. to its secretary to keep the archives and meet possible clerical expenses.

On page 130 of the same book, there is another reference to the royal institution, to the small McGill college, which was established, as we know, through a gift from

Hon. James McGill, designed to establish in Montreal a high school which later became McGill University.

As regards the royal institution, the hon. member for Bellechasse quoted chapter 18 of the 1854 act. You will allow me, Mr. Speaker, to quote an act adopted in 1863, which is Act 26 Victoria, chapter 6, page 3 of the preface of the brief submitted by McGill University to the commission of inquiry on constitutional problems. I read the following:

(Text):

Under various acts of the legislature of the province of Quebec culminating in the act of 1863 (26 Vict. c. 26)—

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I see there is a mistake; it is not chapter 26, but chapter 6.

(Text):

—the board of governors of McGill University was also invested with the title and powers of the Royal Institution for the Advancement of Learning, which had been created by act of the legislature in 1801.

(Translation):

That means that as early as 1863 there no longer existed any royal institution, and the acts and authority of that institution had been handed over to McGill University. In 1867, when the British North America Act was drafted and agreed to in London, it was only fair that any money or property left by the royal institution, or if McGill University should later on become dependent on that foundation due to that act of the union, it should be returned to the jurisdiction of the province of Quebec.

However, there is more to it than that, Mr. Speaker. I have learned during my short experience that you must refer not only to legal documents but to their sources. Furthermore, in order to find out what certain legislators meant and, to a certain extent, to understand the Canadian constitution, the hon. member for Bellechasse could read the speeches made by the authors of that legislation, or any other. I find in a publication of the Public Archives of Canada, entitled Index to the Debates on Confederation, 1865, a foreword or introduction, written by professor Frank Scott to whom I referred a moment ago; but, this time, it is actually professor Scott who wrote this introduction, which I should like to paraphrase.

Professor Scott deplores the fact that there was no substantial report made of the Charlottetown conference, nor of the Quebec conference, nor of the speeches which were delivered there, except perhaps that which is reported in Confederation Documents, of 1895, which I quoted a moment ago.

After having deplored that, professor Scott adds, as recorded on page 7:

However, the general principles of federal union were hotly discussed on many occasions, both in parliament and on the hustings.

Then we read a sentence which is of no importance for the sake of my own argument. And professor Scott goes on to say:

However the researcher must consult the various parliamentary journals and the official reports if he wants to read up on the subject. After all, the parliamentary debates of Canada on confederation are the only copy and the only substantial and serious analysis of the project of a union and of the developments of that project until the end of the Quebec conference.

At page 9, the author goes on to say this:

We shall not reach unanimity on the value and the purport of those debates. The evidence, like any evidence of the kind, must be studied with care and used cautiously.

Farther down, the author says:

It is none the less very important evidence which acquaints with the thoughts, hopes and fears of the leaders of the time on confederation.

Mr. Speaker, I shall spare you some other representations that I might make because time is getting on.

With the help of this index which is very well made, I read in the report of the debates that took place in 1865 the speeches of those who attended the conferences of Charlottetown and Quebec.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, I shall not quote everything I read because I ran through all the parts where mention was made of education and schools, and nowhere did I find any reference to universities and institutions of higher learning. However, mention was made of Catholic confessional schools, of dissident schools, of public schools and of separate schools, and it is the only reason, in my opinion, why paragraph 6 of the forty third resolution was enacted. It reads as follows:

(Text):

Education, saving the rights and privileges that the Protestant and Catholic minorities in both Canadas may possess as to their denominational schools at the time that the union comes into operation.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, in the light of paragraph 6 of resolution 43 which later became section 93 of the British North America Act, we see that the only concern of the fathers of confederation, and of all those who studied the 72 resolutions was the safeguard of the minority in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, in order to allow them to keep the school system that had been instituted in each of these provinces.

Mr. Speaker, having quoted those facts, I believe that if the hon. member for Bellechasse had a right to conclude that the fathers of confederation had necessarily thought of universities in drafting those texts, I have a right also to come to the conclusion I drew last year. Besides, I am not the only one to come to this conclusion. May I remind you, however, of the words quoted at the beginning of my remarks.

But there is more. As I said before, I am not the only one to think so, and I would quote in this respect what Rev. Father Egide-M. Roy, of the minor brothers, said in 1924, in his book entitled "The development of the French-Canadian school system". I read it after I had expressed my views on the matter last year, Mr. Speaker. This is what Rev. Father Roy has to say on page 231:

In order to give some idea of education in the province of Quebec, we must first put aside secondary and higher education, i.e. classical colleges and universities. These institutions have been developed under the sole leadership of the clergy and they remained outside all governmental action or influence. They are private corporations, with their own identity. If for the past few years, they have been receiving grants—which are anyhow rather meagre—they nevertheless keep their complete independence.

That was what Rev. Father Roy said in 1924, Mr. Speaker, and I believe that conditions have not changed, either in 1951 nor in 1957 nor in 1960.

I therefore think, Mr. Speaker, that I am entitled to express my humble opinion and to conclude that the central government, or rather the central parliament, has a perfect right to vote grants to the universities without encroaching on provincial autonomy in the educational field.

There is an important distinction to be made between the power to grant subsidies —or make gifts—and the authority to legislate in educational matters.

And this is what I find on page 17 of the brief submitted by McGill University:

(Text):

Much confusion has arisen in discussion of this subject through a failure to distinguish between the power to spend crown moneys on behalf of education and the power to make laws in relation to education.

(Translation):

There is a basic difference between distributing sums of money collected by way of direct taxation in the federal field, and the power to legislate in the field of education.

Under the Liberal formula, the government of the time placed no condition on the use to be made of the funds distributed, it had no controlling authority over the administration of universities; it exercised no influence in the drafting of curricula or in the choice of teachers. In fact, all that was done at the time, that is in 1951, and since, was to determine the amount of money to be given by the federal government to institutions of higher learning, both in the province of Quebec and in the other Canadian provinces.

Mr. Speaker, at this stage of my remarks, I think we have reached an appropriate time to ask you to call it ten o'clock.

(Text):

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask if there is any change in the program announced last night for the business of the week?

Mr. Churchill: No change in the program; we expect tomorrow, by arrangement, to have the debate on apartheid. I will announce the business for Thursday and Friday tomorrow if there is any change in the program as outlined.

Mr. Chevrier: I wonder if I could get some indication at this stage as to what we will be doing on Monday next?

Mr. Churchill: Monday of next week would be a supply motion.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

C.N.R. LAY-OFFS, LONDON, ONT.

Question No. 322—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

1. Has the government received representations from the brotherhood of railway carmen of America, local 488, requesting government action or assistance to reduce recent lay-offs in the Canadian National Railways car shops in London, Ontario? If so, on what dates?

2. Did the representations call attention to the situation wherein work formerly done at the car shops in London is now being farmed out to other contractors?

3. What action has the government taken to deal with lay-offs of the nature mentioned?

4. Has the government received any indication as to whether or not the car shops at London may be closed down?

Answer by: Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport):

1 and 2. No recent representations have been received from local 488 but the management of the Canadian National Railways advise that work formerly done at the London shops has not been contracted out.

3. Matters of this kind come strictly within the administrative control of the management of the railway and representations made to the government are drawn to the attention of the management.

4. The management advise that meetings were held in London on April 13 with union representatives and employees and with the London city council, at which time advice was given that subsequent to the end of July, 1960, work on passenger cars only will be discontinued in the London shops. Medium and heavy repairs to freight cars, work equipment, and miscellaneous equipment, employing upwards of 300 men will not be affected by the work reassignment. The majority of the passenger workshop employees will have an opportunity to transfer to other assignments, and displaced employees will be interviewed by counsellors qualified to advise on what other work may be available.

STUDENT EMPLOYMENT, PUBLIC SERVICE

Question No. 328—Mr. Boivin:

1. How many students were employed by the federal government during each summer since 1956?

2. What was the average earnings of such students, and how many weeks or months were they employed during each of these years?

Answer by: Hon. Leon Balcer (Acting Secretary of State):

1. The following figures include graduate and undergraduate students employed under civil service commission certificate throughout Canada in the agriculture, applied and pure science, arts and social science fields: 1956 season, 1,172; 1957 season, 988; 1958 season, 1,034; 1959 season, 1,084.

2. The salary ranges for undergraduates were as follows: 1956, $220 to $280; 1957, $245 to $280; 1958, $245 to $305; 1959, $245 to $305.

Salaries for graduates employed during the summer vary widely and cover many classes and range up to $500 per month.

During these years, some students engaged for summer employment have been retained for several weeks and others for several months. The average period of employment was approximately two and a half months.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, April 27, 1960

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Second report of standing committee on external affairs—Mr. Lennard.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF NEW CHAIRMAN OF CHIEFS OF STAFF

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The house will recall that on January 20 I announced the retirement of General Charles Foulkes as chairman of the chiefs of staff. It has now been agreed that the general's retirement will take effect on May 31 and that Air Marshal F. R. Miller, at present deputy minister of the Department of National Defence, will be appointed chairman of the chiefs of staff, effective June 1.

Air Marshal Miller previously served in senior appointments in the air force and at SHAPE in Paris before he received his appointment to deputy minister in August, 1955. Air Marshal Miller will be reappointed to the air force on May 31 to take up his new appointment on June 1.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): It is, I know, not customary for us on this side to comment on government appointments and on retirements from the public service, but in view of General Foulkes' very long and distinguished service as chairman of the chiefs of staff committee perhaps I may be permitted to express our gratitude for that service and our regret at his retirement, along with our very best wishes to Air Marshal Miller who has been chosen to succeed him. I know from his past record of achievement that Air Marshal Miller will be a very worthy successor to a great Canadian public servant.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): On behalf of this group I want to support the remarks made by the leader of the official opposition with respect to General Foulkes and with respect to the appointment of his successor.

Mr. Diefenbaker: So there may be no misunderstanding may I say that I have already paid tribute to General Foulkes and am naturally in agreement with what the Leader of the Opposition has said.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

COLOMBO PLAN—STATEMENT ON AID TO PAKISTAN

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I have a short statement to make concerning Canada's Colombo plan aid program in Pakistan.

The house will be interested to know that under the 1959-60 Colombo plan capital aid program, Canada has agreed to make available to Pakistan $15 million, which will be used to provide Canadian commodities and equipment requested by the Pakistan government to help it carry forward its economic development plan. This $15 million will be used for the following purposes:

$3,730,000 for the provision of industrial metals including tinplate, aluminum, steel and sheet metal which are required to maintain a satisfactory level of industrial activity and employment in Pakistan's metal-working industries;

$3,650,000 for the provision of wheat to meet food shortages;

$3,010,000 for the provision of fertilizers which will be used to help Pakistan meet one of its most urgent problems, the increased production of food;

$60,000 to be used to carry out economic and engineering studies on a number of new capital projects which Pakistan has requested Canada to consider;

$4,550,000 will be set aside for allocation to new projects which are under consideration at the present time.

In addition to these capital aid allocations Canada is continuing its program of technical co-operation in Pakistan as part of its over-all Colombo plan program for south and south-east Asia.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): I am sure the house will be pleased to hear this announcement of the continuance of Colombo plan aid to Pakistan and will be, generally speaking, in accord with it. I am glad to observe that the minister is continuing the course of adhering to the purpose of the Colombo plan in trying to divert any expenditure for this purpose to technical assistance and capital works which will increase the productive capacity of the receiving countries and their ability to help themselves.

I notice there is one item included of $3.65 million for the purchase of wheat. I presume there will be counterpart funds set aside, so that to the extent that there is a deviation from the original Colombo plan it will be made up in large part through the technique of counterpart funds. I recognize that this is probably their wish and that this is a proper method of handling it.

Mr. Green: That is the intention, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of a group that throughout the years has promoted policies for the assistance of the needy of the world, we naturally support the minister's announcement and were pleased to hear him make it. We are glad to see this application in international affairs of policies we have advocated for many years.

AUTAIR HELICOPTER SERVICES—AIRCRAFT ACCIDENTS, 1959

Question No. 130—Mr. Chevrier:

1. Did Autair Helicopter Services Limited, have any accidents with its aircraft in 1959?
2. If so, how many such accidents and what was the nature of each?
3. What aircraft were involved?
4. Did the accidents result in partial or complete write-off of these aircraft?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answer to part 1 is yes.

The answer to part 2 is four, as follows:

Part 3 is answered by the answer to part 2.

The answer to part 4 is yes, as follows:

(a) CF-KMV, substantial damage.

(b) CF-KMX, substantial damage.

(c) CF-KMW, complete write-off.

(b) CF-IKS, Bell 47G2, owned by Western Helicopter Limited and operated by Autair, northeast Quebec, 9 April 1960, was reported as a crash during a forced landing due to control difficulties.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

APARTHEID—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 26

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time to beg leave to move the adjournment of the house under standing order 26 for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely the threat to relations of confidence and friendship between members of the commonwealth caused by the policy of apartheid.

The importance of this subject does not, I think, have to be emphasized by me; it is reflected in the interest and concern felt throughout the country, which has been demonstrated. The urgency of the matter, Mr. Speaker, is I think underlined by the fact that the Prime Minister will be leaving tomorrow morning to attend a commonwealth prime ministers' meeting in London, and I would think it might be desirable for the Prime Minister to have the views of the house on this matter before he goes to London.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if I might speak for a moment on this, I am leaving tomorrow. The subject is one that is of general interest and urgency, and I would appreciate very much the opportunity of hearing the views of the house on this subject. Therefore there is no objection whatsoever to the motion moved by the Leader of the Opposition.

Apartheid Policy in Commonwealth

Mr. Speaker: Shall the Leader of the Opposition have leave to move the proposed motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I move this motion for the purpose of initiating a discussion of a matter which as I have said I think is of great importance, interest and concern to the Canadian parliament and people, and a matter on which the views of the house should be made known before the Prime Minister—

Mr. Speaker: In case the exact motion before the house might be overlooked, I think I should put it before the hon. member continues his speech. Moved by Mr. Pearson that the house do now adjourn.

Mr. Pearson: As I was saying, Mr. Speaker —and I apologize for not having given you an opportunity to put the motion—I think it is desirable, as the Prime Minister has already indicated, that the views of the house on this matter might be made known to him and the government before he departs for the commonwealth prime ministers' conference in London.

Before dealing with this matter in the context of the commonwealth, perhaps I may be permitted on behalf of the official opposition —as this will be the last opportunity before he leaves—to convey to the Prime Minister our good wishes for his mission and our best hopes for a happy and successful sojourn in London.

Along with that wish we express our hopes that this conference, to which I know the Prime Minister will make an important contribution for Canada, will result especially at this time, as other commonwealth conferences in the past have resulted, in strengthening good and constructive relationships within the commonwealth so that the members of the commonwealth may continue to play an even stronger and more constructive part for peace in the world.

I understand, though I have no official confirmation of the fact, that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green) will be leaving with the Prime Minister to attend a meeting of the NATO council in Turkey, I believe. If that is the case I should like to include him in our good wishes for a successful and profitable journey. I am sure the deliberations of the NATO council at this particular time will be as significant as on any occasion in the past. It is of great importance to all of us that these deliberations should result in strengthening NATO and trying to work out a common NATO policy on the eve of the summit conference. I hope—indeed, I know—that the minister will do his part at this NATO council meeting to bring about that result.

I am sure the commonwealth meeting in London will not only be an important one, but in the circumstances of today perhaps in some ways it will be an uneasy and even difficult one. The commonwealth has, of course, faced its difficulties before now and surmounted them. I believe this will be the first meeting of commonwealth prime ministers since July, 1957, and in view of the complexity and difficulty of the subjects which will face the prime ministers perhaps our own Prime Minister may conceivably have changed his mind, as expressed on one occasion, that there should be a meeting of commonwealth prime ministers every year if practicable, I think he added, which is an important addition.

The value of the informal character of these commonwealth prime ministers' conferences—and I stress the word "informal"—is admitted, especially by anyone who has had the privilege and responsibility of taking part in them. Very often they have no specific agenda at all or in the sense at least that controversial subjects are rarely put on any agenda unless they are agreed to in advance. But whatever may be the nature of the formal agenda or lack of it, informal discussions customarily do take place at meetings of this kind on the most controversial and difficult subjects; and they can be, of course, and in the past have been on more than one occasion, the most important discussions that take place.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that recent developments in South Africa make it desirable and, indeed, I should think make it inevitable that, whatever may be the nature of the formal agenda, at least informally and perhaps in a very important way these developments should be considered. I agree, Mr. Speaker, that based on the experience of the past, it would be a mistake to formalize agendas at meetings of this kind; but I think it would even be a greater mistake at this time not to take advantage of the opportunity of exchanging views informally on this and every other matter of interest, however controversial, to the member governments and member peoples of the commonwealth.

