BUDGET CHANGES

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): Might I ask the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) whether he has not omitted something to-day; whether there are no more budget changes to be laid on the table?

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance): Nothing more to-day, Mr. Speaker.

DISMISSAL OF J. B. LEVESQUE

Mr. ALEXANDRE J. DOUCET (Kent, N.B.) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, on March 19, 1924, the House ordered the production of all correspondence exchanged between the Department of Marine and Fisheries and Mr. Jean Baptiste Lévesque relating to the dismissal of this employee; on April 30 last, the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries informed me that the officials of his department would immediately furnish all the information required relating to this dismissal. I wish to know if I shall soon be given this information?

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) (Translation): The corespondence to which the hon. member refers has just been laid on the Table of the House.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE ACTING MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Monday, May 12, the debate on the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Acting Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into committee of Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Woodsworth.

Mr. R. F. PRESTON (Lanark): Mr. Speaker, I desire to address the House for a few moments on a question that I believe to be of great importance not only to the people whom I have the distinguished honour to represent, but also to the masses of the people of this country. I concur with what other hon. gentlemen have said in reference to the absence of the right hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), and I join with them in expressing the hope that in the near future providence will restore to him his health and strength and that he may be enabled again to take his place in the House. To the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) I extend my congratulations upon the bold and vigorous way in which he delivered his budget speech, but to the contents of it, Mr. Speaker, I cannot subscribe.

About a year ago it was rumoured about the country in the press and elsewhere that this government was likely to make some changes in the tariff, and it was suggested that if the changes were made the result would be disastrous to industry, especially to the woollen and textile industries. Following upon that rumour, more than one deputation came to Ottawa to wait upon the right hon. Finance Minister. One of these deputations which I have particularly in mind was made up of a body of able executive men, men of wide experience, who felt it their duty as business men to come here and give all the information they could to the Finance Minister. They laid their cards on the table; they appealed to the minister, and I personally was present and heard the appeal. He received them in his usual courteous manner but gave them no encouragement and when the budget of that year came down it was found that nothing had been done along the lines suggested by them. The country has been placed in a most deplorable financial condition by reason of the fact that no relief was given to the industries I have mentioned.

Before the budget speech of this session was delivered, I understand, another deputation came down here and waited upon the Acting Finance Minister along the same line—men, as I say, of outstanding executive ability, men who knew their business and who wanted to give the Acting Finance Minister what guidance they could and to point out the need for some relief. I do not know exactly what the answer was, but it was stated that he did tell them they might thank God that they had this government in power. What he meant by that I do not know, unless it was that if the Progressive party were in power the condition might be even worse.

I propose to deal with this budget under several heads: First, from the point of view of its effects upon the industry of my own constituency; second, its effect upon the industrial fabric of the country as a whole; third, its adverse effect upon Canadian wages, Canadian employment and the standard of Canadian labour; fourth, its menace to the Canadian home market and consequently to the great mass of the agriculturists of Canada; fifth, its relation to immigration and emigration; sixth, its demoralizing effect upon Canadian stability and Canadian development and its equally demoralizing effect upon public confidence in the integrity of public life involved in the apostasy from the solemn pledges and undertakings given by the government to the people.

I wish to speak first in reference to my own county, with which I am most familiar.

Many years ago we had two principal industries in that county, agriculture and lumbering. The farmers and their sons got work from the lumbermen in the woods in the winter and in the sawmills and on the drives in the summer, and so they went along for some years; everybody was working and everybody was contented. During those days there was no distress, no discontent in the county. But there came a time when the lumbering industry in that part of the country passed out of existence and the farmers' sons were obliged to look to other sources of employment. Fortunately we had a protective tariff in this country, and under that tariff new industries took the place of lumbering and the lumbering towns of those days are now industrial centres.

I propose to give a few figures as to the capital invested in that county in industrial concerns, the wages paid, and the number of employees. We have approximately $9,265,000 capital invested in industrial concerns in that county; they have an annual payroll of $2,026,200, and employees to the number of 2,344. This, Mr. Speaker, illustrates what industry means to one county in Ontario, and these industries have been developed as the result of protection. The figures I have quoted, do not include all the industries, just the major ones, and, of these quoted, two-thirds of the investment is in the woollen industry. These industries have kept our people in our own country, and in our own country they have furnished employment for the sons and daughters of the farmers who do not wish to remain on the land, and further, they have furnished a market for practically the entire agricultural products of our country. Anything seriously affecting the prosperity of these industries will seriously affect the prosperity of every man, woman and child in my county, whether they are in the mills or on the land.

Permit me for a few minutes to deal with the general situation as it affects the woollen industry. This is one of the greatest of Canadian industries, having a total investment of $65,000,000 and 124 mills in the several provinces. It particularly feels British competition more than any other Canadian industry, as is seen by the imports. For the fiscal year ending March 31, 1922, there was imported from the United Kingdom, under the British preferential tariff, goods amounting to $90,000,000. Of this, $22,000,000 were woollen or knitted goods, showing conclusively, that the woollen and knitted goods industry of Canada bears the brunt of importations under the British preferential arrangements. Any increase in the British preference, as I will show further on, means an increase in the importation of British woollen and knitted goods, and a decrease in the Canadian production of the same goods, with consequent unemployment, and the migration of our skilled labour to the United States.

The 10 per cent increase in the British preference placed the woollen and knitted goods industry of Canada in most serious danger. In 1900 the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) increased the British preference to 33½ per cent of the general tariff. Between 1900 and 1907, eighty-eight woollen mills closed their doors and the woollen and knitted goods industry faced almost extinction. So alarming became the depression of this great industry, that the present Minister of Finance made a thorough investigation and changed the preference on these goods, to 14.29 per cent of the general tariff. This tariff practically remained unchanged until 1922, when the same Minister of Finance reduced the duties from Britain 2½ per cent on certain items such as flannels, cloths, tweeds, undershirts, knitted goods, and so on. The effect of that was seen in the rapid increase in the British importations. For the ten months ending January, 1923, with an allowance to bring the figures up to the end of March, 1923, the following increase is shown in importations from Great Britain, of woollen and knitted goods brought about by the tariff reductions made that year:

Total value of woollen and knitted goods imported into Canada:

Year ending March, 1922..	$20,680,208
Year ending March, 1923..	29,484,079

Increase approximately 43 per cent.

Yardage, imported into Canada:

Year ending March, 1922..	12,208,523 yards.
Year ending March, 1923..	18,793,613 yards.

Increase approximately 54 per cent.

Hosiery and socks imported into Canada:

Year ending March, 1922..	257,089 doz. pairs

Increase approximately 138 per cent.

This shows what a serious effect the increase in the British preference had on the Canadian woollen industry. Few of the Canadian mills to-day are running full time; in fact, the competition is so keen that any further preference to the British mills will have a most serious effect. The situation to-day is even more serious to the Canadian industry than it was in 1900. British industry is shut out from continental markets as they cannot pay, and from the United States by the tariff, and they are now turning their whole attention to the Canadian market. British industry is a most powerful and well-organized machine. Certain other factors enable the British manufacturer to produce more cheaply than the Canadian. They have 50 per cent cheaper labour; they have cheaper coal, lower bank rates, cheaper production and a depreciated currency. During the six months ending March, 1923, 15,800,000 yards of British cloth were sent into Canada, which has a population of eight and a half million, while during the same period only 7,220,000 yards of British cloth were sent to the United States, which has a population of a hundred and fourteen million. The United States, with all its highly organized industry and great capital, felt the necessity of protection against the cheaper imports of Great Britain, and they have successfully overcome this by their tariff, while the woollen industry of Canada has been left to bear this keen competition, and this government now proposes to put it out of business.

The reduction in duty was not enough to make any difference in prices to the consumer, while it is sufficient to allow the British industry to undersell in many lines, throwing the men and women in Canada out of work, reducing our market, decreasing our population, and driving our skilled labour to the United States, where they are keenly anxious to get our people. To-day every country in the world, except Canada, is in some form or other increasing its protection to its industries. Canada is the only country in the world that is making it easier for the foreign producer to sell in our markets, and make it more difficult for our own people to retain their own markets.

What is the position of the Canadian woollen industry to-day? In a summary of the situation, as presented by the representatives of the industry who waited on the Acting Finance Minister (Mr. Robb) before the present budget was brought down it was shown that:

Twenty mills are closed since January 1st, 1923, out of 124 woollen and knitting mills on which we have reports. Idle machinery to-day in the 124 mills reporting is as follows:—Looms, 40 per cent; Cards, 33 per cent; Mules, 24 per cent; Dyeing and Finishing, 28 per cent; Knitting, 41 per cent; Sewing, 44 per cent or an average of over 40 per cent of the machinery idle. There is considerable reduction of operating machinery over 1923, which was an extremely unsatisfactory year for the mills. To-day only 10,799 hands are employed in the mills reporting, while if these mills were working full time, they would employ 23,055 hands.

Out of the mills reporting, only 58 could report on the number of their employees who have gone to the United States since January 1st, 1923, and these did not give all those who actually left the country, but only those highly skilled workers they actually know about. The figures for the 58 mills are: Employed when mills are on full time, 11,244; employed to-day, 7,376; known to have left for the United States, 776. This represents over 10 per cent of those now employed in these mills.

While these figures reflect the serious condition in Canadian mills during 1923, and the more serious situation at the present time, we find that over $40,000,000 worth of woollen and knitted goods were shipped to Canada from abroad during the calendar year 1923 of which over $30,000,000 worth were shipped into Canada from Great Britain. On careful analysis of these imports, we find that there is the machinery and technical ability in Canada to manufacture from 80 per cent to 90 per cent of these imports, and if the bulk of the imports had been manufactured in Canada, it would have employed from 17,000 to 20,000 additional hands throughout the year.

It was submitted that the woollen and knitting industry, which is indigenous to Canada, and of which 94.4 per cent of the industrial capital employed is owned by Canadians, should be safeguarded by tariff adjustments, otherwise capital employed would be dissipated, and the employees thrown out of work or largely transplanted to the United States. In the present unsettled political and economic condition of European countries it may possibly be a fatal policy to rely upon an uninterrupted supply of necessities of life, such as woollen and knitted goods to Canada from European sources, including Great Britain. They asked that in the present budget, adjustments of the tariff and regulations regarding the tariff be made to safeguard this industry which is necessary to the full development of Canada along national lines. With this end in view they submitted certain points for consideration. Unlike any other industry in Canada, their main competition for the home market comes from goods shipped from Great Britain. Of the total imports into Canada dutiable under the British preference, one third is in competition with their industry, and their industry therefore bears one third of the burden of the British preference. And since wages and overhead, which is wages in another form, are much lower there than in Canada, Great Britain would have a natural preference in Canada, even if preferential rates of duty were not granted. On examining wage figures supplied by the Ministry of Labour, London, we find that the wages in the woollen and knitting trade in Great Britain were 66 per cent higher in December 1920, than they are now, while in the industry in Canada, the wages are governed by the wages paid in the United States and have not been reduced more than an average of 10 per cent.

Duties on goods from Great Britain were lowered in 1922 and again in 1923. Invoices for duty purposes are valued at the exchange value of sterling on the invoice date, instead of at par value, thus lowering the actual amount of the duty as provided by the tariff.

There is a large "invisible bounty" on all exports of goods from Great Britain to Canada owing to the purchasing power parity of the British pound to the Canadian dollar, and the rate of exchange. This amounts to practically the difference between the par value and the exchange value of sterling. Duties levied on goods from Great Britain imported into Canada are diminished by this amount. There are no tariff regulations compensating for this "invisible bounty". It is a factor in addition to other advantages for producers abroad, such as lower wages, overhead, and so forth.

Goods partially manufactured in continental countries by much cheaper labour than can be had in England, may be shipped into Canada under the British preferential rate. As an example, goods made in Great Britain can be sent to France to be dyed and finished. In this connection, they pointed out that Australia, New Zealand, the Union of South Africa and the Bahamas have the following clause in their regulations, which prohibits such shipments to these countries under their British preferential tariffs:

> In the case of goods which have at some stage entered into the commerce of or undergone process of manufacture in a foreign country, only that labour and material which is expended on or added to the goods after their return to the United Kingdom shall be regarded as the produce or manufacture of the United Kingdom in calculating the proportion of United Kingdom labour and material in the factory or works cost of the finished article.

While they dealt in detail with the question of imports from Great Britain, many of the same points were applied to continental countries, especially France, which owing to the fact that the invoices are valued at the exchange rates and the "purchasing power parity" of the franc is much higher than the exchange value, is rapidly increasing its exports to Canada, to the detriment of our home industries.

In the circumstances, I believe it to be in the national interest to restore the tariff on woollen and knitted goods to at least the rates effective under the Fielding tariff of 1906-7. And particularly for the purpose of preventing commercial dumping now carried on to an extent that is devastating this Canadian industry as a result of depreciated currencies in Great Britain and on the continent, it is necessary that the dumping clause be amended so as to apply the dumping duty to safeguard against such depreciated currencies.

Surveying the government figures for last year of imports in competition with the cotton, silk and linen mills, as well as our woollen and knitting mills, we find that $14.40 worth of manufactured textile products for each man, woman and child in Canada was imported from abroad during 12 months. The total is $112,444,724. The bulk of these goods could be produced in Canada and as their value, outside of the cost of the original raw material, is all labour, the direct and indirect wages lost to the country amounts to almost the value of the imports. The reason why the bulk of these goods was not made here is that the customs duties are so low that the low-paid workers in Great Britain and continental Europe have an advantage in our home market over the better-paid workers in Canada. The wage scale in Canada is determined by the wage scale paid in the United States. Goods partially or completely manufactured by workers in European countries can be shipped into Canada from Great Britain under the British preference. Also there is no compensation given in the administration of the customs duties for the effect of depreciated currencies on goods from Great Britain, France, Belgium and Italy. To give an example, a paper pound will buy in England to-day just as much as a gold pound, but goods from Great Britain are valued for duty purposes at the exchange value of the paper pound as compared to the Canadian dollar. The effect is to actually lower the already too-low duties.

I have here the text of a letter addressed to the Prime Minister by workers in the Canadian textile mills which I desire to have placed on Hansard. I shall not weary the House by reading the communication, but with the permission of hon. gentlemen it will be inserted in the record:

[The communication handed in is as follows:

To the Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING, Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa.

Sir:

Great numbers of men and women in Canadian textile mills are being laid off and more are being put on part time. Some mills are shut down. Because of this, many Canadians have to leave their homes and go to the United States.

This is caused by the $112,000,000 worth of manufactured textile goods made by workers abroad which were sent into Canada last year because our customs duties are too low.

If these goods had been made in Canada, the wages would have been paid to the workers in the Canadian textile mills instead of to men and women in Germany, France, Great Britain, the United States and elsewhere.

Every spinner, every weaver, every knitter, in our Canadian mills would be employed full time and overtime, and the "Help Wanted" sign would be hung out if the wages for making these imported goods went into the pay envelopes of Canadians.

Take only a few items of the goods which came in last year and see what they would mean in work and wages if made in Canada:

Yarns made from wool	3,464,459 lbs.
Tweeds	4,741,113 yards
Worsteds and Serges	7,044,753 yards
Women's and children's dress goods	4,922,192 yards
Flannels, plain	1,509,600 yards
Blankets	128,873 pairs
Socks and stockings, wool	7,897,320 pairs
Socks and stockings, cotton	6,429,660 pairs
Socks and stockings, silk	364,884 pairs
Yarns made from cotton	2,095,428 lbs.
Cotton thread, etc	1,360,245 lbs.
Cotton piece goods dyed	22,253,023 yards
Cotton piece goods printed	6,238,647 yards
Cotton in grey	9,434,243 yards
White unbleached cotton	5,904,495 yards

The above list of course only gives a few examples. The amount of knitted goods coming in is very great but cannot be shown in this way.

The countries from which these goods, manufactured from wool, cotton, silk, flax and hemp, come are:

Great Britain	$65,090,565 worth
United States	27,168,120 worth
Other countries	20,186,049 worth

The wages paid in Great Britain and in European countries are only from one-half to one-quarter of the wage scale paid in Canada and therefore we cannot compete with these low paid workers unless the government protects our wages by increasing customs duties.

We therefore address this letter direct to you personally to ask that you advise your government of the necessity to raise the customs duties sufficiently at the coming session of parliament to protect Canadian workers.

We are,
Yours sincerely,
The Undersigned Workers in the Canadian Textile Mills.]

Some changes have been made in the tariff with respect to agricultural implements, and we have heard a great deal about this matter during the last few weeks. The notes that I have on the agricultural implement industry were prepared before those changes took place. However I shall make my statement to the House, and should I be guilty of any technical blunders I am quite sure hon. gentlemen will excuse me.

1. The implement manufacturer to-day buys his labour at rates 113 per cent higher than they were before the war.

2. He must pay from 100 to 248 per cent more for his raw materials, steel, malleable castings, lumber, cotton duck, and so forth, and the incoming freight charges on these materials are 90 per cent higher than in 1914, while outgoing charges on the finished products are estimated to be 44 to 100 per cent higher than in 1913.

3. Despite these increased costs of production the total increase in the price of farm implements since 1914 is but 80.4 per cent as against an increase of 100 per cent in farm labour.

4. As a direct consequence, few, if any, of the implement manufacturing industries are paying dividends; fourteen of the leading companies lost $9,393,000 in 1921 and $1,738,000 in 1922.

Yet it is this industry, which represents an investment of some $80,000,000 in Ontario alone, that this government has marked out for slaughter. We are told by the government's apologists that it is merely carrying out its 1919 platform. If that be so, then how does it come that they have singled out the one industry that enjoyed the least protection? What of the boot and shoe industry? What of the automobile industry? Why are they not touched? The answer is because this is a political, not a scientific or economic budget. To touch boots and shoes would be to lay unholy hands upon some of the constituents of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). To touch automobiles would be to lay unholy hands upon the political chances of some other of my honourable friends. So these industries are left alone, the "poor masses" for whose sufferings the Prime Minister's heart bleeds so copiously, are let go hang so far as boots and shoes are concerned, while the poor implement industry is butchered to save the skins of this government and to make a Roman holiday for their friends in the West.

What is the fiscal trend of the world to-day? Everywhere, on every continent, the nations are seeking restoration of their economic strength through the agency of tariffs. Practically all of the new nations that were created by the Treaty of Versailles have gone in for protection. France, Germany, Italy and Spain have either heightened or are heightening their tariffs. Even the little Irish Free State has gone in for a policy of protection. And while all this is going on, while free trade is practically dead, and while the United States, the greatest industrial entity that the world has ever seen, continues to increase her tariff barriers, continues to take fiscal measures against Canada, Canada, through this minority government opposite, throws open its markets to the world. Sir, I say that in the modern history of the world there has seldom been greater evidence of incompetency and economic folly. And what is the consequence to this country? The consequence is that Canadian industry is terrified. Those industries that have not been touched feel that they are but out on suspended sentence. Last year the Minister of Finance gave the country a promise of stability. He said that with the United States standing by the Fordney-McCumber tariff it would be madness for this country to further lower its own tariff bars. To-day we see this minority government indulging in that madness, at the point of a gun pressed against its political stomach by the Progressive party, it is placing this country at the economic mercy of the United States. Today all over this country factories are closing down. Men and women are being thrown out of employment. Towns and communities are being depopulated. Farmers are being deprived of their home market. Canadian capital, that ought to be going into the development of the country, is being put into banks or bonds. British and foreign capital is being frightened away from the Dominion. There is unrest and uncertainty from Sydney to Vancouver. And what is happening to the young manhood of this country? At the rate of 10,000 a month, our young men, discouraged by what is taking place at home, deprived of opportunities at home, are fleeing over the border to rear higher the prosperity of a foreign land. The government cannot deny this. If they do deny it, if they challenge the truth of what I have just asserted, then let them look at their own official statement of the Settlers' effects that have come into and gone out of this country during the past two years. Let them study the figures as told in their own official blue books. The other day Mr. Grant MacNeil, Dominion secretary of the Great War Veterans' Association, addressed a meeting in the city of Ottawa. In the public press I read this report of that address:

Describing the Canadian immigration effort for 1923 as a "gigantic debacle", C. G. MacNeil, Dominion secretary of the G.W.V.A., presented some startling statistics to a meeting in St. Matthias' Parish Hall Saturday evening under the auspices of Flanders Lodge No. 1, L.O.L.

Quoting from Canadian and United States official records, Mr. MacNeil showed that during 1923, a total of 137,320 people had been brought into Canada from all sources, while 182,369 had entered the United States from Canada during the same period.

"We presented United States with a quota equivalent to our total immigration and 45,000 of our resident citizens in addition", he declared. "Why should the United States worry about immigration while the magnanimous Canada taxpayer is willing to spend about $80 per head for the privilege of delivering the very best of immigrants within the doors of that republic."

In his opening remarks Mr. MacNeil said that for some time past Canadian ex-service men as represented in the G.W.V.A. had viewed with growing alarm the increasing exodus to the United States. With branches of the association everywhere reporting removals an investigation had been undertaken. This had revealed that nearly one-third of the overseas strength of the C.E.F. had crossed the border. In consultation with immigration officials it had been found that this movement was regarded as a species of restlessness and that it was thought these people would return eventually.

"We have been thoroughly disillusioned on this score," said the speaker. "Canadian ex-service men have migrated to the United States for no other reason than to secure their bread and butter. Conditions have not been righted and as the years pass the prospects of their return rapidly fade."

"The most popular retort to any statement depicting this exodus is that all the Canadians are returning or are about to return. Let us again examine the official statistics. Included in the Canadian immigration total for 1923 are 20,307 people who entered Canada from the United States. We find that of this number only 2,587 had previous Canadian residence. It is clear that we have not recouped our losses, and that there is little joy in the quality of the negligible number received by Canada in exchange.

"We need not search far for the men to roam afield for a livelihood. It is disclosed in the returns of the industrial census of Canada issued by the Bureau of Statistics, that for every 100 men employed in our industries in January, 1920, only 88 were employed in January, 1924. Employment has decreased by 12 per cent. We have no industrial expansion to provide employment for newcomers, and we have experienced a contraction of payrolls that has squeezed our men out of the country."

Mr. MacNeil said that in the face of these facts there was an insistent clamor from influential quarters for greater immigration. This was touted as a panacea for all economic ills.

"Can we safely continue to pour population through our country into the United States, which at the same time is washing away the elements of our own structure? Shall we strive for national stability, or shall we proceed with this mad attempt at exploitation of population turnover?"

That, Mr. Speaker, is the considered opinion of a man who has investigated the facts, who is speaking with information and without political bias. The situation which he discloses is a grave one; and I say to this House that unless the people of this country wake up, unless they determine to abolish this eternal political tampering with the tariff and give Canada a sound policy of ample protection, that drain upon our national life will continue until it becomes a veritable menace to our national existence. What we want in Canada is a tariff policy that will develop our own country, that will build up our own towns and cities, that will provide a home market for our farmers and traffic for our railways, a policy that will keep our young people at home and bring the right kind of immigration to our shores; a policy, in a word, which will do for Canada what protection has done and is doing for the United States. To-day the financial position of this country gives cause for grave concern. We have a debt which stands at $2,400,000,000—representing a fixed charge of $130,000,000 a year upon the people of the Dominion. We have a scale of taxation which, largely because of the extravagance of this government, has been continued at a war peak, and which is about the heaviest taxation in the world. Our trade continues to expand, but it should not be forgotten, that our exports are swollen by a drain on our natural resources—that we are much in the position of a man who is selling his estate.

The great problem of the world to-day is impoverishment and debt. The great need of the nations, apart from development of their industrial and productive life, is retrenchment and economy. Great Britain has recognized this; the United States has recognized it, Australia and New Zealand have recognized it. Britain, despite enormous commitments, despite that she is paying twelve times more than we are for defence, has been balancing her budget and paying her debts. She paid off hundreds of millions of her debts in 1923, and reduced taxation. She produced a surplus of more than two hundred millions this year, and reduced taxation again. The United States, through economies that were effected, has reduced the liabilities of that country by billions of dollars, and is reducing taxes. Australia and New Zealand have reduced expenditure, debts and taxation. Yet, while this has been going on, while these countries, often less favourably situated than Canada, have been retrenching, this country has been plunging further into debt. This government has increased the debt of this country by upwards of $100,000,000. It confesses to an increase of $31,000,000 in 1923; its own figures show an almost similar increase this year—despite an effort to camouflage the truth. It promised economy; and it talked economy, but it has continued a profligate extravagance: it was willing only this year to pour out millions of the taxpayers' money to bribe the constituencies of Halifax and Kent. Its devotion to economy, like its fidelity to the rest of its pledges, depends upon its political life. Anywhere, at any time, it is willing to sacrifice retrenchment, and pour out the public's money, to buttress its tenure of office.

And it is this infidelity to solemn pledges, Mr. Speaker, that constitutes the worst feature of this budget. What confidence can the people of this country have in this government? Let us for a moment glance over its record:

It promised to reduce the cost of living. On the first of January of this year, two years after it had taken office, its own official reports—the reports of the Labour Department—showed that the cost of living was actually 2 points higher than on the first of January, 1921.

It declared that it was going to abolish trusts and combines; and the Minister of Labour actually told us that Sir Charles Gordon should be sent to gaol. Sir Charles Gordon was sent to Genoa as our economic representative instead; and the only action taken against trusts and combines is the creation of a combines act whose sole achievement has been to add to the burdens of the taxpayers of the country.

They denounced the government of my right hon. leader for failure to collect the Riordon taxes. I ask any hon. member of the government to rise in his place now and tell this House and country how much of these Riordon taxes have been collected?

They solemnly pledged themselves to give a cash bonus to our soldiers. They cynically abandoned that pledge, and instead told those same veterans, less than a year later, that the door was practically closed against them.

They denounced orders in council as autocratic and declared they would banish them from our government, but they have passed, and are passing, more orders in council than ever before in the history of our country. They have committed the country to the expenditure of millions of dollars by this very process which they so denounced—as in the case of the purchase of the Union Club in London.

They declaimed against royal commissions. This year we have six or seven royal commissions roaming up and down the country at prodigious expense, adding to the burdens of the taxpayer and relieving the government of the responsibility it was afraid to face.

They said that they would practise economy, but they have heightened the debt of the country by nearly $100,000,000.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): By how much did my hon. friend say this government had increased the debt?

Mr. PRESTON: By $100,000,000.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): As a matter of fact it has decreased it.

Mr. PRESTON: You would have to produce a different kind of budget from the present one to show that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: "Decreased" it by endorsing its own notes.

Mr. PRESTON: They have been the most profligate and extravagant government in the English-speaking world at a time when extravagance is criminal.

They declared that they would reduce taxation. To-day taxation is higher than when they took office.

They said that they would promote immigration and bring back the "'golden era of Laurier." They have failed to produce an immigration policy of value, and almost a quarter of a million Canadians have left this country since they came into power.

And so it is to the end of the chapter.

Mr. Speaker, the plain truth is that this minority party has destroyed responsible government in this country. It is in a minority in this House; it is in a hopeless minority in this country. It holds office simply on the sufferance if its masters from the West. Over there, Mr. Speaker, on the Progressive benches, sit the real rulers of this country. The Liberal party holds office; the Progressive party holds power. The hon. gentlemen who sit on the treasury benches are simply a cabinet in custody. The hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) is the Rasputin behind the throne; it is he, not the right hon. Prime Minister, who dictates the policies of this Dominion. The hon. member for Brandon has a willing instrument in the person of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). That hon. gentleman visited the West last year and told the farmers that there was no difference between his party and theirs. "We want to do what you want us to do," he told them: "give us your orders and we will gladly obey them." Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentlemen from beyond the lakes have given their orders, and those orders are being obeyed. So long as men like the ex-Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) and the member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) were active in the cabinet, such enslavement could not exist. But the ex-Minister of Justice who believed in protection, and the member for Shelburne and Queens, who also believed in protection, are gone, and the remnant of this government—anxious to hold office at any cost and a pliant instrument for the intrigues of the member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) who has high political ambitions—has bowed down before its masters. And so I say that the real rulers of Canada to-day are on the Progressive benches. They are governing this country, and they are governing it without responsibility. The whole thing is a sheer negation of the principles of representative government. And, Mr. Speaker, this is just the beginning. These hon. gentlemen tell us that this is but the "first step." They tell us that they have sounded the "death knell of protection;" they warn us to wait until next year. The whole prosperity of the country is menaced by the cowardice of a minority on the one hand and the tyranny of a minority on the other. The truth is that it is impossible to point to a single administrative or legislative act during the past two years and say: "Here the King government did good." All along the line, anywhere that honest inquiry can look, the record is one of failure, of impotence, of defeat and of humiliation.

And now, Sir, just a word in conclusion. I have spoken of the danger of this budget. I have tried to show the peril that confronts the national life of the country in any interference with the tariff. I have pointed to the lengthy story of failure, of impotence and of humiliation and surrender to selfish interests which have characterized this government's regime. I have surveyed its record of broken pledges, of bad faith, of recreancy to principle, a story without parallel in the political life of this country. But it is futile to appeal to this parliament. The servile band who sit behind the government, with some few honourable exceptions, have outraged political honour. That group have degraded the public life of this Dominion; they care nothing but for office and power. But, Sir, a day of reckoning is coming. Sooner or later this government will have to answer for its stewardship to the tribunal of the people, and when that times comes we on this side of the House will confidently face the result.

Look over the history of this confederation, Mr. Speaker, and you will see that in every crisis in our national life the Liberal-Conservative party has been signalled by the people. I am confident that they are turning to that party again to-day. I am confident that they are turning to the leader whose experience and whose vision and courage place him high above contemporary statesmen, and that when the time comes to give their verdict, this government will be consigned to that oblivion which its record so richly deserves.

I have gone over briefly some of the reasons why this government have no legal or other right to occupy the position they hold to-day. They are occupying an impossible position, by reason of the pledges and promises they gave to the people previous to the last election. Did they carry out those pledges and promises? No, they did not. Finding themselves in a minority position, what have they done? They have done exactly what I have said: They have carried on negotiations with hon. gentlemen to my left. They have said to them: "We will give you whatever you want; we want to remain in power." I do not know how long hon. gentlemen to my left have lived in Canad, but I assume most of them have been in this country ten, fifteen or twenty years and have made great successes in western Canada. They have, I believe, built up good, comfortable homes for themselves and their families, and that, of course, is a source of satisfaction to us all. Many of them also, I presume, have large bank accounts. Now, Mr. Speaker, did they attain that prosperity under a free trade policy? No, they did not; they attained it under a protective policy placed upon the statute books in 1879 and continued from that time up to the present, with some few slight changes. From 1879 to 1896 we had a protective policy. That great statesman, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, whose memory still lives in the hearts and minds of the masses of the people of this country—he and his friends opposed that policy when in opposition, but when they came into power they adopted it and continued it, and when Sir Wilfrid Laurier went out of power in 1911 he left a higher tariff than had been in force when he came in.

What I want to impress upon the House is this: Canada is a young and growing country, a country of great opportunities; it only needs development. We have everything that any country could desire, but we must have a sound, sane protective policy that will give support and protection to our industrial concerns all over the country. Those who invested capital in our industrial enterprises did so under a protective policy and in the belief that that policy would not be tampered with practically every day in the year. But what do we find now?—and I have particular reference to my own county. There we have two large mills closed down, one in the hands of a receiver. That four-storey mill is filled with the most up-to-date machinery that money can purchase for the purpose of producing for this country goods of the very best quality at prices that will meet the competition of the world. But what has this government done? As I say, in 1922 and 1923 they increased the British preference, which permitted foreign goods to flood our domestic market and drive our people out of business. Is there any sense or reason in this? I do not think there is. While the United States has built up a tariff wall so high that no outsider can get a look-in, we have been reducing our tariff protection, thus disorganizing our business and driving our people across the line. In my opinion we ought to have a fair and substantial protective policy that would prevent the United States or any other foreign country from dumping their surplus production here while we are not permitted to do business with them. We must trade on the principle of dollar for dollar, else we cannot live. This jug-handled policy is no good for Canada.

I hope I have made myself clear. I offer no criticism of the government except from a business standpoint. I believe they are on the wrong track. When I heard the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) the other day deliver his budget, which his colleague the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) later termed the "death knell of protection," I thought: Well, if that great man, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, was here we would never have heard any such doctrine as that enunciated in this House. Because he was a protectionist, he knew the value of protection, and therefore he continued the protective policy up to the time he went out of office in 1911.

I know of only one remedy for the present condition of affairs. When the time comes that the government must appeal to the people—and the appeal may come sooner than some of us anticipate—when it does come, Sir, in my humble opinion the great and independent electorate, irrespective of party ties, will march to the polls with that sacred ballot in their hands and there deposit them, not for the purpose of retaining this minority government in power, but on the contrary, Mr. Speaker, to drive them out of power and put in power the most outstanding and capable man in the public life of Canada to-day—and that man is the Right Honourable Arthur Meighen.

Mr. L. P. BANCROFT (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, many hon. members are repeatedly advising the western farmer to discontinue his agitation for lower tariff burdens, lower transportation costs and the completion of the Hudson Bay railway, and to turn his attention to mixed farming. They tell him that therein lies the solution of his troubles. For instance, the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Dickie) who comes from a district noted for the production of canned salmon, said a few days ago: Let the western farmers throw away their can-openers and get down to mixed farming. Other hon. members have suggested that we might emulate the example of the great mixed farming province of Quebec. Now, these statements show an absolute lack of knowledge of farming conditions in western Canada, and they are both false and misleading, as I shall endeavour to prove in the short space of time which I plan to take up this afternoon.

I have before me a comparison of the live stock production of Manitoba and Quebec for the past year, 1923:

Year 1923

LIVE STOCK AND DAIRY PRODUCTS—QUEBEC AND MANITOBA

Horses
Quebec	361,651 or .145 per capita
Manitoba	362,407 or .604 " "
Cattle
Quebec	1,781,751 or .75 " "
Manitoba	691,711 or 1.15 " "
Sheep
Quebec	822,997 or .35 " "
Manitoba	93,162 or .15 " "

Swine
Quebec	797,726 or .34	" "
Manitoba	291,236 or .48	" "
Poultry
Quebec	6,482,256 or 2.82	" "
Manitoba	3,289,051 or 5.48	" "
Eggs
Quebec	26,672,975 dozen or 11.5 doz.	" "
Manitoba	13,811,350 dozen or 23.5 doz.	" "
Dairy Products
Quebec	$34,017,996 or $14.40	" "
Manitoba	$10,576,407 or $17.60	" "

In 1922 Manitoba produced 3,041,712 pounds of honey. The production of honey is increasing very rapidly in Manitoba, and it is noteworthy also that Manitoba honey is of the highest grade known on the North American continent. Recently a single shipment from North Carolina to Manitoba contained forty million bees valued at $10,000. Next I have figures with regard to the estimated value of field crops for 1923. They are as follows:

Manitoba Field Crops, 1923

Wheat	24,807,000 bushels
Oats	19,181,000 "
Barley	10,533,000 "
Rye	2,617,000 "
Mixed grains	134,000 "
Flax	2,511,000 "
Potatoes	2,241,000 "
Turnips	694,000 "
Hay and Clover	3,245,000 tons
Alfalfa	133,000 "
Fodder Corn	987,000 "

In addition to this the production of fruit is extending very rapidly in Manitoba also. Apples are produced in commercial quantities in Lisgar, and small fruits do exceptionally well in all parts of the province; their production bids fair to become one of the important branches of Manitoba agriculture. Now, let me give the House figures showing the wealth produced by other Manitoba industries in 1921, namely:

Manitoba Industrial Products, 1921

Fisheries	$ 1,023,187
Mineral production	2,258,942
Furs	1,679,812
Lumber	1,461,466
Manufactures	123,470,393

In view of these facts, Mr. Speaker, I do not see how anyone can accuse the people of Manitoba of having all their eggs in one basket. I want to point out that the amount of wealth produced in Manitoba bears little, if any, relationship to the condition in which the people of that province find themselves to-day. This condition, I venture to assert, is one of the most distressing and precarious through which they have ever passed, and cannot long continue without ending in disaster. The problem, so far as Manitoba is concerned, is not so much the production of wealth, or a variation in the form of its production, but a more equal distribution of the wealth when created.

Now, Sir, in order to improve conditions in western Canada there must be established a modern, flexible credit system, suitable for agriculture. The report of Dr. H. M. Tory reveals in considerable detail the steps that have been taken to solve this problem in other countries. In Canada a solution of the agricultural credits problem is urgently required. If the first step in the rehabilitation of agriculture is to reduce living and production costs, and to reduce the costs of transportation, surely the second step is to devise some means to make farming profitable by establishing a credit system that will enable many thousands of farmers to carry on their indebtedness under some debt funding plan. Conditions in Canada may be somewhat different from those in other countries, but it is inconceivable that we in this country cannot discover some sound method of providing capital for the agricultural industry. Where other countries are succeeding in overcoming this difficulty, Canada ought not to fail. The onus rests upon the Dominion government to set about this matter in earnest. The provinces have attempted to do something along this line, but the history of other countries proves that this is a national undertaking demanding legislation by this parliament. The establishment of some such system as this would, in my opinion, do more to stop the exodus of farmers to urban centres and out of the country and to renew the hope of men experienced in farming who are still on the land than any other single reform of which I have knowledge.

Transportation is another great problem and an immense burden upon the western farmer. Situated as he is in the very heart of the continent, bearing the carrying charges of his product to market as well as paying the cost of carrying in all the commodities that he has to purchase, he feels that transportation is one of the great problems before the Canadian people to-day. The demand for the completion of the Hudson Bay railway is an attempt to reduce transportation costs to and from western Canada. The determined opposition to the completion of this railroad seems to come from those who are interested in the present transportation systems, and the general impression in western Canada is that they fear the competition of the Hudson Bay route. This railway was started for the purpose of connecting the great producing areas of western Canada with the sea, and it cannot be abandoned when 332 miles are completed and it is only ninety miles from the sea. If it were right to construct the railway thus far—and both parties are responsible for its construction to that extent, and consequently for the awakening of the hopes of the people on the prairies and of many who have gone into the northern district—it cannot be abandoned now without a serious national breach of trust. The Hudson Bay railway must be completed, because not only will it move western Canada approximately 1,000 miles nearer to its Liverpool market, but it will establish new and direct competition with the Fort William-Liverpool route, and in that way will have a tendency towards restraining the excessive charges which we have to meet on that route.

In regard to the proposed tariff reductions, outlined in the budget, I am sure that in western Canada those reductions will be regarded as a step towards lowering production costs in the basic industries, and as an indication of the government's intention to reduce them still further in the future. Taken by themselves, the present reductions do not go very far towards relieving the burden of tariff taxation, but we welcome them as a sign of the recognition by the government of the absolute necessity for reducing the costs of all the necessities of life as well as the costs of the implements of production. But the conclusion cannot be avoided that the bulk of the immediate relief promised by the budget comes from the remission of the sales tax rather than from the reduction of import duties. We are confident that import duties can be very substantially reduced, not only without injury to the manufacturing industries, but with actual benefit to them. A reduction of the tariff will bring lower prices and lower prices will bring about an increased demand for manufactured products. I might refer at this point to a statement which I think should not be allowed to pass unnoticed. No doubt many members will have read the reports in the press of the speech delivered by Colonel A. F. Hatch, first vice-president of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association on April 11. This speech was given some space in all the newspapers at that time. Referring to the tariff reductions in this budget, he said:

> It is very far-reaching, and is giving the western farmer, who is really a foreigner, an award at the expense of other parts of the Dominion. The western farmer, as a rule, has no interest in the country. He eats out of a can and gets all he can from outside the country, and puts his wheat in in the spring. As soon as he harvests and markets his grain he goes off to California or some other place for the winter, and spends his money outside of the country.

[Mr. Bancroft.]

This is a curious specimen of the propaganda of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association for national unity. The supreme idea of the statesmen of the past was development of western Canada on the basis of brotherhood and goodwill, genuine national unity; whereas the Rally-round-the-Flag protectionist politicians of to-day would simply extend to the West a kind of colonial status, while at the same time suggesting that its people are foreign or inferior. For five generations my family has lived in this country, and I want to tell these gentlemen that I am proud to associate with and to represent in this House the people whom they thus choose to stigmatize as foreigners.

The hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Dickie) argues that only a prohibitive duty against imports of iron and steel enabled the United States to become a great manufacturing country. The facts might bear another interpretation. But assuming that the hon. member's argument is correct, has he considered at what cost to the consumers of that country its great iron and steel industry has been built up? I have in my hand a pamphlet issued by the Fair Tariff League of the United States under date of February 28, 1924. This is not a free trade organization; in fact its policy is very similar to that professed by the Conservative party in this country It states that the purpose of the league is:

> A just tariff adequately. . . .

That is a very familiar word in this House.

> . . . .but not excessively protecting American industry and labour.

Referring to the steel business of the United States, I find on page 20 of this pamphlet:

> On the basis of normal quantity production the present tariff makes farm implements cost farmers $100,000,000 too much and implement manufacturers $50,000,000 too much.
> American steel makers add the duty and the freight from Europe to domestic prices. They export $230,000,000 at 30 per cent less than domestic prices. (Total exports steel products, all kinds, $700,000,000). To-day's price (October 22, 1923) of American-made bar steel, which is a criterion for all steel prices, is $2.40 per hundred pounds. The export prices of English bars is $1.61.
> The American price, $2.40, is the English price, plus the duty of 27 per cent, or 43½ cents, plus 20 cents freight to New York, plus 16 cents for good measure.
> While thus charging the last farthing that circumstances permit, our steel manufacturers are exporting at the rate of $230,000,000 annually, and the profits of the greatest of them, the United States Steel Corporation, in 1923, were in round figures, $180,000,000 net, subject to interest charges and dividends. Dividends were declared for the quarter year ending September, 1923, at the rate of $6 per share on its $508,000,000 of common stock, once all water and sold for $8 per share, now worth intrinsically $260 per share. The Wall Street Journal, of November 2, says that 10 per cent annually, or $10 per share,

"would have been entirely conservative and proper, as the earnings for the current year are at the rate of 15 per cent after paying preferred dividends." Some other companies were as profitable.

American wages, measured in dollars, are the highest ever, largely because the tariff is exorbitant and profiteering, instead of honestly protective. Wages must keep up with living costs, even if the latter are not honest.

These and similar excessive costs of materials and wages and of freights, which are high for the same reason, (railroad equipment is figured on the above steel basis), make the factory cost of farm implements at least 10 per cent above honest protection, and likely 15 per cent. At 10 per cent excess cost the implement factories are obliged, if they live, to pass this excess cost on in the sum of $50,000,000 annually; further increased as the implements pass to the wholesaler, to the retailer and on to the farmer, to a total of $100,000,000.

Farmers cannot pass this $100,000,000 on to their consumers because 89 per cent of all American farm products are sold on free trade or export basis.

Farmers constitute 29 per cent of our population and fully one-third of its purchasing power; for farmers, as users of machinery and other appliances, are far greater purchasers than average citizens. Also farmers pay 40 per cent of all railway charges—far more than average citizens.

Again, on page 27, there is another paragraph headed. "Heavy Steel Products", which I would like to read:

Extensive analysis of the seven basic steel industries, pig iron, bar steel, rails, structural iron, cast and wrought iron pipe, tinplate and terneplate, and wire, and wire work shows that Congress in the Fordney law gave these industries the privilege of adding $351,000,000 to their prices, to cost consumers twice the sum at retail and in amortization charges, or $702,000,000.

Since the great steel consolidations, these industries have charged all the traffic will bear. It is overconservative to estimate that only one-half of the above tariff allowance is added by them to their prices, or $175,000,000 to the United States as a whole, to be doubled at retail or by amortization charges in freights and buildings, etc., making a total cost to American consumers of $350,000,000, or an average of $3.50 per capita. The steel duty, however, costs farmers half as much again as other citizens, or $158,000,000 all told, for farmers are among our greatest consumers of steel, in machinery, in automobiles, and in the transportation of their crops on the railways.

There is no reason for this tariff except price-raising. We are the greatest and cheapest producers of steel on earth. Steel producers say so. We exported in the three years 1919-1921, of these heavy steel products, $733,787,285, against imports of $34,786,900. Exports were twenty times greater than imports. Exclusive of pig iron, which we are willing to export only in more highly finished products, we exported 50 times more than we imported.

The heavy steel duties are an enslavement of the public to a few of the wealthiest corporations in the world. Their annual profits aggregate hundreds of millions of dollars. The duties on these heavy steel products show clearly the difference in the value of duties to manufacturers and to farmers. Manufacturers, when they will, if only by winks and nods, can agree on prices and add all their duties to their prices.

When the steel schedules was before the Senate, Senator Underwood, of Alabama said: "I am in the business myself. I represent a great iron and steel district. I would not willingly harm a people that I represented, but neither would I willingly betray a people I represented by taxing them unjustly for special interests. I know this iron and steel schedule, and I know that it is a fraud and a sham upon the people of this country. I know that it is not even in the interest of the industry in the end. It can compete anywhere in the world. We are the master iron makers of the world.

"Where the fallacy of this argument comes is that under the guise of doing something to help the farmers in some particular item, their support is asked for a bill of which, as a whole, it seems that for every dollar the farmers may derive from the bill they will pay $100 in taxes for the benefit of somebody else."

I read that, Mr. Speaker, to show the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Dickie) that it cost the people of the United States something to build up the great iron and steel industry they have there.

Speaking a few days ago, the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) said:—

The present reduction in the duty on logging machinery will affect thirty seven firms in British Columbia who are now producing this class of machinery at a cost no higher than is the production cost and the sale price in the State of Washington and taking no advantage of the duty.

Now, I have here a comparative list of prices published by the British Columbia Loggers' Association, as follows:

	Seattle Price	Vancouver Price
12 x 14 Two Speed Yarder..	$10,000	$13,692
12 x 17 Simplex..	10,400	14,233
9 x 10 Duplex..	5,925	8,104
Locomotive 50 ton..	18,833	25,688
Locomotive 60 ton..	21,277	29,702
Locomotive 70 ton..	24,000	33,533
High Lead Block 30 x 5..	261	373
High Lead Block 35 x 5..	319	457
Loading Block 14 x 2½..	91	132
Loading Block 18 x 2..	128	184

Mr. LADNER: Are not those the prices in the State of Washington, not in Canada.

Mr. BANCROFT: It is the Seattle price in the one case, and the Vancouver price in the other. The two cities are from seventy to ninety miles apart, and the water freight rate should be added.

The hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Ross) speaking the other day referred to the slave labour of the southern states, and stated that where there is low tariff there is cheap labour. Now, Mr. Speaker, slave labour is not cheap labour. It is admittedly the most expensive labour there is, owing to its comparative inefficiency. The most highly paid labour as a rule is the most efficient, but high money wages are not necessarily high wages. In low tariff countries at normal times money wages may be lower than in some highly protected countries but their purchasing power is much greater, and the workers are better off on that account. What makes low tariff countries so formidable as competitors is, that they can maintain high standards of living and efficiency at comparatively low cost in money.

In passing I may take this occasion to refer to the remarks of the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Ross), concerning a definition given by the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) of a political party. That was a very good definition and the attitude of the hon. member for Kingston towards it reminded me of some comments of Washington Irving on the same subject which seemed peculiarly applicable to the party to which my hon. friend belongs. Irving sagely remarks:

> And here I would note the great benefit of party distinctions in saving the people at large the trouble of thinking. Hesiod divides mankind into three classes —those who think for themselves, those who think as others think, and those who do not think at all. The second class comprises the great mass of society; for most people require a set creed and a file-leader. Hence the origin of party: Which means a large body of people, some few of whom think, and all the rest talk. The former take the lead and discipline the latter; prescribing what they must say, what they must approve, what they must hoot at, whom they must support, but, above all, whom they must hate; for no one can be a right good partisan who is not a thorough-going hater.

Mr. WHITE: Does my hon. friend belong to a party?

Mr. BANCROFT: It is the popular rebellion against that kind of partyism, Mr. Speaker, which is responsible for the presence in this House of the large group to which I have the honour to belong. I may be pardoned for advising both the old parties to live up to the definition of the hon. member for Brome unless they wish to be left entirely behind in these days of independent and progressive thinking.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I want to refer—

Mr. LADNER: May I ask the hon. gentleman if the prices he gave were in connection with duplex loaders or yarders?

Mr. BANCROFT: Yarders. I had the price of a two-speed yarder, a simplex yarder, and a duplex yarder.

Mr. LADNER: I think the House should be informed on a question of this kind.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. LADNER: I should like to ask my hon. friend if he has certain information? I understood him to give the prices in Washington and British Columbia respectively.

Mr. BANCROFT: Seattle and Vancouver.

Mr. LADNER: I should like to ask my hon. friend if he has this information:

Washington Iron Works 12 x 17—3 drum two-speed yarder..	$11,500
Willamette Iron Works 12 x 14—3 drum two-speed yarder..	13,250
Vancouver built 12 x 14—4 drum simple geared yarder..	10,200

These prices are certified to by thirty-seven firms belonging to the Canadian Manufacturers' Association.

Mr. BANCROFT: I saw the list to which my hon. friend refers but the list I read was issued by the Logging Association of British Columbia. They repudiated the price list my hon. friend speaks of.

Mr. LADNER: I would ask my hon. friend if he has the loggers' price which includes the duty and freight to Vancouver? This information is necessary in order to make an intelligent comparison with the British Columbia price.

Mr. BANCROFT: I gave prices for the purpose of showing what the duty means to the logger in British Columbia, and to prove that full advantage is taken of the duty.

The passage a few days before the budget was introduced of a regulation abolishing the differential of 5 per cent in the valuation of imports under the dumping clause has given rise to doubt as to the reality of the tariff concessions in the budget. As a matter of fact if the dumping clause is applied to any considerable extent the real effect will be to neutralize the effect of the tariff reductions if not to actually raise the tariff.

The claim has been made on behalf of the Canadian manufacturers that the difference between the purchasing power of sterling and of the dollar gives the British manufacturer an advantage of about 2 per cent. The removal of the differential may therefore work in favour of the Canadian manufacturer to the extent of an additional two per cent or three per cent protection. Whether this is so or not will depend upon the extent to which the dumping regulations are applied. In any case the mere fact of the repeal of the 5 per cent differential just when strong representations were being made to the government that the tariff should not be materially interfered with, and just before the government seemed to have set its face in the direction of a low tariff, is of itself sufficient to arouse suspicions. The announcement by the hon. Minister of Customs that the old regulation creating this differential is to remain in force is in some degree reassuring. But there would appear to be nothing to prevent its being again suspended so soon as the budget is safely passed. Some more substantial assurances are required in a matter in which the minister seems to have the power to modify the declared policy of the government without being under the necessity of consulting his colleagues. If such assurance is not given and if this regulation is not modified then I must regretfully conclude that the government has made some hidden concession to the manufacturers, and my vote on the budget will be determined by this consideration.

Mr. F. N. McCREA (Sherbrooke): With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall take up a little time in expressing my views on the budget. I do not wish to be harsh or to make any rash statement, but inasmuch as I differ from the government on the budget I desire to outline my reasons for coming to such a conclusion.

The present condition of the country is serious, its burdens are very heavy. Our taxation is almost intolerable and how long people can continue to bear their present burden is something I cannot predict. The question is, what is the prospect for relief? My own impression is that the only sure relief is increased population and increased capital. How are we to get that increased population if we do not give these people something to do? We must have employment to offer them, otherwise they will not come. The people we have in Canada at the present time are leaving faster than others are coming in. In my judgment we cannot place all the people on the land. Of course it is a good place to settle a great many people, but we cannot build up a nation with nothing but farmers. Therefore, we must give some real protection and fair play to industry if we want to increase our population. We have heard a good deal about free trade and about high protection, and all that sort of thing, I am not a high protectionist; I am a moderate protectionist. People who do not believe in my theories will say, "Oh well, he is a manufacturer and consequently speaks from a manufacturer's standpoint". I am and have been a manufacturer for years, but the branch of the business I am connected with, the paper industry, requires no protection. No paper, or very little at any rate, is imported, except tissue paper or something of that kind. The real paper industry makes paper for export and not for import; consequently a tariff on paper would not affect my business. I have been in business for some fifty years or more, and I speak with the information and knowledge I have acquired during all those years. The western farmer would lead us to believe that the panacea for all his troubles is free trade, and that if the farmers had it they would be happy. They have dwelt on that theory so long and so much that it has become a hobby with them and it is more hobby than real. I think a reasonable amount of tariff or of protection would benefit the farming community more than any other class of the population of Canada, and I will tell hon. members why. This country needs population and capital, and if we get the population we must give employment.

Looking at it in the smallest possible way; suppose that an immigrant coming to this country is willing and able to earn a living and support his wife and three or four children by honest toil, with reasonable pay, the moment he sets foot on Canadian soil he becomes a consumer of fifty per cent of his earnings. If he is a common labourer earning $4 a day, fifty per cent of those earnings will go to supply foodstuffs and other commodities that the farmers should and do produce. That being the case, we need population. Suppose we doubled our population, and instead of a few labourers or farmers coming to this country, a million or two came over. That would create a market for a $1,000,000 or $2,000,000 worth of farm products every day of the year. I ask my farmer friends if that does not appeal to them as being to their advantage as farmers. What is the use of a farmer producing large crops of vegetables, butter, cheese, and other articles if he has no market for them? Everybody will agree that the home market is the best market for any country. Fifty per cent of the immigrant's earnings will be spent in foodstuffs, the balance going to the shoemaker, the tailor and for rent. I do not wish to speak in bitterness in discussing this question, because the tariff does not affect my business directly in any way. Of course, any tampering or gerrymandering with the tariff affects everybody, perhaps not directly but indirectly. Anything that affects the country of course affects everybody in the country.

The government seem to take great pleasure in the fact that they issued fifty million dollars of bonds for the purpose of equipment for the Canadian National Railway. They put out another issue of a couple of hundred million of refunding bonds. They take great pleasure in the fact that the bonds were taken up quickly and readily by Canadians. So do I. That fact indicates two things; it indicates that the people of Canada have money, and that they have faith in their country and in the government to some extent. But it indicates something else which to my mind is more serious. It indicates that the people of Canada, instead of putting their money into industries for the development of the resources of the country, are putting it into bonds and securities. They are not going to take chances in putting their money into industrials, where they are not sure of the stability of the country or of the government; because the tariff policy may be changed at any time. Instead of being a proof of the good condition of Canada, I think this is an indication that the people of Canada are afraid to invest their money in industries and industrial projects.

The question of free trade has become a hobby with the western farmer, but I think their trouble lies in another direction, and I think I will to some extent convince my hon. friends that my theory is nearer right than theirs. The trouble is not so much the changes that are made in the tariff at this particular time as the indications that it is only a step, and God knows how long the next step may be. This, on the investor or the industrial man, whoever he may be, whether located here or elsewhere, has the effect that he does not want to take any chances. If his money is in his pocket or in a bank or in bonds, he is going to leave it there; he is not going to put into industry when he does not know how that industry is going to be affected by some changes in the tariff. Let me illustrate how the present tariff changes appear to me. I read a little of the Bible occasionally and I was reading a little this morning. In the fifth chapter of Exodus, seventh and eighth verses—there are some reverend gentlemen present and they can look this up—I find that when the Israelites were in bondage and were groaning under their load of persecutions and burdens, the knowledge of this came to King Pharaoh. It appears that in those times they were making brick from straw, and Pharaoh called his taskmasters together and he said to them: Take away the straw from these dissatisfied Israelites, but continue the tale of brick. Let them find their straw where they will. That is about the way in which this budget is going to deal with the industrial people—it is going to take away their protection, but to increase their burden. Pharaoh asked only that the tale of brick be not diminished; but as I understand the matter, when you diminish the taxation on one element of the country, you increase it on another. About half a billion dollars is required to carry on the country's affairs, and somebody has to pay that. If you relieve one element of their burdens either by reducing taxation or by reducing the sales tax, you increase the burden on somebody else, so that in that respect the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) is one step worse than Pharaoh. He is not only exacting the tale of brick that was usually produced, but he is increasing the burden and taking away the protection.

Let me refer for a few minutes to conditions in my riding and in some of the other ridings surrounding mine. The city of Sherbrooke has about twenty-five or thirty industries employing, when they are running to capacity, or nearly to capacity, about 4,500 men. Twelve of those industries, employing about 2,400 men, are branches of American industries. Will any of those advocates of free trade, such as the apostle of free trade from Brome (Mr. McMaster) tell me why those industries came to locate in Sherbrooke and Drummondville? Was it on account of the good looks and the good behaviour of the people of that section, or what was it? I will tell you why they came, and they came for no other reason than this. They came, not because they could not manufacture those goods in their home town, only a short distance away, but because they wanted to get the benefit of the Canadian market to sell their goods in without paying the Canadian tariff duty. Someone will say: We do not want those American people to come and locate in this country, make big profits and take the money home. At the present time they are not taking very much money home, but they are putting some of their own money into their business to keep it going until they can get work. These people are employing Canadian labour; they are paying good wages; they are buying Canadian goods. They are building up, not only their own industry, but the city of Sherbrooke and other cities where they locate. They are buying Canadian goods and Canadian foodstuffs. Farmers from the surrounding country for miles, even some farmers from Brome where the apostle of free trade comes from, visit Sherbrooke, get good money for their agricultural products and return home satisfied. Would they have that market if it were not for those industries? The same thing applies to Drummondville. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) knows all about that section of country, and he knows that ten years ago the town of Drummondville, which was the county seat, was as dead as a doornail, with no business, no sale for anything and property scarcely worth the taxes. Today property in that town is worth three or four times what it was ten years ago. Not only has the town been built up, but the whole surrounding country has a market for its goods. If we have not those industries, what are you going to employ people at? What are they going to do? Will they go across the line as people are doing now when they cannot get work in Canada?

I am not going to say much more at present on the tariff question, as I shall probably have a chance of speaking on some of the details, because there are a number of details that require explanation. I think the Acting Minister of Finance who, by the way, is, as a rule, a good level-headed fellow, and his colleagues who had to do with the framing of the budget, jumped at conclusions rather hastily, and when they investigate carefully, they will find that they will have to modify a number of the changes that they have made, exempting one thing, taxing other things and so on, before they will satisfy the people generally. I hope, when the matter comes up in committee, to have an opportunity of saying a little on many of the details.

I said a little while ago that I thought the special troubles that are affecting the farmers of the West, and, in fact, not as much the farmers of the West as the farmers and all people of the East, are railway freight rates. The farmers of the West are not suffering as much as the people of the East because, during the war, when on three different occasions rates were increased, those rates went up uniformly throughout the Dominion. But when the question came up of reducing rates about two years ago, the farmers of the West got a reduction on their grain of some thirty-odd per cent, while the eastern people got a reduction of seven per cent and sometimes not quite as much. Consequently the eastern shipper has suffered to a greater extent than the western shipper. I wish to say in this connection that our freight rates are at least twenty-five per cent higher than they should be and are higher than the people can afford to pay. I will take a little time to explain what I mean. There are three groups of people specially connected with this. First there is the producer. It does not matter whether that producer is a tiller of the soil or a manufacturer, he is an exporter of every kind and class of goods, and consequently the open market of the world sets the value of his goods. If we were consuming all we produce we might raise the price of our goods as the cost of production increased, but being exporters our price is, as I have said, fixed in the open market. The producer, I claim, is the farmer, the lumberman, the miner, the fisherman and the manufacturer—every one of them is a producer. The second group is the carrier. Whether transportation takes place by land or water, everybody engaged in it bears a part in the carriage of goods from the source of production to the point of consumption. The third group is the distributor. It does not make any difference whether our distributors are jobbers, wholesalers, retailers, or even peddlers, every one of them selling goods is a distributor.

Now then, if any one of these classes gets more than its fair share of what the business will produce, the others get too little. For example, to-day the transportation people are getting far and away more than their share of what the business of the country produces. In some cases the distributors are getting more than their share, but I must say that the farmers of the West so handle the selling and marketing of their grain that there is not a great deal of leakage to the distributors. But there is in some businesses. For instance, the spread between the price the manufacturer of boots and shoes gets and the price the consumer pays is sometimes more than it ought to be. But especially are the carriers getting more than their fair share of what our business will stand. Consequently at the end of the year when the producer finds that he has lost money he ceases to employ. Hence so many idle people in, or leaving, the country. In 1920 when wheat was selling for $3 a bushel and everything else at any price you cared to ask, freight rates were not so bad; but the products of the farm, the forest, the mine, and the sea have all declined in value, fifty per cent, and in many cases even still more, and yet freight rates have been reduced only about twelve per cent, and the carriers are now scrapping to get an increase.

Let me say further that Sir Henry Thornton and Mr. Beatty, the presidents of our two great transportation systems, perhaps think they are managing their roads. Well, they are to some extent, but they have very little to say as to the rate of wages, the schedule of working hours, the classification of labour, and all the rest of it; they are practically powerless to deal with this matter. The only authority that can and should deal with it—and that is the reason why I am talking so much about it—is the government. I think there is only one road of any importance on this continent which is really run by the owner, and that is Henry Ford's road. He says to labour unions, international and local: Keep your hands off my business; I am running this road to suit myself and I will allow no interference. It is a pity that the government of Canada has not the collective courage that is exhibited by that one man across the border. I wish the government would wake up to the fact that the managers of our great railway systems are practically helpless to reduce freight rates with labour costs so high without creating deficits. This can be done on a government road; the Canadian Pacific cannot do it. They have got to earn a profit to pay their bills.

Now, let me give the House a few figures to illustrate the necessity for a revision of wages in order to balance economic conditions in this country to-day. Two years ago I referred to this subject, and a gentleman from the Senate undertook to correct my statements —not only to correct them, he even said they were false. So I got busy to find out whether I knew anything about what I was dealing with. I said then that the cost of operation of our railways had increased very materially although their earning power had not increased correspondingly. I find the following in connection with a particular station in the country where lumber, pulpwood and so forth are the principal commodities moved. In 1910 the earnings to the railway company were $14,080.25; the cost of maintenance was $824.75—by-the-way at this particular station, and I think it applies to all country stations, the agent lives in the station, or very close to it, and is supplied with free rent, free fuel, free light and free brooms, soap and other things to keep the station and his residence clean; practically the only thing he has to buy is his food and clothing. In 1920, ten years later the revenue was $17,992.76; the cost of maintenance was $3,062.64—almost four times the cost of 1910, with only 25 per cent increase in revenue. But, remember, the freight rates that prevailed in 1910 were more than doubled in 1920. Another example is that of a station on the Canadian National Railways, which is supposed to be operated economically for the benefit of the country. This statement is from 1st to 15th January, 1921—fifteen days. The agent's monthly wage was $145 based on 25 days to the month. His regular pay for twelve twenty-fifths of the month at the rate of $145 amounted to $69.60. But there was a holiday in the month during which he spent 8 hours on duty, and for that he received $5.70. Then there was overtime during that period of 72 hours at $1.07 3-4 an hour, amounting to $77.04. Then he had Sunday overtime, 30 hours at $1.07 3-4 making $32.10 more. Then he had a call some time when he was not on duty and for that he got two extra hours at $1.07 3-4 or $2.14. So that his remuneration for the period from the first to fifteenth, including holidays and all, was $186.58.

Now, I will give you a little more; there are one or two funny things here. Take the case of another man on the same road but at a different station, employed during the same period, from the first to the fifteenth of January, 1921. He worked twelve twenty-fifths of the month at $144 a month. He received as regular pay $69.12. He had overtime of 131 hours at $1.05¾ for which he received $138.53. He had another bill of Sunday overtime of 30 hours—I do now know how he got it in, but he did—for which he received $31.72. Then he had three calls when he was not on duty, making 6 hours at $1.05, amounting to $6.34 more. Then it was found that he was entitled to have had two weeks' holidays during that time, so he put in his bill for 12 days at $144 a month, or $69.12 more. So the modest compensation that he received for his services during that 15 days was $314.83. I would ask you farmers of the West, I would ask people all over the country—for it is not only the farmers of the West who are interested—if you are satisfied with a railway being operated under such conditions and on the basis of such wages as these, when you are working long hours at small pay? As I have said, the railway management is helpless to deal with the matter. If Sir Henry Thornton and Mr. Beatty jointly should decide to-morrow that these conditions would be changed, that they would ask their men to get away from these war conditions and McAdoo arrangements and back to something like what the conditions were before, they would immediately be advised that there would be a walk-out; international labour, located down in Indianapolis or some place else, would simply order the men out. We own the road and we are paying the bills, but the international railwaymen tell us how we shall run it, what the conditions of labour shall be, what the remuneration shall be and all the rest of it. The management is powerless to deal with the matter.

The Secretary of State (Mr. Copp) yesterday took very strong exception to the Montreal Star for having written such articles as the "Whisper of Death," and he showed that in the same paper there were eulogies of several enterprises and activities throughout the country and references to the prosperity that was prevailing. That all may be; there is some prosperity in some directions. But I ask any thinking man who knows the conditions, as the Star must have known them, existing on the railways, the classification of labour, the wages paid and so on, if the Star was so very far astray when it made references to the whispers of death. If these conditions continue as they have continued without objection from anybody in authority, how long will it be before these whispers of death are realized? How long will it be before the death knell of this country is sounded? Well, I do not mean that; the country is too full of possibilities; its resources are too great. Millions of acres in Canada, the best land in the world, are still unoccupied; there are untouched forests, untouched minerals, untouched everything else that goes to build up a country. If we get good, sane government half the time we can exist, but we need it part of the time, anyway.

The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) the other day, speaking on the budget consoled himself with the thought that this budget would sound the death knell of protection. I do not believe that; I do not believe it is the death knell of protection. I think the people who are advocating free trade now will sooner or later repent, will realize that they have been wrong, and come back to a sound way of thinking. I do believe this, however—whether it will be a source of gratification to the minister or not—that it has practically sounded the death knell of getting any more new industries into Canada, or any part of it. If that is any source of comfort to the minister; if he is delighted at our not only getting any new industries but at the killing of some of those we now have—well, I think his desires will be fairly well met. But as to the budget being the death knell of protection, the death knell of the prosperity of Canada, I think he is mistaken. I hope this government will very soon change their mind to a sound way of dealing with things. I do not know whether they really sincerely believe in the doctrine which they are preaching; if they do, I am sorry to say I think they are astray. If it is a question of expediency, let me say this: The very worst thing that could happen in any case would be for the government in power to be defeated on the budget. We were told last year by the Minister of Finance that we might consider the tariff of last year as permanent, or as lasting for some time, with slight changes. This thing of gerrymandering it as has been done this year, with the intimation that it is only a step—God knows how long the jump will be next time—is another matter. As I say, the worst thing that could happen the government would be its defeat in the vote on the budget, and to my mind that would be very much better than to ruin the country. That is my judgment; I may be wrong, but I do not think I am.

I have talked longer than I thought I would, Mr. Speaker, I did not expect to be able to continue so long, but the Lord gives strength where it is needed.

I have many other figures here as to the advanced wages and costs on the railways in the last ten years. As I said a moment ago, when everything was selling high there was some justification for these higher rates, but I do not think there was any justification for the short hours. I am a firm believer in every man doing a fair day's work for a fair day's pay, and I do not think short hours are in the interest of anybody. The rate of wages on the railways is not so high in itself, that is $69 for twelve days' work is not out of the way, but that same labour used to be performed if it took twelve or fifteen hours per day without extra pay. The agent lives at the station, and he has only to appear when his services are needed; he can sleep the rest of his time if he likes. He has only to attend to business when there is business to do. But it is this overtime and paying time-and-a-half for overtime that is sending up the costs. The same thing applies to other services. And I wish to say this—I have said it before, but it will not spoil it to say it again: I think it is about time this government or any other government that may succeed it, and which is taxing the people by every method and every means, as we are being taxed now, when they are getting all the money they possibly can get out of us, which goes in a great measure to pay for help—I think it is about time these people should be asked to work longer than five-and-one-half hours, as they do in the Civil Service, and many of them do not work half that time. This applies to every service under the administration of the government, I do not mean that there are not good men in the Civil Service, but the Civil Service is very much over-manned and very much underworked, and there is no reason in the world why this government should not say to the Civil Service and everybody else in their employ: We want a fair day's work for a fair day's pay. The pay is not out of the way but the service rendered is not in keeping with the wages paid, and at this time when we are being pressed for money to meet our bills I think the government should exact a fair and reasonable day's work from its employees. If we get that it will help to lessen our burdens a whole lot.

There is lots of talk of retrenchment, but I do not see much of it in practice. I would like to see the people of this country adopt some of Henry Ford's methods. What are the conditions of labour here? Let me tell you a little more about the railway system. The train that runs between here and Montreal leaves here at four o'clock in the afternoon or thereabouts, and makes the run in three hours, and the employees get a day's pay for that. Can any of you gentlemen carry on your farms, or could any industry be carried on successfully where a day's wage is paid for only three hours' work. For a round trip the engineers and firemen get two day's pay and a little over, because they get a day's pay for one hundred miles. Is there no room for remedy in this kind of thing? If this country is going to be successful, if we are going to build up a country in Canada, we must have things distributed more evenly, so that when a man does a fair and reasonable day's work he will get a fair and reasonable day's pay.

You will probably say that I am opposed to labour. I am not. I come from that class myself and I know something about it. I am an employer of labour, and of a lot of it too, and in my business we find that we have got to exact nine and ten hours a day of hard work. We cannot afford to pay the high wages some of these other people are getting for four or five hours' work a day, and I claim that it is unjust and unfair that men in our employ who are quite as intelligent and as capable in every respect should be working nine and ten hours a day when these other people are working only four or five hours and are getting higher wages. If we paid less freight we could pay more wages, but we cannot do it now without going into bankruptcy. Those are the conditions, and I am asking the government, as the only authorities who can deal with the situation, to say to international labour: We are willing to do business with Americans; we invite you to come here and do business with us and spend your money here, but when it is a question of running our own railways and fixing hours of labour, we will do that ourselves, because we have to furnish the money. We do not object to our men joining Canadian unions if they want to. I think it is only right and necessary that they should unionize to some extent in order to bring what grievances they have before their employers, but, to use the phrase of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart), I say that international labour will sound the death-knell for this country unless we get some relief from the present conditions and have something to say as to our own industries, and do not allow ourselves to be dictated to by international labour.

Mr. Speaker, I thank you for your indulgence and I hope that my good friends on both sides of the House will think over what I have said about these things. I have no hostility towards any class of men, but what I do claim is that conditions in our country at the present time are badly balanced, and if there were some attempt made to level up things and to give everybody a fair chance, there would be some inducement for our people to remain at home and for immigrants to come in here and help us bear our burdens. Unless we do that, I do not know how long we can stand the strain we are called upon to bear, but I am afraid not as long as it will last unless some remedy is provided quickly.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea) for having been candid enough and honest enough to tell this House what he thinks, and especially to tell us what he thinks of the government's proposals for the reduction of the tariff. It is a good thing, and I would there were more of it, that men here representing their constituencies should tell their leaders and the House and the country what they think of the problems of the day that beset this country in every direction.

Speaking of the increase in costs, I hope the government will take into consideration the statements made by the hon. member for Sherbrooke, and try and administer public affairs so that they will cost less money. It is costing too much at this time to govern this country, and people are complaining of the cost in every direction. The Civil Service may be over-manned; probably it is. There should be an equality of treatment and an equality of wages as between the Civil Service and other work in the country, for it has got to be that the Civil Service offers what we call now a preferred position; the hours are short and the pay is high, and what is done for the public is very small in quantity.

The hon. member also spoke of reducing prices. I say it is up to the government to set an example, and they can set an example in this way. There is no reason now why the government should not restore the postage to pre-war rates. Let us get back to pre-war postage and say that we believe in the reduction in some of these charges. And now that the government is in control of the Canadian National Railways I see no reason why there should not be a return to pre-war rates for passenger fares. I see no reason also why express rates, telegraph rates, and all similar charges should not go back to pre-war figures. If we do not commence we shall never carry these things out. In order to play on the harp we must play upon it; and if we want to get these charges lowered we must start to lower them. I hear complaints all over the country of these excessive charges and high prices and there is a demand for their reduction. Possibly that may be the justification of the government in cutting, as they think they are cutting, the tariff. They may be doing this cutting in the hope of giving people lower prices, but if that is their expectation I do not know that they will quite realize it. At any rate, we will wait and see.

Let me draw the attention of the government to these facts: The hon. member for Sherbrooke follows the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond) and the latter follows the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler). I also think we had a member of the Progressive party last night who said he could not vote for these tariff changes. It is time therefore that the government paid some attention to the public feeling, as exemplified by the representations of these hon. gentlemen. I am going to vote against both the amendment and the motion to go into committee of Ways and Means to reduce the tariff. I have always been a protectionist. My father was a protectionist and brought me up that way.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACLEAN: Some hon. gentlemen may not like to hear that but I am proud of the fact. My father did a great deal to start the manufacturers' association in this country. He raised his family properly on ten or fifteen dollars a week although he gave his time to preaching protection. It did not pay us very much in the long run but my father was an honest protectionist. He believed in protection and preached it. I happened to know Sir John Macdonald in the old days, and the greatest thing he ever did for this country was to introduce the principle of protection for the development of Canada. I agree with my hon. friend from Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea) who said that no country has become great that has only developed one side. There must be an equality of development, the country must be developed from the industrial as well as from the farming side. If that is not done, you are going to have conditions such as my hon. friend spoke of, and those are not in the interest of Canada or its people.

