On Sunday last five lads, named Allan Cameron, Harry Steeves, James Walls, Jas. Skields and Albert Smith, instead of going to Sunday School or engaging in some such occupation proper for the day, took a walk towards the back of the town. Three of them—Cameron, Steeves and who can do so should join in the trip which will be the last of the season for this purpose.

Court at Newcastle, on 11th inst., I think it right to explain that the matter was pretty well taken out of our hands by the Foreman. In the first place, there seemed to be an understanding that he was to be foreman, for the Sheriff nominated him for the position. That was an unusual thing, I think, and none of us seemed to realize that it was so, until afterwards. Then, it was said, that Mr. Stewart had the address prepared a day or two before, hand, and when it was laid before us by who can do so should join in the trip which will be the last of the season for this purpose.

YOLANDE. By WILLIAM BLACK,

And as for her; she was stun most into unconsciousness by this shock of self-abasement and distress. She lay on the sofa, her face covered with her hands; she could not face the light. What was she, then?—she who had hitherto been so fearless and so proud. A flirt, a jilt, a light o'love—that was how she saw herself; and then there was a kind of despair over the misery was a kind of despair over the misery she had wrought, and a yearning to have him back to implore his pity and his forgiveness; and then sudden re-solves to free herself in another direc-tion, at any cost of penitence and humi-liation. She began to compose hurried

This also was strange, that, amid all the preparations for departure that she was now mechanically making, she should be possessed by a singular auxisty that Mrs. Bell, when she came to Allt-nam-ba, should find the household arrangements in the most perfect order. Had she some vague hope or fancy, then that some day or other, when she

"You are going, Yolande?" he said, looking, and again and again she besought her to desist from these preparations, and to go and have some lunch, which awaited her in the dining-room, "You know, miss," said she, "you can't go before your papa comes home; and then it would be far too late to catch the steamer. You can't go before the morning; and I am sure, miss, you will be quite ill and unable to travel if you don't eat something."

Well, Yolande went into the diningroom, and sat down at the table; but she could not eat or drink anything; and in a minute or two she was back again in her bedroom superintending the packing of her trunks. However, she was in time compelled to desist. The meneal agitation of the morning, combined with this want of food, produced the natural result: she gradually went in the definition of the morning, combined with this want of food, produced the natural result: she gradually went in the definition of the morning, combined with this want of food, produced the natural result: she gradually went in the sinking of the heart.

"You a sen going, Yolande?" he said, with a sinking of the heart.

"That, again, it is unnecessary for you to ask me," the girl said, simply.

"But not at once, Yolande?" said he girl said, simply.

"But not at once, Yolande?" said he girl said, simply.

she was in time compelled to desist. The meneal agitation of the morning, combined with this want of food, produced the natural result; she gradually acquired a violent headache—a headache so violent that further superintendence of packing or anything else was entirely out of the question. Now, it was the literal fact that she had never had a headache in her life—except once at the Chateau, when a large volume she was reaching for in the library fell and struck her—and she did not know what to do; but she fancied that by tying a wet towel round her head she might lessen the throbbing of the temples; and this she did, lying down the while. Jane stole out of the room, fancying her young mistress might now get some sleep. The girl was not thinking of sleep.

"Young Leslie. I think he might have spared her. It was not much. Don't you think—out of consideration—"

"Nonsense, 'man. What young Leslie has done seems to me, on reflection, perfectly just, and right, and reasonable," said John Shortlands, telling a lie in the calmest manner possible.

She was standing quite still now, her eyes distraught, and she was trying to recall the very tones in which he had said, "I love you." That was the misery of it, and the cause of her remorse and self-abasement; and yet—and yet somewhere or other deep down in her heart there was a curious touch of pride that she had heard those words. If circumstances had been different—to be approved, to have won the affection, to be loved by one like that! And then a passion of self-contempt seized her, and she said to herself: "You, to think yourself worthy of such a love! You, who can allow yourself to think of such things with that ring on your finger!"

This sless was strange, that a smid all.

I saw so much said about the merits of Hop Bitters, and my wife who was always Allt-nam-ba, should bind the household arrangements in the most perfect order. Had she some vague hope or fancy, then, that some day or other, when she should be far enough away from Allt-nam-ba and Gress and Lynn, and not likely to see any one of them again, her name might be mentioned casually by this good woman, and mentioned perhaps with some slight word of approval? When she drew out for Mrs. Bell's guidance a list of her arrangement with the Inverness tradesmen, she was dissatisfied with the mere handwriting of it (for indeed her fingers trembled somewhat), and she destroyed, and wrote out another—until the handwriting was fairly clear and correct.