The effort to formalize and organize the commonwealth itself through centralized institutions would have prevented its development at all and, if it had been persisted in, I think might well have resulted in its disappearance in its present form. There were those in this country and in other countries who, with the very best of intentions and desires, sought that kind of commonwealth growth. However, I think it is fortunate for the commonwealth that any effort in that direction was not successful. If such an effort in the twenties and early thirties—and I am talking now about centralizing and institutionalizing the commonwealth—was not successful, it would be, of course, quite impossible now because of the very nature of the membership, with governments having different foreign policies and indeed very different international commitments. So the commonwealth today is a close and family association without the binding commitments which it sometimes undertakes through formal treaty obligations.

There have been great changes, of course, in this association. There have been changes from the old British empire to the first British commonwealth brought about in the twenties and sealed by the Statute of Westminster in 1932, I think it was. There were changes from the first British commonwealth of nations in the thirties to the second commonwealth of nations which developed after world war II. Indeed, the shrinking of the old British empire into the present commonwealth in a sense represents its greatest achievement; for out of this empire, have peacefully emerged by evolution those free nations which make up our new and enlarged commonwealth today. That emergence has taken more than one form and has expressed itself in more than one way. It is well that we should be clear about this matter as the commonwealth faces perhaps some difficult problems in the days ahead.

Some of the members—Canada, Australia and New Zealand—have grown from colonies to independent states, with strong ties of race, sentiment, history and heritage still linking them to the mother country long after they have achieved full self-government. But other nations of the commonwealth have an entirely different historical basis for membership in this association. South Africa, which is very much in our minds today, became a member out of its defeat in war and out of British magnanimity and statesmanship in victory. India, Pakistan, Ceylon and Malaya were British colonies but with old cultures and civilizations of their own, anteceding those indeed of the mother country itself. These ancient nations and modern colonies and now independent states—and we sometimes forget this—learned a great deal from the British. They learned of the rule of law, even-handed justice, fair dealing, administrative and governmental order and methods. Indeed, it was the British, even though they may not have been very conscious of it at the time, who also gave them a sense of national consciousness which, in some cases, they had never possessed before. It was on this basis that their freedom developed.

There is also now a native African member of the commonwealth, and very soon there are likely to be others along with a West Indies federation and perhaps a Mediterranean island. Their peoples have never in the past had a cohesive national identity or a continuous national story as we understand it, but they have nevertheless now become independent, indigenous states with only in some cases a few white Britishers to recall the previous political connection with Whitehall.

All this means that there has been a fundamental change from empire to commonwealth, and there has been an equally important change from old commonwealth to new commonwealth. It is this new multiracial commonwealth which exists today, representing every clime, every religion and almost every culture. Four fifths of the people who make up this new commonwealth are Asian, a fact which has an important bearing on the troubles in South Africa. This new commonwealth includes the second most populous country in the world and the second most populous Moslem state. It represents three of the ancient civilizations of mankind, namely Judeo-Christian, Hindu and Islam. Inside it there are four monarchies by choice and conviction. There are three nations that have stated their intention of becoming republics. There are two that actually are republics and there is one, an elected monarchy, where the local monarch—and I am referring to Malaya—accepts another monarch in London as the head of the association. It must seem all very confusing to any logical student of political forms and organizations, but in its way it works. It has worked well in the past, and we hope it will work even better in its new sphere in the future.

The commonwealth has adjusted itself pragmatically and on the whole gracefully to a long series of changing circumstances. Yet it would be folly—and I hope the Secretary of State for External Affairs will not accuse me of being pessimistic when I say this—to become complacent about what has been done or to assume that this beneficent progress must inevitably and automatically continue. There is no certainty today that it will do so, although we hope it will. It would also be foolish to try to obscure the new problems facing us in a haze of patriotic oratory. As the United Kingdom prime minister himself said on his return from Africa, I think it was about the end of January—and I quote from the press report of a statement he made on his return:

> We mustn't take the commonwealth for granted. We could easily break it up or throw it away.

There are undoubtedly difficulties ahead and Africa has shown that they can develop into dangers for the commonwealth association. But there are also opportunities for even greater service of this multiracial association; to its members and to the world—

I therefore think, and I am sure all members in the house will agree with me on this matter, that it remains an important objective of Canada's policy to help avoid the dangers ahead and to help realize the full opportunities of the commonwealth association. It should be a privilege for any Canadian to work for the maintenance and strengthening of this commonwealth of nations as a strong force for peace, security and progress in the world of 1960.

Mr. Speaker, there is one particular and special difficulty very much in our minds, which is referred to in this resolution, which confronts us and the commonwealth today. That is the policy of apartheid in the Union of South Africa. I am sure that difficulty will be very much in the minds of the commonwealth prime ministers when they are in London, as it is also in our minds in this parliament today as well as in the minds of the people of Canada.

Apartheid is a policy founded on racial segregation, on racial discrimination, on racial privilege on the one hand and racial inferiority on the other. Any person who has any affinity at all with liberal views—and I use the word "liberal" with the smallest of "l's"—must protest against that kind of policy wherever it might be found in the world, especially if it were found in any of its aspects in our own country. Because it is a policy of differentiation based on race and colour. It is a policy of separate development, and it has been applied in South Africa in a strict, determined, and I believe narrow way. It is a policy particularly offensive to the other members of the commonwealth, especially those in Africa and in Asia who make up four fifths of the people of this association.

This question of apartheid has over the years been before the United Nations for international consideration. So far as the period during which I, as a member of a government, had some responsibility is concerned, I recall that the Canadian delegation at the United Nations joined other delegations in condemnation of the policy of racial discrimination but were cautious about condemning South Africa itself. In those earlier years we hoped that more liberal trends, more liberal policies and more liberal people, if you like, in South Africa would get stronger in their influence and that the South Africans themselves would remove any legitimate causes of international complaint.

We feared in those days that outright and formal condemnation of the South African government, quite apart from any special problem or difficulty arising out of the commonwealth association, would weaken rather than strengthen these liberal forces by rallying all white South Africans behind their government and its policy in the face of attack from outside, because that kind of attack by condemnation from outside very often has that effect inside. We hoped, then, that Canadian and other commonwealth influences could be used as opportunity offered to impress on South Africa that the policy of apartheid was wrong, that it could not succeed; that it was hurting South Africa itself and should be changed. Any such intervention or friendly pressure of that kind would of course have been made difficult then, if not impossible, by supporting outright strong and formal condemnation of South Africa itself at the United Nations.

Mr. Speaker, whatever may have been the situation earlier, whatever may have been the considerations which at that time seemed to prompt caution, whatever may have been our hopes in those days, in the light of later developments, recent developments especially, it is surely no longer possible to refrain from speaking out; because these recent developments have shown depressingly and conclusively that the hoped for evolution in the right direction has not been taking place. Indeed, these most recent developments, have confirmed among other things, what was becoming increasingly evident, that South African policy was moving, if it were moving at all, in the wrong direction.

So there was bound to be violence, and it culminated in the tragedy of Sharpeville, an event that shocked the conscience of the world; at least that part of the conscience of the world which has the right to express itself in freedom. That tragedy and subsequent events, as I have already stated outside this house, should cause dismay and distress to us all.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this matter has been referred to during this session. It was brought up on January 29 by my hon. friend the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), who, dealing with apartheid, asked the Prime Minister, as reported on page 491 of Hansard, whether he did not think, in view of the character of these meetings—that is, the commonwealth meetings in London, with their secrecy—that this was among the kind of questions that should be discussed, as they have been discussed, among the prime ministers of the commonwealth.

This question was referred to later, on February 11, by myself, when I had this to say as reported on page 983 of Hansard:

I do not think anybody in this house, certainly nobody in this party, would wish to take any course of action which would drive South Africa out of the commonwealth, but we surely do not wish to see a course followed by South Africa which will drive four fifths of the people in the commonwealth outside the commonwealth.

Then on March 23 I asked the Prime Minister whether, having had an opportunity to examine the reports from South Africa, he could express the distress and dismay of this parliament at the violence which was used in South Africa in measures taken in connection with a coloured demonstration against the racial policies of the South African government, which violence resulted in such tragic loss of life. The Prime Minister replied that he had not received the report he had requested through diplomatic channels, and that until he had done so he thought it would be inappropriate to make any statement except to reiterate the fact—and I here quote from Hansard, page 2349——that we deplore the development of a situation which has given rise to such tragic violence and loss of life.

Then on March 25 I asked the Prime Minister whether he had received the report in question and whether he had any statement to make. He replied, as reported on page 2448 of Hansard:

The conclusion of the government is that at this time no beneficial purpose would be served by diplomatic protests or by even more extreme measures to intervene in this tragic situation.

Then on March 31 I asked the Prime Minister whether he would instruct the Canadian representative in South Africa to inform the South African government of the alarm and distress of this parliament at political developments which had led to such violence and might lead to anarchy. The Prime Minister replied that the views that had been expressed in this chamber in recent days had been made known to the representative of South Africa in Ottawa.

Then on April 1 I asked the Prime Minister whether he would make provision to express the views of this parliament through a resolution on the policy of apartheid, and provision has now been made for a discussion of the matter.

Mr. Speaker, I think one of the first questions we should ask ourselves as we discuss this matter is this. Have we the right in the Canadian parliament to intervene and express our views and have those views made known to the government of South Africa? I think we have not only that right, but now we have that duty.

It has been suggested in some quarters that if the governments of the commonwealth took irresponsible or drastic or strong action it might drive South Africa out of the commonwealth. Certainly that is not the purpose of anything I am saying today, and I hope it is not the purpose of any hon. member of this house. But we cannot refuse to face the situation—it is one which, I hope, will not materialize—that South Africa may drive herself out of the commonwealth by forcing a choice between her policies and the views of other members. I read only this morning a report from Kuala Lumpur in Malaya which underlines this danger. Perhaps this is the kind of danger which the prime ministers' conference to be held in London may be able to avoid. Before he left for London the Prime Minister of Malaya, with the unanimous support of his parliament, said he was going to raise this question in London, and he added these words which I quote from a Reuters dispatch:

If South Africa chooses to get out of the commonwealth as a result of my actions, then I say "good riddance".

That, surely, is the sort of thing which the right kind of intervention by the parliaments of the commonwealth could perhaps prevent rather than bring about. Therefore the purpose of this intervention on my part is to express my own views and the views of my party on this matter in the hope that this kind of expression and intervention may help to correct the situation in South Africa which, if it is not corrected, may have the worst kind of result for the commonwealth association.

Our Prime Minister is reported as having said toward the end of January of this year to a delegation of the Canadian Labour Congress—and I quote from the press report—

The essence of the commonwealth is the independence of its members. I ask you what would be our reaction in Canada if some other part of the commonwealth were to criticize us.

Up to a point I agree entirely with that. We have to be careful and responsible before we indulge in idle criticism of not only other members of the commonwealth but other friendly states. But surely this situation in South Africa now has gone beyond the point of no criticism.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not want to interrupt the Leader of the Opposition, but I would point out that the suggestion made in the representations by the labour congress was that South Africa, if it failed to act in a manner suggested, should be put out of the commonwealth.

Mr. Pearson: I remember that. It came up in the house, and the Prime Minister made it clear he would not subscribe to any purpose or action of that kind. I think I have already indicated my agreement on that point. Now the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, who is as responsible and careful in these matters as, I think, any leader of a government could be, speaking in Capetown to the South African parliament itself in January of this year had this to say—perhaps I may quote from what he is reported to have said—

> In this shrinking world in which we live today, the internal policies of one nation may have effects outside it. We may sometimes be tempted to say to each other, "Mind your own business". But, in these days, I would myself expand the old saying so that it runs "Mind your own business, but mind how it affects my business, too."
> Let me be very frank with you, my friends—

Remember, he is talking to the South African parliament.

> As a fellow member of the commonwealth, it is our earnest desire to give South Africa our support and encouragement, but I hope you won't mind my saying frankly that there are some aspects of your policies which make it impossible for us to do this without being false to our own deep convictions about the political destinies of free men—

That was a courageous statement, particularly in view of the fact that it was made in South Africa. Thus, I say, we have not only the right but the duty to criticize, publicly dissociate ourselves from and, indeed, protest against the apartheid policies of the government of South Africa.

The correspondent of the London Observer in Johannesburg had this to say on April 23—last Saturday—and I quote from his report:

> The recent crisis has been settled in a way that takes South Africa closer to revolution; it has now entered a shadowy period of complete uncertainty. This is the moment for constructive international influence to make itself felt—
> It is no longer possible to argue that what happens in South Africa is not a threat to world peace. It is most decidedly so, and the west should act accordingly.

Certainly domestic violence in that part of the world can become a threat to international order and international peace; and any policy of white supremacy, colour discrimination and race segregation based on the doctrine of apartheid is bound to result in violence. Perhaps I might be permitted to quote what I said on this point outside the house. I said:

> Such a policy can only lead to tragedy which will engulf the white minority as well as the coloured majority. It may lead even to anarchy. The South African government should know how Canadians feel about this.
>
> In taking our stand against these policies and the principles on which they are based, we in Canada have no reason to be smug or superior. It would be hypocritical on our part to praise ourselves that we are not as other men: if we had faced conditions that other people have had to face, who have racial problems that we know nothing of, our record might not be as good as it is.
> Our country is not twisted by discords of the past or torn by racial enmities handed down as part of history. We have few of the national prejudices and ancient grudges that, in other and older countries, maintain and foster enmities and suspicions. But who can say that we are free from intolerance and discrimination and bigotry?
> So let us avoid any trace of smug holier than thou superiority—nevertheless, it is true—and we have the right to say it—that any governmental policy in any country which is based on racial superiority or discrimination will not succeed but in time will lead only to disaster.
>
> No government, no nation, can have security, peace and progress in the future which bases its policy of the present on these false, wrong and evil assumptions.
> We Canadians have the right, and indeed the duty, to condemn strongly and clearly what we cannot approve, remembering that condemnation of these things in other countries will have a hollow ring if we permit them in any shape or form at home.

So our condemnation, our protest, must be constructive and even understanding, and not merely captious and emotional. I do not pretend to know very much about South Africa. Indeed, I know very little except from what I have been able to read and study; but surely any student of history, ancient or contemporary, is bound to come to the conclusion that there must be a change in South African policy before it is too late or the events of recent weeks will be nothing to what will happen in the months ahead. The winds of change are blowing in that part of the world and those who do not recognize this will be blown away. Time surely is not on the side of the white South Africans in this matter any more than the facts and the tides of contemporary history are on their side. What may have been possible, even if it were not right, 50 years ago is now neither right nor possible.

There are deep, dark forces at work which may soon sweep away the chances of any settlement based on reason and justice. This becomes more likely as the moderate, reasonable and more experienced non-white leaders in South Africa—along with white leaders of the opposition to apartheid—are now being jailed. All history shows that in these circumstances there is only one result; the forces and the leaders of extremism and of violence take over even though they may temporarily be driven underground. There are also, no doubt, externally controlled subversive elements present in South Africa who are happy to exploit the situation and happy to see the South African government make easier their task.

Back in 1909 when the British House of Commons was considering the bill to give South Africa self-government as a union—that bill and that action was a great tribute to the magnanimity and farsighted wisdom of Great Britain—a Liberal member of that day—I think his name was Mr. Byles—had this to say, and I quote from the Hansard of that time:

> A gulf, a widening and dangerous gulf is being fixed between black and white. Some day they will hear the call of their blood.

That call is becoming a cry as blood is being shed. In that poignant, moving story of South Africa by Alan Paton, "Cry, the Beloved Country", which no doubt many hon. members have read, the author has one of his characters say:

> I fear that when we whites learn to love you Africans, you will have learned to hate us.