I want also to tell my hon. friends the Farmers' representatives that they are beginning to go back on their own ground. It has been pointed out here, to a large extent, that they believe in what they call farming or mining the land. Well, that will not do for the farmers. They are now beginning to engage in dairying and live stock activities. They are also in the bee business, and they will come to an industrial view of things later on. That is what I am going to discuss this evening. That being the case—with the change of sentiment in the government ranks and the statement by hon. members one after the other—five now probably—of their objection to the budget, the government may reconsider their course. Certainly the hon. member for Sherbrooke is going to raise his voice on the individual tariff items as they come up. If that is done—although I have very little hope of anything resulting from it—there may be some improvement in the government's policy. But I do say this—and that is why my remarks on the tariff tonight are so short—I am quite sure the question now before the people is the tariff issue. It is one of the great questions in the United States at the present time. The presidential election will take place this fall. I do not know what will happen over there but there may be a movement in the way of reducing the tariff. In the meantime I say to the Canadian manufacturers: Put up with what you have to put up with now. I say to labour: Put up with what you have to put up with now, and see what will happen next fall and next winter after this question has been threshed out all over the country. We shall hear nothing but the tariff discussed in Canada, and we shall get some idea as to what the people really think of this issue. If the Americans persist in closing their markets to us we may find a way of limiting them in certain of our markets to them. For instance, we may consider the putting of an export duty on some of the things they get from us. There are a number of measures we can resort to which may be in the nature of retaliation but are perhaps in the direction of fair treatment all round. The people are going to consider the tariff question and are going to talk on it and from the point of view on the whole that it is not so much the manufacturers who have to suffer as it is the workers in the factories. Many of our industries may be able to stand tariff reductions and may get through somehow; but the great trouble in regard to these changes is the effect they will have on our working people and on their wages.

I am going to take a little time in dealing with some other public questions and this is the time to bring them up. When there is a motion before the House to go into commitee of Ways and Means on the budget proposals opportunity is given to discuss any question that affects the public interest. One of the matters I purpose discussing is the wide and far-reaching revolution that is taking place not only in Canada but in almost every other English-speaking community in the world, and even in other countries—I refer to the substitution of the group or three-or-four party system for the old two-party system. I am going to give the House an instance of what has occurred in this country. The change is taking place here and it has actually become effective with the Progressive party in this House. In a speech delivered here only about eight weeks ago I directed attention to the revolution that is coming and the substitution of this group system for the old two-party system. I gave some instances of it, and I told the House that the government now in office were practically in a minority and they were in a minority as far as I could find out. I said then that some changes would be made perhaps, but I did not realize then that in less than four weeks more I should see the recognition of the group system in this country and in this parliament, recognition in such a manner as to indicate that the system had actually arrived, under which a minority in the House dictated the tariff policy of the government in office. This revolution has occurred in England. In England to-day a minority government are in office and have tackled the budget and put it through, and have met with a great deal of approval from the British people. That minority is in office and carrying on. But in this country a minority in the House has dictated the tariff policy of the government, and I believe there is no particular deal as between the two, because if there had been a deal there would have been a document of some kind, an agreement, and a coalition would have resulted. and three or four members of the Progressive party would have been taken into the government. But we do not see that. But the hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. McCrea) states that the Progressive party may come back and make further demands on the government which is in power. That is such a far-reaching change that nobody knows where it is going to end, we see where they landed in the United States; to-day the Coolidge government is in office, or rather the Republican party is supposed to be in power, but minorities have been elected in both houses of Congress so strong that the farmers' bloc, made up of insurgent Democrats and insurgent Republicans, in more or less alliance with the Democratic party in the main, have held up administration and all the legislation, and have compelled the President of the United States to remove two of his cabinet, and nothing in the way of legislation or administration is going through at Washington now, except with the approval of Senator Lafollette and the bloc I have just spoken of. These changes made in all quarters are so far-reaching that I do not know where they are going to land. A great change is coming on. People say: Party is party and will remain. But a great change is taking place in the minds of the people. A new remedy has been proposed. People are now taking more interest in affairs. The Progressives of the West have been compelled to take an interest in public affairs. I have been surprised to hear my fellow members during the session questioning the right of the Progressives to be in this House. They came here as the rest of us did, by the vote of the people; they have a right to be here, to state their case and to do as they are doing, dictating the policy of the government, if they see fit, and to carry it through.

I ask the Speaker to call it six o'clock, and this evening I intend to tell the House a romance in Canadian politics in connection with this revolution which has taken place, and I am going to submit on my own account a new national policy for Canada for 1924. I am going to tell the House of one of the greatest romances in history. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) is going to be one of the parties concerned, but he is not a hero in that romance.

An hon. MEMBER: Have you copyrighted it?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): No, but it will be on the wire perhaps.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I believe I can listen to that.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): But the real hero, the lady in the case, is the Prime Minister.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not want to be a lady.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): You are not the lady. I will deal tonight with the romance of the political changes that have taken place and will tell the House what I think ought to be the national policy of Canada for 1924.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE ACTING MINISTER OF FINANCE

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Mr. Speaker, just before six o'clock I was speaking on the motion before the House and I directed attention to the most peculiar and rather revolutionary event which has occurred, namely, that a government which was practically in a minority had had its tariff policy dictated by another minority. I know of no parallel case in our parliamentary practice. But I said there was a romance connected with this event which I would relate after dinner. Now, I am going to good authority—Sir Walter Scott—and if the House will permit I will read the Lady Heron's Song in the fifth canto of Marmion. It is about the adventures of young Lochinvar who came out of the west. This is the song:

O, young Lochinvar is come out of the west,
Through all the wide border his steed was the best;
And save his good broadsword, he weapons had none,
He rode all unarm'd, and he rode all alone.
So faithful in love, and so dauntless in war,
There never was knight like the young Lochinvar.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): My friends are ready for the part.

He staid not for brake, and he stopp'd not for stone,
He swam the Esk river where ford there was none;
But ere he alighted at Netherby gate,
The bride had consented, the gallant came late:
For a laggard in love, and a dastard in war,
Was to wed the fair Ellen of brave Lochinvar.

So boldly he enter'd the Netherby Hall,
Among bride's men, and kinsmen, and brothers, and all:
Then spoke the bride's father, his hand on his sword
(For the poor craven bridegroom said never a word),
"O come ye in peace here, or come ye in war,
Or to dance at our bridal, young Lord Lochinvar?"

This is where the moderato furioso comes in:

"I long woo'd your daughter, my suit you denied;—
Love swells like the Solway, but ebbs like its tide—
And now am I come, with this lost love of mine,
To tread but one measure, drink one cup of wine.
There are maidens in Scotland more lovely by far,
That would gladly be bride to the young Lochinvar."

I will illustrate that a little later on.

The bride kiss'd the goblet: the knight took it up,
He quaff'd off the wine, and he threw down the cup.
She look'd down to blush, and she look'd up to sigh,
With a smile on her lips, and a tear in her eye.
He took her soft hand, ere her mother could bar,—
"Now tread we a measure!" said young Lochinvar.

So stately his form, and so lovely her face,
That never a hall such a galliard did grace;
While her mother did fret, and her father did fume,
And the bridegroom stood dangling his bonnet and plume;
And the bride-maidens whisper'd, " 'Twere better by far,
To have match'd our fair cousin with young Lochinvar."

One touch to her hand, and one word in her ear,
When they reach'd the hall-door, and the charger stood near;
So light to the croupe the fair lady he swung,
So light to the saddle before her he sprung!
"She is won! we are gone, over bank, bush, and scaur;
They'll have fleet steeds that follow," quoth young Lochinvar.

There was mounting 'mong Graemes of the Netherby clan;
Forsters, Fenwicks, and Musgraves, they rode and they ran;
There was racing and chasing, on Cannobie Lee,
But the lost bride of Netherby ne'er did they see.
So daring in love, and so dauntless in war,
Have ye e'er heard of gallant like young Lochinvar?

Now, for a few comments. Imagine this chamber to be Netherby Hall. Then who is the young Lochinvar? Perhaps my friend the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) does not quite fill the bill. But what about the golden Apollo who comes from the West—Calgary (Mr. Shaw)?—or a dozen others? But I am quite satisfied with the Progressive leader; he is good enough for the part of Lochinvar if he does the right trick. Here is where the drama begins.

"There are maidens in Scotland more lovely by far,
That would gladly be bride to the young Lochinvar."

Who are they? Is it my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) or the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton)? My advice to them is that Lochinvar is not through with his adventures; he may not go on the rampage, but he may go looking for a charmer. If I were the leader of the opposition I would be as chaste and as attractive as Diana, and I would wear a gown, not of the cut now in fashion, but of a discreet length. Then he would be able to do as Tennyson makes the Yorkshire farmer advise his son:

Doänt thou marry for munny, but goä wheer munny is!

And if the right hon. gentleman should get in the way of Lochinvar the next time he comes around, we do not know what would happen. Then who is the fair Ellen? The fair lady sits over there—the Prime Minister! And the elopement? It took place when young Lochinvar from the West ran away with the Prime Minister of Canada! And between them they arranged the fiscal policy which is now before the House. Then I told my friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) that he was in the romance, but in another way. I was down in Quebec not long ago and I went to Wolfe's Cove where I used to go in the old days down with the rafts to Quebec. There I saw an old friend of mine, and I said to him, "How about the new Minister of Justice?" "Oh," he said, "Maclean, he good man, he bon garçon." I said, "In what way?" He said, "Well, he was over in the Old Country; he went to see King George and then he went to see the pope. The pope asked him how Mr. Hocken was getting on in Toronto and whether Tommy Church still played the kazoo in the People's band." Then I said, "Now, what about the minister?" "Oh" he said, "He is big man. He came back from that trip to England, he came to Quebec and said to me, 'You ride a horse?' and I said, 'Yes.' He said 'Then you come with me.' So we went right out to the West, up to Saskatoon or some place. The minister got a list of all the members of the Progressive party. We got on a couple of cow ponies and we rode out and rounded up all the members of the Farmers' party; we got the ropes on them, brought them into camp, and delivered them to the Liberal party." Now, my hon. friend the Minister of Justice did not say that; it was said by this friend of his, who had a great admiration for the minister's political abilities; he pointed out that the Minister of Justice had rounded up the Progressives. Personally I do not think he did that, but a great many people in Quebec give him the credit for it. The real thing was that the Lochinvars of the Progressive party eloped with the Liberal party and the leader of the Liberal party, and a marriage took place.

Now, what about the morals of it? To my mind there was nothing immoral in it, but the Prime Minister should have admitted the whole case frankly. He had been an observer like I was, and I observed this wonderful change in our political institutions, a change that has occurred not only in Britain but here and in the United States, namely, the substitution of the group system for the two-party system. He cannot get away from that; it is the predominating feature in politics today. In England a minority is in power; the same is true here, as it was in Ontario before the change, and even yet there are three or four groups in that province. I believe that when the election comes in British Columbia in a few days you will see the group system come out there too. It is just a question of the signs of the times, and if you are in politics and you are not guided by that fact I do not know where you are going to land. It is all very well to denounce the group system, but it is here and the proof of it is in the story that I have told you. My friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell), the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) and some other gentlemen get up and say to the House "We did not run away with the girl; she was always of our kind, of our tribe." Well, if that is so, if the two parties are the one party and the policies are the same, why all the rough riding that we see in this House? The member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) is rough riding; the Eulers are out; the McCreas are out; the Raymonds are out; the Elliotts were out last night, and I do not know how many more. If the two parties were the same, you would not see all this rough riding, but there you have it. It is my one criticism of the Prime Minister that he should have frankly and freely come out and said: "I recognize the revolution that has occurred in parliamentary institutions and I am going to do what Ramsay Mac-Donald is doing to-day and what other politicians are doing elsewhere—carry on government by negotiation between groups rather than by the opposition of one party to another." That is the change: The revolution consists in the carrying on of government by negotiation between groups rather than by fighting between two parties. I know that many of my hon. friends around me will say: "Oh, we are going to get back to the old two-party system." Not quite in our time. So the criticism I make of the Minister of Justice and of the Prime Minister is that they should frankly confess the existence of this condition and the fact that their action was based upon it.

I want to get back to the question of how it all happened—this romance. All that happened was a gesture; one kiss and one whisper in the ear, and apparently the deed was done. That is the way politics are going to be carried on now for some time, rather than by discussion. These things cannot be called "deals," because if there was a real deal between two parties an agreement would be drawn up and the result of that agreement would be a coalition; there would be Lochinvars in the government to-day if that were the meaning of it. But that is not the meaning of it, because Lochinvar says:

> He took her soft hand, ere her mother could bar,—
> "Now tread we a measure!" said Lochinvar.

Lochinvar is going to tread measures with her half a dozen times before he is through, because as the member for Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea) said this afternoon, God knows where it is going to end. There is going to be another treading of measures. They talk about just "one cup of wine," but I watched the King's treasurer, the minister who has charge of revenue in this government—I watched him across the floor of the House the other day, and I did not think there was very much on. But somebody had evidently called out for a drink, and he jumped up in the House and he offered a goblet of the real old stuff. All kinds of further reductions are promised; there is to be another measure trod between our friends down the line and the Minister of Finance. There will be a great many more; we do not know where these things are going to end. But the point of the story—and I know all my friends here may not accept it, and hon. gentlemen across the way may not accept it—the real thing in politics to-day is the fact that, the world over, the two-party system is more or less at an end. The group system has come, and instead of the fighting between two parties there is the carrying on of negotiations. You will have the greatest example of it in history in the United States when they come to the issue as they will late this fall.

I asked you, Mr. Speaker, to pardon me for telling a romance on the floor of this House, but it is good to get back to romances occasionally. I would not have been able to tell that story to-night had I not been brought up on Lochinvar at my mother's knee. She used to tell me that story of old, and when I thought of it the other night the whole thing visualized itself to me as I have attempted to depict it here to-night. It is just an elopement of two parties; it is up-to-date, and we do not quite know what will come of it.

Now, I promised the House that after I had told the romance I would give my outline of what a fiscal policy for Canada at this time should be.

An hon. MEMBER: It is a tragedy, not a romance.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Well, it may be a tragedy. I told the House I would give my policy, and it is only my own, for 1924 for the people of Canada, and especially for the Parliament of Canada. I am going to read it, and then I will make some brief comments on it.

A New National Policy For Canada, 1924.

1. A fiscal policy that will keep and build up our industries, gain for us new ones, and give employment at good wages to our home workers.

That is my idea of a tariff policy for to-day, and that would probably be the only plank that can be disputed in this platform. The next is a rather important one, and quite up-to-date.

2. Public support of public services owned in whole or in part by the people; transportation, communications, power. Also co-operation and joint user with competing services where same may be in the public interest; all these services at cost.

3. A national system of banking with rediscounts, including credits for farming as well as for business and industry, based on national notes and national currency; to include postal savings banks and marked cheques thereon.

This is a subject we had up for discussion in the Banking and Commerce committee to-day, and it will be up again to-morrow. I have given a real plank on banking for this country, I think.

4. Development of the St. Lawrence waterway for navigation and power.

Now here is one I have especially for the Maritime provinces and the western provinces, and you will see where it leads to.

5. Electrification of the National railways, and in connection therewith, co-operation with the provinces or municipalities for the distribution of power in areas adjacent to the transmission lines of the National railways.

6. Encouragement of national and other co-operation to develop sales and export of Canadian farm products. Also to secure therefor the lowest transportation charges by land and sea.

7. To defend our country and yet ever aim at reducing the evils of war by co-operation with other nations in disarmament and the erection of a world court of arbitration.

There is a plank that goes home to everyone. It goes home to all the mothers, brothers, widows and sisters who lost their friends in the war. I have not a word to say against war in the past, but the world is lost if it does not find a way to end war. There is no hope for humanity if we cannot stop war, and it will not be stopped by fighting but by more courage on the part of public men and public women, and their getting together with church societies of all kinds and uniting, not quite to stop war for the present, for we will all fight for our country, every Canadian will do that, but in view of our experience we want to see if something cannot be done by co-operation between nations, first to reduce armaments, and then to get a world court to settle these disputes between the different nations.

Let me just go over this programme again and make a few comments on one or two things. First of all, on a national banking system for Canada. We have had that up before us in the Banking committee, I know I am charged with being an enemy of the banks, because I have the hardihood to propose that we ought to improve the banking system in this country, something after the manner in which it has been done in the United States, and banking in the United States is based on the credit of the nation. They do everything there on the credit of the nation. They have any number of banks with an immense capitalization, and all these banks make a great deal of money, and they make it under the National Reserve Bank system. Why cannot we have the same thing in this country. As I told a friend of mine to-day who was speaking to me about the tariff: "True," I said, "the tariff is a great issue in this country, but the biggest issue in the next election is going to be the banking law of this country."

Now I pass to this other proposal of mine with reference to the St. Lawrence waterway. I am glad to know that the government is taking that up, and I was glad to see notice given by the Minister of Railways, (Mr. Graham) the other day that he has already appointed his members on the Joint Advisory Commission, and I hope there will be a further announcement any day. I went over to the department here in Ottawa that has charge of the development of water-powers in Canada and I got their reports on the matter; they are available to any gentleman that wants them, and they show a system for electrifying the whole of Canada from the Pacific to the Atlantic. Sir Adam Beck's system of hydro-electric development in Ontario is the most successful experiment in public ownership of any service like the distribution of electrical energy, and he is applying now for Cornwall island on the St. Lawrence, where he is going to develop an immense amount of power. It will have to be done there in an international way, and the Americans will get half of the power developed, I presume.

In the province of Quebec, at Sault rapids, they have enough power to drive every train from Quebec right up to where they meet the Ontario system, and the Ontario system goes up to lake Superior, where you have the Nipigon hydro-electric power, and then on to Winnipeg. After you get out of the electrical influence generated at Winnipeg, you come to Saskatchewan and Alberta, and the experts of the department, as I see by their reports, have come to the conclusion that you must generate energy for these two provinces by means of great steam plants fired by coal or lignite. They have lignite in Saskatchewan and an abundance of Alberta coal. The great secret of the electrification of railways is the wonderful progress that is being made in high voltage transmission over long distances, and the Edison men are to-day perfecting a system whereby they can transmit a million volts through a wire over long distance without any great waste, and with a wonderful distribution of power. So that means that the electrification can be done at half what it costs now; it also means a substantial reduction in freight rates.

As to the Maritime provinces, my suggestion is that as they have no great water-powers, they develop these large steam plants at the pit heads of their mines for the distribution of electrical energy. I was reading in one of the American papers only yesterday that the American Electrical Company are building to-day generators that produce 75,000 horse-power in one unit, and you have only to increase the number of units to get all the power you want. So the real policy for Canada to-day, if we want to give some relief to the eastern provinces, and to do something to make the West more satisfied, is for the Dominion to undertake the electrification of the National railways.

In the provinces outside of Ontario and Quebec—in the West and in the East—let there be co-operation with the provincial governments and municipalities in generating enough electrical energy not only to drive the railroads and provide power for the industries but to light and perhaps heat the dwellings of citizens. You in the West and in the East want power as much as we want it in Ontario. In that province to-day we have the distribution of electrical energy at cost. If they can have that in the East they can have it in the West. In Ontario we are spending money for this purpose and the money is a paying investment. The country will make money out of such an enterprise and it will reduce the cost of transportation. The railroads may have to scrap some of their engines, but the cheapest thing to do with equipment when you find something better is to scrap it. So my suggestion, and it is a practical suggestion, is to go on with the waterways right away, and with the electrification of the railways. If you electrify the railways you can connect up with the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway. Sir Adam Beck has a scheme for the electrification of that system and giving power to the mines. The railway service can be extended to the mining districts in northern Ontario and Quebec, and in that way there will be a great revival of business in Canada. The thing to do in this country in order to get industry going is to electrify the railways and give employment to the people. If that is done not one dollar will be lost. As Sir Adam Beck has shown, by doing this you realize a profit which meets all the costs, provides for a sinking fund and gives the people a service at a very low rate.

My principal reason for speaking to-night is to direct the attention of my hon. friends in the Maritime provinces and in the West to the proposal for the electrification of the railways so that they may embark upon an admirable scheme of development such as we have in Ontario.

Mr. CHURCH: Could you get anywhere with your programme under the group system of government you have been boosting.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I do not know whether you would or not. My hon. friend knows as much about it as I do and can work the question out for himself. My idea is that even if we do have to go to the group system it will not be a bad way to bring about what we desire.

Mr. CHURCH: Do you think there would ever have been a hydro-electric system if we had had the group system of government at the start? Did not Ontario vote out the group system last June three to one?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I am not to blame for that. My hon .friend himself went out and fought in the campaign and as he says they were defeated. I do not blame him, I know what took place. There is a fight of the big interests against Sir Adam Beck. There I leave the matter.

Now, I want to say a word or two in regard to the great railway that opposes the National Railway system in this country, and that is the Canadian Pacific. I have much admiration for that road, it has been made a great success; but there are men in Montreal who have joined the Mount Royal bloc, as I would call it, the exponents of which are the Montreal Gazette and the Montreal Star. They are preaching a queer doctrine—not only the doctrine we heard this afternoon, "that gloom, and the whispers of death, and everything else will come to Canada"—but there are men in Montreal who are saying—I put it right up, perhaps, to the Canadian Pacific, certainly to some of the banks and Bankers' Association—that in some way what I would call "the Mount Royal hookworm" has got into the National railways and into Adam Beck's hydro-electric system in Ontario. They are continuing to preach that doctrine, and that is the attitude of this Mount Royal club, if we may call it such. Now, that cannot go on in this country. There is lots of room for the two railway systems, if we have to have them, but it is going to be an expensive thing for Canada. I should like to see the Canadian Pacific, in some way, join up with the Canadian National Railways. In the platform I lay down here to-night I left a saving clause:

> Co-operation and joint user with competing services where the same may be in the public interest.

There is no reason why the Canadian Pacific should not work in with the Canadian National Railways. There should be joint user, at least, and other things of that kind. They should take an example from the Hudson's Bay Company; the great thing for the Canadian Pacific to do would be to cash in like the Hudson's Bay Company, so that our two railway systems might get together. Some people might not like that. They might say, "We want competition, and amalgamation would not pay." But we heard from the hon. member (Mr. McCrea) this afternoon about the awful charges on the country in the way of railway cost. And the railway costs have got to come down in Canada. We have too many railroads for the population, there is far too great a mileage, and some plan ought to be worked out in the future by which we could greatly lessen the cost. It may be that a government made up of groups will yet take up this problem and find a solution for it. There never was such a fine, complete and well organized system as the hydro-electric system of Ontario. There is not a bit of graft in connection with it. Some mistakes may have been made but no graft has been shown. There has been an amortization of the whole cost and the people get electricity for light, heat and power at a very low rate. It is the greatest public ownership service in the world. Another fine example that is attracting a great deal of admiration is the street railway system of Toronto, which the people there now control. It is the best street railway system owned by the people to be found anywhere.

I want to point out to the Minister of Railways that all the steam railroads of the United States have their plans made for the electrification of their systems by the development of electricity from steam. They have their plans and estimates and are going to do it. Plans have been made for the same thing in Britain. But we in Canada are in a position to be there first. With the transmission lines of the Canadian National Railways we will be able to put power into the Maritime provinces and into the western provinces, to say nothing of British Columbia. We can develop all the electric power we want and can move every railroad train in Canada, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, by electrical energy generated either by coal or by water-power, and cut the cost of transportation in two. That is the way relief will come to the farmers of the West. Perhaps when they get some electrical energy for distribution out there they will cultivate some new industries and may ultimately become protectionist to some extent—because farmers have turned protectionist before—and will come to view the question in the same way that I do. At any rate I throw out the suggestion.

I will not detain the House any longer. I should like to have followed my hon. friend from Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea) to a greater extent, but coming right back to the issues of the day that confront us here, I want to know if the policies of the Liberal party and the Farmers' party are the same. If that is the case why do we see the "rough riders," the several hon. gentlemen that I have named, riding up and down this House. At any rate the two parties have found a way to get together even if that was brought about by an elopement. There has been an elopement and there may be fusion now but perhaps there will be disunion later on. If the young Lochinvar is going to ride again my advice to my hon. friends on this side is "Watch him and look your prettiest."

Mr. HAROLD PUTNAM (Colchester): In common with other hon. members of this House, I am sure I enjoyed the interpretation of the hon. member for York (Mr. Maclean) of Lady Heron's song. We on this side of the House consider it distinctly complimentary that the Lochinvar from the West should come to this quarter for his bride. It is absolutely true, even on the hon. gentleman's own showing, that the lover who was not a laggard in love and a dastard in war, passed over completely the old-time Tory party. In that particular respect the party at the head of which the hon. member for York (Mr. Maclean) sits to-night, reminds me of a title of a play on a billboard. I have not seen the play but the title is "The Unwanted Child."

Now, Mr. Speaker, to be a little more serious, I know that just now we have superior critics who are apt to regard the whole debate on the budget as a rather academic, lame or rather useless affair. I do not share that view. I think at no time in the history of the country was it more important or useful that we should have, as we have been having, a fair and intelligent debate upon the issue of high protection on the one side or of lower protection upon the other side, and I have comfort in the fact that as yet we are to be followed by the great leaders on each side, belonging to each group; and that therefore we who are private members will find ourselves in the good company of the leaders who are taking this discussion seriously, and who are regarding it as useful, or of course we would not hear from them at all.

Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to pay my humble tribute of congratulation to the Acting Minister of Finance upon the manner and the clarity of method with which he presented the budget this session. As that occasion approached we on this side at least were almost prone to think that a budget deliverance in these latter days of Liberal rule without the great Fielding would be something like the notable play of Hamlet without the central character of Hamlet himself. All the Empire knows, that, overshadowed as he is to-night by an illness which we trust is temporary, there is only one Fielding, and to-day Canadians in general know and realize that there are very few Robbs. As a Liberal of the old school, I hail with frank gladness the fact that this particular budget takes a practical step away from the device and the idol of high protection in this country. In my view and according to my teaching, customs tariff is nothing but a tax. It is as surely a tax as a disease is a tax upon one's physical strength, just as surely as in the time of the Bible and ever since we have had the unwelcome presence of the tax-gatherer in one form or another. I have no doubt that to-day the overwhelming mass of the people of Canada accept as a maxim the fact that the customs tariff is a tax.

If we go back to the year 1878, we find a time when a young politician came upon the horizon, and a time when commercial depression was to some extent overspreading the whole world. We were then even a younger nation than we are now. In the throes of those dull and slack times the people were in a mood to listen to something new, and the man who afterwards became Sir John A. Macdonald painted a picture which predicted that villages would spring into towns and towns into cities, and that the very music and hum of industry and a perpetually balanced life between the urban and the rural population would obtain. It is too bad that just then too many Canadians forgot the wholesome axiom that the customs tariff was after all a tax. But now, after almost fifty years of an experience, which has been disappointing to say the least, I think that the man who to-night would come forward and dispute the proposition that a customs tariff is a tax would be in that position where he would find that none were so poorly equipped with economic knowledge as to do him reverence.

How has this fallacy of protection been supported by its own sub-fallacies for so many years? Because there are a few clearly defined fallacies which have been kept alive. One of the first is the very fallacy which was born under the promise of Sir John A. Macdonald himself that it would be of brief duration, and that it would be removed when once the manufacturers had ceased to be any longer infants and babes in their career. There is no doubt that that promise was made and that it is historic; and in that very promise we can see that at that time this astute young politician, as he then was, did perceive that throughout Canada there were those who well knew that the customs tariff was only a tax, and to placate them he made this promise that the burden would be of brief duration. We know that that promise has not been fulfilled. We know that the fallacy consisted of a carelessness in allowing such a condition as that to go on, forgetting that once a protected beneficiary obtained a hold under the device and the advantage of the tariff, the beneficiaries would fight to the last gasp to retain that hold, as the hon. members on your immediate left, Mr. Speaker, are fighting at this particular stage.

Another fallacy—and I refer to it only briefly—is the fact that in the semi-sacred name of loyalty time and time again this policy of high protection was allowed to live, on occasions when, in 1891 and again in 1911 at least, there was a fair opportunity to largely do away with it, so that we might have unhampered trade with our great neighbours to the south. Again it is difficult to see just the connection between the theory that to lower the customs tariff here would mean any lessening of our devoted ties to the Old Land; but that fallacy seemed to be very pronounced at that time. Allied with that we have the fallacy that we should not trade too freely with our border nation. We have been told—though we have nothing but the snow, the ice and the Eskimo in the North with which to seek commerce—that we should not think of trading too freely with our great neighbour to the south, and that there would be a loss of our self-respect in doing so. Again I say that by the fallacy of pretended patriotic duty we were buncoed out of a fair share of trade with our neighbours to the south.

There is one more fallacy which occurs to my mind—I do not for a moment say that I have given the whole of them—which has kept the greater fallacy of protection alive and going for such a long while. That is the fallacy that if you help the secondary industries of the country, no matter how prematurely, no matter how ridiculously, you thereby help the initial and primary industries of the country and the consumers in general. It is especially held up to view that if you pile up tariff walls as high as Haman's gallows around the factories and industries, you will thereby provide markets for all the agricultural interests of this great and diversified country. It seems to me that those who come forth as bargaining orators with such a proposition as that have a very heavy burden of proof against themselves, because at this particular time they do not dispute that if you crowd protection upon these secondary industries, you will produce higher prices for what has to be bought by those engaged in primary industries and by consumers in general. Nobody disputes that at this stage of our economic argument. Having submitted to the bargainees, the consumers, farmers, labourers of this country, the proposition that protection itself means a higher price for what they have to buy, is the burden of proof not strictly against those who proclaim that? Yes, but they say, we will give you compensating advantages in the shape of a stiffened and enlivened market for what you have to sell. The burden of proof is against those who propose that bargain or proposition. I say with all confidence that that burden of proof has not yet been discharged in all the arguments, real and academic, which we have had for half a century in Canada. Throughout this discussion, nobody on your immediate left, Mr. Speaker, has discharged that burden of proof or shown that in return for the detriment of those higher prices and that higher cost of living, they have got or can get back any corresponding advantages which will outweigh that disadvantage in the welfare of the country at large.

This budget proposes to reduce the customs tariff, and thereby it reduces the expense of production. Thereby, it reduces the cost of living, and for that blessing I, as a consumer, feel profoundly thankful. But that is not the main significance and importance of this budget, which lie deeper. I take it that the main significance of this budget lies in the fact that it provides recognition of this fact, namely, that you must relieve the primary industries in this great country of the burden of high protection in order to have the fiscal soundness for which we seek.

Mr. LADNER: Does the hon. gentleman state that we have high protection in Canada?

Mr. PUTNAM: That, to me, is much a matter of the viewpoint of the one who analyses it.

Mr. LADNER: What is the hon. member's viewpoint?

Mr. PUTNAM: From my poor remarks thus far forth, is the hon. gentleman still under the belief that I consider that at this time the protective tariff is not too high in Canada?

Mr. LADNER: I have not heard the hon. gentleman's remarks thus far forth; I might have heard the ones that he has just delivered; but, in my judgment, he has made a very general statement in regard to the tariff without specifying.

Mr. PUTNAM: I should hope that the hon. gentleman might be able to draw a very few palpable deductions. I do not propose to be questioned for the mere sake of interrogation. It is a tribute, I think, which I pay to the hon. gentleman's intelligence that I refuse to answer his question. I was going to illustrate that if I were a wanderer in an arid country and very thirsty, I think, as a man still retaining my common sense, I should look for water.

An hon. MEMBER: Why water?

Mr. PUTNAM: Because this is Ontario. If I should reverse the process by looking for some dish out of which I might drink the water if I should find it, I should be in the position of those protectionists who tell the farmers that if they would only first and now give them ample protection on secondary industries, all would be well with the farmers. I remember travelling in the Rocky mountains and meeting there an Irishman. He was taking frequent drinks from a bottle, not of water —this will interest the last interrupter—and he did this under the pretence that when he poured whisky down his own throat, it was an excellent cure for his wife's corns. While the connection may be a little remote, I think it is just as intimate and logical as in the case of the protectionist who is telling the men from the plains on his left that protection in Canada is the cure for all their ills and that high protection will assure them the prosperity of which they have long been in fruitless search.

At this particular time, if any policy could be devised which would be really a national policy, it should be hailed with delight. We have been taught over and over again, and correctly, to act nationally, to think nationally, in this Canada of ours. I submit that protection itself is the very reverse of a national policy. It subsidizes some industries at the expense of others and of the consumers in general. I listened with interest to the amendment which was moved by the newly elected hon. member for Kent, N.B. (Mr. Doucet). It seemed to me that, when we have here a place for the leader of the opposition, a place wherein he is paid for his distinguished and, in the present instance, I will say faithful services, it is almost a pity in a constitutional sense, not questioning for a moment the ruling of the Speaker, that that amendment had to go by the board because here was an opposition led by a leader highly paid for the job and they could not use their own amendment as a nucleus round which to rally and express their views upon this tariff. But having said that much when I come to the merits of the amendment itself, when I come to the contradictions in terms in that amendment, I am exceedingly glad that it received the still-birth which it did, because it claimed that we should consistently maintain protection. I do not think the most fervid or perfervid protectionist in this House or in this country will maintain in his reflective moments that there is any such thing as consistent protection. I do not think Mark Twain, in the very height of his deliberate drollery, ever put words together which were more self-contradictory than the word "consistency" and the word "protection". We all know, and every man especially, I take it, who has ever been in the cabinet secrets of any government, will know that when delegations come to them asking for more protection, it is absolutely guesswork as to when you are arriving at a system of justice if you are going to monkey with protection at all. I challenge any man to frame a protective policy which will be consistent and deal out even-handed justice. And the converse is true, as we heard the other day from the entertaining glimpse which the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. McMurray) gave us behind the cabinet scenes. He said that as delegations arrived to oppose various reductions in the tariff on one item or another, their never-failing argument was that if one particular reduction went into effect some other cognate or similar industry would be more favourably placed. I am free to confess that you cannot reduce duties wholly consistently, even if you do so gradually, as this government is proceeding to do. As it is axiomatic that you cannot build up tariff walls with absolute consistency, so you cannot take them down with absolute consistency. Therefore I have no doubt that of necessity criticism will be levelled here and there against the government in that its downward trend of tariff duties is not entirely harmonious and consistent. The tariff itself being inconsistent and mischievous, unless you do away with it at one fell swoop, you have to go through a period of conflict and inconsistency in getting back to a normal business basis. Consequently I humbly ask our Liberal friends throughout the country to bear with the administration in avoiding as best it can glaring inconsistencies in tariff reductions while making no pretence that its policy of tariff reductions can go on without inconsistency any more than that a tariff can be built up without inconsistency.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Is my hon. friend in favour of or against any measure of protection at all in the tariff of this country?

Mr. PUTNAM: That question, Mr. Speaker, could be easily and categorically answered, but I am going to inflict only a short speech upon my hon. friends, and I should like them to take it for granted that I shall not resume my seat and leave that obvious question wholly untouched.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I accept that statement. I hope my hon. friend will not sit down before he answers the question.

Mr. PUTNAM: When we are asked whether or not we should do away with protection altogether we have to take into account the particular industry which will be affected. It is very hard to lay down in one sentence any rule that will suit my hon. friend or any other hon. member. We have to take into account that there are factories which may have been in operation and getting on nicely before protection was adopted as the fiscal policy of this country. In such a case I do not deny that this factory could make more profit after protection came into effect, and consequently it could pay better dividends. In this event what will happen? If dividends are doubled by the application of protection, the owners of the industry will resort to the very common device of watered stock in order to conceal from the consumer the extent to which he is exploited. But a factory which springs up under protection is in a different category altogether. Protection itself raises the price of everything that goes into that industry, it raises the price of labour and the cost of living, and the result is that the factory will require a larger genuine capital and will be started under more onerous conditions. Now, if you take protection away from that industry what happens? Unless the protection is withdrawn gradually that factory will be subjected to certain hardships. Therefore the two cases are dissimilar. When you are dealing with a factory founded before protection was applied, the process is comparatively simple; you have only to scale down the capitalization, in other words, squeeze out the watered stock—and if somebody gets burnt by having dealt in that watered stock he is not to be pitied. But the process is altogether different when you are dealing with a factory established under protection; the scaling down of tariff duties has to be done gradually with due regard to the new conditions which that factory may from time to time have to meet; and this, I take it, is the policy of the government in regard to the present budget.

With respect to the amendment which the hon. member for Kent has moved, and wherein he speaks of "consistent protection," I am sorry he is not in his seat to-night, because I did want to wish him all the joy he can anticipate in telling the people of the Maritime provinces—who are depressed and sometimes discouraged as a result of half a century of the experiment of high protection—that "consistent protection" is the panacea for all their economic ills. He came up here as a new recruit with all the prestige which accrued to him from being a Tory representative from the Maritime provinces—they are so scarce—and with the tumult of his by-election still ringing in his ears, he propounded the doctrine that consistent protection is the cure for the economic ills of the Maritime provinces, I hope he will enjoy all the favour he shall find in the eyes of his people when he goes back and tells them a story so old, so ridiculous and so well disproved by weary decades of painful experience,

Now, Mr. Speaker my proposition is that a genuine national policy of tariff reform must assert the principle that freer trade is essential to the welfare of the nation as a whole, that the tariff must be regarded purely as a means of raising public revenue, and must proceed to the attainment of these objects by degrees. Protection in the best sense of the word is neither a national blessing nor a truly national policy, because it ignores the natural sequence of industries. What is that natural sequence? What is the business of a great and young country like Canada? Is it not in the first place to develop its primary industries, to see to it that there is a fair economic condition obtaining amongst the farmers, the miners, the fishermen and the lumbermen? They were here first. We have millions of acres of cultivated land: How many of them were selected by the hardy tillers of the soil with any regard to the nearby location of some so-called home market? In some cases there may have been such choices, but in the aggregate the farmers of Canada ignored the question of home market, realizing full well that they had to depend for a return for their products upon the unfettered market of the world. The farmer wants to be let alone. He realizes that he must sell his products in open competition with the world. The protectionist says to him. "You shall not buy what you wish in the open market; we are going to make you swallow protection and make you pay an inflated price for what you have to buy." The more healthy the condition of the primary industries the greater will be the field for the development of the secondary industries. When you attempt to induce too premature a development of the secondary industries, at once you inflict harm upon the primary industries, increase the cost of living and make it more difficult for those engaged in the primary industries to get their products ready for such market as there is, the surplus product being destined for export to the market of the world.

We are told, and correctly told, that one of the great hopes for the future of Canada is multiplied immigration. It has been agreed by all parties and by all governments that our immigration should consist of selected agriculturists, of those who can make a success of farming—bona fide farmers who will stay on the land. My Conservative friends agree with me in that as well as my Progressive and Liberal friends. It has been the tenor and tune of the speeches of those to your immediate left, Mr. Speaker, in this debate that the welfare of farming depends upon the protection of the secondary industries. I would ask hon. gentlemen to your left if they think we should modify our propaganda among prospective immigrants in the congested parts of Europe? Dare we put a rider in our immigration propaganda to the effect that the ultimate success of agriculture in Canada depends upon whether or not a high protective tariff is maintained? I challenge my hon. friends opposite to this test of their honesty and sincerity, when they say that farming is dependent upon the protection of secondary industries. Dare they, in the light of common sense, say that the immigrants should be warned that if protection is whittled away in Canada the success of farming will go with it; that if we adopt a purely revenue tariff or aim at the goal of free trade, the field for farming in Canada will be over?

Mr. RYCKMAN: I accept the challenge, and I say yes.

Mr. PUTNAM: The hon. gentleman thinks we should make that change in our immigration propaganda?

Mr. RYCKMAN: If you say that this country shall not have a protective tariff that will reasonably protect industry, then the farming community will suffer and we have no reason to ask immigrants to come here and undertake farming.

Mr. PUTNAM: Will my hon. friend tell us what sort of tariff would reasonably protect industry, to use his own phrase?

Mr. RYCKMAN: I have spoken once in the budget debate, but I hope I may not have to speak again. I can only reply by asking my hon. and esteemed friend to answer the question that I put to him before, and I hope he will not sit down without answering it: Is he in favour of a protective tariff for this country—any protective tariff?

Mr. PUTNAM: I did not forget my hon. friend's academic question, although it was very much out of order just at that stage. Let me ask the hon. gentleman another question—because I am not afraid to make the discussion a little conversational. When he says he believes in modifying our immigration policy to the extent of warning immigrants that if our present protective tariff is lowered the field in Canada for those immigrants will be uninviting, does he speak for himself or for his whole party?

Mr. RYCKMAN: I generally speak for myself, and I am prepared to take the consequences of what I say. If the hon. gentleman wants to advertise to the world that this country is prepared to accept a tariff that is not protective he will not have any sympathy in connection with the result obtained if he seeks to get immigrants. He cannot hope for success if the policy of this country is going to be no protection at all—or free trade, which the hon. member would seem to be arguing for.

Mr. PUTNAM: If the hon. member were in a position of enough prominence—and I say it without disrespect—to look to the good of the whole world, would he advocate a protective tariff—

Mr. RYCKMAN: Looking to the good of the whole world I am simply a back bencher.

Mr. PUTNAM: I put an "if" to it, as my hon. friend must have noticed. I suppose my hon. friend agrees that very largely the products of the farms of Canada must be exported to foreign countries to find a market.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Less than 20 per cent.

Mr. PUTNAM: My hon. friend seems to be in favour of every country in Christendom putting up tariff barriers and having its own protection. Where would he find a foreign market if every country resorted to the device of protection, a device which has the effect of keeping out the products of other countries? Occasionally we are told—and I dislike repeating what I very poorly said in the short speech I made in the debate on the Address—that the protective policy of the United States is proof that protection itself will not disturb the sequence of events in the building up of the industry of a new country. I deny in toto that proposition. The United States has a great variety of climate and soil conditions. The labour of man applied to the various sections of that country in all its different capacities produces a variety of products almost infinite in their complexion, and within that country those products are exchanged on a basis of free trade. It was not until the period between 1816 and 1830 that any tariff legislation was enacted in the United States.

From 1830 to 1860 was a period when the tariff of the United States was entirely non-protective in its aim and in its scope. I want for a moment, with a very few figures, to show hon. gentlemen that in that particular period the United States had the greatest percentage of growth in its population, and an enormous growth, and I think the greatest percentage growth, in its property values. From 1830 to 1840 the increase for taxation purposes in the property values of the United States was 53 per cent; from 1840 to 1850 an increase of 80 per cent, and from 1850 to 1860 an increase of 126 per cent. I have not the later figures, but my reading leads me to believe that there has been no such percentage of increase in property values after 1860, when high protection was more frankly applied.

In 1800 the United States had a population of 5,308,000; 1830, 12,866,000; 1860, 31,443,000; 1890, 62,947,000; 1920, 105,710,000, Enormous as those last growths of population are, they do not represent as high a percentage in growth as those earlier figures which I quoted, which were given as and for a time when the United States had a tariff for revenue only, and when there was no element of protection in their tariff whatsoever. Thus we see quite clearly that this high protection was not the basis and the nucleus of the great growth of the United States, and therefore that furnishes no lesson at all for Canada.

The United States for every dollar of its total products produced exports only six cents' worth, showing how very largely it relies on its great internal trade, upon its great system of free trade as between state and state. That shows the fallacy of holding up the United States as an example for us to follow in the matter of high protection or even moderate protection.

When we come to our own country, we find that in 1920 our total production was $4,485,487,785, and in that year our total exports were $1,189,163,701; in other words, with a population one-twelfth that of the United States, Canada must export and does export about twenty-five cents' worth of every dollar of her total products, in comparison with six cents' worth exported in the United States. In other words, we are four or five times as much dependent upon foreign trade as is the United States. I am delighted to see the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) nodding his head, because I consider him an authority in all respects in these matters. As I was saying, those figures show that we are very much more dependent on foreign trade than is the United States, from which our friends to your immediate left, Mr. Speaker, are so insistent in endeavouring to draw lessons. My hon. friend asked me if I was prepared for the elimination of the tariff.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Are you in favour of any measure of protection?

Mr. PUTNAM: I hope for some far off Divine event of which Tennyson speaks. I hope the whole creation, including my hon. friend and his friends, are moving to that goal. I do hope for a time when protection will be exterminated root and branch; destroyed, horse, foot and artillery. I agree with my hon. friend that it will not come suddenly. The tariff was built up under a vicious and mischievous system, and I believe that just as fast as we can stand it, and without undue dislocation of industry, and with due protection even of the mushroom industries, some of which should never have been started—

Mr. RYCKMAN: Artificial silk for instance, established last year.

Mr. PUTNAM: Artificial silk and artificial arguments.

Mr. RYCKMAN: That is not an answer.

Mr. PUTNAM: My hon. friend is very discriminating to-night. You cannot build up a system by quoting artificial silk or any other isolated item, and we have not time to make a new tariff even for my good friend from Toronto. But I want to answer him frankly. My position is, that just as fast as we can get the tariff down to a revenue tariff basis, and I do not pretend to judge how fast that should come about, we should do it. I believe that is the solution of the tariff problem for Canada. I believe that in time we shall gradually weed out all the tares from the wheat and get down to a purely revenue tariff, with the revenue raised wholly and solely for the public service. I think in that process, if my hon. friend is really referring to my wisdom, there will be a very long term of protection, geographical and incidental, yet, but I confidently look forward to the undoing of the mischief that was done by Sir John Macdonald in 1878. But it should be done slowly, and I hope it can be done without undue hardship to any legitimate business.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend has used a phrase which is quite frequently used, and that is that the tariff should be reduced to a revenue basis. Would he be good enough to say at what point he expects the element of protection to be eliminated and the tariff to be simply a revenue tariff? The reason I ask him the question is that a moment ago he asked for a definition of an adequate tariff.

Mr. PUTNAM: I do not know that I entirely apprehend the full meaning of the question.

Mr. STEVENS: I am sorry I did not make myself clear. The question was, at what point in the reduction of the tariff does my hon. friend expect to arrive at what he terms a revenue tariff, where there will be no protective element, but merely a revenue tariff element. My hon. friend has had two ministers helping him.

Mr. GRAHAM: You should not object.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I can answer it.

Mr. PUTNAM: In the main it is a tariff that will get the revenue into the treasury, and not into the pocket of the protected manufacturers. I am a little bit surprised at that particular brand of courtesy which prompted my hon. friend to say that I was receiving help in answering the question. It so happened that I did not receive any help, and I am surprised at that little departure from the splendid courtesy which I have always associated with the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), when he twitted me that I was waiting for help before I answered. I think it was just a little unworthy of him.

Mr. JACOBS: He was encumbered by help.

Mr. STEVENS: I think my hon. friend is correct.

Mr. RYCKMAN: The hon. Minister of Justice said that he would come to his assistance, and I would therefore ask him where the protective tariff on boots and shoes would cease, and the tariff remain only a revenue tariff.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I am absolutely in order. I ask the hon. gentleman where the protective tariff on boots and shoes would cease and where the revenue tariff would come in? Give it to us in percentages and, with the permission of the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. Putnam), I have no doubt the Minister of Justice will now speak.

Mr. PUTNAM: Does the hon. gentleman expect me to give the exact data that would produce that result?

Mr. RYCKMAN: As nearly as you can.

Mr. PUTNAM: My hon. friend would like me to give approximate figures?

Mr. RYCKMAN: Yes, you asked me to.

Mr. PUTNAM: I do not know about that. I do know, however, that there is an obligation upon the leader of the opposition to give us information upon that point. I do know this—that before the right hon. gentleman went to the country at the last general election he told the people of Canada that he had still a long time to put up what he called a campaign of education; that before he would touch the tariff he would have a commission that would tell just the digit above which the tariff should not be raised as being too high, and just the digit below which it should not be lowered as being too low. If my hon. friend would use his good offices with the leader of the opposition and get him to redeem that promise he would really be in a better position to obtain an answer to that question and doubtless he would obtain some data from that source. I do not think the commission in question was ever dismissed.

Mr. GRAHAM: No it was parked.

Mr. PUTNAM: I have spoken at greater length than I intended.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. PUTNAM: It must be remembered that I alluded to the fallacy under which this protective policy of Sir John Macdonald was born, namely, that the tariff would be wiped away just as soon as the infant industries ceased to be babes and infants. That promise is still outstanding. Hon. gentlemen opposite twit us about every hour because they allege we have not carried out all our pre-election promises and particularly the platform of 1919. I believe, Mr. Speaker, in taking up these pre-election promises in their historic order. I would therefore carry my hon. friends back to that undoubted promise of their greatest chieftain, Sir John Macdonald, in 1878 when he said specifically, in terms the whole country is familiar with, that "protection was only a temporary evil, endure it for a little while until these industries get upon their feet." To-day in these belated days the Liberal government is making an attempt to redeem that promise of the great Conservative chieftain. We ask hon. gentlemen opposite to take up the alleged broken platform and broken pre-election promises in their proper historic order. Let us dispose of the promise referred to first. The platform of 1919 is a platform which tries to honour the dust of Sir John Macdonald and to implement that chieftain's promise—a promise which in point of honour is as compelling as though it were only made yesterday; a promise which is all the more overdue because during the intervening decades the industries aided by the protective tariff have ceased to be infant industries. Sir John Macdonald passed away when this country was a good deal younger than it is to-day. I give credit to my hon. friend's great former leader for realizing that that promise was long overdue and that he intended to fulfil it. I do not think the late Conservative chieftain would sleep serenely in that quiet cemetery at Cataraqui if he felt his promise would remain unfulfilled. I do not think he would sleep so well if he knew we were going to break faith with him, and therefore I call on hon. gentlemen opposite to support this budget and join with us in implementing the promise of Sir John Macdonald.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Before the hon. gentleman sits down will he tell us at what point the revenue tariff was fixed for boots and shoes, and at what point the protective tariff was fixed for the same industry?

Mr. PUTNAM: In reply I would ask my hon. friend at what point rubber tires should be fixed in the tariff?

Mr. RYCKMAN: I did not hear the question of the hon. and learned member for Colchester. I want to make my question very plain and I think I can do it in very few words. I understood the hon. and learned member for Colchester—

Mr. PUTNAM: Leave out the "learned".

Mr. RYCKMAN: —would tell us before he sat down where the line was drawn between a protective tariff and a revenue tariff on boots and shoes. If he can do so it will enlighten this side of the House.

Mr. PUTNAM: That would depend upon conditions.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Take conditions as they are to-day.

Mr. PUTNAM: I think we shall get help when the tariff commission appointed by the late government brings down the exact digits as to every item as was promised. I should like to know the point at which the hon. gentleman thinks that protection to rubber tires approaches the right figure? Why bother so much with boots and shoes when in these days of Liberal government the people are walking so seldom and riding so much in automobiles?

Mr. ARTHUR L. BEAUBIEN (Provencher): In rising to take part in this debate, it is not my intention to again consider many phases of this vast question, most of which have already been discussed. I want to limit my remarks to one or two points on which, in my estimation, not sufficient light seems to have yet been thrown.

The budget does not seem to bring very substantial changes in our tariff situation, but no matter how short the step in the right direction may be, I believe it should be accepted. I readily admit that all desirable changes cannot be made in one day or even one year. It is only by seeing the good results of slight changes in the tariff that the people will press their demand for more alterations in our fiscal policy. When I say the people, I do not mean the agricultural class only. As you know, Mr. Speaker, it has been said that we favour class legislation. Of course, this statement comes from an advertisers-controlled press and from bawling politicians who work first and last for power, and who have misrepresented, by hook and by crook, the Progressive group and their ideals. When I speak of the people who will demand changes, I mean all elements of our population, except, perhaps, the get-rich-quick and the reaper of excessive profits in exploiting others' brains and labour.

The progressive group stands for justice to all classes, for the progress and welfare of the whole population. We have been accused of asking special privileges for the agricultural class. Nothing is further from the truth. If we have asked that justice be given to the farmers and that they be afforded an opportunity to reap all advantages from their work, it is because we feel that other classes of society could not logically reap the full benefit of their activities unless the farming class, which is the basis of public welfare, receives fair play and justice.

The fact that farming is the very foundation of national life was demonstrated a long time ago. Cicero in old Roman times, proclaimed that: Among the productive arts, none was better than agriculture, none was more fruitful; none was more agreeable or more distinctive of a free man.

[Mr. Putnam.]

One of the foremost economists, if not the greatest of the last century, Le Play, has expressed the same idea in a beautiful passage which I will quote in French first, and which I will try to translate afterwards. He said:

L'agriculture a été pour les sociétés humaines le principal moyen de multiplication, d'indépendance et le progrès moral. Plus que toute autre branche d'activité, elle caractérise la vie nationale. Elle est, dans l'ordre matériel et dans le régime du travail, la force qui complète le mieux l'ordre de la création.

The English translation reads:

Agriculture has afforded to human societies the principal means of expansion, of independence and of moral progress. More than any other branch of activity, it characterizes the national life. It is, in the material order and in the regime of labour, the power which best completes the order of creation.

It being admitted that agriculture is the basis of our national welfare, let us glance at the world's conditions to-day. People have just emerged from the stupor resulting from the most horrible war of all times. They are all trying to devise means, according to their conditions and power, to effect a recuperation of their former strength. In other words, everywhere the world is facing the problem of reconstruction. In all countries public men are busy building up a new national life. Since the beginning of the session, you have heard speeches on national unity, national problems, and national reconstruction. How is it to be brought about? Will you build from the roof down or from the foundation up?

I do not hesitate to say: If you want to build up a prosperous nation, in this agricultural country, start at the foundation. Try firstly to better the farming life. The farmers are ready to share the sacrifices in this present crisis; they never shirked their duty on co-operating with other classes in order to make this country prosperous. They are still ready to toil on the land to extract from it most of our necessities of life, provided you instil in their hearts hope instead of discouragement, contentment in place of dissatisfaction, and so create in their homes a little happiness. If you adopt means to improve the disastrous condition the farmer is in to-day, the unemployed of the cities will go to the land, instead of emigrating to the United States, and those who would under other conditions, desert their farms will never think of leaving them. Immigrants coming within our borders will become good settlers and will trade with other industries which will again enjoy the sunny side of prosperity. I repeat in all sincerity, if you want to reconstruct our national life, start at the basis, the farmer.

In the February Bulletin of Agricultural Statistics, it is stated that:

Low prices, high wages, freight rates and costly machinery have taken all profits from farming in the West.

The products of our agricultural industry which are by far the most important in Canada, so much exceed our home consumption that necessarily, we are a community of exporters. Lower cost of transportation, better marketing facilities and a better control in the selling of our grain will largely contribute to replace low prices by fair prices, as would also a reduction in the cost of machinery and other necessities of life. I am glad that a grain commission, presided over by Judge Turgeon, is inquiring into the wheat marketing problem, and I hope that our farmers, through the elimination of all useless middlemen and profiteers, may, in the near future, be able to get a better price for their grain.

The question of freight rates also demands immediate attention and action. May I express the hope that in order to relieve the great western farming community, steps be taken to complete the Hudson Bay railway as soon as possible. This question will be dealt with fully, I expect, during the present session. I wish, however, to draw the immediate attention of this House and the government to the fact that a certain section of Canada has never been enlightened as to the facts that led our public men to undertake the building of that road. The press of eastern Canada, supported by its big advertisers, had to follow their suggestions. Big interests connected with the lakes, or other shipping companies were holding a firm grip on almost every newspaper of this part of the country, where the people were made to believe that the practicability of that road, as a paying proposition, was a myth born in the brains of vote-catching politicians. The people never knew the real facts. Moreover, certain official reports containing those facts and conclusions favourable to the completion of the road, have never been translated into French for the information of the province of Quebec. Was it done purposely? I have in mind one special report of a committee of the Senate, in 1920, which should be translated into French and distributed widely in the province of Quebec, since the newspapers of that large province thought proper not to give their readers the two sides, and, more especially to keep in the dark the favourable side of this important question.

In connection with high wages mentioned in the quoted bulletin as one of the causes of deficits in farming operations, I may say that the farmers of this country do not object to pay fair wages for a fair day's work, and that they would rather suffer themselves than deprive labourers of the opportunity of earning an honest living. There, again, the sincerity of the agricultural class in co-operating with other classes for the general welfare, is manifest.

The fourth point mentioned in the Bulletin of Agricultural Statistics as being a burden on the farming life of this country is "costly machinery." The budget announces a slight decrease in the tariff on farm implements, and this is gladly accepted by this group as a partial measure of justice.

I was astonished to read declarations of certain manufacturers, or of their representatives in the press, and of certain members in both Houses of Parliament, to the effect that this reduction in the tariff would mean a serious loss to the revenue of Canada. I was astonished because they are the same people who, after the formation of the Progressive group, always claimed that the farmers were practically exempt from taxation. It is only now that they seem to realize that the farmers who are subject to all forms of taxation like the other consumers, are big contributors to the revenue of our country. The only taxes that they do not pay are taxes on luxuries which they cannot afford to buy. I say, without any hesitation and free from any influence whatsoever except my deep interest in the general welfare of my country, that any measure that this or any other government may bring in to improve conditions of rural life in Canada, will receive my hearty support.

Amongst the measures that are expected to be adopted is the establishment of a federal farm loan board, which, with the help of a federal reserve bank, will extend, by a system of rural credits to agriculturists, the period over which moneys are now being lent. The elaborate report of Dr. H. M. Tory, published by order of parliament, contains very valuable and interesting information which, I hope, will enable the government to establish the necessary institution for financing the farmer's needs in such a manner that he will be in a position to wait and not to sell his wheat until market conditions are favourable, or to do greater development on his farm without incurring a great risk of losing his property.

Again, I submit that our national reconstruction should begin at the foundation. What we need first and most in this agricultural country is more population on the land, as is admitted by everybody, and means are being taken to bring in more immigrants. Let me say, however, that the large expenditure for immigration will be a complete waste of money, if the new settler, as well as the old Canadian farmer, is not content with his life. When our Canadian farmers are compelled to leave their farms on account of deficits accruing every year in spite of their hard labour, how can one expect that new immigrants, who are not yet tied up to this country by the many bonds of residence, environment, laws, social and family relations, public or private institutions, will stick to a meaningless home? I appeal to this government and to all men of goodwill in this parliament; let us get together and unite our efforts to adopt legislation to relieve, first of all, our agricultural industries. It seems to me that such a unanimous effort is our main national duty at the present time.

If we want again to enjoy prosperity, let our next budget tend more towards eliminating the causes of the farmers' critical situation, that is, low prices for their products, high freight rates, costly machinery, and high duties on the necessaries of life. Let us adopt measures that will improve the lot of our rural population. Let us contribute to keep our own Canadians at home, on the land, in the cultivation of which they will find some happiness. Our farmers, respectful as they are for the moral and natural laws, will see their numbers increasing by natural expansion and by a large immigration coming to share their contented life. Thus, through our efforts, Canada will become more prosperous, and we shall have done for our country more than those who wave the flag for the sake of a small group having special privileges and a large protection, or for the sake of a few ambitious politicians.

Mr. HUGH C. McKILLOP (West Elgin): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) on the very able manner in which he brought down the 1924 budget. While not at all in sympathy with what the budget contains, yet at the same time I want to give the hon. minister all credit for the prompt and quick despatch he gave it. About a month ago the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), during a speech that he delivered in this House, referred to me as being one of a deputation that waited on the cabinet one day last winter in reference to the Home Bank depositors. In this statement the Prime Minister was correct. I was invited by members of the deputation from the constituency which I have the honour to represent to accompany them to Ottawa. This kind invitation was accepted gladly, because although not a loser by the failure of the Home Bank, yet I was always in sympathy with the depositors, many of whom lost their all in this disaster; and when everything in connection with this failure is taken into consideration I am strongly of opinion that something should be done for them. For instance, it is a well-known fact that the government was fully aware, before the collapse of this bank, of the condition it was in. Such being the case, why did they not make some move to prevent this failure and save the depositors from the loss of their money? What a difference between the course of this government in regard to this matter and the action of the provincial government of Quebec. In this latter case, as soon as the government found that one of their large financial institutions was in danger of failure they moved at once, took prompt measures, did not allow the bank to fail, saved the depositors their money and prevented what otherwise would have been a financial calamity. Not so with our Dominion government, who, although they knew that the Home Bank was in a bad condition, never raised a hand to prevent this bank from failing, thereby allowing many people to lose so much, and in many cases their all, and spreading hardship and ruin from one end of this country to the other, when they might, by prompt action through the Bankers' Association or by some other means, have prevented this catastrophe from taking place.

Now, I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that taking all these facts into consideration, I think the depositors of the Home Bank should be reimbursed to the full extent of their losses, and I for one will support any measure brought forward in this House with that object in view. Of course I know that the argument is advanced that the Home Bank depositors cannot be given back their money without the depositors of the Farmers Bank getting their money back also. Well, all I have to say to that is this: When the Farmers Bank failed my sympathy was with the depositors, and I thought they should have had their money back, but two wrongs never made a right Therefore, I claim that just because the Farmers Bank depositors did not get their money back is no reason why the depositors of the Home Bank should not receive theirs, and I sincerely hope that the government will find a way to give back to the depositors of the Home Bank all the money they lost.

Last year I drew to the attention of the government a condition of affairs that existed between the tariff duties on beans coming into this country and the bean producers of Canada. I am very sorry to note that no change in the tariff on this particular commodity has been made. The duty on beans coming into this country is 25 cents per bushel, while on beans going into the republic to the south of us, the duty is $1.05 per bushel. This, I claim, is not fair, equitable or just to the bean farmers of this country. Last year the production of beans in this country amounted to 1,041,700 bushels valued at $2,773,000, while at the same time beans to the amount of 342,224 bushels valued at $843,763 were imported. Now, what does this mean? It simply means that owing to the low duty on beans coming into this country, the bean producers of this Dominion have to compete with other countries, such as Japan, Austria and Belgium, where living conditions are so different and labour so much cheaper. In fact, in this respect I have it on good authority that a labourer in the fields in some of these countries does not receive as much for a week's work as one in this country receives for one day. And further, Mr. Speaker, just let me point out that last fall when the Canadian bean crop was ready to market, the farmers received a fair price per bushel for their beans, the price then being from $2.60 to $2.75 per bushel, but this price lasted only a short time because of the heavy shipment of foreign beans arriving on our market, with the result that our bean farmers and dealers had to take a lot less for what they could sell of last year's crop. In fact some of them had to take as much as 75 cents per bushel less than they received when their first beans of last year were ready to market. The result is that while shipment after shipment of foreign beans is still coming in, thousands of bushels of our own production are being held by our farmers and dealers. This, Mr. Speaker, I claim is not as it should be. No one in this country is being benefited by allowing this state of affairs to continue, with the exception of the dealers who are buying these foreign beans and selling them to the consumer at the same price as one would have to pay for the home-grown product. In this connection let me say that I have been told that there is one firm handling these foreign beans who cans them and labels the container "Made in Canada," puts them on the market and sells them for the real Canadian bean and at the same price as the genuine, home-grown article.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I protest against this discrimination against our bean producers, and I claim it is high time this tariff was changed and they were given the necessary protection to compete successfully with those foreign countries with depreciated currency, where labour and living conditions are so much cheaper. Just think—nearly one million dollars of good Canadian money gone to enrich foreign countries for beans alone this last year, while thousands of bushels grown here in Canada are still in the producers' hands, the consumer not benefiting a particle by it. I hope the government will take action on this matter right away, adjust the tariff and give the bean producers a fair show.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am a believer in protection; I believe that what this country needs is protection, and high protection at that, the higher the better for all classes. I would like to see our tariff walls raised higher even than the tariff barrier of the republic to the south of us. I am satisfied that if this were done the wheels of industry would turn, there would be plenty of labour for the working man, a better home market for the farmer, there would be plenty of money circulating around and everybody would be happy and contented. However, Mr. Speaker, in this matter I do not wish to be misunderstood, as I would want the farmer protected as well as the manufacturer, and this is how he could be protected —have an amendment made to that slow-acting combines bill passed last session, making it possible to punish severely any manufacturer found guilty of charging an unduly high price for any of his articles the farmer buys.

Now, Mr. Speaker, just let me say here that I am convinced that quite a few of the ills from which Canada is suffering could be cured if the tariff were so arranged as to stop the exporting of so much of our unfinished product, taking, for instance, our pulpwood. Last year we exported in the unfinished state over ninety-nine million dollars' worth of this commodity alone; I contend that if a bill was passed prohibiting the exportation of pulpwood in its unfinished condition, and as a consequence it had to be manufactured here in Canada, the result would be that large plants employing thousands of workingmen, distributing large sums of money for wages, material and so forth, would be established here in Canada, from which the people of the Dominion as a whole would greatly benefit.

Mr. Speaker, there is one other matter to which I would like to refer, and then I am through, and that is the coal situation here in Canada. This Dominion has within its boundaries very large quantities of coal, coal fields undeveloped with millions and millions of tons of coal in them. I think, if the government really wanted to do something for the people of Canada, instead of buying a Scribe Hotel in Paris or a Union Club in London, England, —things I am convinced could be done without for years to come,—they would be well-advised to turn their attention to the development of our coal fields and making arrangements whereby this coal could be delivered to all parts of Canada, wherever needed, as cheaply as possible, thereby assisting the people to obtain all the fuel they require. Not only that but at the same time it would stop the sending every year of over one hundred million dollars of good Canadian money to other countries for fuel alone when we have so much of it right here in our own country. I claim that if the government would attend to this at once they would be performing a great service to the people as a whole.

Mr. O. R. GOULD (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, at this late stage in the debate one finds it difficult to introduce new matter, and this might almost be sufficient justification for closing the discussion. But on paying a visit to my people in the West I find that they are very much interested in the budget and are paying close attention to the varied expressions of opinion that are being delivered upon the floor of the House.

I wish to join other members in complimenting the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) on the generalship which he has displayed in the presentation of his budget. I do hope that a year from now my praise may be just as unstinted as it is at this time. What I have in mind is that the dumping clause can be so interpreted as to nullify all the apparent benefits of the budget. I sincerely hope and trust —using the word "trust" in its fullest sense— that the minister or the government will not exercise the dumping clause too drastically, if they exercise it at all, for there is a fear in the minds of the people that its restrictive features may be unduly enforced.

I have noticed, particularly in the early stages of this debate, that our Conservative friends prefaced their remarks by expressing their appreciation of the Acting Minister of Finance and their regret that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) himself was not in his seat. In explanation of that they stated that had the Finance Minister occupied his usual place in the House he would not have brought down a budget such as the present budget. That is to admit that the Finance Minister is greater than the whole Liberal party, in other words that the part is greater than the whole, which none of us can believe to be possible. The statement of the right hon. Prime Minister that the Finance Minister endorsed this budget was satisfactory to me, and it must have been satisfactory to our Conservative friends, for since that statement was made they have ceased from introducing their remarks by an expression of sorrow at the absence of the Finance Minister. During the years that I have had the honour of occupying a seat in this House, when the Finance Minister was in his place and introduced the policies which hon. gentlemen now give him credit for perpetuating, I cannot recall that they bestowed upon him the fulsome praise which they now offer in his absence. It is something like writing an epitaph on a tombstone; if they believed the Finance Minister was furthering policies which were beneficial to Canada as a whole, why did they not commend him while he was in the House rather than wait until this late day?

Since 1875 all elections in Canada except two have been fought upon the tariff or economic issues. The two I refer to were the elections of 1908 and 1917. The 1908 election was fought largely on the Transcontinental railway question and the 1917 election was the occasion of the formation of the Union or war time government. Had the government of 1908 devoted their time to a discussion of tariff matters it would have been much better for the people of Canada, whether the election was lost or won, than the making of arrangements in connection with that huge expenditure on railways. However, it is not my purpose to enter upon a discussion of railway matters. I am very much interested, of course, in the tariff question and the few remarks I shall make will be largely devoted to that subject.

In passing, though, I wish to make a remark or two concerning the very able address delivered by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens)—and I am pleased to see that he is in the chamber. The hon member stated that in his early days he had been a student of Adam Smith, Henry George, and John Stuart Mill, and what puzzles me is how the hon. gentleman, having studied these political economists, could in 1924 support a policy brought into effect in 1878, the National Policy. It does seem strange, Sir, but I have no doubt that I can get an explanation from the hon. gentleman in conversation with him. Since the days of Sir John A. Macdonald agriculture has made the greatest strides of any industry in Canada. It is well known that last year Canada produced the largest amount of exportable grain of any country in the world. Consequently our grain crop is the basis of our national wealth, and from an economic point of view it would seem to be wise to pay some attention to this basic industry. I argue that the National Policy is diametrically opposed to the best interests of agriculture.

The hon. member for Vancouver Centre argues for a home market for agriculture, and by the same token he argues for a home market for manufactures. The manufacturer, he says, must have protection which will eliminate opposition, but he becomes partial at that point, because the agriculturist has no protection and is made more or less the victim of the protection which is afforded to the manufacturer. The hon. gentleman by his arguments would oblige all governments in Canada to assume the monetary obligation involved in protection in our relations with other countries. That is to say, if Canada has a high protective tariff which has the effect of keeping out the goods of other countries, the task is imposed on the Canadian government of bargaining with other countries to give us favoured nation treaties or access to their markets in other ways. I do not see the logic in that argument.

At this point it may be well to ask, what is a home market? The market is represented by the purchasing power of the agriculturist, of the labouring man and of the professional man. The purchasing power of the agriculturist is limited by the amount he can receive in the market of a free trade world. His products are sold in competition with cheap labour all over the world, with conditions obtaining in other countries where agriculture is carried on. On the other hand our manufacturing friends oppose that principle, claiming that they cannot compete—and they will not if they can avoid it—under conditions which are nevertheless forced upon the agriculturist. The wage earner, the labourer, is circumscribed in the labour markets of the world; he is in competition with labour everywhere. The professional man's purchasing power is circumscribed more or less by the competition of those of his own profession. The total of these represents the purchasing power of Canada or of any other country.

Now, the imposition of a 10 per cent tariff minimizes the purchasing power in the home market to that extent. If you impose a 20 per cent tariff the purchasing power in the home market is limited one-fifth. Consequently the protectionist meets no competition until the purchasing power in the home market has been diminished by that 10 per cent or that one-fifth. The whole purchasing power of the people under a tariff is nullified by the extent of the tariff, be it 10, 15 or 20 per cent—it is nullified and becomes of no effect. The amount of the tariff also represents what the beneficiaries of the system receive for which they give no adequate return.

If that argument is followed out to its logical conclusion and every country would impose a tariff having the object of keeping out the products of other countries, we would then have Canada for the Canadians, America for the Americans, Great Britain for the British, Germany for the Germans, Russia for the Russians, China for the Chinese, Japan for the Japanese, and so on. So we come back to greatly enhanced prices, to a nullification of the purchasing power of the whole world due to the operations of this impostor, protection. The only benefits they might get are through the extra genius shown by statesmen in the various countries who exact a better bargain than the statesmen of other countries. Now when an individual feels himself a victim of a system or a principle, no amount of argument will soothe him or persuade him that he is not a victim, and in that regard I argue, as I have done frequently in this House, that the agriculturist is justified in feeling that he is a victim, and no amount of talk by our Conservative friends or other advocates of protection in Canada will ever persuade the agriculturist that he is not the victim of a vicious system. I believe that that feeling will remain in his breast just so long as he is denied equity in a country with great natural resources, which should give him a fair return for his labour.

I hold in my hand an article that appeared in the Journal of Commerce some time ago, and I am sure our Conservative friends will not dispute the authority of that Journal. I wish to present a case to the common people of this Dominion, whether they be agriculturists, professional men, or labourers in our towns and cities or villages, to show the enormity that is practised through this vicious system of protection, and how the masses are victimized for the benefit of a few people. I think that the presentation of these figures will prove conclusively that the beneficiaries of protection are not so much concerned with providing a job for the working man, as in perpetuating this vicious system and taking the benefits that accrue from it—a system that has been followed by all governments in this country since 1878.