How can there be any other result if a government in 1960 insists with obstinate determination, yes, with a fierce sincerity, and even in some cases with religious conviction, on applying the policies of apartheid to three quarters of its people, at a time when the universal declaration of human rights has been accepted by all governments as a solemn commitment and by all peoples as their due. In these unhappy circumstances this house has a right and, I repeat, a duty to make its views known clearly and strongly, but with responsibility. I give these views as I see them in the hope that they may commend themselves to the house, and I summarize them as follows. We deplore and protest against the policy of apartheid of the government of South Africa under which persons because of race and colour are denied by law human rights and fundamental freedoms. We have watched with anxiety and dismay this policy lead to arbitrary arrests and detentions without trial, to unrest and violence. We believe that its continuance seriously threatens those relations of confidence and friendship which are necessary for any continued and constructive association between members of the commonwealth.

We are convinced that peace and order in any country can in the long run be secured and maintained only on the basis of freedom and non-discrimination and on full respect for the dignity and worth of all men, whatever their race, colour or creed.

I venture to express the hope that the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) when he goes to London may see fit to make known views of this kind or views which may be more appropriately expressed than the way in which I have tried to express them, not only to the delegate of South Africa but to all the members of that conference as representing the views of this parliament of Canada and that he also may see fit to send views of this kind directly to the South African government through the diplomatic channels.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, before proceeding to deal with the motion which is before the house may I take the liberty of thanking the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) for the good wishes he extended to me in respect of my trip to the NATO foreign ministers' meeting in Istanbul, Turkey at the commencement of next week. It always helps a great deal, as I am sure that hon. gentleman found by experience, to be able to go to these meetings feeling that one has behind him the encouraging thoughts of his fellow members of parliament. I am very hopeful that some worth-while progress will be made during the course of these meetings.

In addition to the ordinary NATO meetings there is to be a meeting of the five foreign ministers of the western countries which are members of the ten-member disarmament committee, for the purpose of preparing the case on disarmament for the chiefs of state and heads of government who will represent the west at the summit meeting on May 16. This particular work, too, is of great importance and I am hopeful that one result will be that more progress will be made in the field of disarmament during the weeks that lie ahead.

The subject under discussion today is one which has touched the emotions and the consciences of all Canadians very deeply. In the heat of political statements there have been some suggestions made that the members of the government are not as much concerned and upset about this problem as they might be. In this connection I should like to refer to a statement made by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), house leader of the C.C.F., when speaking in this house on March 25, 1960 as reported at page 2453 of Hansard. The hon. member said:

> From my associations with hon. members opposite and from the public statements of the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs I can say that I know of no one in this chamber who condones what is being done in South Africa.

The Leader of the Opposition has taken that same position in his remarks this afternoon and that is an accurate statement of the feelings of every member of parliament sitting here today.

Unfortunately there have been quite violent criticisms of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) on this point and I have found them very difficult to understand because throughout his whole career in public life he has been against discrimination of any kind.

Apartheid Policy in Commonwealth

May I say on this point, too, that I do not think there is a member in the house who believes down in his heart that the Prime Minister of Canada is not frightfully disturbed about this South African question and just as strongly opposed to discrimination of any kind as he has been throughout his career. This had been shown during the course of the last three weeks right here in the house. I would refer, for example, to the first occasion when the question was raised, which was on March 22. I am reading from page 2299 of Hansard. The Prime Minister had this to say:

> The attitude of the Canadian government has been made clear on more than one occasion, that anything in the nature of racial discrimination is not regarded favourably and is indeed condemned.

On March 23, in answer to a further question, he said this, and this particular extract was read by the Leader of the Opposition in the course of his speech a few moments ago. I am reading from page 2341 of Hansard:

> It would be inappropriate to make any statement, except to reiterate the fact that we deplore the development of a situation which has given rise to such tragic violence and loss of life.

Two days later, on March 25, the Prime Minister said, and I am quoting from page 2448 of Hansard:

> I have already made it clear on numerous occasions that the government has no sympathy for policies of racial discrimination and that we deplore the development of a situation which has given rise to such tragic violence and loss of life.

There were further similar statements, one in particular on March 31, when the Prime Minister was being questioned by the Leader of the Opposition, and I am quoting from page 2641 of Hansard:

> The house will be aware, from the statements I have made in this house since the recent disturbances began, of how profoundly the government regrets and deplores the tragic situation which prevails in that country.

The Prime Minister was referring to South Africa. I continue:

> I should add, too, that the views that have been expressed in this chamber in recent days have been made known to the representative of South Africa in Ottawa.

I can vouch for that latter statement, as I had made those views known myself to the acting high commissioner for South Africa. Then, on April 11, after Mr. Norman Phillips, Canadian newsman, had been arrested in South Africa, the Prime Minister had this to say, as found at page 3087 of Hansard:

> The matter was taken up with me, acting in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and as a result the Canadian high commissioner was instructed to inform the South African government that the arrest and detention of Mr. Phillips could not but add to the widespread public indignation already felt in Canada at the measures which had given rise to recent violence and loss of life in South Africa.

[Mr. Green.]

Those representations were made by the Canadian high commissioner in South Africa to the minister of external affairs of that country. Perhaps I might point out that as a result of those representations Mr. Phillips was released; an act which brought comment in the British House of Commons to the effect that the Canadian government seemed to have a good deal more ability to get Canadian newsmen released than was the case with the British government in its dealings concerning their newsmen who were in difficulties.

These steps have been taken; these protests have been made, and yet three days ago the national leader of the C.C.F., Mr. M. J. Coldwell, for whom we all have the greatest respect, is reported as stating this in Vancouver:

> We've heard so much about human rights and fundamental freedoms from our present Prime Minister.
> Yet when these human rights and fundamental freedoms are being fought for and people are being put to death in the fight for them, all we have from our present Prime Minister and our government in Ottawa is silence.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that this statement was far from fair; it was completely inaccurate and misleading and could only have one effect, namely to stir up the Canadian people unjustly and try to convince them that their Prime Minister and their government did not care at all about what was happening in South Africa, and had cared so little that nothing whatever had been done to try to remedy the situation.

I do not mind criticism at all, but I ask hon. members with respect to the stand taken by Mr. Coldwell, what would they have the Canadian government do? What more could we have done short of withdrawing our high commissioner from South Africa, and would that have been the slightest bit of help in getting this very difficult problem solved?

It might be wise to consider the attitude taken by Mr. Hammerskjold, the Secretary General of the United Nations, and a great world statesman. As you know, Mr. Speaker, some weeks ago the security council passed a resolution which condemned the Union of South Africa. Mr. Hammarskjold, of course, then had the responsibility for doing something about the resolution but he did not run around the world making statements which could only incite people. In his effective way he has been able to arrange to have a conference with the foreign minister of South Africa, and possibly other ministers, in London on May 12; and, furthermore, to visit South Africa himself during the month of July.

I do suggest that a similar attitude might be adopted in Canada. Extreme views on this question or on any other difficult question never help very much, and surely this is not the Canadian way to carry on. It is not the Canadian way to go to extremes of one kind or another. The reputation we have among the nations of the world is a reputation for a cool-headed attitude, and not for rushing off after this mirage or after that mirage and getting all excited and making fantastic statements.

I turn again in this connection to the same speech made by Mr. Coldwell, and may I say that there is no one whom I dislike more having to criticize. According to press reports, he said at Vancouver in the same speech:

> The British commonwealth would be better off without South Africa . . . Withdrawal of South Africa from the commonwealth of nations would relieve the commonwealth of a terrific embarrassment.

In answer I would cite a statement made by another socialist public man, Mr. Nash, the Prime Minister of New Zealand. He said on March 31:

> There is no way to save a holocaust in South Africa except by quiet reasoned discussion.

The proper approach to this question was given again yesterday by Prime Minister Macmillan in the British House of Commons when he was being questioned on this subject. He said:

> All these matters are very much in our minds, terribly in our minds.

Mind you, although we in Canada think this problem is serious it is infinitely more difficult for the British.

> What we here have to try to do is to use this coming conference to make all the progress we can in these matters, to preserve the unity of the commonwealth, and to see how far, in the more intimate discussions that the prime ministers are able to have with each other, they can make some useful contribution to the problem. I would venture to ask members and the house as a whole to recognize the very heavy responsibility that lies on this country at the moment.

Then there was an interjection by Mr. Manuel, a Labour member, who said, "On the government". Mr. Macmillan went on to say:

> And on this government, in trying to steer in this most complicated question a wise course which will lead not merely to our priding ourselves on taking some outward action for which we can take credit, but which will lead to useful results on the lines along which we all want to see progress made.

These remarks, I suggest, set a very good standard for the discussions which will be taking place next week. It is worthy of note, Mr. Speaker, that even in South Africa there have been some hopeful developments. For example, the acting president of the cabinet, the Hon. Paul Sauer, said on April 19:

> We must create a new spirit which must restore overseas faith—both white and non-white—in South Africa.

That is a statement by the man who happens to be leading the South African government at the present time.

I believe it is a very fortunate thing that there is going to be a commonwealth conference at this particular time. The problems that face any such conference are difficult but I do not believe that a more difficult problem has ever had to be faced by the prime ministers of the commonwealth than the particular one we are debating today.

Canada is not in the position of being without influence in the commonwealth. Canada is in a key position. Our attachment to the commonwealth goes very deep. It is probably the strongest attachment held by the Canadian people. Here we have an organization of ten nations, with more coming in all the time. Nigeria will be the eleventh nation on October 1 and will come into the commonwealth club of its own free will because it wants to be a member of the commonwealth.

A few weeks ago Mr. Nyerere, the leader of the main party in Tanganyika, was in Ottawa. It is a party, by the way, which is composed not only of African natives but of the white and Asiatic settlers in that country. He said here on more than one occasion that when his country gets its independence—they hope to get self-government this fall although perhaps not independence for a year or two—they intend to ask for membership in the commonwealth. He said that there are two organizations to which they want to belong, one being the United Nations and the other the commonwealth. He said that the commonwealth only exists as a matter of friendship and for mutual help and that even the communists never complain about it. He said that they cannot complain because there is nothing they can find wrong with the commonwealth.

Here we have this commonwealth, a bridge between all of the continents, under the leadership of the British and with the help of the other members, launching new nations in a way which is not being done anywhere else in the world. It is true that France is now following this example but the British have set the pace in an admirable way in launching new nations. That process is only nicely begun. There will be more and more such nations as time goes on.

It would be a world disaster if the commonwealth were allowed to break up, but if the extremists in Canada had their way and our Prime Minister and the other prime ministers went to London determined to make harsh statements and to demand violent action, how long does anyone in this chamber today think the commonwealth would last? This fact is recognized by the members of the commonwealth who have joined it since the second world war, by India, Pakistan, Ceylon, Ghana and Malaya. The statements made by the leaders of these countries on this very question, which touches them far more deeply than it does us and is far more serious for them, on the whole have been very restrained.

I suggest that we send our own Prime Minister to this conference next week with the feeling that the House of Commons and the Canadian people have confidence in him to do his part to work out this difficult problem.

These nine prime ministers and the foreign minister of South Africa—it is unfortunate that their prime minister cannot attend because of his disability—have the responsibility of dealing with this problem in such a way that progress is made toward the objective we have in mind of removing discrimination and of making certain that the commonwealth takes the right turn at this critical time in its history.

It can go on from now to make a far greater contribution in world affairs than it has ever made previously if good leadership is given during the next few days. May I suggest that we need have no fear about the future of the commonwealth being in safe hands at this conference in London.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): This morning, Mr. Speaker, I was reading the Inaugural handbook of the Canadian national commission for UNESCO, I sholud like to introduce my remarks by two references from that handbook which is one of our own publications. On the first page, all by itself, I notice these words:

> Peace, like happiness, is a by-product of efforts directed to other proper ends; and the great advantage of concentration on immediate and worthy ends is that men of good will of all creeds and philosophies can join in them heartily.

Then on page 5 of this Inaugural Handbook I find the short, pithy opening speech that was given at the first conference of the Canadian national commission by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) of our country. He had this to say, and I quote from page 5:

> I saw something of the beginnings of the United Nations in San Francisco in 1945. I saw there the great dedication of the nations to the principles of peace in the world and to the achievement of a reasonable equality of economic and cultural opportunity in every part of the world.

[Mr. Green.]

We could not agree more with the two excerpts I have quoted from this handbook of our Canadian national commission. It is on the precepts of those two quotations that I want to make my remarks this afternoon. May I say, Mr. Speaker, that if time only permitted, every member of our C.C.F. group in this house would like to speak on this matter because we feel so deeply concerned about the situation and what it can mean, if allowed to develop, to the future prosperity and peace of the world.

We in the C.C.F. sincerely hope that as a result of our discussions this afternoon a message will come from this House of Commons appealing to all Europeans in South Africa to recognize the insanity of apartheid and the need to come to terms with the situation by being prepared to negotiate with the African leaders and not to jail them. We feel that we are expressing the opinion of the vast majority of the Canadian people in asking, through the medium of what we say today in this House of Commons, the Europeans in South Africa to come to terms with the situation before it is too late and not to continue with an unsound approach, one which is tantamount to dictatorship, in an attempt to suppress 11 million people because, in so doing, they are not only inviting disaster, in our estimation, but are inviting widespread violence.

We in this group feel strongly a deep sense of shock because of the ruthless and murderous use of armed force in South Africa in order to compel obedience of the native Africans to what can only be termed cruel and unjust laws as exemplified by the apartheid policy. It is now evident—or it should be—that the suppression of every form of opposition in South Africa is being carried out—and apparently is so intended—with force of arms without regard to the grave possibilities of still further loss of life in that country.

I feel certain that all of us in this House of Commons and all the people of Canada condemn the apartheid policy or one of any degree of racial separateness—I believe that is one of the other terms that is used—because it can only mean inhuman treatment of the native Africans. The apartheid policy is based—whether or not they will agree to it in South Africa I do not know—on the master race philosophy. That philosophy was repudiated by western civilization in the last world war and certainly it was repudiated in the establishment of the universal declaration of human rights.

The policy we are now discussing and with which we are so seriously concerned is not only villainous but is perilous in that it denies to at least 10 million people in South Africa elementary freedoms and rights of citizenship in order to maintain the rule of the whites in South Africa. If my reading is correct, Mr. Speaker, more than half of the entire white population of the African continent is in South Africa; but in South Africa the whites are outnumbered by more than four to one. It therefore surely follows that the apartheid policy cannot be made to work without poisoning the whole continent of Africa and without causing a violent upheaval which, indications would lead us to believe, could endanger the whole world.

It is because of our feelings in this regard that we call upon, request and plead with the Prime Minister of Canada to raise this issue when he attends the commonwealth prime ministers' conference in London. We ask that the horror over recent events as felt by the Canadian people be fully expressed by the Prime Minister when he is at that conference. We feel certain that definite and pungent analysis and expression of our feelings on this matter by the Prime Minister will encourage those in South Africa who oppose the government's merciless and dictatorship policy.

At the same time may I on behalf of this group say that we also urge support of any action by the United Nations to mobilize world public opinion on the side of sanity and humanitarian principles in a stern reproof to the South African government. May we also add that we urge upon the Prime Minister and the Canadian government to offer as a humanitarian gesture an emergency measure to grant political asylum in Canada to the refugees from South Africa.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green) spoke much of the British commonwealth of nations, and Canada of course is an important part of the commonwealth of nations. But I am afraid that it is not generally recognized that this British commonwealth of nations, of which we are so proud to be a part, is composed of a majority of nations the people of which have a skin pigment which is not white. The last census of which I have taken note gives a total population in the British commonwealth of nations of 629 million. Of that 629 million 500 million are non-white. Therefore, when the Secretary of State for External Affairs comes out with the exhortation which he did and the enthusiasm which he did—and I noticed the ceremony with which he did it—when a few moments ago he said what a world calamity it would be if the British commonwealth broke up, he should remember that 500 million of this 629 million in the British commonwealth are non-white.

This means that if you want to hold the British commonwealth together you have to hold together those countries which are non-white and which today are waiting very carefully what is taking place in South Africa, the policy of South Africa, and the attitude of the countries which are white in the British commonwealth toward the apartheid policy and the violence, dictatorship and suppression of freedoms which has resulted.

It would be logical and reasonable that those countries should look to us to find out whether democracy has a real and fundamental meaning. I believe I made mention when I spoke in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne of the marvellous opportunity granted to yourself, myself and four others to go to Australia for the biennial conference of the commonwealth parliamentary association, where we met with the non-white members of the commonwealth; where we heard how they were disturbed at the discrimination between races and colours; where we heard of their disturbance at the policy of South Africa; and where we heard from everyone how they looked to Canada to give leadership, to take definite stands and to make its voice known and heard.

On analysis it is understandable that there are reactions and objections by the people of South Africa to what is taking place there under the policy of apartheid. From my own reading I was amazed to find that in a so-called democratic country of this world, a member of the British commonwealth, they have a pass system. And of course it is the pass system to which the African people look with abhorrence, recognizing it as a badge of absolute subjection. I think I am not far wrong when I say that it is against that pass system that the South Africans have been particularly demonstrating in the past few weeks. I gather from what I have been able to read that every African of the age of 16 years and over must hold a pass. Without that pass he cannot move into towns; he cannot obtain employment; and indeed, without that pass he is denied all freedom. If he is discovered without a pass he suffers a fine or imprisonment.

If that were not enough in a free country of the British commonwealth, look at the land system. It is a land system which discriminates against the African population. Less than 15 per cent of the land area in the Union of South Africa is allocated to three quarters of the population which is African. Over 85 per cent is allocated to the white minority of three million, and no African can hold freehold land anywhere in the Union of South Africa, even on the South African Bantu reserves.

It is a situation like that which causes us to view the position of the native Africans in South Africa in relation to the policy of apartheid of that government. The Prime Minister of Great Britain has been mentioned several times this afternoon by both the previous speakers. We have to admire the courage with which he spoke in South Africa and admire certain actions which have been taken since his return to the United Kingdom. We noted with interest an eloquent phrase which he used when he spoke in Capetown. He referred to the "winds of change". That is a very eloquent phrase. Africans in all Africa are feeling the winds of change, and this in South Africa no different from anywhere else.

As the Secretary of State for External Affairs mentioned, in some parts of the African continent the winds are blowing almost like a hurricane. They are blowing through Nigeria, which is going to become independent very shortly. They are blowing through the Belgian Congo, which is going to become completely independent on July 1. It is certainly understandable that the Africans in South Africa want the same rights and liberties as their brothers and cousins elsewhere on the continent and elsewhere in the British commonwealth of nations.

A great deal has been said by myself and the previous speakers about the British commonwealth of nations. Surely the basic principle of our commonwealth is the maintenance and furtherance of human rights and fundamental freedoms. One could wax very emotional about the commonwealth, but I think that fundamentally the maintenance and furtherance of human rights and fundamental freedoms is the basic reason for the continued existence of our commonwealth. If we believe that, then we in Canada have the responsibility to demonstrate by our speeches and our action this afternoon that we firmly believe that the commonwealth has a constructive purpose, namely to insist that the United Nations declaration of human rights is more than wishful thinking, and that it is of concern to us in Canada as a partner in the British commonwealth of nations.

We are very happy that the opportunity has been granted for this discussion to take place this afternoon. We are bitterly disappointed that the procedure is such that all one can do is talk, and that all the Prime Minister can take to the prime ministers' conference in London is an expression of individual opinions as they are given here today. Very often we hear of the leadership given by the United Kingdom; of the true meaning of the mother of parliaments and of the courage and devotion of the British. I wish the procedure this afternoon in this Canadian House of Commons had been such that the Prime Minister of Canada when he leaves tomorrow could take with him a motion unanimously expressing the views of all members of this house as to what they think of the apartheid policies of South Africa and how dangerous they could be to the future of the commonwealth and to the peace of the world. Surely, if the House of Commons in Great Britain could do it, why can we not do the same?

I was most interested to read the motion which was passed unanimously in the United Kingdom House of Commons on Friday, April 8 of this year. It is to be found in their Hansard report at page 775. This is what the people's representatives in all parties in the United Kingdom House of Commons had to say; this is the motion which was carried, and I quote:

> That this house, deploring the present racialist policies now being pursued by the South African government, under which non-Europeans are consistently denied normal human and political rights, including the right of campaigning for a peaceful change in the laws under which they live, and the recent declaration of a state of emergency and the many arbitrary arrests, fearing that a continuation of this repression is threatening the security and welfare of all races living in the Union of South Africa and good relations between members of the commonwealth, urges—

I wish I had the right to insert, here, the name of the Prime Minister of Canada.

> —the prime minister to take the opportunity at the forthcoming commonwealth prime ministers' conference to bring home to the South African government the strong feelings of the British people on this question; and states its firm belief that peace and tranquility in South Africa can only be secured on the basis of freedom and equality and a full respect for the inherent dignity and humanity of all men.

That was the motion which was passed unanimously in the United Kingdom. Thus, the prime minister of Great Britain could convey not only the sentiments contained in a number of speeches; he could convey to the conference the unanimous opinion of the people's representatives on the subject of apartheid in its relation to the world and to all the partners in the commonwealth.

If the procedure of this house had permitted I would most certainly have moved a resolution identical with that which was carried in the United Kingdom House of Commons, changing the words only where necessary so as to read "the Prime Minister of Canada" instead of "the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom", and "the people of Canada" for "the people of Britain".

Having heard from the Secretary of State for External Affairs on behalf of the government, having heard from the Leader of the Opposition on behalf of the Liberal party, and having heard the views of the C.C.F., it is clear that we are without doubt unanimous in our views on this vital question, and because of that, and because we wish to help the Prime Minister and to strengthen his hand with regard to this humanitarian and far-reaching question, I should like to ask whether the Prime Minister himself would not give consideration to asking for the unanimous consent of the house—because by unanimous consent all procedure and standing orders can be changed—to permit the introduction of a resolution along the lines which I have suggested which, as I said, is word for word the same as that already agreed to in Great Britain.

To say anything more would be repetitious. I wish to conclude, having made a reference to the House of Commons in the United Kingdom, by reading the last statement made before the vote was taken as it appears at page 848 of the British Hansard:

> I know that all the people of South Africa will not hear all of it because their newspapers are censured, but I hope they will hear enough to realize that the House of Commons feels very strongly that it is our duty not to keep silent but to do all we can to help our friends in South Africa to help themselves and to put an end to this terrible tragedy which has overcome their land.

To that, we say "amen".

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): I am pleased to have the opportunity to take part in this discussion which is of such interest to us all. The discussion of such a subject marks, it seems to me, the growing maturity of Canada inasmuch as we are devoting our attention to the outside world and to the consideration of our place and role therein. It is such a short time ago in the history of our nation that a discussion of any aspect of foreign policy was very rare indeed.

I should like to join the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) in his words of good wishes to the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) as he leaves for the commonwealth prime ministers' conference, and to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green) as he goes to Europe to take part in very important international gatherings. I am sure all of us will keep them in our thoughts as they participate in these vital deliberations on behalf of world peace.

I think it is fitting that the motion of the Leader of the Opposition should embrace this matter within the framework of commonwealth considerations. He is quite right, and I was interested in his remarks about the development of the commonwealth, that unique political institution which seems capable of such great diversity and variety while at the same time retaining the fundamental values which have made it one of the greatest organizations in the world. I am very proud in this connection that the leader of the party to which I owe allegiance has always been distinguished as a supporter and as a lover of the commonwealth, and with that view I am proud to associate myself.

It is significant, too, that today we are giving our attention to the great continent of Africa, surely the continent of the future. So often we used to refer to Africa as the dark continent and perhaps in many ways it was, although, as has been said by Professor Kimble, it is perhaps true that the darkest thing about Africa was our own ignorance of it. Such ignorance and lack of concern can no longer prevail because today we must consider this great new area that is seeing the emergence of great new nations dealing so importantly in world affairs.

It has been said that the struggle in Africa has not been and is not only for self-government, but for self-respect. We have watched that development and of course Canada is tremendously interested in it because in Africa there are and there will be political and social developments of vital concern. One is perhaps led to think of the ancient parable spoken about putting old wine in new bottles as one looks at some of the sociological, political and economic developments in this great continent which are occasionally disturbing.

The subject of apartheid is of widespread interest today. We read a great deal about it in the press but one cannot help observe that matters of interest to the press are not necessarily equated with matters of importance. But beyond the press and radio and television this is a question being discussed by legislatures and by citizens. Surely all of us are as one in our concern for the human suffering which is taking place in the Union of South Africa. There is surely no monopoly of concern or regard for severe violations of the sanctity of the human personality. Of course, the difficulties have not taken place only in the last few days. There have been problems aplenty in that area of the world for a long time. There are many grave and serious difficulties there and there will be more. Lord Balfour said that in South Africa a white nation has established itself in a black continent and that is something that has never before presented itself in the history of mankind. It is not surprising that some of the problems of that nation are unique and dreadful in their complexity.

We can all share our concern for the future in Africa if certain policies are pursued and if adjustments, accommodations and re-thinking do not take place along certain lines. It would be very easy for any hon. member of this parliament—I think I could do it although it is not my nature—to denounce and make inflammatory speeches about what is going on in the Union of South Africa. It was Milton who said it is always easier to be critical than correct. There are some Canadians who say, "Throw South Africa out of the commonwealth." That is a favourite expression. There are some who seem as anxious to have South Africa thrown out of the commonwealth as they are to have red China brought into the United Nations. But are these suggestions in the best interests? Are these the wisest policies to follow?

In his usual wisdom I believe the Secretary of State for External Affairs expressed it well when he said that these extreme measures are not the Canadian way. I do not feel called upon to utter inflammatory, condemnatory statements. I do not think that at this juncture they are necessary or helpful.

I think the Secretary of State for External Affairs was quite right when he said that Canada need not go to these extremes to make clear its attitude and point of view. I am sure there is no doubt anywhere in the world as to where Canada stands on the matter of human rights.

I had the privilege to represent my country in one of the committees of the United Nations and for three years had an opportunity to deal in a minor way—and I would not pretend it was otherwise—with delegates from all over the world, from the United Nations and its 82 members. I never found any doubt as to where Canada stood on these matters. There is no question about the liberality of Canada's views in the world scene. Certainly there is no question as to the prevailing attitude of the Prime Minister. I first heard of the man who is now Prime Minister of Canada not in connection with a matter of politics but in connection with his advocacy for certain aspects of human rights and fundamental freedoms to which he has been devoted all his life. It is axiomatic to say he is a great defender of human freedoms. That is known not only throughout this land but throughout the world.

Would we be rendering our best services to mankind in pillorying the government of another nation or castigating its laws, no matter how repugnant those laws are to our thinking and no matter to what extent we may feel they lack something in inward wisdom? For the Canadian House of Commons and those of us who are its members to spend time publicly denouncing the laws of another country strikes in me a minor chord of unease. I wonder what other countries there are in the world upon whose laws and actions we might sincerely pass critical judgment? Are there not other areas on the earth's surface where the human personality is being violated? I submit that if it were not for certain aspects of freedom we would not know what was going on in the Union of South Africa. The things which emerge from certain other parts of the world represent a far greater degradation of the human personality than what emerges from the Union of South Africa. This is not to be construed in any way as an effort to condone, pass over or diminish the importance of these events which we deplore, but I cannot support as a matter of policy and of function the Canadian parliament and people devoting themselves to this purpose.

There is another aspect of the case that causes me no small feeling of concern. I believe the Leader of the Opposition referred to this in his address to which I listened with the greatest interest. There is the danger of moral priggishness in taking such a course. I would want to avoid any self-righteousness in this regard. It was said that he who is without sin should cast the first stone. I think it behooves us to think very carefully about this, examine the question closely and make sure that as individuals and members of groups we are at all times making the maximum effort to fulfil and develop our beliefs in the fundamental freedoms, in the equality of man and in our repudiation of anything which even approaches racial intolerance or prejudice. Canada has a very fine record in this respect but there are some things in which the area for improvement is fairly significant.

But I think the major consideration of all is again, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs expressed it, that the moderate course is the better course. There are still some moderates in the Union of South Africa; there are still men of liberal mind—I would have to write that liberal with a small "l", of course—and there are still areas for moderation.

If I thought that a bitter denunciation, an inflammatory attack upon this state; if I thought that working up Canadian public opinion to be blistering in its denunciation; if I thought that a blistering denunciation in a group to which I do not belong, namely the commonwealth prime ministers' conference, was helpful, I could easily recommend such a course. We can denounce, we can criticize, but in so doing would we by our act be helping the people of the Union of South Africa who now most need our help in the difficult and trying times which are so much on our minds.

I think of the need of dealing with the great problem of the area of southwest Africa, where the Union of South Africa has a responsibility before the world as a mandatory power from the league of nations. I can recall when this question was before the United Nations. I remember the bitter denunciations and the part of the world from which they sometimes came. I saw that over the last few years there were opportunities for some rapprochement, for some process of negotiation, to which the union would be a part. I thought then how wise and sound it was not to close irrevocably the door for discussion, for negotiation, upon which is based the future hopes for improvement of those people.

The Prime Minister of Great Britain has been referred to by every speaker today. I had the privilege of sitting in the gallery of the British House of Commons some time ago when the Prime Minister of Great Britain was being asked—as was the Prime Minister of our own country—about the very question we have now before us. I was so impressed by the wisdom of his reply. He said:

> Of course, what has happened in this tragic situation is a very great source of deep regret to me. I share to the full the feelings of sympathy for those who have suffered, but I ask the house to consider our position not as a party matter. The British commonwealth has, I think, a great past. I believe it to have the possibilities of a great future. It will outlast the particular people who preside over the fortunes of any country at any given time. I think that we must remember not lightly to throw away or to injure what I am certain in the years ahead will be a great instrument for good.

Then he went on to talk about the heavy responsibility which rested upon the government and perhaps especially upon him. He said:

> I think it has been made clear already that the agenda of the formal conferences is fixed by the conference itself. There are certain traditions about it.

He expressed the hope that the Prime Minister of the Union of South Africa would be there and he went on to say that the course which was suggested to him was quite different from taking an action which would precipitate a crisis in the commonwealth. He continued:

> Britain has a great responsibility here, and what I want to do is to use the commonwealth and see it grow, but so to steer a course that we are able to preserve in full the structure which has been built up and to see that we do not err in precipitate action which might have very dangerous results.

He then went on to say:

> I have expressed my view privately, and in a courteous way, as I thought, and I have tried to do so publicly. Our duty is to influence and to guide and to hope that, by so doing, the principles in which we believe will be accepted everywhere. But I repeat—and I think the right hon. gentleman knows the position that he would be in if he had the same responsibility—that we have to be bold in the statement of our views but cautious in any action which, foolishly carried out, might jeopardize the whole structure of our commonwealth proceedings in their formal character.

I commend this particular reference to the hon. member from the C.C.F. who has just spoken. I see no members of that group in the house at the present time. I commend to them this wise and reasoned statement of the Prime Minister of Great Britain but I do not rest my case and I do not rest my concern only on the remarks of the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom. Knowing the record of our own Prime Minister and his wisdom, knowing what the commonwealth has been and will be, I am sure that the counsel of moderation and of reason will prevail.

I have no doubt, and I am sure the Canadian people have no doubt, that we can trust our leaders on this very moot issue that is before us. I know that in the discussion of it in high places our Prime Minister and Canada will play the highest part; I know that Canada will be found to be on the side of freedom and a supporter of justice and a proponent of reason and a purveyor of wisdom. On these grounds I feel that this most delicate issue will be dealt with by our Prime Minister and his colleagues.

(Translation):

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, having listened closely to the four members who took part in this important debate, I should like at this time to associate myself with the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) not only in the splendid speech he has delivered but also with regard to the principles he has stated on behalf of the party to which I have the honour to belong.

The statement he made in this house is one against the policy of apartheid, of discrimination, of segregation, not against a minority, but against a majority which has been discriminated against on account of its race and of its colour.

Mr. Speaker, we, who are sitting on this side of the house, believe that all men are equal before God. We believe that all men were created in his image and resemblance. We also believe that the Creator considers them as such, on an equal footing, and if some men on earth happen to be of a certain colour or to belong to a certain race, or to profess a certain religion, while others belong to a people of another race, of another colour, or to practice another religion, we must recognize that this is an accident beyond the control of those men.

Apartheid Policy in Commonwealth

The United Nations, as the Leader of the Opposition ably pointed out, have condemned in principle racial persecution, but were reluctant to go any further, fearing they would violate the doctrine of sovereignty, fearing to intervene too deeply in the domestic and national problem of individual nations.

By virtue of the principle whereby nations should not interfere in the affairs of others, it becomes very important for other nations of the world to know whether that principle does not also affect their personal business or their own position, or whether that principle might not have serious repercussions on other countries of the world. And should it become necessary to intervene in the affairs of another country—and I think that is a distinct possibility in this case—even if only by a resolution of the house or by a statement of opinion such as we have heard from the four hon. members who spoke before me, I think it then becomes important, indeed necessary, to take a stand on a state of affairs which exists in another country and may well have repercussions in Canada.