The object of this writer was to give to the people of Canada the idea that the tariff is a very small thing, and he purports to give a list of the implements that are necessary on a 160-acre farm. This is the list: gang plow, spike tooth harrow, scuffler, disc harrow, disc drill, spring tooth cultivator, corn cultivator, corn binder, manure spreader, mower, horse rake, binder and wagon. He states that this table represents the ordinary equipment for an average farm of 160 acres, and the duty payable on these implements. When my eyes fell upon this article it occurred to me that if the editor of this paper knew no more about the matter than the writer of this article, he might be justified in printing it, but if he did know more, he should have met him at the door with a baseball bat, because he has presented the strongest possible argument in favour of low protection. He has done this unconsciously, because he did not know what he was talking about. He has calculated that $175.77 will be payable in duty on these implements on the average farm, but he does not give half the implements that are necessary before a man can engage in farming on that scale. In the first place he has no harness, and in passing I would say that I would like nothing better than to have the writer of this article go on a 160-acre farm and try to make a living with the equipment that he has listed as necessary. He would be like a buttercup in the Sahara desert. Nevertheless, this man purports to be an authority on protection. Possibly some sensible people may have seen his ridiculous statement and may believe in it and therefore, I propose to expose the fallacy of it. He has no provision for harness, and hon. gentlemen know that there is quite an extensive duty on harness, and that you cannot do much farming without harness. The implements he has listed require four horses, and he would be obliged to provide harness, to the amount of approximately $100. He has no walking plough, but as he has furnished a gang plough he can perhaps do without it, although I could not; he has not got a wagon box with which to draw his grain to market and his seed to the field; nor a fanning-mill to clean the grain before taking it to market and to clean the seed before sowing. He has no pickler, and as the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) and my Progressive friends know, that is absolutely necessary on account of smut and other things. He has no engine, no ensilage cutter; he has not even a sleigh or a cutter. Evidently he expects that a Chinaman lives on the adjoining farm for he has made no provision for a washing machine or a wringer for the farmer's wife. He has no buggy, forks, shovels, spades, axes, hoes, chains, clevises, no roller or packer, and no thrashing machine. I have made what I think a very fair list of the articles which I think are necessary, and if you take the duty as given by this writer, $175.77 and add the items I have given, you get a duty of $375 on the implements the farmer will absolutely require on a 160 acre farm before he can engage in farming. My urban brother in the city is not obliged to pay that tax. Only the man who chooses agriculture as his vocation is obliged to pay this $375 extra tax over and above what his brother in the urban centre pays, and that is why we cry out against this system of which we are the victims. I may say incidentally that if my words ever reach the ears of this writer, I hope he will mend his ways.

Mr. HOEY: No provision is made for a Ford car?

Mr. GOULD: There is no provision for a Ford car. This writer goes on to say:

> Implements at all properly cared for will last on the average in Canada ten years, so that allowing for manufacturers taking every dollar in duty that they can, we have an extra cost per year of $17.50.

I have shown that that average would be $37.50, as the tax amounts to $375. He goes on:

> Assuming an annual crop of 100 acres and an average yield of all kinds of grain of 17½ bushels to the acre, this duty would add to the cost of producing the grain one cent a bushel.

That is very generous. We have in Canada at the present time 60,000,000 acres of land under cultivation, and I shall endeavour to show the huge amount of money which the agriculturist is obliged to pay before he can engage in farming. Sixty million acres under cultivation means 375,000 quarter sections of land. Taking the writer's own computation of $375, that means a total fine of $140,425,000 which is placed on the agriculturist of Canada before he can engage in his chosen occupation. Is it any wonder, Mr. Speaker, that when the people become aware of these things they protest and they send representatives to parliament to register their protest. As I have already stated every election in the past has been fought upon economic issues and the same issues will come up at every election in the future until justice is done to the people that suffer from this system.

The writer also argues that the charge in question will have to be renewed every ten years. That is to say that this huge expenditure of $140,425,000 is repeated every ten years. If we take that for forty-five years it means a total payment in the way of penalty of $631,912,500. That is what those sixty million acres will pay in the course of forty-five years. This is a huge sum to be taken out of the pockets of one class of the community. Is it any wonder, as I stated a few moments ago that the manufacturers, the beneficiaries of this system, are not as anxious to provide work for the labouring man and prevent his migration to the United States as they are to retain their profits.

Mr. CALDWELL: Are the figures that my hon. friend just quoted based on the present duty?

Mr. GOULD: Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is it not a fact that in times past the duties were higher than they are now and consequently the total would be greater?

Mr. GOULD: I am pleased my hon. friend reminded me of the fact. If we went back to the times when the duties averaged 17½, 20 or 25 per cent the figures would reach the staggering total of billions of dollars. We have 300,000,000 acres of arable land in Canada potentially available and in view of this magnificent prospect we can well imagine how the manufacturers would like to perpetuate the system so that they could multiply the total of $631,912,500 by five—because we have five times as much arable land to bring under cultivation yet. I ask again, is it any wonder that we raise our voices in protest, and does not our argument rest on a logical basis? I only ask permission to present these facts in a simple way so that the ordinary reader may grasp them more quickly than if they were couched in technical language.

Now, as I read it the writer went on to argue that the tariff takes the paltry amount of one cent per bushel. Very well, let us accept that estimate. We will find according to the terms that practically 994,000,000 bushels of grain were produced in Canada last year which, according to the writer's own computation, would represent $994,000 annually. These figures, no matter how you take them, represent an unwarranted and unjustifiable fine upon agriculture. Avarice and greed stalk forth on this land under the guise of morality as represented by the beneficiaries of this vicious system of protection for a few. The system lends itself readily to incompetence and the perpetuation of an antiquated system. It fosters hatred and class domination. Wars and famine follow in its train and its sponsors laugh at the writhings of its victims.

I hold in my hand a little pamphlet which was prepared under the directions of the present government for distribution at the World's Fair in London this year. From this pamphlet I want to cite a quotation which reads as follows:

> During the last twenty-five years her manufacturing industry has enjoyed a remarkable growth—

Yes it has.

> —and there is good reason to believe that this will continue in the future.

So there is.

> This expansion is partly attributable to Canada's natural advantages, amongst which are plentiful and diversified raw materials; an unusually extensive transportation service both by rail and by water, which facilitates the assembling of raw products at points favourably situated for their manufacture and distribution in finished form. Abundant water powers supply ample and cheap energy. The expansion of agricultural, mining and other branches of basic industry has the effect of enlarging the domestic market for manufactured products.

Every word of the statement is true and such being the case there is no reason why Canadian manufacturers should ask that a certain class of the community be penalized for their benefit. That is the attitude I take. I regard it as almost sacrilege that in a country such as we have, endowed with such wonderful natural resources men should ask to be accorded such privileges as are granted in the tariff.

Our Conservative friends have been indulging in all sorts of prophecies of impending doom. Industrial Canada, for example, is filled with accounts of meetings that have been held at which it was stated that if such and such a thing occurs some other thing will happen. These are nothing but false predictions, unjustifiable and groundless prophecy. No consideration at all is paid to the statements that were made here last year with respect to the actual condition of agriculture in Canada and the effect this was having on the general business of Canada. The thing necessary to do is to re-establish the purchasing power of the people not to perpetuate a tariff that would weaken that power still further. The manufacturers and their friends do not recognize that the purchasing power of the people of Canada is gone and even if the tariff were raised to a point high enough to satisfy the hon. member who preceded me it would have no effect because the people have not the money to purchase goods. That is the fact not only in Canada but in other countries.

In the government ranks we find some hon. gentlemen declining to support this budget. The hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea) the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) and the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler).

Mr. FORKE: There is the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond).

Mr. GOULD: Yes and the hon. member for Brantford. We have listened for two or three weeks to the lamentations which have gone forth from the sponsors of the protective interests in Canada, as to what would happen if changes were made in the tariff. The hon. member for North Waterloo—in whose constituency the city of Kitchener is located—both in his speech on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne and in his speech on the budget, lamented these changes and predicted that a very sad state of things would result to industry in Canada. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have here a press despatch which may be of interest in this connection, and which ends as follows:

Kitchener, Ont, May 4.—A price of 100.71 has been received by the city for a block of $258,000 debentures, the Dominion Bank being the successful tenderer. They range from ten to thirty years.

Evidently the Dominion bank, or those who tendered for these bonds in the city of Kitchener do not believe the tales which were repeated by the hon. member in this chamber. I would not ask for better evidence to the contrary than is given by these people who keep their ears well to the ground and know the actual financial conditions in Canada. They have faith in the city of Kitchener and prove their faith by buying its bonds above par.

Now I wish to make one or two references to the amendment of the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth). It seems rather unfortunate that the majority of the gentlemen to whom I have occasion to allude are absent from the chamber, but that is not my fault. I would not like to accuse the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg of playing politics, and yet I do not recognize in the speeches he has addressed to this House any advocacy of the principles embodied in that amendment. Nevertheless, for my part, let me say that I have on divers occasions spoken much along the lines suggested in this amendment. I know that I have supported amendments in this House along the same lines. I have been more or less active throughout the country advocating the majority of the principles outlined in this amendment, and I cannot see why, with the belief I have in these principles, the government should take an amendment to the budget in the sense that it is a vote of want of confidence. If I were to support the amendment it would be my explicit desire, as shown by my action, my action should not be regarded as a vote of want of confidence. If the government should not insist upon that principle or idea, I think that I could support the amendment. I also want to support the budget. I support the amendment simply because on principle I have always advocated such ideas in the past. I believe in the principle of taxing unearned increment. I do not want to go into the question to-night, but my mind goes back to the West where I see that this government and past governments have been obliged to spend millions and millions of the people's money to provide facilities for settlers who have been driven into the back settlements because the land speculator held the lands close to the railway. These huge expenditures have been forced upon the Dominion government because of the fostering of the individual who held land out of use close to the railway. That same land that was held out of use has obliged neighbours to live miles apart who should be settled closer together. We have taxed ourselves to build schools and roads. These vacant lands have been the homes of all the insect pests which agriculture has suffered from. And yet we have a government sitting idly by and refusing to tax the unearned increment of that land which has increased in value as a result of the activities of you, Mr. Speaker, myself and others here and there.

Mr. FORKE: You have a provincial wild lands tax.

Mr. GOULD: Yes, we have, if you take that into the consideration. The day will come when there will be a reorganization of the Dominion and provincial system, so that there will be no overlapping. But when land which was bought at three or four dollars an acre, is through your activities and mine, sold later at thirty dollars an acre, I say that is an unearned increment, and the state should step in and take a large proportion of the money, rather than allow speculators to take it away to a foreign country. That is what I mean.

I could follow the matter up and present the same argument in regard to terminal elevators, but I use that as a justification for the adoption of the principle whereby we may largely offset the loss we would have from the taking away of the tariff tax.

Again let us look at the sales tax. We will find all our manufacturing friends on bended knee to our government asking them to take away the sales tax. I am not such a strong advocate as to urge taking away the sales tax because I believe in the principle of a direct tax. It will necessitate education on the part of the people, but until we have more education and more understanding by the people of the principles of taxation, the result will not be accomplished in the manner it should be. We should have a system of direct taxation to supplant and not to supplement indirect taxation; then progress will be made in Canada, business will be carried on much better, people will pay more attention to the principle of government and Canada will benefit. Therefore I am not so anxious as some people are for the taking away of the sales tax. I want if relief is to be given let it come from the reduction or removal of indirect taxation. I think that would be much better.

I do not think I shall carry the story further. It becomes interesting to me and I feel like talking, but I have broken the ice and I have given expression to a few points that have a direct bearing upon the questions involved in this debate. If the people want more of the story they can find me in my office, or I would be pleased to discuss it with any hon. gentleman who wishes to pay me the compliment of visiting me.

Mr. L. W. HUMPHREY (West Kootenay): I feel that it is fitting that I should at least state my position in relation to the budget that has been brought down by the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb). Before going into the question that I would like to touch upon, I would like to associate myself with those who have directed kind words to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). I sincerely trust he will be soon restored to health, and that we may be privileged to see him again in this chamber.

It is not my purpose to go into details in discussing the advantages and disadvantages of the free trade and protection issue, or the advantages or disadvantages of this budget; but simply to express my opinion as to how the budget will affect my own district, and at the same time keep in mind how it will affect the whole Dominion. First let me say that, as I view this budget, it will appeal to the majority of the electors in the district I represent, and in my own opinion will result in a greater degree of prosperity in the farming, lumbering and mining industries; as the district I have the privilege of representing is given over particularly to farming, with some lumbering and a good deal of mining, I feel that what would be good for the interests I have mentioned would certainly be good for the whole district. It is very gratifying to have before us a financial statement of the Acting Minister of Finance, and to know that the financial condition of this country is as good as it is, and especially in the face of the organized system of propaganda that has been circulated in the country during the past six or eight months. As the province of British Columbia is now entering a period of prosperity I do not believe that this budget will in any way interfere with the future of that province, or have any detrimental effect upon any of these industries. I believe that there are many factors and conditions that affect the prosperity of a country outside of the tariff issue.

On some of these questions, that are of vital importance to the whole country, I should like to touch very briefly, and also endeavour to bring out a different view from that which has been expressed by some hon. members in previous debates. At the beginning of this session I believe that practically every member of this House was primed up to a certain extent with a system of propaganda which was spread throughout the country crying for economy and for every government to practise and to bring about a policy of economy in every way. Although I am in accord with the policy that has been brought to the notice of the whole country, I do not feel that I can be in any way stampeded into supporting a policy that I would believe to be one of false economy. No doubt as regards many forms of expenditure it will, perhaps, not be necessary to practise the most rigid economy, but at the same time it will be necessary to economise to a certain extent. My position in regard to the budget—and I should like to state my position now—is that I feel I can support the budget as it stands to-day, believing that it is in the best interest of the whole Dominion.

Some questions that I should like to take advantage of this budget debate to touch upon pertain to the whole of the Dominion, while perhaps, they have some small particular reference to my riding. The first question to which I should like to refer is that of immigration. In the past year, more especially than any other year, I feel that the present government have been putting into effect a policy of immigration designed to promote the future development of this country, and the few remarks that I propose to make now, I should like to direct to the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Robb), so that he, if possible, may profit by the experience that we are having in British Columbia. During the last session of this parliament, legislation was introduced in this House providing restrictions in regard to the Chinese and, in my opinion, that is legislation upon which the country can compliment the government and that will bring about effective restriction of Chinese immigration. We in British Columbia have a complicated immigration problem. We have the Chinese; we have the Japanese; we also have a mixture of many other nationalities, and in that connection I should like to draw the attention of the Minister of Immigration and Colonization to the class of settlers that we have through the interior of British Columbia, that at the present time are not complying with the laws of the province, that are not complying, as I believe they should, with the laws of the whole Dominion. This class of settlers to which I refer is termed the Doukhobors, if I may use that term. We have in the constituency that I represent somewhere in the neighbourhood of two to three thousand of this class of settlers, who came in some few years ago and settled under a colonization scheme. During the past few years they have isolated themselves in their own colonies. They have not complied with the laws of the province respecting births, deaths and marriages, and in the past year they have become a class of people that are continually filling our police courts and our civil courts more than any other class of people that we have in the district.

We, having had experience with different nationalities during the past few years, feel that these questions should be brought to the attention of the federal authorities, so that in some small way they may be able to profit by that experience in working out their immigration policy. Within the past three or four years these settlers have burned down practically every school that we have in the district, and although I am not here to place the blame upon any particular class, I am placing this upon Hansard so that the Dominion of Canada or some other part of this country may benefit by our experiences. In the district which I represent somewhere in the neighbourhood of eight or ten school buildings have been wiped out by these people, and it is a well known fact that this was done by no other class of people than the Doukhobors themselves. We feel that this is not a healthy condition for settlers to build up in any province, and that the Immigration department should endeavour not to bring in settlers that will produce this state of affairs. In British Columbia and, I believe, in every other province, we want a class of settlers that will comply with the laws of the province and of the Dominion and that, if possible, in time will assimilate with our people and become good Canadian citizens. As regards the constituency which I have the honour to represent, I feel that we are not receiving the class of settler that we should receive. I have stated, for the benefit of the hon. members, the position as regards our school problem. This is only one of our problems, and in that connection I would ask the House to bear with me for a moment while I place upon record a letter published in the Nelson Daily News under date of April 28, showing the situation of this class of settlers as applied to that particular district. This letter is sent from Brilliant, B.C., under date of April 25, 1924, and is as follows:

JOHN OLIVER, Esq.,
Premier of British Columbia,
Victoria, B.C.

Dear Sir:

Last Sunday night towards Monday morning, 21st of April a lot of buildings were burned in the Doukhobor colony at Brilliant, namely three schools and a small house of mine which was built on a rock about two years ago with beeautiful architecture.

At the time of a fire I was in the province of Alberta and had been informed by Brilliant office immediately after which I have returned to British Columbia. The indication is that the fire took place intentionally therefore I decided, dear sir, to inform you more fully regarding this matter what is going on in colonies of the Christian Community of Universal Brotherhood.

The spirit of socialism had widely spread in Europe, and the American continent in general, which passes in to middle perpetual principal of barbarity, robbery, and attempt on others' property.

The Doukhobors came from Russia with good principles and absolutely peaceful life, but here in Canada under the influence of the different character of settlers and circumstances so to speak a "free life" a different opinions were formed in the Doukhobor Society result of which three parties came out.

The first party which is under my control carries a name of "The Christian Community of Universal Brotherhood Ltd.," duly incorporated and although with big physical labour yet the people of this corporation are getting their subsistence and are arranging more or less on good terms. This party is upkeeping the principle, religion and customs which the Doukhobors have had in Russia.

The second party, this is the people who left the Doukhobor Society and have accepted the homesteads in the province of Saskatchewan and Alberta and became British subjects. These people had commenced to use meat as food, drink whiskey, smoke and chew tobacco. Younger people have started to buy automobiles, frequently visiting pool rooms and acquired all the corruptive civilized principles. Now this party is absolutely ruining in Saskatchewan and Alberta, leaving their land and are going to proletariat. It is quite possible that they will be good socialists. These are the products of the American free spirit.

The third party, although very small in number that left the Doukhobors Society under the name "Nudes" are absolutely anarchists acknowledging no moral laws, desire to work nothing, hatefully looking on all the cultured progressive arrangements such as good agriculture, orchards, and general adaptability of agricultural improvements, Such party, is under suspicion are the ones who is setting fire amongst Doukhobor colonies in British Columbia. I have decided to bring to your notice and respectfully ask you to remove this party from the nearby Community colony settlements, otherwise these people are threatening tc start burning up the good arrangement as possessed by the Christian Community of Universal Brotherhood such as jam factory, a factory which makes wooden pipes, sawmills, warehouses, and other buildings. If the government will not take quick action to remove these people to some other province then some night it may happen that they would set a fire for hundred thousands of cultured arrangements. These people under the name of "Nudes" have worked out a principle absolutely against the cultured arrangements. They understand that it was I. Peter Verigin, who had opened up the schools in the Doukhobor colonies and this is why they have burned my house together with the schools as accordingly their belief I am working together with the Canadian government, I am very much surprised that the setting a fire to the schools had been started sometime ago and the government does not take any steps what ever in order to punish the guilty one's in this process.

Now the same party declares and there is talk amongst the people that if the children will be taught in the dwelling houses then they also will burn such houses. To my regret I must inform you that all the schools at Brilliant will be closed because there isn't a single school that is left unburned. I cannot invite the children with school teachers to use the dwelling houses with the possible danger that these houses will also be burned by "Nudes" and if the fire should happen at night time then the people that live in houses can be burned. Please take the most suitable measures that you can set at earliest convenience.

There will be about twenty or not more than thirty of such people who are living around the Community colonies. The government could have arranged for them some kind of enterprize so they can work and keep themselves by their own labour. Just at the present these people are causing only a terror on the peaceful dwellers in the Christian Community colonies. Whenever there is a meeting in the Christian Community then these "Nudes" are getting in by force and are causing disorder, very often they are beaten badly for indecent actions, but I consider this altogether unlawful. The British Columbia government should take more cultured measures for removing these people from the settlement of peaceful inhabitants. If the government will appoint an inspectorate to pick out the "Nudes" or in other words Anarchists I will give exact list of names and surnames of such people.

I beg to remain with the hope that you will take quick action on my report.

Respectfully yours,

PETER VERIGIN,
President.

I have read this letter to the House because the question it refers to is becoming quite critical in British Columbia, and eventually it will have to be dealt with by the federal authorities. It is my opinion that the question should be carefully studied by those in charge of immigration, so that these conditions may not be duplicated in any other province. All we ask is that we may have immigrants whom we can assimilate and associate with and whose children can be educated with our children. Unfortunately in these Doukhobor communities to-day there are no school facilities and the people are broken up into warring factions.

I would commend the government, especially the minister in charge of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment (Mr. Beland) for the promise made a few days ago to establish the present bonus to disabled veterans upon a permanent basis. That message has been very gratifying to our returned men throughout the whole Dominion. During the past few years these veterans have been labouring under more or less disheartening conditions, and consequently they have been in a state of unrest, not knowing just how they stood in respect to their cost of living pension bonus. I believe many people are more interested in the welfare of our returned men and the widows and orphans of those who died at the front than in a good many of the questions which have been discussed during the course of this debate. It appears to me that it should not have been necessary for our returned men to maintain an expensive organization for the purpose of securing what undoubtedly the country generally considers is only their just due. I trust that parliament may pass legislation that will place our veterans upon a still better basis. It would be much better to give the benefit of the doubt to the returned men, establish them on a good percentage basis as to pension and eliminate a great deal of the enormous overhead in the administration of soldiers' civil re-establishment and pensions. It is only necessary to compare the returns brought down in this parliament and in previous parliaments to see that the overhead expenditure in connection with that administration is running enormously high.

I would like to touch briefly on a question in which I believe many people throughout Canada are interested to-day, that is, expenditure covering military and naval operations. I speak particularly of military services, and as one who, I say it very humbly, had some few years' active experience during the war period. I notice that there is a reduction this year in the military expenditures of $1,078,854.67. I am thoroughly in accord with that reduction. With all due respect to those who think differently, I feel that the time has come when there should be a change of thought and of policy regarding military expenditures and military operations. Some few years ago I was a great militarist; I thought that we could not go too far in our military expenditures. But after some four and a half years of practical experience of a varied character I am of the opposite view, and I commend this minister or any minister of any government who will proceed along the line of curtailment of military expenditure. I am thoroughly in accord with the position taken a year ago by the party at present in power that no action should be taken regarding military operations without the full consent and approval of parliament. Whatever action this government or any government of Canada may take in the future should look to the establishment of some permanent peace. I consider that the policy that we have worked on in the past has not been such as to make for permanent peace. The only way to attain that end is to take all possible steps to bring about disarmament, and speaking as I do from experience I wish to associate myself with those who are working along these lines. If steps taken in this direction go hand in hand with the curtailment of military expenditures, then by all means let us direct our efforts to that end with a view to arriving at some permanent peace policy.

Certain references have been made by some hon. members this session and in previous sessions, from which I desire to dissociate myself. I refer particularly to statements made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) and the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea). In connection with the question of what policy would be best for this country in view of agricultural, industrial and general conditions, many hon. members have stated in this House and out of it that the cause of the difficulties involved would be found in the amounts paid in wages. It is only fair to the railroad men throughout the country that I should state briefly another view of the matter. I listened attentively to the address of the hon. member for Sherbrooke and particularly to his reference to the question of railroad men's wages, the conditions under which they are working, and so on. I do not wish to deal unfairly with my hon. friend. Let me first, however, refer to the remarks of the hon. member for South Oxford in the debate on the Address. The hon. gentleman must have been under some misapprehension. I am sure he was sincere in the statements he made, so far as his knowledge went, but I may be permitted to make a few remarks in reply, based upon some twenty-odd years' practical experience in many different phases of railroad work. He suggested that on occasions the men deliberately aimed at getting time and a half of overtime. I may say that there is no part of western Canada where railroad men receive time and a half except in one class of service, namely, the switching service. On the eastern lines they do have a provision for time and a half after a certain period. The statement to which I refer was made on March 7, last, and was as follows:

> By reason of the fact that after a railway employee had put in so many hours, if he could delay a train service he would obtain pay and a half for the overtime. I know as a matter of fact instances where this has been deliberately done by the employees operating trains, particularly freight trains, in the province of Ontario. Hon. members can easily see what an incentive it would be to do something of that nature.

Now, I think that any official of any railway company and anyone connected with railway operation in Canada knows that there is no such thing as a man deliberately delaying any train for the purpose of compensation, and if such a case was brought to the notice of the officers, steps would be taken to see that it did not occur again. There may have been isolated cases, but certainly it is not a common practice, nor one that is sanctioned by the railroad officers and employees throughout this Dominion, and I am sure they would be very glad if the hon. member would draw such a case to their attention. In connection with the statement made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) in the early part of the session, I do not want in any way to take a mean advantage, but my attention has been drawn to his statement by so many different parties throughout the Dominion that I wish to place on record a reply to it that appeared in the Edmonton Journal under date of April 3rd last:

> Sir—It would perhaps be scarcely fair, on the subject of "the big wages paid to engine drivers, etc." (whoever that very compendious phrase may indicate) to expect too much from your evidently ill-informed correspondent, Emmeline Gibb Taylor, in to-night's Journal; seeing that only very recently Donald Sutherland, M.P., has been quoted all over Canada to the same effect, with much wild and wholly unauthenticated assertion about $5,000 and $6,000 salaries per annum.
> It does not seem to be understood that engine service on our railways is governed by seniority. I have myself nearly 13 years' rights as fireman and engineer, and the highest sum I ever made in one year is $2,326.65, and I have only once besides exceeded the $2,000 mark. What is known as the Chicago joint agreement is in force on Canadian, as it is on United States railways. This arrangement entered into by ourselves, restricts the monthly mileage of passenger men to 4,800 miles, and of freight men to 3,800 miles. This is to divide the work in order to help the spare men who cannot command a regular engine. Allowing for the very largest and highest paid class of engine running out of this city, and assuming that the engineman could make maximum mileage on that run, and lost no time throughout the entire year—a state of things which hardly could be and which I know as a matter of actual fact, is not done, the maximum results in passenger and freight service respectively would work out at $3,473 (four men only) and $3,210 per annum. The men who are able to command anything like these figures have reached this position after years of such service as in the opinions of those best competent to judge is not very adequately characterized by the word "luxury." When they get there I say that $5,000 per annum is impossible. There are certainly times when money may be made at a rate that might approach that figure if kept up for 52 weeks a year; wrecks, when men have to remain on duty until the road is clear, sleep or no sleep; snow blockades, when we have been stalled, without food, for 12 and 18 hours in a drift, and the very delay has necessitated turning the engine out again the moment she reached the shop; a rush of business, when men have been called for duty before their rest period had expired—all these are highly eloquent of "luxury"! So far as the class of spare men are concerned, however, (and we are a large class), this morning I drew a pay cheque of $82.35 for two weeks' work as engineer. This is not the highest I have drawn for such a period; neither is it the lowest. During this two weeks I have had to be within reach of the 'phone at all hours: if I miss a call, I go to the bottom of the list, and if delay thereby ensues I am held responsible.

When a wreck is narrowly averted, we often hear a lot about the "coolness and skill" of some engineer, and "the lives which hang on his vigilance and judgment," and so on; the same man is apparently a mere thief at pay day. The passenger man is often entrusted with half a million dollars' worth of equipment; so, likewise, the freight man, who is often required to make fully as high speed with valuable freight and with vastly inferior facilities for stopping in a hurry, if need arise.

The true answer to incompetent criticism is that railway officials, the best judges of the facts, have recently agreed on several American roads, to an increase in enginemen's wages. I suppose we shall be told that we have "used the club to them." Those who could say so only exhibit their utter ignorance of our methods of negotiation, the type of man by and with whom these are conducted, our general excellent relations with our officials, and, in short, can only demonstrate their entire incapacity to sit in judgment.

F. G. Roe.

Those are the conditions that exist, Mr. Speaker, and I am glad to have been able to make a reply to the statements that have been made.

Dealing for a moment with the remarks made by the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea) this afternoon, if I remember correctly, he spoke in almost the same language both last year and the year previous. A reference to Hansard leads one to believe that he was quoting from a previous speech that he made to the House. I do not wish to be unfair to him, but I am simply taking the record as it stands. I feel that it is my duty to reply to some of his statements, but first may I be allowed to quote what he said in this House in the budget debate of two years ago? This is what he said—Hansard, 1922, page 2316:

Now, I am not interested in the railways; I have not a dollar in railway stock. But I ship as much freight as any man in this House. I ask hon. members who criticise the railways and find fault with them: how are the railways to cope with this condition? The railways should be in a position to say to these men: "You must do thus and so, as you did before; conditions have changed; you also must change and come back to normal conditions." When a strike is called, who calls it? Mr. Carey of Indianapolis, or some other leader of an organization. In the election of 1911 we heard a great deal from our friends on the other side of the House to the effect that there should be no truck or trade with the Yankees. Well, so far as the Yankees running our railway system is concerned; so far as their dictating when and how and how many hours our men shall work and what pay they shall receive, I say it is time that we had no truck and no trade in that direction. We ought to say: "Hands off; we will run our own business."

I believe it is my duty to reply to the hon. member's remarks as quoted, as they are almost identical with his language to-day. I should like to state for the benefit of hon. members that the different labour organizations throughout Canada are no doubt international in their character but nevertheless their affairs are entirely in the hands of Canadian representatives. The moneys of these different organizations run up into many millions of dollars. The money collected from the Canadian members of these organizations remains in Canada and is invested here, it does not go to the United States. More than that this money is deposited in Canadian banking institutions. As to the officers of these organizations, let me say in reply to the hon. member for Sherbrooke that although our unions are affiliated with international organizations the officers, and those having jurisdiction over legislative and protective work, are entirely Canadian. Furthermore, we have no connection with the American bodies in respect to negotiations for higher wages or improved conditions—these, if we take the railways as an example are undertaken and carried out by Canadian representatives, with the entire approval of the men themselves. I feel that the amicable relations that exist to-day between railroad men in Canada and the officers of the different railways are as strong as they are in any other country in the world. The officers of the great railway corporations welcome the plan of collective bargaining, of co-operation on the part of the employees, and they also cordially receive any suggestions tending to bring about more efficient operation. My hon. friend should not be afraid—nor indeed any member of the House—of any labour organization that is conducted on sane and businesslike lines. That remark applies to the action of the rank and file of the members, and is equally true of the officers. It has reference more particularly to the organizations responsible for the negotiations between the railway corporations in Canada and their employees. The railroad men, to whom reference has been made by different hon. members, only want a square deal so far as their wages and conditions of work are concerned and, according to representations that have been made to me are only too willing to lay their cards on the table, and to have the questions at issue thoroughly discussed with the representatives of the companies in order to arrive at what may be considered the best solution of the existing difficulties. I believe that by having recourse to this plan of co-operation and joint consultation greater progress towards efficiency in railway affairs will be made than by any other method.

That brings me to a consideration of what attitude should be adopted in reference to the government of the day. Let me say briefly that where the people of the country have confidence in their government, and that confidence is not weakened by the carrying on of false propaganda, we can look forward to the future with greater confidence and with the prospect that it will not be long until a more prosperous and a happier day dawns for Canada.

Mr. THOMAS HENRY THOMPSON (East Hastings): At this late hour. I do not intend to take up much time. But a number of hon. members have spoken of conditions as they exist in their respective constituencies, and I should like to present some of the conditions that exist in the constituency which I represent and how the industries there are affected by the tariff. Before doing so I wish to join with other hon. members in expressing my regret at the illness of the right hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). May I be permitted to hope that he will soon be restored to his usual health and vigour and that before long he will be found occupying his accustomed place in this House.

I should like to consider for a few moments how the tariff affects the fluorspar industry in my county. For the benefit of hon. gentlemen who may not be aware of the fact I may explain that fluorspar is a mineral largely used as a flux in the production of steel. Prior to the year 1914 none or very little of the mineral was produced in Canada. The local market was supplied with 'spar imported from the United States and Great Britain. The outbreak of the war, however, led the Canadian manufacturers of steel to engage in the manufacture of steel for ammunition purposes and so a great demand arose in Canada for 'spar beyond the then existing capacity. The county which I have the honour to represent has large deposits of fluorspar, and the managers of the mines were able to open up and operate some of the mines and supply a portion of the great demand at that time. The mineral was shipped as far West as Sault Ste. Marie, as far east as Nova Scotia, and also to the United States. The quality of the mineral, I may explain, is of the very best and there is a sufficient supply to meet the needs of the Dominion. Fluorspar is protected in the United States but has no protection under the Canadian tariff.

In 1920 the operators of the Hastings mines became alarmed. They had a vision of what might happen. They got together, passed a resolution and forwarded the same to me. That resolution asked that the Canadian producers receive the same consideration as the producers of fluorspar in the United States and recommended that the government impose a duty on fluorspar entering Canada corresponding to that levied on Canadian fluorspar entering the United States. Surely that was not an unreasonable request to make. I may say that I took the matter up with the Minister of Finance at that time, and he promised that in the forthcoming revision of the tariff the matter would receive every consideration. The mine owners pointed out at that time that as the steel business would slacken, as it was bound to do in the United States, the supply of fluorspar would overtake the demand and that the old established and well equipped mines in the adjoining republic would dump their surplus production into Canada to the detriment of the recently opened fluorspar mines in Ontario. Fluorspar can be produced more cheaply in the United States than it can in Canada owing to climatic conditions. I should explain here that fluorspar requires to be washed, and in a cold climate such as we have in Canada that process is a very expensive one. Well, the fears of our mine owners were well founded. The United States raised its duty from $1.50 to $5 per ton. This practically closed the door to Canadian fluorspar, and as the result of not being able to ship the mineral to the United States—where they are able to produce more cheaply than in Canada—the mines in Ontario are closed.

When the mines were operating the Americans quoted prices so low that the operators of the mines in Canada could not compete. But just as soon as the mines ceased to operate and were allowed to fill with water and there was no competition in Canada, the United States raised the prices $6.50 per ton, which the Canadian consumer is now paying in excess of what he paid when our Canadian mines were producing. The people of the county of Hastings appreciated very much the benefits derived from the operation of these mines. All classes were benefited, the labouring class, the merchants and the farmers. As a result of the mines closing down the Canadian National Railways has lost the increased tonnage created through the operation of these mines. There were five mines operating within three miles of my home, so that I know something about the benefits that were being derived from the industry. The labouring men have had to seek employment elsewhere. A number have gone to the United States to work in the mines there which now supply the Canadian market. The merchants have been deprived of the business that came to them as the result of the operation of these mines. The farmers have also been deprived of the increased home market for their produce. Capital is idle.

We have also talc mines that have been operated steadily for the last 20 years. I believe they are the only talc mines in the Dominion of Canada, and they too have to meet very unfair competition, as the United States duty is 25½ per cent, while our government imposes a duty of 17½ per cent. As a result since the United States raised the duty, the mines have not been running to full capacity. A great many other minerals are affected in the same way. The budget of course puts mining machinery on the free list, but what good is that when the mines are closed down? These mines are closed down as a direct result of this government failing to impose a tariff equal to that imposed by the United States on our Canadian fluorspar. If that duty were imposed the mines certainly would be able to operate, but at present the fact that mining machinery is on the free list will not enable those mines to open up and operate. I believe one of the planks in the government's platform was the encouragement of the development of natural resources, and this is one of the natural resources of our country; but instead of encouraging the development of these resources certainly the policy of the government is to close them down and put them out of business.

Our farmers have to meet very unfair competition as a result of the high tariff wall against their produce, such as butter, cheese, eggs and live stock. When we take into consideration the enormous quantities of farmers' produce brought into this country, surely we will all agree that they have to meet very unfair competition. The chief market for the farmers' produce is the villages, towns and cities of Canada, and these villages, towns and cities are supported very largely by the factories and manufacturing establishments. These depend on the tariff for their prosperity. If the purchasing power of the urban community is doubled the home market of the farmer is also doubled, and if cut in half the home market is also cut in half. The farmers have been told that the tariff is responsible for most of their troubles, and yet after every tariff reduction the condition of the farmer has grown worse. A tariff policy that sends hundreds of thousands of the farmers' best customers out of Canada into the very country that has closed its markets to our agricultural products, and permits $78,000,000 worth of agricultural products to come into Canada under a very low tariff in competition with our Canadian farmers' produce, cannot be shown to be in the best interests of Canada, or the best interests of our Canadian farmers. These markets belong to the industrious people of Canada, and they must have a chance to produce profitably and abundantly.

I have nothing to say against our freight rates from the West, but I believe the lowering of the tariff, or free trade would work disastrously to Canada. I do not believe it would work out as they have anticipated. I think the same thing would happen as happened to the fluorspar industry in my district. I believe when our industries are destroyed, as they certainly will be if the present government pursue a policy such as they have intimated—which is alleged to be the death knell of protection—that the powerful organizations of the United States will get together and raise the price, just the same as they have on the fluorspar, and that our farmers will pay just as much for their implements as they did before. I would be in favour—and I am speaking for myself—of doing everything that I could to assist the farmers. I am in favour of the merchant marine being used to further their interests, and I am very much in favour of subsidizing the merchant marine to enable them to carry the produce of the farmer, flour and live stock at very low cost. I think flour especially should be carried at a very low rate so as to encourage the milling of the wheat in Canada and keep the by-products here for the Canadians. I believe this would lower the cost of production and in that way lower the high cost of living.

The hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill), the other night, spoke about the opposition favouring the big interests. I want to say just a word about the stamp tax. In my opinion, this government have favoured the big interests in connection with the stamp tax. Very soon after they got into power, they fixed the maximum amount of stamp tax at $2 on cheques from $5,000 and upwards. This, in my opinion, works to the detriment of our farmers. Most of the farmers deal through their cheese factories and butter factories in amounts under $5,000, and this tax turns over to the farmer four times on every transaction weekly in the sale of his butter and cheese. But the large broker, who is dealing in amounts of $10,000, $20,000, $30,000, $40,000 or $50,000, has to pay a tax of only $2 on those amounts. In my opinion, that works out in the interest of the big interests of which the hon. member for Pontiac speaks.

I am in hearty accord with the reduction in the sales tax, but I think the government should have gone a good deal further. The sales tax has not been removed from lumber and cement, building materials. If this were done, it would affect all classes. I believe in tax reduction that benefits all classes, and I urge upon the government to take into consideration the advisability of removing the sales tax from lumber and other building materials.

What Canada needs is a stable condition. With stable conditions, millions of dollars are ready to be invested in this country. During the last few years we have lost great opportunities, because capital is always nervous and will seek investment where stable conditions prevail. In the last two years we have had a government that has been talking about reduction of tariff, free trade, and during this budget debate we had the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) telling us that this budget sounds the death knell of protection and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) talking free trade. How can we expect capital to be invested in the industries where such a situation prevails? This action is certainly driving capital out of Canada.

There are many other subjects which I should like to speak on, but at this late hour I will not detain the House. I want to say, in closing, that, in my opinion, this budget will go down in history as the most iniquitous piece of legislation that has ever been forced upon an intelligent electorate.

Mr. EDWARD N. HOPKINS (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I have been delighted with this debate, not particularly with the arguments, but with the candour of the speakers. If there ever was a time in the history of Canada when we should have plain speaking, it is to-day, and I am going to try for a little to discuss the problems of Canada in a very plain way. I am naturally going to commence near home in the Canadian West, which is a new country. When the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), who, every hon. gentlemen regrets, is not in his place to-night, was making his maiden speech in the province of Nova Scotia, that great land to the West was a hunting ground for the Red man and a pasturage for the buffalo. No territory on this continent was ever developed with such rapidity as the Canadian West, and no other country ever will be in the future because it is the last great West. In the early days the farmers went into that country to solve a problem. They thought that problem was: Can we produce grain successfully west of the Great Lakes? After they had solved that problem, they found out that it was only the tail end of the problem; that they had yet to grapple with the real trouble and that is: Can we get a remunerative price for our product after we have produced it? We are well aware of the fact that we have to produce the grain, ship it across the whole continent and across 3,000 miles of water, land it on the hearthstone of the English farmer as cheaply as he can produce it and also compete with those not so remote from the Atlantic seaboard. In 1923, we produced in Saskatchewan, just in one of the provinces of the three, as follows:

Spring wheat	252,622,000	bushels
Oats	218,075,000	"
Barley	19,278,200	"
Rye	8,582,000	"
Peas	55,000	"
Beans	22,000	"
Mixed grains	944,000	"
Flaxseed	5,493,800	"
Potatoes	4,370,000	cwt.
Turnips, mangolds, etc.	585,000	"
Hay and Clover	425,100	tons
Alfalfa	16,000	"
Fodder corn	304,800	"

Livestock—	1923	Value
Horses	1,137,301	$59,931,000
Milch cows	403,813	15,645,000
Other cattle	1,131,274	24,133,000
Sheep	137,240	874,000
Swine	679,867	6,893,000
Total		$107,476,000

Let me give the values received:

Field crops	$248,778,000
Farm animals	11,912,000
Wool	142,000
Dairy products	19,366,000
Fruits and vegetables	2,461,000
Poultry and eggs	8,670,000
Fur farming	7,000
Clover and grass seed	103,000
Total agric. revenue	$291,439,000

That looks as if they were doing a little mixed farming. These are just a few of the figures, but the tragedy is this: We produce them without a profit and that cannot continue. The problem of the West to-day is to get remunerative prices for our products after we have produced them. What are we going to do about it? There are just two things we can do: We have got to raise the price of products; we have got to lower the price of the materials that enter into the production of those products. We are trying to raise the selling price of our products by co-operative marketing. I am very glad to say that the wheat pool is likely to be a success, and we have great hopes from it. The reductions in the tariff will to a certain extent also help us to produce cheaper, but those reductions are not enough. The problem of the farmer is—to get a remunerative price for his products. Something will have to be done to this end or he cannot continue.

We have been told that some of us in the West believe in class legislation. That is not so. Let me say that I represent a constituency in central Saskatchewan, one-half rural and one-half urban: Twenty-five thousand people live in the city of Moose Jaw, and twenty-five thousand live outside. When I try to improve conditions in the country I do not have to apologize to my city friends, for they look upon the farmer as their life blood. Before I came down here I made a survey of local conditions, and I will describe what I found. The city of Moose Jaw is sometimes called the "Mill City". I went over to the mill in the first place, and said to the miller: "How are conditions?" He looked up with that smile that never comes off, and answered, "Pretty good." I said, "Don't you want a little protection?" "Oh, no," he replied; "all we want is a fair field and no favour." "But." I persisted, "is there not anything you want?" "Well," he said, "I wish they would build that line from Mawer to Dunblane, and give the wheat and coal a fair chance to flow down to Moose Jaw in its natural channel, and so help the other end of the Canadian National. We have $200,000 to increase our mill to five thousand barrels a day; it now has a capacity of three thousand; and we will make this investment if that branch line is built." I said, "You are easy." Then I walked over to some of my wholesale friends. Moose Jaw is a distributing centre and has five or six wholesale grocery firms. I went to one of them and inquired of the manager, "How are conditions?" "Well," he said, "pretty fair; the buying power of the people all through the country is decreasing, but we are trying our best to buy in the cheapest markets so as to give them bargains. The great trouble, however, is that sometimes when we get a bargain the anti-dumping clause comes along and spoils it all. Get that dumping clause removed so we can secure something cheaper for our people." I said, "All right." In the city of Moose Jaw we have the headquarters of seven or eight large lumber companies, having from forty to one hundred and twenty distributing branches throughout the three provinces, and I thought some of these people could tell me pretty well what the conditions were. I went to one company and asked the manager, "How do you find conditions? You are getting letters all the while from your distributing branches, and should be able to tell me." He replied, "To tell you the truth, the buying power of the farmer is decreasing all the time". I inquired, "Anything I can do for you?" He answered, "Yes. Lumber is a prime necessity in this country to house our people, and if the government took the sales tax off lumber that would be a help." I told him, "Likely if the government have not forgotten they will do that, for nobody will object to it and it will be a great help to the people." Moose Jaw is a railway and mill centre; thousands and thousands of people there wear the overalls and carry dinner pails. I go to some of them and ask, "What is your problem?" They reply, "Well, we get fair wages, but with the high cost of living we can hardly keep our families and educate them." Then I go to the salaried people, and I find it is the same thing all the time—the high cost of living. It begins to get on my nerves, and I go over to some of our retail stores. I say to the proprietors, "Here, the trouble with this country is the high cost of living. They tell me you get one-third as much for passing your goods over the counter as the people do who produce them. What have you got to say about it?" They reply. "Well, we cannot help it. Look at the rents we pay. We pay $400 a month for this store." I said, "I will see about that;" and I go to the landlord. "Why do you charge the storekeepers so much rent that it aggravates the high cost of living?" He answers, "I cannot help it. Look at the taxes I pay." I walk over to the mayor, and say to him,"What do you mean by charging these taxes?" "Well," he retorts, "two-thirds of our taxes are not controllable; we have got to pay interest on our bonded indebtedness; that is the trouble." I begin to think this thing out. I see hon. gentlemen here from Toronto. One of them tonight said, "We have got a magnificent street railway system." Another of the city's representatives said a few days ago, "We have expended so many million dollars to fix up the waterfront, and so much on the agricultural building. What a wonderful city it is!" And it is a magnificent city. But the cities all over Canada are copying the example of Toronto. That is the trouble. Let me quote from a newspaper report which I read the other day. It is as follows:

> In sounding a note of economy in a report to the city council, finance commissioner Ross said, "It is not an extravagant statement to say that a sort of financial madness is over the whole land. As private individuals we are living beyond our means, as citizens we have spent without thought and mortgaged the city so heavily that we and our children will groan under the burden."

Now, all the things hon. members have been talking about in this debate do not touch the real problem. I hope I am wrong in the opinion which I am about to express. I hope that five years hence if any hon. member stumbles across to-night's Hansard and reads my remarks he will be able to say. "That man did not know what he was talking about." But I am going to put it to you straight and tell you what it is. All our life as business people we have seen one man get another man in an iron grip financially, and cripple him. We have seen that all over the country, and our comment has simply been, "That is only business;" and the world rolls on. But when a certain class of the people get another class in their iron grip and won't let go, in my opinion there is going to be a calamity. Now, I am going to tell you in as few words as possible what I think the problem is.

The problem is the great burden of debts that hangs over the people of the world like a cloud. If the year of jubilee would come, our supposed problems would disappear like the dew before the noonday sun. What is the result? A few of our people are struggling to pay the interest on their debts, which they cannot do; consequently the debt is piling up, while too many of our people are eating, drinking and making merry as a result of their toil. This cannot go on indefinitely. What is the remedy? The interest on these debts must be reduced to a point where the debtor can pay the interest on his debts and some part of the principal or he will become a slave to his debts. Let me give you a concrete example. At the close of the war the German Empire was the greatest debtor in the world. All the years since her creditors have been endeavouring by all means in their power to collect those debts, and they have not got very far. They have now agreed to accept an amount within the ability of Germany to pay, this amount to be fixed by a commission appointed for that purpose. If all debtors and creditors in the world would make their adjustments on that basis, I could see some hope ahead.

But what of ourselves? I do not mean the government, but every member of this House. We surely all have some responsibility. We have a heavy debt in this country considering the population, and we must remember that that is not the only burden our people are called upon to bear. Our provinces and municipalities also have heavy financial obligations. The cry of economy and retrenchment is in the air and I think it would be well for us to heed it. We in this corner of the House had little to do with the creation of our debt but we are very much interested in the matter and would like to see the debt reduced. The question is, how can it be accomplished? Business men would say, economise, cut down the overhead, take some of the advice you are giving so freely to our people; cut out the automobile, save gas, and come down a little nearer to the simple life.

[Mr. Hopkins.]

I notice on the order paper a resolution calling for the reduction of the sessional indemnity. I do not propose to argue that the present indemnity is too large, but I do say it would set the country a good example if we did reduce this indemnity, and I will have the greatest pleasure in supporting the resolution if it comes to a vote. It is generally conceded that we as a country are over-governed. A suggestion has recently been made that the membership of the Upper House should be reduced by about one-third. There is no doubt this could be done and the country would get as good legislation as it does today and a large amount of money would be saved. However the move to reduce the number of legislators is in the air, and I may say that a resolution to do this in Saskatchewan actually passed the legislature. We also hear it seriously advocated that the number of provinces in the East and West be reduced, and there is much to be said for this.

These are serious days, and the governments of the world are not facing the debt problem. These are not the days for the optimist or the pessimist. We want men of clear vision and stout hearts. If the creditors of the world will go on adding the unpaid interest to the debt and then demand their pound of flesh, we will only have two classes of people in the world. That great class that we are so proud of, which is commonly called the middle class, will have disappeared, and that would be a calamity. Government by party prevails in the world to-day; with all its faults we have never been able to evolve a better system. But I have often thought there might come a time when we could lay aside party consideration for a little and get around a common table for the country's sake. Has that time come? I think it has.

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) in his budget speech this year made it very clear that there are certain basic industries on which the prosperity of all others depends. Agriculture is mentioned as the chief of these. One thing must be apparent to all, even to those who have during the last forty-five years become somewhat stupefied by privilege—that before the manufacturing class can realize any benefit from a system of protection there must be at least a larger class that cannot be protected and is unprotected in every way. This class in Canada is the agricultural class. Did the agricultural class have the same privilege by law to fix the price of its product as the manufacturers enjoy, there could be no benefit to either. I take it from the words of the budget speech that the government has at last realized this fact, since agriculture is mentioned as coming in for more equitable treatment. But at no time has particular stress been laid by the party to which I belong upon the necessity for free agricultural implements as apart from everything else; in fact there may be an unfairness in singling out any particular industry for a cut in the tariff while the cost of living will be maintained at its present altitude. The agricultural implement industry has been in this position ever since the National Policy was inaugurated, and they know well what this means.

In the manifesto of the Canadian agricultural implement manufacturers as presented to the government they stress the idea on page 6 that if the tariff is taken off and their home market is open to competition their export trade is bound to languish and die, and they admit that the export trade was built up on the tariff when it was even higher than it is at present. Well, what is the inference? What do they mean by this statement? The inference is that the home consumer has been charged a price that ensures a profit over the whole of their sales, export and home trade alike. There is no other meaning to be taken from it, and the facts of the case bear out my deduction. They say they have never sold implements in foreign countries cheaper than at home, but let us see what the facts are. Any one who followed the events of Sir Wilfrid Laurier's visit to the West in 1910 cannot fail to realize the truth of the matter. If we take the Grain Growers' Guide of February 16th and August 2nd, 1910, we find that Ellis Mumford, Palmerston, Ontario, noticed on his visit to England in that year that Massey-Harris 6-foot binders sold for $130 with full equipment. At the same time he saw ploughs made in Canada selling at $3 less than the price in Ontario, close to the factory. The binder selling at $136 had full equipment and a tarpaulin cover to put over it when it was idle in the field. The price in Saskatchewan at that time was $160, or $164 for the privilege of two payments.

Mr. McMASTER: With tarpaulin?

Mr. EVANS: No, without tarpaulin. The Toronto Globe of August 5th, 1910, which had a representative with Sir Wilfrid when he made that tour, says:

> Talk to any man whether he be farmer, merchant, banker, or real estate agent, and he will inevitably revert to anathemas on the protective tariff and on the prices of implements in the different countries; he is loaded with prices and dates too.

Now the retail prices of implements as given by the firm of John Wilders, Hall Foundry, Reading, England, for the same year, on April 10, 1910, over the signature of Mr. Wilder himself, are as follows:

> Massey-Harris, 6-foot cut, $140.94; McCormick, 6-foot cut, $121.50; Deering, 6-foot cut, $126.36. The Saskatoon retail price at that date was from $160 to $164.

Also at that time Mr. C. H. Hart in the Grain Growers' Guide of October 26, 1910, stated that there was a difference of 30 per cent between the price of a binder in Manitoba and Dakota. Now these facts have never been refuted, and they suffice to show to what an extent the agriculturist has been exploited. But after all, be it said in fairness to the implement manufacturers in Canada, they have never indulged in this form of exploitation to the extent that many of our other protected manufacturers have done, and the worst offenders in this case have been those who have used the raw product of the farmer himself, such as wheat, oats, hides, wool, and so on. There has never been any relation practically between the price of wheat and flour, oats and oatmeal and rolled oats, wool and clothing, hides and harness, and so forth. The operators in these things have been the worst offenders, and our protective tariff has enabled our Canadian millers even to dump flour on the European market against the very best mills in the world, those of Britain and Holland, to the detriment of the price of the farmer's own wheat in western Canada.

To return to the implement industry, the late manager of the Massey-Harris Company told the Drayton Tariff Commission in 1920 that given free trade in the materials that enter into the production of their products, they could make as much money under a free trade system as they are making now. There was an utterance regarding our protective tariff by one of the best business men in Canada at the time. It is significant from the fact that here was one manufacturer who had at last realized that even did he want to make of this Dominion an industrial country, with big cities and tall chimneys, there was only one way of doing it, and that was to make manufacturing as cheap here as in any other country in the world. That is why Britain has led the world in manufacturing industrialism and civilization, during the last half century particularly. Anything in the way of a tariff that drives the cost of production out of line with world prices is bound to prove a boomerang even for those for whose benefit it was inaugurated. No Canadian exporter hopes to successfully compete in the world's market only as he relies on the price charged to the home consumer to give him a profit on the whole of his sales, domestic and foreign alike. There is no other meaning to be taken from the manifesto of the Canadian implement manufacturers, and it is the same with the rest of the manufacturing industries too. I say that this is a regular feature of the protective tariff, that the cost of manufacturing is driven to such a height in this protected country that the class that is unprotected is exploited by high prices to ensure a profit for the manufacturers at home and abroad.

Now I want to speak for a short time on on another feature of the tariff, a feature that throughout this country is not as well understood as it should be, and that is the dumping act. After the capitulation of the Liberal party in 1897 they soon became fast friends with their old enemies, and between them they evolved new methods to further the interests of the protectionists, or I might say, to further the interests of the paternalism of pelf, and in 1904 the dumping act was evolved. Now, just as the Tariff act was amended in 1922 for the sake of the British Columbia apple growers, so in 1904 the dumping act was added to the Tariff act for the sake of the steel industry of that time. The steel industry had not been long established, and notwithstanding the fact that they needed an anti-dumping measure in addition to all the privileges which they had enjoyed previously, the Canadian Steel companies are notorious to-day as the greatest dumpers of goods in the foreign countries of the world. At that time the people of Canada were paying $7 a ton bounty on steel rails in Canada, and this enabled them along with the tariff, favoured railway rates, exemption from taxation, and so on, which this country was giving them, to dump their rails at a price very much below the world's prices at that time. Let me give an instance. The Dominion Iron and Steel Company was dumping rails in the southern Punjab that year at $24 a ton, while for the government section of the Transcontinental railway in Canada the people of this country were paying for their rails, including the bounty, $39 a ton, at the very time this company was dumping their rails in India at below the world's prices.

Jacob Viner, in his book on dumping, relates how in 1910 the United States Tariff Commission received complaints of dumping by Canadian producers of even harness leather, sole leather and particularly lumber, while it is questionable if the agriculturists of any country were paying as high for these goods as we were doing at that date. Dumping is essentially a feature of a high protected country. There is no dumping in England. England never fears any dumping, and England does not engage in that nefarious practice herself against other countries. There was at that time no such law on the statute books of any other country in the world. In fact, it may safely be said that Canada has led the way in devising ways and means to fool the public for the benefit of professional politicians and privileged interests in the greatest system of legalized pilfering that the world has ever known. It is doubtful if any other country would have such a law on its statute books to-day if Canada had not set the example. It was not until 1921, that the United States enacted legislation which in any way resembles our dumping act of to-day. The five self-governing dominions of the British Empire also have a law of this kind following Canada's example. Now I think it is one of the greatest political incongruities in the world that history may record that the professedly free trade government of this country has led the world in protection or legalized pilfering. It is a shame. The anti-dumping measure enacted in 1904 by the Liberal government was put into force largely to offset the demand of the manufacturers at that time for higher protection. It was for this reason the anti-dumping act was enacted. By that time the politicians of both parties had placed themselves in such a position of relationship to and community of interest with the protected manufacturer that they could be dictated to, and could refuse only to their own hurt. Again, as Jacob Viner naively puts it, the manufacturer was the one important source of campaign funds for both parties. For that reason they have been able to exercise control over the trend of tariff legislation in Canada. Faced with this dilemma the government had to find some ingenious way of escape because about this time the Agrarian revolt was almost in full swing. So the anti-dumping law was placed on our statute books in the hope that it would please the manufacturers and fool the farmers into the belief that the government had resisted the demands of the manufacturers for a higher tariff. This surely is a most humiliating thing for history to record. Mr. Fielding declared at that time that all that was needed was a temporary measure to deal with a temporary condition. Twenty years have passed since then, and the dumping act has been so strengthened by amendments that it has become a more complete measure for price-fixing and eliminating competition than the original act itself. I want to state right here that a real reign of terror has been inaugurated by the Customs department, by the board that administers this act, and so effective is this court of the inquisition that none of its victims will dare to give information as to the treatment they have received, lest the screws be put on a little tighter next time, and the rack be screwed a little further. Indeed, the whole idea of the dumping act is to make it absolutely impossible to import goods of any kind. A paragraph in a letter from one of the great distributing firms in western Canada has this to say regarding the dumping act:

> The imposition of the dumping duty means we are trading in the dark not knowing just exactly what our costs are until after the goods are received and reshipped out, the duty in some cases being applied after we have even made collection.

Now, while in some years the duty collected under this dumping clause has not exceeded $75,000, yet we keep an army of inspectors in foreign countries to harass the exporters there, and to examine the books of the manufacturers to see that they are not falsifying their invoices. In face of this I ask is it any wonder that our foreign trade is falling off when we invite the foreigner in this way to treat us always with suspicion.

I am glad to see that the government has seen fit, on second thought, to cancel the regulation made on April 8, this year and restore the regulation of September 1, 1914. Coming as it did concurrently with the changes provided for in the budget it looked as though the manufacturers had again been satisfied that the budget provisions would not in any way hurt them. Here let me again state that changes of this nature should not be left in the hands of any one man or even a board to administer, more especially a board that is appointed with the sanction of those who are interested in tariff protection only. The dumping act is administered to-day in the interests of the manufacturers by a board trained by themselves, the head of that board being in former days a servant of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association as their tariff expert. I want to tell the House that no statutory regulations govern it at all; each case is decided according as they see fit and the exigency of the matter from the viewpoint of monopoly and exploitation.

As far as the consumers of this country are concerned the dumping act is a piece of galley-slave legislation, robbing citizens of their rights as such and giving a favoured few the right to exploit the rest of us. The old dumping act as redrafted in 1907 was surely bad enough, and gave the Minister of Customs wide latitude of privilege on the one hand while it permitted exploitation on the other. Our agricultural societies have for many years been discriminated against in its application, in that those who have had to administer it would not concede to co-operative companies the right to be classed as jobbers or dealers in any lines of goods they wanted to import notwithstanding their continuance in the business or the amount of goods they were buying. I maintain, as I have done before in this House, that in the matter of importations no government has the right to discriminate between one citizen and the other. If I can go to the United States, or any other country and buy from a manufacturer at manufacturers' prices, all that I should be expected to do is to pay the scheduled rate of duty on my purchases on entry into this country.

That is my right as a citizen and unless I am accorded that right I am not exercising my citizenship to the full as I should do. To-day the Minister of Customs can actually determine the purchasing power of the dollar of the workers, or the meagre earnings of the agriculturists, who have to shoulder the burden of providing for the protectionists' voracious appetite. The dumping act with these changes mentioned is the one thing to-day that stands between us and the lowering of the cost of living in this country and bringing the cost of production in line with world prices. My protectionist friends to my right and protectionist Liberals opposite wish to distract our attention from this to the state of Europe. Here, they say, lies all our trouble. Europe may be in the best state imaginable as to trade, but here is a measure that prevents the non-protected class of this country from coming in line to take advantage of any improved world conditions. I say it is at the bottom of all our troubles to-day. Abolish the dumping act now and next year you can abolish the bonus to the civil servants, and they will thank you for it. Abolish the dumping act and wages on the farm and in the factories and on the railways can be immediately lowered. Production will come in line with world's prices, and transportation rates will be cut so that the commerce of this country can move freely to and from the markets of the world. It is certainly a sorry business for a government to step in between one citizen and another and to say to one, "You may import on the manufacturer's invoiced price", and to say to the other, "You will have to pay a dumping duty, equal to the difference between the price you bought the goods for and the fair market value for home consumption in a retail way". The farmers of Canada have repeatedly tried to lower their cost of production by buying at first cost. When they could not do this in Canada there was nothing for it but to import. They have been met at every turn with the dumping act, and because they are not recognized under the rules of combine as jobbers or dealers they are by law denied the right to purchase except at retail prices. I have here a lettergram from one of my constituents who was assessed under the dumping act a large sum of money because it was charged that he had imported too cheaply some goods that had gone out of style in the country of origin. Just fancy our tariff board at the instigation of the manufacturers dictating to us what we shall wear, and what we should not wear.

Mr. SALES: It should not be left to anybody.

Mr. EVANS: Again let me say that I always thought the sales tax was a percentage on the transaction, but here again discrimination is practised, and the same lettergram states that the import sales tax favours the wholesale importer as against the retail importer. I think this is a state of affairs, when taken altogether, that is unbearable to a free people if they know the conditions. This country is in a position to-day of having a combination of politicians and privileged interests which have been formed, and they together have agreed that the cost of living shall not be lowered; in fact they have the power to-day to say what the standard of living shall be. The dumping act is a piece of legislation dictated by greed, with the one idea of creating a monopoly to control everything as to price which our people need to buy. It is slavery. I have made the statement that the dumping act as administered is arbitrary and tyrannical in its application. Not long ago a gentleman was sent all the way from Nelson, B.C. to Winnipeg to assess two cars of apples. These apples were of a class and kind not grown in Canada; but is it reasonable to bring a man 1,200 miles to assess a car of apples? I suppose if someone in Saskatoon happens to get a car of apricots next season too cheaply according to their idea, a man from Niagara will have to be sent up there to adjust it.

Mr. McMASTER: Were they Northern Spies?

[Mr. Evans.]

Mr. EVANS: No. I suppose if Vancouver gets a consignment of cotton from Great Britain at a price below what the Minister of Customs will consider a fair market value for home consumption, at the instigation of a representative, say, of Dominion Cottons Limited, somebody from Montreal will have to go 4,000 miles to adjust the duty. Is this the way to collect revenue? I think it is time the common people of this country inquired who Canada belongs to anyway, and for whose sake and for whose benefit its affairs are administered. Is the purchasing power of our earnings to be determined by the Minister of Customs with all these privileged interests at his elbow? The people of the prairies have to do without many things. They have to do without fruit to the detriment of their health because of the present protection. It is not too much to say that British Columbia could have found a sale for 1,000 cars of apples more on the prairies had the price been in line with the price of what we have to sell; and that would have been the case but for the duty and the arbitrary application of the dumping act. It is a sorry plight to which any country can be brought when the manufacturers and producers can set the price of their product, and have their exploiting tendencies recognized in the legislation of the land. This letter from the Western Canada Jobbers' Association has the following to say regarding this matter:

> The fair market value this year, for home consumption in the United States, as set by the growers in British Columbia on C. grade apples, was $1.10, and the jobbers were assessed 15 per cent on $1.10 because the apples purchased in the United States were purchased at a price which was more than 15 per cent below $1.10. If it can be proven that United States growers are selling for export to Canada at a lower price than for home consumption, then probably our industry should be protected. But we could buy good apples in Washington for 80 cents which was the price at which they were sold in the United States. Why pay dumping duty because the British Columbia growers claim that the growers in the United States should be getting $1.10.

I always thought that the meaning of dumping was that they were being sold for export at a cheaper rate than they were being sold at home. This is not the case, and yet the dumping act is being applied. Again this bears out the assertion I have already made.

> In Washington the cost of packing a box of apples is figured at 42 cents, everything included, while in British Columbia they figure their cost up to nearly 80 cents.

The trouble with the British Columbia apple grower is the same as with the manufacturer. By protection the cost of doing anything is driven altogether out of line. Relations between the British Columbia apple packers and the buyers on the prairies are very much strained. The prairie provinces will be glad to buy their fruit in Canada, but I would advise the producers or British Columbia salesmen not to antagonize their best market.

Some beneficial changes have been announced in the budget. The one great change that I want to see yet is the elimination of this dumping act, and until then the people of this country will not have the freedom to which they are entitled.

Another change which I should like to see is that all bounties which were granted last year to certain industries should also be abolished. Why should we give a bounty to what is called the artificial silk industry? It is protected under the ordinary duty relating to cottons, and cotton it is. Why should we also give to a rich company in this country a bounty up to a quarter of a million dollars for making their own copper or brass rods, while on all that the people will have to buy and use, they have to pay 30 per cent duty? Is there any fairness in this? Will any member on the government side, when he speaks next. tell us why they have to link up with all those industries by tariff, bonuses, and bounties? Why are the people shackled through the tariff in all their operations?

Let me deal with a few of the general remarks that have been made in this debate. A good deal has lately been said regarding the Laurier-Fielding tariff, and our protectionist tariff friends here have sighed for Fielding and his stability. As regards the Laurier-Fielding tariff, there has never been anything in Canada by way of a tariff that could rightly be called by that name, and the name of the Grand Old Man should not be coupled in this connection with it. The development of what I like to term as the "communism of pelf" reached its height, it is true, under the Liberal administration in the year 1906 or 1907. Despite the fact that Mr. Fielding was a member of the resolutions committee at the great convention in this city in 1893, at the tariff revision of the session of 1906-07, he piloted the Tariff Act through this House in the spirit of a Dingley or a McKinley. It is a noted fact to-day—and let history be fair—that the Prime Minister through it all was significantly silent. He was a disappointed man with his party. Being a free trader, he was disappointed, and through the whole piloting of that Tariff Act of 1906-07, Sir Wilfrid Laurier was significantly silent. The one thing that surprises us now is that Sir Wilfrid Laurier stayed with his party trying to please two factions, with a consequent stultification of his better self. But it is wrong and an injustice to couple his name with that of the Minister of Finance of that date as regards the tariff.

I was pleased the other day to see in a Montreal paper a statement by the Massey-Harris Company. I do not think I need trouble to read it as this House is pretty well acquainted with it. It is a statement that is calculated to create a better feeling between the different classes of this country. Let me read one part:

> The Canadian manufacturer of farm implements has been in a measure compensated for the loss of protection on the finished goods by modification of the customs tariff on the materials and so on which he uses. Heretofore, many material items carried a rate of duty greater than that which applied to the finished implements, and in this respect the industry was handicapped. The lowering of these duties, together with further adjustments just made, has remedied these inconsistencies and so far as the Massey-Harris Company is concerned, we shall endeavour to adjust ourselves to the new conditions and we will give to the Canadian farmer every possible advantage arising out of the changes made. We rely upon him to do everything within his power to stimulate Canadian industry by the purchase of Canadian made machines.

That is a significant utterance coming at this time. I would advise other Canadian manufacturers to show something of the same spirit.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: How much of a reduction will the hon. member expect in the price of agricultural implements as a result of the changes in the tariff? What reduction on a binder will be satisfactory?

Mr. EVANS: I could not say offhand what the appraisement of a binder is.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It is $280 or $300.

Mr. EVANS: It is more than that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The hon. member would naturally expect to have a reduction of as much as the sales tax would amount to.

Mr. EVANS: Quite that and we are promised even the reduction of the tariff. How puny are such statements made by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church), when he says that the present budget will close down our industries and that we shall lose the industrial supremacy we have. At page 1754 of Hansard he is reported as saying:

> The International Harvester Company can now close its doors in Hamilton and manufacture in Chicago. The money invested in Hamilton is just so much waste and the plant can now be scrapped.

I have heard it said that Hamilton is a city that was built by protection. All I say is that what has built Hamilton is what has destroyed the rural life of Ontario itself, to say nothing of the other provinces. In fact, our system of class privilege has destroyed at last the very foundation of our industrial and agricultural life. What shall be said of the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond), who says that although ploughing a lonely furrow, he will still do so with a Brantford plough? He will stick to his course. The trouble with our protectionist element is that they have been stupefied by privilege granted by law. They look upon it now as their inherent right. Protection at the best is a national imposition, any phase of it. Sir Richard Cartwright called it robbery by law, and robbery it is; but the pitiful thing about it at this late date is the fact that those who were given the privilege in the first place fail now to discern even that robbery is a sin. The only thing that hurts now is the fact that the pocket they have been accustomed to pilfer is empty.

I should like before closing to call attention to some statements of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens). I wish he was in his seat. In a most passionate speech the other day he undertook to tell us what was wrong with the country at this time. He said that tariffs should protect against a lower standard of living. Everyone in the party to which I belong knows that those today engaged in the basic industry of this country have their standard of living lowered by the tariff itself to the very limit of existence. In this connection, too, I would point out that the favourable balance of trade mentioned by the Acting Minister (Mr. Robb) is more due to the fact that our people have sold to the poverty line than to any general prosperity.

Now, the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) implied that our trouble is attributable to the farmers raising but one commodity—a most erroneous idea and made in actual ignorance of existing facts. His philosophy is terribly astray when he says that we should have a tariff that would give us advantageous admittance to the markets of other countries. Yet he deplored the fact that Canada bought $4,900,000 worth of goods from Germany! He said, "This is an evil." But we sold to Germany nearly three times that amount of goods. He also said that we could gain favourable access to other countries by a tariff. And he believed that we should treat other countries as they treat us. Yet when asked by an hon. member from this side if he would be willing to treat Britain,—free trade Britain—as she treats us, by giving her free entry to our market, he answered, "Oh, no, that would be an evil too." And this, notwithstanding the fact that over four hundred Canadian firms are to-day successfully doing business in Great Britain selling Canadian goods! But the protectionist mind is always a mystery. It has now become so callous as to demand a preference in the British market because we, in our erroneous idea of fair play, give Great Britain a nominal advantage only to climb our virtually inaccessible trade barriers.

The hon. member also says that we must protect our factories so that our railroads will have the tonnage needed to make them pay. It is surely a well-known fact that manufacturing can only be carried on successfully when the raw material may be had on a very short rail haul. This as things go is natural. I know a factory can function any old place under protection, but no one is able to purchase its output and live. Surely any Canadian who looked into this matter at all will know from experience that such is the case.

Again, the hon. member advocated a spirit of co-operation—national co-operation between the different classes. Now, this co-operation was never questioned so long as the agriculturist, like a faithful beast of burden, was carrying all the others on his back; but since he has lain down under the load the hon. member is crying to the government, "Give me a pair of new spurs." Failing that he says, "Give me a sword, for now I would slay thee," as Balaam said to his ass.

The hon. member deplores the fact that our iron ore is going to the United States, but he never dare hint—at the expense of spoiling his own argument—the reason why. I will tell him the reason. Those for whose benefit protection has been created have so driven the cost of working that ore altogether out of line with world prices that they themselves have no longer any confidence in their own policy, and instead of investing Canadian liquid funds in the Dominion, these funds are being remitted to other countries for investment in concerns competitive to our own. Then these patriots cry out at election times, "No truck or trade with the Yankees or any other foreign country." This surely is a new brand of patriotism.

The hon. member advocates that a protective wall be placed around the British Empire. What does he mean? This is nothing more than a protective scheme to embrace the whole British Empire and place its inhabitants at the mercy of an empire-wide combine,—similar to the combine which the people of Canada have been in the grip of for the last forty-five years. I say this country needs a change. Agriculture has been nearly choked to death by protection. Our protectionist friends tell us that all other industries are in an awful state. Protection is ruining agriculture, our basic industry. Our farmers have been delivered over to the tender mercies of those who by their wealth have power to secure legislation that can be called by no better name than that which the late Sir Richard Cartwright gave it, "Robbery by law". The woollen manufacturers tell us that their industry is about to fall; that the country is going from bad to worse. Our banks are tumbling one after the other; no one can tell what is going to happen next; there is no confidence in any of our banks. At the same time politicians in this House have successfully resisted any effective method of bank inspection.

What shall be done? The one thing to do to-day is to free the agricultural industry from the burden of protection. Take all protection off the cost of living and the cost of production. The farmers themselves then will redeem this country from the state it is now in. Production on the farms will be increased; our vacant lands will be filled up without any expensive immigration policy either; our factories will be busy again supplying goods for the country; and, best of all, there will be a virile contented population on the land, without which no country in the world can survive.

On motion of Mr. Hoey the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Graham the House adjourned at 1.20 a.m. (Wednesday).

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

BILLS TO AUTHORIZE THE CONSTRUCTION OF BRANCH LINES

Mr. FRANK CAHILL (Pontiac) presented the sixth report of the select standing committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines, as follows:

Your committee have considered Bill No. 38, an act respecting the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway Company, and have agreed to report the same without amendment.

Your committee have considered the following bills and have agreed to report them with amendments, viz.,

Bill No. 30, an act respecting the construction of a Canadian National Railway line between Rousseau and Laurent, in the province of Quebec.

Bill No. 46, an act respecting the construction of a Canadian National Railway line from Lloydminster, in the province of Saskatchewan, northwesterly 45 miles.

In compliance with the order of May 12, your committee have further considered Bill No. 40, an act respecting the construction of a Canadian National Railway line to Mile 41 of the Melfort branch near Nipawin in the province of Saskatchewan, and have agreed to report the same with further amendments.

With regard to the last mentioned bill, your committee beg to recommend that the title be changed to read as follows: "An act respecting the construction of a Canadian National Railway line either to Mile 41 near Nipawin or in a northeasterly direction to a point in Township 48, Range 13, west of the second meridian, in the province of Saskatchewan."

All of which is respectfully submitted.

BANKING AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE

LEAVE TO SIT WHILE HOUSE IN SESSION

Mr. THOMAS VIEN (Lotbiniere) presented the fifth report of the select standing committee on Banking and Commerce, as follows:

Your committee recommend that leave be granted them to sit while the House is in session.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

Mr. VIEN moved that the report be received and concurred in.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, if these motions are to pass as they have been passing, granting large committees one after the other power to sit while the House is in session, the House itself will become a mere formality. It would seem to me it would have been better had the committees commenced work sooner, and not now be usurping the time of parliament. I do not like consenting to so many committees sitting while the House is in session.

Mr. VIEN: I may say that this motion met with the same objections in the Banking and Commerce committee. It is not the intention, so far as I can judge, to sit while the House is in session, except in exceptional cases. The committee, under the powers that were granted to it, have summoned witnesses from Washington and New York, the presidents of banks and experts on financial matters, and they have felt that it would be quite unfair for these gentlemen, who are very busy, to sit only from eleven to one o'clock and then keep them waiting over until the committee sits the next day. Therefore, we have asked the privilege to sit while the House is in session, but I think it is the general consensus of opinion in the committee not to abuse that privilege but to exercise it only out of regard for these gentlemen who are being summoned to appear as witnesses, and who are coming here, not compulsorily, but quite voluntarily.

Mr. L. H. MARTELL (Hants): Mr. Speaker, I should also like to call your attention to this fact, which I think is very pertinent, that often many committees are called to meet at the same hour and hon. members in many cases are members of several committee. I think that is most unfair, and the matter should be looked into with a view to finding a time for the committees to meet so that hon. members can attend the various committees of which they are members, instead of having three or four committees meeting at the same time, which makes it impossible for the members to attend some of the committees.

Mr. VIEN: Mr. Speaker, I was going on to state when I was interrupted by my hon. friend, that some of the witnesses have expressed in their telegrams a desire to be able to return home the very same day. I might mention, for instance, Mr. Skelton Williams, who was formerly Comptroller of the Currency in the United States, and now of Richmond, Virginia. He was very willing to come voluntarily to give evidence before the committee, but at the same time he expressed a desire to be able to return home on the same day if possible.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not a member of the committee, Mr. Speaker, but I must be permitted to doubt the wisdom of the initial step of the committee in having witnesses come from the ends of the earth to advise us on banking matters. Still, it has been done, and as apparently it is only the intention to utilize the time of the House to hear these witnesses I withdraw my objection

Mr. SPEAKER: By unanimous consent.

Motion agreed to.

A. Hanna and 25 others of the Methodist Church at Port Carling, Ont. —Mr. Stewart (Leeds).

On the petitions being presented:

Mr. A. R. McMASTER (Brome): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order, whether it would not be possible to have these numerous petitions for and against Church Union placed on the Table of the House, to have them appear in Hansard the next day, and thus save some very valuable time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. SPEAKER: The members are at liberty to do exactly what the hon. gentleman has just suggested, but they also have the privilege, if they so desire, of reading the petitions from their seats. Of course, it would save much valuable time if the petitions were simply handed into the Clerk of the House. They appear in the Votes and Proceedings the next day.

Mr. THOMAS SALES (Saltcoats) thereupon laid a petition upon the Table.

In addition to this he reported on the opportunities for improving the company's position and securing additional freight, passenger and express business.

2. The sum in question had nothing to do with Hotel Scribe and, as indicated in the answer to question No. 1, was compensation paid to Mr. Aronovici for the services described during the period mentioned.

3. No information.

4. With the owners.

5. Question not understood. Mr. Aronovici was on salary from April 15, 1923, to December 31, 1923.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

OPIUM AND NARCOTIC DRUG ACT—PAYMENT OF MOIETIES

Hon. Mr. STEVENS:

For a return showing particulars of all moieties paid through the office of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in Vancouver and Victoria, in connection with the administration of the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, setting forth to whom paid and date of payment.

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): This resolution and the two following ones, were on the order paper the other day, together with a number of other resolutions. My hon. friend was absent and the other resolutions were carried by the House. I have to object to the passing of this resolution as well as to the two others which follow. It is not in the public interest to give the names for which my hon. friend is asking. As I said the other day, the administration of the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act is a very difficult task, and it would make the work of the police more arduous to publish the information asked for. I repeat that I have to object to the passing of these resolutions.

Mr. MARTELL: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Is the resolution dropped?

Mr. STEVENS: I have no desire to drop these resolutions. If the government refuses to allow them to pass they must take the responsibility.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the resolution dropped or does it stand?

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Speaker, may I speak to the point of order? The point I raise is this: A motion of this kind is non-debatable but if the government object to it they must take the responsibility of rejecting the motion. I am not asking the privilege of debating the motion, I am merely presenting it for the consideration of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried:

Some hon. MEMBERS: Lost.

Mr. SPEAKER: Lost on division.

OPIUM AND NARCOTIC DRUG ACT—REPORT OF COMMANDANT OF R.C.M.P.

Hon. Mr. STEVENS:

For a copy of the report of the officer commanding the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, dated about January 4th, 1922, to the Minister of Justice or the Department of Justice, alleging that certain individuals, including customs officers, were implicated in the smuggling of drugs, together with copy of all correspondence in connection therewith.

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE: I have to offer the same objection to this resolution. The information contained in this report by an officer of the mounted police to the Minister of Justice is of a very confidential nature, and it would be against the public interest to make it public.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion? Lost on division.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

OPIUM AND NARCOTIC DRUG ACT—VIOLATIONS

Hon. Mr. STEVENS:

For a copy of all reports received from the officer commanding the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, Vancouver, regarding the violation of the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, during the years 1920 to 1924, inclusive.

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE: My reason for objecting to this resolution is that in many cases such reports contain the names of persons who are only suspects and, perhaps it is found out afterwards that they may not be guilty. It would not be fair to make such reports public. On the other hand, when a person is subsequently found guilty of infraction of the act, the making public of the information which led to the apprenhension of the guilty person would render the subsequent work of the police officers more difficult. It is against the public interest to disclose such reports.

Mr. STEVENS: I would not ask for that class of information. That could easily be deleted from the report. It is the general report which is asked for in this particular motion.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is "a copy of all reports received from the officer commanding the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, Vancouver, regarding the violation of the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act."

Mr. STEVENS: The minister could delete from the report what he regards as against the public interest to disclose.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Perhaps my hon. friend will allow his resolution to stand and we may find a solution possible.

Mr. SPEAKER: The resolution stands.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS AND MERCHANT MARINE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. MEIGHEN: I should like to ask the Minister of Railways if he has yet received the annual report for 1923 of the Canadian National Railways, and the Canadian Government Merchant Marine?

Mr. GRAHAM: The report of the merchant marine is not yet to hand. An advance copy of the railway report is at hand. I hope in a few days to lay on the Table a copy for each member of the House.

REMUNERATION TO INFORMANTS

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. MARTELL: In reference to resolution No. 25 which stands in my name, can the Prime Minister tell me when I will have an opportunity of discussing before the House the question of paying to informants a moiety of the fines imposed in the cases referred to in the resolution.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the resolution has been called a number of times when the hon. member was not here.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE ACTING MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Tuesday, May 13, the debate on the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Acting Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into committee of Ways and Means and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Woodsworth.

Mr. R. A. HOEY (Springfield): Before undertaking a discussion of the proposals submitted by the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) in his annual budget, and the subject matter relevant thereto, there are one or two matters, perhaps of minor importance, with which I would like to deal. The first, Mr. Speaker, is a letter by Mr. John Stuart Mill quoted in the course of this debate by the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) with the object of showing that that eminent authority, at a certain stage in his career at least, was in favour of a protective policy provided the conditions were not normal and the circumstances somewhat unusual. I have in my hand The Letters of John Stuart Mill, edited by Hugh Elliot. In the second volume at page 27 appears a letter written by John Stuart Mill to a friend in Australia, in which he seeks to explain just what he had in mind in his former communication and places his own interpretation thereon. The letter is brief, and I should like to quote it in full:

> I have just received your letter dated 25th February. It is a great compliment to me that my supposed opinions should have had the influence you ascribe to them in Australia. But there seems to have been a considerable degree of misunderstanding about what they are. The fault probably lies with myself in not having explained them sufficiently. I have entered rather more fully into the subject in the new editions published this spring, but not to give you the trouble of referring to them, I can have no difficulty in saying that I never for a moment thought of recommending or countenancing in a new colony more than elsewhere a general protective policy or a system of duties on imported commodities, such as that which has recently passed the representative assembly of your colony. What I had in view was this: If there is some particular branch of industry not hitherto carried on in the country, but which individuals or associations possessed of the necessary capital are ready and desirous to naturalize; and if these persons can satisfy the legislature that after their workpeople are fully trained, and the difficulties of the first introduction surmounted they shall probably be able to produce the article as cheap or cheaper than the price at which it can be imported, but that they cannot do so without the temporary aid either of a subsidy from the government or of a protecting duty; then it may sometimes be a good calculation for the future interests of the country to make a temporary sacrifice by granting a moderate protecting duty for a certain limited number of years, say ten or at the very most twenty, during the latter part of which the duty should be on a gradually diminishing scale, and at the end of which it should expire. You see how far this doctrine is from supporting the fabric of protectionist doctrine in behalf of which its aid has been invoked.

There is just another quotation which is very brief. This letter was written to the New York Liberal Club. In response to a hint from the secretary, Mr. Mill responded by a letter on protection as follows:

> I hold every form of what is called protection to be an employment of the powers of government to tax the many with the intention of promoting the pecuniary gains of a few. I see the intention, because even that desired object is very often not attained, and never to the extent that is expected, but whatever gain there is is made by the few and them alone, for the labouring people employed in the protective branches of industry are not benefited. Wages do not range higher in the protected than in other employments; they depend on the general rate of the remuneration of labour in the country, and if the demand for particular kinds of labour is artificially increased the consequence is merely that labour is attracted from other occupations, so that employment is given in the protected trades to a greater number but not at higher remuneration. The gain by protection, when there is gain is for the employers alone. Such legislation was worthy of Great Britain under her unreformed constitution when the powers of legislation were in the hands of a limited class of great landowners and wealthy manufacturers. But in a democratic nation like the United States it is a signal instance of dupery, and I have a higher opinion of the intelligence of the American many than to believe that a handful of manufacturers will be able to retain by fallacy and sophistry that power of levying a toll on every other person's earnings, which the powerful aristocracy of England, with all their political ascendancy and social prestige, have not been able to keep possession of.

The next quotation was one referred to a few days ago. It was ascribed to the venerable American statesman, Abraham Lincoln, which ascription I contend has absolutely no basis in historic fact. This quotation played a very important part in the campaign of 1921. There was scarcely a Conservative committee room, Mr. Speaker, in the city of Winnipeg in which this quotation was not displayed in large and conspicuous letters. I challenged its authenticity then, but I little thought that I would ever be called upon to challenge such a pseudo-quotation on the floor of the Canadian parliament. I have in my hand the Journal of Economics published by Harvard University, volume 28, 1913. On page 18 in that volume there is an article by Professor Taussig entitled; "Abraham Lincoln on the tariff —A Myth." Those who have followed the campaign literature on the tariff during recent years will have become familiar with a phrase attributed to Abraham Lincoln. The following version is taken from Curtiss's Industrial Development of Nations, 1912, a pretentious three-volume publication, in which are collected indiscriminately all sorts of protectionist arguments. Under a portrait of Lincoln this is printed:

> I do not know much about the tariff, but I know this much, when we buy manufactured goods abroad, we get the goods and the foreigner gets the money. When we buy the manufactured goods at home, we get both the goods and the money.

No reference is given by Curtiss to Lincoln's writings: nor is such a reference given in any place where I have found the phrase quoted. A careful examination of the various editions of Lincoln's published works brings to light nothing that remotely resembles it. There is nothing in either of the two editions of his writings put together by Nicolay and Hay, nor is there anything in the so-called Federal edition. Nicolay and Hay's Life yields nothing of the sort, nor does any of the biographies. So with Lincoln's Speeches in Congress and his Messages to Congress.

Now, what is the history of the phrase? The very first mention which we have found is 1894, in the American Economist, a weekly protectionist sheet published in New York. In that periodical for June 29, 1894, the quotation is given as having been copiel from the Independent of Howard, Illinois, of June 9, 1894:

Then Professor Taussig concludes his article with this statement:

> It seems certain that the phrase is apocryphal. There is no evidence that Lincoln ever used it. Further search may show just how it originated. Possibly the claptrap about the goods and the money, was invented before it was foisted on Lincoln; possibly it was ascribed to him at an earlier date than the first here noted (1894). By dint of repetition it has come to be associated with Lincoln almost as much as the cherry tree is associated with Washington. So crude is the reasoning (if such it can be called), so vulgarly fallacious is the antithesis, that we must hope that it will cease to be invested with the sanction of a venerated name.

Then there is an interesting foot note:

> Since this note was prepared, my attention has been called to a letter of Mr. Horace White's in the New York Evening Post of April 10, 1914. Mr. White points out that nothing like the oft-cited passage is to be found in Lincoln's writings, and pungently concludes: 'My reason for thinking that Lincoln never said this is that he was not a fool.'

Following Professor F. W. Taussig's article in the Quarterly Journal of Economics, a writer in the Boston Transcript, Mr. Calvin W. Lewis, followed up the clues. He found that although there was no Howard Independent, there was a Harvard Independent published at Harvard, Ill., and in the issue of that paper for June 9, 1894, he found the passage that had been quoted by the American Economist.

The next question was: Where did the Harvard Independent get it from? In the works of Colonel Ingersoll, there is an oration on Lincoln which bears the date 1894. The orator in that speech says:

> It is better for Americans to purchase from Americans even if the things purchased cost more. If we purchase a ton of steel rails from England for $20, then we have the rails and England has the money, but if we buy a ton of steel rails from an American at $25, the American has the rails, and the money both.

This, it will be noticed, differs from the Lincoln saying, in that the English price is given at $20, and the American at $25. Ingersoll does not quote this statement. It is his own argument. There is now no doubt whatever that the Harvard Independent mixed up Ingersoll and Lincoln. There is not a shadow of excuse for those who are now misusing a great and venerable name for mere selfish ends. It has been abundantly proved that Lincoln never used the words attributed to him by protectionists, both in the United States and Canada, and it is worthy of note that the Republican party has now absolutely ceased to use or recognize this pseudo-quotation.

These arguments, coming as they do from time to time and irritating one beyond measure, indicate the straits to which hon. gentlemen are driven in an attempt to defend a policy that is as archaic as the old ox cart The older the ox cart, the louder the squeak. I have been interested, indeed, I might say astounded, at times by the amount of time taken up by hon. members in an attempt to show that the tariff is one of the chief factors, if not the chief factor that is likely to make for industrial stability and, consequently, for industrial progress. In these expostulations they choose invariably as their text a statement made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) in his budget speech of last year. I have no desire to quote the statement; it has been quoted again and again and again, and some hon. members seem to derive a great deal of comfort from even the repetition of it. First of all, let me say that when the Minister of Finance made that statement, in my humble judgment, he meant exactly what he said. That is to say, he meant that the tariff schedules as then revised were, in his judgment, moderate; that in the interests of Canadian industry they should be allowed to remain, with one or two minor changes, just as they then were. I sat opposite or almost opposite to the Minister of Finance when that statement fell from his lips, and I thought of another statement to which the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw) referred, the statement made by Mr. Bonar Law when he took over the reins of office in Great Britain and promised the people a period of tranquility. He failed to bring about that condition, though he gave his life in a heroic attempt. I thought of the last presidential election in the United States when the great issue was won between idealism and normalcy; the forces that stood for the re-establishment of normal conditions proved victorious, and a great leader gave his life in an attempt to bring about normal conditions, but he failed. The truth of the matter is that mere pronouncements, even though they fall from the lips of eminent men, are meaningless if such pronouncements cannot be reconciled or brought into harmony with fundamental economic laws. But the statement at its best was the statement of a Minister of Finance attached to a government in a minority. To be carried out, that statement would involve, on the part of the government of which he was a member, the violation of the sacred pledges upon which they were elected. I should like to ask in all sincerity: Do the manufacturers of this country or hon. members to my right, want that pledge fulfilled by the violation of sacred pledges, by the refusal on the part of the government to carry out a programme upon which they were elected? So it seems to me that the supreme and paramount question is: Is the government going to be responsible to the will of the people in this country, a majority will, or obedient to a minority in this House? Let us ask for a moment: Is industrial stability desirable? I do not think there can be any division of opinion on that subject; industrial stability is desirable. That being so, what are the factors that contribute thereto, and what part does the tariff play therein? Well, it seems to me that we can determine with a fair degree of accuracy just what these contributory factors are in the matter of industrial stability. First of all, industries must have immediate access to a normal and uniform supply of raw material, and they must have up to date machinery, which in my judgment should enter the country at this stage free of duty. They should have also a normal supply of labour, the cost of which will always depend on the purchasing power of the employee's dollar. They should have, further, executive skill, coupled with the most efficient management. And then there is a factor most important of all: Before you can have industrial stability in this country you must have a measure of stabilization so far as the purchasing power of the people is concerned. And that factor is one almost wholly beyond our control. Let me take this illustration, which I draw from western Canada, inasmuch as I am more familiar with conditions there. A certain acreage is sown to wheat in the province of Manitoba in a given year. Harvest time is approaching, and the crop experts estimate that the harvest will yield 35 bushels No. 1 Northern to the acre. Just about eight days before the time of reaping, evidences of rust appear, bringing dismay with them. Climatic conditions rapidly promote the development of this defect, and that crop, valued at approximately one hundred million dollars, is cut down to forty million dollars; the estimate of 35 bushels to the acre, No 1, dwindles to 12 bushels of feed wheat, which does not come within the commercial classifications at all. Now, I want you to think for a moment of the effect of such a failure—and such failures are periodical. I want you to think of its effect first of all, on the primary producer from the standpoint of his stability. His municipal taxes remain the same; his overhead charges remain approximately the same; his labour costs remain the same. I want you to think, in the second place, of the effect upon certain grain companies, with whom we do not sympathize very frequently in this House. A company has, say, three or four hundred country elevators designed and built to handle a maximum crop and in which they have hundreds of thousands of dollars invested. It has also terminal elevators in which millions of dollars are tied up. And these elevators, I say, are designed to handle, and handle efficiently and with the greatest despatch, a maximum crop. Yet they are forced to be content with a minimum production. Then I want you to think of the effect on our transportation companies, its reflection in higher or lower freight rates. And last of all, but not least, I want you to think of the effect of such failures on our eastern manufacturers in that the purchasing power of the agriculturist is, at least temporarily, demoralized. But, say my hon. friends, the fact that we cannot stabilize all industry in this country is no reason why we should not attempt to stabilize such industries as are capable of stabilization. And that sounds plausible. But my contention is this, that any attempt to stabilize such industries in an absolute sense will not mean stabilization but will mean utter stagnation. Is there any manufacturer with any grey matter in his skull who can be discovered anywhere in Canada, and who is not talking mere political piffle, who will sit down beside me and contend that the tariff is the chief factor today? Will such a man contend that the tariff, in this stage of our development, and in view of the fact that we have no power over the tariff schedules of other countries—tariff schedules that may at any time react disastrously against them—is there, I ask, any manufacturer who will sit down here and contend that the tariff is the chief factor that is likely to contribute to his progress or militate against his success? I do not think that, apart from politics, such a manufacturer can be discovered. But I go further. Is there any agriculturist to-day who is honest and who is not playing politics who, at this stage in the development of his industry, and having surveyed all the conditions, will sit down and argue that the tariff is, in his case also, the chief factor that is likely to contribute to his success or otherwise? That it is a factor we all agree; that it enters into the conditions no one will dispute; it is the one factor perhaps for which there is the least justification. But it is not the only factor. Why, then, is the tariff emphasized and re-emphasized? Why does it occupy such a position in these discussions from time to time? Well, politicians always have had and always will have a rallying cry, something around which to wage battles, sham and real. Personally I emphasize the tariff because I believe that Canadian civilization is peculiarly and distinctly British; and because it is peculiarly and distinctly British the Canadian people will never remain reticent, will never labour without protest, so long as there is in this country a system of taxation that extends benefits to the few at the expense of the many. I say, being peculiarly and distinctly British, we concede the right to any government to impose taxes from time to time; but we contend also, while making that concession, that it is the prerogative and the duty of the government to prevent the governed from taxing one another.

Mr. LADNER: Would the hon. member therefore entirely eliminate the tariff?

Mr. HOEY: I am coming to that.

Mr. LADNER: Would he do it immediately?

Mr. HOEY: Nothing irritates me so much as the impression I get, perhaps from inference, that the Canadian people have not the right at any time to sweep away tariff privileges. Since when did

4 p.m.

Britishers claim property rights in privileges? And so, it seems to me that the issue that is becoming more clearly defined in this country is not an issue between protection on the one hand and free trade on the other; the very exigencies of the moment, the financial demands of our treasury, are forcing us to adopt a revenue rather than a protective tariff. The question may be asked, what is the difference? The hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) usually interrogates at this stage in an honest attempt to get a clearly outlined definition of just what a revenue tariff is. Let me say that adequate protection, as I see it, means all the protection that manufacturers in your constituency may demand from time to time. A revenue tariff is all that should be extended to them in the interests of national justice and national progress. Let me put upon the pages of Hansard this definition of revenue tariff:

> Protective tariffs differ from revenue tariffs in their object, which is not so much that of obtaining revenue as that of protecting home producers from the competition of imported commodities. The two objects, revenue and protection, are not merely distinct, but antagonistic. The same duty may raise some revenue and give some protection, but, past a certain point at least, in proportion as one object is secured the other is sacrificed, since revenue depends on the bringing in of commodities; protection on keeping them out. So the same tariff may embrace both protective and revenue duties, but while the protective duties lessen its power of collecting revenue, the revenue duties by adding to the cost of home production lessen its power of encouraging home producers. The duties of a purely revenue tariff should fall only on commodities not produced in the country; or, if levied on commodities partly produced at home should be balanced by equivalent internal taxes to prevent incidental protection. In a purely protective tariff, on the other hand, commodities not produced in the country should be free and duties should be levied on commodities that are or may be produced in the country.

Do. hon. gentlemen to my right advocate the abolition of all duties on commodities that are not manufactured in this country?

> And, just in proportion as it accomplishes its object, the less revenue will it yield.

That, to me, Mr. Speaker, is the issue that we are attempting to define at this day in this Chamber and throughout the country.

I said a moment or two ago that industrial stability had a vital and direct relationship to the prosperity of the western agriculturist. I want to read from a document prepared by a man whom you cannot describe as a Progressive no matter how you attempt to stretch your imagination. He says:

Never overlook what the fact is, that the source of all wealth is original Mother Earth. That is why the railroad owner, the railroad worker, the manufacturers and their employees, banks and their staffs can only be assured of conserving their own property and their own positions when the grain grower and the cattle breeder are assured of a fair living wage for their labour. In a word, the future success of our country depends upon the prosperity of our farm life. The grain grower is the foundation for a broad and high pyramid of population; he is the ultimate consumer of what the most of the rest of our people produce.

And listen to this:

If we fill our country with happy and contented grain growers and cattle breeders, who are assured of a fair living wage, every man in a factory, every man in a shop, every man in a railway, every man in an office will be in a vastly better and safer position.

An hon. MEMBER: Who is the author?

Mr. HOEY: That was a statement of hon. Robert Rogers. It is so strikingly similar to a certain passage in the budget speech of the Finance Minister that I felt I would like to quote it. Mr. Rogers is the celebrated western politician who became reconciled with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) at Saskatoon last fall and who sang with him:

> Blest be the tie that binds
> Our hearts in Christian love.

And they sang it, so I am informed, to the tune of "No Truck or Trade with the Yankees."'

Hon. members may ask, and the question is a reasonable one: If the tariff is not the chief factor in making for industrial stability why is it that a revision of the tariff schedules is immediately reflected in industry? That is to say, a revision downward, even though it might be small—even microscopic—is always followed by disastrous consequences. Take for example the woollen industry. What are the actual facts? First, there is a claim that our woollen manufacturers to-day cannot meet foreign competition because of the wages they have to pay—overlooking the fact that high wages are not always expensive wages. I want to read an extract from a pamphlet published by the Fair Tariff League, of which Mr. H. E. Miles is chairman. It says:

The effectiveness of American highly-paid labour, when earnestly applied, well directed and supported, on the farm or in the factory, is illustrated in the following statement on rice by Mr. Gray Silver, of the American Farm Bureau Federation, at its annual convention at Chicago, December 13, 1922:

"I asked a great manufacturer what his pay-roll meant, using his mechanical facilities in comparison with unaided man-power. I wanted to estimate the productivity of the American farmer and his machinery in comparison with the hoe in Europe and the coolie in Asia, with whom the American farmer competes in the export markets of the world. After nearly a year's time, the manufacturer replied: 'Our 10,200 men with their applied mechanics and power machinery do the work of almost 500,000 men working without machinery. Our wage-earners are 200 times cheaper than unaided man-power.'

"The competitive value of applied mechanics on the American farm was shown last year. Our production of rice has increased until last year we had a large exportable surplus. Our friend, Secretary Hoover, said to the representatives of his department in different parts of the world, 'Find buyers for this surplus rice; we have 180,000 tons.'

"And where do you suppose the market was found—in riceland, in Japan and China—at our domestic price plus the cost of taking it there, proving that the 10-cent worker with the breech-clout is more expensive than our labour-capitalist at $3 per day."

I have in my hand a reprint from the Central Canadian, Carleton Place, Ontario, of the issue of March 13th, 1924, of which the heading reads:

Hawthorn Mills is in Liquidation; Plant will Close. Woollen Industry Hard Hit. Over 200 Employees Affected.

The truth about this reprint is this: It was broadcasted from ocean to ocean in an attempt to create unrest and to shatter the morale of the Canadian worker. There is scarcely a day that we do not receive in one or two envelopes posters such as this: "Don't Blot out These Basic Industries." I have been wondering, Mr. Speaker, if we could not pass a law preventing organizations or industries that are supposed to be non-political from taking part in what is purely and ostensibly political propaganda. Now, what about the Hawthorn mills? The information I have with regard to the Hawthorn mills is the following:

Woollen manufacturers, Carleton Place, Ontario, Lanark county.

This is the mill referred to by the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Preston) when he read that speech so vigorously yesterday.

The above also constitutes the Directorate

March 11, 1924, this company assigned to Horace Pratt, Official Receiver, Ottawa, Ont. Robert Barr, of Barr and McBride, of Hamilton, Ont., appointed Custodian. Meeting of Creditors to be held in Toronto, Ont., at a future date to be mentioned.

A statement of the Company's affairs shows approximately as follows:

Assets
Merchandise	$165,560
Trade fixtures	4,500
Book Debts (good)	75,200
Book Debts (doubtful)	2,200
Book Debts (bad)	1,700
Cash in bank and on hand	860
Total Quick Assets		$250,000
Machinery equipment and plant		324,000
Surplus from securities in hands of creditors		216,000
Total Assets		$790,010

Hawthorn Mills Limited, Carleton Place, Ontario
Goodwill 1918 was.. .. .. $ 51,900
Goodwill 1922 was.. 122,000

The capital stock up to 1919 was $129,500, so that the difference between $129,500 and $51,900, making $67,600, was the actual cash in the business.

The capital stock was increased in 1919 by $100,000, and the goodwill was increased to $122,000.

Undivided profits in 1918 were indicated by this company to be.. .. .. $348,165 71 and a surplus of.. .. .. 82,515 78

making a gross surplus of.. .. .. $430,681 49

Now I come to a very interesting part of the statement. During the election campaign of 1921, apart from the Lincoln quotation to which I have already referred, the great issue in western Canada was the salary paid the president of the United Grain Growers, Limited, a salary of $15,000 a year, although the annual turnover of the company at that time, if I remember rightly, was considerably over $100,000,000. That gentleman was denounced as an exploiter, a man who was unworthy of the confidence of the western electors. Let us see what this little two by four company in Carleton county paid in the way of salaries:

1918	Salary	Dividend	Total
R. Thompson Sr.	$11,000 00		$11,000 00
C. W. Bates (partner)	10,000 00		10,000 00
Agnes Bates..		$700 00	700 00

Agnes Bates is evidently a member of the family.

R. Thomson Sr...	$11,000 00	4,208 00	$15,208 00
C. W. Bates..	8,335 00	3,508 00	11,843 00
Agnes Bates..		700 00	700 00

1920	Salaries	Dividend	Total
R. Thomson Sr.	$15,000 00	$13,000 00	$28,000 00
R. Thomson Jr.	4,998 00		4,998 00
Little & Little Toronto (Commission). ..	10,793 55		10,793 55
Luke F. Moore (")..	10,762 27		10,762 27

They must have been selling woollens because they were paying commissions.

R. Thomson, Sr.	$12,000 00	$11,099 00	$23,099 00
R. Thomson, Jr.	4,998 00		4,998 00

R. Thomson, Sr.	$12,000 00	Dividends	$12,000 00
R. Thomson, Jr.	5,365 00	passed in 1922	5,365 00

The company created a depreciation reserve of $49,000.00 in cash, up to 1922, in addition to having increased the plant very considerably. If the depreciation reserve is deducted, as well as the goodwill, a fair valuation of the assets would show that the company was very far from being insolvent.

[Mr. Hoey.]

In 1920, and 1921, these mills started making specialties and velours. The demand fell off, and this experiment proved a very costly mistake. It was not the tariff, but embarking upon a class of manufacture which did not prove profitable.

Let us take the case of Canadian Woollens.

The Auburn Woollen Company Limited of Peterboro, had a capital stock of $176,200, and became merged into the Canadian Woollens Limited, a new corporation, which embraced the Auburn Woollen Company, Limited, the Bonner-Worth Company, Limited, and the Standard Knitting Company, Limited, in June 1919. The appraisal of assets indicated the Bonner-Worth Company had $151,440.79; the Auburn Woollen Mills, $271,835.33; and the Standard Knitting Company, $341,100.06. This was the war time valuation, made as of July 1, 1919.

Extension took place to both plants during the war, and both were engaged in war production. Unquestionably, the goodwill amounted to very little, because the business that the companies obtained was in competition with other Canadian concerns, and the lowest priced goods obtained the preference.

The Canadian Woollens Limited was incorporated with $1,750,000 of preferred stock, $1,750,000 of common stock, or a total of $3,500,000; and the assets of the Canadian Woollens Limited, processes, patent rights and goodwill were valued at $1,440,937.81. The sum of $423,276.12 was apparently the patents and processes, and $1,000,000 was for the goodwill. At this stage I might read the following letter from the Patent and Copyright Office which speaks for itself:

Dear Sir,—In reply to your letter of the 15th instant I may inform you that the Canadian Woollens, Limited do not appear either as patentees or assignees on any patent granted here.

And yet we have an amount here for patents. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) described me the other day as "an unsophisticated rainbow chaser." He said: "You are chasing rainbows, but I am afraid you will never reach them." Well, I was reminded of the purpose that some one had in mind when the rainbow first appeared; it was evidently to save the world from destruction by water. If I am chasing rainbows at all I am chasing those rainbows that indicate that some day the people of Canada, including the industrial interests of the country, will be saved from the ravages and the disasters that result from watered stock. Canadian Woollens paid:

June 30, 1920..	$122,500 dividends
June 30, 1922..	122,500 dividends

It also in 1922 paid into the sinking fund for the redemption of preferred stock, $35,000. The Canadian Woollens Limited showed a loss in 1921 of $351,526.57, and yet paid dividends that same year of $166,250. This apparent loss was caused in 1921, by bookkeeping adjustments, allowing excessive amounts of depreciation, decline in value of wool, and so forth. The Auburn Woollen Company paid, before the merger, dividends for the first six months of 1919, 16 per cent or at that rate of 32 per cent per annum.

Now, I come to the salaries paid by the Canadian Woollens Limited, these people who are appealing for sympathy and asking us not to blot out these peculiarly impoverished industries. I can well understand why they should not want to blot out industries which pay such salaries. Take for example these figures:

Canadian Woollens Limited

	Salary
1919—
E. Worth, Manager..	$14,583 33
J. W. Worth, Superintendent..	6,206 05
N. Rosin..	17,691 45
1920—
E. Worth..	30,490 96
J. W. Worth..	10,618 40
1921—
E. Worth..	15,000 00
J. W. Worth..	4,672 66
J. Charlesworth..	4,999 92
P. G. Blake..	5,116 60
R. S. Keyes..	5,200 00
1922—
E. Worth..	15,000 00
J. W. Worth..	5,000 00
P. G. Blake..	5,000 00
W. Tinker..	4,000 00

At the end of 1923 the company had:

Cash in hand..	$ 928.06
Accounts receivable..	277,648.50
Bills receivable..	21,598.05

And so on making total assets $4,824,583.50. Among the liabilities are:

Reserve for redemption of preferred stock.	$19,733.28
Reserve for bad debts..	18,397.92
Total..	$38,131.20

Mr. Speaker, after listening to a few of the speeches delivered by hon. gentlemen to my right I was particularly anxious to know just what the condition in certain industrial centres was, and so a few days ago I wrote to a prominent business man in the town of Renfrew to attempt to discover just how the industries of Renfrew were making progress. In reply to that letter the gentleman in question says:

Dear Mr. HOEY,—I am very pleased to have your favour of the 1st, inst., and it will afford me much pleasure in supplying as far as possible, the information desired.

In order to have my information authoritative and up-to-date, I called up the manager of one of the banks who is conversant with the situation and well qualified to speak on the subject. He informed me that the woollen mills in Renfrew were all busy at the present time, just as busy as they were two or three years ago. He said the Renfrew Textile Company and the Renfrew Woollen Mills Company were both working night and day to capacity, and the Logan Woollen Mills full day time. He informed me also that the Renfrew Machinery Company which manufactures cream separators, showed an increase of 15 per cent in their output in 1923 over that of 1922, and their increase for 1924 so far was fully 15 per cent over that of 1923, which increase they expect to be fully maintained during the year. This latter industry, by the way, operates, as you no doubt know, under free trade conditions so far as its own product goes, and is in competition with the world, sells its output to a very large extent in the United States, and ships to South America, Africa, Australia, Europe and the British Isles.

The manager of the Renfrew Textile Company told me over the 'phone this morning that the mill was working to capacity night and day, and had orders on hand to keep them going till the end of September, and their usual repeats would undoubtedly keep them going till the end of the year.

This mill confines itself to the manufacture of mackinaw cloths, and they have no fear of foreign competition in this line, under the new tariff schedule, because the best of wool stock must be used in the manufacture of this line of goods, and the foreign manufacturers, who use a very large percentage of cheap shoddy, are outclassed altogether in competition with the Canadian manufacturers, who use a better class of material for this business. The textile mill have increased their output this year by 45,000 yards, or about 8 per cent over last year. Their output at the present time is 1,700 yards per day of finished goods.

The Renfrew Woollen Mills Co., are working on a finer grade of cloths, such as are made in, and imported from, to a large extent, France, Belgium and England. But they too, are holding their own in competition with the foreign manufacturers, because, according to my information, they are at the present time working night and day to capacity on goods for the Canadian market.

You will no doubt hear a great deal during the budget debate about the failure of the Woollen mill at Carleton Place. Well, my own opinion is that a tariff as high as the Rocky mountains all around Canada would not have saved this concern from collapse. There were many reasons for this unfortunate condition, and believe me the tariff had absolutely nothing to do with the case. The overhead expenses were, I am told on what I believe to be good authority, altogether out of proportion to the amount of business done. Too many relatives were attached to the staff at high salaries. Add to this their attempt to sell direct to the retailer, which they found very expensive, and not satisfied with selling to the retailer, they even went to the consumer. Add to these, machinery that should to a very large extent be on the scrap heap, and you have a condition under which no mill could operate successfully no matter where situated or under the very highest tariff protection.

Renfrew industries are all working to capacity at the present time, and we have quite a wide range of such. In addition, there is not a vacant house in Renfrew for rent to-day.

Mr. MARLER: What the hon. member is reading from sounds like a speech of the hon. member for Brome.

Mr. LOGAN: It is not a "whisper of death" anyway.

Mr. HOEY: I have before me the imports of raw wool into the Dominion and the figures are very interesting.

Mr. BOYS: Will the hon. gentleman inform the House who wrote the letter from which he has just quoted?

Mr. HOEY: I have no particular desire to inform the House just who the business man was. I will, however, go so far as to say that he is a very prominent business man in the town of Renfrew, and if I mistake not at one time was a member of this House.

Mr. BOYS: Brother Pedlow.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Left at home for a good protectionist and a minister in the government.

Mr. HOEY: He does not pass any comments in his letter on those somewhat vexed questions.

Mr. MARLER: He has his opinion on certain subjects has he not?

Mr. HOEY: All Britishers have. Now, the raw wool imported into Canada in 1921 amounted to 9,277,237 pounds; in 1922, 12,586,695 pounds; in 1923, 18,255,595 pounds. Not only is this the case so far as importations are concerned, but our exports have actually increased during the last two or three years.

Now, I pass on to consider the tariff as a factor in driving people from Canada into the United States. A few weeks ago I wrote to Washington and obtained from the Inspector General of Immigration the actual figures as to what the exodus really was. I desire to read these figures to the House because there seems to be so much misunderstanding on this point. The figures are as follows:

Immigrants Entering United States from Canada
Years, 1911-1923

Year	Number
1911	56,830
1912	55,990
1913	73,802
1914	86,139
1915	82,215
1916	101,551
1917	105,399
1918	32,452
1919	57,782
1920	90,025
1921	72,317
1922	46,810
1923	117,011

[Mr. Hoey.]

I want to give also the number of United States citizens who have been entering Canada. They are as follows:

Immigrants Entering Canada from United States

1923	22,039

Immigrants Entering England from Canada

1921	21,047

I want to point out something else that is very significant. In the year 1921 under the government of my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) we lost to the United States 72,317.

Mr. McMASTER: That is the right hon. gentleman to your right.

Mr. HOEY: Yes. In the same year we lost to Great Britain 21,047. If this government is driving the people to the United States the government that preceded it drove the people not only to the United States but back to Europe as well. What are the actual facts in connection with this list of figures? I cannot understand men, even though they be hon. members who, in an attempt to attack the government, disparage the country. In the year 1922 there were 46,810, or the lowest exodus to the States in thirteen years, with the single exception of 1918. Now I am waiting for hon. members to my right to applaud.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Did the hon. gentleman say that 1922 was the lowest in thirteen years?

Mr. HOEY: The lowest but one in thirteen years.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman said the lowest. I did not think it was the lowest but one. It was certainly double that of 1921 as he read it. Where did the hon. gentleman get his figures?

Mr. HOEY: I got them from Mr. Sibray.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have it from the Embassy at Washington, and the figure given for last year was 181,000, the number trebling in the month of June.

Mr. HOEY: I have the figures direct from the Department of Labour, from Mr. Sibray, who describes himself as the Commissioner General of Immigration to the United States. In 1922 there were 46,810 residents of Canada who went into the United States, but in the same year there were 29,412 residents of the United States, or American citizens who came into Canada.

Mr. LADNER: Will the hon. gentleman give the figures for 1923 from the same source?

Mr. HOEY: In 1923 there were 117,011, and you must deduct from that 22,039 who came into Canada from the United States.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. member want it any worse than that?

Mr. HOEY: No. I want to explain just why this exodus took place. Hon. gentlemen will notice that in the year 1922 emigration slumped. Why? In my judgment it was because a Liberal government was returned to power in this country and the people became more hopeful and stayed at home; then unfortunately the Liberal government showed evidence of following in the Tory footsteps and the people in disgust and dismay began to leave the country. Now that the government is showing signs at least of carrying out its 1919 platform I have no doubt at all that the influx of United States citizens into this country during the next ten years will be one of the outstanding features of our immigration policy.

Referring to the amendment, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) on having become a convert to tariff reform. He was not ever thus. In the Hansard of 1923, volume 1, page 41, the hon. member said:

> I think perhaps I am rather glad in many ways that the tariff was left out of the Speech from the Throne. It is possible that we are getting down to a rather more serious consideration of the actual situation—the recognition that, after all, the tariff is not fundamental in our economic solutions.

Then in 1923, Hansard volume 3, page 2718, May 14, the member for Centre Winnipeg said:

> Mr. Speaker, I should like to express my agreement with a great deal of what has been said by the leader of the Progressives (Mr. Forke) and also to concur in the general lines of the amendment which has been presented. I would, however, like to point out that in the opinion of the group which I represent, the mere bringing about of a larger measure of free trade does not really touch the root of the trouble to-day.

I can only attribute his conversion, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that for almost two sessions he has been sitting in close proximity to the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) and I believe in the contagion of character. Whether this amendment is defeated or not, I do not think the government should look upon its rejection as a repudiation of the principles contained therein with which we are almost all in agreement. Personally I would like to have more information on the amendment, which calls for an unimproved land tax. Conscientiously I do not know what the hon. member has in mind. Does he intend by an unimproved land tax something similar to the tax levied by the municipalities to-day, or does he want an unearned increment tax; that is, when the sale of land takes place. That in my judgment is a very important distinction. Then there is the question of the revision of the income tax. In some of the provinces we have an income tax. Personally I pay a federal income tax and also a provincial income tax, and I should like to know just what the definite proposals are before committing myself to them, although I am in favour of the amendment in principle. Reference is also made to the graduated inheritance tax. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, the government should seriously consider again the advisability of what has been suggested by the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw) from time to time. That is the calling of a conference between the federal and provincial authorities and taking this as a basis for their discussion, a basis out of which they might evolve some theory really practical and something really helpful as regards taxation. It seems to me that at such a conference the whole question of taxation might be very profitably discussed, as well as the whole problem of economy. If you figure out to-day, you will find that the municipal, provincial and federal taxes amount to $100 per capita for every man, woman and child in the Dominion of Canada. If you place the annual revenue of the average family of five at $2,000—that may be too high or too low—that means that $500 or one-quarter is extracted in an attempt to meet our governmental obligations. It seems to me that no nation can recover quickly, if indeed it can recover at all, while its people are groaning and labouring under such a tremendous burden of taxation.

With regard to the budget itself, in my judgment it is more in harmony with Liberal principles, more in accord with the demands of the Canadian people at this time than any budget introduced since the defeat of reciprocity in the year 1911. Because I believe that, actuated by a sense of fair play, believing also that, perhaps, after all the government did all that could be done, finding itself in somewhat difficult circumstances, I am prepared to support the main motion, looking forward to a time when the platform upon which the government itself was elected, will be carried out in detail and in full.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I feel that I can compliment the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Hoey) on his rapid advance in parliamentary life and standing, and as respects his speech to-day, at least on its style, its splendidly constructed sentences and, as well, the temperament which characterized its delivery. Needless to say, I could not agree with very much of his argument. In many cases I could not discern the argument; but none the less, I have not given up hope that, with a more extended experience in public affairs, and a more practical knowledge of Canadian conditions and business, he may yet become a valuable acquisition to public life.

I want to make some comment at once on that feature of the budget presentation this year which has to do with our finance, with our debt and with the effect of the year's business upon both. The Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) came to parliament and assured us that we were in the glorious position this year of having a surplus over all outlay, a surplus applicable to the national debt; that the Canadian people now are in debt some $30,000,000 less than they were a year ago. Some of us were prepared for this. We heard a sound go forth earlier in the year that we were going to have a balanced budget. We were not advised how this was to be accomplished, but it was to be done by some means or another. I was not able myself to divine what could be the scheme. I had followed the monthly presentations of expenditure and revenue, and I could not see that we were gaining in either direction. I remembered that in 1923 the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) closed the year with an addition to the debt of $31,641,067.01. I have a little arithmetic in my composition, and I was able to reason that if this year there was even a balancing, it would mean that we must have improved our finances, the advantage of revenue over expenditure, by just that amount. Having looked into the actual returns and obtained them up to date, I want to lay before the House just what improvement we did make. All agree there should have been some improvement; we all know that as we recede from the war, war expenditure naturally diminishes. Civil re-establishment was reduced a year ago by about $3,000,000, and it was expected that it would show reduction this year by about the same amount. But an analysis shows that the aggregate improvement is so small relatively as to be almost negligible. The revenue for the year was better than the revenue of the year before by $1,782,642.34. Imagine an increase of only one and three-quarter million dollars after an elevation of the sales tax, after the addition of all the other taxes that hon. gentlemen opposite imposed. We actually gathered in $1,782,642,-34 more than the year before. These figures are from the returns of the Department of Finance issued the 30th April, inclusive of all revenue received prior to that date and applicable to the previous fiscal year, inclusive of all expenditure of which account had been received, applicable also to the previous fiscal year which ended the 31st March. In addition, the Acting Minister of Finance reported that he had made an adjustment with the British government and a transfer of some accounts which this year netted him $9,622,760.37. This is simply found money. This really was our money five or seven years ago just as it is to-day. Seven years ago it could not be taken into consolidated revenue because most of it was not adjusted, the rest in trust account. This they found as it were by the roadside, but the year before they found $8,-199,000 in exactly the same way. So the improvement in this regard was $1,423,000. This improvement added to the improvement in ordinary revenue aggregated $3,206,000.

Now coming to the other side: Taking total expenditures, they are of four classes: Ordinary expenditure, capital expenditure, special expenditure, and fourthly such as is required for our National Railways, including merchant marine. In capital expenditure the year's business showed $3,489,000 more spent than the year before; in ordinary expenditure an improvement of $1,046,000; in special expenditure, an improvement of $107,000; total improvement $1,154,000. This taken from the unfavourable showing on capital left a net increase in expenditure in those three classes of $2,335,000. Taking, therefore, all revenue of every kind, found money and all the rest, the improvement over the year before was $3,206,000, and all expenditures save railways make a showing worse than the year before by $2,335,000. So the net improvement is $870,000. This is the net of the year's business outside of railways; $870,000 better than the year before. The year before we had an increase of debt of $31,641,000, and this year the Acting Minister of Finance says that we have paid off $30,409,000 of our debt or an improvement for the year of $62,050,000. The only way to account for it therefore would be to find that our railways took less money to the extent of $61,179,000. Now, can the members of the government look me in the face and say that the railway position improved by $61,000,000? Do they suggest such a thing? How then do they tell the country that we are $62,000,000 better off than we were the year before on the year's showing? The fact is they have misled and deceived the country, and the government knows it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I take direct issue with that statement of my hon. friend.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, I will establish it. I come now to the money required for railways. The most we ever heard claimed, even in the press, as the improvement of this year over last, I mean 1923 over 1922, was in some issues $18,000,000 odd, in others, up to $20,000,000—a long way from $61,000,000. But I have had opportuniity to examine the returns of the National Railways, and those I propose to give to the House to show just what the railway improvement was, to show how near il approached $61,000,000, which sum it must have reached if the presentation of this year is right and honest comparable with last year and previous years. There was no improvement even of $20,000,000 as the figures taken directly from the railways' own returns will show.

In getting at the real comparison the following three classes, making up among them the total operating results, appear in the returns: (1) Operating income; (2) Non-operating income; (3) Deductions from income, The following is a comparative statement of the results in each case:

1. Operating income—1922, loss of $1,227,508.34; 1923, profit of $16,273,238.81; showing improvement for 1923, of $17,500,747.15.

2. Non-operating income—including rentals received for cars from other roads, rentals of joint terminals, premises, and so forth, 1922, $10,055,367.83; 1923, $7,885,081.48; showing decrease for 1923, of $2,170,286.35.

3. Deductions from income—including rentals paid for cars, rebates for joint terminals, premises and other items, 1922, $7,387,481.13; 1923, $10,656,671.28; showing greater payments out for 1923, of $3,269,190.15.

These three results taken together, therefore, show operating improvement for 1923, to have been only, $12,061,270.68.

I have left out all reference to fixed charges. I am simply taking the operation, and the net improvement on operation is $12,061,270.68 for 1923, by the railway directorates own showing, by their official returns.

There is, however, still a fourth factor to be taken into account, viz.: the fixed charges for 1923 as against the fixed charges for 1922. The figures for these items are as follows: Fixed charges, 1923, $65,199,323.95; fixed charges, 1922, $59,400,476.11; showing fixed charges for 1923 greater by $5,798,847.84.

Deducting, therefore fixed charges—which I admit a government does not have to advance all in cash, because it is mostly owing the government itself—from improvement in total operating revenues, we find a net improvement of only $6,262,422.84. I am ready to leave out fixed charges, ready to leave out the increase of $5,798,847.84 the year before, and the most they can possibly show is $12,061,270.68. How then does the minister come and say that on account of the railways, and only $870,000 on all other accounts, we are $62,000,000 better off on the past year's showing than we were the year before?

The matter can be presented in another way. For the fiscal years 1922-23, Mr. Fielding, as Finance Minister, advanced out of the national treasury to the National Railways and marine, $98,250,720. For the fiscal year 1923-24, there has been advanced out of the treasury for the same purpose only, $25,281,664. The difference is, $72,969,056. Mr. Fielding advanced moneys from the treasury for the purposes of covering deficits on operation, fixed charges, and new capital investments, including equipment. For 1923-24 the device was adopted of guaranteeing the railway bonds both for equipment and those other purposes to the extent of, in the case of equipment, $22,500,00, for other purposes, $50,000,000, or a total of, $72,500,000, practically the difference between the cash advances of the past year and that of the year before.

It will be seen at a glance that to compare this year with last, or indeed with any previous year, the whole $72,500,000 must be added to the capital debt of Canada.

The result is this. That the national debt of Canada for 1923, has been increased by the sum of, $72,500,000—the guarantees—less the sum of, $30,409,109.37—alleged surplus—The net result, therefore, is an increase for 1923-24 of, $42,090,890.63.

Now, how was this done? The railway is our corporation; it is another name, a chartered name for the Dominion of Canada. The minister endorses the notes of our corporation for $72,500,000; then he says that those $72,500,000 are bonds which we have endorsed inasmuch as we just put our name on the back instead of on the front and therefore we have not affected the debt of Canada. And the Prime Minister says: We are not deceiving the country when we tell them we have reduced the debt. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) arises and says: "Oh, you endorsed the notes of the railway too, and did not add the amount to the national debt."

Yes, there are bonds you can endorse and even moneys you can advance without any need of adding to the debt. For example, if you endorse bonds to pay off other bonds, that does not add to the debt of our company and need not be added to our debt, or if in a given period you endorse bonds to no greater amount than you actually reduce the funded debt of our company by, then certainly you do not need to add to our debt. But the moment you endorse bonds and make this country liable for an amount greater than you reduce the funded debt of the company by, then it is no less than misrepresentation not to add the amount to the public debt of Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does my right hon. friend say that with respect to the bonds which his government endorsed, part of the money was not used to pay off deficits, to pay interest or sinking fund?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will give the answer immediately, and I hope the Prime Minister will follow me. The facts are here in a return which I have from the department, and they go back to the origin of the National Railways—because no argument applies before that time. The National Railways are ours; their debts, their obligations if we make ourselves responsible, are ours. We endorsed bonds to the extent of $100,000,000, $25,000,000, in each of the years 1920 and 1921 for each of the systems, the Canadian Northern, or the National as it was then called, and the Grand Trunk. Of all the bonds advanced to the Canadian Northern the whole amount was for refunding, while of the advances to the Grand Trunk some 12½ million out of one and about 2¼ millions out of the other—I have the exact figures—were used for general purposes. But we actually advanced in cash, which was represented in the debt, more than twice that sum, which was applied to the refunding of the debt of the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific. In a word, the aggregate of the amount we endorsed which does not appear in the national debt of Canada was less by about $15,000,000 than the amount that was actually applied for refunding. This is the record of the late government. Is this money, may I ask, the $50,000,000, to be used for refunding, this $50,000,000 which was endorsed in February? Will the hon. minister say so? He told the House in his budget speech it was for capital. Certainly the endorsement of last year, 22½ million for equipment, was not for refunding. The whole $50,000,000, on the minister's statement, and the whole 22½ million as well, should in justice be added to the debt of Canada to-day.

It was suggested by the Minister of Railways: "Oh we should not add it to the debt because it is going into capital." Some of it doubtless is; all of it is not. I do not know whether a large proportion is, but I do not care if every dollar of it is; it should on a fair presentation go into the national debt of Canada. I do not want to be misunderstood; I am not necessarily objecting to the endorsement of the bonds. I think generally it is better to advance the cash, but this is not the point I am pressing. The point I am pressing is as to what ought to be the statement of the national debt of this country. Endorse the bonds if you will, but do not keep the people in the opinion that our debt is going down when the debt which we are obligated for on our own system is going up, and is ignored. Why is it that money advanced to be used for capital should be added to our debt, or that money obtained on our endorsement and used for capital should be added to our debt? Well, Mr. Speaker, I will tell why: Because it is not represented by anything which, according to the system in vogue in Canada, can be called an active asset and deductible from the gross debt to get the net debt. Hon. gentlemen will remember that in 1919-20 the Minister of Finance of that day took $282,000,000 of assets—mortgages we held from railways, others of a like character, assets represented by those mortgages, which, because we held the mortgages, had always before been taken off the gross debt—and he said: "These are not carrying any interest; these are virtually, for the moment at least, dead; it is not right, it is not straight to have them appear as deductible from the gross debt to get the net debt." And he wrote them down and put them into the debt of Canada, refusing any longer to deduct them from the gross debt.

I may remark just in passing: Hon. gentlemen often hear about the large increase in the debt in 1920; $282,000,000 of that was just as much our debt years and years before as it was then; but only in 1920 was it put into the debt in order that the people of Canada might know the facts. These mortgages we take now from our own Railways Company, whether we take them to secure our endorsement or take them to secure our advance—these are mortgages that the railways cannot pay interest upon and do not claim that they can. Therefore the late government always had the matter so financed that these were treated as non-active and therefore not deductible from the gross debt but included in the net debt of Canada. This is why I say that in arriving at any fair statement of our position we are bound to treat all of these as non-active assets—until the day comes, as I hope it will, when the returns of the Railways will be such as to turn those non-active assets into active assets and pay us our interest, or part of it, upon those amounts. Then it will be just to deduct them from our gross debt and therefore not include them in our net debt. But until such a day comes, it is neither the practice of governments which have gone before nor should it be a practice to-day to treat them as real assets in the sense of active assets deductible from the gross debt of Canada.

The hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler)—and I was really surprised to hear him say so, though he put it in a pretty cautious form, said: "I think there is a surplus. I do not claim that it means a deduction from the debt, but it is a surplus on the year's operations, because when money goes into capital out of which later on our earning power will be better, it should not be charged against the year's operations." But the surplus the minister was endeavouring to prove was a surplus over capital and everything else. And besides, in the handling of the books of the country, as the minister well knows and every one of us well knows, moneys put into capital are, by the millions every year, taken from ordinary expenditure and charged against the year's operations, and in this country as in others it is right that it should be so. How, after this, are we ever going to compare any year fairly and intelligently with any previous year? "Debt reduced" appears on the records—$30,400,000. Well, add $72,500,000 and you have the debt increased by $42,000,000 the year just passed. Does the minister say we should not add the 22½ millions which went into equipment? If he will look at the year before he will find that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) advanced in cash out of the treasury for equipment and added it to the debt. If he will look at the year previous he will find that the minister advanced in cash again for equipment, and if he will look at the year previous to that again, our year, he will find that we advanced $14,000,000 odd for equipment—all certainly going into realizable assets, but going into a concern which could not pay its way, could not pay interest; therefore our obligation in respect of it should have been and was added to our net debt.

Hon. members one after another rise in their places, pat themselves and say: "Thank heaven we are past the day of deficits. Thirty millions of a surplus, and we are going to reduce our taxation because of that surplus." Well, may I ask why the minister did not endorse the bonds of the company for the 25¼ millions also instead of advancing the money. Then we would have had a surplus of $55,000,000—and imagine the glee of hon. members. No sooner had the Acting Minister of Finance delivered his speech than the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Johnston) rose and declared that it was a great encouragement to the taxpayers of Canada that at last we had a surplus. With what wonderful acclaim would he have given utterance to his feelings had the surplus been $55,000,000! There is something else the minister could do which would be just as logical as what he has done. Why could he not incorporate a company and call it "Liberal Government Incorporated?" The country could own all the stock, and then every year instead of borrowing money or using our revenue to pay our debts, just endorse the bonds of that company; he could take care of our annual expenditure in that way and we would thus "reduce" our national debt by the entire revenue, $300,000,000 to $400,000,000 every year. This is the process which the Acting Minister has started. Where is he going to stop? The debt of this country to-day should be marked up in the books as increased by $42,000,000.

The minister says, and he says with more show of right than in respect of his other contentions: We have some $15,000,000 of the last $50,000,000, the proceeds of our last endorsement, in the treasury, and this should be set off. Well, in one way it should, but to compare with other years, it should not, and for the simple reason that in other years when the money was advanced for this purpose there was also an unexpended sum. Following the practices of other years, which should be done to make our book-keeping clear and in sequence, this cash should not be deducted either, and I venture to say that next year the minister will not take this $15,000,000 and say: This was advanced or guaranteed in the year 1924-25, and not in the year 1923-24. No, by the method previously adopted—the right method—our debt now has been increased by $42,000,000, a little more than the increase of the year before. Mr. Fielding advanced $98,250,000 and this government in reality advanced or guaranteed to the National Railways $97,000,000 and a fraction, practically the same as was advanced the year before.

I have given our financial position, but before I close this phase of the subject I want to make reference to a contention which the Prime Minister has pressed once at least in this House, a contention by way of complaint of the conduct of the late administration in respect of the taking care of war obligations during the currency of the war. I have heard his words re-echoed from various quarters of the Commons, words to the effect that the late government by dereliction, the insinuation always being because it was protecting its friends, "the interests," did not take care of any capital war obligations during the progress of the war, and consequently that the burden of this government is so terrific that only an extraordinary government could bear it. Well, a lot depends on what you would call the "capital" cost of the war. I do not know what the Prime Minister means by it, but I know that in other enterprises capital cost is all costs during their continuance. I know in the statutes, under this government, or former governments of the same party as this, no matter what the enterprise, provision was made even for interest on the cost during construction, during its continuance, being taken as part of the cost. But I do not intend to include interest. I am ready to treat interest on war debt during the war as the carrying cost of the war. Nevertheless we had to get the money and to pay it, and it was directly due to the war. But I wonder if pensions paid during the contest were not part of the capital cost. I wonder if the hospitals of the Department of Civil Re-establishment were not part of the capital cost of the war. Is it only part of the capital cost when the money you get is to buy ammunition for the soldier to shoot, and not the money you have to get to help your own men after they are shot?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does my right hon. friend contend that the pensions we are now paying are part of the capital cost of the war?

Mr. MEIGHEN: After the war is over the capital cost of civil re-establishment continues for a while on a reducing scale, until finally it goes out. There are also pensions for a long time, gradually reducing until they go out, but during the continuance of anything, the capital cost is all it costs, and pensions are as much a capital cost as anything else. It does not matter whether you call it capital cost or not; but I am prepared to call it that, because it is. The carrying cost is the interest on the cost; the other is wholly a part of the cost of the war. But does it matter what we call these things as long as we know what we have to pay? The fact is we had to pay it, and get the money to do so: I have the figures here from the year 1914-1915 on to 1919-1920 inclusive, the receipts, the total expenditure for everything, the deficits and the war expenditure, and I would ask that the details might go on Hansard:

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does my hon. friend contend that the money we are voting this year for soldier settlement and soldier's civil re-establishment is part of the capital cost of the war?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I contend this: When incurred during the war it is perfectly right to include it as such. It is after the war now, but is this even now "carrying" cost? It all depends on what name you prefer. We had to get the money to pay it, no matter what you call it; and it certainly was fairer to call it capital cost, than to call it "carrying" cost then. I would like to know what the difference is between the cost of curing a wound and the cost of making one. Is one to be called capital, and the other not?

Let me add, in the first year of the war necessarily, there could be no war taxes imposed. The war broke out shortly after the end of a fiscal year, and the first taxes which could be imposed would be collectable in the second year after the struggle began. So, we had say five years of war, with only four years' possibility of taxation. And I wonder was the taxation too light? Could the taxes have been made greater?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Prime Minister says yes but the member sitting at his right thought no at the time we were imposing them. The right hon. gentleman himself was not in the House at that time. The facts are these: During the early part of the war, as revealed, indeed, by the figure given to the House to-day by the hon. member for Springfield, when the United States were not in the conflict, they held a tremendous advantage over us as a magnet for population. If hon. members will look at the official returns they will find that for all these early years after the war right up to the time the United States came in, the balance of migration against this country was in large figures. In those days we had to look carefully in making our financial provisions because there was the prospect that contrasted with conditions across the border, instead of getting more money by a too high scale we would get less and we would certainly get less population. We had to adjust our finances accordingly, and as rapidly as we could we increased taxation and in the spring of 1917 we put on the highest profits taxes in the world. We put on other taxes almost in proportion. So high did we impose them that hon. gentlemen now sitting opposite, hon. gentlemen now in the government, rose and protested that the effect of such taxation would be unfair to the industry of Canada. If the Prime Minister will look at Hansard for May 22, 1917, at the time these high taxes were being put on—I mean the higher taxes for there had been profits taxes imposed long before —he will find that his present Minister of Railways warned the government that strong representations were coming to him from many and reputable business concerns to the effect that the high taxation being levied upon them would so reduce their reserves gathered during the period of inflation that they would never be able to stand the deflation period which was sure to come. Not only did he tell of these representations—representations which went so far as to say that one firm after another might be driven into bankruptcy—but he declared on the strength of figures submitted to himself, on the strength of investigation made by himself, he was disposed to agree with their contention. And the Minister of Railways turned out to be right—this was the effect on many a company in Canada. I have not even referred to the warnings that came from the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald). Now the leader of both these hon. gentlemen says "You did not tax nearly enough, you let the profiteer go." I do not think this conduct on the part of the Prime Minister is very fair, especially when during that period we were supported in the course we took by certainly the one most eminent of his own ministers to-day.

The amount we had to raise for interest on war debt, was a sum in the neighbourhood of two to three hundred millions more. According to the figures of Sir Thomas White some $435,000,000 of war cost was paid during the real period of the war. I do not think this experience compares unfavourably with that of any other country but I say this: Having regard to the position this Dominion was in, a position unique in the world, a position right alongside of the most prosperous nation speaking our own tongue, we went as far in the direction of taxation as was in the interests of this Dominion and we were recognized as doing so by hon. gentlemen among those who now complain.

[Mr. Meighen.]

There is one other statement I wish to make. I am sorry the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) is not in his seat. It refers also to what took place in those years. The Minister of the Interior went to the city of Edmonton last fall and made a statement explanatory of the failure of this government to reduce the debt. This is what he said:

> In 1911 when the Conservatives took office the public debt was less than the sum now required to meet the annual fixed charges. By the time the war began in 1914 the national debt was increased 46 per cent.

I should like to ask the minister—and I will put my question on Hansard now so that he may answer it at the first opportunity on the Orders of the Day—whether he made this statement before any audience in this Dominion? I have read from the report of the Edmonton Bulletin, an organ friendly to himself. I do not need to insult the House by telling them it is not true. Every hon. member knows that instead of the debt being increased 46 per cent—an incredible amount; I cannot see how a responsible man could possibly use such words, and I would employ stronger language only I hope he will be able to say the report of the Edmonton Bulletin is wrong—the facts are quite the opposite. The debt in the one year was increased by twenty-one million odd dollars, and in the other years was diminished by twenty-five million odd dollars, and at the end of the fiscal year just before the outbreak of war the debt was some three million odd dollars less than when the then government came into power. Although not much to the point I may add parenthetically that one reason of the increase in the year I referred to was the necessity of taking care of precious railway enterprises for which we were not responsible.

Now I come to other features of the budget. The budget proposes a reduction of taxation. Nobody can help but rejoice in a reduction of taxation as such; but I want to know what justification this government has for proposing to this House to reduce taxation. With a deficit of forty millions, or in that neighbourhood—and it would have been much higher but for the money they found by the roadside—how do they justify a reduction of taxation at all? I wonder does the Acting Minister of Finance really expect that he is going to be able to balance the budget this year upon which he has launched? To-day his revenues are going down. I venture to say he will not get any one hundred and twenty millions next year on his sales tax. He collected last year about forty-seven millions more on his sales tax out of everybody in the country that was collected two years before. True he collected about forty-two millions less on income and profits taxes. On those taxes which were always said to be taken from profiteers he gets about forty-two millions less than we did. But he got last year some forty-seven millions more from the sales tax which comes from everybody, thus fulfilling the prophecy of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) "that the masses were to be relieved and the profiteers or malefactors were to be mulcted." I do not think the Acting Minister of Finance looks forward with much equanimity to balancing his budget for the year to come unless he intends an extension of the practice which accounts for the "surplus" of this year. No, on the showing of the past year and with no evidence of any further retrenchment—no evidence at all events until we are sure what the supplementaries are going to be—I do not think he has any right to reduce taxes at all. We hear a lot of late about reduced estimates, but when we come to this session and find the expenditure of the year greater than for the year before, even though the estimates were less, I do not believe we have much ground for hope that there is going to be any substantial economy.

So far as sales tax reductions go, they certainly should be made just as fast as economies will justify, just as fast as the year's returns will show to be possible. Those taxes come from everybody. They necessarily impede business. I think imposed on a small scale they are a fair tax. I do not think we can get on wholly without them. And I do not object even to special favours going to those who now, owing to world conditions,are under specially difficult handicaps. I do not object to special favours or privileges going to agriculture such as the wiping out of sales tax on implements because agriculture to-day the world over labours under difficulties very great, but I do sometimes wonder how hon. members to my left can accept these special privileges. I have read their newspapers. I have listened to many of their speeches. Have they not been roaring for many a year against "special privileges," and how in the world they find it in their hearts to take these special favours, I am at a loss to know. I am not objecting to them in any way. You have to meet conditions as they occur, and you have to do the things which will meet them.

Now I speak of the tariff reductions those which reduce the revenue by the whole sum of $750,000, around which this debate has largely centred. We have had tariff discussions in parliament as long as I have been here, and for many and many a decade before, and I do not know that I can add very much to a general tariff debate. I do hope though in a brief way to lay my views before the House. I have opinions on the question,—opinions that are not in principle different from those with which I entered parliament, not in principle different from any I have ever expressed in or out of this House, but matured, I hope, by some years of experience and observation of practical affairs. I believe in the protective system, I believe when we have a protective system it should be balanced, and it should be equitable. If I disbelieved in a protective system, but found one applied, I would still want it to be equitable; I would not want it "gerrymandered," to use the excellent expression of the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea). A tariff which treats one manufacturer one way, or one class one way, and another in a different way, cannot be defended by any person. The free trader from his standpoint can defend a tariff on goods not Canadian-made for such alone is a revenue tariff, as well defined by the hon. member for Springfield to-day. The protectionist can defend a tariff on Canadian-made goods fairly and equitably applied. But no human being can defend what this government presents, either on the theory of free trade or on the theory of protection or on any principle at all.

Has anybody tried? I have not heard anybody try. Ministers have risen, one after the other; but oh, such defences! Could I illustrate better than from the words of the Solicitor General (Mr. McMurray). He was fair; no one can dispute his fairness. He supported free trade till six o'clock, and protection after eight o'clock. Up till six o'clock he denounced the whole principle of protection, but he pleaded with hon. members of this House to allow this government to continue it, saying that a great blunder was committed in that it ever was established. But once established, he said, it is hard to get rid of. After eight o'clock, when he found that he himself had assisted in putting a new protection on artificial silk, he said the Liberal party was always in favour of commencing industries by a protective tariff.

The protective system is in use in most of the world; indeed, there is only one important country to-day which does not follow it. The presumption would be, I think, that granted a fair distribution of intelligence the world over, there is at least much to say in its defence. The common judgment of humanity persisted in year after year for centuries has not often proved to be far astray, especially in regard to commercial matters. What has the hon. member for Brome in his mind just now?

Mr. McMASTER: I had in mind that for years and centuries the common judgment of mankind said that the earth was flat.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, the common judgment is sometimes wrong about astronomical facts; but the man who places a question of commercial practicability in the same category as astronomical facts is not very likely to reason properly about either. The purpose of a protective tariff is to secure a distribution of industries in the country which adopts it, to secure a better distribution and diversity of occupation. I do not doubt that if the world were all one and it did not matter at all what particular part advanced more rapidly than the other, if conditions in every country were alike, if, in a word, the whole idea of nationality were abandoned, then there would be much to be said for free trade. But even then it would in my judgment result in a concentration of industries and occupations to a tremendous degree. It would lessen the distribution of the activities and occupations of people throughout the length and breadth of the globe, and therefore I am not sure that it would add to the happiness of humanity. But in the world we live in to-day, where the unit is the nation and where the purpose of national policy is to serve the whole, I am utterly unable to understand how any country especially a young country, ever expects to secure diversity and distribution of occupation without a protective system. But of all countries which could so expect, surely this would be the last.

It may be that a nation far ahead, a nation which has the advantage of vast and long experience in production, a nation which has great facilities in world banking, which has tremendous plants and a large population to cater to, would be as well under free trade. Certainly it would be far better if all the rest of the world would be good enough to follow suit. But here we are situated alongside of the furthest advanced industrial nation of the world—we have to direct our affairs with constant relation to this truth—a nation which holds a tariff in front of us year after year, decade after decade—I almost said century after century—a nation which almost absolutely denies us access to its markets save for such raw products as it has to have in order to make money in their manufacture.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MORRISON: What about our farm implements? They have access to that market.

Mr. CALDWELL: What about boots and shoes?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I had better answer the hon. member now. He says: Oh, they do not put up a tariff against farm implements. They put it up against farm products and manufactured goods, but implements and boots and shoes they let in free. So the hon. gentleman says that we ought to let our tariff down because now we can get into their markets. I venture to say that if he will speak to any hon. member who represents a constituency where boots and shoes are manufactured, he will find no boot and shoe manufacturer, "with gray matter in his skull," to use the ornate language of the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey), who, having control of the capital of an organization will invest that capital in a factory in Canada whose product is to be sold in the United States—adapt his plant to produce goods to meet the various tastes there—for he knows that, even with the United States tariff down, harassing restrictions and every possible obstacle will be put in his way, and as well that in the course of two years, the tariff may go up and all his investment be lost. This has been the experience in so many instances that the business men of Canada have learned.

I want to know what hon. member with a dollar to invest, thinking of establishing an enterprise, if he knew that in the United States he would have 110,000,000 people to cater to, and that here he would have only 8,000,000 or 8,500,000 and only such portion of those as his competitors over there had not taken for themselves, would establish himself here instead of there. I should like hon. members to think these things out. It is a hard cold fact that business men, as farmers and everybody else, usually go—subject to certain patriotic restraints—where they can do the best. And, with a plain case before them of every advantage there which could be got here—save, of course, certain local conditions and circumstances which, in the aggregate and speaking generally do not amount to a great deal—and with only a fraction of the advantage here that they would have there, which of them would choose to establish on this side of the international line rather than on that? But the manufacturer who starts in Canada depends, of course, upon having an advantage in his home market corresponding to that which his American competitor has in his own country. This is the experience of Canada, and we have learned from our experience.

I will not labour the point further. I have no hope on earth of ever convincing some hon. gentlemen to my left who say our course now is to drop our tariff inch by inch and foot by foot, because they believe the United States is going to have a lower tariff soon, and they think, forsooth, that this course on our part would likely accelerate that condition of affairs. I have listened to so many prophecies about what the United States are going to do in the way of low tariff that I have almost lost my faith. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) will recall that, year after year, he thought they were getting pretty close to a low tariff in the United States. If he does not recall it, he will remember the eloquence of his friend from Red Deer of that date, who professed, in season and out, right up to the emergency tariff of 1921, a belief that the United States were getting pretty near to free trade. He used to employ the language used in this debate by the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw). "Why," he would say, "over there they are paying just a few cents per capita in customs taxes and here we are paying a great deal more per capita; so we are far more protectionist than they." This really was the language echoed by the hon. member for West Calgary. As if the amount they are paying per capita was not governed by the height of their tariff. Why, on the reasoning of the hon. member for West Calgary, Great Britain is to-day the most highly protected country in the world. They have a far higher per capita customs duty than we have, far higher, I think ten times as high as that of the United States. No, the hon. member who was leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Crerar) shed his prophecies when the emergency tariff came down, but he seems to have passed the mantle of Elijah to his successor from Brandon (Mr. Forke), for that hon. gentleman rose even in this debate and foretold that they would very soon have a low tariff in the United States. I would advise him to wait. He will possibly see a reduction—but he will likely live to see that reduction done away with. If he lives long enough, he will come to the conclusion that we had better make our tariff to suit ourselves.

Mr. FORKE: I think I stated specifically, when I spoke on the budget, that we ought to frame our tariff independently of anything the United States might do. Our fiscal policy should be one to suit ourselves.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am very glad that, to this extent, I have made a convert of the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke). I ask him carefully to remember his words, to remember, when the question of reciprocity comes up again, the virtuous conviction of this hour. He is right to-day, and I hope he will give us a better example of the perseverance of the saints than this government has ever done. Yes, we should make and maintain our tariff according to a principle which is suited to Canada.