I think, therefore Mr. Speaker, that we must condemn this policy of apartheid. We must do so because it is a bad policy, a wrong one, and because it is contrary to human rights, to justice, to morality and to natural law.

I wonder how far I can go along with the attitude displayed a moment ago by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green). Personally, I have some doubts as to whether the Secretary of State for External Affairs was entirely right in the statement he made. Oh, I do not say that we should not do all we can to maintain the unity of the British commonwealth of nations, but I wonder if, when that unity is threatened because one of the members of the commonwealth is persecuting a majority, whether the unity of the commonwealth is still easy to maintain.

Unfortunately, the history of minorities throughout the world does not always make palatable reading.

In Canada, our own minority has not always enjoyed equal and fair treatment. This is less true because history, experience, the passage of years and particularly the thinking of a large number of those who make up Canada's majority have taught most Canadians that there was no longer any excuse for such a situation.

I also think we should thank Providence that Canada does not have problems similar to those now prevailing in South Africa.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

That is why, coming back to the main theme of the debate, I insist that we, in the opposition, strongly protest against the apartheid policy under which human beings are being persecuted because of their race and colour, and justice is being trampled under foot as if it did not exist for coloured people.

We are concerned about the disastrous consequences of that policy which recently has led to the arbitrary arrest of individuals and their detention without a hearing; a policy which has led to violence, unfortunate killings and bloodshed.

It is a policy that must cease if normal relations are to be restored in that country of the British commonwealth of nations. Peace, order and security cannot exist without due respect for the individual.

Like the previous speakers, may I urge the Prime Minister to take note of the views expressed on both sides of the house and particularly of the suggestions made by the Leader of the Opposition who has a wide experience, not only in the United Nations, but in many other places, and to make his views known at the conference he will be attending shortly. We wish him every success. We know very well that his parliamentary experience will help him to remember not only what took place here, but what is taking place at present in Canada, and the anxiety that grips the population in various quarters in this country on account of recent happenings in South Africa. We trust he will also remember the fear and anxiety that is felt in all civilized countries of the world.

On the strength of those arguments and of those views, if not of the resolutions which have been put on record, the Prime Minister will be able to make known with greater justice and greater force the views which, I am sure, he himself intended to express to his colleagues of the British commonwealth countries.

(Text):

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all hon. members in the house this afternoon were impressed by the unanimity of viewpoint, as one might expect among members on both sides of the house, with regard to this very important matter.

My first words must be of thanks and appreciation to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) for the manner in which he presented the viewpoint not only of the opposition but, in general, of hon. members of this house. May I say to him that the restraint with which he spoke was in keeping with what I would expect from one who—whatever our differences of opinion may be, and sometimes they are very strongly and definitely expressed—is regarded by me and I know by members in the house generally as having made a worth-while contribution to external affairs in this country. He has won for himself the Nobel prize for peace and all of us join in a realization of its importance. I say that because today the House of Commons was at its best. Indeed there was that feeling that here in this chamber all of us are in a cathedral of devotion to the abiding principles of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

I want to thank my friend and colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green) for his words. After all, we in public life expect to be judged and often misjudged. However, I want to thank him for his words when he referred to the attitude I have taken through the years, when it was not always popular, on behalf of those things which represent more than life itself, namely the civil liberties of the individual.

On an occasion like this I might be allowed to look back in retrospect. I recall an occasion in 1922 when it was not popular in my province to take a stand on behalf of the rights of the other language in this country and when counsel were afraid that to take that position would be detrimental. That has been my attitude through the years, namely a belief in the need, at all costs, to preserve those things that represent the recognition of the sacredness of the human personality.

I am glad that the opportunity has come to say a few words on this subject which has actuated the minds of my fellow Canadians and indeed those of people in every part of the world in recent weeks. It is not a new matter. Apartheid has existed since 1948. Year in and year out it has come before the United Nations. I criticize no one today when I say that through the years Canada abstained because of the principle that interference in the domestic field of any nation was not a thing to be accepted by the United Nations.

I welcome the opportunity first because it enables the Secretary of State for External Affairs to place before the country the views of the government. But more particularly do I welcome the occasion in that it has provided an opportunity for the House of Commons to express its united viewpoint; for there are no frontiers or divisions between hon. members—whatever their location may be in the house—on the need for maintaining those freedoms without which mankind cannot rise to its full stature.

Some mention was made by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) of the fact that an opportunity should have been available for the moving of a motion; and he quoted with approval what had taken place in the British House of Commons. Let me point out that the motion in the British House of Commons was made as a private members' motion and resolution in an hour set aside for the discussion of private members' resolutions. I would also point out that during that day in question, namely April 8, there were several motions. There was one dealing with medical diseases which took from 11.05 to 12.32. The question was put and agreed to. Then came the motion of the hon. member for Wednesbury which was quoted by the hon. member.

There was no other way in which to bring this matter before the house than by the means adopted by the Leader of the Opposition today. I would point out this fact. When about two weeks ago I spoke on this subject and referred to the possibility of there being a debate, my natural view was that the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), having regard to Monday being the last private members' day, would have permitted the clearing away of a number of cases on a subject that is receiving general attention from members of the C.C.F. party. If that had been so, we could have placed on private members' motions a motion similar to the one indicated by the hon. gentleman and with consent could have proceeded to discuss it. However, that course has been denied by the attitude taken on Monday last—the last private members' day—by the hon. gentleman's colleagues.

Having referred to that fact, may I say this. Having no disagreement on this matter and having heard the views of the house, we will all be reinforced in the sure knowledge that there are no divisions of opinion on this matter.

The Leader of the Opposition, with the experience that has been his, referred to the nature of the prime ministers' conferences, their composition, the informality that prevailed, and the freedom from any fixed determination in advance as to the course to be followed. Indeed, commonwealth prime ministers' conferences are most informal meetings. The various prime ministers sit about the table in the cabinet room at No. 10 Downing street. Then in that spirit, mystical as it is, which binds the members of the commonwealth together in frankness, but with that tolerance which must always prevail between members of a family, matters are discussed. Determinations are not made.

Communiqués issued at the end of the conference contain nothing upon which there is not complete and unanimous agreement.

The hon. member for Vancouver East mentioned the debate in the British house, and I refer to the words of the minister of state for commonwealth relations who discussed in general the meaning of these conferences. As reported on page 830 of the British Hansard, he said:

> The secret of the success which has attended these conferences in the past, indeed the mystery—to use the word in its old English sense—of commonwealth relations lies in the informality of its methods combined with a respect for certain principles which, with the exception perhaps of the Statute of Westminster, are not contained in any formal document—
> We must not forget that there are few commonwealth countries whose policies have not at some time or another aroused controversy in one or more of the others.
> If a commonwealth prime ministers' conference became an occasion at which any prime minister might have the domestic policies of his government criticized and arraigned by his colleagues, I have little doubt that such conferences would cease to be acceptable to commonwealth prime ministers generally.

I mentioned that on an earlier occasion. There is no formula under which prime ministers meet. There is no record kept except an informal one. There are no motions made. Through the instrumentality of joint discussion comes a realization of the problems of each other.

I thank the Leader of the Opposition for the good wishes he expressed to me on this occasion and for his wish that a constructive conference will be the result. He dealt with the commonwealth at some length. He described its evolution; difficult to understand, impossible of definition. It has simply advanced not from precedent to precedent but from innovation to innovation. He asked the question whether or not the Canadian parliament had the right and the duty to intervene in matters of concern, particularly to one or other of the member nations. He pointed out, too, that wherever discrimination takes place it leads inevitably to disaster. We say that we cannot win a nuclear war, that no nation can win it. Equally so no nation today can win a race war within or without its territories.

Again quoting from British Hansard, the following appears at page 833. I am quoting the minister of state for commonwealth relations to whom I have already referred:

> No one who has . . . shared the hopes and expectations of seeing there—

He is referring to South Africa.

> —the spread of order, tolerance and freedom can fail to be heart-broken by the events which have occurred there during these last weeks. The antidote is to seek the best way which lies within our power to help to set these things right, and to prevent a situation arising in which South Africa finds itself in one of the cul-de-sacs of history from which there can be no escape except through violence and tragedy.

Mr. Speaker, that is the purpose of this discussion today, to reinforce me as the representative of this nation, having held these views throughout the years, with the conscience, thought and deliberation of the Canadian House of Commons in order to air the views which have been expressed on matters which are of particular moment at this time.

Through the years I have advocated in this house, although my view was not accepted, that nothing could be more helpful to a prime minister than a discussion of such matters, to the end that through discussion the prime ministers' conference may have presented to it the views of the Canadian people bodied in the thinking of the members both of the House of Commons and of the Senate as well as Canadians generally.

I have never quite felt the same after the trip I took a year and a half ago as to the meaning of the commonwealth. I was in the countries of the commonwealth in Asia, and whatever the colour, race or religion there was something intangible there which was beyond description. There was a feeling that never would it be possible for members of the commonwealth to be at war with one another regardless of their differences, however strong they may be. Wherever I went I visited the courts, and I felt that there the rule of law applied and that the common law, brought in line with local conditions, gave to us belonging to the commonwealth a bond. I believe that in the years ahead there will more and more come a realization that only through the assurance and the acceptance of the equality of man can there be that unity which will place the commonwealth, as it is becoming today, in the position of a bulwark against communism and everything it stands for.

That is why discrimination is dangerous. Communism marches not so much on empty stomachs and on poverty as it does on the fact that while all of us pay lip service to the equality of man and to the brotherhood of man without regard to race or colour, none of us is completely free from intolerance. Wherever there is discrimination—as the hon. member said referring to the meeting of the parliamentary association which he attended—there you have the beginnings of a situation which ultimately cannot but achieve a mobilization by the communists, who, whatever their tyranny may be, give every indication in their words of the equality of the individual.

As I prepare for the meeting which will begin next week in London it is of assistance to me to have heard the speeches which have been made today. This subject arouses profound emotions. It cannot but result in powerful expressions of opinion. It requires, however, as the Leader of the Opposition said, clarity of thinking coupled with responsibility. I could make a speech on this subject; it might be attractive for the moment, and it might receive widespread support, but if in dealing with the subject my contribution was not one which led to a solution of this problem but, actually, to its exacerbation, the wish to do so would be denied by the reality.

I do not intend to go over the attitude of the government to date. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has done so. He has referred to the representations made by the Canadian government and by himself to the representative of South Africa. On April 9, in a statement which has been subject to criticism, I spoke of Canada's indignation at what was happening. The work of responsible statesmanship today is not to arouse, is not to please, is not to mobilize the plaudits of the moment. Otherwise instead of bringing about a solution of the problem or an atmosphere in which the problem can be solved, what we do is add to the fires. Our responsibility everywhere within the commonwealth is to make the commonwealth a bridge based on tolerance which will bring to the white, the black and all the other colours that are represented in this commonwealth, equality through moderation. Discretion in discussion does not mean acquiescence, or toleration of the thing with which we disagree.

Mr. Speaker, no Canadian views this policy as being right or workable. What shall we do in order to bring about before it is too late a realization that discrimination wherever practised is a forerunner, first of tyranny and then of ultimate change by force, bloodshed and discord? We recognize the complexity of the problem of racial relations. As I said a moment ago, no country can claim to have a perfect record in this field. Where were we in the days of war and after the war? I criticize no one, but I recall on one occasion speaking when the Japanese, because of their race and for no other reason —not the crime they had committed or which it was anticipated they would commit—could be banished from Canada. None of us can speak without sin on this subject. We have gone a long way along the road toward solving this problem. An organization of coloured people in Toronto—and I wish I had its name here—has made representations to me which I can only commend for their sanity, their reason and their responsibility. This organization realizes that much remains to be done, that the steps forward toward national or international tolerance are slow. We realize that, but at the same time we recognize that repression as a deterrent to progress toward racial equality can never be accepted.

I share in full the feelings of those both within and outside this house who have emphasized their hatred of policies of discrimination. Such policies can only lead to the negation of human rights. All of us, whether we can express our views or not, feel a deep sense of outrage at those things wherever they may be, which constitute a denial of the sacredness of human personality.

What about the situation? The Secretary of State for External Affairs asked the question: what should we have done? We made our views clear. Noising views from the house tops is not always a safe method in matters such as this, indeed in any deliberations or in any phase of life in which you try to secure through arguments the attainment of your objective.

Some say, "What have we done?" My answer is: What of the other nations of the commonwealth? Mention was made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs of the text of the resolution at the United Nations. That resolution constituted a major step forward toward the achievement of international tolerance. Nine nations voted for it. Great Britain and France abstained not because they loved apartheid but because the circumstances were such that they felt that this constituted an interference by the United Nations in domestic affairs which in itself would result in a veto on any action being taken. This resolution represented the conscience of mankind. The text of the resolution is as follows:

> The security council, having considered the complaint of 29 member states concerning the situation arising out of the large-scale killings of unarmed and peaceful demonstrators against racial discrimination and segregation in the Union of South Africa.
> Recognizing that such a situation has been brought about by the racial policies of the government of the Union of South Africa and the continued disregard by that government of the resolutions of the general assembly calling upon it to revise its policies and bring them into conformity with its obligations and responsibilities under the charter.
>
> Taking into account the strong feelings and grave concern aroused among governments and peoples of the world by the happenings in the Union South Africa.
> 1. Recognizes that the situation in the Union of South Africa is one that has led to international friction and if continued might endanger international peace and security.
> 2. Deplores that the recent disturbances in the Union of South Africa should have led to the loss of life of so many Africans and extends to the families of the victims its deepest sympathies.

3. Deplores the policies and actions of the government of the Union of South Africa which have given rise to the present situation.

4. Calls upon the government of the Union of South Africa to initiate measures aimed at bringing about racial harmony based on equality in order to ensure that the present situation does not continue or recur and to abandon its policies of apartheid and racial discrimination.

5. Requests the secretary general, in consultation with the government of the Union of South Africa, to make such arrangements as would adequately help in upholding the purposes and principles of the charter and to report to the security council whenever necessary and appropriate.

That resolution was brought about in advance. The secretary general, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs said, will meet the representative of South Africa in London at the prime ministers' conference on May 12. Later on, the secretary general will be going to South Africa. A major step forward has been achieved.

What of the attitude of the British on this resolution? Whatever we would say of them, they have a knowledge of diplomacy and of international rights. The foreign secretary said—and I paraphrase—that he was afraid the resolution would only make the South African government more stubborn. However, as things have turned out there has been a very long stride forward as a result of international action.

What of the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom? We hear criticism as to what we should do. It is suggested that the government should seek to bring about South Africa's expulsion or exclusion from the commonwealth. I will refer to that in a moment. That statement was recently made by several, including the hon. member for Assiniboia, if reported correctly and in his absence I repeat, if reported correctly. It is also suggested that strong formal protests should be addressed to the South African government. That is the second general suggestion. The third is that at the meeting next week of the prime ministers there should be on the part of the leaders of the commonwealth countries other than South Africa a strong collective and public expression of condemnation or disapproval of the South African policy.

Let us see what the attitude is of those who have responsibility. What did Mr. Macmillan say? The Secretary of State for External Affairs mentioned what he had said yesterday. This matter—as I paraphrase what he said—will not be on the agenda formally. Mr. Speaker, can you believe that each of us outside the Union of South Africa will not make clear, informally, our views? Can you see them sitting around that table without informally making known their views? India, Mr. Nehru; Pakistan, General Ayub Khan; Ceylon—well, they have started another election so I do not know who will represent them—Malaya. Mr. Macmillan already has said yesterday what he would do.

What about Mr. Menzies? Mr Menzies has been in office in Australia longer than any prime minister in the history of that country. That wise statesman said:

Prime ministers' conferences do not have matters listed for discussion. They do not have an agenda. They do not have votes taken. They do not have majorities.

When some people tell me I should bring this up and have a vote, I invite them to consider what would happen if there were a vote in a prime ministers' conference. Suppose someone moved to throw Canada out saying we did something that the others disliked. Suppose someone disliked our policies with reference to the migration of peoples. If we were to start having motions and majorities in prime ministers' conferences it would not be very long before all of us would have voted the rest out. There is no question about that. But it is easy for some who write editorials to say what should be done.

The Leader of the Opposition today—and I again express my views respecting his speech —spoke with the authority and knowledge that experience assures.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is not a tribute to him, it is a fact.