Mr. FORKE: I agree with that. I do not see what I have to take back.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I wonder if hon. gentlemen to my left believe that in attacks upon this principle—for many of them make them sincerely—they are really making any gains. They heard the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) say: "This budget is the death knell of protection; protection is not all gone, but it is going little by little; its death knell has rung." They heard that all right, and they heard the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) proclaim that the blessed day of the execution of the 1919 platform was about to dawn. They have listened to those things, but I wonder if they have listened to other things as well. Have they heard from hon. gentlemen over there any falling away from the protective principle? Those men who are going to vote for the budget, scores of them—does anyone think they believe in the principle of the hon. member from Marquette? Does anyone think they believe in it even as applied in this budget? Not one out of ten of them does, and all I need appeal to is their words in this House. For example, the hon. member for Quebec county (Mr. Lavigueur) is ready to vote for the budget. Yes, but he says: In our country we are making boots and shoes; you keep your profane hands off boots and shoes; I will support you as long as you stick to something we do not make; I am ready to vote for low farm implements, because, as he answered me, that is protection for the farmers; but boots and shoes, never! He complained that the duty to-day was far too low on boots and shoes—he who is supposed to stand up in this House and vote for a duty one-third the size in respect of a very vital industry in this Dominion. Let no one mistake my words: I support the hon. gentleman from Quebec in respect of boots and shoes; but I apply his principle all round. I wonder whether hon. gentlemen to my left think that those across the way really believe in one single argument they have advanced. Hon. gentlemen have been advancing the argument all along that when you impose a duty you make the farmer or the consumer pay the whole amount of it not only on imported goods but over the whole line of similar Canadian-made goods which they buy. Well, if such is the case in boots and shoes I am sorry for the consumer. Of boots and shoes we are importing about 5 per cent of our supply, so that for every dollar of the duty paid in taxes, according to hon. gentlemen to my left, there is paid the sum of $19 to the manufacturer in Canada. And this, mark you, is a "revenue" tariff government. Let hon. gentlemen listen to the Prime Minister when he speaks and they will find him extolling the virtues of a "revenue" tariff. Yet this government of "revenue" tariff is taking, in the boot and shoe industry, about $300,000 a year in duties, getting it only from 5 per cent of an importation. The government know right well that if they cut the duty in two on boots and shoes they would get far more revenue for the country. Will the Prime Minister dispute that? Do not let him or any other hon. member say that I am suggesting the cutting of the duty on boots and shoes. I would not have made the reduction of last year, for I believe in fair protection for boots and shoes the same as for everything else. But imagine a government pretending to advocate a "revenue" tariff, and collecting a duty which it does on the importation of a commodity in respect of which, according to their friends and allies, there is involved an imposition on the consumer of $19 for every one dollar collected in taxes. No; the hon. member for Quebec county (Mr. Lavigueur) says: "Keep your sacrilegious hands off boots and shoes." But he is just the same as the others. What about the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe)? I warned hon. gentlemen to my left two months ago that if they wanted to test the government's real opinion of the principle which they—the government—are always denouncing, all that they had to do was to turn their barrage against boots and shoes. Why, when a delegation came down two weeks or so ago the Minister of Justice appeared before them and, as reported to me, tried to have them think that we were attacking the duty on boots and shoes on this side. The minister nods; he says no. Well, I am glad to have him confess openly in this House that we have not attacked it. But I do know that he painted himself as Horatius on the bridge standing gallantly against the Tarquin hosts.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend from Lanark (Mr. Preston) yesterday said that the Minister of Justice was looking after his own constituents and was not touching boots and shoes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: So he is; but why not look after others too? The Minister, says, "Don't put your hands into my county". And what about the Minister of Customs, the hon. member for Three Rivers, (Mr. Bureau)? He is ready to vote dismay to the city of Hamilton; he is quite prepared to sacrifice the city of Toronto, the city of Brantford, and indeed to sacrifice all his divorced wife's relations so long as Three Rivers is left untouched. But if any one attempts seriously to invade the industries there, he will know something of what it means to prod the tiger in his lair. Again, what about the Minister of Railways himself? He stands in the citadel of Brockville—there at least is his home—and, while he has not done much to the constituency of South Essex, he is ready nevertheless to strike a blow at Hamilton, at Toronto, at Brantford, at Smith's Falls, in short, at all those counties which suffer particularly from the virtual abolition of duties on their manufactured products, but glancing jealously at the Canada Forgings planed in Brockville he holds up his warning hand and says: "Keep your fingers out of my lawn mowers". He extracts lawn mowers—

Mr. GRAHAM: My right hon. friend, if he will read the tariff carefully, will gather a great deal of information in regard to other items which are affected very materially and which I might say something about.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have read the tariff, and I have the information, but I am on lawn mowers just now. I know that these articles are extracted from a schedule of spades, shovels and the like which the minister reduces and lawn mowers are left with a duty of 20 per cent, 30 per cent and 32½ per cent. The whole thing is a calculation of how few constituencies, and consequently how few votes, need be sacrificed in order that the government may purchase the support of hon. gentlemen to my left.

On motion of Mr. Meighen the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question being put, pursuant to rule.

QUESTIONS

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—RETURNED SOLDIERS

Mr. BLACK (Halifax):

1. How many returned soldiers have been appointed by the Canadian National Railways. in Pictou county, since January 1, 1922?
2. What are their names and to what positions were they appointed?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. 8.

2. G. H. Cummings, crossing watchman; J. H. Dunn, brakeman; Wm. Landry, T. S. Penny, G. W. Sinnis, W. B. Wilson, Noble McKay, locomotive wipers; George Sinnis, stores issuer.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—POLICE OFFICER, PICTOU, N.S.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax):

1. Who is the Canadian National Railway Police Officer in the town of Pictou, Nova Scotia?
2. When was he appointed, on whose recommendation and why?
3. Who was the previous incumbent of this position?
4. When was he appointed and when did he retire?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. P. O. Carroll, C.N.R. uniformed watchman in Pictou.

2. Appointed July 10, 1923, by the late general manager to protect coal pile and other railway property.

3. There was no former incumbent.

4. Answered by No. 3.

COAL MINING RIGHTS

Mr. BROWN:

1. Have any coal mining rights by way of lease or otherwise been granted since the 6th of October, 1919, in townships 55, 56, 57, 58 and 59, ranges 7, 8 and 9 west of the 6th initial meridian?
2. If so, to whom?
3. What total area was included?

Hon. Mr. STEWART:

1. Yes. Three applications for leases of coal mining rights within the said townships were accepted by the department on the 5th day of June, 1919, and payment of the rental of the areas applied for, amounting to $3,840, was accepted by the department on the 2nd day of July, 1919. Owing to unavoidable delays leases in favour of the applicants of the rights so applied for were not finally issued until the 20th of February, 1920. As the applications had been made in strict conformity with the provisions of the regulations for available coal mining rights, and as the department had accepted the rental for the first year, there was no other course but to issue leases under the regulations.

2. Edwin Jochin, John Moyes, L. R. Wolaver.

3. 3,740 acres.

Mr. BROWN:

1. Are there any subsisting leases or licenses to take coal from the following lands in townships 55, 56, 57, 58 and 59, ranges 7, 8 and 9 west of the 6th Initial meridian?

2. If so, when were they made?

3. To whom?

4. Who are the present holders?

5. If a company, who are the directors, officers and shareholders?

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE ACTING MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Wednesday, May 14, the debate on the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Acting Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into committee of Ways and Means and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Woodsworth.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have made some references to the stand of hon. gentlemen opposite who are known to favour the protective system but who support the budget because they feel that there is no serious immediate blow aimed at their constituencies, and that they can afford to sacrifice something of the fundamental interest of the country for the sake of votes on division in this House. I had not completed the number, but I am sure hon. gentlemen everywhere know that the vast majority of those who on the other side support the sacrifices of industrial interests as embraced in this budget would never support them if they affected the immediate constituencies from which they come. I do not think anything could make clearer how utterly without principle, as described by the member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) this budget is

I desire to refer, but very briefly, to some remarks the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey) made yesterday. He is fond of historic lore, and called to his assistance various authorities and raised some objection to quotations which had been made supposedly from the great Abraham Lincoln

The whole point he was discussing, as I got it, was as to whether some particular way of stating the case for protection had been adopted by Lincoln. Well perhaps the quotation used was the way Lincoln stated it, perhaps it was not, I am not going to climb the archaeological tree to find out; it is sufficient for me to know that Lincoln supported protection, I am not particularly interested in just how he put the case.

Mr. HOEY: The quotation was often used in the campaign of the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No doubt there were many who attributed it to Lincoln, and I notice that all those who did not were opposed to protection themselves. But it is much more important to have the authority of a man like Lincoln, a man of intense patriotism, of deep human sympathies and of great practical wisdom—better far to have his authority from the practice of his life than to have the exact phraseology in which he defended his belief. We used to hear for many years—usually from the former hon. member for Red Deer, Mr. Clark, the opinions also of John Stuart Mill. The case is now taken up by the member for Springfield, and he protests against any inference that John Stuart Mill would support a protective policy in America for any period longer than twenty years after the time he lived. Well, I join with the hon. member in respect for the names of great thinkers and philosophers, of the past. As for Mill I certainly would have regard for his opinion as respects an economic question, as to what principle should be applied to conditions as he saw them and was able to study them. But when it comes to asking me to accept the opinion of Mill as to what would be right as applied to conditions a quarter of a century, or a century afterwards, the draft on my veneration is too heavy.

Mr. HOEY: Does the hon. member know that I was simply replying to an argument of one of his own members.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He was referring to what an hon. member had said, that Mill, observing conditions in America as he did would favour, or at least would not object to, a protective system there. I say I respect Mills' opinion as applied to conditions within his knowledge, but when he speaks of what would suit conditions away in the future, I must be permitted to appeal from the predictions of the last century to the facts of to-day.

The hon. member quoted a letter from a former member of this House, a most respected man, actually proving that we have some industries running in Canada yet. I do not know that any one disputes the fact. We have, as respects most industries in this Dominion, a protective system yet. We have a more or less serious invasion now, a tendency and a constant threatening and warning which does infinite harm;—but we have industries yet. I made inquiries as to those woollen factories to which the hon. gentleman referred, and, my information is that the product of one or both, is a particular line of material as respects which there is no serious, if any, competition from the Old World. These also have some protection.

Mr. HOEY: That would not apply to cream separators which I quoted.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, not to a cream separator. The hon. gentleman turns the cream separator handle year after year. But there is something worthy of remark in this connection as well. Do not rely too much on the cream separator when you are managing a Dominion. It happens to be a specially intricate mechanism the manufacture of which depends on special patents, and thereby enjoys protection of another kind which renders it not so necessary to have the regular rule apply. But I want to tell the hon. member that, from the mouth of the manufacturer himself, I have been frequently told that the difference between the cost of manufacture of a free trade cream separator and the price the farmer pays is bigger than it is in respect of any implements protected by the tariff to-day. He mentioned also one or two factories which had closed, and criticised their management. He did not like the salaries that had been paid. I did not gather very fully just what he was trying to show, but I did gather this; that the man who drew the salary also had a very considerable stock interest, and I would imagine if it were possible for him to continue the business and save his stock he would likely do so. He evidently found it was an impossibility. I never before heard his capacity as a business man impugned. Indeed in other industries he has been successful. According to the hon. member, the business failed, not because of lack of business, but because of lack of money. This is usually the cause of most businesses failing.

Reviewing some other remarks of the hon. member, I was rather astonished to find that he followed a very bad precedent in respect of immigration figures. He has placed on Hansard now the figures of the migration from Canada to the United States, as reported by the Immigration Department of Washington, reading the figures for "1911" and each year down to "1923", but on inquiry I find his years all end with June.

Mr. HOEY: The fiscal year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, and in that way he escapes the disastrous months between July and December of 1923. I do not know why these figures should be concealed from the House.

Mr. HOEY: I tried to obtain them, but was unable to do so. I was very moderate. I did not state that these figures included the British possessions of North America, including Newfoundland.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know where Newfoundland gets into this.

Mr. HOEY: But the figures for Newfoundland are included. The figures are given for British North America.

Mr. MEIGHEN: For Newfoundland?

Mr. HOEY: For British North America.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the hon. gentleman takes very much comfort out of that he is welcome to it. How many would go from Newfoundland? But why did he not give the figures up-to-date? I got them up to the present time. I got them two months ago as nearly up-to-date as the figures of two months ago would permit, and my figures now date to the end of March. The figure I gave the House from memory yesterday was correct, which was 181,973 for the full 1923 year. For the 12 months ending 31st March last, the total was 200,816, and these only embrace those who go across and pay the $8 head tax, who report themselves as intending to stay, or from whom the money is collected in case they do stay. Everyone knows, unfortunately, that they do not include a very large number indeed who flit across the line. We do not rejoice in these figures, but it is better to have the actual facts.

Mr. HOEY: Will the right hon. member give the House the number of American citizens who have come to Canada in the same period?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman gave them for one year, I did not check them up. He said some 22,000, but when you find 200,000 going out, it is hard to rejoice evermore over 22,000 coming back. The hon. member referred to a slump in the figures of emigration for 1922, which he ascribed to the fact that all the country knew a Liberal government was returned to power. Those figures for 1922—July 1, 1921 to July 1, 1922—were half during the period of the previous government; and the half during the period of the government before were materially less than the half during the period of the present government. But, imagine the theory of the hon. gentleman. Take for example, the woollen industry: From an actual specific census it has been learned—and all could not possibly be traced—that on account of mills closing down enough employees had gone to the United States to total more than ten per cent of all employed to-day. The hon. member's theory is that the reason these people went to the United States was that there was not enough Liberal policy in effect; in a word, the reason they went to the States and the reason the mills closed to make them go, was that they had too much protection. Any mind that can follow a sinuosity of that kind deserves the highest commendation.

Referring to the woollen mills, these were attacked in the tariff two years ago, but not very heavily. The tariff at the time was low. The reduction was 2½ per cent on most lines of goods, and on certain small lines some 5 per cent on the British preference schedule was taken away. A year ago, on all commodities enjoying 15 per cent, 10 per cent more of the duty was taken away. Following this there was an immediate influx of Old World goods, supplanting goods made in this country, an influx which, in the case of tweeds, overcoats, flannels, and serges, doubled in 1923 the importations of 1921. For the eighteeen months before the 1922 budget these importations totalled $11,000,000, and for the eighteen months succeeding totalled $18,500,000. The increase displaced goods made in Canada. All this meant men out of work who otherwise might have been employed. All this meant emigration, and I wonder who got any benefit in this country. Hon. gentlemen may think: "Well, every time you take off a duty, there is a saving to the consumer; you save just the amount of the duty." It cannot be denied that, particularly at the beginning, in some cases a slightly higher price would result from a duty. But that it is universal, is entirely untrue; that it is general and continuous, is entirely untrue. I have before me figures to show this, in relation to industries which to-day enjoy a protection of 30, 35 and 37½ per cent, goods which are selling throughout the length and breadth of Canada manufactured, wholesale and retail, at the same prices as across the line, goods of ordinary consumption, goods representing millions and millions of dollars' worth of the consumption, of the people. The reason is this: The makers in Canada enjoy the Canadian market, and being certain of a stabilized

Canadian market, they are able to produce on a comparable scale with their competitors and can put the goods on the market in Canada at the same price as in another land. Why, in respect even of implements, if he will read the official, the undeniably correct, statements of those who have manufactured them—I refer to that of Mr. Thomas Findlay in particular—he will find that, those countries which had those industries protected had enjoyed far lower prices for their implements to the consumer than those countries which had no tariff at all. This applied, not in individual countries alone, but everywhere, with the consequence, at least in some, that now they have erected a forty to fifty per cent tariff and are encouraging and actually succeeding in making the goods at home. They will thus arrive at a price comparable with that prevailing in those countries which have built up their industries under a protective system.

I will again illustrate my point. I do so with facts given to the government by those immediately concerned. I ask the government to correct me if any of the facts I relate are wrong. I give, by way of illustration, the glass industry as some time ago established in this Dominion. A factory was constructed during the years 1918, 1919 and 1920, at Hamilton, capable of producing some 20,000,000 square feet per annum, or about two-thirds of the consumption of Canada. In that industry some $2,000,000 was invested. It went into operation. At the time the venture was launched there was in this country a protective duty which averaged approximately 18½ per cent, that is to say, 18½ per cent on the assumption that the Belgian franc was at par or nearly par. Three hundred employees were engaged in the work of producing glass; some 300 or more were likewise employed in the production of raw material, silica and the like, and some 69,000 tons of freight came to our railways chiefly in the carriage of raw material which, ordinarily speaking, volumes in freight about ten times what the finished product does. These were the immediate advantages to this Dominion. Over in Belgium the glass industry has reached its greatest development. There, the industries are connected by a mutuality, and they virtually decide what, in their own best interest, is the price that should be quoted to other countries. When our industry got under way, the Belgians reduced the price to Canada to 40 per cent discount; and, with the 40 per cent discount and the disadvantage of exchange, levelling our duty to a very small fraction, the Canadian industry was crippled. Being denied the slightest assistance from this government, it was compelled to close its doors. Well, you say, we at least got the glass 40 per cent cheaper. Yes, we did, until the industry closed its doors; but when the industry was out of business, then the 40 per cent discount was abandoned and 17½ per cent premium was put on instead, and the people of Canada had to pay for the glass and 17½ per cent premium as well. In a word, we are paying virtually what the duty would have been had it been imposed by the government, and the whole of it charged to the Canadian consumer, and we have lost the industry and wiped out $2,000,000 of investment.

Mr. CRERAR: When was the company started?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The building was completed, I understand, in 1920. I ask that these facts be impugned if in any degree they are wrong.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Did the industry to which my right hon. friend has referred not close its doors before this government came into office?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The submission made to the government stated that they closed their doors in May, 1923, after they had appealed in vain to this government to assist them with a duty. All the duty they asked was one-half cent per square foot up to 2½ cents, according to the standard, a duty which, ad valorem, would be—on the basis of only fifteen cents for the Belgian franc—18½ per cent, or about the duty which protects the industry in the United States. I wonder if hon. gentlemen feel that the refusal was wise. I wonder if they can read from this lesson just what would take place in respect of other industries if the same policy were followed. Even if the whole duty were added, to the price, it would amount to three dollars on a five thousand dollar house. This sum of three dollars, or say the half of it, or, perhaps, a quarter, or, perhaps, later on, none at all, which would be the addition to the price to the consumer in the case of glass—because we are at present paying the duty, only we are paying it to Belgium—decides in each single case whether a sum amounting to $100 or $200 stays in Canada or goes to swell the occupations and the population of another land.

The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Hudson) came to the conclusion that we could not become a self contained country—he said no country could; In the absolute he is right. No country, I presume, can become absolutely self-contained. Accordingly, as one would infer from his argument, there is no use trying. Let us stop all trying he says and whatever it is we need, let us buy it, no matter where. He based his claim on the contention that in western Canada we are not industrial, we are not going to be—and that because western Canada, therefore can not, as he said, get results from a protective tariff, it is not right that a protective system should prevail. Western Canada is more industrial that the hon. member is ready to admit. Western Canada has advantages which, with added population, and provided we have a fiscal system which permits it, will be the source of many industries as time goes on. I have in my hand a letter which illustrates the situation there as respects the rolling mill industry, and I will read only a paragraph. I have permission to read it. It illustrates, in much the same way as the glass industry, the case for a protective tariff. I am reading from a letter from the Manitoba Rolling Mill Company, Limited:

We are supplying most of the bars used in the prairie provinces east of Calgary.

I may say that since the reduction in the Belgian franc it is impossible now to get west of Calgary.

We are not making much margin on it because the competition is too keen, particularly from Belgium where wages are less than half what we pay and where their product is carried to Vancouver at present for $4 per ton. But we are keeping $1,000,000 a year right here in Manitoba that was formerly sent out of the country. We pay double as much for scrap as was formerly paid, before there was a rolling mill here. We use 15,000 tons of coal per year, mostly western coal; we pay $150,000 per year in freight, and we pay directly at our own plant about $425,000 per year in wages and salaries, in addition to indirect wages and salaries that are paid in another way, all of which formerly went out of the country. A very small reduction in the tariff would close this plant.

I pause to give the hon. member (Mr. Hudson) permission to say now whether he would support such a reduction as would close that splendid rolling mill plant in the city of Winnipeg. If he would not, why then does he support reductions which imperil plants here in eastern Canada and in British Columbia? Why has he supported reductions which already have destroyed plants in various parts of this country?

A very small reduction in the tariff would close this plant, but if an opportunity is allowed for it to grow it will eventually become a large industry, covering a considerable range of production, and be a permanent contribution to the wealth of the country, notwithstanding Mr. A. B. Hudson's hostile speeches and his enmity towards the industries in the West.

Mr. STEVENS: Not a word.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: Now I am going to make a few remarks on the present changes. They embrace reductions on agricultural implements; reductions, however, far more serious in the case of those other manufactured products which enter into the construction of such implements; reductions as well in mining and logging machinery. There is a reduction in implements of some 4 per cent on the main items, 5 per cent on some others, and as high as even 10 per cent. Reductions are given however on what are called raw materials but what are really manufactured materials produced by other supplying plants. The importation of these materials is allowed virtually free, wholly free in so far as pig iron and steel are concerned, and almost free as respects all other commodities. Just what the effect is to be on the agricultural implement industry I do not undertake to say; time will tell. I do not presume that very great change is made as respects that single industry; but the penalty is heaped on others in order that hon. gentlemen to my left may be enticed.

Great comfort is taken by the Prime Minister out of a statement which has been issued by the Massey-Harris Company. The effect of that statement is that the company intend to carry on and try to adjust themselves to new conditions; immediately following its issue was a proclamation of the Prime Minister that Massey-Harris supported the contention of the government. Have hon. gentlemen carefully examined the Massey-Harris statement? I do not see anything very extraordinary in it.

The provisions of the budget which exempt farm implements from the sales tax are most welcome, and these combined with the lowering of customs duties on raw materials announced in the government's amendments, now enable the manufacturer to make an immediate reduction in his prices. So far as the Massey-Harris Company is concerned—and no doubt this applies to other implement companies—there will be passed on to the farmer in the way of reduced prices the complete saving effected in the remission of the sales tax—

Wonderful! They are not going to pay a sales tax to the government so they are good enough not to collect it from the farmer.

—and the lessened duties on raw material.

Whatever they save in that regard, they will not charge to the farmer. A previous paragraph asserts their intention of endeavouring to adjust themselves to new conditions. Well, this is the attitude of British people generally; this is the right attitude. Note that they promise no reduction in price because of the reduction of duties on their own product. But the men who are hit by this tariff are the men who are supplying the other manufactured goods which the agricultural implement makers use. I wonder how hon. gentlemen to my left justify that. I wonder how they justify a reduction, for their own benefit especially, in any case. Were we not asked a year ago to vote for a resolution moved by the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) which not only declared a lack of confidence in the government, but declared also that the budget of that time was a protective budget? Were we not urged to support a resolution, which declared particularly against the stability which had been promised? This was supported by speeches the general purport of which was that the farmers did not want something specially for themselves, but wanted the necessaries of life reduced? They were not specially interested in implements the hon. member for Brandon said: No, it was a great principle they were contending for, the reduction of duties for everybody on the necessaries of life. And hon. gentlemen to my left had no confidence in the government at all because the government at that time would not concede these claims. Now, a year afterwards, when they have been given, as they believe, something for themselves, their enthusiasm is exuberant, their confidence in the government is restored. Now that they believe they have something which is to their own advantage, their confidence in the government is so great that they will not even vote for their own platform for fear the government will be displeased. This is about as illuminating an example of unselfishness as the House has ever witnessed.

I have been impugned because I will not now support a reduction in farm implements, and the honour has been done me by hon. gentlemen of quoting from a speech I made in 1911, in which I favoured a reduction on farm implements. The resolution which I moved at that time read:

> That this House is of opinion that a substantial reduction in the duties on farm implements is now due to argiculturists of Canada and is in strict accord with the true purpose of a protective tariff.

By the terms and principles of that resolution, and of the speech I made in support of it, I abide. But I wonder if there is any difference between the support of a reduction from a duty of 20 per cent and 25 per cent at a time when the industry was flourishing, when its profits were good, and a reduction now from a duty of 10 per cent and 15 per cent after several years of successive losses. If one favours a reduction from a level of 20 or 25 per cent, then to be consistent according to the logic of hon. gentlemen opposite, one has to keep right on reducing until he leaves no duty at all. Or, in a word, a physician called in to treat a patient for obesity, who prescribes until he brings him down to normal proportions, must be arraigned as inconsistent and indicted as an apostate unless he presses right on until he reduces his poor patient to a bloodless corpse. As respects the duty on implements, I do not depart from the principles I enunciated eleven years ago. Would that some other hon. members of this House could say the same! But I want to add in justice to myself that while the principles as there enunciated were right, and while the facts I there adduced were true to the very best of my power collection, nevertheless, to adapt language which I know will fall pleasantly on the ears of hon. gentlemen to my left, the language of Sir Robert Peel: I cannot withhold the homage that is due to the province of reason and of truth by denying that my opinions on the question have been matured by experience and by a close observation of Canadian affairs. At that time I did not give the weight I would give to-day to the importance of a large export trade in the keeping down of prices at home, to the importance of a large scale of production based on the security of home market and of large export trade—to maintain prices low in the country of origin.

I do not think any hon. member will say that we ought to give a special advantage to a foreign industry. But is that not done by this budget? You can reduce slightly—and hon. gentlemen themselves did in 1907—the amount of protection on specific things produced by an industry, but when you wipe it out altogether on a whole long line, robbing our industries of millions of dollars of business in this country, industries which pay a duty of 53 cents a ton on their coal, as high as 27½ per cent on the raw material which they have to import, and as well pay our corporation tax and submit to our general level of taxation—necessarily high—industries which on their plant had to pay duties—in one case alone amounting to $4,000,000—which their competitors across the line did not have to pay,—and which now have to pay interest on that money, when you place them in a position in their home market where their competitors get in without a single charge and take the home market from them, I want to know what you think of the fairness of the proposal. Yet this is what the budget has done. This is the price hon. gentlemen of the government have paid, this is the sacrifice to the Progressive gods in order to secure the party's vote. This applies right down the line. This is done not on the basis of any principle; none is even suggested. Would anybody suggest a principle which justifies putting the steel industry, say, in such a position, or many other industries which are affected, and maintaining the duty on furniture at 30 per cent, or the duty on stoves at 25 per cent or on lawn mowers at 32½ per cent—can anybody suggest any principle for such a thing? I could go down the list of hundreds of articles and show that nothing else is the result of this wonderful budget.

Now, hon. gentlemen contend—I refer particularly to those to my left—that they are justified in supporting the budget. Why? Because last year stability was promised, and this year stability is destroyed. I should like these members to listen during the 4. p.m. speech of the Prime Minister while he proves to you that stability is still maintained. Don't they expect it? Don't they know that every man on the other side of the House who supports the budget will contend in his defence that stability is maintained? Of course hon. gentlemen to my left are right, there never was a more violent assault on stability, not in the last thirty years, than there is in this budget; nor has the effect of that assault ever been more immediate and more apparent. Imagine the government suggesting not a reduction of duty of 2½ per cent on certain lines of goods as made last year—that is tariff revision—but a tariff reduction of 10 per cent and 5 per cent and 4 per cent and the wiping out of the tariff on whole lines of goods, that is not tariff revision; that is tariff stability! You can have stability and still, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) said last year, make necessary minor adjustments from time to time. But no rightly constituted mind would suggest that these are merely minor adjustments. These are substantial variations of the tariff, striking at certain vital and important industries of this Dominion. No, the promises of 1919 went by the board; but the promise of 1923 has gone by the board as well. The hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey) who spoke yesterday said: Surely, surely though you believe in a protective tariff, you do not want it maintained at the price of perfidy, you do not want the government to break its solemn engagement of 1919?

Mr. HOEY: That is repudiating the mandate of the electors.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not so sure. Is the hon. gentleman quite sure that such was the mandate of the electors?

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. HOEY: I have not any doubt whatever.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I wish I could so easily be sure one way or the other. When you have three groups in a general election it is pretty hard to tell what the verdict of the electors is; and when besides you have the whole contest smeared with a cloudburst of misrepresentation it is still harder. Anyway, does the hon. member think that sixty-five members of this House who appealed to their constituents on the Laurier-Fielding tariff were elected to destroy that tariff? Does he think that the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond), who was elected on a platform which denounced us for reducing the duty on agricultural implements, was elected to reduce those duties still more? Does he think the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Mitchell), who went before his constituents as a protectionist and who thus followed the example of his party leaders in the province of Quebec, the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler), who also followed the example of his party leaders, and who declares in this House that he had the solemn word of those leaders as his authority for that step—does the hon. gentleman mean to say that those members were elected to destroy the protective tariff?

Mr. HOEY: Hon. gentlemen always clap before they hear the full truth. If you deduct twelve members from the Liberal party, there is still an overwhelming majority in favour of the 1919 platform.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would like the sixty-five, the whole membership from the province of Quebec, yes, and the Ontario membership to stand up and say—

Mr. CRERAR: Does that include the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster)?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, I think I had better exclude the hon. member for Brome. I congratulate the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) on this one of the ninety and nine. Those who listened to the following masterpiece of tergiversation and evasion, I wonder what it was they voted for? These are the words of the present Prime Minister in describing his fidelity to the platform of 1919:

> What mariner putting out into unknown seas would start out without a compass to show him in what direction to go, would plunge straight ahead into a rock if he saw it there, simply because there was some other chart that pointed that way at the moment.

I will now give hon. gentlemen time to think out what that means. I have tried for weeks myself, and I do not know yet.

Who can tell what will be the condition we will have to deal with to-morrow? This platform was laid down two years ago. We had not then acquired these railway systems.

No, that is quite correct, and the Poincare government had not fallen. Each has an equal bearing on the point. He goes on:

They ought to be applauding me for saying I am not going to follow any letter that leads to destruction.

Did the voters who answered that appeal vote for the 1919 platform? Or again, an auditor puts the question:

You stated in the House in 1920, that you would stand all fours by the Liberal Convention's trade platform. Now you say it is only a chart.

A very pertinent question because in 1920 we had acquired the railway systems, when the present Prime Minister affirmed his fidelity to the platform of 1919. Here is the answer:

I stated my position—

I read you how he stated it.

If it is not intellibigle to you I am sorry. That is not my fault. Do you know the meaning of this passage in scripture, "It is the letter that killeth, but the spirit that maketh alive." It is in accordance with that teaching I propose to carry out the Liberal platform. No legitimate industry need fear anything that the Liberal party might do in power.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is my hon. friend reading from?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am reading a quotation from the Brantford Expositor, I think. It is quoted in another paper. There is another portion really worth reading too.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If it is as good as the last it will be very good.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That was very good, the Prime Minister says. It was. It was simply typical of the whole nature of his campaign. Here is another extract from his speech at Sherbrooke:

There is not a man in the Liberal party to-day who would think of doing injury by way of tariff to any industry carrying on a legitimate business and earning legitimate profits. We have no desire to hurt any industry. Why should we do so, especially at this time? Where men are trying to create monopolies against the interests of the country we will let in the light and make a change, but have no thought of making a change where business is being carried on honestly and decently.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What paper is that from?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is a quotation from his speech as taken from the report of the Montreal Gazette. Does the hon. member dispute its accuracy?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, but my hon. friend has not read the whole speech.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I hope I would not. I do not know whether in this case, but in others, I have no doubt that if I went on I would read exactly the opposite. That is why the Prime Minister finds himself in the position he is in, in this House now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps my hon. friend would read to the House one quotation that is the opposite.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, I could read what the Prime Minister said in June 1920 in this parliament, when he read the platform of 1919 and declared as a matter of honour he was bound to abide by it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Read it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I read it here a year ago. Are we to infer that these industries as respects which changes are made, as respects which the whole protection in some cases is taken away, were not carried on legitimately? Were they earning more than a legitimate profit? I appeal to the Prime Minister to say, especially with respect to those who were not earning anything at all. I appeal now to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock): Are the industries attacked by this budget, whose duties are reduced or taken away, industries which were not carried on decently or honestly, or are they industries which were earning an illegitimate profit? The Prime Minister to-day finds himself confronted by hon. gentlemen to my left, telling him that he went to the country on the 1919 platform, reading to him the terms of that platform, and declaring that he bound himself in parliament and on the stump to abide by it, declaring that he got his support upon it, and at the same time hon. gentlemen opposite rise one after the other and say: The Prime Minister assured me in my own town that no legitimate industry would be affected, assured me that no industry earning only a moderate profit would be touched, and on that assurance I became his candidate, and on that assurance I was elected." Is it any wonder I question what the verdict really was?

Let me read now a statement from a paper which supports hon. gentlemen to my left, the Farmers' Sun. I have here an extract from that paper, an editorial from its issue of March 15.

The elector who has no partisan bias will find it difficult to give admiration or sympathy to either the deserters or their deserted leader. What is now taking place is a natural result of the peculiarly dishonest campaign the Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King and his lieutenants waged in the last general election. In the low tariff Maritime provinces and in the West the Liberal tariff platform held the centre of the stage. In industrial Ontario the 1919 platform was dismissed as merely a chart, and promises given that no legitimate industry would be injured by a Liberal accession to power. Thus it was that while the party as a whole stood pledged to all-round tariff reduction, Liberal candidates, with Mr. King on the platform endorsing them, were bidding strongly for protectionist support. The present Premier was a party to this deception, and now that circumstances compel him to make important concessions to gain Progressive support, he is in no position to criticize his insurgent followers.

I wonder was that not a pretty fair statement of the position. It is very hard to tell what a verdict is under conditions of that kind. We hear now loud and long proclamations of the death knell of protection, while the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) stands and says: The issue now is clear; we are against, you are for protection.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: "Hear, hear," he says, but do you believe, Mr. Speaker, that when the test comes his colleagues will abide by that position? Do you believe they won't welsh just as they did in 1921? Don't you know that hon. gentlemen over there, not by the half dozen, but by the score—

Mr. FORKE: You forget that we can do it ourselves.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman says he can do it himself. Let me finish my sentence and I will reply to him—they will go to the country with the words of the hon. member for the county of Quebec (Mr. Lavigueur), with the words of the hon. member from Charlevoix-Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) who declared that the Minister of the Interior a single member of the government had no right to speak for the government—they will go to the country with these words on their lips, and consequently if they come back as Liberals at all they will come back by the protectionist vote. Now, the leader of the Progressive party says, "We will do it ourselves." Let me say frankly now in the face of hon. gentlemen to my left that while those across the way will welsh on the issue they—the Progressives—will welsh themselves. Yes, in the last election they did not stand true. In the last election down in the county of Cumberland their candidate ran on a platform of protection for the coal industry; outside of coal he did not care. In the last election the hon. member for South Waterloo (Mr. Elliott)—who sits among them, who votes with them, but who now has flinched at this budget—went to his constituents on a protectionist platform. He declared that we had to have a tariff commission in this country before whom manufacturers could go and if they needed protection they would get it. I do not know that hon. gentlemen to my left are very much entitled to boast of their superior position. All we want, all we ask is that the word of the Minister of Agriculture, the word of the Minister of the Interior, be accepted, and that we go squarely to the people of Canada on the protection issue.

It is contended in respect chiefly of our grain producers whose crop of wheat is largely—about half, I think—an export crop, that they have to sell their wheat in an export market and take the export price; that consequently in respect of that particular product, they cannot be protected—their price cannot be raised by a tariff and they argue accordingly that those wheat growers have no particular interest in the home market, that however large it gets it would not affect the price of their export products. I have some agreement with the statement of fact, and I have always contended that in respect of a product such as grain where there is a large export the price is naturally on the export level.

Yes I have some agreement with the statement of fact, but is it to be argued that because by its means you cannot raise the price of wheat, the home market is not of value to Canada, and is not of value even to the raiser of wheat in this country? The hon. member for Battleford (Mr. McConica) argues in this House that the home market is a myth. He has a very poor opinion of the home market and describes it in language of contempt. I venture to say that when he was in public life in Ohio he did not describe the home market of the United States as a myth or if he did it would not be much wonder he is now in Canada. In the first place the home market is of tremendous value to the rest of the country. As respects wheat, something that we export in very large quantities, I do not believe the home market could directly or very substantially affect its price. But have we no interest besides wheat? Have not the farmers of Canada, as respects a vast proportion of their products a vital interest in the home market? Besides the bringing to them purchasers for the great body of their products—the best market they possibly can have, a market which consumes nearly all the production in a large class of cases—besides that I ask hon. gentlemen to my left has the farmer of this Dominion no interest in providing in Canada those industries which will enable his son, if he wants to leave the farm, to get work in his own country and not have to become an exile in another land? Even if we assume we cannot raise the price of his wheat that is no reason at all why we should bring about conditions as a result of which his son will necessarily have to travel away instead of establishing himself in our own country. By arguing to the contrary my hon. friends are creating a wrong impression entirely.

Mr. FORKE: The right hon. gentleman never starts anything right.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Where am I wrong in starting?

Mr. FORKE: You started by declaring that we do not want a home market and that we are against creating industries.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the hon. gentleman wants a home market why does he discourage it in the way he is doing?

Mr. FORKE: I never discouraged it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman says he did not? His friend from Battleford called it a myth.

Mr. FORKE: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I leave it to the hon. member for Battleford, yes and many more of them to settle the matter with my hon. friend; I was referring to the language used by the hon. member for Battleford. The home market is a benefit to all classes in Canada. The home market is Canada.

I bring another point to the attention of hon. gentlemen to my left: How are we to discharge the debt of this Dominion, how are we to carry the burden of government in this country? Is it not of some importance that we should keep in this country the tens of thousands who are going to the United States? Every family here would be helping them to pay our taxation, and if they were here would be working for employers who would be contributing to the revenue of Canada. Hon. gentlemen say "Oh, just take these two, three, four, five dollars off our implements and then watch us pay taxes." Now, assume that the amount that is going to be saved, or rather reduced, by this tariff on implements is all going into their pockets.

Mr. FORKE: We never said that, you say it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How are the taxes to be paid?

Mr. FORKE: By the people of this country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But if the people go how are they to be in the country? The hon. gentleman is convinced?

Mr. FORKE: No, I am not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: To keep the people in the country is of just as much interest, and will be of as much immediate benefit to the farmers of the West as to any other class of the population. Imagine the effect of this slight reduction of duty! I venture to say not $300,000 in its entirety will be taken off farm implements. Add to that if you like the home consumption, if you still stick to it that your theory is right, and you have something like $700,000. Hon. gentlemen know that even if they had a law which brought the whole of this money into the treasury of Canada, if they gave it all to the Minister of Finance, it would not fill the hollow of his hand; it would not buy the kitchen of the Scribe hotel.

Mr. CRERAR: I wish to ask the right hon. member a question in order to be clear on his argument, which I have not been able to follow very closely, perhaps—my own judgment is that it is rather sinuous. Is he arguing that the exodus to the United States would be stopped if our tariffs in Canada were raised higher?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think I made it very clear.

Mr. CRERAR: No, you did not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I made it very clear that it was largely caused by the reductions already made.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend is evading the question and I want an answer.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will answer it, yes.

Mr. CRERAR: Very good.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would not be opposing the reductions if I did not think they should not be made.

Mr. CRERAR: But you would raise it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: You have to raise it to get back to where it was.

Mr. CRERAR: I dislike very much interrupting my right hon. friend, but the exodus to the United States was started long before; in fact the figures he quoted in the debate on the Address showed that. Now he states he would raise the duties that have been lowered. Does he think the tariff as a whole is too low and would he raise it in order to stop the exodus?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the hon. gentleman refers to every schedule and every article, I can answer him. It is safe to say that in my judgment many of the duties are plenty high enough, but the influence of this government upon others has been injurious.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the matter with hon. gentlemen? Every time they put their hands to the statute book they write sentences of idleness and expulsion against many people of this country. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) says there was emigration before. Certainly there was, and there will always be emigration; but when you find it increased nearly three times over from one month to another, and hold the high level throughout a whole year, it is a pretty serious matter to seriously minded men. And I fancy when you are able to trace the men thrown out of employment in factories as respects the products of which the duties were lowered, trace them into the States by the hundreds, you can find the reason they fell out of work and the reason they left the country.

I do not advocate a high protective tariff, but I advocate a tariff that is protective. I advocate a tariff that, being protective, is fairly and equitably protective, and not a gerrymandered system such as the government now presents.

Mr. GOULD: Is it not a fact that after 1920, when the right hon. gentleman was leading the government, we had the longest bread line ever known in the history of Canada?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, it is not a fact by any means. In 1921 there was considerable unemployment. When you get 400,000 or 500,000 men coming back all at once from Europe where they had been fighting for their country, you will likely find considerable unemployment until these men are absorbed. I wonder what would be the condition if we had 400,000 or 500,000 of our sons journeying back to the Dominion at the present time! The reason we have not more unemployment to-day is the unfortunate reason that while the United States was enjoying a wave of prosperity denied to us, our men became absorbed in the republic.

Mr. GARDINER: Was there any unemployment in this country in the winter of 1913 and 1914?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There was some. I never hope to abolish unemployment absolutely, but I do not consider that a reason why we should not try. I do not hope that we can ever become a wholly self-contained country, but I believe in approximating to it with all the might we possess. I do not think we can ever have absolute stability, but that is no reason why we should be continually hacking at our tariff and placing our industries in peril.

As respects agriculture in Canada to-day, it suffers just as agriculture suffers the world over. Does any hon. member really believe that, with agriculture the world over producing grain crops by the hundreds of millions of bushels above the average production, and with the largest consuming continent twenty per cent below its average consumption, we can produce at once a healthy, wholesome agricultural condition by any fiscal system in the world? These conditions are world-wide. They obtain it is true in the United States in respect of the grain area. They obtain the world over, and they are suffering in some other countries even worse than we are here. But in Canada surely something can be done. In Canada our policy should be to endeavour to get, not only for manufacturers but for farmers, a preference within those markets which are the best for the whole Dominion. I have been in favour of a British preference all my life, but I want a British preference for which something is obtained. This was the purpose of the British preference as originally instituted. I can see no reason for a British preference or any other preference unless it is of benefit to the country which gives the preference. I believe in Canada standing up for her own interests in trade matters, and adopting a policy which will improve the business of this Dominion. I know of no other way to hold our own. We have hope, and there is reason to have hope, that we can accomplish something in this direction. If we make concerted effort throughout the whole Empire we can, I should think, get results. But if our representatives at the Imperial Conferences where these matters should be pressed, adopt an attitude of indifference and merely support in cold formality, almost in silence, a preference resolution; if by their attitude they give British statesmen reason to believe, that the people of Canada have no interest in the British preference, I do not think we will get far. Let our statutes as well reflect the preference we look for, and let us ask for it and work for it in the interest of Canada and of the Empire as a whole. Let us look to Britain rather than to the south of us where we have always looked in vain, or where when there has been action it has not ultimately resulted well.

Encouragement should be given of every possible kind—and in every possible way to western agriculturalists toward perfecting a system of co-operative marketing. I would like to see such connection established between our western selling organizations and the great co-operative institutions of the Motherland as will help a preference to be established and trade beaween them developed. Then there would be an immense future for agriculture in Canada. I have always welcomed the efforts of western agriculture towards co-operative marketing. Indeed, I think the Wheat Board example given by the late administration had very much to do with the voluntary efforts of western agriculturists to-day. That example was set in the days when policies were carried through to success. Speaking to a concrete matter, I know of no reason why the Minister of Finance should deny to those efforts the meagre help of the money now in his hands, money which belongs to the farmers of the West—money contributed by them, which is not the money of the minister, money which is the property, strictly speaking, of those who sold the grain to the old Wheat Board. This money should be returned to them as their own property, as carefully and as accurately as may be possible. I know the minister's difficulties; I know it is impossible to give the money exactly to the men to whom it belongs; but because this is impossible is no reason why the closest approximation should not be made. The duty of the minister is so to divide the sum that it will reach the men to whom it belongs and give them every possible encouragement in the work upon which they are now engaged. These, along with the suggestions of a very practical character made by the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. LeSueur), are the efforts which should be made on behalf of agriculture at this time.

I do not think we are doing enough in the way of outside representation to advance the sale of the farmer's products and I am sure we are not doing enough to secure to the farmer the advantage of the market of the Dominion which he has helped to build. Why, for example, should we, an agricultural country, be in the position of buying from the United States—that great industrial nation—$81,000,000 worth of farm products, and selling them only $51,000,000 worth?—These are imported in this quantity because our tariff is one-half to one-third of theirs, and the smaller figure is the extent of our export because they maintain a high duty against the products of our farms. Canadian farmers are absolutely entitled to a higher tariff against farm products from the south. Do not think I am arguing that this particularly is going to affect wheat; it will have an effect, as regards many and very important products of the farm. To secure better the home market of Canada would be of very great value to farmers, particularly in the central provinces of this Dominion.

We are asked: What has protection done? For four decades this country maintained resolutely a protective system—a tariff fashioned to the needs of Canada. Throughout those four decades we made solid and increasing progress, and we made it against great odds—against the handicap of a farther developed nation right along our side—a nation of our own tongue abounding in all those attractions that a spirited and diversified industry can supply, rich in every allurement that draws to itself the seeker of a home or the soldier of fortune.

Against this formidable rival with the like of which no other country ever had to contend we grew in stature and wealth. We multiplied our manufacturing production ten fold, me multiplied our mineral production seventeen fold, we multiplied our agricultural production ten times. We opened up a Western Empire and spread a net work of transport from ocean to ocean; We laid the foundations and erected the girders of a big well balanced country where millions of virile people could live and multiply and make their home. At the end of that period such was our strength that we stood unbowed beneath the economic weight of a war participation undreamed of as within our power. True we experienced through this time, in common with every country and concurrently with our neighbours on this continent those variations of industrial expansion incident to every land, cycles of exhilaration and relapse round which the peoples of the world press forward their uneven march. But at no time in those forty years did we fail to improve our position and at no time could we be contrasted unfavourably with those other countries with whom we compare and with whom chiefly we compete. In 1921 we suffered with them reaction from the inflation of war. But we suffered no more than they. The numbers of our unemployed were indeed less by half proportioned to our population; the industrial disturbance was less severe.

Then came the period of tariff bombardment, tariff threatenings, trumpetings and the blowing of horns. Two parties contrived to control this House—or rather one party with two divisions and two names. The great body of the one and a small portion of the other believed in tariff destruction. The other portion who believed in a protective tariff was lulled into acquiescence by the prospect of a political triumph and by equivocal assurances of apostasy given by the Liberal leader. The Laurier-Fielding tariff was the banner held aloft in industrial Canada. The 1919 platform was the battle-cry down the concessions and through the prairie West. As was inevitable both groups of followers have been betrayed. We have not in Canada to-day either the one policy or the other. In fact we have no policy at all. We have had a process of tariff hacking, chipping and tinkering—in fidelity as declared by the honourable member for Waterloo—in fidelity to no principle whatever. We have had nothing but a bartering of tariff concessions on the auction block, the victim industry chosen every time with an eye to political support; with an ear tuned to the division bell. Every day this chamber has rung with denunciation of our fiscal system even from the ranks of the government, loud vauntings about the goal of free imports, threatenings and slaughter breathed out by three ministers in succession—stability promised a year ago, the death-knell of protection to-day. This is the melancholy record of two and one-half years of power.

What would honourable gentlemen expect? —I appeal to the business men of this House—what would you expect would be the consequence on industry? There is alarm, there is dismay, there is a stoppage of expansion; there is depression. The United States strengthened their tariff defences three years ago and sprang forward after '21. They have enjoyed a wave of prosperity the most abundant in their history, not universal but almost universal in its sweep. For the first time we have failed to share even a reflex of that prosperity. The industries which this government has attacked have languished. Speaking generally those only have prospered who have engaged in selling our crops which fortunately have been heavy and in selling our natural resources and those dependent on them. To-day every member of this House knows that the feeling through Canada is anything but wholesome or hopeful. The barometer of migration is ominous. From the city, from the town, from the factory, from the farm, the procession is distressing. A year ago its volume suddenly rose to three times its normal dimensions. And still they go. Their numbers may diminish with the saturation of the United States—but are we making work for them in Canada? We are circumscribing the area of employment every day. The inevitable consequences are upon us. Capital alarmed, business harassed, production dislocated, agriculture unassisted, labour contracted, tens of thousands of our children exiled, the debt heavier, taxation multiplied, the budget juggled, these are the reapings of thirty months of this government, the cruel cost to date of its brief and inglorious career.

What this country needs the bitter lesson of experience is teaching now as never before. First and fundamentally Canada needs a protective policy consistently and unflinchingly pursued. Canada needs a fearlessly Canadian policy—a national policy in the sense that Macdonald conceived it, in the sense that Laurier maintained it. Long enough have we trifled with this thing: long enough have we flirted with theories suited only to a non-existent world to a world where all conditions are alike, all production on equal scale, all labour of equal standard, all markets open, all currencies at par, or suited at best to a country the very antithesis of our own. The time is coming now to settle this question, and to settle it for good. A right fiscal policy is vital to any country; it is a thousand times vital to Canada. For our part we welcome the issue. Almost anything would be better than what we have now. We are in a condition of anxious enervating suspense, industry crouching under a sword tossed between two leaders in this House, a state of perpetual premonition, a sort of endless thunder and lightning betokening a destructive storm. The Conservative party is for protection —for the farm, the mine, the factory, the whole of Canada. To those of other parties in this House I say, you are either for protection or against it. If you are against protection say so and draw your sword against it. Do not talk about tolerating it or palliating it;—if it is wrong, get rid of it and the sooner the better. On the other hand, if you are for protection stand up and say so and join the ranks of its defenders. Do not camouflage your colours by talking about a revenue tariff when you mean a tariff on goods made in Canada. Do not camouflage your colours by talking of a Laurier tariff or a Fielding tariff, or a tariff for the home or any of that meaningless humbug. Protection is protection, no matter what you call it; it is a tariff on Canadian-made goods; it does not matter what you call it. Do not flinch the issue; do not confuse the issue. Let its friends give battle to its foes. Let us have a clean, clear fight and a definite verdict and let this Dominion get on its way once more.

This country needs, yes this country must, if she is going to carry on, take to herself for her own good all the advantages she possesses. She must assert fearlessly in her law and her administration, not in any spirit of retaliation but in a spirit of self-reliance, her faith in her own resources, her unalterable determination to get for her people the full finished harvest of those resources. In tariff, in internal organization, in diplomacy, this great purpose has become more and more the guiding star of policy in other countries of the world; especially has it become more and more the fixed policy of the United States, and will be for years to come, as every one of us knows with only temporary variations. And even if every other country abandoned this course—an impossible presumption— even if they did and the United States alone persisted, this Dominion would still have to pursue it and pursue it unswervingly if we are going to sustain the contest. We must keep work in Canada if we want to keep workers in Canada.

To this great end we need every day of every year to encourage our people, east, west and centre, by our own speeches, through the press, by our conduct in parliament, to think in terms of the whole Dominion and to understand that only when they are doing so are they in reality thinking out what is best for themselves. The tariff above everything else is a matter for the nation, it is a question of national policy. The habit of thinking in sections on this subject and carelessly assuming that the loss of one is the gain of another—that habit is pernicious and disintegrating. The loss of one is the loss of all.

Mr. MORRISON: Has the right hon. member spoken that way in Montreal?

Mr. MEIGHEN: In Montreal, in Toronto and wherever else I have spoken.

Mr. MORRISON: We have not heard the hon. member speak that way in the West.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman does not attend my speeches there very much. This question broadly understood is not a question of adjusting a balance as between Saskatchewan and Ontario, or between Manitoba and Quebec. It is not a question of Montreal as against Saltcoats, of Toronto as against Pipestone, of Halifax as against Miramichi. It is a question of Montreal as against New York, of Sydney as against Pittsburg, of Hamilton and Toronto and Kitchener as against Buffalo, and Chicago and Detroit, of British Columbia as against the Pacific States, it is a question above all of Canada as against her rivals.

The call of this hour, an imperative, appealing call is for Canadians to think together and never to forget that Canada is one.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I desire to join with all who have spoken on this side of the House, as with most of those who have spoken on the other side, in expressing the regret which I think we all feel at the circumstances which have prevented our venerable Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) from being present at this session to discharge a duty to which he had looked forward with keen expectancy. Had Mr. Fielding been able to present the budget to the House it would have been his seventeenth budget. Although the right hon. the Minister of Finance has not been able to attend parliament this session, he has been following with the keenest and closest interest, the discussions which have been taking place. On each occasion on which I have had the opportunity and the privilege of seeing him—and that has been frequently—since his return from the South, the Minister of Finance has expressed to me the wish, should any of his colleagues desire it, that he should be permitted to come here on the evening of the division, notwithstanding the advice of his physicians, in order to show to the House and the country that he stands four-square by the side of the Acting Minister of Finance in the budget which has been brought down. In his absence, I wish to make it clear to the House that such is the desire and the wish of the Minister of Finance.

May I congratulate the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) not only on the budget he has brought down but also on his having brought it down at the early stage of the session at which it was introduced.

Despite the remarks of my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) and some of his supporters. I think the acting minister should feel deeply gratified at having brought down a budget which has met with general approval throughout the length and breadth of this Dominion, and has given fresh hope and heart to the people of our country.

We did not expect that my right hon. friend would become very enthusiastic over this budget. When we assembled at the beginning of the present session, the public had been led to believe that the country would again be confronted with a further increase of the public debt, with a deficit resulting from an excess of expenditures over receipts, with a contraction of commerce and trade, and possibly with an announcement of the need for increased taxation. The unfounded and irresponsible attacks made upon the administration in these particulars by the leader of the opposition and his detractions and misrepresentations in the course of his mournful pilgrimages through western and eastern Canada had, it must be admitted, given rise to doubt and created apprehension. I need not enumerate the circumstances which combined to make it difficult, if not impossible, for my colleagues and myself to attend to our many public duties and also find the time necessary to follow my right hon. friend everywhere in a refutation of these erroneous impressions. We knew that the facts were otherwise. We knew that as soon as parliament met the truth would become immediately apparent, and we were content to wait.

As hon. members well know, we had not to wait very long. The Speech from the Throne had no sooner been delivered than the public learned it had been deceived by the leader of the opposition with respect to the addition to the public debt; to deficits resulting from excess of expenditures over receipts; as to the condition of trade and the probability of increased taxation. They discovered that in each of these particulars the truth was the reverse—that the public debt for the first time in a decade has been diminished, not increased; that a surplus of receipts over expenditures would in all probability be announced; that trade, instead of having diminished, had vastly expanded and what was most gratifying of all, that taxation instead of being increased would be substantially reduced; all of which expectations have now been realized as disclosed in the financial statement of the Acting Minister of Finance.

In a word, my right hon. friend finds himself very much at sea, and is now endeavouring to restore the impressions which prior to the assembling of parliament he sought so assiduously to create. This afternoon he endeavoured to make it appear that as a result of representations made in the last general election a sort of nemesis was overtaking the government, and he drew from the papers he had in hand a copy of the Farmer's Sun from which he read an editorial setting forth, according to his statement, the view that there were divisions in the ranks of the Liberal party, and that this was a punishment for its sins. In this connection let me read to the House an editorial from the Farmer's Sun of April 12, 1924. My right hon. friend did not read this editorial. He has a way of picking and choosing here and there whatever suits his purpose; he does not try to place all the facts before the House, but prefers to give a partisan, partial statement of a kind that will the better serve his ends. In brief, he carefully avoids anything that will bring out the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth. As I say, this is characteristic of my right hon. friend's method. It will be all the more apparent to hon. members on listening to the following editorial from the Sun, which I think he should have read when he presumed to draw deductions from the editorial which he presented a few minutes ago. This is an editorial which appeared in the Farmer's Sun of April 12, 1924:

A Commendable Budget

The full measure of the benefit to be conferred upon the primary industries of this country by the tariff and tax reduction proposals submitted to the House of Commons by Hon. J. A. Robb on Thursday cannot be estimated until they are considered in detail, but it is apparent, even upon a cursory examination, that Premier King and his colleagues have made a sincere effort to carry out, within practicable limits, some of the pledges given to the electorate by the Liberal party in 1919. It is equally apparent that Mr. King has merited the support which Mr. Robert Forke, on behalf of the Progressive group, intimated, at the opening of the session, would be given to the governmnt, providing it brought forward progressive measures. Ever since the Speech from the Throne announced the intention of the government to lift some of the burden upon the instruments of production, Premier King has had to withstand tremendous pressure, not only from interests likely to be affected by tariff reductions, but from within his own party. This pressure, it was feared, would cause the government to whittle down its tariff relief proposals. In fact, so general did the impression become that the government's proposals would be of little importance, that The Montreal Gazette a day or two ago interpreted a statement of the Minister of Finance as an assurance that relief would be given by tax reductions rather than tariff changes.

Mr. King seems to have yielded little to protectionist urging, and the new budget will certainly be fought to the bitter end by Hon. Arthur Meighen and his colleagues. There are protectionist Liberals who will leave the ranks and join him, but these desertions will not be serious enough to hinder the adoption of the proposals.

Nothing could be truer, Mr. Speaker, than that the proposals will be adopted.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My right hon. friend believes in always reading everything. I have another editorial here dated April 6, from the same paper, headed: The Wobbling Mr. King.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The editorial my right hon. friend directs my attention to opens in this vein:

> Just where Mackenzie King is going to land finally in matters of tariff policy will not be known until the budget is brought down the middle of this month.

That was April 5. The editorial I read appeared on April 12.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is April 5—several days after the budget was brought down.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The budget was not brought down till April 10th. My right hon. friend, when it comes to a recital of matters on which he wishes to score a point, has a genius for a sort of political thimble-rigging. I do not think the country could have a better example of his method of procedure in public affairs than that which he has exhibited at the moment. The truth is he cannot get over the fact that "this government"—as he continually says—"this government" has succeeded in bringing about a condition of greater national prosperity, has succeeded in having a surplus instead of a deficit, has placed on the records of this country in its statistical tables figures which cannot be questioned as to the expansion of trade, and has reduced taxation; these are things, that irritate his feelings and cause him very often to lose his better judgment and in his one desire to discredit the ministry, to indulge in extreme language and misrepresent the condition of the country.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that while the constitution fixes five years as the term of parliament, although half of that term has not yet elapsed, the country has had presented to it the third budget of this administration, and each budget has shown a progressively improved condition not only as respects reduction of the public debt but also as respects reduction of expenditure, reduction of taxation and increase of revenue and expanding trade. In short, in all the essential features of our national economy there has been steady and marked improvement. That is the most convincing and gratifying evidence the country can have as to how its affairs are being administered by the present government.

Let me take first of all the public debt. During the period of the war and demobilization there had been, year by year, gigantic increases to our public debt. They did not cease even with the period of demobilization. The war ended November, 1918. I shall say nothing of the additions of the fiscal year 1918-19, nor of the fiscal year 1919-20. It might have been expected, however, that the fiscal years 1920-21 and 1921-22 would have seen an end to the additions to our public debt. On the contrary, however, the public debt continued to increase. In the fiscal year 1920-21, the debt increased by the sum of $92,010,360. The next year, 1921-22, which represented nine months of office of my hon. friend and his friends, indicated an addition to the public debt of $81,000,000 or over. As I said, speaking on this matter in the debate on the Address, had it not been for the fact that the present administration was in office three months of that fiscal year the chances are the increase in the public debt for 1921-22 would have been as high as the previous year—$91,000,000 instead of $81,000,000. The year following, this government had to meet a vast number of obligations which had been left by the previous administration. In the matter of preparing our budget we were not free. We had to meet these obligations, many of which were uncontrollable in their character, and as a result we were unable at the end of the first year of office to do more than show a very material reduction in the increase which had been made to the public debt in the previous years. Instead of the public debt showing an increase of $91,000,000 as in 1920-21, or $81,000,000 as in 1921-22, the increase had fallen to something like $30,000,000, odd, a decrease of $50,000,000 as against the preceding year.

Coming now to this year, which is the first in which the government has really had some show in the matter, we find that instead of adding to the public debt $30,000,000, as was the case at the end of the last fiscal year, we are now able to speak, and speak honestly, of a surplus amounting to over $30,000,000 on the last year's business.

My right hon. friend has tried to make out that in some way that surplus is not genuine, that because the government guaranteed loans for the National Railways, to the extent of $50,000,000 that amount should have been included in the public debt. All I can say, Mr. Speaker, is this, that in this matter, as in most matters of administration, the government had the officers of the Finance department follow precisely the same methods as had been followed by the previous administration. My hon. friend the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) when he brought to the cabinet the statement which he brought to parliament, intimated to his colleagues that these were the figures which had been given to him by the officers of the Finance department, that they were taken from the books of the Finance department, and that they were made up in exactly the same manner as records of previous years had been made up. My hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) in 1920-21 guaranteed a loan of $50,000,000, $25,000,000 to the Canadian Northern and $25,000,000 to the Grand Trunk. That was not included in the public debt. The following year my hon. friend made another guaranteed loan.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will my hon. friend permit a question? Does he recognize the difference between a refunding issue and other issues?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend will permit me, I will come to that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would point out that while my hon. friend will find that there is some $12,500,000, it may possibly be $14,000,000—

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Better sit down and learn your lesson.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON—which was not refunded out of the total of these loans, during the year out of current cash we refunded over $15,000,000, $29,000,000 altogether being the amount.

Mr. GRAHAM: It was not added to the public debt just the same.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, it was.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was not. In the following year my hon. friend guaranteed a loan of $50,000,000, $25,000,000 to the Canadian Northern and $25,000,000 to the Grand Trunk. In speaking yesterday, the right hon. leader of the opposition tried to convey the same impression which his former Minister of Finance has sought to convey, that in some way the loan with which he had to do was concerned wholly with refunding operations, and that therefore there was a reason why when this government dealt with the matter it should deal with it in a different way. Well, I happen to have in my hand, Mr. Speaker, a statement secured from the books of the Finance department, showing how the guaranteed bond issues were dealt with, and I find that my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance did not segregate the different accounts on which the moneys were paid out, but some were paid out for one purpose and some for another. First of all out of this guaranteed loan, some $5,000,000 was allowed on operating deficits of the Canadian Northern, and to the Grand Trunk a sum of $1,095,000 for the same purpose; for interest and sinking funds there was allowed to the Canadian Northern the sum of $8,907,907, and to the Grand Trunk the sum of $5,216,175.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I stated all that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, my hon. friend did not state it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I gave the total.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I challenge my hon. friend—

Mr. MEIGHEN: I stated the total was about $14,500,000 or $15,000,000, but I stated that so long as the total amount guaranteed by bond did not exceed the total amount refunded, there was no need to add to the debt. And it did not exceed it; indeed, the refunding was greater by $15,000,000 in our time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to give the balance of these figures: For acquisition of property, materials and supplies there was allowed the Canadian Northern $5,172,807.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Out of what?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Out of the $25,000,000 guaranteed bond issue.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have a statement to the contrary.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: These are the figures given by the Finance department; they are taken from the books of the Finance department. On that same account there was allowed to the Grand Trunk $5,157,402; for construction, and betterments for the Canadian Northern $2,725,784.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is that 1921 or 1920?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The 1921 loan.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have a statement here from the annual reports of the Canadian National Railways, as follows:

> During the year an issue of $25,000,000 Canadian Northern, 6½ per cent, twenty-five year sinking fund bonds guaranteed by the Dominion were sold in New York in payment of advances by the Dominion Government.

That is refunding.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I submit in a matter of this kind, if there is any difference of view as to which is correct or not, that I am justified in appealing to the books of the Finance department in the statement I give to the House. This statement has been given to me by the officers of the Department of Finance, and will be substantiated by them. Of that total of $50,000,000, $4,421,663 went for the Canadian Northern to meet principal of maturing loans, and $11,717,596 to the Grand Trunk.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is that 1921?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. I think this proves what I have just said, that my hon. friends opposite in presenting their statement to parliament did not place in the columns which relate to the public debt of this country the guarantees made to the railway companies. I would submit further that while my hon. friends opposite might well have included those guarantees as additions to the public debt, because the railroads at that time were in a state of bankruptcy, and what they were doing was to meet the bankrupt condition of the roads, since the present administration has come into office a change has taken place in the position of the national railways under the management of Sir Henry Thornton and his board of directors—a condition which justifies the government in feeling that these roads are entitled to have some guarantees given for what they need in the way of betterment and equipment without the amounts being added to the public debt.

There is reason to expect that with the business of the railroads progressing as it has progressed within the last year or two, it will be only a very short time before the National system will return dividends to the people of Canada. In 1921 there was a deficit on net operating expenses on the National system of $11,848,000. In 1922 there was a surplus of $2,886,711. In 1923 the net operating revenue was $20,236,000. During the past twelve months, if we take the period for which we have a record now, up to February 1924, the net operating revenue amounted to $23,768,000, and the president has stated that for the year 1924 he believes the net operating revenue will equal $30,000,000, and that in two more years the system will cease to be a burden to the taxpayers. Now, that was justification, if justification were needed, for our not including as additions to the public debt such guarantees as these we have made.

May I add further that with respect to Dominion government accounts it has not been customary—not only during the last couple of years when hon. gentlemen opposite were in office, but running back for the last twenty-five years or more—to include as additions to the public debt guarantees of such a character. From 1896 to 1911 guarantees were made to the extent of $124,000,000, not a cent of which was added to the public debt of the country. Between 1911 and 1921 guarantees were made to the extent of $170,000,000, not one cent of which was added to the public debt. Why then should this government ask the officers of the Department of Finance, in the preparation of statements for parliament, to change the method of bookkeeping and of presentation and give to parliament something entirely different from the methods adopted in previous years.

Mr. MANION: Were not the guarantees between 1896 and 1911 guarantees for private corporations where the corporations were paying the interest?

Mr. GRAHAM: And they did not pay.

Mr. MANION: They paid some.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In regard to these guaranteed railway loans I think it is a fact that not a dollar of the money raised was placed in the federal treasury; there was a trust account made out to the railroad. That account is kept entirely separate from the government accounts and has always been kept in that way. Hon. gentlemen opposite have spoken about refunding, and I think the leader of the opposition said yesterday that "there was refunding and refunding." Well, if hon. members had time to go over the transactions they would find that a good deal of the refunding which my right hon. friend did in his day was to meet temporary loans that had been issued in order to meet deficits of the railway which was in a bankrupt state. That kind of refunding I think ought to find a place in the additions to the public debt. But every dollar which the railways have had of the money which has been issued under the guarantees of the present government has gone into construction and equipment to make these roads better revenue payers than they are at the present time. So we say, Mr. Speaker, that our accounts have been made up in a regular and proper manner.

More than that, not only does the federal government follow this method, but the provicial governments do not include in their additions to the public debt like guarantees made by them. The Ontario government have guaranteed forty-two millions to the Hydro-Electric Power Commission, and these amounts are not included as additions to the public debt.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Are not these active assets? Does not the Hydro-Electric pay its interest?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In the case of our guarantees we have reason to believe the National Railway system will pay the interest very soon. Will hon. gentlemen opposite say that whatever is done for the Canadian National Railway system, in the way of branch-line construction and the like, should be added to the public debt of Canada? That is the contention which my right hon. friend is making at the present time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I contend that all advances for capital or for anything but refunding, so long as the security taken is not active, should be included in the national debt..

Mr. GRAHAM: That is directly opposite to the course which has been practised for the last twenty-eight years.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We have only had these railways for four years.

Mr. GRAHAM: You do not want to treat our railways even as they were treated when they were in private hands?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is not the point at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have said enough to make it perfectly clear that what the government has done under the present system of control is identical in method with that followed not only when hon. gentlemen opposite were in office two years ago but with the custom followed for the last quarter of a century. I think I have made it very clear also that the system we are following is the method which is also followed by the provincial governments.

I should like to draw attention to the care with which the Acting Minister of Finance presented his statement to the House. He did not try to give the government more credit than it was justly entitled to. True, he was able to point out to the House that the books of the government showed some $30,000,000 in the way of a surplus, but he was careful to inform parliament that of that amount $1,300,000 odd was in the nature of some obligations that had been cancelled, and that $9,300,000 was in the nature of the payment of a book debt which was owed to us by Great Britain. So that there were $10,000,000 for which he did not in any way claim special credit for the government. But where was he to put the $10,000,000 to which I have just referred unless he included it as part of the surplus of the year? Was he to add that to the public debt of the country? There was no other place he could put it; he had to make a statement exactly in accordance with what the figures showed.

The outstanding feature of my hon. friend's statement was that for the year, from economics which the government has practised, he was able to show a net surplus of revenue over expenditure of $20,000,000. More than that, my hon. friend when he brought in his budget mentioned that he was in a position to present to the House only estimates; he was very guarded and very careful not to overstate the facts. To-day we have the complete returns up to the end of the fiscal year and what do they show? They show that while my hon. friend did not overestimate the revenue he did very considerably overestimate the expenditures. He overestimated the expenditures to the extent of some $5,000,000 with the result that the surplus we have to-day is in reality $35,000,000 instead of $30,000,000.

Hon. gentlemen opposite have made various estimates of the public debt. The ex-Minister of Finance made one estimate, the leader of the opposition made another estimate. I need not point out that their figures were not the same. They both gave to the House different versions. My hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) made an estimate which was also different but which, except as to the placing of the guaranteed loans, was I think very fair. He went into the figures carefully and I think accurately. He however took the position that the $50,000,000 guaranteed should be included as part of the public debt.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that we were right in not including it; but my hon. friend will have this consolation, that if he had had all the figures when drawing up his statement, he would have shown, not that the government had a deficit of some two million dollars, as he figured out according to his calculation, but a surplus of three million, including the fifty million dollars guarantee. He would have been able to show it for this reason: That of that fifty million guarantee there are seventeen millions still in the treasury, or were in the treasury at the end of the fiscal year, which had not been drawn out. The fact therefore is, Mr. Speaker—and I give this to hon. members as conclusive as to the country's position—that in the treasury of this country at the present time, in actual cash, there is that surplus in round figures of thirty-five million dollars.

Let me give now figures of reductions in expenditures. Here I think my right hon. friend will find great difficulty in rebutting what I have to say. I have spoken of the three budgets, and the increasingly better showing which has taken place as each budget has been brought down. These figures are eloquent in themselves, I shall give them in the form of a statistical table which sets forth the figures for the fiscal years 1921-22, 1922-23 and 1923-24:

Budget of	Fiscal year	Total generally controllable expenditure	Total generally uncontrollable expenditure	Grand total disbursements
1922	1921–22	156,559,119	307,093,317	463,652,436
1923	1922–23	143,069,685	291,382,656	434,452,341
1924	1923–24	140,662,864	229,530,787	370,213,651

There is a difference of sixty-four million in disbursements between 1924 and 1923. If my right hon. friend wants to know where we get our surplus, there it is, from the economies we have practised. What does that show with respect to the estimate of the grand total disbursement per head of the estimated population of the country? It shows the total disbursements per head of population as follows:

	Grand total disbursement per head of population
1922	$51 77
1924	39 66

In other words, the disbursements per head of the population in 1924 were seven-ninths of those in 1922. For every nine dollars which my hon. friends opposite were spending when they left office, this government is now spending seven dollars. We have been able to reduce expenditure by that ratio.

What about the revenues of the country? They also contain something which reflects the improved condition of the country. Whilst the disbursements have shown a marked progressive decrease, the revenues on the other hand have shown an equally marked progressive increase. The figures are as follows:

Budget of	Fiscal Year	Total Revenue Receipts
1922	1921-22	$381,952,387
1923	1922-23	394,614,900
1924	1923-24	396,000,000

This table shows a steady increase each year since the government has taken office.

I take next the external trade of the country. My hon. friend said a few moments ago that everyone was leaving the country, not the people only but also the trade, that business was suffering, and that the country was in a bad way indeed. Here are the figures in regard to the external trade of the country, they disclose a vast improvement in the total volume of trade and particularly in the favourable balance:

Budget of	Fiscal year	Imports for home consumption	Total exports	Excess of imports over exports	Excess of exports over imports
1922	1921–22	747,804,332	753,927,009	.....	6,122,677
1923	1922–23	802,465,043	945,295,837	.....	142,830,794
1924	1923–24	893,335,491	1,058,553,297	.....	165,217,806

*1920–21: Excess of imports over exports—$29,730,763.

My hon. friend says the business concerns of the country have been closing down since the government came into office, that the changes in the tariff have affected business considerably. The figures I have quoted show that this is not the case. Had I taken the fiscal year 1920-21, when my right hon. friend was in office, hon. members would have seen that there was no excess of exports over imports that year; but an excess of imports over exports of $29,730,763.

Mr. MEIGHEN: About two years before it was five hundred million.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There are the figures as they relate to the period of time this government has been in office, and as they are recorded in the three successive budgets which have been brought down. Now then, what was the other outstanding feature? It is that this year there is a reduction in taxation of twenty-four million dollars. There you have reflected the condition of Canada. You have a surplus in the matter of revenues over expenditures, you have this great reduction in the total expenditures of the country, you have this vast increase in the total export trade of the country, and you have at last a government which is able to come before the people and say, "Having practised economy, having introduced policies which have been helpful to the nation's progress and development we are now in a position to relieve you of taxation to the extent of twenty-four millions of dollars."

I shall refer now to the other financial matter to which my right hon. friend referred yesterday. He took issue with the statement which I made that the previous government had left as a mortgage upon the wealth and the industry of this country the total capital cost of the war. I wish to repeat Mr. Speaker, that that is a true and accurate statement of the fact. The total cost of the war was met by hon. gentlemen opposite by means of loans, and not a dollar of it was raised by means of taxation. Here again, notwithstanding the figures which my hon. friend gave this House yesterday, I stand in the judgment of the House as to whether I am not right in saying that the appeal to be made in this instance should be to the books of the government as they were kept by hon. gentlemen themselves.

If hon. members will look at the books of the government as they were kept during the period of the war, they will find there were certain sums of money which were allocated to capital cost of the war; to expenditures of account of war and demobilization. There were other sums that were put down to current liabilities to be paid out of the consolidated fund, just as we are meeting all our accounts to-day. These were current obligations arising out of the war, lasting not only during the war, but continuing on for a more or less indefinite time. These obligations arising out of the war were, first of all, interest upon the outlays constituting the capital cost of the war. My right hon. friend would hardly say that the interest that was paid on the capital cost of the war should be added to the capital cost of the war. Interest in such cases is paid to avoid paying the capital—to keep the capital where it is and avoid paying it. But that nevertheless was one of the items that was included in the statement of the former Minister of Finance of what his government had met in the way of war expenditure during the period of the war. The soldiers' civil re-establishment and the soldier land settlement are the other two items. Soldiers' civil re-establishment was an obligation arising out of the war, an obligation which is continuing at the present time. Does any hon. member believe that it is a fair and accurate presentation of the facts to tell the country that expenditure on account of soldiers' civil re-establishment is a part of the capital cost of a war which ended in 1918? Yet there you have the basis of the figures which my right hon. friend gave to the House yesterday as his reason for denying the statement which I had made that the entire capital cost of the war was left to the country as an obligation by the governments of which he was a member and remains as such at the present time. That is the reason why for some little time it may not be easy to reduce taxation as much as we should like.

My right hon. friend put on Hansard yesterday some figures which he had not read to the House. While I take no exception to his having placed them on Hansard, I think he should have taken care to see that they were accurate. In giving the total expenditure to the country for 1919-20, he fixes the total expenditure at $743,763,186. Those figures should read $785,869,611, the larger figure including advances to railways amounting to $45,780,690. This figure makes the deficit for the six-year period, $1,684,179,975, as given on page 43 of Hansard of this session, when I gave to the House the figures as to the total expenditures. So, that even if we admit the right hon. gentleman's claim regarding sinking funds, the deficit during the six-year period would still exceed the total expenditure on war and demobilization account. There is no refuting the figures, and I think it is well that they should be before the country and the House again. Let me say that when I speak of the capital cost of the war, I include the capital cost of the war and demobilization. Demobilization is a part. These are the figures:

Year	Total Revenue Receipts	Total Disbursements	Deficit	Spent on War and Demobilization Account
	$	$	$	$
1914-1915	133,073,482	248,098,526	−115,025,044	60,750,476
1915-1916	172,149,393	339,702,502	−167,553,109	166,197,755
1916-1917	232,701,294	498,203,118	−265,501,824	306,488,815
1917-1918	260,778,953	576,660,210	−315,881,257	343,836,802
1918-1919	312,946,747	697,042,212	−384,095,465	446,519,439
1919-1920	349,746,335	785,769,611	−436,123,276	346,612,955
	1,461,396,204	3,145,576,179	−1,684,179,975	1,670,406,242

In other words, the exact figures disclose that during the years 1914-1920 $13,773,733 was spent on the business of Canada over and above what was spent on war and demobilization account during that period.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have been following my right hon. friend and his statement is incorrect. I have just looked at the Public Accounts, and I find, for the year 1920 the deficit is $390,000,000, as against the $436,000,000 that he showed. A very cursory examination is sufficient to show that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The figures I have are figures given me by the Finance department, which I have every reason to believe are absolutely accurate.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have the books here.

An hon. MEMBER: A misprint.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is not a misprint.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me come to another part of what I should like to say this afternoon. We have heard it said over and over again in this debate and emphatically by my right hon. friend this afternoon that, in the tariff changes which the government has made, the government has not proceeded in accordance with any principle; that we have acted in a haphazard manner. I think he used the expression that we have been "gerrymandering" amongst the industries. He was very very strong in what he said as to there being no underlying, guiding principle upon which the tariff changes had been based. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that the budget which has been brought down this year has been carefully planned, planned in reference to very definite principles. Those are the principles for which the Liberal party has fought during the years which have passed and for which it will continue to fight during the years which are to come. The guiding principle as regards the tariff has been its revision in such a manner as will help to increase production and help to decrease the cost of living—in other words, to effect a reduction in living costs and a reduction of production costs. Those have been, as long as the Liberal party has been the Liberal party, the aims and objectives which it has had in mind in all tariff matters.

I should like to emphasize that in this two-fold aim the Liberal party has had in view, not only producers, but also the consumers of the country. We have sought, in all our policies, to consider the interests alike of consumers and producers. There are some who say that it is impossible, at one and the same stroke, to render a service alike to producers and consumers. A view of that kind is a very superficial view. Let me give from nature an illustration which in a moment will make the matter apparent. The condition of the country is dependent very largely upon the seasons. If you have a spring in which the rains are just sufficient, a summer where there is plenty of moisture and sunshine and a fall that is free from blight, then you are apt to have harvests and crops which will bring plenty in the land, which will help the producers and the consumers, at one and the same time, and further national well-being as a consequence of helping both producers and consumers. On the other hand, if you have a spring in which there is not sufficient rain, droughts in the summer, frosts and consequent blights in the fall, not only are producers injured, but consumers as well and the entire country suffers.

Taxation is in the nature of a blight. Let it ever be remembered taxation is a burden whether it is on the back of the consumer or on the back of the producer. The man or woman who has to carry it is a burden-bearer, and the man or woman who is freed to some extent of taxation is freed to that extent of a burden. If you free consumers of that burden to that extent you are helping, not consumers only, but also producers, because you afford a larger purchasing power and ensure a larger demand for the commodities which are produced. Similarly, if you in some measure relieve the producer of taxation, you are helping also the consumer, because in relieving the producer in some measure of taxation, you enable him to produce in larger quantities or the same quantity more cheaply, and you help the consumer by having placed before him commodities in large quantity, and at a lower cost. Where it is possible to relieve the consumer and the producer of taxation, you are helping all classes in the community.

The most elementary knowledge of political economy teaches us that the factors of production are four: Land, labour, capital and management. In order that wealth may be produced, that industries may be developed, in order that there may be an export trade, and that a country may enjoy economic advantages over other nations, there must be a combination and co-ordination of these four factors.

What is the land? Land, in the broad meaning of the term, consists in the natural, material resources of the soil, the forests, the mines and the sea. Agriculture, lumbering, mining and fishing are the industries that grow out of the development of the natural resources; they are the industries that depend upon the soil, the forests, the mines and the sea. As you develop these natural resources, so you make possible the development of the whole of the industrial life of the nation. That is the great fact which lies at the bottom of this budget. We are seeking to make possible the development of the natural resources of the country in a larger way than has hitherto been possible, believing that as we promote this development we are helping the whole industrial life of the country.

Next, take labour; labour includes the actual labour in the country at any moment; but it also includes in a potential way the immigration that may come to the country to supplement existing labour. I maintain that there is necessary, as a supplement to a vigorous immigration policy, some policy which will induce immigrants to develop our natural resources. In other words, if you are going to stimulate in Canada the kind of immigration movement which is necessary for our development, you must endeavour in some way to attract immigrants to develop the resources of the soil, the forest, the mine, and the sea. It is in the great natural industries of the country that wealth in the first instance must be produced.

I come now to capital. What is capital? It is nothing other than wealth that is used for the production of further wealth. In the great basic industries, capital is the machinery, the implements and the tools required to aid labour in this development, also the food and clothing essential to the workers engaged while production is bringing forth its fruits. The capital that is essential to the development of these basic industries, upon which the whole of the national wealth and development depend, consists in the implements of production. That is why the Liberal party has always stood for the reduction to the lowest point possible of the duties on the implements of production, and particularly those that are connected with agriculture. We have been seeking a policy which would help to develop the whole of the national life; and it would be just as logical to put a tax upon every immigrant who comes into the country and goes to work in mine, or field or forest, as it is to put a tax on the implement he has to use in order to extract the wealth from the soil. We say, therefore, that in so far as the circumstances of the country will permit, we believe that in our policy we are laying the foundation of a great industrial revival in this country, that we are establishing a truly national policy.

My right hon. friend asks, why single out particular industries? Different members of the House who have spoken have conveyed the impression that we were discriminating against a particular class. We have done nothing of the kind. Let hon. members look through the records of the Liberal party and they will find that from the day on which the question of the tariff was first spoken of, the reduction in the duties on implements of production has been put forward as a foremost object of the party, and put forward for the reason I have mentioned.

Let us stop for a moment to consider further the nature of industry. What, in a general way, is industry? It is nothing other than the transformation of the natural resources of the country, through human intelligence and human energy, by the aid of natural forces, and of tools and implements, into commodities and services that are available for human use. That is all. Industry is a great process of transformation beginning with the basic industries associated with the soil, with the forest, with the mine, and with the sea, a process of transformation in which every handicap that is imposed at the base is carried on up to the very top and where whatever of freedom is given at the start is reflected all along the way. Our object in the budget, far from injuring in any way the industrial life of the country, has been to bring about an industrial development in Canada vaster than has ever been known before.

I have spoken of the different industries as being so to speak, built up one upon the other. I have in my hand a copy of the Canada Year Book which contains a list of the manufacturing industries in this country, not the individual plants, but the different industries, large as well as small. There are between three and four hundred altogether, the larger of which number about forty. Now, what does one find as one consults the classification? One finds that all the industries of this country —and I am speaking now of the manufacturing industries in relation to the tariff changes which we are making at the present time—are based, and depend for their raw material, upon the development of the four basic industries to which I have referred. First of all, there are the industries that grow out of the vegetable products, such for example as biscuits, confectionery, bread and other bakers' products, feed and flour mills, and so forth, comprising a list of some thirty-four. Then there are those that depend upon the development of the animal products, and also the textile industries. There are, further, the industries that relate to forestry, such as wood and paper, and those relating to the mines, such as iron and its products, non-ferrous metals and their products, chemical products, and so on; then certain miscellaneous industries; and, finally, the construction industries, hand trades, repairs, and so on. If one looks critically at this list of industries one will find that a great many depend almost entirely on the products of agriculture; others mainly on mineral products, some on the forest, and others again on the combination of the basic industries I have mentioned. In other words, the whole industrial structure, the whole industrial life of the country, is built up on the development of these basic industries. And that is the reason why in the tariff which we have brought down we have confined the changes to the reduction of duties on implements of production in the basic industries. We have tried to make possible a larger production in agriculture, in mining, in lumbering and in the fisheries, knowing that, as we help to stimulate these industries, every manufacturer and every employer in the country will be assisted. But not only will the manufacturing industries benefit; all transportation enterprises, the whole of the commercial and industrial life of the country, and as well the export trade and finance, will stand to gain, and with the industries and trades the great body of consumers who compose the nation. If one will pause to reflect one will see that that is the only sound national policy, the only basis on which national development can take place.

I might conclude this phase of my observations by presenting to the House an analogy which will serve to illustrate my conception of the relation of the manufacturing industries of the country to the great basic industries. I think of Canadian agriculture as the trunk of a great tree, and of its current production as the sap—the life-blood of the tree. The current products—the animal and the vegetable products—leave the trunk of the tree and supply life and aliment to the great branches—to such great manufactures as flour-milling, slaughtering and meat packing, butter and cheese, bread and bakery products, biscuits and confectionery, and so forth, as well as to such smaller branches as prepared breakfast foods, stock and poultry foods, condensed milk, tanneries, leather goods, and so forth—all of which industries were in days of less specialized production carried on upon the farm itself. My idea is that if we desire to promote the prosperity of even these smaller branches of our tree, the best way is to cultivate the ground around its trunk, from which it draws its sustenance, thus increasing the flow of products which pass from the trunk into the manufacturing processes of the branches. That, I submit, is the natural and obvious way of promoting industrial prosperity, and that is why this government is reducing the duties on agricultural implements—those duties which restrict production. But if I may go on with the analogy, the opposition's method of handling the situation is first to tap the trunk at its base by the duties upon agricultural implements, and thereafter to favour one branch of industry at the expense of another—in other words, to control and divert existing supplies of products rather than take the obvious way of increasing all products by working the soil around the tree and affording it all possible nutriment.

Similarly, again, with our forestry industry. In our statistical classification, there appear under the general heading "wood and paper" no fewer than forty-three distinct manufacturing industries deriving their raw material from our forests, which also supply a large part of the raw material for our construction industries. It seems to me that there can be no better way of promoting the welfare of these industries—the branches of our great "forest tree"—than by diminishing the duties which have a tendency to restrict our forestry production.

Again, the same analogy applies to the many industries based upon our mines and quarries.

This, Sir, is our reason for reducing duties on agricultural, forestry and mining machinery, and I feel that it is a reason which will commend itself to the good judgment of this House. It is true that certain industries may, for the time being, experience inconvenience from the partial withdrawal of artificial stimuli supplied to them in the past; while we regret this, our action must be determined by regard for the best interests of the country as a whole. The government has done its utmost to soften the shock to the industries immediately concerned, and to avoid the possibility of their sustaining any appreciable injury or loss.

There, Mr. Speaker, is the difference between ourselves and the opposition, there is where we join issue with our opponents. They stand for the protection of a few special interests; we seek to develop the industrial life of the Dominion as a whole and with it to improve its commercial and financial prosperity.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock I had been answering the criticism that was made to the effect that this budget had not been brought down in accordance with any principle. I think I made it pretty clear that the government had been guided by fundamental principles which have been the actuating ones of Liberal policy ever since the Liberal party had anything to do with the question of the tariff. The Liberal party has aimed at all times where tariff matters were concerned, to reduce the cost of living and also to reduce production costs by removing in part, and in some cases in whole, the duties on the implements of production of the basic industries. We are endeavouring in that way to increase production in the basic industries of agriculture, mining, lumbering, and fishing, with the hope and expectation not only that those industries will be benefited, but that the whole manufacturing industry of the country, which is necessarily based upon the basic industries, will also be benefited, the trade and commerce and finance of the country similarly benefited, and also, but by no means least, that the consumers of the country will be benefited through obtaining in larger quantities and at lower prices the commodities which they require for daily consumption. In other words, our policy is a truly national policy, the only policy deserving of the name of national policy in this country.

As I remarked this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, this is the third budget which the present administration has presented to parliament. With respect to the other two, what was the nature of the criticism directed against us by the right hon. leader of the opposition and his following? It was all to the effect that we had not been true to Liberal traditions; that we had not carried out our platform; that we had not implemented the pledges given the electors in the general elections of 1921; in particular, it was alleged that the reductions we had made in the duties on agricultural implements in the first budget, and the increase made in the British preference in the second budget, together with other reductions in both budgets in duties upon many of the necessaries of life and other articles of daily use were insufficient to fulfil the reasonable hopes and expectations of those who had given us their support at the polls, in virtue of which support we had been returned to power.

We had this afternoon from the lips of the right hon. the leader of the opposition in the characteristic phraseology to which in this House we are becoming accustomed, the criticism that we have been guilty not only of betrayal, but of infidelity, of infamy, I think, of apostasy. Heaven alone knows how many other phrases of a like kind he used. At any rate the right hon. gentleman could not find words strong enough to indicate that we had not been faithful to our promises. He said that not only was the budget repudiating the Liberal policy, but that the Liberal leader was also repudiating his promises and his pledges. He intimated, and this is a criticism which hon. gentlemen opposite have been given to making, that the government in this matter had been actuated by some ulterior political motive, that we have had primarily in view the making, as my right hon. friend expressed it this afternoon, of a sacrifice to the Progressive gods, that we were "opportunists," that our purpose in this budget had been solely that of winning Progressive support; that such was the main object.

Mr. Speaker, I think the most effective way of answering that criticism is for me to review outstanding features of Liberal policy, and the professions that have been made by the Liberal party in regard to Liberal policy in the two particulars which I have mentioned, namely, the desire of the party to reduce the cost of living, and its desire also to reduce production costs by reducing the duties on the implements of production in the basic industries. I must ask the House to pardon me if with a view to disposing once for all of this kind of criticism, I undertake to quote, as it will be necessary to quote in this connection, for purposes of accuracy, statements which have been made, and which should be regarded as authoritative.

I shall not attempt to go over the whole field of Liberal resolutions. I state again that on the tariff, speaking broadly, it will be found that the Liberal party has consistently advocated measures for the reduction of duties on the implements of production, and also the reduction of duties in a way that will reduce the cost of living. I shall begin with the time with which most of us who are on this side of the House are most intimately associated, and for which we are more or less responsible.

I shall ask the House and the country, in the light of the reference and quotations I propose to give to judge whether in tariff matters we have not consistently advocated a revision downward in the interests alike of producers and consumers; have not advocated specifically a reduction in taxation upon the instruments of production and the necessaries of life; and whether the tariff reduction proposals submitted to parliament in the present budget are not wholly in accord with, and a faithful implementing of professions, promises and pledges made to the electors at the time we sought their support in the general elections of 1921.

Let me refer first of all to the platform of the Liberal party as adopted at the Liberal convention in June, 1919. Whilst differences may exist as to the extent to which it may be wise at any given moment to carry out in detail the items specified within its pages, there can be no differences of view as to the essential underlying principles of tariff reform therein set forth. They are embraced in the opening paragraph of the resolution on the tariff, which reads as follows:

> That the best interests of Canada demand that substantial reductions of the burdens of Customs taxation be made with a view to the accomplishing of two purposes of the highest importance: First: diminishing the very high cost of living which presses so severely on the masses of the people; Second: reducing the cost of the instruments of production in the industries based on the natural resources of the Dominion, the vigorous development of which is essential to the progress and prosperity of our country.

There is exactly what the present budget proposes—substantial reductions of the burdens of customs taxation, with a view to diminishing the very high cost of living, and reducing the cost of the instruments of production in the industries based on the natural resources of the Dominion.

With respect to the resolution as a whole and more particularly with reference to the detail which follows, as I have already mentioned repeatedly in this House, I have never regarded the purpose of the convention as other than that of giving to those who might be entrusted with the administration of the party's affairs a chart on which was plotted the course the party would be expected to take when in office, and to take in the light of all existing conditions and circumstances, not, as I have also repeatedly said, at the dictation of any one individual but under the guidance of those of its number whom the party might elect as its representatives in parliament and in the government. This I need not remind the House is not some new version placed upon the platform of the Liberal party to suit the exigencies of the occasion, but was the interpretation placed upon the platform by myself in the presence of the assembled delegates at the time of the convention and heartily acquiesced in by them—an interpretation moreover which in the sessions following was quoted to parliament and repeated by me from every public platform in addresses delivered during the campaign of 1921.

The Liberal convention was held, as I have remarked, in June, 1919. In May of the following year we availed ourselves of the first opportunity afforded thereafter of disclosing to the country through parliament the official or authoritative view of the Liberal members of the House of Commons with respect to tariff matters when the hon. member for West York, the then Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) introduced his budget. An amendment was moved on behalf of the then Liberal opposition by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens, the present Minister of Finance, (Mr. Fielding) and seconded by myself. It was supported in division with one or two exceptions by every Liberal member present in the House at the time. The amendment will be found in Hansard of May 18, 1920, at page 2510. I shall not read the whole amendment, the last paragraph will be sufficient to disclose to the House and to the country the consistency of the attitude of the Liberals in advocating the two great purposes I have already mentioned, namely, substantial reductions in the burden of customs taxation, with a view to (a) the reduction of living costs and (b) reduction of production costs, especially as those are related to necessaries of life and the instruments of production. Here are the words of the paragraph referred to:

> That in view of the continued increase in the high cost of living, of the greatly increased burden of taxation, of the hardship which many of the people suffer from those causes, and the unrest naturally arising therefrom; and in view of the desirability of adopting measures to increase production and effect such relief to consumers and producers as may be within the power of Parliament, the House is of opinion that, pending a wider revision of the tariff, substantial reductions of the burdens of customs taxation should be made with a view to the accomplishing of two purposes of the highest importance; first, diminishing the very high cost of living which presses so severely on the masses of the people; second, reducing the cost of the instruments of production in the industries based on the natural resources of the Dominion, the vigorous development of which is essential to the progress and prosperity of our country.

That was the manner in which we put forth in this House the Liberal position with respect to the tariff. But there was another session of parliament which succeeded the one to which I have just made reference. It was the session immediately preceding the general election, and the Liberal party therefore was doubly careful to outline in its resolution of that day the position which it was taking before the country. Let me say, Mr. Speaker, we were not at the time of the elections seeking Progressive support. We were offering opposition to the Progressives. We thought the party as then constituted was going too far. That was the position we took at the time. It was found, when we got into the campaign that they were not taking the extreme position respecting free trade which some had indicated they were likely to take. Be that as it may, the point I want to make clear—because of something the leader of the opposition said to-day—is, that the object we had in view in the course of action I am describing was not progressive support but to put before the people of this country what the Liberal party stood for and was prepared to fight for.

As I have said, the Liberals in parliament sought to place before the House and the country their views on tariff revision in the form of an amendment to the budget of the then Minister of Finance. On May 10, 1921 the following amendment was moved by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's and again seconded by myself. I shall read the whole amendment as it sets out very clearly the essential features of Liberal tariff policy. I would ask the House to recall that it was a resolution moved and in fact drafted by the present Minister of Finance, and to note the emphasis it places upon, first: Reduction in the tariff as the main object to be sought; second, its disavowal of protection as the principle upon which the tariff should be based; third, the aim of our fiscal policy as the encouragement of industries based on the natural resources of the country; and fourth, the reduction of such duties as may be expected to reduce the cost of living, and the cost of the implements of production. The resolution is as follows:

> That all the words after the word "that" to the end of the question, be omitted, and the following inserted instead thereof:
> The House regrets that, after repeated assurances by the government of an intention to have a revision of the customs tariff, and after a protracted inquiry extending from ocean to ocean by a committee of cabinet ministers, the government have made no proposals for any reduction of the tariff;
> That, while recognizing that existing financial requirements of the Dominion demand the maintenance of a customs tariff, the House is unable to concur in the declarations by the government that the tariff should be based on the principle of protection; the tariff is a tax, and the aim of legislation should be to make taxation as light as circumstances will permit;
> That the aim of the fiscal policy of Canada should be the encouragement of industries based on the natural resources of the country, the development of which may reasonably be expected to create healthy enterprise, giving promise of enduring success;
> That such changes should be made in the customs duties as may be expected to reduce the cost of living and to reduce also the cost of implements of production required for the efficient development of the natural resources of the Dominion;
> That, while keeping this aim clearly in mind, the House recognizes that in any readjustment of the tariff that may take place, regard must be had to existing conditions of trade, and changes made in such a manner as will cause the least possible disturbance of business.

There is the Laurier-Fielding tariff; there is a declaration that what should be done in the matter of the tariff is a reduction of the duties on the implements of production in order that the great basic industries might be developed in the manner described. I could quote what I said in the House in support of these resolutions, but I will not take up the time of hon. members in referring to the debate that then took place. The whole trend of Liberal discussion then was that this was the object we were fighting for, this was the aim we had before us.

Not only in the House but throughout the country I had occasion to speak on the tariff policy of the Liberal party. Before the election as well as during the election I spoke in eastern Canada and in western Canada. I not only spoke in eastern and western Canada, but I also wrote one or two articles on the Liberal policy with respect to the tariff. I challenge any hon. member of this House to find in any speech of mine made before the election or during the election a single contradiction of the principles that are laid down in the resolution I have quoted. I state that in all the speeches I made I represented to the people in so many words virtually what I have been saying this evening; and more than that I made it a point of emphasizing in every speech—and this is the truth I desire to bring out—that the Liberal party stood for a reduction of the duties on the articles that would affect the cost of living, and especially on the implements of production in the basic industries of agriculture, lumbering, mining and fishing.

I spoke in Toronto with my colleague and friend, the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment (Mr. Beland), on August 14, 1920. That was the year before the passing of the second resolution which I have just read. Let me give to the House the report contained in the Mail-Empire of Toronto of August 16, which was Monday, of the meeting held at Hanlan's Point, Toronto, on August 14, 1920. This is what the Mail and Empire reports as the Liberal policy as stated at that time: Quoting my words, the paper has the following:

> We believe that the time has come, indeed that it is already long past, when a downward revision of the tariff is necessary. In this revision we believe that there should be substantial reductions of the duties on the necessaries of life; in other words, on those articles which go to make up the food, the clothing, the shelter of the Canadian people; that certain specific articles required for the purposes of consumption and other articles essential to production should be placed upon the free list, and that in regard to the instruments of production in the basic industries of agriculture, mining, lumbering and fishing, there should also be a substantial reduction of duties. It is not a question of free trade or protection. With the revenue which will be required for years to come, to meet the large interest payments on public debt, the obligations to our returned soldiers in the way of pensions and in other respects, as well as to carry on the work of government in Canada —resort as we may to direct taxation of incomes and of business profits, which is also a part of the Liberal policy; tax as we will all luxuries, which is another plank in the Liberal platform—there will still be required for purposes of revenue large sums of money which of necessity will have to be raised by indirect taxation through a customs tariff. In revising the tariff to this end, care will be taken of the position and needs of all the industries in our country; but such tariff as may be necessary in this connection will be, under Liberal policy, a tariff for consumers and producers, and not a tariff to further the interests of combines, monopolies, or of any special or privileged classes.

The Toronto Globe of the same date contains, on its front page, part of what I have just read, and has the following additional statement which I made at that time, and which I have held to consistently ever since:

It is not honest to say that we can do away with the tariff. We can revise it, and that is the policy of the Liberal party. And I shall say in regard to tariff policies exactly the same in the city of Toronto as I shall say in the western provinces. I have not one message for the city and another message for the country, one message for the employer and another for the employee.

During the fall of 1920 I went out as far as western Canada with my hon. friend the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) the hon. member for Lunenburg and the late Hon. Mr. Kennedy, and we spoke in a number of the cities of western Canada. I shall not take up the time of the House reading lengthy extracts, but I would like to read a few words from the speeches I then made, and I shall give a reference in each case to the paper in which these statements will be found; so that if hon. gentlemen wish to look up the records they may do so. I will read the statements that have a bearing on what the government is seeking to do in the tariff proposals before the House. In the Victoria Daily Times, September 18, 1920, the following will be found:

The Liberal leader's policy on the tariff is a substantial reduction of the duties on the necessaries of life, the things which go to make the food, clothing and shelter of the Canadian people; the placing of articles essential to production on the free list, and material reductions in the duties on implements of agriculture, mining, lumbering and fishing. He frankly believes in a tariff, but declares it should be a tariff for consumers and producers rather than for profiteers and special privilege.

After a meeting in that city on the night of September 29 a press despatch sent out from Vancouver appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of the day following as follows:

Hon. Mr. King discussed the leading problems of the day, the cost of living and the tariff, declaring that, with regard to the latter that what is wanted is not taking of evidence, but immediate revision to bring relief to consumers and producers, in regard to the high cost of living.

The Lethbridge Herald has the following with reference to a meeting held at Lethbridge October 19, 1920:

It is not a question of free trade or tariff. Under Liberal policy it will be a tariff for consumers and producers".

Change of tariff means the interests of consumer and producer and putting an end to profiteering".

Cut down the tariff on all necessaries of life.

Substantial reductions or taking off the duties on the implements used in our basic industries of farming, lumbering, mining and fisheries, is our tariff policy.

There is no time more than the present for a great agricultural policy.

It is a good thing to have towns and cities, but an evil thing if towns and cities are to develop at the expense of rural centres.

As you develop the great basic industries so you increase the amount of raw material for manufacture.

The Lethbridge Herald of the 20th October has also the following editorial reference:

There was a basic truth in what Mr. King laid down that the basic industries of the country should be relieved from the factors that prejudice these industries to the detriment of the country at large, in the placing of burdens on the implements of production. He brought his argument home when he exemplified its truth in the statement that only by the production of cheap raw material could the manufacturers of the country hope to be able to compete with other countries.

Speaking at Saskatoon October 22, reported in the Manitoba Free Press the day following, I find the following:

We hold that there should be an all-round revision in the interests of consumers and producers, and substantial reductions in two great particulars—the necessaries of life and the implements of production in the basic industries.

At Prince Albert a meeting was held on October 28 and the report in the Montreal Herald, October 29, reads as follows:

He maintained that the greatest question in Canada was the cost of living, and that its only ultimate solution lay in greater production. It was for this reason that the Liberal party felt that in the interests of Canada as a whole too much encouragement could not be given to the agricultural industry.

There were other speeches made in 1920 in different parts of the country, and telegraphed all over Canada by the Associated Press in which the same declarations of policy appear. There could be no doubt in the minds of anyone who had been reading the press where I stood and where the Liberal party stood on the question.

I will now quote from MacLean's Magazine, and in doing so I do not think any hon. gentleman will think I am quoting from a Liberal organ. This magazine published a series of articles on the tariff, one by my right hon. friend opposite, (Mr. Meighen) one, I think by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) and one also on the Liberal policy by myself. This publication is dated January 15, 1921, and here is what is stated in the magazine as to the Liberal position on the tariff:

> Mr. Meighen is striving to make the issue between the political parties in Canada one of free trade versus protection. Were he in a position so to do he would create an issue to his own liking. That the issue cannot be between free trade and protection is clear from the fact that none of the political platforms now before the country, not even the platform of the Farmer's party, demand free trade. The Liberal party has no thought of tariff abolition. Its policy is one of tariff revision through reduction in the interests alike of producers and consumers. All of us are consumers; all of us are or ought to be, in the broad sense, producers, rendering some service to the community with hand or brain or both.
> We believe that the time has come, indeed that it is already long past, when a downward revision of the tariff is necessary. In this revision we believe that the home and its needs should be a first consideration, that there should be substantial reductions of the duties on the necessaries of life; in other words on those articles which go to make up the food, the clothing, the shelter of the Canadian people; that certain specific articles required for the purposes of consumption, and other articles essential to production, should be free of duty altogether; and that in regard to the implements of production in the basic industries of agriculture, mining, lumbering and fishing, there should also be a substantial reduction and in some instances, a total elimination of duties.
> With all there has been of destruction during the period of the war, what is needed most to meet the scarcity and taxation which have ensued is increased production. If the basic industries, the key industries of Canada, are relieved as far as possible of taxation, if the instruments of production are made easier to obtain, if production is thereby cheapened and enlarged, these industries are benefited, and the whole community is benefited. Not only do secondary industries gain in the reduction in cost of raw materials, but consumers also gain in the lessened cost of many of the essentials of life.

Exactly the same thing as I have been saying in this House this afternoon. I regret being obliged to take up the time of the House with these quotations; but I should like my right hon. friend to believe that there are in this House men who are quite as sensitive with respect to their honour as he is himself, and that the kind of talk he has been indulging in about my saying one thing in one place and another thing in another, being guilty of apostasy, infidelity and whatnot, is not the kind of thing that will go down with the Canadian people, nor is he as leader of a party setting an example that others should follow.

May I speak now of the campaign of 1921? The first meeting that I spoke at in that campaign was in the city of Toronto which, I think, is a manufacturing centre. It was addressed by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and myself on the evening of September 20. I have in my hand a copy of the Toronto Globe which contains extracts of what was said at that meeting. This was the opening meeting of the campaign in an industrial centre, and hon. members will I think admit that, with the possible exception of Montreal, there is no other more important industrial, manufacturing centre in Canada. This is what the Globe gives under the heading of:

> Liberal leaders on two vital issues, the tariff and government railways.

Quoting from my speech that night:

> It is for the principle of a tariff for revenue that the Liberal party has stood in bygone years; it is for that principle the Liberal party stands to-day, and it is for the principle of a tariff for revenue that the Liberal party will continue to stand if returned to power in the present contest.
> Let me tell Mr. Meighen that, while it is impossible to have an issue between a tariff based on the principle of protection and a tariff based upon the principle of free trade, it is possible to have an issue on a tariff primarily for revenue as against a tariff primarily for protection; and that upon this issue we are prepared to fight, as Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Mr. Fielding fought in 1896,

The Laurier-Fielding tariff, if you please.

> . . . and with expectations of a like return of prosperity and stability in matters industrial and commercial, should our policy be vindicated at the polls...

I added at that time and it is quoted in the same connection:

> It is because we believe that in no other way can the battle be won throughout this Dominion from ocean to ocean we propose to place Liberal candidates in the field not as expressing an antagonism toward any class or group who may share Liberal or Progressive ideas, but solely to make sure the triumph of Liberal principles and policies at the polls.

In other words, I stated at that meeting that the Liberal party intended to place its candidates, as, it did, in practically avery constituency in this Dominion, against hon. gentlemen of the Progressive party opposite. They fought against these hon. gentlemen and fought on the very tariff principles which we are trying to put through this House at the present moment. We were not catering for Progressive support at that time. It cannot be said we were seeking at that time what we could get in the way of votes in this House. We were telling the people of Canada what the Liberal party was prepared to do if it were returned to power. Over and over again, throughout that campaign, I mentioned, as I mention now, that I could see no necessity for men of Progressive and Liberal views with respect to these questions, shared in common as in this particular we share them in common, being divided as we were divided in that particular struggle. I say now to my hon. friends of the Progressive party in regard to these great questions which affect the well-being of the masses of the people, which have to do with the prosperity of the country, which have to do with the interest of consumers: the less we let hon. gentlemen opposite divide the forces that have the interests of the people at heart, the better it will be for this Dominion of Canada. They are derisive because the government is bringing down a policy which appeals to hon. gentlemen of the Progressive party. From the moment that I had anything to do with public life in this country, I have tried to bring about unity between the forces that are making for the dominance of progressive and Liberal ideas in Canada, and I shall continue to strive in that direction. I say, too, speaking to my hon. friends of the Progressive party, that the only hope the Tory party in this country will ever have of getting back into power is that they can divide the forces that have the interests of the people at heart.

I have read what the Toronto Globe said in reference to my remarks in that regard. Remember that this was the campaign in which we were appealing to the people for support and these were the grounds we were putting forward when we asked the people to return us to parliament. The Mail and Empire of September 21 has the following:

> The Liberal leader's tariff statement last night was simply a repetition of previous declarations of the Liberal policy of a "tariff for revenue." He went a little further, however, by admitting that he would revise the tariff to cheapen the means of production—his way of referring to a cut in the protection given machinery and farm implements manufactured here, and he would also use it to lower the cost of living by permitting freer import of foodstuffs.

The London Advertiser contains also a statement of what was said that night in very much the same words. The Toronto Star of September 21 had the following, taken from my speech of that evening:

> There need be no mistaking the position of the Liberal party as regards the tariff. It regards the tariff not as an end in itself, but as a means to an end. That end, according to the Liberal policy, is three-fold, and is to be effected not by abolition of the tariff but by its revision.
> First: its revision for purposes of revenue; this to be accompanied by making such revisions as are required to give greater effectiveness to the tariff, as one of the means of raising revenues necessary to carry on the government of the country.
> Second: its revision for purposes of increase of production. This to be accomplished by facilitating more extended development of the industries based on the great natural resources of our country—agriculture, mining, lumbering, and fishing—by making the necessary instruments and implements of production available where possible at lessened cost.
> Third: its revision for purposes of decrease of the cost of living. This to be accomplished through rendering possible increased production in the manner already described and by making certain of the necessaries of life available to the people at lessened cost.

From Toronto in that campaign I went to the city of Montreal where I spoke on the evening of September 22, and I take the following extract from the Montreal Star of September 1923:

> ...The issue is not between protection and free trade; it is what it has been in the past, between the old Tory party and the old Liberal party, an issue between high protection on the one hand and a tariff for revenue on the other. . . . But there is a great difference between having a tariff that has stood for many years and never changed and revising the tariff in the interests of the needs of the country as you see it. Mr. Meighen says the tariff needs revision; we say the same thing. The difference I can see is, were they to revise the tariff it would be revised in the interests of combines, monopolies, trusts and mergers. If it is left to our revision it will be revised in the interests of the consumers and the producers, and this is the first interest to be considered.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will give my hon. friend a little more; he will get all he wants. I shall quote next from the Moncton Transcript of September 23rd which gives a report of a speech I delivered at Sherbrooke in the constituency of my hon. friend (Mr. McCrea) who spoke in the debate a day or two ago.

> Mr. King declared that the first need of Canada was true economy and a reduction in the cost of living. Revision of the tariff was overdue, but it should be downward revision in the interests of all classes.

The leader of the opposition read an extract from a report of my speech in one of the Sherbrooke papers. Well, I take the following from a press despatch to the Ottawa Citizen of September 24 reporting what I had said in Sherbrooke on this question of the tariff:

> The Liberal party believed in cheapening raw materials by reducing the tax on implements of production.
> The Liberal tariff was the only one which was equally fair to residents of both city and rural area alike. It was the policy which would bring about increased production, which was the need of Canada to-day.

The point I want to make perfectly clear is this, that I did not choose one centre in which to say one thing and another centre in which to say something different. If I felt that in any particular constituency some special question was likely to be raised at any time with respect to these matters I emphasized that particular point, and when I spoke in Sherbrooke I knew how my hon. friend on this side of the House felt in regard to tariff matters. I was therefore very careful to make it clear that as respects the instruments of production our intention was to reduce the duty if we were returned to power.

A little earlier in the year, speaking at Bedford in Missisquoi in the province of Quebec, the constituency of my hon. friend (Mr. Kay), I made a statement a report of which appeared in the Montreal Gazette and which I shall read to the House. In passing, I may say that my purpose in giving these quotations is that the House shall see that so far as the several provinces were concerned, in the province of Quebec in Montreal, and other centres, there was no mistaking our position. This is an extract from the report as it appeared in the Montreal Gazette and which might have been read by every one who reads that newspaper:

The people also expect a government to devise methods of helping to relieve conditions. We have a tariff that needs revision in many ways. The government said it would revise the tariff, and this year they announced that intention in the Speech from the Throne, but before the session was over there was no revision and nothing has been done towards reducing taxation or lowering the duties on the necessities of life and instruments of production, as advocated by the Liberal party.

Speaking in Nova Scotia at the first meeting that took place in eastern Canada I made the position of the Liberal party perfectly clear to the people of that province. The gentleman who presided at that first gathering in the Maritime provinces was a close and intimate friend of the right hon. the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding),—I refer to Mr. Murray, the ex-premier of the province. What did Mr. Murray say in opening the campaign in Nova Scotia? The report will be found in the Halifax Morning Chronicle of September 27 of the meeting held the night before at Sydney. Mr. Murray said:

The Liberal tariff policy of to-day is embodied in the resolution moved by Mr. Fielding and seconded by my friend Mr. King.

That was the resolution I read a moment or two ago. Reporting my own remarks, the Ottawa Citizen had the following despatch:

The tariff, said Mr. King, should be framed to develop the basic industries of the country. It would be our aim, he said, to develop these industries and bring them to a proper success.

Speaking at Digby, Nova Scotia, I said, as will be found in the report that appeared at the time in the St. John Daily Telegraph:

"The Liberal tariff policy," declared Mr. King, "was wide enough for all the Dominion." He enumerated the different industries found in the surrounding area which included the four great basic industries. Other industries were dependent on fishing, agriculture, lumbering and mining. "The natural resources of the country must be fully developed," the Liberal leader declared, and implements and instruments of production should be relieved as far as possible from taxation to encourage fullest production."

In Amherst, Nova Scotia, I am reported in the Daily News of October 6, in the report of the meeting held October 5, as follows:

Referring to the industries and resources of the province, Mr. King declared these should be developed. The instruments of production in the basic industries should be as free of taxation as possible... Necessaries of life should also be made as cheap as possible to the people.

In Prince Edward Island, speaking at Summerside on October 6, as will be seen by the Island Patriot of Charlottetown, I am thus reported:

The platform was laid down as a guiding chart. It stood primarily for two things. For tariff revision to reduce the cost of production and to reduce the costs of necessaries of life.

And in the Island Patriot of October 7:

What is the Liberals' position in regard to the tariff? . . .We say the tariff is a tax, and being a tax it should be made to bear as lightly as possible upon the people as a means of getting the necessary revenue to carry on the government. The Liberal policy is that of a tariff for revenue in the interests of producers and consumers. . . .We want a revision of the tariff in the interests of consumers and producers.

In the Halifax Chronicle of October 7 there appeared the following:

The tariff is of importance, and our stand is well known. . . .There must be a tariff for revenue and not for protection. There must be increased production in the basic industries, and this demands the lowest possible tariff on the implements of production. Then we all need certain things; on these necessaries of life the tariff also should bear lightly. The home and its needs will be our first consideration in revising the tariff.

Speaking at Alberton in the province of Prince Edward Island I am reported to have said:

We, when elected, intend to revise the tariff in such a way as will aid the basic industries of the country, farming, fishing, mining, lumbering, in a way that will encourage production and to that end we contend that the equipment, the tools, the machinery required in these industries must be placed on the lowest possible tariff rate. This is something that is of interest to every one in this country.

In the province of New Brunswick I spoke at a meeting, in the city of Moncton on March 13, the following report of which is to be found in the Moncton Daily Times of the 14th:

The Liberal tariff policy was again outlined by Mr. King. It was based on development of the basic industries. The tools and equipments needed for these industries were as important as the resources themselves. Increased production in these main industries would help all industries based on them. Reduction of duties on these implements of production was vitally important, as also was the reduction, as far as possible, of the taxes on necessaries of life and the needs of the home.

A similar quotation from the Montreal Gazette of October 16 relates to a meeting held in Sussex, New Brunswick; and from the St. John Globe I take the following report of a meeting held on October 16:

There was need for revision. The Liberals demanded that such revision should be in the interests of all the people. The need for revenue would be a primary consideration instead of protection.

Then in St. John, New Brunswick, as reported in the Globe of October 17:

It was to the interest of the country as a whole that the tax on implements of production should be as light as possible. Also the tax on the necessities of life should be light. It was along these lines that the Liberals proposed to revise the tariff.

In St. John, as reported in the St. John Times of October 17:

He regarded the platform as a chart of the course that the Liberal party was supposed to take. He would keep the chart before him and with the assistance of his colleagues would take the right course. Conditions had changed materially since the 1919 platform had been framed. There had been changes in the United States tariff. Must we be bound by the actual words of any document? The people would regard him as a madman if he did so. He would have to accommodate himself to conditions and take a common sense view. That would be the sane course to take..... It was to the interest of the country as a whole that the tax on implements of production should be as light as possible. Also the tax on the necessities of life should be light. It was along these lines that the Liberals proposed to revise the tariff.

I come now to the province of Ontario. Speaking in Sarnia on November 2, as reported in the Sarnia Observer, the day following, I said:

The wealth of the country came from the great basic industries, lumbering, mining, farming, etc., and as all manufacturing was the turning of raw materials into articles of consumption, the Liberal party wanted the implements of production to be taxed as lightly as possible. The same applied to certain classes of necessities of life, such as food, clothing, etc., which should be taxed as lightly as possible. The Liberal tariff proposed that manufacturers should be prosperous because they could get their equipment at reasonable prices while the masses of the people should not be overtaxed in costs of food, clothing and other necessities.

In Sudbury on November 8, as reported in the Montreal Gazette on November 9, I said:

The tariff could not be abolished, however, since revenue was needed, but it should be revised from a revenue basis. To increase the wealth of the country its natural resources must be developed and this demanded the removal of taxation as far as possible from implements of production in the basic industries. Necessities of life must also be freed of taxation to the greatest possible extent.

Then at Port Arthur on November 10, as reported in the Manitoba Free Press Bulletin of November 11:

The Liberal leader outlining the revenue tariff policy, declared that free trade was impossible, and unthought of at present, and that the Liberal party stood for downward revision, making the tariff bear as lightly as possible on necessities of life and implements of production.

Mr. King declared he had been making exactly the same tariff speeches in all parts of Canada for the past two years.

In Newmarket, in my own constituency, I said on November 22:

The Liberals believed in revising the tariff in a manner to increase production by lightening the burden on implements of production in the basic industries and on the necessities of life.

The report is from a despatch to the Ottawa Citizen of November 23.

At Peterborough I am reported in the Examiner of November 27, as follows:

Mr. King said that the best tariff policy in the interests of the country was that of the Liberals, which, he explained, was a policy of downward revision; a tariff designed primarily for revenue, which would lighten the burden of taxation on implements of production in the four basic industries, and on foodstuffs.

Again at Pembroke I am reported in the Montreal Gazette of November 29, 1921, as follows:

The Liberal tariff policy was unchanged, Mr. King said. He believed in the necessity of downward revision, with reduced taxes on necessities of life and on the implements of production used in the basic industries.

At Gananoque I am reported in the Ottawa Citizen of December 1, 1921, as saying:

The Liberal revenue tariff policy would help bring the needed revenue and also increase production in the great industries. Machinery and tools used in the four basic industries of agriculture, lumbering, mining and fishing, and also necessaries of life, must be freed from irksome taxations. As far as possible, a Liberal tariff revision, said Mr. King, would be based on the home and its needs.

Now I come to the western provinces: Of my speech at Melville, Saskatchewan, the Manitoba Free Press of November 14, 1921, contained the following report:

Mr. King reviewed the platform as put forth by the Liberals, and said that his party stood for downward revision and for relieving of taxation as far as possible—implements of production in the basic industries and necessities of life.

At Calgary, Alberta, I am reported in the Manitoba Free Press of November 16, 1921, as follows:

The Liberal party, he declared, stood for a tariff for revenue. This, he believed, was in the interests of all producers and consumers. He also held that duties should bear as lightly as possible on the implements of production in the basic industries and on the necessities of life.

The Calgary Morning Albertan on November 16, 1921, contained the following report:

We stand for a tariff for revenue, not to protect monopolies. But we would have the tariff revised for the producers and consumers. The burden should bear as lightly as possible on the tools of production of farm, mine, lumber camps, and so forth, and on the food and clothing of the people.

At Edmonton I am reported in the Edmonton Bulletin of November 15, 1921, as follows:

Tariff for revenue only should be the object. The Liberal party was pledged first to reduce the duty on implements of production to the lowest possible degree, and second to lower the scale of tariff on necessities of life as far as possible. Liberals stood against tariff for the interest of trusts, combines and monopolies; theirs was a policy for the people of Canada as a whole.

At Regina I am reported in the Edmonton Bulletin of November 16, 1921, in these words:

His policy, he said, was one of downward revision, with the lightening of the tariff burden on implements of production in the basic industries and on the necessities of life.

The Moose Jaw Times on November 18, 1921, contained the following report:

We should view the tariff in the light of what is best for the Dominion as a whole. If life will be made easier for the great majority and greater prosperity for the masses will ensue, then we should revise the tariff. The tax on necessities is now too high and the way to lower this is to revise the tariff. Greater production and greater demand will follow cheaper prices.

The basic wealth of Canada is derived from four great industries. These are agriculture, mining, fishing and forestry. It requires implements and tools to turn these into a state for consumption. These implements can be regarded as capital. That being the case, it is a foolish policy as any financier will tell you to tax capital. Yet a heavy tax is put upon these. The reason why we advocate a lower tariff on implements is that it will make the finished product that much cheaper. In this manner, production will increase.

Our policy is not a tariff for protection of special interests but simply a tariff for purposes of raising revenue. The present tariff must be revised to help production. Where it bears too heavily on any one class it should be lowered and this is the case regarding implements and tools.

I might quote from many more speeches and publications but I think these should suffice to disclose what was said by me during the campaign of 1921 as to the Liberal policy on the tariff.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that after listening to what I have quoted no hon. member with a sense of fair play can say that in the last campaign the Liberal party did not make its position known with respect to a reduction in the tariff on implements of production, as we are seeking to carry it out at the present time. These few quotations—only a few out of the total number—show that during the campaign on every platform—I repeat, on every platform—I emphasized the two outstanding features of the Liberal policy: Reduction of the cost of living by a reduction of some of the duties on the necessaries of life, and by a reduction of duties on the implements of production in the basic industries of agriculture, lumbering, mining and fishing. That was the line of policy which Liberals took in the general election. It was in virtue of what was then represented that we were returned to power. If we have not sooner carried out that policy in the measure which we have to-day, it is because we also stated that we would have to have regard for revenue, and until we got to the point where we were able to balance our budget and to reduce taxes, we did not feel justified in taking the step we have now taken. But having come to that point, having found we were able to save the people $24,000,000 in taxes, we have taken the first opportunity we have had to carry out in a consistent and real way the pledge and the promise which we made the people, and on which we were returned, namely, to reduce the duties on the implements of production in the basic industries enumerated in the budget.

Now, Sir, let me say a word or two with reference to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth). After listening to the quotations I have read my hon. friend will see that the Liberal party is committed to reduce the duties on the necessaries of life to help bring down the cost of living. I submit that we are doing this in the most effective way when we reduce the duties on the implements of production in these basic industries, because as I have shown this afternoon, and I think conclusively, as you cheapen the raw material in these basic industries you help in the course of the natural working out of things to reduce the prices of commodities as they become available for consumers from one end of the country to the other. In that way we feel we are doing a great deal. But in the preceding sessions we have also done quite a little in the way of reducing duties on implements of production and also on some of the necessaries of life, and those reductions must be taken into account in considering what we are doing to reduce the cost of living. Also, what we have done by way of reduction of the sales tax should not be lost sight of. I am sure my hon. friend will agree with me that there is no desire on my part not to have everything done that can be done for consumers; but there are ways of and times for doing all things. You can go so far; if you go too far you sometimes do harm in the direction in which you wish to do good.

9 p.m.

The amendment is as follows:—

That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor—

Whereas the budget proposals would seem to indicate the recognition by the government of the necessity for a fiscal policy designed to encourage industries based upon the development of the natural resources of the country, and to afford some alleviation of the financial burdens bearing upon the people;

And whereas the condition of such industries and the position of consumers in general is such as to demand relief

Therefore, be it resolved:—

That the best interests of Canada will be served by an immediate and substantial reduction of the tariff on the necessaries of life including foodstuffs, clothing and building materials;

And further that it is desirable.

(a) That the income tax should be so readjusted as to bear more heavily on unearned incomes;

(b) That unimproved land values including all natural resources should not be exempt from taxation; and

(c) That a graduated inheritance tax on large estates should be considered.

There are several reasons why it seems to me the amendment should not receive the support of hon. members and why the government is unable to accept it. In the first place, it commits us, as I have indicated, to new methods of taxation or to alterations in existing methods. Apart altogether as to whether such changes might or might not be in the national interest, I submit that there has been no opportunity given either the government or the House to consider their possible operation and effect. I shall not question, Mr. Speaker, your ruling to the effect that the amendment is in order. I doubt if it would have been so ruled save to permit of greater freedom of discussion in debate, but I would submit that the grounds are very strong for rejecting any amendment to the budget which commits the House and the country to forms of taxation into the possible consequences of which neither the House nor the government has had opportunity to inquire. As I say, the proposals may be good in themselves; each of the proposals made has much to commend it, and something to be said against it, but this is not the time nor the occasion to pass upon them.

In the second place, the amendment, I think, fails to recognize some of the existing conditions of which account should be taken just at this time in any extensive revision of the tariff with respect to the so-called necessaries of life, conditions of which the government has been fully cognizant and has taken very fully into account. Not a little has been said in the course of this debate of the effect of depreciated currencies in countries overseas upon the price of many articles which materially affect the cost of living; boots and shoes, textiles, clothing, foodstuffs and the like, have been mentioned more particularly. It has been pointed out that where articles are imported from countries whose currencies are depreciated the effect of the tariff remaining as it is, is to permit what is equivalent to reduction in the existing duties.

I may say quite frankly that the government has recognized the existing situation in this regard. We agree that in their operation, the one upon the other, the two are interrelated.—the effect of the tariff and the effect of depreciated currencies.

We recognize further that the matter is a very involved one requiring the most expert and minute examination, an examination which the Department of Finance as at present organized is not in a position to give.

To the manufacturers and dealers who have been urging us to increase the tariff on account of the effect of depreciated currencies abroad, we have frankly said such a step could not well be taken at this time without considering the whole question of tariff revision with respect to the necessaries of life. That by refraining from any general downward revision, such as is suggested in the amendment of the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth), we were, while recognizing the effects of depreciated currencies, meeting them in a manner which seemed equitable and just: and similarly I would say to my hon. friend, and those who may have thought of supporting his amendment, that by refraining at this time to grant additional tariff considerations to manufacturers in this country to offset the additional competition which has come through depreciated currencies overseas, we have in effect, in addition to what we have already done in reducing duties on the necessaries of life, been giving to the consumers of Canada the full benefit of whatever in this regard may be to their advantage.

May I at this juncture say that the government is in sympathy with the view which has been expressed by many hon. members in different parts of this House, that there should be in the Department of Finance, in addition to the one or more persons who at present act as advisers to the minister on tariff matters, other persons with special knowledge or specially qualified to obtain exact information with respect to just such questions as the operations of depreciated or appreciated currencies upon the tariff, and the operation of existing tariffs and suggested or needed tariff changes, upon industry and upon revenue: a body of experts to be known as a tariff committee or a tariff board, or by some other suitable designation, whose duty it will be to give continuous time and attention to tariff matters, so that the Minister of Finance, in making his tariff proposals or suggesting tariff revisions to the House may do so in the light of the fullest expert and exact knowledge of the situation in all its bearings.

Hon. members will have noticed that it was announced in the Speech from the Throne, that:

Legislation will be introduced making provision for consolidation of the revenue collecting services of the government under one administrative head. With a view to simplifying and improving the existing system, it is also proposed to constitute a board to investigate and study the various modes of taxation.

I shall not anticipate what may be said upon the legislation to be introduced by outlining its provisions at the present moment; I would like to point out, however, that this announcement in the Speech from the Throne constitutes an additional reason why the amendment of the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg is most inopportune and should not be accepted at the present moment. It is, amongst other things, to study and investigate just such modes of taxation as the hon. member has suggested, viz. the readjustment and extension of the income tax to bear more heavily upon unearned incomes, a direct tax upon unimproved land values, and the institution of a graduated inheritance tax on large estates, that the board is to be appointed. It might also inquire into the simplification of income tax returns.

Some have suggested that this board should be the one to which should be assigned the investigation and study of the tariff as well as all other modes of taxation. That, I think, is a suggestion deserving of the most careful consideration. There is much to be said for it, and much to be said against it. There is no reason, however, why the personnel of such a board might not, if thought advisable, be utilized in whole or in part in the manner suggested, either as members of a separate tariff board, or as a board on taxation including an investigation and study of the tariff along with other modes of taxation. That point, we are not, however, called upon to decide at the moment. It is sufficient for my present purpose to say that the government is of the opinion that expert and exact knowledge to be obtained in the manner mentioned should precede any general tariff revision, such as is suggested by the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg in his amendment, and that such revision should take into account the operation of depreciated currencies as well as other factors affecting the tariff.

I wish to say this, however. So far as the tariff changes of this year are concerned, and I say this more particularly to my friend from North Waterloo (Mr. Euler), these tariff changes were not made in the dark. There was nothing haphazard about them. There was no singling out of any one particular industry or of any one class of industries. It was simply carrying out the policy that was laid down at the general election, and which has been a part of the Liberal policy from the time the Liberal convention was held.

There is one point, however, I should like to make clear whilst speaking on this matter, and that is that a tariff board such as I have described, is not to be confused with a tariff commission, as some have suggested, which should operate wholly apart from the government or the Department of Finance, and which would take from the government of the day and this House of Commons responsibility with respect to the tariff to be imposed. It must never be forgotten that a customs tariff is a tax, and that the control of taxation is the supreme right of the Commons, and that the responsibility for taxation must be that of the government under which it is imposed. What is proposed and meant is a board for purposes of investigation and study of tariff problems which shall act in an advisory capacity to the government, it being recognized that with the need for revenue what it is to-day as compared with earlier years, to say nothing of the changed and constantly changing conditions of the world, and the increasing importance and magnitude of the country's business, there is need also for the most enlightened judgment in all matters of tariff policy.

I come now to the last of the reasons why the amendment should not be accepted, and why the government in the proposals it has brought down should receive the hearty unqualified support of all who regard a reduction in the cost of living and in production costs as essential features of Liberal and Progressive policy. It is, that taken as a whole, and in connection with what has been accomplished in previous budgets, both these aims are in large measure being achieved in the budget proposals before the House. I hope the House will give me permission to place on Hansard tables showing what has been done in that regard.

Let me touch upon this matter under three heads: What has been, and is being done with respect to first, duties on the implements of production in the basic industries, of agriculture, lumbering, mining and fishing; second, duties on the necessaries of life; and third, the exemptions under the income tax.

The total reductions effected in production costs through the reductions in duties upon the instruments of production are perhaps best shown in a descriptive statistical table which I have prepared and which with the permission of the House I should like to be permitted to have inserted in Hansard as it stands. It gives the rates of duties as they were when the present government assumed office in December, 1921, and the rates of duty as they will be when the proposed reductions go into effect, account being taken in this connection of such reductions as were made by the budget proposals of 1922 and 1923 as well as those of the present year.

In addition to the reductions in customs duties it should be remembered that when the present government came into office there was a sales tax affecting the articles mentioned in the table which figured out to practically three per cent on the selling price of these articles when of domestic manufacture and to four per cent on imported articles. The sales tax on these articles—with the exception of but two items—no longer exists, so that the total savings effected by the government through reductions in customs duty and sales tax combined, in respect of the articles mentioned, would really be three and four per cent more than the figures given in the column under 'reductions".

Notes re Agriculture:—

(a) While it is not possible to make any accurate estimate, it is considered the reduction would be a least two or three per cent.

(b) The change made under these items, apart from the actual increase of drawback, means a great advantage to manufacturers in that it does away with the keeping of accounts and advancing moneys. Another benefit to manufacturers is that materials on hand April 11, 1924, which enter into the cost of implements mentioned will be subject to a drawback of 99 per cent.

(c) These items were subject to various rates of duty, but on the principal items the duties were as indicated.

The agricultural industry was also benefited in 1922 by the exemption from sales tax of fibre used in the manufacture of binder twine.

(d) Prior to 1922 manilla rope was restricted to rope used in holding traps in lobster fisheries; in 1922 the budget extended the free list to include rope used in all fisheries.

(e) Prior to 1924 the duty exemption applied only to "barked" marline: the exemption now applies to all marline, which means some additional saving to fishermen and does away with considerable annoyance.

It is to be noted, also, that the fishing industry was benefited in 1922 through the removal of the sales tax on manilla fibre for use in the manufacture of rope for the fisheries; by the removal of the sales tax on boats purchased by individual fishermen for their own use in the fisheries; and on articles and materials used in the manufacture of similar boats.

NOTES ON GENERAL INDUSTRY—
(f) Reduction calculated on basis of 60 per cent drawback.
(g) The Government has also by recent amendments made reductions in many articles that enter into the construction, equipment or repair of blast furnaces.

Coming now more particularly to reductions in the costs of living. It should be pointed out that the most effective way to reduce the cost of living is to reduce the cost of production of the articles that go to make up the necessaries of life, such as foodstuffs, clothing, boots and shoes, and building materials. That is what has been done by every change in the nature of remission or abolition of customs duties and sales tax upon the instruments of production. It will take time to disclose the full effects in this regard, but that it will be very far-reaching there cannot be a shadow of doubt. We have stressed the advantage of the proposals of the present budget to those engaged in the basic industries and in particular to the farming community. We might, and should, stress with equal force the effect upon consumers generally, for the benefits thus derived through a remission of taxation cannot fail to be passed along and shared directly, as well as indirectly, by consumers generally, viz., the people of the country as a whole.

In addition to this, however, the government has made numerous other changes in the tariff and the sales tax on articles more particularly in the nature of necessaries of life, foodstuffs, clothing, boots and shoes, of immediate and direct benefit to consumers. True it is that, taken item by item, these do not appear large in amount, but taken in the aggregate they should have, and are in fact having, a very appreciable effect in reducing the cost of living in this country.

I have assembled in the form of a tabular statement considerable reductions in duties on the necessaries of life which this government has made and which if permitted I should also like to place on Hansard:

In addition to the reductions in taxation made by reductions in customs duties on many articles which bear immediately and directly upon the cost of living, the government has also made far reaching reductions by abolition of or reduction in the sales tax on an even much larger number of articles. Besides the total remission of the sales tax, already mentioned, on instruments of production, and which should be reflected pretty generally on reduced prices in the necessaries of life, there are many articles of daily use on which the sales tax has been completely abolished and others on which it has been considerably reduced. On all articles that have not been exempted from the sales tax there is under the present budget a reduction from 6 per cent to 5 per cent. As respects the following articles the tax has been altogether removed, or reduced as indicated:

Three per cent is the rate on domestic goods which would be slightly increased by the tax on the raw materials imported. Four per cent is the rate on imported goods for retailers and consumers.

A further important reduction was in coverings used exclusively for covering goods not subject to sale tax. These include cheese boxes, butter boxes, fruit packages, etc., and constitute a very material reduction.

These, Mr. Speaker, may be cynically described as trifles, but they are all making for perfection in the reduction in the cost of living in our country and perfection as we were told a day or so ago, is no trifle! The truth is, taken collectively, they constitute a far-reaching reduction in the cost of living from one end of our country to the other.

To these as effecting a reduction in the cost of living should be added the additional income tax exemptions which the budget grants.

I apologize for occupying so much time but before concluding there are two other subjects on which I should like to say something.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I want to clear up what seems to me a serious misapprehension with respect to the Laurier-Fielding tariff. In the course of this debate it has been intimated that the government was departing in the proposed reductions of customs duties from the Laurier-Fielding policy with respect to the tariff. This was the ground, I think, upon which my friend, the honourable member for St. Lawrence-St. George in Montreal based his objection to the budget. He claimed that he had assured his constituents that if returned to parliament he would in tariff matters follow the Laurier-Fielding policy. If that be true—and knowing my honourable friend as I do, I am sure it is true,—he ought, before it is too late, to reverse his declared intention, and continue his support of the administration upon the tariff proposals in the present budget as in all other particulars.

I contend, Sir, that there is nothing in the budget proposals which is not in complete accord with the Laurier-Fielding policy. That indeed the changes I have referred to are in fullest accord. How are we to judge of the Laurier-Fielding policy with respect to tariffs unless it be that we have regard for declared principles as advocated and supported by these great men in their efforts to mould the thought and opinion of the country on tariff matters.

If we take the political careers of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Right Honourable Mr. Fielding during the years they were associated in their efforts on behalf of Liberalism and the Liberal party, we find they fall naturally into three main divisions: The years prior to 1896 when the Liberal party was in opposition; the fifteen years of Liberal administration, 1896-1911, during which the Liberal party held office—the golden era of progress and prosperity in Canada—and the years succeeding 1911 when the party was again in opposition up to the time of Sir Wilfrid Laurier's death in February, 1919.

I shall not attempt to review much less to enumerate the specific tariff measures advocated, supported and promoted in common by Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Mr. Fielding during the quarter of a century in which together they were the joint exponents of Liberal policy in the matter of tariff, but I will appeal to the record and challenge any one to show wherein, in any one of the three periods I have mentioned, the declared aim, purpose and achievement of Sir Wilfrid and Mr. Fielding in expounding Liberal doctrine was not in full harmony and accord with the action of the present government in reducing duties; reducing duties in particular on the instruments of production in the basic industries of our country, over and above all in the basic industry of agriculture. The record will establish beyond all doubt that the Laurier-Fielding tariff was one not of increased taxation, but of a lowering of taxation with respect to production and living costs.

Let me take first the period prior to 1896. In 1893 the Liberal party held a convention at which were passed two important tariff resolutions declaratory of the party's policy on tariff matters. The first declared the principle on which the customs tariff of the Dominion should be based. The exact words in this particular were "not, as it is now, upon the protective principle, but upon the requirements of the public service". It went on to speak of the evils which the tariff based upon the unsound principle of protection had occasioned and set forth that "the highest interests of Canada demand a removal of this obstacle to our country's progress by the adoption of a sound fiscal policy, which, while not doing injustice to any class, would promote domestic and foreign trade, and hasten the return of prosperity to our people". The resolution went on to declare that the tariff should be reduced to the needs of honest economical and efficient government and to promote freer trade. The second resolution on the tariff was one in favour of reciprocity in trade with the United States.

It was on this policy of tariff reduction, a policy which denounced the principle of protection as radically unsound, that the Liberal party, under Sir Wilfrid Laurier's leadership was returned to power in the general elections of 1896, and that Mr. Fielding entered the Laurier administration as Minister of Finance.

Then followed the fifteen years of Liberal administration. Early in the session of 1897 the new Liberal government passed the first measure of tariff reform, whereby 47 articles were added to the free list, and duties were reduced on 147 others, including farm implements. This was the first instalment of the Laurier-Fielding tariff, a tariff which reduced duties, and which included in the reduction duties on agricultural implements. Then came a second instalment of the Laurier-Fielding tariff in the same year. A preference of 12 per cent granted to the goods of Great Britain coming into Canada, with provision to grant a further preference of 12 per cent in the following year. In the years which followed other items were added to the free list, other duties were reduced, the British preference was further increased and at the time of the general elections of 1900 stood at 33⅓ per cent.

The session of 1901 followed close upon the return to power of the Liberal government. If honourable members will look up the budget speech delivered by Mr. Fielding on that occasion, they will find the Laurier-Fielding tariff policy set out in the following words "The tariff policy we have to offer to-day is the tariff policy which we adopted in 1897 and which we have continued up to the present time". Note the date 1897, the usual tariff revision downwards. In the years that intervened before the next general election more reductions were made in the tariff, more additions were made to the free list. Especially was this true of the year 1904 when 14 articles were put upon the free list, and the duties materially reduced on 14 others.

In the fall of 1904 the Liberal party was again returned to power. The government announced at the session in 1905 that there would not be any changes of an important character during the year. In 1906 a committee of the cabinet made an extended tour of the country inquiring into the desires of the people of all classes in regard to the tariff and promptly at the beginning of the session of 1906-07 the government presented a full revision of the Canadian tariff in what is usually cited as the Customs Tariff, 1907; reductions in the duty on many articles were provided for, readjustments involving increases were made in some cases as the results of experience in the operation of the tariff of 1897 and the free list was enlarged by a number of important additions. If reference is to be made to general tariff revisions, this may I think be appropriately termed the second Laurier-Fielding tariff the first being the tariff of 1897 which Mr.

Fielding had said in 1901 was the one the government had to offer that day, and which had been continued. I shall not attempt to enumerate or review by items the changes in the tariff effected by this tariff of 1907, but inasmuch as we are being told that to be consistent, to be honest, to be true, we should follow the Laurier-Fielding tariff, I think I should give some indication of the nature and trend of that particular tariff revision. Here are some of the reductions of tariff I find:

On reapers, mowers, self binders, binding attachments and harvesters, duty reduced from 20 to 17 per cent.

On windmills and complete threshing machine outfits, duty reduced from 25 per cent to 20 per cent.

On axes, scythes, sickles, hay knives, edging knives, hoes, rakes and pronged forks, duty reduced from 25 per cent to 22½ per cent.

On shovels, spades, shovel and spade blanks, and iron or stool cut shapes for the same and for lawn mowers, duty reduced from 35 per cent to 32½ per cent.

Among the items added to the free list by the new tariff of 1907 were machinery for the manufacture of twine, cordage rope, linen and for the preparation of flax fibre, blast furnace slag, trucks of a kind not made in Canada; parts of miners' safety lamps and accessories, blast furnaces for the testing of copper and nickel, well-drilling machinery for boring and drilling for water, whether made in Canada or not.

Taken by and large the Laurier-Fielding tariff of 1907 presents striking similarities, particularly as respects the instruments of production in the basic industries, and especially the industry of agriculture, to the tariff proposed by the hon. the Acting Minister of Finance. If it is upon the basis of the Laurier-Fielding model that the budget of my hon. friend is to be judged, then I think it is clear beyond possibility of contradiction that he is entitled to all the support that can be given him.

Now Mr. Speaker, I may say that the words "Laurier-Fielding tariff" cannot have any meaning unless they relate to the principle upon which the tariff was framed. Surely no hon. member pretends we were to have to-day the exact tariff of Mr. Fielding's and Sir Wilfrid Laurier's day. If they do so will it be found in the tariff of 1896 or in the tariff of 1907 with their many modifications? The only possible meaning that could have been attached to the expression Laurier-Fielding tariff as used by leaders of the Liberal party, is that if we were returned to power we would proceed with respect to the tariff on the same principle, in the same manner and method as the Liberal party proceeded when Mr. Fielding introduced the Laurier-Fielding tariff.

If there is any doubt on that let us consider the third period, the period subsequent to 1911, when Sir Wilfrid Laurier again stated his position in this House. Surely when up to the time of his death he was fighting for certain tariff principles, he was giving expression to the Laurier-Fielding tariff. When he was in this House after 1911 what did Sir Wilfrid stand for? Why, when my right hon. friend opposite and his friends proposed tariff increases he fought them, opposed them, denounced them. He said that what was needed was not an increase in the tariff, not a tariff based on the principle of protection, but a revision downward; a tariff based on the principle of revenue. All his speeches were to that effect. Not one speech that Sir Wilfrid made contradicted anything in the line of policy that he or Mr. Fielding had advocated.

In the general elections of 1917 in Sir Wilfrid's appeal to the electors, I ask my hon. friends who attach importance to the Laurier-Fielding tariff to tell me what he said. When that appeal was made in 1917 he stated in his manifesto what he thought should be done in regard to the tariff, he told the electors that if returned to power he would reduce the duties on articles that affected the cost of living and on the implements of production in the basic industries. But more than that, the last speech Sir Wilfrid Laurier made in his life was made in this city at a meeting of the Eastern Ontario Liberal Association, held on January 14, 1919. I have a report of that speech in my hand. Can we find any more authoritative interpretation of the Laurier-Fielding tariff than a statement of what our great leader said in reference to the tariff at that time and on that occasion? I say that it is the only statement that anyone has a right to quote as authoritative. Here are Sir Wilfrid's words:

> In this country, Sir, Liberals have always been the disciples of the British people on the question of commercial freedom. Indeed, many years ago,—when you recall that time to-day—in the resolution which was passed upon this subject at the convention of 1893, we declared against the principle of protection, and when we had the opportunity we lived up to our declaration. Sir, it has always been made a cause of reproach to us that when in office we did not adopt but were recreant to our declarations. Such a reproach cannot reach us. We were not recreant, we proceeded step by step towards the goal, always keeping it in view, never imposing a duty for protection's sake, but always acting upon the principle or the basis of a tariff for revenue and revenue only. This was our policy in the past, it is our policy to-day and we have taken this occasion to re-affirm it ....

That was sounding the death knell of protection just as the Minister of the Interior meant the words when he used the phrase the other day. I make this assertion in his hearing and he applauds it. No more tariffs based on the principle of protection—as set forth in the resolution of the Tory party, moved in this debate too late to be accepted—but a tariff based on the principle of revenue.

That was "our policy" in the past—the Laurier-Fielding policy. The words can have no other meaning. That is our policy to-day—the policy of the Liberal party—proceeding step by step towards the goal of greater freedom in matters of trade, never imposing a duty for protection's sake, but always acting on the principle or the basis of a tariff for revenue and revenue only. I repeat this statement in the hearing of hon. members and before this country, this is the position of the Liberal party. We believe in proceeding step by step. We believe when it comes to a question of imposing a duty in having duties framed on a tariff for revenue basis and not on the basis of protection.

One reference to a word which has been much called in question in this debate. A great deal has been said about the Right Hon. Mr. Fielding's reference to stability in his budget speech of last year. I notice that hon. members, when they attack the government either in reference to the Laurier-Fielding policy or in reference to stability, give to the phrase or the word their own meaning, and then tell us that we are putting a false meaning upon it. I contend you cannot take any word and separate it from the context in which it is used, and I say the right hon. Minister of Finance did not mean by tariff stability, any such thing as immobility, finality, stagnation or permanency. One hon. gentleman said something a day or two ago to the effect that the Minister meant the tariff should be permanent. Had he meant so he would have said so. Mr. Fielding was very careful to say that of all the things in the world that could not be permanent the one thing was the tariff. It had to be changed. There had to be adjustments to suit the needs of the time. He made that very emphatic. But after he had spoken hon. members began to take up the word stability and to use it for partisan political ends, to make it synonymous with finality. Before the debate was over I had occasion to say a few words on Mr. Fielding's reference to stability. My statement was made in the presence of the right hon. the Minister of Finance. I made it standing here while he was at my side, and he never questioned the interpretation I put upon his use of the word. My words were said with a full knowledge on the part of my colleagues that they would be said. They were stated in order to make clear to the people of the country the meaning intended to be attached to that word, and I claim, Mr. Speaker, I had some right in the name of the Liberal party to say what meaning should be attached to that word. My words will be found on Hansard at page 3052 of the debate of May 23, 1923, as follows:

> Stability does not mean finality. I notice that some hon. gentlemen opposite have sought to combine the two words. If there was one thing above another which the hon. Minister of Finance was most careful to emphasize when he spoke of stability, it was that as regards all legislation, and in particular as regards the tariff, there was no such thing as finality. He spoke particularly and specifically of the probable need for change as respects some items of the tariff affecting consumers and in relation to the necessities of production.

Elsewhere, I pointed out that Mr. Fielding could not have meant by stability no change for he had concluded his speech by saying that at the very first moment the party had the opportunity, they would go to the country on reciprocity, which meant a change in tariff all along the line.