Mr. Pearson: I accept it as a fact.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Making due allowance for the wording which still expresses my idea, Mr. Menzies said this:

They consist of, say, nine people sitting together each of them the head of the government of his own country, discussing matters of common interest informing each other's minds, learning from each other's experience, getting to know something more about the problems of other men. These are not meetings where votes are taken. Indeed, I should like to tell hon. members that even the communiqué which emerges at the end of a commonwealth prime ministers' conference—and it is always a harmless enough document, as you know—cannot contain anything to the inclusion of which even only one prime minister objects.

Then, he goes on:

The opposition says: "Put it down on the agenda."

How often have I read that in the last few days as coming from those who have no responsibility. I continue:

Put it down on the agenda. Bring along the prime minister of South Africa. Let him be put into the dock and let us all try to cross-examine him. How long does anybody suppose the commonwealth would last if that was the way we went on?

When I read what the pundits say I wonder whether they have read what Mr. Nehru said.

He tabled a resolution in the Indian parliament. It deplored the incidents and sent sympathy to the Africans who had suffered from the firing and from the policy of racial discrimination and the suppression of the African people in their own homeland. He said, "This is a moral issue." There was no question raised by him that he intends to formalize his feelings.

When we hear my friends of the socialist party saying what they would do if they were here I ask them to read what Prime Minister Nash had to say on the subject. I have his statement here which is dated March 31. Prime Minister Nash has not made a request that the South African racial policy be discussed in the commonwealth prime ministers' conference. His words are these:

> I have, in fact, repeatedly emphasized that internal affairs of commonwealth countries of a controversial nature are not normally discussed at prime ministers' conferences. If they were—and the inclusion of South Africa's racial policies would be a matter for Dr. Verwoerd—I should make whatever contribution I could in a common endeavour to find a solution to the existing grave situation in South Africa.

Then later he was asked on April 11 about New Zealand's attitude toward the South African question. He replied it was a matter of record that he did not think there were any racially superior people. Then he added these words, that he would not say anything to make things worse than they are. Then he went on to say:

> Unless some super statesmanship was used by someone there might be a worse condition than has yet been known in the conflict between the races.

What about Ceylon? Ceylon's feelings were expressed by the representative at the U.N. council, when he strongly criticized the policies of the South African government as ugly and almost indecent. The prime minister of Ceylon expressed his aversion to any form of racial discrimination and felt the security council resolution carried more weight than if countries took up the matter individually. These are the prime ministers who are going to meet; these are prime ministers of another colour who have felt the horrors of discrimination and condemn it. But the pundits say, "Speak up." And do what? Speak up in public and do what?

At the present time I share the feelings of those who have expressed themselves strongly. I am not going to repeat what I have said in the past. Some of them, if they were standing here, would realize that however attractive outspoken criticism may be, we should speak only in a moderate but direct, clear and frank expression of views not in the open market, which, according to many, has made South Africa stubborn, but to the individual who represents that country.

In the few moments remaining I am going to deal with some of the suggestions. "Throw them out of the commonwealth." I reiterate the view I have expressed before that there is no merit in such action. Such a course may have some superficial attractions but what of its objections? It would respond to natural feelings of distaste for racial policy; it may commend itself for its purgatory effect. What would it solve? Would it bring relief to the 10 million blacks in that country? Would it bring relief to the many whites who do not share the view on discrimination? You are going to throw the 10 million blacks out. The whites who do not hold the same views as the government of the day you are going to throw out into outer darkness. That is what some say.

There is no machinery provided in the commonwealth to do so, as there are no qualifications as to beliefs required for membership in the commonwealth. One of the greatest hopes I have for an ultimate settlement is that South Africa has not withdrawn itself from the commonwealth and the fact that it will be represented in London at the prime ministers' conference assures that the channels of informal communication have not been closed.

Mr. Phillips of the Toronto Star was interviewed by a well-known former member of the press gallery, who tried to get him to say that we should throw South Africa out of the commonwealth. What was his answer? He was asked this question:

> Do you think it would be ... do good or harm to most people if we somehow kicked South Africa out of the commonwealth now?
> Mr. Phillips: I wouldn't like to see South Africa kicked out of the commonwealth. I've met South Africans who are the same type of people as Canadians and even when I was in jail I talked to a ... I was in prison with a young doctor and I said "Why don't you come to Canada; your career is being blighted here"—and he said "No, my job is to stay in South Africa—I'm very proud of my country and I want to see it have a better future than it's getting."

Phillips spoke with the experience that comes from one who knows. He went on to repeat that.

Then they say "Boycott South Africa." That sounds like something that is attractive to some people. Who would suffer? How many of those who hold that view have any realization of who would suffer? In 1959 Canada's exports to South Africa totalled $51,377,332 while imports from South Africa amounted to $6,631,000. They bought from us eight times what we bought from them. Who would suffer? Members of the C.C.F. party, as reported in the press, talk about kicking a country out of the commonwealth, but I point out that we sold to South Africa $15,642,000 of wheat. South Africa is our fourth largest customer for wheat. Let nobody say that I believe that the cause of freedom should be weighed in the scales of monetary considerations, but I simply ask the question: Who would suffer by the boycott? There are other countries in the commonwealth with quite the reverse situation, whose trade picture is quite different and where the balance of trade is in favour of South Africa.

The next suggestion is that we should make a formal protest. I have already answered that by reference to the attitude taken by the other governments of the commonwealth. So far as our commonwealth governments are concerned, let us exercise an influence of moderation, let us be served by steadiness and restraint, and remember always that this problem did not begin in 1960 but has existed since 1948.

We continue to believe that the clarity and the certainty of the words that we direct to the representatives of that country, coupled with the situation that has arisen as a result of which Mr. Hammarskjold, the Secretary General of the United Nations, will meet with the representative of the prime minister of South Africa at the conference in London and will later go to South Africa, hold the hope that at least there is a realization that something will have to be achieved.

I turn now to the delicate question of how this problem might be dealt with at the commonwealth prime ministers' conference. The house will appreciate that it is impossible to know in what way the matter might arise. I believe it will come about informally, and in informal discussion it is possible to convey the views shown to be in the hearts and souls of hon. members of this house today and of Canadians generally. There is one advantage when you express your views in that way. You do not mobilize the stubbornness which is inherent in all of us. How many of us have reacted to criticism in quite the opposite way to that which the criticism was intented to evoke?

The further question arises whether there should be some corporate expression of condemnation or disapproval. I do not believe that. I think in general that meeting together we shall bring about some realization that within the commonwealth as it expands there will come a day, which cannot be too far removed, when discrimination will not be accepted but rather that there will be a common brotherhood, each country with its own form of government, an anachronism without organization, a family group without treaty or pact and without anything to bind us together which works, as the Leader of the Opposition said; a commonwealth drawing its strength not from sameness but from diversity, providing the soil and climate in which its individual members can achieve and consolidate self-sustaining growth and the atmosphere in which they can develop talents and capabilities of their own choosing. That is my idea of the commonwealth. It is not something that denies criticism among its members, but that does not mean that it permits of action being taken to exile those of its members with whom the others do not agree. That is not the spirit of the commonwealth.

My time is up and I will conclude if I may have one minute. No problem has caused me more concern. Someone has said that I am torn between what I think is right and, on the other hand, what I think would be appropriate. It is nothing of the kind. I have a horror of discrimination against the individual but that does not mean that I believe in bringing about change by denunciation. That has been tried before. Someone has said that responsibility is rarely easy and for those who are really responsible it is all the more difficult. That has been the situation and I have tried to give leadership to the Canadian people who believe in the commonwealth. There has been no condonation of wrongdoing. I could do the popular thing. I could denounce. I could follow the course of least resistance but denunciation of what I hate would not achieve what we desire should be achieved, the ending of a policy that cannot succeed. Mr. Macmillan spoke of the winds of change. I think of them as hurricanes as men are driven to new heights in their desire for equality and an opportunity for the better things of life. Today in what has been said in the house there has been a freedom from the outcry of political considerations. The debate, which began with leadership, has continued so throughout. For me the debate has been worth while.

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps I might be permitted, Mr. Speaker, to ask the Prime Minister a question, even though it is six o'clock. I ask him this question solely because of the fact that, as far as I can judge, complete unanimity of viewpoint has been expressed in this house with regard to the views of the House of Commons on this matter. I ventured to put those views in the last part of my own statement. I ask the Prime Minister whether, when this motion is withdrawn, that expression could be put forward as a private member's resolution. It would have to be done, if it were done at all, by unanimous consent and could be passed without further discussion or change, if the house so desired.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, I have asked with regard to that matter and I may say that it cannot be done. The hon. gentleman moved the adjournment of the house. The motion therefore being to adjourn, there cannot be, by consent or otherwise, any motion passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to ask the leader of the house what business the house will be doing on Thursday and Friday.

Mr. Churchill: Owing to the interruption occasioned by this debate today and the change in the program, tomorrow we will go on with the Trans-Canada Highway Act, followed by the estimates that I announced the other day. That would be the business for Thursday and Friday. On Monday and Tuesday there will be a supply motion.

Mr. Speaker: Before announcing the adjournment of the house may I say that some repair work is being done on the bells. If hon. members hear the bells ringing after six o'clock it does not mean that the house is reassembling.

It being four minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

PRODUCTION CONTRACTS, CF-104

Question No. 223—Mr. McIlraith:

1. Have any production contracts been signed with any company or companies for the production of the CF-104? If so, on what date, to what companies and for what amounts?
2. Have any arrangements been made with respect to subcontracts for airframe components? If so, what is the nature of these arrangements?
3. Will subsidies be paid to industry so that CF-104 components will be made in Canada?
4. What is the total number of CF-104's to be produced?
5. What is the estimated cost per unit?
6. What is the date for the expected delivery of these planes?

Answer by: Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production):

1. A number of contracts have already been signed, details of which are given on the attached list "A" to the total value of $239,621,209.

2. The successful prime contractor included in his proposal a comprehensive outline of its recommendations for subcontract arrangements. These arrangements contemplated a wide distribution of subcontract work. The department is being particularly careful to monitor the prime contractor to ensure this wide distribution of subcontracts and, in fact, the term of the contract requires that the prime contractor receive approval by the department for all major subcontracts.

3. In appropriate cases industry is being assisted to make components in Canada.

4. The quantity is 200 combat CF-104, plus 14 trainers CF-104D.

5. The estimated production cost of a completely equipped CF-104 combat aircraft is $1,032,000 and a CF-104 D trainer aircraft is $1,409,800. These prices are exclusive of armament.

6. The delivery schedule is classified. It is expected, however, that aircraft will be coming off the final line by the end of February 1961.

NATO WHEAT FLOUR PURCHASES AND TRANSFERS

Question No. 271—Mr. Cardin:

1. Did Canada in the last fiscal year purchase or transfer wheat flour for strategic stock piles in member states of NATO? If so, in what amounts and in what member countries?
2. Have any expenditures been made from vote 506 in the estimates for 1959-60?
3. Have any terms and conditions been laid down by the governor in council for the purchase and transfer of wheat flour?
4. If so, what are these terms and conditions?
5. Have any orders in council been passed in this connection and on what dates?

Answer by: Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs):

1. No.

2. No.

3. No, but when the Canadian offer was made known to NATO countries in 1958, certain terms and conditions were laid down; these were reflected in the exchange of notes that took place in Ottawa on April 25 between the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Norwegian ambassador.

4. Copies of the notes were tabled on April 26, 1960.

5. Order in council P.C. 1960-490 of April 13 authorized the Secretary of State for External Affairs to conclude an agreement with the Norwegian ambassador.

2. Were any of these persons released because of (a) inefficiency; (b) to promote economy or efficiency; (c) medical reasons; (d) misconduct?
3. If so, how many in each year, in what service and for what reason?
4. How many persons with over 20 years regular and wartime service have been honourably released from each of the armed services, without entitlement to a pension, during each of the last five years?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

IRAN—ANNOUNCEMENT OF GRANT TO ASSIST EARTHQUAKE VICTIMS

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs): Following the statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on April 26 concerning the recent earthquake in Iran, hon. members will wish to know that on the recommendation of the Canadian Red Cross Society a grant of $10,000 has been made from the international relief fund to assist the unfortunate victims of the disaster. These funds are being sent by the Canadian Red Cross Society to the league of Red Cross Societies in Geneva for the purchase of urgently required medicines and emergency supplies.

We are keeping in close touch with the situation in Iran through the Canadian representative in Tehran and with the Canadian Red Cross Society in case further assistance of this kind may prove appropriate.

THE MINISTRY

INQUIRY AS TO ACTING PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I am not quite sure to whom I should address this question, but perhaps in the circumstances I might address it to the Minister of Finance and ask him whether he can inform the house who, in the absence of the Prime Minister, is to be Acting Prime Minister, and who, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, is to be acting in that capacity.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Acting Prime Minister): I will do my best to fulfil the duties of the first role.

Mr. Pearson: I wonder whether the minister, in his new capacity, could answer the second part of the question.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) will be the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder whether I may ask the minister a supplementary question. May I ask the Minister of Finance if he is also acting president of the council?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We shall do our humble best to fulfil the duties that may devolve upon the Acting Prime Minister in the absence of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am afraid the minister did not hear my question. I asked him whether he was acting president of the privy council.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is no president of the privy council as such in the present government. The practice has been that the Prime Minister acts as president of the council. In the present instance the Acting Prime Minister will endeavour to discharge all the duties that devolve upon that office, including that of acting as president of the council as occasion may require.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the minister a still further supplementary question. Will the Acting Prime Minister ascertain whether the Prime Minister was not in fact made president of the council some time after he became Prime Minister?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have stated the fact, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the minister would verify it.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF NATIONAL CO-OPERATIVE ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I wish to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Can he say whether the government has under consideration a draft national co-operative act, as submitted to the government for consideration by the co-operative union of Canada? Is it the intention of the government to introduce such a bill or a bill of this type during this session and have it stand over until next session for further action?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Acting Prime Minister): I am not aware of any such draft bill having yet been submitted. It may be the fact that it has been submitted by the organization to which the hon. member refers. If it were the intention of the government to bring such a bill forward for enactment either at this session or at a later session, that fact would be made known to the house in due course.

Mr. Argue: In view of the Acting Prime Minister's statement and in view of the recommendations of the royal commission having to do with food marketing, may I ask whether the government itself is considering, without this submission, the introduction of such an act this session?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The same response applies, Mr. Speaker. If such a measure is contemplated for introduction at this session the house will be made aware of the fact in due course.

REFERENCE OF NATIONAL DEFENCE ESTIMATES TO SPECIAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Could the Minister of National Defence advise the house whether it is his intention to move sometime next week that his estimates for the current year be referred to the special committee on defence expenditures, which I understand will be set up next week?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): I believe that will be done by the house leader.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DISARMAMENT—PROPOSED INTERNATIONAL POLICE FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs a question based on a press dispatch from Geneva which has just been brought to my attention. Because I have not been able to give him notice of the question he may wish to take it as notice. The question is whether it would be possible to make public a proposal which is reported to have been made by General Burns at Geneva, and which is given in some detail in the New York Times, with regard to an international police force as part of the western proposals at the current disarmament meeting.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I shall have to obtain a report, look into the matter and give the Leader of the Opposition an answer at the earliest possible moment.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

STATEMENT AS TO FRENCH NETWORK PROGRAM ON MARSHAL PETAIN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I ask the Minister of National Revenue whether his inquiry in connection with the program to which I referred on two earlier occasions has materialized, and whether he is able to give any information to the house in connection with it now.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): I was awaiting an opportunity to reply to the question of the hon. member for Laurier.

I am advised by the C.B.C. that the broadcast about Marshal Petain was part of a C.B.C. recorded series which started some time ago. As a matter of fact the sequence of the broadcasts was set at the time the series was first planned and organized in October of 1959. This was prior, of course, to the announcement of the visit to Canada of President de Gaulle. The sequence placed the Petain broadcast on April 18. This happened to be the day the President of France arrived in Ottawa.