But I have something that is even more authoritative as illustrating the significance and meaning to be allotted to the word. I have Mr. Fielding's own words where he uses the word "stability" in reference to the tariff changes. It was a word that Mr. Fielding was fond of using, that he had used many times in the course of his public life in addressing audiences. When he was speaking in the House of Commons in 1907, when he was bringing in the budget of 1907 that made the changes in the tariff that I have read to the House to-night, the reduction on implements and the like, he made use of the phrase "tariff stability" in relation to the period of nine years which had preceded it. If hon. members will look at Hansard of May 22, 1906, at page 3839, they will find that Mr. Fielding used the following words, speaking of the inquiry which he and certain of his colleagues had had with a view to a subsequent revision of the tariff, and of the revision which he intended to make, but which had not yet been made. This was in 1906:

> We hope, during the recess, if this session does not extend to too great length, to take up that work...

That was the revision of the tariff.

> ...and at the November session, unless there should be delays in the present session, to cause a change in that programme, we hope to bring forward a revised tariff—not one which will make any great changes, perhaps...

Hon. members will notice that he says not great changes, but small ones; we shall see what these small changes were.

sure of success that we have had in the past, in devising a tariff which will meet the requirements of all interests in the country, and that we shall have again a period of tariff stability under which the industries of Canada will go on and prosper as they have done in the past nine years.

He was speaking in 1906. All the tariff changes that were made in 1897 come within the past nine years, the changes that succeeded in the interval before 1901 and 1904, those changes, those reductions in the tariff, and in the revision to be made there were the further changes, changes with respect to the implements of production in basic industries that I have already quoted. Mr. Fielding uses these words:

We hope to bring forward a revised tariff—not one which will make any great changes, perhaps...

And they were considerable as I have read them to the House.

...and that we shall have again a period of tariff stability under which the industries of Canada will go on and prosper as they have done in the past nine years.

If you will take his thought, you will see that when Mr. Fielding uses the word "stability," he used it always in reference to meeting new conditions that have arisen or may arise. It is not a stationary, stagnant business; it is a matter of making progress and making it in the right direction.

Not one which will make any great changes, perhaps, but one which will meet such conditions as have arisen.

There is the first thing.

...and we hope that we shall have the same measure of success that we have had in the past, in devising a tariff which will meet the requirements of all interests in the country.

There is another phase of it.

...and that we shall have again a period of tariff stability.

In other words, the tariff was not to be something permanent, stationary, immutable, unchangeable and the like, but with tariff stability there was to be progress in the right direction. I might indicate what I think Mr. Fielding had in mind, what seems to be the right interpretation, if I remind the House of a little rhyme which is, I think, familiar with regard to the word "rest". Many persons would like to define rest as idleness, to give it the significance of indolence, doing nothing, marking time. The little rhyme runs:

Rest is not quitting this busy career,
Rest is adjusting oneself to one's sphere.

It is adjusting oneself to one's environment, a going in the right direction, making progress, and it is the same with stability. Whoever spoke of a ship at sea as being stable because it was standing still? When a ship puts out to sea to make from one port to another, we say that she is steady or stable when she is in motion, when she is making headway, according to the way in which she holds her own against the different winds and seas which she encounters. We to-day are following that course. We have come to the moment where we can reduce taxation, and we are reducing it in accordance with what we have promised.

Just a word to the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond) for whom there is no one that I have greater affection or greater regard, the last member of this House that, if it was within my power to prevent it, I would injure in any way or for that matter the constituency of which he is the distinguished representative. My hon. friend, in the speech that he made some little time ago said:

I am loath to think that the Prime Minister would do anything against the interests of Brantford.

He is right.

In this resolution that was brought before the city council, it is stated that when the Prime Minister was in Brantford before the election he made a promise and a pledge to the people that if he were returned to power, no legitimate industry would suffer. Consequently, we cannot, upon present evidence, condemn the Prime Minister, but we shall not forget his promise.

This afternoon my right hon. friend, in his characteristic way, read a portion of a speech which I made at Brantford, and which contains, I think, the promise to which my hon. friend has reference. I asked my right hon. friend the name of the paper from which he was reading, and he said he was reading from the Montreal Gazette, but he thought the article was from the Brantford Expositor. I have in my hand a copy of the paper and of the article. It is a Canadian Press despatch headed:

Rocks and shoals may divert route of Liberal ship. King will not lay out course by convention tariff chart alone. Brantford meetings.

And so forth. My right hon. friend as I say, read this and also the following:

No legitimate industry is going to be hurt by our tariff policy, Mr. King declared. "But if we find industries taking advantage of the tariff to build up combines and trusts, then, if I have anything to do with it, we will put an end to this amassing of fortunes at the people's expense."

But he did not read this part, and this I would recall to the mind of the hon. member for Brantford as to what I said. It is in the same despatch quoting what I said at Brantford when I was supporting him at his election:

Mr. King reiterated that the Liberal party did not stand for free trade. The people now realised this fact. But the tariff must be primarily for revenue, and it must be revised in a manner to bring about an increase in production. Implements used in the basic industries and necessaries of life must be relieved of taxation as far as possible.

There is the statement that I made in Brantford when I went there to support my hon. friend, when I hoped that he would be returned to parliament. I said there the thing which I knew I would have to say some day in this House, because I believed that the Liberal party was going to be returned to power, and I was careful to see that no man in Brantford, because I thought my hon. friend would be returned, or in any other constituency, would be able to chide me with having taken one position in Brantford and another elsewhere. So I took care to say this and the Brantford Expositor records it:

> Implements used in the basic industries and necessaries of life must be relieved of taxation as far as possible.

I did say that industries doing legitimate business would not be injured, and I think I do not need to go further than the words uttered by the leader of the opposition this afternoon to convince the hon. member for Brantford that I have been true to what I then said. The leader of the opposition said this afternoon: "As regards these agricultural implement manufacturers, I do not believe they are going to be hurt," and that is what the country thinks and that is what the implement makers themselves think.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The worse the quotation, the more the applause. I did not make the statement which the Prime Minister attributes to me. It is only about three minutes since I read it. I took no responsibility as to what the effect would be. I did say that I did not think it would be very great.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am quite prepared to accept my right hon. friend's latest twist and to take his word.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will show the Prime Minister the statement in the transcript of Hansard if he calls it a twist.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I protest against the Prime Minister describing my words as a twist.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think I shall be much dismayed by the rumble which hon. gentlemen create on the other side.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend is rather sensitive.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not twist, but I know who does.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend is squirming badly now. I was not referring to the words in Hansard, I was referring to his present interpretation. The House is accustomed to the habit of the right hon. gentleman of trying to leave one impression by the use of certain words which are susceptible of a different interpretation. However, that is not an important point. The main thing, is it not, is the fact, as my hon. friend from Brantford will I think agree, that the government has endeavoured to meet the implement manufacturers as we said we would.

We have been able, in a large part at least, and I believe time will show, wholly, to make good to the manufacturers of implements in one way or another whatever they may have lost through tariff reductions. That is only carrying out the policy announced by the Liberal party; for wherever mention is made of reducing the duties on implements of production there is also indicated an intention of reducing the duties on raw materials that enter into the making of the finished product. We have endeavoured as far as possible to meet the manufacturers in that way. A statement has been quoted from the Massey-Harris Company, and I shall not refer to it again except to say that, interpreted in the way I think it ought to be interpreted, it implies that the government has dealt fairly by that industry and that the company hope, as a result of the changes which have been made, to be in a position to offer their implements cheaper to the farmers and thus do a greater business in the future than they have been able to do in the past. Let me say to my friend the hon. member for Brantford, I have not forgotten my promise, I have fulfilled it.

I have in my hand, from the Brantford Expositor, a series of interviews which I shall not attempt to quote even in part. These interviews are given by the Verity Plow Company, the Cockshutt Plow Company and the Adams Plow Company. The headline reads:

> New schedules introduced will constitute some help in matter of lower tariff . . . . Comments of Brantford implement makers to whom free raw material list had not been previously extended—an undoubted feeling exists of improvement in the outlook—firms will continue to carry on to the best of their ability.

They feel that a very considerable concession has been made and they hope to go on with their business as in the past.

My right hon. friend said this afternoon that the tariff changes had been restricted in their application so as not to touch the constituency of any member of the government in which there might be an implement industry. At any rate, that was the purport of his words. The implication was that, as the common saying is, care had been taken by the government to look after their own relations but that they had let their neighbours' relations shift for themselves. Well, in the constituency, North York, which I have the honour to represent in this parliament there is an important implement industry and one of long standing in this country. I refer to J. Fleury's Sons of Aurora, Ontario, makers of cultivating implements and stock raisers' machines. I need not tell members of the Progressive party who J. Fleury's Sons are in the implement-making business, but I will read a letter which I have received from Mr. Fleury, the head of this firm, so that the House may see what his view is with respect to the changes that have been made. The letter is dated May 1, 1924 at Aurora, Ontario, and it is as follows:

Dear Mr. KING:

I wish to express my satisfaction with the amendments put before the House yesterday in connection with duties on materials entering into the cost of implements.

Manufacturers of agricultural implements should feel, I believe, that they have no real grievance; and should be able to show farmers (and no doubt will) that the adjustments of the tariff and the removal of the sales tax will give farmers appreciable benefit in the matter of lower prices.

I wish to express my appreciation of, and thanks for, your consideration in taking time personally to get a real understanding of the situation of implement manufacturers as affected by the changes in the tariff.

With kind regards, I am,

Yours faithfully,

H. W. FLEURY.

Mr. Fleury, as hon. members are aware, is one of the best known and most important agricultural implement makers in Ontario and indeed in Canada. I may say that when the government decided that the time had come when a change should be made in the tariff on implements of production we did not try to bring about that change in an indifferent manner or one which would work injury to any industries that could be avoided. We sought to get in touch with the implement makers and I myself asked a number of them and their representatives to come to Ottawa to confer with some of my colleagues and myself. We met them and intimated that in our opinion the interests of Canada demanded that there should be a reduction in the duties on agricultural implements and that the government had made up its mind to that reduction. We added, however, that we wished to make that reduction in such a manner as would do the least possible injury to the industries with which these manufacturers were connected, and we invited suggestions from them as to how, in making the reduction, we could meet them in other ways. We had numerous conferences with them, the result being that we have worked out a tariff which in my opinion not only will prove beneficial to all the basic industries and the manufacturing businesses that develop out of those industries, but which will also prove of advantage to the implement makers themselves. Time will tell, and time I think will prove that the government in this connection has been wise.

I was going to say something on immigration but I shall reserve my remarks on that subject until another occasion, for I fear that other speakers have been much restricted this evening. As we opened the debate with an exchange of courtesies in the nature of an exchange of editorials from the Farmers' Sun between the leader of the opposition and myself, I think before concluding I should tender him one more from the Farmers' Sun to make up for the "Wobbling Mr. King" one which he sent over to me. My right hon. friend waxed eloquent in his desire for a general election. He said, "We are ready now and we challenge the government to go to the country at once." And all his cohorts alongside him applauded so that it was impossible to hear another sound for a good many seconds. Perhaps the Farmers' Sun is not very far wrong in its view of what my hon. friend's desire is in the matter of a general election. This editorial appears under date April 16 and is headed "Mr. Meighen's hard luck." It reads:

The heaviest cross the Tory politician has to bear is not an overpowering fear of industrial collapse due to tariff reduction. Such a fear might disturb him somewhat, but it could never impress him as a misfortune equal to the circumstance that Hon. Robb's budget should make its appearance a year or more before a general election. It is one thing to plunge into a campaign, broadcasting blue ruin, creating distrust and apprehension by predicting disaster in the future; it is an entirely different proposition to unbalance the judgment of an electorate able to measure of sincerity of election propaganda in the light of experience. By the time the voters of the Dominion are called upon to speak, the changes submitted to the House by the Acting Finance Minister will have had a reasonable trial. It will be known then beyond dispute how much or how little they have benefited agriculture, and the other primary industries of the country. It will be possible, also, to estimate the injury, if any, inflicted upon industries whose protection has been reduced. And this is as it should be.

My right hon. friend says that he is ready for a general election. Let me tell him that this government has not yet finished its work of the present parliament. We have a lot more to do; we have only started upon what we hope to be able to do for the country. My right hon. friend may want a general election, but the country does not. The country notes with favour the progress in its affairs that has been made since the present administration has taken office. The people have not failed to observe the improvement in conditions disclosed by each successive budget brought down since the present administration took office. The country is looking to this administration to carry on the good work it has begun and which it intends to continue.

In a word, Mr. Speaker, we believe that in this budget we have been able in very large measure to implement the promises, the professions and the pledges which we made to the electorate in the general election of 1921. We believe that we have established a policy that is entitled to be called a real national policy, because it is so framed as to serve not one class but all classes as well as all interests, manufacturing, commercial, and financial. We want to see that policy given a trial. We believe that if it is given a trial this country will witness a forward progressive movement such as it has not known for many years, and that when the time does come that we appeal to the people again for their support, they will express their confidence in a government which has lived up to its convictions, carried out the promises which it made to the electorate, and conducted the nation's affairs with the interests of the people ever at heart.

Let me say in conclusion that in what we have done not only have we been seeking to improve the country industrially, but we have been seeking also to unite the nation from the Atlantic to the Pacific. We have viewed with a good deal of concern the division which has sprung up between eastern and western Canada. We have felt that it was not good for Canada to be divided into two great sections, each becoming more and more class conscious—the West feeling that it had a grievance against the East, the East bitter in its antagonism towards the West. We have sought therefore a policy which would bring about national unity and demonstrate a community of interests. We have sought to do this in a manner which, we believe, will help to bring from the Old World immigrants to our shores as the tide used to flow hither in the past, which will have the effect also of again bringing immigrants from the United States. We believe with the legislation we are presenting prosperity will return as it came in the days of the Liberal party before, when due regard was had to the development of the primary industries of this country. We feel we are helping to unite Canada, to promote a community of interest between the different classes and the different parts of our country, and in this way to build up a stronger, a more prosperous and a happier Dominion, proud to be a part of the great British Empire to which we belong, a country that will be of service to its own kith and kin and of service as well to the community of nations of which it is a part.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, at this late hour of the night and at this late stage of the debate I shall endeavour to make my contribution to the discussion as brief as possible I cannot let the occasion pass without saying a word of commendation to the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) on the statement he submitted to the House five weeks ago to-day. My hon. friend is Scotch, and he has some of the valued characteristics of his race; he has the Scotch characteristic of hard-headedness, he has also the Scotch characteristic of modesty. But I think his modesty must really be suffering very severely in view of the lavish compliments that, quite properly, have been bestowed upon him. His budget speech was the shortest that has been delivered since I became a member of this House in 1917. That may be the reason why the debate is the longest in my parliamentary experience. If I might be permitted, I would proffer a word of advice to my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and to my right hon. friend who leads the opposition (Mr. Meighen); it is that in this respect they might each endeavour to emulate a little more the brevity followed by my hon. friend the Acting Minister of Finance in introducing his budget.

Nor can I let the occasion pass without saying a word with respect to the Minister of Finance (Mr Fielding) who is unable to be in his seat. I think by common consent the Right Hon. Mr. Fielding occupies a pre-eminent position in the public life of the Dominion. His experience as a public servant has extended over forty years, commencing in the province of Nova Scotia and continuing in the larger federal arena. In that long and valuable service he has contributed unstintedly of his outstanding abilities to the upbuilding of this Dominion. I think it is a great deal to his credit that at the end of that lengthy period of public service he stands at the forefront, remarkable for his courtesy to his opponents, and without the slightest suggestion of a stain on his reputation as a public man. In that respect he has set a worthy example to our public men, young and old, who may be moulding the destinies of the Dominion to-day, or in the future.

Turning to the budget itself, I wish to refer first to the national debt and the surplus. I have not very closely analysed the statement produced by the Acting Minister of Finance as to whether it really shows a surplus or a deficit. I must confess that when I listened yesterday to my right hon. friend who leads the opposition I thought the surplus was vanishing into thin air, but when I listened again this afternoon to my right hon. friend who leads the government, I thought he presented another side of the story. But at any rate, what is the purpose of bookkeeping in a business concern or in our national economy? Its whole purpose is to reveal the precise and exact position of a business; and it should be so in regard to the affairs of the Dominion. I dare say that probably others could put a different construction after an analysis of the figures, to that which has already been given to the House. The important thing, however, is that the public should be plainly and completely informed as to the exact position of our finances. In respect to our railway financing I think its nature must govern its treatment in the national accounts. Anything in the nature of capital charges in the way of expenditure for railway extensions, for proper betterments, is a proper capital charge; there is a definite asset against it; and I see no good or sound reason why such should be charged up as a part of the ordinary expenditure of the country. That is the manner in which it has been treated in the past: all the guarantees that this country has given, to the extent of hundreds of millions of dollars, has never been charged to the national debt. I could instance that in the guarantees that have been given to bodies like the Montreal Harbour Board, the Quebec Harbour Board, the Vancouver Harbour Board, and similar corporations. But there should be a sharp distinction drawn between expenditure of that kind and expenditure that is incurred, for instance, in the form of capital charges on our railways.

It will be several years yet, probably two or three under the very best of conditions, before the earnings of the National Railways will be sufficient to pay operating expenses and all the charges against the money invested in the enterprise. The custom has been in the past to add these interest charges to the obligations of the road. These interest charges should be a direct charge on the finances of Canada until the road is in a position to meet them.

I want to make reference to a suggestion made by my hon. friend the member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) in his admirable speech on the budget some days ago. In discussing the handling of the railway finances he advanced rather a novel idea. He made the suggestion that all the revenues of the railway should be paid into the consolidated fund of Canada, and that all the expenditures should be disbursed in the same way as other government expenditures are disbursed. Now I usually find myself in complete agreement with my hon. friend from Brome, but I am quite sure of this, that he has not given the suggestion that he made to the House very full study or consideration, or he would not have made it. That, to my mind, would make a wholly impossible condition of affairs in the administration of these roads. Fancy, for instance, having all the revenues that are taken in over all parts of this broad Dominion from the Atlantic to the Pacific paid into the consolidated revenue fund of Canada! How are the payments to be made? How are the expenses of the road to be met? The road could not possibly operate under those conditions with any satisfaction whatever. There would also be the further disadvantage that it would drive the administration of the road more and more into the ambit and orbit of political pressure and political consideration, and if this road is ever to succeed, and I believe it will succeed, it must be removed, absolutely and utterly, from the region of political interference.

I think there is some credit coming to the Acting Finance Minister (Mr. Robb) for the reductions in taxation that he has made. If press despatches are correct strong representations were made to the government prior to the delivery of the budget, that taxation should be reduced. But I have observed that the reductions that have been made through the budget we are now considering, affect altogether what might be termed the necessaries of life for the great masses of the Canadian people. I am among those who believe that taxation should be reduced in this country as rapidly as possible, and I am glad to see in the step the government have taken in that direction that they have reduced the taxes as far as possible on the things that are in most common use among the Canadian people, and that is certainly where taxes should be first reduced.

The chief issue involved in the budget, however, is the issue of the tariff. I listened with a great deal of interest to the address delivered by my right hon. friend who leads the opposition, and as well to my right hon. friend who leads the government. There is no question whatever now where my hon. friends to my right stand on the question of the tariff.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There never was.

Mr. CRERAR: Well, to be quite frank, when I was listening to the speech of my right hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, yesterday afternoon, I had a doubt where he was going to come out on the question. But he evidently got some inspiration overnight and now he stands absolutely and flat-footedly on the principle of protection and not the tariff as we have it to-day. If there is any meaning in the words of my right hon. friend, they mean that if he is again returned to power and the party he leads resumes the reins of office in this country, there is no further chance of reductions in the tariff, but there is a certainty that the tariff will go up. My right hon. friend also had some criticism to offer of members of the Progressive party for having expressed different views on the tariff. Well, I presume that he will stand by the utterances of his own followers on this question. Only the other day, on May 12, the hon. member for Prince Edward (Mr. Hubbs), speaking from his seat in the House had this to say on the tariff:

> Now, Mr. Speaker, I must say that I am entirely opposed to the budget. Let me emphasize again, what we must have in this country if we are going to build up Canada, is a good constructive tariff. If I had the framing of it I would say put on a tariff so high that nobody could fly over it with an aeroplane and so deep in its foundations that a submarine could not dig under it.

Now there is the real Simon-pure gospel of protection. I do not know how far my right hon. friend agrees with that, but I can tell him that the gospel that he preached this afternoon will not find a very favourable reception in that great part of Canada that lies west of the Great Lakes. But if the government's policy means anything, as enunciated by the Acting Minister of Finance, and as elaborated by the Prime Minister this afternoon, it means this, that the fiscal policy of this country, so far as the present government is concerned, is to be shaped in the future as it has been shaped in this budget, upon the principle of developing the great natural wealth of this Dominion. Now that, it seems to me, is a distinct step in advance, and I will endeavour to show why a little bit later.

Some reference has been made in the debate to the Liberal platform of 1919. Well, I remember reading the press descriptions of that great convention, at which were assembled delegates from every constituency in Canada. They gathered here in Ottawa from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and it was not the leaders of the Liberal party at that time who were making the platform of the party. That was a democratic convention, so far as my recollection goes, and so far as my reading of newspaper reports of its proceedings is concerned, and that convention, embracing some seven or eight hundred delegates from all over this Dominion, sat down in consideration of a course of public policy. Whether the government that was elected in 1921, and which my right hon. friend now leads, has up to the present lived up to that platform or not, I think they may justly claim that in the present tariff proposals which they have brought down they have at any rate made a step in that direction.

Why do I offer a word of commendation of this budget? Because this budget recognizes the position of agriculture in this great Dominion. I have advocated in this House on several occasions before—I advocated it during the election of 1921 in every constituency, I think, in which I spoke—that a sound fiscal policy for Canada was a policy which would develop the natural wealth of the country, which would not endeavour to foster and stimulate, at the expense of the great masses of the people, artificial industries that were unsuitable to the development of this Dominion. Sir, I believe that that policy is sound to-day, and sounder to-day than it has ever been before. Our protectionist friends argue that we should be a great manufacturing country, that we should manufacture our own raw materials in Canada and export the finished product abroad. I have no fault to find with that. But what value is a protective tariff in the development of manufacturing industries based on the natural resources of this country when we produce from these resources away and above what we can possibly consume at home? I ask what value is a protective tariff to an industry of that kind? What value is a protective tariff, to the great pulp and lumber industry of this country? Take the figures of our exports and they are growing almost every year in that particular industry. What value is a protective tariff, for instance, to the flour milling industry of this country? We export hundreds of thousands of barrels of flour every year from Canada. What benefit is it to a meat packing establishment? What benefit is it to any of the great industries that are based on our natural resources? It is of no benefit. But where has the protective tariff been invoked in Canada, where has it been used? It has been used in building up or creating industries in Canada the major portion of which depend upon a foreign country for their raw material. I submit, Sir, that that is not a sound method of development.

After all, where does the great wealth, the real wealth, of this country lie? It lies in our fertile fields, it lies in our vast mineral areas, in our forest wealth, and in our fisheries: and if we are to seek and find a sane and sound policy of national development we must seek it along the lines that will encourage production of wealth from these things, and not by the creation and stimulation of artificial industries that depend upon foreign countries for their raw material. I might instance some of these. Take the most highly protected things in this country and what are they? Well, we find them in cotton goods, we find them in rubber goods, and we find them also in many other lines. Is it a sane policy—I ask my protectionist friends this question—to penalize the people of Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific, to increase the cost of living to every person in this Dominion, to build up industries of this character? I say it is not a sane policy. That is why I am in support of the policy the government has brought down as far as it has gone.

Now, this budget has not really hurt any one. Who has it hurt?

Mr. GRAHAM: It has hurt a lot of feeling.

Mr. CRERAR: It has hurt a lot of feeling. The reductions in duties on agricultural implements have been compensated for, and rightly so, by the reductions on the raw materials that go into those implements. And what is the net result? The net result to-day is that every farmer in Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific, will buy his agricultural implements this year cheaper than before, or cheaper than he otherwise would have done if this budget had not been brought down. I am at a loss to understand the attitude of many newspapers and public men, and I might include in that the right hon. gentleman who leads the opposition because of the course he has taken on this question. I read something not very long ago about "the influence of the psychology of fear." That is the attitude of mind to-day of some people. If you study this thing in the light of the cold analysis of fact what injury has it done? And yet we have a tremendous outcry all over the greater part of Ontario and part of Quebec. I am amused in reading the Montreal Star. A few months ago it had a series of editorials under the caption "The whisper of death." It saw nothing but blue ruin, and now it sees nothing but blue ruin from this budget. I can compliment my right hon. friend who leads the opposition on one thing—that his speech here to-day has probably brought him the support of the Montreal Star, and that, I am sure, will be a great joy to his heart. I shall watch very anxiously and with a great deal of care for its editorials to-morrow.

But this brings back to my mind the reciprocity arrangement of 1911. What injury was done to the Canadian manufacturers under that arrangement? There was not a single possible injury to them under the reciprocity arrangement of 1911; it would in the end have been a boon to them. But what was the course taken? Well, we had the manifesto of the "noble eighteen" of Toronto who came out in flat-footed opposition. We had a frenzy and furor of opposition to that proposal created for months by active propaganda in eastern Cnada. And with what result? That the people of Canada were misled as to the real purpose and real value of that arrangement. My right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) has argued that that arrangement would have been of no value to Canada, that we were far better without it, and some of his supporters have taken the same ground. Was it of no value to this country with its tremendous agricultural output to find all the possible markets that could be found for these agricultural products? On the very face of it was that not a common sense proposal? In a study of our national economy what this country needs more than anything else at the present time is markets, and under the reciprocity arrangement of 1911 we were given access to the American market for our natural products.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: What was the response from your own province of Manitoba in regard to that?

Mr. CRERAR: Oh yes, I have heard that question before and I answered it. I want to say to my hon. friend now that he got a response from the province of Manitoba in 1921 as to what it thinks on the question of reciprocity and the question of tariff generally. In Canada we were robbed of the benefits of that arrangement. My right hon. friend argues that there would have been no stability to that arrangement, that we could not depend on the United States government living up to its obligations; but the fact was that the American government kept that offer on its statute books for over ten years

It incorporated it into the law of the United States, and it remained there until they became convinced of the fact that Canada had slammed the door in their faces and did not want to have anything to do with them. The agitation that has been worked up over the budget in eastern Canada reminds me of the agitation worked up against reciprocity in 1911.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It did not frighten you?

Mr. CRERAR: No, it did not frighten me. Let me say a further word or two about the reciprocity pact in 1911. That arrangement gave entry to the United States market for our wheat and live stock. Every additional dollar that could be brought into Canada as a result of the sale of these products was an additional dollar of purchasing power on the farms of Canada for the business concerns of this Dominion. I am amused at the attitude I find in eastern Canada on this budget. I was interested recently in reading an article in the Hamilton Herald, an interview with the president—I take it the president of the local branch of the manufacturers' association in the city of Hamilton—given out after the budget was delivered by the Acting Finance Minister (Mr. Robb). The article says:

> It is very far reaching and is giving the western farmer, who is really a foreigner an award at the expense of the other parts of the Dominion. The western farmer as a rule has no interest in the country. He eats out of a can and gets all he can from outside the country, and puts his wheat in in the spring. As soon as he harvests and markets his grain he goes off to California, or some other place for the winter, and spends his money outside the country.

Here is a new definition of a western farmer. He is a foreigner who eats out of a can and winters in California. That is an interview given to the Hamilton Herald by the president of the local manufacturers' association. I have here another paper, the Labour Leader, of Toronto and I would commend this to my hon. friend from Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth). I shall not read the article in full; in fact, I shall do no more than draw attention to it. But the whole purpose of the article is to excite indignation, to stir up people, and to work them up to a high pitch of opposition to any reductions in the tariff that may give any benefit to agriculture.

I desire to say a word or two as to the attitude of the West on this question of tariff, and why western Canada holds the view it does hold on the tariff. What are the chief products of western Canada? The chief products of that part of the Dominion are agricultural products. We produce grain in large quantities. We produce live stock, butter, wool and the other agricultural products that are commonly found in agricultural communities. The wheat production of western Canada last year reached 480,000,000 bushels. We will require to export at least 380,000,000 bushels of that crop either in wheat or in flour. We sell that wheat to the markets of the world, in competition with the countries of the world. We also produce live stock in great number and our production of live animals is away in excess of the possible consumption of this Dominion. What is the basis upon which the prices for these commodities are fixed? They are fixed also in the markets of the world in competition with the world, and the same is true with regard to our dairy products and all our agricultural products. What value then is your protective tariff to the western Canadian farmer.

I mention this fact, sir, because I think there is a great deal of misunderstanding in eastern Canada as to the actual position of the West on this question of tariff. The western farmer is not a protectionist and never will be; I will say more, that you can take the most hidebound protectionist you can find in Ontario, in Montreal or anywhere else; and send him to western Canada, and while the heresy may cling to him as long as he lives because of his early environment and training, yet none of his children will grow up to believe in it. After all people's views on questions of this kind are fixed or influenced largely by their local conditions, and environment, and you cannot convince the western farmer, nor can you convince the average western businessman in town or city, that a protective tariff is of any value to him. I was glad to hear a reference by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in the concluding portion of his remarks as to the need of unity in this Dominion.

After all the most significant political fact in Canada to-day is the thousand miles of wilderness between the East and the West. As legislators in this parliament we should never lose sight of the fact that what we really have in this Dominion is two or three separate communities, and one of the greatest tasks of statesmanship in the Dominion is to shape policies, and find policies that will hold this country together. It is not enough to say to the western people, "You are ungrateful; we have assisted in creating the country for you and you are ungrateful when you protest against a protective tariff." That will not convince them, but I do believe that the western people in general outlook are reasonable, notwithstanding the criticism that has been directed against them. It is true the great mass of the western people have pretty definite views on this question of the tariff. I realize in any solution of it, there may require to be something of the principle of give and take. The idea that exists among many eastern manufacturers and industries that western Canada is out to destroy industry is wholly wrong. It is not the case, but we must realize the fact that western Canada does not profit in any way from a protective tariff. I say in all seriousness that that fact should be realized and understood in eastern Canada, if a way is to be found that will prevent any serious conflict of opinion arising on this question as between different parts of the Dominion. I speak quite frankly, speaking only for myself, when I say that if the tariff is fixed on a basis of the revenue needs of the country, it should be possible to find such a way. The revenue requirements of this country mean that revenue must be raised through the agency of the tariff for many years to come. There is no gainsaying that fact; but I want to repeat that a tariff based on the principle and the needs of revenue is a wholly different thing from a tariff based on the principle of protection.

We have had a good many arguments in this debate from hon. members who believe in the principle of protection, that it is essential to the building up of this country, that a protective tariff is the great contributor to the wealth of this country. After all, what is the best measure or gauge of the wealth of a country? It is the volume and character of its trade, with other countries, not the volume it does in trading amongst its own individuals. What are the facts in respect to the trade of the Dominion when it enters the world's market? Let us take the figures for the twelve months ended March 31, last, as prepared by the Department of Customs and Excise. We find this:

Exports of Dominion
Agricultural and vegetable products.. ..	$391,000,000
Animals and animal products..	140,000,000
Agricultural and vegetable products, other than foods..	39,000,000
Wood, wood products and paper..	273,000,000

And so on. I quote these figures merely to show that the real source of wealth in this Dominion comes from its agricultural lands, its forests and its fisheries.

I do not wish to delay the House, and I want to pass on and to consider briefly the argument that has been urged by our protectionist friends that we should have a self-contained country; in other words, that we should endeavour to live as much as possible within ourselves. There is no such thing anywhere in the world to-day as a self-contained country. Reference has been made in the discussion before, I believe by the hon. member for South Winnipeg (Mr Hudson), to the position of Great Britain. Where is there in the world to-day a country that excels Great Britain in prosperity, a country that has stood the shock of war and the reconstruction period following the war as well as Great Britain? But is she a self-contained country? Great Britain has not at any time food supplies to last her for more than six or eight weeks. She imports raw cottons, raw materials in a multitude of ways, and it is by manufacturing and re-exporting them and trading with the world that she has amassed her great wealth. And with what result? Only recently the Chancellor of the Exchequer brought down his budget and he showed a reduction in their debt for the year of over $240,000,000. What is the position of protectionist Germany, of protectionist France to-day?—one asking the world to help rehabilitate her; the other in a perilous position financially.

Mr. STANSELL: Does the hon. member think that western farmers who are complaining to-day would better their condition by emigrating to Great Britain?

Mr. CRERAR: I do not really know what that has to do with the case. I do not think they would. I do not see why they should do so. The fact is that there are too many people in Great Britain to-day. The British government are subsidizing them to get them away.

Mr. STANSELL: Would the same thing happen here if we had free trade in Canada?

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend asks if the same thing would happen here if we had free trade in Canada. With a country 5,000 miles in extent from ocean to ocean and anywhere from nothing to 1,000 miles north of inhabitable territory we could support a hundred million people without any difficulty.

The ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) had something to say about the Americanization of Canadian industry. He argues that, as a result of these tariff changes the manufacturing business of this Dominion will go to the United States; that our industries would be all Americanized, and that our people would be leaving Canada in shoals as a result of the proposals brought down by the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb). What are the facts in respect to the movement of population to the United States? It is true that within the last few years we have had a considerable movement of population from Canada to the United States, but that movement took place before this budget was brought down. If we go back a little bit into the history of Canada, I find on examination that, in the period 1880 to 1890, which is the period immediately following the inauguration of the National Policy of protection which was put into effect in Canada in 1878 or 1879, at a time when the population of this Dominion was about one-half of what it is at the present time, more than 392,000 people left Canada to go to the United States. If we examine the figures further, we find that from the late nineties for the next ten or twelve years there was practically no movement of population from Canada to the United States. What was the reason of that? It was this, that western Canada was opening up; great quantities of free land were available to settlers who were coming in and taking advantage of that. The movement was from eastern Canada to our western provinces. As regards the Americanization of our industries, I should like to draw attention to this fact, that that process is going on at the present time in any case. What are the facts? To-day American capital is flowing into this country in immense quantities, and that is perfectly agreeable to my hon. friends to my right. The industries of the Dominion are to-day largely controlled by American capital. A statement issued by the Bankers' Trust Company of New York, a short time ago, gave the information that over $2,500,000,000 of American money was invested in the Dominion of Canada. In 1921, more than $1,000,000,000 was invested in fifteen groups engaged in manufacturing enterprises in Canada. What does this mean? My hon. friends to my right do not want Canadians to buy American made goods; they want the American to come over here with his capital, to establish himself in Canada and to make the goods in this country.

Mr. MANION: Hear, hear.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend says: "hear, hear," but the result of that is this, that he comes over here and he becomes the most ardent advocate there is for a protective tariff in this Dominion.

Mr. MANION: Hear, hear.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend again says: "hear, hear" to that fact. As a result of that, the American capitalist comes to Canada under the aegis of our protective tariff. He gets his return on his investment; he takes that back to his own country, and the people of Canada from one end of the country to the other have contributed to that result.

Mr. BOYS: He pays a large amount of wages.

Mr. CRERAR: He pays a certain amount in wages, and the raw materials are found in this country. Now, there is one other result so far as the principle of protection in the tariff is concerned, and that is that it leads inevitably to the development of state socialism; it is a form of state socialism. When the power of the state is used to give benefits to a certain section of the people through tariff laws it is a direct use of that power to benefit a portion of the community at the expense of the rest. Reference has been made in this debate to the condition of agriculture in western Canada and throughout the Dominion, and the argument is advanced that what agriculture needs in this country is more protection. The United States is a highly protected country; and what is the position of agriculture there? With all their protection agriculture is in a worse condition in the United States than it is in Canada. And what is the inescapable result? The American farmer is appealing to congress for relief and proposals are before that body for the expenditure of vast sums of money to afford relief to the farmers of the United States who find that they cannot prosper under their present system.

Mr. MANION: Does not my hon. friend admit that in England under free trade since 1846 the British farmers have been nearly wiped out of existence?

Mr. CRERAR: If they have been nearly wiped out of existence, it is because of another reason altogether. If my hon. friend would talk with British farmers as I have to many of those who have come to western Canada he would find out why they leave the Old Country.

Mr. MANION: They left to come to a protected country.

Mr. CRERAR: Nonsense; they left because they could not pay the exorbitant rents which the landlords asked them to pay.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Conservative landlords.

Mr. CRERAR: There are a few other points which I think should be touched upon. I believe that this country needs strong constructive policies at the present time, and I purpose supporting the budget because I think it is a step in the right direction. At the same time, if my right hon. friend who leads the government gets his tariff advisory committee at work one of the first duties which I think that committee should undertake will be to find out for instance why it is that the duty is fixed at 20 per cent, on shovels and spades and 30 per cent on bathtubs and dishpans. There should be a consistent principle running through the establishment of a tariff policy in Canada, and it is for the people through their government to settle what that principle shall be. With the principle upon which your tariff is to be based once established, then I think there may be some advantage in having a body such as the Prime Minister referred to; but that body should be charged with further duties than those of advising on the ironing out inequalities in the tariff. One of the most necessary things in the Dominion to-day is some study of the whole question of taxation in order to prevent overlapping in the imposition of taxes, and a study of the incidence of provincial and federal taxation. After all, we cannot get away from the fact that the country is facing grave difficulties. While our debt is enormous I believe we have the resources that will overcome our handicaps from the taxation that we have to support. But this can be done only by the most intelligent study of the whole problem, and I think that some such body charged with the duty of studying the whole question of taxation could give a great deal of information to the government and to the country that would assist in getting taxation established on a fair, sound basis.

I am satisfied with the budget as far as it goes; but, if I may repeat what I said a little while ago, I believe that a basis can be found upon which we can get some common agreement between East and West on the question of the tariff by placing the tariff frankly on a revenue basis and recognizing it as such and not as a protective tariff. There must yet be very considerable reductions in the tariff. No one wants to hurt Canadian industry, and least of all do the people of western Canada desire to do so. But I say that the task of statesmanship in Canada is to find policies that will hold the country together, that will unite it from one end to the other. We can have our differences of opinion on administration, and we doubtless shall have such differences in the future. But I deprecate, I deplore anything that will arise in this Canada of ours that will fix our political differences on sectional or racial considerations. Let us avoid that altogether. It is because I think that the government, in the step that it has taken in the budget in reducing the taxation on implements of production, is pursuing a sound policy and one which I believe will conduce to harmony in the Dominion, that I intend to support the budget when the vote is taken.

[Mr. Crerar.]

Hon. John B. M. BAXTER (St. John City and Counties of St. John and Albert): While there have been many references in the course of this long debate to the fact that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) is not present with us on this occasion, I do not think it would be at all out of place for me, coming in a sense from the section of the country from which he comes, to express again the feeling of regret which this House and the country experiences that a man who has been so long prominent in Canadian public life, a man with whom we do not all pretend to agree—for we cannot expect such unanimity in political matters—yet a man who has won our respect for his courage, his directness and the great ability he has displayed during many years, is not able, through unfortunate illness, to participate in what to him was probably the greatest happiness of his life, namely, parliamentary work. We must always expect in the course of life that incidents of this character will occur; and I can never avoid thinking, when it does occur in the course of a strenuous political life, of the words of the great poet who depicted what comes into the life of almost every man when he says:

> ...in the open noon of my pride
> They sent me a voice from the darkness;
> They whispered and called me aside.
> They said, "the end is forbidden;" They said, "thy use is fulfilled."

And to those of us who may be permitted to remain perhaps for years in the active work of the nation will some day come the summons to that enforced rest which always seems to come unexpectedly, and which evokes in such an assembly as the Parliament of Canada that warm and deep and honest sympathy which has been expressed from either side of the House towards the absent member.

In a purely personal sense I join in the tribute that has been paid to his acting successor (Mr. Robb). I can at least congratulate the acting minister on the brevity of the remarks with which he introduced the budget. I agree with the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) that it would have been well if that brevity had been emulated by many succeeding speakers, but I fear before I get through to-night that I too may be counted among those who have somewhat failed to copy that extreme brevity which characterized the introduction of the budget. I will, however, do my best to economize time.

In passing, may I remark on the absence from the House this evening of a gentleman who used to be considered in political circles as a probable successor to the Minister of Finance should a vacancy occur in that post. We have not with us to-night the member for St. Antoine (Mr. Mitchell), nor have we any explanation of his absence. No doubt there is a reason, a potent and a valid reason; and while I enjoyed the mock heroics of my right hon. friend the leader of the government when he declared there would be no general election, and that the people of Canada were so contented and happy under his beneficent rule that there would be no need for a general election, I could not help but think that at all events he will have the benefit of a record of public opinion in an important part of the Dominion as the logical and necessary political consequence of the withdrawal from this chamber of the hon. member for St. Antoine.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They have had two or three already.

Mr. BAXTER: To which I shall refer in good time.

Mr. FINN: Not on the budget.

Mr. BAXTER: There are so many other questions besides the budget upon which public attention could be challenged that I almost wonder at the temerity of an hon. gentleman on the other side suggesting the possibility of additional reasons for the government asking the country for that public confidence which no longer remains with it. I sympathize with the temporary successor of the Minister of Finance. He is walking with stumbling feet along a path which he does not know, driven by the impulsion of a blind opportunism which has already destroyed a great historic party that once had a record of achievement behind it and a set of principles by which it believed the Canadian commonwealth could be best regulated. But to-day the right hon. Prime Minister is no longer leading a great historic party. His traditional Liberalism has faded into invisible distance and the real direction of the affairs of Canada is coming from the group which is seated to my left; the wreck and the rump of the Liberal party follows along the path that is blazed by the hon. member for Marquette and the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke). It is a great price—some of us would think too great—to pay for the temporary enjoyment of office, but hon. gentlemen opposite us do not apparently so regard it. They probably think it is cheap. The public sooner or later will have an opportunity of pronouncing judgment, and we will then realize where they think the real cheapness is.

I do not propose to follow at any painful length the speakers who have preceded me in a discussion of the supposititious surplus which has been presented to the House. I have heard some discussion of bookkeeping methods, and I think if I caught them aright I am tolerably in agreement with the remarks of the hon. member for Marquette, who thinks it would be better to place on public record in a definite way the obligations of the country. I have listened, not without amazement and not without some impatience, to the most extraordinary references that were made by the right hon. Prime Minister and some others to the reasons for treating the advances to the Canadian National Railways as something other than a part of the public debt. I wonder if hon. gentlemen opposite have ever stopped for a moment to think quietly of what constitutes the real difference between the cases cited by the right hon. gentleman and the present case. We are told that when a dry dock has been subsidized or a loan made to a

Somebody comes and says: I have not got any credit at the bank, but the manager says if you will put your name on the back of a piece of paper he will be most happy to make the advance. By analogy, the lender of the money comes to the Dominion government and says: If the people of Canada will put their collective name on the back of a piece of paper the money will be forthcoming. Now, that is what you do when you guarantee any loan on account of the Canadian National Railway system. There is no security in the railway; the security is in the tax-paying power of the people of Canada, and nowhere else, and the only honest thing, the only proper thing, from a bookkeeping standpoint or any other standpoint, is to honestly and properly charge that up as an additional debt upon the people of Canada. I shall not spend any further time upon that. We were told by the right hon. the Prime Minister to-day that that was a matter of no importance, and he launched into, shall I say, a very satisfactory statement to himself of that increase in trade that had taken place in the last few years. Was that due, in any way, to this government, Mr. Speaker? Did he expect after the war period was over that the world and Canada was going to stand absolutely still? We had had far greater trade expansion during the war years, and we know the reasons for that expansion. Then came the falling-off. Did he expect that there never would be any recovery? Some recovery has fortunately accrued to Canada, but how much greater would that recovery have been had the business interests of Canada been assured of some reasonable stability in the financial policy of this country?

He passed on and discussed the reduction in taxes. I shall spend but little time on that. He told us, as others have told us, that that reduction will be $24,000,000. The only estimate we have been able to get has come from the Finance department, and it is that the reduction in duties will only amount to $750,000. Will any hon. gentleman on the other side of the House, or will any hon. gentleman sitting to my left, sitting there in control of the side of the House which is on the right, tell us that $23,250,000 will be economized by the reductions in the sales tax? I do not think I will find anyone with the hardihood to make such an assertion as that. If there is to be a reduction of $24,000,000, why has not some gentleman in the course of this tremendously long debate come forward and given us some kind of tabulated definite estimate of the particular things which will achieve this reduction? Oh, but it suits them far better to go out to the public and talk of $24,000,000. I will venture to predict, and I am not at all fond of the role of prophecy, that when they come back here next year we shall not hear of a reduction in taxation of $24,000,000 or if we do, we will have a worse financial statement than any that has preceded it.

The right hon. gentleman also undertook to illuminate the want of financial capacity of the previous government. He dilated on the assertion that has repeatedly been made from the other side of the House, that Canada did not bear any portion of the war cost during the period of the war. That is the way, I am putting it precisely, the assertion was made and repeated over and over again in the course of this debate, and in the course of another debate which took place in this House. But the right hon. the leader of the government discovers now that we paid only some of the interest on the war debt, and he charges now that the old government did not pay part of the capital cost while the war was in progress. If it were not for the frenzy of politics, would hon. members see any real distinction? Let me come to that again by way of a very simple illustration. When a public work is undertaken, everyone knows, the interest during construction is charged as a part of construction, and is properly so charged. Unfortunately, what the whole world was doing during four years was paying the cost of destruction instead of construction, and they had to pay, most regrettably, interest upon the cost of destruction. Can you distinguish that from the capital cost? Is there any difference? And yet it is manifest in the figures that the old government bore some part of the cost of destruction that was being incurred during those perilous years. There is no use mincing words about it, no use inventing new phrases, no use trying to draw some inferences to the discredit of gentlemen on this side of the House. The fact remains that the cost of the war that was passed on after the old government went out of office was less than the total cost of the war to Canada, and therefore some part of it had been paid during the period in which my right hon. leader or his predecessor was the leader of the government.

Then we were told further, that the reduction of the cost of living was the great aim of the Liberal party. If that be so, unless the Liberal party had its genesis with the advent to power of the right hon. the Prime Minister, when that Liberal party was led by Sir Wilfrid Laurier and assisted by the Right Hon. Mr. Fielding, I would like to ask why they did not abolish the tariff in those pre-war days when the whole tariff could have been abolished with far less strain from a financial standpoint upon the people than is involved in a very small disturbance of taxation at the present time. When we are dealing now with hundreds of millions of dollars to run this country we can see how, when it took less than $100,000,000 to run the country, they could, if that had been the real aim of the Liberal party, have got along with some internal revenue taxes, some income tax and sales taxes and done without protection, which they are proposing to destroy root and branch with a pair of tweezers, nipping off a little each year.

But it is like everything else that comes from the government, it is entirely unsatisfactory. It is only meant for a bit of camouflage; it is only meant to delude some people and to obtain a temporary anchorage in some political haven that perhaps appears, and appears only on that magical chart by which the leader of the government is professing to steer the country, and which no one else has ever seen. If Mr. Speaker, you follow the advice of my good friend and take the burdens off production, he tells you that the producer can produce more and at lower costs. Well, there are a good many producers, but will my right hon. friend explain to the country where are the markets for the producers? He has heard very largely from the group sitting to my left that they are producing more to-day than they can get sale for, and they keep on producing. But there are other things in Canada than the production of wheat, and if we are to take the burdens off production so that the producer can produce more, I want to find out a little something about the consumer. That is a matter of some importance to the country. I want to know, and this country has got to know, and has got to make up its mind whether it wants the consumer to dwell within the limits of Canada, or whether it proposes that the consumer shall dwell only in some part of the United States.

That after all marks the absolute line of cleavage between this party and the party and a half with whom we are in conflict in this House and in this country. Shall we have a home market that is worth having? Shall we bring people into this country, provide the means for their employment, build up industries within Canada, make it a country worth living in, and in that way develop the agricultural interests of the Dominion? Or shall we, gradually or by one bound, obliterate all traces of industry and thereby make what was the home market of Canada consist in exporting goods from this country to reach citizens who have been exported a little in advance of the goods. But the right hon. Prime Minister does not tell me where the markets are. Instead of that what do I get? A rhythmical treatise delivered in splendid language on the four essentials of land, labour, capital, and management. He hesitated a little over the management. First of all he said there were three essentials, and then he stated there were four. He was sure of the land, the labour and the capital, but after a short period of doubt he decided to include the management. I know why the doubt was. It was not a philosophic doubt, it was a real, actual one that time. Having had an experience of his own government since December, 1921, he doubted if there was such a thing as management of this country. About that disquisition there was a faint aroma of the class room. One could almost imagine the campus of a college largely endowed by the Rockefeller millions. You could see the students assembled there and you could almost hear their cheering, led by some professor, when the happy news would come to the college that John D. had opened another oil gusher on some part of this world's surface. It was an unreal thing; it was the sort of thing that you get at an institution of learning; it was not a real practical sort of thing that has to be dealt with in this House and in the government of the country —wholly academic, while God knows what the world to-day needs is the thing that is practical. When we have shown the world how to do its work and how to solve its problems, some twenty-five years afterwards the universities will begin to write books about it and tell the people how it was done. The solution of the problems of the world comes from the working men of the world first and finds its way into the universities afterwards.

Then my right hon. friend passed to the basic implements of production, but he did not follow them very far. He dodged the lawn mowers, they were not apparently basic. He tarried a while with the farmers. It was basic there because it was political. It was the basic thing that gives a basic majority in a House where they would not have a scintilla of power unless they reached out and treated your opponents better than they have treated their friends. That is the position of the right hon. Prime Minister: He has sacrificed, he is sacrificing—and fifteen of his supporters from Nova Scotia are daily and nightly parties to the sacrifice—the best interests of the Maritime provinces in the matter of the steel and the coal industry because the Prime Minister has seen fit to pay no attention to the claims, the legitimate claims, of the part of the country that gave him its support when he turned to the three western provinces that had rejected him and paid them with some reduction in the duty on farming implements. He had a solid sixteen to join in this iniquity. Since the people of Halifax had the opportunity of speaking it is only a solid fifteen; and the sooner the constituencies are opened in Nova Scotia the sooner the Prime Minister will find what the people, not the politicians, of that part of the country think of his performance.

Mr. MARTELL: That is an anaemic platitude on my hon. friend's part.

Mr. BAXTER: Did I hear anything?

Mr. HANSON: Just the sighing of the wind.

Mr. BAXTER: I am waiting for any member with courage to repeat anything he may have muttered.

An hon. MEMBER: Job.

Mr. MARTELL: It is a platitude that is not worth answering.

Mr. BAXTER: I beg my hon. friend's pardon. Will he repeat his statement?

Mr. MARTELL: Your anaemic platitudes are not worth answering.

Mr. BAXTER: That is first rate, but my hon. friend ought to have some sympathy with anaemia. He is known throughout the House as one of the microbes of the Liberal party.

Mr. MARTELL: Another platitude.

Mr. BAXTER: I found him the other night interfering with the political organism of the Secretary of State. They did not seem to be entirely in harmony, and I notice that the Secretary of State has been looking rather anaemic since the attack of my hon. friend. I rather agreed with my hon. friend too. Microbes are useful under certain circumstances.

Well, as a result of this wonderful budget a few tools are made free for the miner but the market is left to be invaded by the alien. I suppose a few shovels, and possibly a few shovel handles are affected. I do not know whether they have yet got as far as the handles that the coal miner may use in a pit in Cape Breton but his product is not protected, not adequately protected against the ravages of American competition. And the railway rates remain so that he cannot send his product into the central portion of Canada under favourable conditions. My hon. friends opposite have done far more for the wheat miner than they have done for the coal miner, and in doing it for the wheat miner they did it with the boisterous applause of fifteen members from a solid Nova Scotia.

Mr. FINN: Does my hon. friend not know that the government of Canada has nothing to do whatever with the question of rates in reference to coal or any other product coming from or going to the province of Nova Scotia?

Mr. BAXTER: Well, all I can say is that the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacLean) spent half an hour boasting in the House the other day of what the government had done—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. FINN: That is not an answer to my question.

Mr. BAXTER: And it is not very much.

Mr. FINN: It is not an answer to my question.

Mr. BAXTER: Oh, you are going to be answered; my hon. friend is not going to escape. It is not very much that the member for Prince had to boast about, it is a pitiable thing, and my hon. friend who has just interrupted me said that the reduction of 7 per cent was hardly perceptible—

Mr. FINN: Hear, hear.

Mr. BAXTER: And he found fault with it.

Mr. FINN: Hear, hear.

Mr. BAXTER: He also took three hours and forty minutes to give us his life history, and to tell us how many delegations to Ottawa he had attended to try and get this very grievance remedied. I sympathize with my hon. friend. I was glad to know—

Mr. FINN: That was—

Mr. BAXTER: Just a moment.

Mr. FINN: That was to the late government.

Mr. BAXTER: I will take any number of questions but I will answer them one at a time. I sympathize with my hon. friend. I was glad to find that so much activity had been displayed. I was glad to know that such a good looking, and amiable, and useful member had come to Ottawa. Everything was in his favour. From the very sacrifice of his profession to the giving up of the best years of his life to the service of his country there was everything that man could desire except results and those unfortunately, he has not been able to obtain.

Mr. FINN: My hon. friend got some results late in life.

Mr. BAXTER: To what does my hon. friend refer? I assume he is speaking about railway rates.

Mr. FINN: Not now.

Mr. BAXTER: Then my hon. friend is wandering from the question. If he wishes to put questions to me I will do my best to answer them. My hon. friend, like myself, comes from a sea-girt constituency.

Mr. FINN: Hear, hear.

Mr. BAXTER: And is at last realizing the merit of a clam which knows when to close up.

Mr. FINN: My hon. friend will realize that when he sits down.

Mr. BAXTER: He is going again. I am a little bit interested, and I know that my hon. friend who interrupted me is interested, and that there are fourteen others on his side of the House, whether they are physically present or not, who are very much interested in the development of the native and natural industries of Nova Scotia. Though I come from New Brunswick I feel that I am quite as much interested because the hour has come when the Maritime provinces must stand together in order to get a fair show from the rest of the people of Canada in reference to their development. I am going to quote—and I can quote with approval—a portion of a speech made by the hon. Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) speaking at Stellarton, Friday, October 26, 1921. He said:

> Last year one hundred million of good Canadian money was paid to the United States for coal under this protective tariff—this peculiar tariff which they say you must not lay any unholy hands upon.

My hon. friend was then running in opposition to the Meighen government. I am not going to entirely endorse the abuse that he uttered in this speech, but I am going to agree with the sense and purport of it. He continues:

> One hundred million dollars we paid out, while at the same time people here could not sell their coal and our mines were working two or three days a week. Do you want these conditions to continue? If you do you will vote for my opponent, and he has no solution for the situation other than that.

I commend that to all good Nova Scotians of the Liberal party. They must have agreed it was good doctrine. They ought to agree it is good doctrine still. My hon. friend was discussing Colonel Cantley, his opponent, and he said:

> Do you want to send a man to Ottawa that, when he gets there, will turn around and say: "I gave you no pledges, I never said to you I would take this course or that on any question. All I said was, "There is a tariff in this country and I do not want to see it removed."

Hon. gentlemen will remark how much difference it makes whether a nebulous statement is uttered by Colonel Cantley or by the present Prime Minister. In the one case it is condemned and in the other it is worshipped, and it is even repeated to the drum roll of applause, hour after hour, in this House, as has been done on this very occasion. My hon. friend the Minister of National Defence did not think it was right when it came to Colonel Cantley. He said:

> That is not a proper course for any man under responsible government who asks the suffrages of a people. I have had long experience in public life and I say that a man who seeks the suffrages of the people should be prepared to come before them, state his policy, pledge himself as to what he is prepared to do, and when grave situations arise be in a position to have some justification for actions to be taken in order that these conditions may be changed.

Then my hon. friend challenged the audience and said:

> What do you think of maintaining a duty on wheat and flour? Why should there be a tariff to enable the men who grind the flour to grind the faces of the poor. I am opposed to the duty on flour.

The hon. gentleman is a member of the government now. I look, I watch, and I wait, for some sign of carrying into effect this solemn declaration which he made to the people of his own constituency. It was the advice of a true Progressive who spoke, but I find he has not yet joined the majority of the government. He continues:

> I pledge myself if I go back to Ottawa—

And he did.

> —to represent this county to advocate in parliament and insist upon the fact that the people of Ontario, if they want to burn coal which is not produced in Canada, that they should contribute to the revenue of the country by paying a tariff on it. And so, my friends, I am not like Colonel Cantley—unwilling to give pledges. I tell you if I go to Ottawa I shall urge parliament to put a duty on coal that is a real duty and not a fake duty.

My hon. friend came to parliament. He is in parliament now. He has been advanced in parliament. He is in this House to-night, and I give him the opportunity of telling us if there has been any change in the coal duties except to allow the dust from lignite coal to come in free and lignite coke. These are the only changes. He was a wonderful power in Nova Scotia, a tower of strength to the Liberal party, but how futile when he reaches the atmosphere of this House. He cannot do a thing for his constituency. Why it would have been better to have elected Colonel Cantley without his pledges than to have elected the Minister of National Defence with all his promises. But I want to go back for a minute or two to my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). He referred to a wide spreading tree this afternoon, with beautiful branches, and he saw those branches all rising at the stump. Well in a wooden country we do not see the branches coming from the stump. When you find the stump the tree is gone. He may have seen the bole of the tree or the trunk, but the stump comes there after the tree has been destroyed. Well, this is the tree that he saw. He has been seeing these visions and dreaming these dreams. He saw this tree denuded of its sap. Somebody took the sap away near the base of the tree, near that stump. He apparently was not familiar enough with forest life in Canada—forest life perhaps was not philosophical enough—to know that you can drain sap from the tree which is the national emblem of the country, and it can be made profitable to the community without injuring the tree. In the same sense we can, I believe, have protection in Canada without destroying the tree of my right hon. friend's vision. But he descanted so much upon the tree that it made me really wonder whether he had not gone back to extremely early times and imagined himself to be the first if not the only man in the world. He may have thought of that tree of knowledge of good and evil of which we read. He apparently had gone so far as to taste the fruits of it. He had become conscious in a traditional sense, and in order to cover his political nakedness he spent about an hour in piecing together newspaper clippings in order to make a sort of garb with which to cover himself, and that as a contribution to the budget debate of the country. I would remind him that people who meddle with the tree of knowledge of good and evil are pursued by a flaming sword and driven from the paradise in which they have temporarily taken refuge. Give the people of Canada one fair chance, and the angel with the flaming sword will forever bar his return to those precincts in the Eastern block where weary legislators refresh themselves in the afternoon with a cup of invigorating tea. But with more fire still he inveighed against protection for what he called a few special interests. I want to ask, not this House—it is not worth while really asking this House—but this country, whether my right hon. friend has scotched the snake of the special interests to which he has referred so much, or has completely killed it? We spent some time in developing special legislation at his instance directed against trusts and combines; the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) was brandishing a battle-axe; something was going to crash in this country; the people were absolutely afraid because of the investigating powers that were given; but we were assured that all that was necessary was to get plenty of light and publicity, and these noxious weeds would disappear from Canadian public life. I have not yet heard of a trust or combine that has been rooted out by this government. I have heard of some towards the fostering of which I thought they contributed. I remember, during the last election campaign, the way in which former Attorney General Raney of Ontario inveighed against trusts, combines and everything else connected with automobiles, but I have not seen the automobile snake even scotched yet by the vigour of this government. I have not found any other trusts or combines attacked. What was all this legislation for? Did they know of these things before they came into power? If they did, why did they not get after them? If they did not know of them and only suspected them, why are we not made cognizant of the efforts that they have made since coming into power to drive these things out of our economic life? The sum total of the matter is that it is like almost everything else that distinguished the campaign of my hon. friends and that distinguishes their political course at the present day; it is nothing but camouflage, nothing but deception, a hollow mockery, a beating of the sounding drum, in an effort to arouse public attention hoping that it will be in its favour.

Then, credit is claimed and volubly claimed for a reduction in the sales tax. Time forbids that I should go into any painful discussion of the sales tax to-night; but I would ask, as one of the minor questions—and it is an important one in some of our Maritime constituencies—why it is that canned vegetables are exempted from the sales tax, but canned fish are subject to 5 per cent, which is now the maximum sales tax? Does this government solemnly recommend people to eat vegetables and eschew fish? I wonder how the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Finn) views that proposition.

Mr. FINN: I always thought a mixed diet was good, together with a little something you cannot get in Toronto.

Mr. BAXTER: That is just what I want to get, the chance to mix the diet, but the poor consumer has to bear, on an absolute foodstuff, a 5 per cent tax if it is canned sardines or fish of any kind. Vegetables, he can get free, but on sardines he has to pay the tax. Yet this government is a government in favour of cheap food for the working people. I have a case in my constituency where it means all the difference between expanded operation and contracted operation if the sales tax is removed or if it is kept on. That may seem like a minor matter, but it is interesting and instructive as one of the examples of the want of consideration that has been given by this wonderful government in the preparation of these wonderful budget changes.

I want to pass for a moment to something that, I think, is of more importance than a special instance. I am impressed with the idea that matters are not being grappled with on a big enough and broad enough scale in this country. These tariff alterations are at best a mere haphazard, piffling bit of work. Other countries of the world that are solvent since the war are devoting their energies to an actual reduction of their debt We are disputing in this House whether you ought to enter a certain set of figures in one book or in another, or put them on one page or another, and we know that we are not reducing our real liabilities. In the same way we come to this House and discuss a question whether you can stand a rate of 5 cents, or 7½ cents, or 10 cents, on some particular commodities. What is pressing down upon internal business in this country to-day? The sales tax as amplified by the present government, this government that was going to abolish oppressive taxes. What did the United States do after the Civil War? Within a comparatively few years, as soon as they pulled their country together, the first thing they did was, not to lower their external tariff walls, but to remove the things that were burdensome upon the internal commerce of the country. I ask: Why, instead of taking a few cents off here and a few cents off there in the protective tariff, if this government had $24,000,000 of tariff they felt they could reduce, why did they not take the whole $24,000,000 off their sales tax, give the people real and vital relief, and let the tariff stay as it was, good enough for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) last year and good enough for many of his Liberal predecessors? The farmers themselves, the agricultural interests that are represented here, tell the government plainly and frankly that they do not think this reduction amounts to very much to them. Some of them say that, after all, the question of the West is not a question of tariff. Many members in the House to my left have said that, and yet the government, in the hope of and for the sake of political support, carries an unwanted gift to the provinces of the West, where it might distribute its favours, if it has favours to give, or its benefits, if it has benefits to bestow, on all the people of Canada from the Pacific to the Atlantic. But we find an outpouring about the unity of Canada and the West and the East being brought together and all that sort of stuff. The East and the West can and will get together, but it will be upon the principle of equal opportunity and equal sacrifice to the needs of the nation, and not by patting a special portion on the back as long as it votes right.

I do not want to take up more time to-night but as the tariff has been discussed at considerable length, I am going to pay a few minutes' attention to something of the history of tariff issues. I am not going to read what some professor has written in a textbook of theory; but I propose to turn to solutions of facts, some of them in this country and some of them in the next best available instance, in the country lying to the south of us. I believe it is better to proceed by building upon the actual accumulated knowledge of the past than to base your policies upon mere conjectures and hopes for the present. If you will go back in our own country as far as 1855 you will find that there was a period of great prosperity in Canada caused largely by the building of the Grand Trunk railway. There was at that time a tremendous expansion and a very great land boom was on. In 1857 the boom collapsed and Canada was in a state of crisis. In 1858, as a remedy for conditions of that character, Sir Alexander Galt first introduced the protective principle into the tariff of Canada. It was successful and industry sprang up. I have neither the time nor the inclination to-night to go into statistics; I want to weary the audience as little as possible. But I propose to put the facts on record, because I believe they are of value not merely historically but practically as well. In 1866 because of the impending confederation Canada reduced the tariff to an average of 15 per cent; the Maritime provinces' average at that time was 12 1-2 per cent. Canada during that period had been greatly helped by the condition of the United States. Immediately after the Civil War in the United States there was an absolute paralysis of industry and there was a high internal taxation which continued down to about 1873, I think. Those conditions afforded a virtual protection to the people of Canada; but in 1873 the United States, recovering from their war burdens, reducing internal taxation, came into competition with us in our own lowly protected markets. I am not going to discuss whether we had a tariff for revenue or for protection in Canada; I will simply say that we had a tariff low enough for the American manufacturer to get over the barrier and sell to our own people in the market which should have been our own. What happened? The Liberal party was in charge of affairs at that time in 1873; Sir Richard Cartwright was its great exponent. I will give you a few words from a public utterance of his in parliament. He said:

> It becomes us to consider the various remedies proposed for this unfortunate state of affairs.
> In the first place I desire to expend a few words on the general impression which prevails, even in quarters where we would hardly expect to find it, that it is in the power of this government, of any government, this legislature or any legislature to make the country prosperous by the mere stroke of a pen or the enactment of acts of parliament. I would like hon. gentlemen in this House and out of it, who entertain that illusion, as I consider it, to think to what such a course would lead and would ask them if they are prepared to pay the price. You cannot have at one and the same time a free government and a paternal government.

His solution was no solution at all. From 1873 to 1878, as we know, Canada passed through one of the worst periods in her history, and it was only by the advent of the Conservative party to power with Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir Charles Tupper, Sir Leonard Tilley and Sir George Etienne Cartier, at the head of affairs, that a real National Policy was introduced which preserved to this country its own markets and its own industries. And it is only in so far as that beneficent policy has not been completely expunged from the statutes of Canada that Canada has been able to succeed in the years which have followed the Conservative administration. The United States had precisely the same experience. From 1818 to 1824 they had what hon. gentlemen would call a revenue tariff. The balance of trade was against them, and in that period exports of specie itself exceeded imports by over $10,000,000. In 1824 they adopted the protective tariff and the results were immediately gratifying, so much so that in 1828 they passed a higher tariff and enjoyed a period of unequalled prosperity down to 1834. In that period they imported $30,000,000 more of specie than they exported and paid off the debt incurred during the Revolutionary War and the War of 1812. But there was too much prosperity; then came that phrase which has become so familiar in these days, "a step in the right direction." A step in the right direction was taken, no doubt amidst as great plaudits as it has received to-day. The tariff was lowered to 20 per cent, a higher average tariff than we have to-day and meaning a great deal more in those days of nearly a century ago. They tinkered with the tariff, they lowered it, and in a very few years the government, as a writer put it, was out of funds and credit. So serious was the situation that in 1842 they went back to protection and again they experienced a period of prosperity. Once more, however, another "step in the right direction" was taken with a new tariff in 1846 and that was followed by an absolute crash. There may be other causes, but I call the attention of hon. members to the fact that every time they took that step in the right direction, every time they lowered the tariff, they were invaded by foreign manufacturers and a financial crash ensued, in that country which was then in a process of building itself up comparable to Canada at the present time.

Experience teaches, they say, but I have yet to learn that it teaches a Liberal government. Now, let us have an example that occurred in this country in 1872. At that time the United States government took the duty off tea and Canada followed suit; but when she did she found a clause in the United States law by which a duty of 10 per cent was charged on all tea imported from countries west of the Cape of Good Hope—a sort of jigger in it such as we should get if we went into reciprocity with the United States. Ten per cent was exacted on all tea imported into the United States from Canada; so that while we had free trade in tea with the United States they had protection against us. This is the same policy as the Progressive government is pursuing to-day step by step and adopted by its liberal junta. Canada at that time took to itself power to impose a duty of 10 per cent on all tea coming from the United States, an equivalent of the duty imposed by the United States on that commodity going from Canada; and the trade was saved until in 1874 our Liberal friends, with Sir Richard Cartwright as Minister of Finance, took hold of the helm again, when they succeeded in very short order in ruining the tea trade. Then the tea dealers went to the United States and sent circulars into this market inviting the people to purchase tea on the other side of the line. Our direct trade was gone, a fine accomplishment, one apparently so fine that the greatest ambition of the Prime Minister and his colleagues to-day is to have it repeated in an almost infinitely larger number of articles than the government of that time dealt with.

This question of protection has been discussed to-night in very measured terms and very fairly by my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Crerar), but if you follow his remarks to their logical conclusion what becomes of Canada? Have we a cohesive country? You have, if you are prepared to make Canada one vast agricultural tract from the Atlantic to the Pacific. I speak from the standpoint of the Maritime provinces, and I have just as good a right to speak from that standpoint as other hon. gentlemen have to speak from the standpoint of other sections of the country. It is only by this common discussion in parliament of the difficulties with which we are confronted in different parts of the Dominion that we will be able to evolve any policy which will do reasonable justice towards all parts. I would put the situation of the Maritimes in this way: You take the duties down low enough, you let our protection fail us, and you soon reach the point at which our very mines will cease to operate because the United States can produce more cheaply and can use us for a dumping market. I am supported in that by the statements that have been made by hon. members behind the government. There is no question between us. Now, if you protect the development of our natural products in steel and in coal, you increase the population in certain centres. The moment you increase that population the demand comes upon the rural districts to provide food for that population. It is the old story of the home market. It ought not to be necessary to discuss it in this year 1924, but apparently it is necessary to re-state the fundamental principles all over again.

Our position is different from that of the West. The man in the West who is mining wheat instead of coal has to compete in the world market. We cannot help him except in one way, as I see it: we can find him the cheapest transportation that the country can afford to give him. That is infinitely more valuable to him than a few dollars off his farm implements. We in the East are prepared to make sacrifices, and we have made sacrifices, for that very thing. The Canadian Pacific railway was built out of sacrifices of the older provinces.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, no.

Mr. BAXTER: Oh, yes. The newer provinces did not build the Canadian Pacific railway.

An hon. MEMBER: A lot of our land out there paid for it.

Mr. BAXTER: The land was bought and paid for by the older provinces.

An hon. MEMBER: We are paying for it.

Mr. BAXTER: It was Canada's gift, it was part of the price of getting the railway built. And it made settlement possible. We do not begrudge it, and we do not want to go back on it. But I ask: As we made the development of the West possible, is it not fair that the West should in some way make possible the development of the natural resources of the East? Let us look where we stand to-day. I am not going to discuss in a spirit of asperity what has taken place with regard to the Crowsnest pass agreement. I just refer to the fact that that agreement was made not between the provinces at all; it was a rider put by Canada upon the assistance given to the Crowsnest Pass railway. The western people get the benefit of that to-day. If that agreement had never been made what possible argument would the West have against the equality of freight rates all over the Dominion? Do they not realize that the very fact that they enjoy the rates under that agreement—whether rightly or wrongly we need not discuss now—means that the people in other parts of Canada and in regard to other commodities have to pay more than they otherwise would? That is the burden we are bearing daily and hourly in other parts of the Dominion. Is it too much for us to ask that our gateways—in the East, Quebec and Montreal in the summer, our gateway in the West, Vancouver, all the year around, and our gateways in the Maritimes, Halifax and St. John, in the winter, shall be used by the western people in preference to searching for a special route for their freight by the gateways of the neighbouring nation? I say frankly, you cannot expect this to go on all the time if there is to be a Canada for us, so long as our income tax is to be paid and our sales tax and our customs dues to maintain our railways and to build further extensions in the West. We are not begrudging that expenditure, but we cannot have the West say: There is no Canada east of the Great Lakes or east of Quebec. We say we want our share in the handling of this western produce. That is the case of the Maritime provinces on transportation. And do not think for a moment that we are going to relieve the situation by getting out of confederation, or even talking about getting out of it. We are going to stay in confederation, and we are proud to be in it. But we are going to keep everlastingly at this question until we make the same impression upon the country and upon parliament as our western friends have made in regard to some other matters. They have shown us the benefit of agitation, and we are going to do the agitating. I believe that my own party to-night stands back of the reasonable requests of the Maritime provinces. If I thought otherwise I would mighty soon part company with it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BAXTER: Hon. members laugh. I will go a step further for them. After the next election comes there will be another government. I might, perhaps not unreasonably, expect to be included in that government, but I would not enter it unless I were sure that I would get justice for the Maritime provinces.

Mr. RINFRET: Does my hon. friend mean the portfolio of Justice?

Mr. BAXTER: I would tell my hon. friends that there are people who could fill it worse. I am not at all conceited, for I can be fair, but I have met some people who cannot be. I want to pursue for a moment the statement I started to make—if I found after assuming office that I had been mistaken in my party, I would leave the seats of the mighty and go into such opposition as there was opportunity to consort with. That is the difference between the attitude that I consider must be taken in order for the Maritime provinces to be successful in their fight for their rights and the attitude that has been persistently and consistently taken by the "solid sixteen" as they were in this House. One of those hon. gentlemen has taken office at the hands of the government, and a very effective stopper has been put in his mouth as far as any advocacy of the rights of the Maritime provinces is concerned. We have heard no motion for a duty on coal nor for a duty on steel, we have heard no motion to take the duty off flour—none of these things that he promised his constituents. We have heard protests from the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan), and when he got away from his free trade heresy I have agreed with the other things he has said. But does the hon. member realize how utterly helpless he has been? During one admirable speech he made I, a poor, miserable, benighted Conservative, had to appeal to the Speaker to preserve order among his friends so that we on this side could hear him. That is the sympathy the Maritime provinces have got from the Liberal party, that is the sympathy the hon. member for Cumberland has received from his party in doing his duty by standing up for the rights of his native province. I have not heard any other members from Nova Scotia trying to do what he did. What they should have done was to have said to their leaders: We are a solid sixteen. We are Liberals. We have followed you. We have borne the heat and burden of the day. You are now on the eve of making a trade with the western provinces for political support. If you make that trade for the sake of that support, you are going to lose the stalwart friends you have had in the past unless you give an even square deal to the part of the country we represent.