In the same series a week previously—that was on April 11—another broadcast in that series on "The Liberation of Paris" dealt with the role played by General de Gaulle in that very historic event.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

HAY RIVER, N.W.T.—ACTION TO OVERCOME ISOLATION DUE TO SPRING BREAK-UP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Armand Dumas (Villeneuve): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Has the minister received a telegram from the citizens' committee of Hay River, Northwest Territories, requesting that he carry out his promise of three years ago that he would do something within a year to prevent the citizens of that community from being isolated from the rest of the world each spring because of the washing out of the fill across the Hay river connecting the Mackenzie highway with that community?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): To my knowledge there has been no recent wire, but there have been frequent communications and consultations with the community of Hay River, and they are fully aware of the actions that are being taken at the present time.

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw attention to the fact that the wire is dated April 27. This is a very recent wire.

PUBLIC WORKS

CONSTRUCTION OF DREDGE FOR USE ON PACIFIC COAST

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Is it the intention of the Department of Public Works not to proceed with the building of the new hopper dredge on the west coast, as I understood was decided earlier, at a cost of somewhere in the neighbourhood of $3.2 million?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): I have nothing further to report to the house, Mr. Speaker, than that which I have already gone into in detail.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a supplementary question. Can the minister say why the laying of the keel was delayed from November of last year to April of this year?

Mr. Walker: I was not aware that there was any delay, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, apropos of the question I asked the Minister of Public Works earlier, I should like to ask him an additional supplementary question. Will he inquire from his departmental officials whether it is a fact that the laying of the keel of the dredge was postponed?

Mr. Walker: I will be very happy indeed to do that.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE FAIR

REPRESENTATIVES TO CONFERENCE—REPORTED STATEMENT BY POSTMASTER GENERAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): On Tuesday the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Crestohl) directed two questions with regard to Canada's bid for the world's fair in 1967 to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who said the questions could more properly be answered by myself.

The first question asked if the house could be informed whether the mayor of Montreal had been invited as an official representative to the conference. In reply I may say that the federal government is anxious for the inclusion in its delegation to the bureau of international exhibitions meeting on May 5 of representatives from both the province of Quebec and the city of Montreal, and we have so indicated through appropriate channels. However, up to the present we are not aware who will represent the city of Montreal.

In the second part of the hon. member's question he asked why the Postmaster General had announced in Montreal that Canada has a slim chance of having the fair. I draw his attention immediately to the fact that the use of the word "slim" was by the newspaper headline writer, and was not my own word at all. I did say that the sudden entry into the bureau of seven countries which have consistently supported the U.S.S.R. in its international relations has made the position of Canada and Austria, which are the only other two countries seeking the fair, more difficult. I think this is obvious, since the choice between the U.S.S.R., Austria and Canada will be made by the bureau based on the votes of its member states, and the hon. member is quite conversant with the voting practices.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask a supplementary question of the minister. Has consideration been given to the possibility of persuading seven of Canada's friends to join the bureau?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): The latest development took place quite suddenly, and membership in the bureau must be sought at least one month before the meeting in which the new countries will vote.

IMMIGRATION

INQUIRY AS TO ADVERTISING CAMPAIGN IN UNITED KINGDOM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, based upon government of Canada immigration services advertisements placed in British provincial newspapers.

In view of the unemployment here, and the advertising campaign of the minister's department in Great Britain for immigrants in a wide category of occupations, can the minister explain the scope and intention of the recruiting now being carried on in the United Kingdom?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the advertisement to which the hon. member refers is primarily an invitation to persons to attend film showings. Included in it, I believe, is a list of occupations in which there are vacancies at the present time. These are openings of which we were advised by the national employment service. There are always a few openings at various places in Canada, regardless of the employment situation.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): May I ask a supplementary question. I have recently seen this advertisement, and it states that there are many openings in Canada for carpenters, painters and electricians. Will the minister kindly explain why this advertisement in the United Kingdom should say there are many openings in these trades, in view of the fact that unemployment in these trades constitutes a major part of the unemployment problem?

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me that the hon. member is undertaking to debate the matter rather than ask a question.

Mr. Winch: No, I am not. I am asking why.

Mr. Fisher: I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Labour, and ask if he would check the information that is provided as to these vacancies with the department of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, because the types of jobs set out in this advertisement would seem to be already very well covered in this country.

Mr. R. D. Thrasher (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour): I will be very happy to bring that matter to the minister's attention.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR REMOVAL OF RESTRICTIONS ON BUILDING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. With housing starts down nearly 50 per cent in the first quarter of this year compared with the first quarter of last year, and with unemployment still with us to an alarming degree, will the government now give consideration to altering its present declared policy of restricting house building in 1960 below the level of 1959?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my hon. friend for the question, and to reassure him that the government has this matter under constant consideration.

Mr. J. A. Habel (Cochrane): I should like to ask a supplementary question. Has the minister received any protests from the municipalities of northern and northwestern Ontario as to the effect the new amendment will have on the construction of new houses in these localities?

Mr. Walker: Would the hon. member be good enough to tell me what municipality?

[Mrs. Fairclough.]

Mr. Habel: All of them in northern and northwestern Ontario. They are all up in the air about it.

Mr. Walker: We have had some representations from people in municipalities, but not from municipalities.

Mr. Garland: May I ask a supplementary question. Since we are rapidly approaching what normally should be the peak of the building season, I wonder whether the government is giving any consideration to making more funds available for direct lending; funds, I might add, which have already been approved by parliament.

Mr. Walker: May I reiterate that all day to day matters in connection with housing have our constant consideration and if, as and when any change is made the matter will be drawn to the attention of hon. members.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

SUGGESTED SCHOLARSHIP FOR MONTREAL "GAZETTE" CORRESPONDENT FOR ORIGINAL POETRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. I apologize for not sending him notice; I have just thought of the question. Would the minister read today's Gazette, which contains a poem by Arthur Blakely entitled "Stanzas Written in Dejection on Being Misquoted", and say whether it justifies a recommendation to the Canada Council for a scholarship?

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

DIRECTIVE RESPECTING DISPOSAL OF U.S. COINS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General. Is the Postmaster General aware that under date of April 12, 1960, the district director of postal service issued a circular to post offices directing that whenever possible United States coins accepted by post offices should be handed out as change to other patrons, in view of the fact that a discount is charged on such coins by the banks?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): No, Mr. Speaker, I was not aware of this rather ingenious suggestion on the part of the district director.

Mr. Denis: May I ask a supplementary question. Would the minister look into that matter and make a comment on it? If it is true, then would he accept these falsified dollars in any amount which may be given to the postmasters?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, seriously, to the best of my knowledge United States coinage has been accepted in this country for a good many years, and has passed back and forth across the counters. I imagine it will continue to do so for some time to come.

Mr. Denis: This circular is addressed to every employee accepting money—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: If hon. members will give the hon. member a chance, I shall try to determine whether or not he is asking a question.

Mr. Denis: It is only in order to contradict—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: I understand that the post office estimates are to be called very shortly, and the hon. member will find that a more suitable opportunity for pursuing the matter.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): May I ask a supplementary question of the Postmaster General. Would he explain to the house why he has had his postmasters instructed to get rid of United States coinage to members of the public in that way?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): As I explained to the hon. member for St. Denis just a moment ago, I had no particular knowledge of this order, but I will be glad to look into it.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask whether this is another difference of opinion between Coyne and Fleming?

AGRICULTURE

DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS—COMPLETION OF STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder if I could ask the Acting Prime Minister whether, when the agriculture estimates are called later today or tomorrow, it is his intention, in his acting capacity, to continue the statement on deficiency payments which the Prime Minister unfortunately had to interrupt the last time the estimates were before the house.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Acting Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY ACT

AMENDMENTS TO EXTEND PERIOD OF PAYMENTS AND INCREASE MAXIMUM EXPENDITURES

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-57, to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the minister not going to say anything?

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, there is no question of principle involved today. This act has been gone into in 1949, 1956 and 1959, and the principle of the bill has been debated at great length. I would only be guilty of repetition in taking up the time of the house by adding anything further at this stage, so at this time I do not propose to make any comment. I will be very happy, however, when the house goes into committee to answer any questions and perhaps say something at the end of the discussion.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, perhaps it will not surprise you when I assure you that I have none of the fear of repetition that seems to be in the mind of the Minister of Public Works. Not only have I no fear of repetition, but in view of the scant impression which seems to have been made on the mind of the minister by the debate which took place at the resolution stage it seems to me that a certain amount of repetition is called for, and urgently called for.

At the time the resolution preceding this bill was before the committee, namely on March 29, my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition set out, as recorded on page 2562 of Hansard, the position of the Liberal opposition on this bill. I want to repeat, not in the same words precisely but in substance, what was said by the Leader of the Opposition at that time. I do this because we on this side of the house are constantly being taunted by the government with the statement that we have no alternatives to suggest to the policies which are put forward by the government.

I want to make it abundantly clear that in this matter we have an alternative. We have an alternative which has been put clearly before the house and the country, an alternative which goes some part of the way, but not the whole distance, that hon. gentlemen who now occupy the treasury benches, notably the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton), the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green) and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees), suggested it should go when the previous government were in office.

Put very briefly, the position of the Liberal party of Canada in this matter is that owing to the disability under which they suffer with respect to transportation, the government of Canada should pay in the Atlantic provinces, and in the Atlantic provinces only, 90 per cent of the cost of building this national undertaking.

The first statement on behalf of the Leader of the Opposition was made before March 31, 1958, in these words. This was a statement issued from the office of the Leader of the Opposition:

> In reply to a request about the scale of assistance contemplated in the Liberal program to provide special assistance for the building of trunk highways in the Atlantic provinces, Mr. Pearson stated that what he had in mind was the assumption by the federal government of 90 per cent of the cost of completing the trans-Canada highway in the four Atlantic provinces and the earliest possible discussion with the governments of those provinces about the routes of other key trunk highways which would be eligible for federal assistance.

As the Leader of the Opposition stated when he spoke here on March 29, that continues to be the policy of the Liberal opposition. Moreover, when he spoke on that occasion, the Leader of the Opposition quoted a statement by the present Minister of Justice when he was sitting on this side of the house on April 16, 1956. He said, as reported on page 2942 of Hansard of that date:

> I said a few words prior to the adjournment on that day in which I had just got to the point where I was seeking to demonstrate that the proposal now before the house—

That is the proposal which is now before the house, I would remind the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Public Works, because there has been no change whatever by the present government from the scheme put forward at that time.

> —is neither adequate to ensure the completion of the trans-Canada highway by the date mentioned in the resolution, namely, December 31, 1960, nor is it fair—

I hope the Minister of Public Works will mark these words.

> —as between provinces which are participating members under the trans-Canada highway agreement.

So here we have the Minister of Justice when he was sitting on this side of the house saying that this legislation was not "fair as between provinces". Those are his words; yet he is now participating in a government which brings forward an extension of precisely the same legislation without changing anything in it except the date of completion of the road.

What accounts for this extraordinary change in view? I could go on and quote the Minister of Transport who, speaking with that moderation with which he always spoke when he sat on this side of the house, carefully weighing every word, so characteristic of that hon. gentleman in those days, had this to say as reported on page 2955 of Hansard for April 16, 1956:

> I think that we in this parliament, particularly the government, must face up to the hard, cold fact that if this highway is to be built within the foreseeable future, the federal government must assume the financial responsibility for its construction and stop playing around with makeshift methods of trying to get it built.

I repeat; "must stop playing around with makeshift methods", said the present Minister of Transport in 1956. I assume there is still a little collective responsibility left in the government in 1960, although after the display of the day before yesterday one sometimes doubts it. If there is any collective responsibility the Minister of Transport is equally responsible with the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Justice for the legislation now before the house. What did the Minister of Transport call it when he sat on this side? It was a "makeshift method". This Liberal makeshift method is the Tory policy to build the trans-Canada highway.

That is the situation, sir. I have no doubt that the Minister of Public Works, who is like a Bourbon who learns nothing—I do not know about the forgetting part, but he is half a Bourbon—will get up after I am finished speaking, and I am sure he will say, "Well, you didn't do it. Why didn't you do it?"

Well, sir, why did not we do it? We started this trans-Canada highway in 1949 on a 50-50 basis, and this was quite a departure from the previous policy in this connection. It was a pioneering venture undertaken as the result of a decision made at the national Liberal convention of 1948 and implemented by the government of Mr. St. Laurent after the election of 1949. It was a very progressive step, but it was only a step; and when in 1956 the government found that this great project was not being completed at anything like the rate we felt it should be, we made an improvement in the formula, an improvement which provided that 90 per cent of the cost should be paid for 10 per cent of the highway.

I was a member of the government when that decision was made and was of course bound by that decision, and I defended it. However, I do not mind admitting that even at that time I would have liked to go a bit further, and we found even after that change that the progress was not as rapid as it should have been. We also found that the rate of progress was very different in different provinces. In the prairie provinces, where the problems of building were not nearly so great and where the road was in fact the main road across the province anyway, they were getting ahead very rapidly. But in other parts of Canada, for one reason or another into which I will not bother entering here, the progress was very slow, notably in the province of Ontario, and for that it is hard to find any excuse whatsoever.

At any rate, Mr. Winters came in here and proposed, and parliament agreed, to pay 90 per cent of the cost of 10 per cent of the highway. Of course the provinces had the chance to choose the most difficult 10 per cent, and I would guess most of them did so.

In order to speed things up, we in the Liberal party came to the conclusion by 1958, when we held our national convention, that even this would not get the road in the Atlantic provinces completed within a reasonable time. Why? It was because those provinces could not afford, out of their annual revenues, to devote enough money to this particular project. In fact in Nova Scotia they had barely started. The view taken by the government of Nova Scotia through the early years after 1949 was that this road, because it was not the main highway in the province and because there were other roads in the province serving the same areas, did not have the same priority from the provincial point of view as other roads did. In fact an agreement was not entered into for several years.

The plain fact is that while from a national standpoint this road is, in my opinion, very important, in some of the provinces—Ontario, for example—it does not assume the same importance. I know about this, in the case of Nova Scotia, because I was in the gallery of the Nova Scotia legislature myself a couple of years ago and heard the minister of highways say that they did not feel they could give a high priority to the trans-Canada highway over other roads for which they also had to pay.

It is not for me to say why this situation should exist, but it certainly does, as experience has shown. Even, as in the case of the province of Newfoundland, where the highway is the main road in the province, there is still not enough in the provincial budget that can be devoted to the completion of this project after all the other essential expenditures have been made. That is why we took the view at the national Liberal convention of 1958 that additional help should be given to the provinces with respect to the construction of roads in the light of the fact that considerable provision had been made elsewhere to assist railway construction. In the Atlantic provinces, except for one small line in New Brunswick, railways were no longer the answer to transportation problems, and roads obviously were. However, railways were still being built—very long railways in the province of Quebec, and considerable branch lines in Ontario, in addition to railways in all the prairie provinces and in British Columbia—for virtually all of which very substantial assistance was provided by parliament.

Mr. Winch: We have not been paid yet in British Columbia.

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not know the hon. gentleman had joined the Social Credit government of British Columbia, but if the Social Credit government have not yet been paid it is because they did not apply for payment, because payment was provided for part of that railway, if I remember well, and I am sure the hon. gentleman will recall that also because I believe he was a member of this parliament when the provision was made.

In any event, in most of the provinces of Canada, from and including Quebec westward, very substantial sums were provided since the war for the building of railways, while virtually nothing has been provided for the building of new railways in the Atlantic provinces, though I admit that a good deal has been spent on the improvement of existing lines. There was nothing exceptional about that; it is the general practice in all the provinces.

However, we took the view that since roads were the real need, roads rather than railways, which were helped elsewhere, had become a matter of national importance, because we in the Liberal party were of the opinion that it is a national responsibility to try to maintain conditions across Canada as nearly equal as it is possible to maintain them. The Minister of Justice said this legislation which he is now helping to sponsor was unfair. It is unfair; there is no question about that. It is very unfair, and that is one of the reasons why we adopted this proposal which was put forward in 1958.

My hon. friend from Humber-St. George's (Mr. Batten) in a speech he made on March 31, I think it was, made a masterly analysis of the situation which gave one a real insight into the per capita costs and the difficulties encountered by the various provinces. It was a masterly speech which it would be wrong of me to repeat to the house at any length but in my opinion the most striking of all the many remarkable statistics my hon. friend put on the record was the comparison between British Columbia and Newfoundland.

The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) can relax, because I am going to admit the point he wants made. We all recognize that the difficulties of building roads in British Columbia are great, that they are probably greater in some areas of that province than they are in any other province. But they are not very much greater than they are in the province of Newfoundland, and there is this additional difficulty with which I shall deal. The figures show that 13 per cent of the total length of this trans-Canada highway is in British Columbia and 13 per cent is in Newfoundland. In other words there is about the same length in each of the two provinces. However, the cost of the provincial share has to be spread among less than half a million people in Newfoundland as compared with about two million people in British Columbia.

Mr. Winch: What is our area?

Mr. Pickersgill: The area is precisely the same, as I pointed out. The trans-Canada highway has the same width and the same length. If you multiply the width by the length you get the area. It happens to be 13 per cent of the total in each case.

Mr. Winch: There is a big difference when you multiply the area by the width. There is a difference between a small wood and a big wood.

Mr. Pickersgill: I thank the hon. member for his diversion. It is almost worthy of the Prime Minister.

The point from which I refuse to be diverted, because it is an extreme example, is this. Here we have a road which we are building as a national undertaking right across Canada. Thirteen per cent of it is in the most westerly province and 13 per cent in the most easterly province, but there are at least four times as many people in the westernmost province to pay their share. Then, to compare incomes, the westernmost province enjoys the highest average income in the whole country, while unhappily—I am sorry to have to say it, but it is true—the easternmost province has the lowest. No wonder the Minister of Justice when he sat on this side of the house and was free to express his opinion said this situation was unfair. It is unfair, and that is why we changed our policy—and we are not ashamed of the fact that we learn things.

Mr. Winch: Why did you change it in 1958, after you were defeated?

Mr. Pickersgill: Because we did not change it before. That seems to me to be a good reason, and I am not ashamed to admit that I have changed my mind about a good many things. Why did we change the 50-50 formula to the 90-10 formula? It was because we had learned something. The Minister of Transport, when he sat over here, said the whole road should be paid for by the treasury of Canada. What has happened to him since he went to sit over there?

An hon. Member: He has learned something and changed his mind, too.

Mr. Pickersgill: He has learned that he is not the boss. He has learned that the Minister of Finance would just say no. He was not the only one to offer hopes. I have here the text of a very interesting television performance put on by the Minister of Public Works in the city of St. John's on October 19, 1959. That was the same day the minister had the satisfaction of presiding over the opening of a public building in the city of St. John's which was at that time, I think, the largest building in that city, and which was built by a Liberal government. On that day the minister made a very favourable impression in St. John's, I might say. I happened to be there, and I had the pleasure of seeing him on television. I thought he put on a very good performance. However, I thought I should like to have the text of his performance, because I anticipated that the day might come when it ought to be recorded in a less perishable form than on television. There are bits of it I should like the house to read, and I am sure the minister would be delighted to hear them. Mr. Jamieson, the interlocutor, had asked the minister some questions about term 29. I am not going to repeat those questions, because I realize they would not be relevant to this debate, though perhaps I could make them relevant if I were challenged. Mr. Jamieson said this:

> In other words, I gather that this is another way of saying what was emphasized earlier—

That was in the minister's previous answer.

> —that in so far as the federal government is concerned, it is not a matter of wiping out Newfoundland's special needs, but that there is still recognition of the fact that we do have special needs in this province.

This is the minister's reply:

> Very, very much so, and there's no one, I think, who appreciates the needs of Newfoundland more than the dominion government at Ottawa.

There might be two views about that matter, but this is what the minister said. Then a little later on—there are several other questions which are not relevant to the trans-Canada highway—I come to this question:

> Well, sir, something else that came up at the press conference this morning was the question of the over-all attitude of the federal government here with regard to the trans-Canada highway. Again, this is of great concern to us in Newfoundland, and I think you had some comments that the paving, in the park at any rate, would be done next year.

This was in 1959. Here is the minister's reply:

> Yes, the part that we are 100 per cent responsible for is your wonderful park—

I am extremely pleased that the minister recognized that the park the Liberal government established in the year 1957 is the wonderful park that we know it is. He said:

> Yes, the part that we are 100 per cent responsible for is your wonderful park, and that 26 miles will be completed early in 1960.

I can tell the minister that was very good news. I have since learned that tenders have been called, and I hope he will not be too long in deciding to let the contracts. Some of us expect to ride over that road this summer, early in 1960, if we can get away from here. Then he went on to give some figures of the cost, and went on to explain the cost-sharing formula which is well known to the house and which it would be an imposition to repeat. Then Mr. Jamieson said this:

> Sir, I am aware of the fact, of course, that you can't discuss matters of government policy.

I do not know why. When I was a minister I did not hesitate to discuss matters of government policy, but perhaps the minister is more discreet in this matter. I continue with the quotation:

> There has been a suggestion, in other parts of Canada as well, that perhaps the whole basis for the construction of the trans-Canada highway might have to be changed. Is there any likelihood, or is there any suggestion that the whole policy might be reviewed?

The minister's reply was as follows:

> Oh, well, I think the policy ought to be reviewed.

I emphasize that statement. He said:

> Oh, well, I think the policy ought to be reviewed . . . At the end of 1960, the trans-Canada act runs out and certainly we can't see the provinces left in the lurch, and this is a tremendous project, particularly in Newfoundland where you really want to have a trans-Canada highway go from sea to sea, and we're anxious to co-operate and I am sure that some form of extension will be arranged and I trust it will be satisfactory to your provincial government.

I am not seeking to suggest for one minute that the minister in any of those words went one iota beyond the bill that is now before us, because that would be unfair. But I suggest that the average Newfoundlander listening to those words would get the impression that when the new legislation came along we were going to get a better deal than we had before.

The minister did not say so. I am not saying that he said so. However, I am saying that even I, with all my experience and with all my suspicion of the minister, thought there might be some faint chance that these words were meant to be more than just a hope. Then the best this government could do was to go on precisely along the lines of the previous government which they are so fond of condemning so much of the time and which they promised, of course, not merely to replace on the treasury benches but to change all those things that were being done so inadequately.

One would have thought that one of the things that would most assuredly have been changed would be something which the Minister of Justice, of all men, said was not fair, and particularly when so influential a member of the government as the Minister of Transport said the whole thing should be paid for out of the federal treasury.

An hon. Member: You said that before.

Mr. Pickersgill: I said that before, but perhaps it is important occasionally to repeat these things until they are grasped by some hon. members.

There was one other thing that I found extremely disappointing in the debate on the resolution, apart from the intransigent attitude on the part of the Minister of Public Works in insisting on sticking to the old policies—not the new ones—of the Liberal party. Of course I suppose that would be a definition of conservatism, that Conservatives wear the old, worn-out clothes that Liberals have discarded. I have seen that definition of "Conservative".

In this particular instance that is the thing they are doing. I was greatly disappointed by the speech that was made in this debate by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. McCleave); I do not know whether I should call him the taller or the junior member for Halifax. I refer to the hon. member for Halifax who sits on this side of the house. The hon. member for Halifax said in effect —and if he thinks I am being unfair to him I am quite willing to read the extracts from Hansard—that because the Atlantic provinces grant, for which all of us in the Atlantic provinces who have any sense are very grateful; it is the only thing we have to be grateful to this government for—the federal government had no other obligations in the highway field to the provinces, although the hon. member expressed the hope that some time or other they would build a road into Halifax. I might say that if he and enough people like him had supported us that road would have been started by now, because that is one of the trunk roads that it would be part of Liberal policy to build and one of the most important of them, quite obviously.

But I would remind the hon. member for Halifax that a much different attitude was taken by the Conservative party in 1957, at the time that hon. gentleman was elected to this house. At that time, although I have not seen the list of names, I imagine the hon. member for Halifax was present at the historic meeting in Moncton when the great charter of the Tory party for the Atlantic provinces was drawn up. At that time the Atlantic provinces were promised Atlantic provinces grants or something equivalent to them. Special adjustment grants they were called in this document, and I take it that is the same thing.

But they were also promised—and it is No. 4 of the Atlantic resolutions—the "adjustment of freight rates and provision of transportation facilities to allow our producers reasonable access to the markets of Canada". The only adjustment in freight rates has been an adjustment upward of 17 per cent, and then 10 per cent was taken off afterwards. So that the only adjustment we have had so far is 7 per cent up, nothing down. It just says "adjustment" here in the Atlantic resolutions. People were intended to believe that it would be an adjustment down, not up, but that is what we have. As for the provision of other transportation facilities, we have had nothing whatever.

That is the whole point. It does not seem to me that any Tory member of this house who subscribes to this Atlantic resolution should be satisfied to support and vote for this bill in its present form, because certainly people in the Atlantic provinces were led to believe by everything that was said before hon. gentlemen opposite attained office that the situation would be different.

There is just one other thing I wish to say about this matter. I regret, and I think every Canadian who really believes that this is a great national project in which all parts of the country should participate regrets very much, that the government of the province of Quebec up to now has not seen fit to participate. I hope, if certain events that many of us look for should come about, that the situation will be changed before too long. This is one reason I am glad that at any rate, if no other change is made in this bill, the time is being extended so that our fellow citizens in Quebec who pay their share in taxes for this road, will get their share of the benefits to which they are entitled and which it is no fault of this parliament, and particularly of this party, that they have not had long ago.

But I do say this, sir. I am rather astonished after the constitutional exposé made to this house by the Solicitor General the day before yesterday in which he told us with respect to another piece of legislation, and perhaps I should quote his exact words from page 3288 of Hansard:

> The Liberal legislation was made applicable only to nine provinces out of ten.

He suggested that any law that was applied in only nine provinces out of ten was not constitutional. The Solicitor General is a member of this government, and we all know that our cabinet ministers are equal one to another, even if some are more equal than others. The Solicitor General is a member of the government. He shared the responsibility with the Minister of Justice who said this bill was unfair, and with the Minister of Transport who said it should be on an entirely different basis, and with the Secretary of State for External Affairs who, when he was over here, said the country could afford to spend far more on this road.

That is their record. They all come in here together and jointly recommend the renewal of this Liberal legislation unchanged except for the dates. That is what they are doing, these gentlemen on the treasury benches. But the most astonishing of all is the Solicitor General because, having told us two days ago that a law that was applied only in nine provinces out of ten was unconstitutional, he now comes and brings in a bill which by his own definition is unconstitutional, and he asks us in this house to vote for it. Well, of course, you know—

Mr. Cardiff: Are you going to vote for it or not?

Mr. Pickersgill: It does not make the slightest difference, as the hon. gentleman knows perfectly well, whether we vote for it or not. It is going to be rammed down our throats anyway.

Mr. Cardiff: That is not what I asked you.

Mr. Pickersgill: Of course we are not going to stop the trans-Canada highway, and we are not going to end old-fashioned Liberal legislation if we cannot get anything better; but I am astonished that hon. gentlemen opposite should not be ashamed that they cannot produce anything better after all the claims they made before they went into office. That is the whole point I am trying to make, and I am very grateful to the hon. member for Huron for enabling me to underline the point, because that is what I have been seeking to do.

Mr. Pallett: Is that spelled "underlying"?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I regret very much to have to raise a question of privilege, but if I heard correctly what the hon. member for Peel said I fancy he would wish to change it.

Mr. Pallett: Mr. Speaker, there was no statement made by me; there was a question asked of the hon. member. He can answer it or not.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. member wishes to leave it on the record in that form I certainly do not intend to make any issue of it, but I felt that I should draw attention to the words he used.

Mr. Phillips: You are not denying it?

Mr. Pickersgill: I have nothing whatsoever to deny. I am not interested in the denial, but I am rather surprised that the chief government whip should indulge in that particular kind of debate on that particular level.

Mr. Pallett: I will get the hon. member a crying towel in a minute.

Mr. Pickersgill: I want to say one more thing about this matter, and it is pretty fundamental. I do think, sir, that experience with the trans-Canada highway and with some of those other 50-50 sharing arrangements—I said this the last time this bill was before the house and wish to say it again—has shown, as the Minister of Justice said when he was over here, this is a very unfair way to have federal financial participation. It creates a great incentive for provinces that are wealthy or provinces that are favourably situated to accept those proposals and get money out of the taxpayers generally, and it often imposes programs upon other provinces, because of the incentive of some federal money, that perhaps they would not give the first priority to if they were managing their own affairs themselves.

I do think that normally—I say "normally" —the federal government should not make conditional payments to provinces to further provincial objects. I believe it is far better to increase the amount that is paid under equalization payments and leave the provinces generally free and autonomous to carry out their functions as they and their electors see fit.

I was fully in agreement with the Minister of Public Works when he suggested that we should go slow on a second trans-Canada highway and on some of those other projects, not because I object in principle to a second trans-Canada highway, but because I think the whole financial basis of the project should be looked at from two aspects, the financial and also the constitutional basis. I do not mean the phony constitutional basis of the Solicitor General; I mean the genuine constitutional basis, that is to say whether it is really desirable for the federal treasury to be paying half the cost of provincial services when they are really just provincial services, instead of leaving the responsibility to the provincial electors, the provincial legislators and the provincial governments, and putting them, through equalization payments that have no strings attached, in a position to do it themselves.

I think this is doubly important, sir, so long as we are going to have the situation that has now existed for 10 years in the case of the trans-Canada highway, where one province with almost one third of the population is having to bear a share of the cost of this project while getting no benefit from it. I say again, it is no fault of ours, it is no fault of this parliament, but it is a fact. It is a fact that we cannot escape, and I think we should be more careful about the proliferation of schemes of this sort unless we are really sure there will be universal participation right across the country, and unless we are convinced that the division of cost is really equitable, as it certainly is not in this case.

There is no doubt that the greatest beneficiary by far of this trans-Canada highway legislation is the province of Ontario. The province of Ontario has by far the longest stretch of the road, and what we are doing is taxing all the people of Canada to pay out of the federal treasury half plus 90 per cent of the cost of 10 per cent of that road in the province of Ontario. I think it was a good thing to do, because we need a trans-Canada highway. I do not question that we need it very badly, but it should be right across Canada and not part way across. I say that the proposal to extend this kind of sharing into normal provincial services is very dangerous and, as the Minister of Justice has said, it is a very unfair way to do it. I think we should look at it with the greatest possible care.

I would hope that at the federal-provincial conference which is to take place in July this whole question will be considered in relation to the question of equalization. I cannot help but feel that if we could increase the equalization grants, which is fairer because it puts the poorer provinces on a genuine level of equality with the better off ones, and then leave the provinces to do their own job in their own way, we would be acting more in the genuine spirit of confederation and would be distributing the money more fairly. If there are to be more projects of this kind I hope the division of financial cost will be more along the lines of the hospital insurance plan, where there was not only a 50-50 division but some account was also taken of the burden upon the province and its capacity to pay.

I do not agree too often with what the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) says but I must say that I was very pleased that in the debate on the resolution the hon. member, if I understood him correctly and I think I did, gave support to that proposition; because it does seem to me that it is a really important point in the whole business of federal-provincial partnership, of which there has to be a good deal if Canada is really to be a nation and not a series of Balkanized provinces.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I must express our disappointment with regard to the limited amendments contained in the bill now before us. After the lengthy debate at the resolution stage we had expected that the government would agree to accept a number of amendments that were offered by the opposition. However, we have to deal with the amendments as contained in the bill now before us.

I regret very much that the minister of highways of the province of British Columbia did not assist us at the resolution stage or even before the resolution stage. Unfortunately he came to Ottawa after the resolution stage had already passed, and he then attempted to persuade the government as to what kind of amendments it should make to the Trans-Canada Highway Act. I believe that as a legislator and cabinet minister he should have known a little better, and should have realized that if he wanted to have any major influence on the policy decisions of the government the time to approach the government was at least not later than the end of the debate at the resolution stage, so the government might have taken cognizance of whatever representation he wished to make before the debate on second reading began.

I regret that the legislation before us will permit the richest provinces of Canada to continue to procrastinate with regard to making their contribution to the completion of what will be our first trans-Canada highway. I should have liked to see in the bill some kind of penalty by way of reduced percentages payable by the federal government to those wealthy areas of Canada that have been standing idly by. I have special reference here to my own province of British Columbia and even more particularly to the province of Ontario. I do not think the House of Commons can continue to encourage indefinitely procrastination on the part of these two richest areas of Canada by continuous postponement of the termination date beyond which the federal contribution will no longer be payable.

We do not intend to oppose the further postponement of that date by three years now being sought by the government. However, we feel that if British Columbia and Ontario do not begin at a very early date to show evidence of more honest intentions to complete their portions of the trans-Canada highway, then the whole basis of federal sharing should be given a very serious review so that an incentive for early completion on the part of the wealthier areas of Canada may be contained in the legislation.