My hon. friends of those sixteen were supporting the right hon. the Prime Minister when he was in the depths of opposition. They went to the country asking the country to get back of him. They were not like people to my left who went to the country saying they had no faith in the present Prime Minister and no faith in his party. And yet it is far, far more unequal than the story of the Prodigal Son. These people who were never in the fold have had everything heaped upon them. The faithful sons who stayed at home, who would not raise a voice of protest, have seen the fatted calf killed and the table spread for the benefit of those who had been, if not spending their substance in riotous living, at least not been living at home within the ambit of the Liberal party.

I want to say a word about this coal business from the standpoint of Nova Scotia. I got the returns ending March 31, 1924, and they show that over 15,500,000 tons of bituminous coal came in from the United States valued at over $44,000,000, and nearly 5,000,000 tons of anthracite, at a value of $44,000,000. The lignite is inconsiderable, but the total imports of coal from the United States were $88,000,000, in round figures. Now my hon. friend the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) advocated a greater duty. He said: "Let us make this Dominion one; you people in Ontario burn our coal." Well, what have we heard in parliament? All sorts of devices, and a committee sitting day after day and week after week to see if it is possible for the Canadian National Railways to bring lignite from some part of Alberta into Toronto, when the best coal in the world was hundreds of miles nearer, accessible most of the year by water, all the year by rail, and nobody ever raised a voice of protest or demanded that the rates on the railway should be made low enough to give Nova Scotia coal the entrance into the markets of upper Canada that were promised to it on every platform when confederation was discussed.

Mr. FINN: Would my hon. friend tell me why it was when F. B. McCurdy of Nova Scotia was Minister of Public Works in the government of Sir Robert Borden, and my hon. friend was in the government of the now leader of the opposition, they did not put a duty on slack coal? Why did they not have the railway freight rates reduced? What was my hon. friend doing then in the Tory administration? Was he asleep at the switch?

Mr. BAXTER: I was not. For my hon. friend's information I would tell him that F. B. McCurdy was never a member of R. L Borden's government.

Mr. FINN: The Union government, then; it was the same thing.

Mr. BAXTER: And the rest of the answer to his question is, what were the cabinet ministers on the Liberal side doing in the years from 1896 to 1911? Had we not better make a fresh start? If the public men from the Maritime provinces have not been getting for the Maritime provinces that advantage the Maritime provinces ought to have had, is it not time we presented a united front and demanded these things? I am doing it to-night. Will my hon. friend join with me?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Will my hon. friend be good enough to tell the House what he thinks the Maritime provinces should have? What things should be done? He has been talking in very general terms.

Mr. BAXTER: I do not need to go further than to repeat to my hon. friend the speech that he made at Stellarton; that is enough. If he will get that—and he has not got the whole of it yet, there is some more of it coming to him—but if he gets that carried out, he will take a long step towards getting something for the Maritime provinces.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): In the debate on the Address my hon. friend's leader, and now my hon. friend himself have quoted from an alleged speech which they said I made at Stellarton. The whole report of that speech is absolutely made up from Conservative sources. I was never reported by any paper, speaking at Stellarton on that day.

Mr. BAXTER: No, my hon. friend was not reported by any newspaper, but a stenographer was specially employed, and I have a stenographic copy of what the hon. member said. It is considerably longer than the extracts, but it is here, and if my hon. friend presses far enough he will get it, every word of it.

Mr. MACDONALD: I want to tell my hon. friend—

Mr. BAXTER: Before my hon. friend goes any further I want to give him a note of warning. He has got into an atmosphere to-night where bluff and bluster will not carry.

Now to follow to their logical conclusion, the expressions of my hon. friend the member for Marquette, (Mr. Crerar) in the eastern provinces or in any other part of Canada, you would leave our natural resources in the ground until the more favoured countries which have got ahead of us in their development would have exhausted all their natural supplies, and then they would be driven to us. When, for instance, there was no more coal to be got anywhere else they would come to us as the only place where it could be got. That sort of development is too many centuries in advance for me to see any possibility of enjoying it. I hope to be in a place where coal will not be necessary when the world is driven to that, because I like the society of my own fellow-men and I know where to go to find them.

Now I want to take up for a minute the steel question. I find in dealing with the steel question that I am running right into my hon. friend the Minister of National Defence again. Quoting from another section of that speech of his, he said:

> You would think that there is an enormous duty on steel products. The Trenton people burn your coal in the Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Company. The duty on steel products as produced down here is as follows: Fifteen years ago there was a duty of 50 per cent on all products of the Trenton works, steel which was used in the manufacture of agricultural implements in Toronto. This government has taken the duty off steel used in agricultural implements.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, I desire to rise to a point of order. I have already stated that my hon. friend is quoting from an alleged report of a speech which I never delivered. I never uttered those statements he is now giving to the House, and I submit he has no right to read to the House any statements which are untrue.

Mr. BAXTER: I submit that my hon. friend has no right to say that these statements are not true. I am responsible for them and I have stated the way in which I got them, and I do not think he can very well rise to a point of order to prevent me from reading statements which I shall attribute to him. He can, if he has the temerity, get up afterwards and deny it,

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I am denying it now.

Mr. BAXTER: That issue will not be determined in this House; it will be determined by the people in Stellarton when they read the hon. gentleman's denial.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I have dealt with bigger men than you there.

Mr. BAXTER: "Fish plates". Somebody said at Stellarton, somebody who wore clothing resembling that of my hon. friend—

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I rise to a point of order. I say it is not open to any hon. member of this House to allege in respect of another hon. member that some stenographer—whom nobody ever knew or heard tell of before—made public a statement containing assertions that the hon. member in question declares are utterly incorrect and untrue and were never uttered by him.

Mr. BAXTER: I do not know how my hon. friend can possibly deny—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the trouble?

Mr. BAXTER: I am arguing the point of order and in spite of interruptions I shall finish my statement; the night is young yet. I confess it is utterly impossible for me to see how the hon. member can deny that he made statements until he hears what they are.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): The statements my hon. friend has read so far were never uttered by me.

An hon. MEMBER: All right; go on and read the rest.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Excuse me.

Mr. BAXTER: What is the point of order now?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I would ask the Speaker to rule.

Mr. BAXTER: On what?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): On the point of order.

Mr. BAXTER: What is it? Must I stop my speech.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): The second point of order is that no hon. member has any right to make an untrue statement about another hon. member. That is the point.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the hon. member (Mr. Baxter) wish to discuss the point of order? Under Rule 19 when an hon. gentleman denies a statement made by another hon. member that denial must be accepted. I hope my hon. friend will not continue to attribute to the Minister of National Defence statements that he denies ever having made.

Mr. BAXTER: Mr. Speaker, I never had the slightest intention of refusing to accept within the walls of parliament my hon. friend's denial. Neither had I any intention of relinquishing my right to say that I am informed he made certain statements. After I have made them he can make the denial if he chooses.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): My hon. friend is attempting by subterfuge—

Mr. BAXTER: I do not think there is any point of order now. I said I accepted my hon. friend's denial.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I rise to another point of order. My hon. friend thinks he can go on now and make statements in another form which I have already stated are absolutely untrue and were never uttered by me. I say that my hon. friend cannot do that.

Mr. BAXTER: Perhaps it would be better for my hon. friend to exercise patience and wait until he hears what I have to say. Then if I do anything contrary to the rules he can rise to a point of order. Until I do that I have not transgressed the rules.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, I ask you to direct my hon. friend to accept your ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman (Mr. Baxter) is an experienced parliamentarian and debater. He knows that it is contrary to the rules to repeat a statement which has been denied by the hon. member concerned.

Mr. MEIGHEN: May I point out, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for St. John City and Counties of St. John and Albert does not want to repeat anything.

Mr. BAXTER: Not at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is the hon. member to be stopped from reading a quotation? I never heard of any such rule as that. If the quotation is denied the member making it is bound to accept it; but I do not think it is the rule that the hon. member (Mr. Baxter) should be stopped and not be allowed to read what he wants to read.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The hon. gentleman has read what claims to be the report of a speech delivered by the hon. member for Pictou.

Mr. BAXTER: I was prevented from reading it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The hon. member for Pictou says he never made such a speech and that the statements contained in the report are utterly untrue. My hon. friend has no right to go on reading an untrue report.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What about the rest of the statement? It may not be untrue.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): The statements are all untrue.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How do you know until you hear it?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Such a speech was not delivered.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend has not heard it read but he looks as though he thought the speech was characteristic.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): The Conservative party fabricated this speech which they allege I uttered.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): My hon. friend is reading a fabricated report.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think it is perfectly clear that the hon. gentleman is wrong in reading a report containing certain statements which are specifically denied by the hon. Minister of National Defence. That is my ruling. I hope the hon. gentleman will accept the ruling and not continue to read from an alleged report. The hon. member says it was not a report published in the press but was specially taken down by somebody at a meeting. It is not usual to quote from a report the author of which is not known.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Hear, hear.

Mr. SPEAKER: That has sometimes been held contrary to the rule. The report is said to have been taken at a certain meeting but the statements contained in it are specifically denied by the Minister of National Defence. Under the circumstances I think the hon. member, who is well aware of the spirit and letter of the rules of the House should abstain from quoting from the report.

Mr. BAXTER: I regret that so much time has been taken up with this incident. I have already said that I accepted within the walls of parliament the denial of my hon. friend. I had not been permitted an opportunity to read one sentence more, or to make any other portion of my speech. My hon. friend interrupted me again on a point of order which seemed to me merely a pretext for denying that he had made a speech in Stellarton such as he alleged the Conservative party were circulating as having originated from him. Now I may say that I have frequently heard letters read here the signatures to which were withheld by hon. gentlemen.

An hon. MEMBER: There was such a case only yesterday.

Mr. BAXTER: Only yesterday. Still I have no desire to prolong discussion on such a barren and unfruitful a thing as parliamentary law. I want to get at the facts. I am not going to bother attributing statements to my hon. friend, but I am, within the rules of the House, going to continue my speech. Now, I may say that speaking on behalf of the Liberal party—

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): This is the speech my hon. friend did not deliver on the debate on the Address. He ran away that night.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the matter now?

Mr. BAXTER: Does my hon. friend say I ran away from anywhere?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I was here ready to go on.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why did you not go on? You said you were going to.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): The hon. member did not go on.

Mr. BAXTER: I will ask my hon. friend to accept my declaration that this particular speech was not prepared until to-day and part of yesterday, and the very part to which he has reference now was not put together until late this afternoon.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): You had the fabricated report in your possession at the opening of the session.

Mr. BAXTER: Does my hon. friend entirely think he is doing justice to himself or the House in making a statement of that kind?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I absolutely do.

Mr. BAXTER: Then all I can say to my hon. friend is that in my belief he knows that the report has never been fabricated.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I know nothing of the kind, that is all I have got to say.

Mr. BAXTER: Now, I want to say that at Stellarton, in the province of Nova Scotia, Friday, October 26, 1921, in the course of the general election a stout gentleman addressed a meeting in the interest of the Liberal party. I am not going to say who the stout gentleman was. He had gray hair and a gray moustache but I am not going to name him. I am going to tell the House what was said in the name of and in the interest of the Liberal party on that occasion.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I rise to a point of order. My hon. friend is attempting by a subterfuge to evade your Honour's ruling. No hon. gentleman in this House would have failed to note the person to whom my hon. friend was referring and I say, Mr. Speaker, that you in your long experience probably have never seen and in my long experience I have never seen any hon. gentleman attempt so boldly to evade a distinct ruling of the Chair, and I raise a point of order.

Mr. BAXTER: I would suggest in regard to the point of order that your ruling should be that if my hon. friend finds any stray shoes lying around which fit him he might put them on. Otherwise I will be in order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I will call the hon. gentleman's attention to number 249 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms which says:

> It has been formally ruled by speakers in the Canadian Commons that a statement by an hon. member respecting himself and peculiarly within his own knowledge must be accepted, but it is not unparliamentary to temperately criticise statements made by a member as being contrary to the facts; but no imputation of intentional falsehood is permissible.

The hon. gentleman, as I stated a moment ago, quoted from an alleged report which I thought was taken from the press. It was denied by the hon. Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald). Then the hon. gentleman stated that the report had been stenographed at the meeting referred to. He said it was a verbatim report of the statements alleged to have been made by the Minister of National Defence. The minister stated that the report was not correct and denied its authenticity. Now surely his word must be accepted. It is a rule of the House that when a denial is made by a member of certain words or phrases attributed to him, his word must be accepted, and I hope the hon. member (Mr. Baxter) will not evade the rule by giving a physical description of the occurrence. I would appeal to his better sense not to indulge in the practice of giving a reference to the occurrence, omitting only the name. The reference is clearly to the Minister of National Defence. Under those circumstances, I would ask the hon. gentleman not to continue along those lines because he is evading the rules.

Mr. BAXTER: I think in deference to you, Mr. Speaker, I will find a way that will not infringe upon the rules of the House, nor impinge upon the sensitiveness of any member of the House. I shall simply say that during that campaign—

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I rise to a point of order. My hon. friend has intimated again in the clearest and most definite way that he is proposing to evade your Honour's ruling. The statement which has been made by my hon. friend is simply an indication to the House that in some wonderful way the creative power of that gigantic brain of his is going to be able to get round the rule. That is the clear intimation, and I submit it is not possible for an hon. gentleman to evade the rules of the House in the face of the decision you have given on the motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand the hon. gentleman has accepted my ruling.

Mr. BAXTER: May I say to the House that at the time of the last campaign, steel used in agricultural implements was absolutely free. I am pausing to see if that is objected to. I wish to say further that at that time the duty on fish plates was only ten per cent, on bars eleven per cent, on billets six per cent, and on angle bars nine per cent. Would that be called protective duty? Would anyone say that that is even revenue duty? In the days of the Laurier government—

Mr. MACDONALD: I rise to a point of order. My hon. friend whose wonderful astuteness is displayed in an effort to defy your Honour—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Order, order.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): My hon. friend is proceeding to read a speech which was fabricated and attributed to me, and which I have already denied, with the purpose and intention of giving to the House the idea that I uttered those words. I submit that is only another attempt to evade your ruling which has already been given.

Mr. BAXTER: I will give your Honour the assurance that the speech which I always understood the Minister of National Defence made is that which I am holding in my hand, which has been lying on my colleague's desk unopened, and that I have not been reading that speech, but I was proceeding to read from notes that I made of the address which I am trying under manifold difficulties to deliver.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think there is any point of order.

Mr. BAXTER: May I say that in the days of the Laurier government a bounty was given to the industry at Trenton of from two to three dollars a ton in order to encourage and strengthen the business of manufacturing steel in this country. I would have expected under those circumstances that some one among all the candidates of the government in Nova Scotia would have pledged himself that when he went to Ottawa he would move a resolution in the interests of Nova Scotia that the duty on steel products would be increased, in order to enable them to compete successfully. I am waiting for someone to move that resolution yet. Out of the whole sixteen members elected at that time I would have thought the most forceful, the ablest man, the one with the greatest brain power, and the one with the greatest ability for bringing people to his point of view would be the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald), but I cannot say to-night whether he was pledged to do a thing of that kind or not. If not I think he ought to have been pledged. At all events I notice he has not done the thing which somebody was pledged to do. I will go further and say that a candidate on the Liberal side in one of the constituencies in Nova Scotia was pledged to do it. The minister may not have been pledged.

An hon. MEMBER: Who was it?

Mr. BAXTER: But one would have thought that he would at least have picked up the fallen torch, and when he found the rest of the crew was insufficient for the duty that he, naturally interested in the steel and coal industry would have done that which the other candidate was too remiss to implement. He has not done it, however, and now he gets into the quiet lockstep of the Progressive party, and chants in chorus with the Canadian Council of Agriculture the new political creed:

A revenue tariff on the other hand will impose a low scale of duties and will be designed to encourage importation so that the largest possible revenue may be secured.

It is fine to think of bringing coals to the Newcastle of Cumberland, to encourage importations of coal and importations of steel. Why, what has become of the basic industries? It seems as if the only basic thing is the comparatively small amount of steel that goes into a harvester, binder or plough or something of that kind, not even into the lawnmower, but when it comes to being a billet or rod or something that is really sizeable in the steel business we are to encourage importations, instead of making use of the splendid opportunities for natural development in the province of Nova Scotia. No matter what the Minister of National Defence said or did not say in that or any other campaign, it is remarkable to think that he sits in a government which so studiously turns its back upon that Nova Scotia of which he must be proud to be a son. He made up a chant in collusion with the Canadian Council of Agriculture not long ago and they prescribed the particular hymn tune to which this was to be sung. He has to sing:

In framing a revenue tariff no consideration need be given to the effect upon the home manufacturer, although there will incidentally be a certain amount of protection so long as duties are imposed upon goods of a class manufactured or produced in this country.

So that, instead of getting American coal excluded and American steel excluded, firms in Nova Scotia will have to be satisfied with the incidental protection which will be afforded by the kind permission of the Canadian Council of Agriculture.

Mr. CARROLL: What difference has the present tariff made to the steel industry in Nova Scotia?

Mr. BAXTER: By the present tariff, does my hon. friend mean the one that is before the House at the present time?

Mr. CARROLL: Yes.

Mr. BAXTER: As it is now and not as it may be to-morrow or a day or two after —we never know.

Mr. CARROLL: Neither one of us is very prophetic.

Mr. BAXTER: All I can say is that from the coming into power of this government to the present day, Nova Scotia has not been given the benefit of any increased duties on its coal or steel.

Mr. CARROLL: That is not my question.

Mr. BAXTER: I cannot answer just in a moment, and I want to supplement what I have said by this, that in so far as importations of raw material for making the general class of agricultural implements are encouraged, that must be at the expense of the development of the basic industry in Nova Scotia.

Mr. CARROLL: What difference does the present budget make on the question of coal in Nova Scotia?

Mr. BAXTER: I would think that my hon. friend would see that coal is used to a certain extent in the production of steel, and the more you reduce the production of steel, the more you necessarily reduce the production of coal. As regards the coal question, I am not so very much concerned with the tariff. If I had not been under the unfortunate mistake which I am assured I have made, and which I must accept myself as having made while I am within the walls of parliament, but no longer, and under the rules of the House, but not in any other way, I would have thought that an hon. gentleman from Nova Scotia had pledged himself to take a very definite line of action with regard to this, but as that has been so studiously denied, my hon. friend can see exactly the point that I was trying to discuss as regards the situation, a point that I can not very well pursue any further in view of what has taken place to-night, and a point on which my hon. friend can have his views as I can have mine.

I want to pass for a very few minutes to the question of transportation. I now come into not at all unpleasant collision, but into juxtaposition to my hon. friend the Secretary of State (Mr. Copp). I regret he is not in the House at the present time, but I think I can discuss the subject without occasioning in him to-morrow morning any very strenuous desire that he might have been in the House. I will quote from what he said the other day as reported at page 1967 of Hansard:

> The thing the people of the Maritime provinces, for whom I have every sympathy and consideration, to do to-day, is to look into this question...

That is transportation.

> ...from a business standpoint. I think it would be wise on their part to choose a business committee who would do for the Maritime provinces what the Chamber of Commerce and Board of Trade of Portland, Maine, did for that city last year.

I want to call the attention of the House and incidentally the attention of the electors of the county of Westmorland to the fine air of detachment which pervades this statement. No one knows better than my hon. friend the temper of the people of Westmorland, and he realizes that this air of detachment is only the forerunner of that actual detachment which will take place whenever this government sees fit to hold a contest in the county of Westmorland. Just imagine a minister saying:

> The thing for the people of the Maritime provinces, for whom I have every sympathy and consideration...

And that gentleman is a minister from one of the Maritime provinces. That is the language not even of mild protest. It is, perhaps a species of self-abnegation. It is certainly a species of profound dejection. It is not the spirit we want exhibited from the Maritime provinces. We want a little more punch and go in it, and in that view I know we have the entire support of the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Martell) who was not satisfied with this declaration in the House the other day.

The Secretary of State gently chided me for the speech that I was supposed to have made in the county of Kent. I am not going into that speech in detail. My hon. friend has embellished Hansard with it. It has been a subject of correspondence between myself and Sir Henry Thornton, and I am not going to drag it in any further than to say that I conceived it to be my duty as a gentleman, under the circumstances, to explain to Sir Henry Thornton how far the report was a fair summary of the speech I had made on that occasion. I pursued what I thought was the correct course, a different course in dealing with Sir Henry Thornton, from what I have sometimes noticed people choosing in regard to speeches they have made. Of course, I do not refer to anyone in this chamber, but I have noticed before now that amongst people there is a disposition sometimes to get away from the things they have uttered. Sometimes we have even denials of that which they have uttered, even though those denials shock common sense. I did not pursue that course. I pursued a course which commended itself to my judgment, a course which, I think, met with the approval of Sir Henry Thornton as a gentleman. This is what I said to him:

> I did refer to you as "an imported miracle" because, as I explained to the audience, that is the way the government press treats you. I did say that you were born in the United States and that you subsequently went to England. That was said in explanation of the fact that you had little or no experience of local conditions and that you had been given a board to advise you, many of whose members were mere political hacks who would be of no assistance to you except along certain political lines.
> I did not say that you were "knighted for some pretended service."

I read this part of the letter in order to do justice to Sir Henry Thornton, because the newspaper report of my speech certainly did him an injustice, and it is only right that I should take an occasion as public as this, not of making reparation for my own fault, but of relieving him from the annoyance that must have been caused by what I contend was an inaccurate report. This is what I said to him:

> I have talked to the reporter who wrote the article and he says that his recollection is that I did say it. Nevertheless I am positive that I did not. All I know about your knighthood and all that I need to know about it is that it was given for war service and nothing could be farther from my thoughts or expression than to refer to these services as pretended.

You will notice that even if a thing makes against me I do not go back on it.

> The reporter, who is a conscientious hardworking chap with a desire to be absolutely accurate, admits that he may not have accurately expressed my statement when he used the words, "thrown out of a job in England." He admits that that reads as if you had been ignominiously dismissed and that I did not use language to convey that impression but merely referred to the cessation of your employment there. I did also refer to men having been removed as, "the second deportation of the Acadians."
> While from my own explanation you may think that the report is a fairly accurate one, yet I can frankly say that it does not in my judgment fairly reflect the character of my address. I referred, though the reporter has not mentioned it, to the Scribe Hotel in Paris and generally contrasted what has been done or not done in connection with railway administration in the Maritime provinces with the programme which was promised by the late administration and which would have been carried into effect if they had been returned to power.

I can assure you, Sir Henry, that I have not the slightest ill feeling towards yourself and I would be sorry to say anything of a personal nature which could give you pain or annoyance. Also, though I am opposed to political interference with the detailed operations of the railway, I do not believe that any administration can or should divorce itself from the general policy of railway administration. That administration should have as one of its principal aims the recognition of the needs of all parts of the country to such transportation as will enable the natural and basic products of each part of Canada to be supplied to other portions of the country and the withdrawal of business from foreign ports for the purpose of utilizing our own harbours.

On these questions you will find I shall speak freely and repeatedly until I see my views adopted or find that it is impossible to do so. I entirely concur that there is no place in this discussion for personal abuse and I am sure that you will acquit me of having had any intention of resorting to that style of persuasion.

I received in reply from Sir Henry Thornton a letter which was most courteous in its tone and which entirely accepted my communication, thus establishing a state of friendly relations between us. But I did not go back on anything that I had really said: I did not deny having made a speech on that occasion.

Mr. GRAHAM: You denied making that speech.

Mr. BAXTER: No; indeed, I admitted almost every word of it.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): My hon. friend did not say anything about the title. Homer, it would seem, sometimes nods after all.

Mr. BAXTER: Never having been Homer I do not know. Homer, if I might observe this, is such a common designation for a Scotchman that I would let my hon. friend settle that question; I think perhaps Homer did nod to-night. Now, I am not going to go into the genesis of the matter, but the fact is that we have the National Railways, and that is all we have. I do not know that we should ever have had it if the people who think as I do had been settling the question. But we have it, and it is no use looking backward; we must look ahead. The railway must be made national and what we need in my judgment is a national railway policy which will make the railway subservient to the country. I want to put myself distinctly on record as saying that I believe it is the office of the government to give directions to the board of directors of the railways as to what this country wants accomplished, for I do not believe in taking the supine position that the whole matter should be turned over to the board of directors and that we should put up with exactly what they see fit to do.

Mr. FINN: Is that the policy of the hon. gentleman's leader?

Mr. BAXTER: I think my leader will concur in it. But I may remind my hon. friend that I have never yet seen the occasion, nor do I think the occasion will ever arise, when my leader will be found to be incapable of expressing his own policy for himself. And, what is more, there is never any evasion about his statement of policy; you get it straight from the shoulder. Now, I do not propose to allow myself to be misrepresented or misunderstood, so that when I say questions of policy I mean of general policy. I do not suggest that this parliament or this government or any other government should interfere, as has been done in some parts of Nova Scotia, in the detailed operation of the road by particular individuals. I leave it to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald, Pictou) to start an inquiry to find out who has been doing that. Possibly he will be able to discover the offender if he will devote his attention to the pursuit of him. In the meantime I am going to suggest, in view of the fact that I have been put in an awkward position to-night, that the newspapers in Nova Scotia offer a small reward to find out who the real author was of the speech to which I have referred. I would even suggest that they give a ten dollar prize.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. My hon. friend has been throwing out innuendoes in such a way that he has been able to circumvent the rules of the House.

Mr. BAXTER: I repeat, I have accepted my hon. friend's denial, and that is the reason I want to find out who masqueraded as the hon. gentleman; I am anxious to discover the identity of the person who impersonated him.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Some reference has been made to "peculiar politicians in New Brunswick," and—

Mr. BAXTER: My hon. friend will pardon my interrupting him. If I allowed myself to be drawn into that sidetrack the hon. gentleman might follow with the question, who it was that had stopped endorsing certain notes. Did my hon. friend ever do it, or has he left off doing it? Now, to come back to the subject that is really of more importance to the country than the discussion of some of the things that have come up in the last few minutes. I say again, that it is the office of the government to institute a policy in regard to the railways and to take power enough to have it carried out, and such a policy must make the railways serve this country and not another country. Repeatedly in the public press, ever since the roads were acquired, we have had statement after statement—and we have had it in this House—that the Union government apparently was responsible for some sort of iniquity in taking over the whole of the Grand Trunk, because forsooth they had taken over the Grand Trunk from Montreal to Portland, Maine.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. BAXTER: Somebody says, "hear, hear."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BAXTER: More say "hear, hear." Now let us have all saying " hear, hear." All together.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BAXTER: Very good! The training of my hon. friends opposite is admirable. I suspected it before, but I never had quite such convincing evidence that the applause accorded the Prime Minister was not spontaneous. I now know it was rehearsed. Well, if my hon. friends are in a receptive mood I want them to reflect for a moment on this acquisition of the Grank Trunk, including the line to Portland, Maine. In teaching one needs to use illustrations, and I think some of my hon. friends are still, or ought to be, in a state of pupilage on that subject. If you own a lot of land, and your neighbour owns a lot of land adjoining, that neighbour can pass over any part of his land when he likes and you have nothing to say about it. If, however, you buy his land you can stop him from even putting a foot upon it. I do not think we can get any political difference on that statement; the political difference comes when we talk about a railway running to a Maritime port or to Portland, Maine. So long as the Grand Trunk Railway Company, a private company organized and financed by British capital, owned the Grand Trunk railway, which had one of its connections running from Montreal to Portland, Maine, the people of Canada had no fair right to say to the private owners of that road: You shall not carry traffic over the lines of steel that you have laid down out of your own pocket. The moment the people of Canada bought that road and took it over they had as good a right to stop the use of those rails as they had to stop the use of any other part of the system. My question is: Why do they not do it?

Mr. FINN: I would ask my hon. friend if he thinks that the government of this country to-day, after the late administration under the right hon. leader of the opposition took the good money of Canada to buy the Grand Trunk from Montreal to Portland, should tear up the rails, abandon that portion of the road, and throw into the Atlantic ocean the money that was so improvidently spent by the late administration.

Mr. BAXTER: I wonder my hon. friend had not asked his question long ago. My complete answer is: They slashed a way through the province of New Brunswick, and ran what was once the National Transcontinental from Grand Falls to Moncton, with the idea of helping Nova Scotia—and it has never helped Nova Scotia one five-cent piece.

Mr. FINN: That is not an answer.

Mr. BAXTER: I cannot give an answer all in one sentence. My hon. friend took three hours and forty minutes the other night, and now he will have to give me some time. Now, on the National Transcontinental the rails are fairly rusty. It develops no local business. It does not help the province of Nova Scotia. The present government, or its political board, is not making daily use of those rails. Now, may I ask my hon. friend if the National Railway Board is bound to use those rails every day because they belong to the government?

Mr. FINN: My hon. friend—

Mr. BAXTER: Wait a minute. That did not come because of anything that my leader or any government he was associated with did; that came because of the unfortunate arrangement which was made by Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Right Hon. Mr. Fielding. But the country has got the road just the same. It is a curse upon the country, but I do not see that that is any reason why we should waste money running trains over it every day if there is not business to warrant such operation. I would suggest that as we have not got traffic enough to run over that road and to run down to Portland at the same time, we should simply take the traffic that goes down to Portland and route it over those other rails into the ports of Halifax and St. John, using the rails within our own country. Now, of those two great connections one is bound to lie idle and unproductive. Shall the unproductive road be within Canada and the productive road in the United States? Or is this House and the present government willing to reverse the position? I understand Sir Henry Thornton, according to the newspapers, says that his business is to make money out of the whole system, and he is going to do it. Therefore until the government gives him directions to the contrary he will be perfectly right in following that course. That means that where he can make more money by routing traffic through United States Atlantic ports than through Canadian Atlantic ports, then under his present declaration Sir Henry Thornton will route it to the American ports. What I want as compensation for what we in the Maritime provinces have given up and for what we are suffering is the mandate of the people of Canada, expressed through this government, to Sir Henry Thornton and his board of directors: Here, even if you make less money by handling the traffic through Canadian ports, that is the way you must route it, and that is the National railway policy of Canada.

Mr. FINN: If shippers in Canada will not route their traffic except through Portland, how are you going to make Sir Henry Thornton do as you propose?

Mr. BAXTER: In the first place, my hon. friend is beguiled by this myth of routing. There is not nearly so much specific routing as he thinks or as we are led to believe. In the second place, my hon. friend ought to know painfully that back in 1898 a Liberal government put a differential on the Intercolonial railway against the port of Halifax and in favour of the port of St. John, and that that was removed only a few months ago.

Mr. FINN: That was agreed to by the people of Halifax and by the Board of Trade of Halifax.

Mr. BAXTER: And it was complained of, and justly so, ever afterwards.

Mr. FINN: It was done under statute.

Mr. BAXTER: Surely my hon. friend has had experience enough of the power of a differential.

Mr. FINN: Oh yes.

Mr. BAXTER: And if Sir Henry Thornton wants to serve Canadian ports, all he has to do is to charge a higher rate—which is a differential—for hauling to Portland, Maine, than to Halifax or St. John, and the freight will go by the cheaper route.

Mr. GRAHAM: Does my hon. friend realize that as soon as the traffic gets into the United States it is subject to the Interstate Commerce Commission? I am treading on delicate ground. Let the Canadian National Railway take steps towards making traffic in the United States difficult over the line that we own in that country, and he will find where we will land with the Canadian National, not in the East but in the West where we get our through traffic.

Mr. BAXTER: There is a way of dealing with that—make your rates cheaper to St. John and Halifax, and let the country bear the difference for the sake of building up the National railway.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is another policy.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BAXTER: I hear groans. There is to be no Canadian national spirit for the benefit of the Maritime provinces, but we can submit to the Crowsnest pass agreement for the benefit of another part of Canada. Is that the way to bring east and west together? Is that making a United Canada? Where are all the Prime Minister's platitudes now, in view of the groans and roars from the other side of the House—platitudes about Canadian unity denied and discarded by his own followers almost before his voice had ceased to echo in this room. Let us come right out in the open and see where we stand. We will find out whether it is to be a united Canada, or whether it is to be united without us. As I said before, you will not drive us out of Confederation, but you are starting now the agitation on the part of the Maritime provinces that will eventually win this case, and you may as well prepare yourselves to adjust the business of the country to those conditions, for sooner or later you will have to do it.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): The hon. gentleman started that propaganda last fall.

Mr. BAXTER: I did not start that propaganda last fall. I started the idea of Maritime unity long before, and I have joined in with the idea of Maritime co-operation, but what I found was that in the city of Halifax, and I think throughout the province of Nova Scotia, the idea is there among the people and it will get expression. I have been one of those who gave it voice, and only one among a number, but the feeling is so deep-rooted that the government is going to realize what the real soul of Nova Scotia is feeling over the treatment it has received.

Now I call the attention of the House to another fact. Out of the ports of Canada to the United Kingdom and to other countries, wheat and flour, all converted into terms of bushels, were exported in 1922 to the amount of 61,000,000 bushels, and by United States ports in the same year over 113,000,000 bushels; in 1923 nearly 116,000,000 bushels were exported through Canadian ports, and nearly 149,000,000 bushels through United States ports, a better relative showing. But the object of our railways should be to induce the export of every bushel of Canadian wheat through Canadian ports. I am not asking now for any special privilege for the Maritime provinces. I am only asking the Liberal party to be true to its really great leader, to implement the words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who said he would never be satisfied until every pound of Canadian traffic was carried over Canadian rails to Canadian ports.

Mr. FINN: He never intended to buy the Grand Trunk then.

Mr. BAXTER: But he intended to build the Grand Trunk Pacific and the National Transcontinental, and he built them.

Mr. FINN: All in Canada.

Mr. BAXTER: Certainly, all in Canada. I wonder if my hon. friend objects to taking traffic from Ontario or other parts over the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. FINN: Certainly not.

Mr. BAXTER: I would hope not. I wonder if my hon. friend realizes that the traffic would be comparatively small if it were limited to traffic originating on the Transcontinental railway, and not very large if it were limited to the Grand Trunk Pacific. The real feeders have been the portions of the Canadian National system, and without them this system of railroads would not have had much vitality. Personally I would rather have seen it under private management, but it is now under public management, and I want that management directed to make the best use of the road for Canadian ports on the Pacific and on the Atlantic.

Now on this transportation question someone spoke at a public meeting in the interests of the Liberal party in tolerably similar language to what I am about to utter:

> Would you consider that it is wise to send these people back? In the old days we could send coal in the winter time from the mines at Stellarton to Montreal. The freight rates under the Liberal government were $1.90 a ton return for nearly a thousand miles. The rate that Colonel Cantley and D. B. Hanna have to-day is $4.20, or an increase of $2.30 per ton on Nova Scotia coal when you send it to Montreal.
> Take steel. What was the rate charged on steel in the days of the Liberal government? Cost from Trenton to Montreal $3.50 per ton. What is the rate to-day—$7.80 per ton, an increase of $4.30 a ton on steel. Is it any wonder that the steel works are not working?
> But we who are fighting the battles of the Liberal party are pledged to at once take steps to see that the I.C.R. comes back to the hands of the people of the Maritime provinces and that it will be operated under a readjustment of the freight rates, where only the cost of operation of the part of the railway in which we are interested will have to be taken into account.

[Mr. Baxter.]

Well, I wonder if anybody ever made that promise. I wonder if any member from Nova Scotia has ever attempted to implement it. I wait for an answer.

Let me point out to the House some of what might be called minor matters in railway rates that do not receive the adjustment or the attention I think they should in the Maritime provinces. The other night the hon. member for Prince represented me as having somewhat improperly dealt with certain railway rates. Now I dealt with the reductions according to the best information I could get, and I know the figures are substantially correct. I would ask the hon. member to compare the rates of 1897 all over Canada with those of 1924, and he will find that our rates in the Maritime provinces, and generally the rest of Canada are vastly higher, that the rates shot up for a few years while the Crowsnest pass agreement was suspended, and they are now back again to the terms of that agreement. There was some little alteration by the Railway Commission, but very small, and I think a moment's comparison of the rates as they are now with the rates for the same products in 1897 will convince the member for Prince that there is something that calls for his work in trying to get a re-adjustment, instead of simply petty criticism of the addresses that have been delivered against the government in the by-election in Halifax.

I have in my possession a letter from the Mann Axe Company of St. Stephen, N.B., and it throws rather an illuminating light on the treatment the railway accords to manufacturers. Now we have basic materials in Nova Scotia, and we are willing to manufacture in New Brunswick. We want our market, and what treatment do we get? The Mann Axe Company say in December last:

> We ordered some goods from Brockville for export to Newfoundland, freight was to be allowed to North Sydney, but instead of any freight allowance we have a charge of the difference between 75c. and 97c. per 100 lbs.

And they go on to quote the railway's confirmation:

> As the rate from Brockville to North Sydney is 75c. per 100 lbs. and the rate from St. Stephen to North Sydney is 97c. per 100 lbs., you can readily understand there is no freight allowance to be given you, but instead a charge of 22c. per 100 lbs.

These people are to-day the only manufacturers in their line of any consequence in the Maritime provinces. Two other concerns have been driven out of business in St. John, probably on account of freight rates, companies that had been manufacturing for nearly fifty years. Now instead of manufacturing axes in St. John one of the concerns is importing from the upper provinces goods they are selling under their own brand and label. That is not the sort of thing that conduces to a satisfactory industrial condition.

Mr. GRAHAM: Which firm is doing that?

Mr. BAXTER: I think it is the Campbell Brothers that are doing it.

Mr. GRAHAM: Not the Mann Axe Company?

Mr. BAXTER: No. This other company went out of business as far as manufacturing is concerned.

Mr. LOVETT: When did they go out of business?

Mr. BAXTER: The Mann Axe Company is not out of business; it is this other concern.

Mr. LOVETT: When did they go out?

Mr. BAXTER: Just a few years ago. That is they went out of the business of manufacturing. They are selling articles made elsewhere.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend but I am very sensitive as to complaints about our railways being unfair. The complaint as read by the Mann Axe Company is based on a statement by them that they were promised a certain rate and did not get it. Now where is the proof that they were promised such a rate?

Mr. BAXTER: I cannot say, that, but what I point out is this: Instead of having oppressive local rates in handling business of this character they should be given the benefit of some kind of a through rate to Newfoundland, an export rate. Now I am told the same thing comes up in regard to Newfoundland which depends largely upon the Maritime provinces for some imported commodities, among them fodder for live stock. In 1922 New Brunswick had a good crop of hay. But the furtherance charge on this commodity via North Sydney was withdrawn leaving regular local mileage rates on hay in effect. In consequence New Brunswick could not compete. Now, Newfoundland purchases largely in the United States. Commodities arriving from Chicago and Central Association points are covered by tariffs granting furtherance rates to North Sydney and thus compete with Canadian manufacturers. In other words people running from Chicago points can get these furtherance rates and people in Canada and the eastern part of Canada do not get them.

Then we have in regard to Prince Edward Island a special commodity tariff on oats in carload lots. I am told this is merely a farce, and that the so-called special rates that were put on from points in Prince Edward Island to Maritime provinces points for local deliveries were nothing better than standard 8 class rates.

Then we have on examination of the tariff the undoubted fact that on iron and steel commodities from 1916 to the present date rates have been advanced from 100 to 150 per cent. From the government of my own province which professes to be dealing with the matter of freight rates I find there has not been a single representation made here on the subject of railway rates. At any rate in a return brought down to the House I looked in vain for any communication from them. I do not know what they are doing. Up to a few weeks ago there had not been a single letter, or telegram, or bit of correspondence produced. I think the railway authorities ought to be alive to the situation but I am rather surprised that the provincial government of New Brunswick would be so supine in this matter when there has been so much discussion in the Legislative Assembly with regard to it.

Now I want to come to something else. I know this speech is painfully long, but there are not many opportunities of bringing some of these matters to the attention of parliament. I have been discussing railway problems from what I think is largely a local standpoint. There is a bigger standpoint than that. I tried to emphasize earlier in my address the necessity for tackling as big a thing as the sales tax and eliminating it as soon as possible. There is a similar proposition to be grappled with in connection with the railway and yet it does not seem to matter as no one thinks of it. Do hon. members realize that the operating revenue from all the railways of Canada aggregates nearly $475,000,000. That is not merely the Canadian Pacific and the National but takes in all the smaller roads. That in other words is the total amount of money that the people of Canada as a whole pay for railway rates whether passenger or freight. Now that is distributed among several roads but the principal earners of the money are the National and the Canadian Pacific; the others are almost negligible. Now what do we see going on in the country from day to day? These two great national systems—for they are both national—jockeying one another for position. Almost any day that you went into the railway committee room lately you would find some discussion about possible parallels. An examination of the railway map shows the parallel. All you have got to do is to take a trip, for instance, from Ottawa to Montreal and you find practically four parallels. Go from Montreal to Toronto and you have parallels. There are many other parts of the Dominion where you will find parallels. The whole administration of both railways to-day is based on the principle of competition. People say when there is competition the consumer gets the benefit. In this case the rates are fixed by the railway commission and all that this competition can do is to increase the cost of service. I had the honour of suggesting that idea to the former Minister of Railways, Hon. Mr. Kennedy, and I wish to say again, as I said before, that I regret very much that death put an untimely end to his career, because I believe he was a man big enough and strong enough to have grappled with this railway problem. I trust that my hon. friend who occupies the position of Minister of Railways at the present time may have vigor enough and interest enough to grapple with the problem as well.

On a question as large as this is I think it is my duty as well as my privilege to give suggestions. My suggestion is this: I think these two roads ought to be asked not to compete but to co-operate. I would suggest that the directorate of each should appoint some small committee that would have no power whatever except the power of consultation and making representations, and that that joint committee should, with all the expert advice possible, devote itself to the problem of settling what service or forms of service can be dispensed with in Canada, still preserving to the people, not perhaps the service that they want nor perhaps the service that they think they are willing to pay for but the service they ought to be able to afford to pay for. There are many places in Canada where we do not need palatial trains or palatial cars. Where two points are connected all the special services could go by one line. If one road gets it the other road may feel it is not being treated fairly, but that can be compensated for by giving it something in another part of the country. In other words put the two of them together to solve the problem as if it were one of joint operation. What will the result be? That their operating expenses will decline and that by the decline of the operating expenses the demands on the people of Canada, who foot the total of this bill of $475,000,000, will be lessened. The money that is returned to the pockets of the people for railway service is just as much a remission of taxation as the money that is cut off by lower duties on any particular commodity.

[Mr. Baxter.]

Now there, in my opinion, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, is a real problem and one of enough magnitude to be worth tackling. This is no piffling about five per cent or two and a half per cent or anything of that kind—not a discussion between a lawn mower and a reaper. It is a big thing. It may easily mean $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 saved to the people of Canada, or $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 more left in the common pot to be available to bear the burden of the country. That is the real economy that is worth considering, not the sort of economy that roots among the offices of the Civil Service and tries to cut off $400 here and $500 there, and winds up by saving $30,000 or $40,000. I do not say that should not be done, if useless or unnecessary people are being employed, but all you can save by those methods is a mere nothing. Tackle a big problem when you are at it and go at it man fashion.

My right hon. friend the Prime Minister in an address to this House said the only questions that were discussed in the by-elections of Kent and Halifax were local questions, except where appeals were made as they had been made by the hon. member for St. John of a sectional character—sectional appeals to one part of the country setting it over against the other. He also added that among the government following from one end of the country to the other, the fact that many of those who had been bitterly opposed to the government, men who had been prominent in Tory circles had been given political appointments under civil service administration, more than anything else had created dissatisfaction with the government. The Prime Minister is quite right that there is dissatisfaction with the government from one end of the country to the other, but he is entirely mistaken as to the cause. He may repudiate the Civil Service Commission if he will, but he has not pricked the blister yet.

If what I have said to-night be sectional, if it be unpatriotic, or if it be putting one class against another, or one part of the country against the other, I tell him that this is precisely the sort of talk that I and others associated with me indulged in in the counties of Halifax and Kent, and that we found a body of people there who needed no preparation, who were thinking the same thing and only asking public men to give expression to it, and yet I have heard the attitude we have adopted described by some hon. members in this House as parochial; and it seems to me that it comes to this: If you talk about spending the public money to bring coal at less than cost from Alberta to Ottawa then it is national. If you speak of bringing coal at cost from Cumberland to Montreal, it is parochial. If you speak of carrying wheat, lumber or fish from the Pacific, it is national. If the concessions apparently are all to be for one interest, then it is national. to the deprivation of all other interests. If we complain about it, we are parochial. Free trade evidently is national in its scope, protection apparently is parochial. Tell that sort of thing to the artisans of this country who depend upon that protection, and who depend upon a wise and fair solution of our transportation problems in order to enable them to participate to the fullest extent that this country can afford. In conclusion I ask this House and this country to adopt a real policy, give us Canadian railways for Canadian ports. Give us a limitation of the British preference to British bottoms and to Canadian ports, give us Canadian tariff to protect Canadian interests, give us Canadian coal for the use of Canadian people, give us Canadian steel for Canadian use, enable us to transport Canadian fish to Canadian consumers. In short, let us have Canadian products for Canadian users and Canadian railways for the Canadian people — national policy from beginning to end and from East to West.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I must apologize, Mr. Speaker, for attempting to address the House at this late hour. I am not responsible, however, for the lateness of the hour. My hon. friend who preceded me is more responsible than I am. I will omit the usual preliminary remarks and the usual compliments. I will try to deal with the questions before the House from a national viewpoint and not from the point of view of an election campaign in the Maritime provinces. The budget is a Liberal budget. That is why my hon, friend seems to dislike it. It is based on the traditional policy of the Liberal party, a policy which is one not of free trade but of freer trade, and based on a proper consideration of the interests of all classes of the community. It has been greeted with satisfaction by the large majority of the people of Canada. It will carry much larger support when the clouds of poison gas that have been spread are lifted, and when the troops of bogeys who have been let loose to play havoc with the common sense and intelligence of the population are dissipated.

The government has redeemed the pledge that was given in the Speech from the Throne. Three or four days before the budget was delivered, I believe, the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) addressed a meeting in the city of Windsor, and ventured a prediction that there would be no reduction in the duties on implements of production. As usual he was wrong. My only hope is that experience will teach him the wisdom of some modesty in political predictions. The government has redeemed its pledge, has reduced taxation by an amount of $24,000,000, and has removed that burden from the shoulders of the ratepayers of Canada. It is rather a large amount. Three dollars per head for every man, woman and child in Canada might seem a very small sum for the financial magnates of the opposition, but it is quite an amount for the hardworking labouring men and the farmers, and that reduction has been made on articles which have been used by the many rather than the few .

I have heard some members in this House express regret that the income tax has not been reduced. My hon. friend from Waterloo (Mr. Elliott) is one of those who expressed that regret. The payment of taxes by itself in an irksome task. The rendering of returns to the government puts one in an ill frame of mind. Even I, with my serene and calm temper, must confess that I am not exempt from that weakness, but the income tax has that advantage of being levied on those who are more able to pay it. Before the income tax could be reduced, the burden of taxation should be lessened on those of the poorer classes of the community.

In dealing with the budget and more particularly with the changes in our taxation, the government had to take into account three main considerations; the necessities of the revenue, the needs of industry and the interests of consumers. I have already stated in this House that I am not a fanatic in matters of trade. The words "protection" and "free trade" are not to me the red rag which they seem to be to some of my friends on both sides of the controversy. This is a very imperfect world, and we have to deal with things as they are rather than as we wish them to be. A battle of words or on words is useless. The word "protection" in itself is a fine word and it appeals to me; but I would rather like its meaning to be broader, and I would apply it to the farmer, the labourer and the consumer at large, and protect them against high prices of articles which they have to buy.

I have met few people who do not admit that a condition under which nations would exchange the articles which they are best able to produce would be a beneficial condition to everybody. Most protectionists admit that, but they dismiss this statement at once as an ideal which cannot be attained. The discussion in the House on this budget has shown the accuracy of my statement. I have heard the hon. member for Centre Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) defend protection or a tariff as a bargaining power with other countries. Bargaining for what? Bargaining, indeed, to obtain concessions and to have larger freedom of exchange with that country. I have heard the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Ross) defend protection and claim that the tariff was necessary as a weapon for retaliation. What is the purpose of retaliation, if not to obtain concessions from the country against which retaliation is made? Indeed, those were the arguments of Mr. Chamberlain when he launched his campaign in England for tariff reform, and in Canada that was the great argument of the father of the so-called National Policy in 1878. He made it a part of his resolution in the Canadian House of Commons when he introduced the National Policy in this country. These are the last words of his resolution:

> And moving—as it ought to do—in the direction of a reciprocity of tariffs with our neighbours, so far as the varied interests of Canada may demand, will greatly tend to procure for this country, eventually, a reciprocity of trade.

The idea of a greater freedom of trade should not, therefore, be abhorrent to any of those hon. gentlemen who admit that their policy or doctrine is temporary, is not an end, but a means, and should end when the goal is reached which they intend to reach. That is a reason why there cannot be any permanency of tariff, because when the bargaining power which the hon. member for Centre Vancouver spoke of is used successfully and when the retaliation suggested by the hon. member for Kingston is also used successfully, in order to secure better and longer freedom of trade with other countries, then obviously the goal is reached and there must be a change in our tariff. Only in freedom could stability be made permanent, and we all think that it is impossible to have free trade in this country at the present time.

As regards stability, did you notice, Mr. Speaker, that those who proclaim most loudly the necessity of stability are quite willing to compromise when the demand is for an increase of duty? Stability works when the question is one of reduction, but the principles are not quite so inflexible when there is a demand for higher duties. I cannot admire such logic and consistency. If reciprocity is admittedly the goal of many protectionists, I believe that a common ground could be found. There are few free trade doctrinaires in this country. Most people who oppose protection do not like the artificial raising of prices on many articles at the expense of the community; but they admit, as a rule, that the tariff is a means of getting revenue, and as there must be revenue in Canada, especially at the present time, in order to meet the expenditure of the country, there could not be any great objection to a tariff for the purpose of securing that revenue. High protection as well as free trade would kill the revenue. When the protection is so high that the foreign goods cannot enter this country, there is no customs duty, no revenue, and other forms of taxation must be devised. Those duties, if applied scientifically from a business viewpoint, in such a way as not to hamper production in those basic and indigenous industries of our country, will still afford an incidental protection that should be sufficient to preserve our industries. Is not then a tariff for revenue a basis on which well meaning, reasonable moderate people could have an understanding? Is not a tariff for revenue a fair compromise? Compromise, after all, in the sense of avoiding extremes, is a British characteristic; the British Empire has been built on compromise, and by compromise it has been kept alive. My hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) the other day said that we were opportunists on this side of the House. I remember having read a speech of Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman in answer to a similar charge made against him in the British House of Commons, and he said virtually this: "Well, there is such a thing as good opportunism in the sense of not endeavouring to do what is at the moment impossible and not rushing precipitately at the thing which cannot be attained immediately; for in trying so to accomplish your purpose you are apt to hurt the very cause which it is your desire to serve." That, I agree, is good opportunism. Why, Mr. Speaker, most of the good that is accomplished in the world is accomplished by such means. Every soldier that knows his business is an opportunist; every seaman battling with the elements is an opportunist; so is every physician and every engineer. Even St. Paul was an opportunist, because he said:

> All things are lawful unto me, but all things are not expedient.

In economic as well as in other spheres the part of wisdom is to avoid extreme views, to eschew the too much and the too little, the too fast and the too slow, and even to be capable of retracing some steps in order to strike the right path.

So far as the needs of industry are concerned, I think we have been careful in that regard. My right hon. leader said prior to the last general election—and these words have been referred to frequently in this debate—that no legitimate industry would suffer as a result of the changes which would be made by his administration should he be returned to power. Well, I claim that no industry has suffered, nor will any suffer, as a result of the changes that are made in the tariff. Is there any suffering evident anywhere? We do not believe it. We believe that it is in the interests of Canadian industry to open foreign markets, to have greater freedom of exchange with other countries. We cannot sell without buying. I see my hon. friend from York (Sir Henry Drayton) laughing, but he knows that what I say is right; we cannot sell without buying. The export business is not a gift, it is a matter of trade, and we must be prepared to buy goods from other countries. What is the hon. gentleman muttering about?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister is asking me a question it seems, and I suppose he wants an answer.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I want my hon. friend to voice his views audibly.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: With our present unforeseen balance against us we have a large amount of outside credits against which we can sell. We have imported many hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of coupons against the interest on which goods can be sold. If my hon. friend does not know that he ought to.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend has waited until the end of the debate to tell us that we have a balance against us. Let me tell him that he is wrong; we have a balance in our favour.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is putting words into my mouth and I object to that. I am talking about interest coupons we have to import, and he is thinking only of a visible trade balance.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is not the question. I happen to have the floor at the moment and I should like to be allowed to proceed. I say that industry has not suffered, and I go further and say that no industry will suffer, as a result of the tariff changes. A statement of the Massey-Harris Company issued recently seems to have disappointed hon. gentlemen opposite; they do not like it. They would have liked to see that company close its doors they would like to see blue ruin and disaster in order to achieve political success.

Mr. HARRIS: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. LAPOINTE: At this late hour I must ask hon. gentlemen to be good enough to let me proceed. I repeat, my hon. friends opposite seem to be in partnership with calamity and desolation. We have heard many stories of the chimerical closing of bogus factories, and other statements which Ananias would envy. Now, my hon. friend from Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Tobin) handed me a few moments ago a letter which is very interesting. On April 1 he wrote to Mr. J. O. Darche, who last year was president of the board of trade of Sherbrooke, Quebec, and who, I may say, is not a political friend of the government.

Mr. Tobin's letter is as follows:

My dear DARCHE,—

I see in last Friday and Saturday's papers the statement that there are six manufactures closed down in Sherbrooke on account of the tariff. This was a surprise to me as I never heard any talk about such a state of affairs. I would be very pleased if you could let me know, if such is the case, the names of those manufactures, etc. In so doing you would oblige.

Yours very truly,

E. TOBIN.

Let me read the reply:

Dear Mr. TOBIN:

Replying to your letter of the 1st instant re statement made at a meeting of the Rotary Club and Canadian Manufacturers' Association at the Sherbrooke House on the 25th of March last, by Mr. Geo. D. MacKinnon, I beg to report the following. The manufacturers referred to are The Regal Tire Co., The Geo. St. Pierre Co., The Hamilton Shoe Co., The Jenckes Manufacturing Co., The Goupil Chocolate Manufacturing Co., and the Manganese Steel Co.

Now, The Regal Tire Co., The St. Pierre Co., The Hamilton Shoe Co., the Goupil Co., failed from two to five years ago, The Manganese Steel became in financial difficulty lately apparently for other cause than the tariff question, and the Jenckes Co. were absorbed by the Canadian Ingersoll Co. immediately after the war.

It is the opinion of our industrial commissioner that this statement of Mr. Geo. D. MacKinnon of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association was an argument to favour their particular cause.

Hoping this explanation will be of some help to you, I have the honour to be,

Your friend,

J. OMER DARCHE.

Already the nightmares created by that flood of misrepresentations are vanishing. The idea that people could be carried away by such a panic-mongering campaign was an insane miscalculation, and history will repeat itself in that regard. When in 1897 the Liberal tariff was introduced in this House Sir Charles Tupper, the then leader of the opposition and of the Conservative party, gave expression to the following language:

> The result is that this tariff goes into operation and the hon. gentleman knows that the industries of this country are already paralyzed in consequence, while hon. members gloat over the destruction of Canadian industries. I was reading the wail, the sorrowful wail, of these industries in the Montreal Gazette, where one manufacturer after another declared that those industries were ruined, that their mills must close, and that they saw staring them in the face a return to the deplorable state of things that existed when the hon. gentleman who last addressed the House was in charge of the fiscal policy of this country. I say that a deeper wrong was never inflicted upon Canada.
> I feel that so far from rejoicing at it from a party standpoint, I deplore from the bottom of my heart the ruin that is going to be inflicted upon the best interests of Canada, and upon its great industries. Still I unhesitatingly say that, from a party point of view, the hon. gentlemen are doing our work; they are showing the people of this country that no reliance can be placed upon the most solemn declarations that they make either in the House or out of it; they are showing the people of this country that, having obtained power, which was all they wished for, they are now prepared to abuse that power at a cost of sacrifice of the industries of Canada.

The very words which we have heard in this House for the last four weeks! And even the good old Montreal Gazette still doing its work as it was doing it at that time —defending Toryism every morning and telling its tale of woe. Well, such was not the case. Those predictions did not prove true. Indeed they proved so untrue that a few years afterwards those gentlemen were carrying on their campaign by saying: Let well enough alone, we are doing too well to change.

We believe in the tariff changes that we have proposed, and we are prepared to fight for them. We are going to fight in this House and out of it for the principles embodied in those changes. I am sorry indeed that some of our friends may not agree with us, because, if so, they are going to deprive themselves of the pleasure of carrying on a triumphant fight against the combined forces of Toryism and selfishness and against some watered stock mandarins who masquerade as the champions of Canadian industry.

The propaganda has started; we have it now. I have here the Journal of Commerce of April 3, containing a report of a meeting of the Eastern Manufacturers in Montreal, under the title: "Eastern Manufacturers combining for Tariff Fight: Plan to unite all sections of business and members of political parties to fight for higher tariff." I quote these two paragraphs from the report:

> The plan when put in operation will probably be modelled on the—

There is a blur at this point—> —of 1911, which so successfully fought reciprocity at that time; and it will include as the principal plank of its platform the commonsense suggestion that all those who think alike on national questions get together for national interests, irrespective of the party labels of individual manufacturers. In this way it is hoped to bring together for the purpose of securing a higher tariff, the business section of the Liberals of Quebec and Conservatives of Ontario whose tariff aims are considered to be identical. The plan would be broad enough to include all classes of business life, on the theory that the interests of classes not directly related to manufacturing interests are in reality bound up with them. The first—

And I call the attention of hon. members to these words:

> The first definite expression of the campaign was a get-together non-political rally held last week in Montreal when four hundred Conservative manufacturers' association delegates from all over Quebec made an impressive demonstration in support of criticism of the present tariff.

Well, this propaganda will not be successful. We will appeal, and I believe successfully, to the manufacturers who have achieved success through hard work and keen business methods, who trusted the Liberal party when it was attacked in the past, who trusted Sir Wilfrid Laurier when he was assailed in the same way as my leader is being assailed today, and who do not believe that it is in the interests of Canadian industry that their association or group should be made an adjunct, or, to use words familiar in this House, a "dilapidated annex" of the Tory party. They realize that there is danger in such an attitude. They know that this country is so vast and has such various and diversified interests that no public man, indeed no progressive business man, should centre his views upon purely local or provincial enterprise and ignore those questions which are fundamental and which must be studied and so dealt with as to make this country prosperous. Those chiefs of industry I think we can successfully appeal to from this higher plane, and I believe that our appeal will be responded to. Our governmental institutions and politics must not be bent in the direction of any class interests, but must be based on the principle of equal justice to all as the only means of safeguarding national peace and normal evolution.

I believe that the changes in the tariff will reduce the cost of living substantially and alleviate the troubles of our consumers during the crisis which they are passing through as the result of conditions which are prevailing throughout the world. Pending a gradual recuperation of the purchasing power of the nation, the obvious remedy, and the only remedy, is a reduction in prices. Ask any influential man in our rural districts and he will tell you that the farmer is suffering from the high price of everything he has to buy. That is the reason that so many cannot make both ends meet and are attracted by the lure of foreign countries. Any policy which will decrease the cost of living and the prices of 2 a.m. what the farmer has to buy will afford him most necessary relief.

Hon. gentlemen opposite have referred many times to the exodus from Canada, to the fact that so many of our fellow-countrymen are going to the United States. Surely they do not expect the people to believe that those who left us two or three years, or even one year, ago did so on account of the present tariff changes? The primary cause of this exodus is the high price of everything and the lack of purchasing power, which I hope will be partially remedied by the decrease of taxation and the resulting reduction in prices. Industry and agriculture must not quarrel with each other; they must help each other in the interests of production. The Canadian nation has its roots in the soil. I was reading a few days ago in the English Review the words of Lord Milner, who in a preface to a pamphlet on the place of agriculture in the life of a nation wrote:

> Unless we are prepared to make a serious and sustained effort to preserve it, agriculture in Great Britain seems doomed to progressive decadence, but if we acquiesce in the decay of agriculture that is to incur national disaster.

Those words are much truer when applied to our Canadian agriculture. I may remind hon. gentlemen that there is a difference between agriculture and the other industries in this, if another industry than agriculture declines or disappears it may be replaced by another industry, but there is no substitute for agriculture.

It has been suggested that the reductions made in the tariff this year have been made to answer the demands of the western farmers, and even to cajole them. Mr. Speaker, were it true that these reductions are made solely to give satisfaction to a large section of the Canadian community and in order to achieve a greater unity in this country, they would have much value, but the western farmer is not alone in his claim for a lower tariff on the instruments of production. My hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) will not be surprised if I remind him that he made a tour of this country in 1920 as an investigator for the purpose of getting all the information necessary for a revision of the tariff. Indeed in the session following, we were told in the Speech from the Throne that there would be a revision of the tariff. During my hon. friend's peregrinations he came to the good old city of Quebec, where he listened to much testimony that was given before him, especially by the manufacturers; but the farmers came too, and I have here a copy of the evidence that was taken before my hon. friend. The leaders of the agricultural societies of the province of Quebec appeared before the commission, and I see attached to a memorandum they presented the names of:

> N. Garneau, President Breeders' Association of the Province of Quebec and Member of the Council of Agriculture.
> Aug. Trudel, Manager Co-operative Central de Agriculture de Québec.
> Frank Byrne, President of the Breeders' Association of the Quebec District.
> Louis Lavallee, Gérant de la société Coopérative Agricole des producteur de semence de Québec.
> John Hay, M.P.P. Argenteuil and Member of the Council of Agriculture of Quebec.
> Georges Bouchard, Professor at the Agricultural College of Sainte Anne de la Pocatière, P.Q.
> C. A. Fournier, M.P., Bellechasse.
> Elizee Theriault, M.P.P. for L'Islet
> Gustave Boyer, M.P., President Dariy-Men's Association of the Province of Quebec and President Maple Sugar Co-operative Society of the province of Quebec.

I see that Mr. Garneau appeared before the commission and said:

> The intensified difficulty of the farmers' position resulting from the high prices of machinery and of the different materials and merchandise necessary to agricultural operations and to the requirements of the family justify the demand for a general lowering of the tariff on all the articles required for the cultivation of the soil and for the support of the family.

Then they give a list of the instruments of production which they want to make free or on which they wish a reduction of duties. Mr. Garneau also says:

> The reciprocity claimed by the farmers in 1911 was combatted by the manufacturers, which did not, however prevent the great majority of the electors of Quebec from favouring the measure. In 1917 one of the principal articles of Sir Wilfrid Laurier's programme included the lowering of the duty on all agricultural implements and the promise of a tariff reform which while sufficiently protecting the Canadian manufacturing industries would have greatly improved the condition of the farmer, of the workman, and of the Canadian consumer in general.

I could read what other gentlemen said before the commission, but it is practically the same thing. So the demand for a lowering of duties on agricultural implements and the instruments of production generally does not come exclusively from the west as my hon. friends opposite like to repeat under so many different circumstances. Now if a farmer saves $25.00 on the purchase of his implements, he will be able to buy goods which he could not afford to buy otherwise. This means increased production for other manufacturers. These are the considerations which have influenced the government in proposing the changes which they have submitted to the House. The responsibility of many of our critics is to their board of directors and to their shareholders. We are responsible to the people of Canada. Our responsibility is even to the future of Canada, to those future Canadians to whom we want to bequeath a united country.

My hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean) whom I am pleased to see in his seat at this late hour, told us the other day of what he called a romance, and indeed it was a fine piece of fiction. There is another fiction which I would like to say a few words upon, although my right hon. friend the Prime Minister has already alluded to it.

I was elected to this parliament in 1904. I was a young man coming here, with all the enthusiasm of my age. I was proud then as I am to-day to call myself a Liberal. By temperament, by training, by aptitude, I could not be anything else.

But, sir, I do not hesitate to say that my greatest incentive, my real source of inspiration was the unbounded admiration I had for the then illustrious leader of the Liberal party, my late chief, Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I have followed him to the very last moment of his life. My political principles, the things I hold dear in public life, I have learned and received from him and even now his revered memory is a fiery cross which lights the way through the difficulties we have to face. I say it is a crime on the part of those who were strangers to his spirit and opposed to his policy, who fought against him, sometimes in a most unfair way to endeavour to use his name to cover their mistaken policies and propound very illiberal doctrines. He devoted forty-five years of his life to the pursuit of freedom and the advance of right and we who were his associates, his companions, his devoted followers, his disciples, will not allow those former opponents of his to misuse his noble figure in support of their reactionary principles. I could quote the words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, prior to 1896 and since that time. They would be worth publishing and will be published some day, but I do not think it is necessary that I should read them here to-night. I do intend, however, to read the words which my right hon. leader read because they were uttered in the last speech Sir Wilfrid Laurier delivered. I may perhaps ask the liberty to read those words again in order that they may be included in my remarks. Addressing the Eastern Liberal Ontario Association on January 14, 1919, Sir Wilfrid Laurier spoke as follows:

> In this country, Sir, Liberals have always been the disciples of the British people on the question of commercial freedom. Indeed, many years ago—when you recall that time to-day in the resolution which was passed upon this subject at the convention of 1893, we declared against the principle of protection, and when we had the opportunity we lived up to our declaration. Sir, it has always been made a cause of reproach to us that when in office we did not adopt but were recreant to our declaration. Such a reproach cannot reach us. We were not recreant, We proceeded step by step towards the goal, always keeping it in view, never imposing a duty for protection's sake only but always acting on the principle or the basis of a tariff for revenue and revenue only. This was our policy in the past, it is our policy to-day, and we have taken this occasion to re-affirm it.

And we, to-day although we have not the fame of our lustrous leader declare to-day that this is our policy and that it will prevail.

Now, Sir Wilfrid Laurier had to fight many elections in the course of his public life, and he had to fight many after 1896. If you take the trouble, as I did, to go to the library and read the electioneering pamphlets issued by the Conservative party in all the elections which followed 1896, you will see what hon. gentlemen opposite thought of the tariff policy of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I will not read the extracts I have here on account of the lateness of the hour, but I promise to the electors of my province and of the rest of Canada that they will be published. Will you permit me to read simply a little song which was published in the Conservative campaign pamphlet of 1911; it is very interesting:

> Cheer boys cheer for R. L. Borden,
> He's our leader staunch and true,
> For he's bound to win the day
> Over Sir Wilfrid Laurier
> And the members of the annexation crew.

I will not recall what was done when the British preference, what was done when reciprocity was proposed by the Canadian government led by Sir Wilfrid Laurier and by the present Minister of Finance. May I refer though to a little incident. In 1902 my right hon. leader of that time was absent attending a conference, I think it was the Imperial conference in London, and a member of his cabinet—a very able man in every way but who had on tariff matters the same views as the present right hon. leader of the opposition —during Sir Wilfrid Laurier's absence had preached the principles of high protection in the province of Quebec, and I think in the rest of the country. The first thing that was done by Sir Wilfrid Laurier on his return was to ask for the resignation of that member of his cabinet. Yet hon. gentlemen opposite claim that Sir Wilfrid Laurier was asserting their views in tariff matters. Let me tell them in all earnestness: Hands off the sacred name of Laurier. Leave his untarnished and glorious memory alone.

There are a couple of things I should like to refer to. The hour is late but it will be my only opportunity to do it. My hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin), I am afraid he is not here to-night—

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Before my hon. friend leaves that subject would he mind placing on record the statement made by the minister, who he says was read out of his party, regarding an understanding the Liberal party had with the manufacturers prior to the election of 1896. Make the story complete while you are at it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not know anything about it. My hon. friend seems to have a fountain of knowledge regarding matters that I am not familiar with at all. This is the first I ever heard of such a thing and I cannot give him the information asked for. My hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) has a fondness for attacking the French treaty. He did it last year and the House will remember that he spoke about bronze powder at the time. He came back this year and gave statistics which I am afraid I must describe as most unfair. My hon. friend gave a list of the amount of duties which had been collected under the treaty since its operation. Then he gave the amounts which would have been collected if that treaty had not been agreed to, and he said that there was a considerable amount which had been lost by the country. Well, Mr. Speaker, I discovered a peculiar thing. Instead of comparing the duties which are collected under the present treaty with those collected under the treaty when my hon. friends were in power, he made the comparison with the general tariff which is most unfair, so unfair that my hon. friend referring to silk fabrics from France said the amount collected was $279,093 where as he said, the amount that would have been collected should be $330,004. Well, Mr. Speaker, the amount that would have been collected for imports when the former government were in power, under the old modus vivendi, would have been $259,-289.52. That is to say that we have collected under the present treaty on silk fabrics $24,-000 more than would have been collected under the old treaty. If you applied the same process to silk fabrics from Switzerland, we collected $533,655.88, and my hon. friend gave the large amount that would be collected without a treaty, and that amount would be $624,334.90. Well, sir, the amount which would have been collected under the treaty in force when the late government was in power, and which was replaced by the present treaty, is $490,548.85. We have collected over $50,000 more under the present treaty. The same thing would apply to velveteens, plush fabrics from France, fabrics from Switzerland and many other countries. On champagne the hon. member said we lost a revenue of $32,-222.20, when as a matter of fact there is a loss of revenue of only $7,476.74, being a difference of $24,745.46 between the figures wrongly given by my hon. friend.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps the hon. minister will be kind enough to quote the rate in the absence of the hon. member for Lincoln. It is the only way these things can be checked.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am giving the calculations furnished by the officers of the department.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would ask what the rate is. I may tell the hon. minister that the same information was given to the hon. member for Lincoln, and I may also tell him that, discussing this very treaty, he gave the House percentages in connection with velveteens, the figures of which I have never been able to get. It is idle to say it can be checked without the rate. If my hon. friend does not want to give the information, he will not give the rate.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am more than pleased—and my hon. friend will realize it in a moment—that my hon. friend has referred to this little difference that we had about silks and velveteens last year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will you give us the rate?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am giving the figures as they are given to me by the department.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is not what I am asking, Mr. Speaker. My hon. friend can refuse if he wishes.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I will give them to-morrow. I did not know my hon. friend would be so thirsty for information about the rates on champagne. I will give him some information to-morrow that will interest him very much. Last year my hon. friend, in the discussion on the treaty on the very question which is now mentioned, said that there would be a terrible decrease in the duty on silk because it was reduced by 20 per cent by schedule D. I then told him that he was mistaken, that only a proportion of about 10 per cent would come under schedule D, and that the rest would come under schedule E and the intermediate tariff, and I said that the hon. gentleman was 10 per cent right and 90 per cent wrong, and he has never forgiven me for that statement.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I asked for the information and he did not give it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have it to-night—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am very glad.

Mr. LAPOINTE: —as the silk has come since the treaty was in operation. I will tell my hon. friend that the proportion that has come under schedule D, is only 3.2 per cent. Instead of being 90 per cent wrong, my hon. friend was not quite 97 per cent wrong.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps the hon. minister will give us the real figure.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I will with the greatest of pleasure, but it is rather an extensive document and the hour is late.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is quite satisfactory to me if the document is handed into Hansard.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I will put it on Hansard with pleasure:

There is another subject on which my statements have been challenged, and to which I wish to refer. The right hon. leader of the opposition toured the country last summer and fall, and said in all his speeches, referring to a statement of mine, that the debt of Canada per capita was less than the debt of all the other dominions and even Great Britain; and he said it was true, but he stated that Mr. Lapointe did not state the reason why our taxation was higher than that of these countries. I have taken the first opportunity to deny that our taxation was higher than that of Great Britain and the other dominions, and that statement has been challenged not only by my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen), but by the press which is devoted to him in the country. I remember that the Ottawa Journal used rather strong language regarding me in that respect. They thought that I was deliberately misrepresenting the facts, or displaying gross ignorance. I have taken the trouble to inquire about it, and I state to-night that our taxation per capita is less than that of Great Britain and the other British dominions, and that taxation per head in the United Kingdom is $101.59, being $79.37 for central government and $22.22 for local government.

Mr. LADNER: Does that include the provincial government?

Mr. LAPOINTE: There is no provincial government in the United Kingdom. I am quoting England at present. In the Commonwealth of Australia the taxation per head is $67.06, the revenue of the Commonwealth being $43.09 per head, and the state revenue being $15.78 per head, the municipal revenue $8.19 per head. New Zealand has a taxation of $76.75 per capita, the Dominion revenue from taxation being $60.33, and the local governing body $16.02. In reference to our local taxation in Canada, unfortunately we cannot have exact figures as to rural municipal taxation as correctly as they have in the other countries. The tax of the Dominion per capita is $36.67; of the provinces, $6,85; of the urban municipalities, $12.65. or a total of $56.17. The Bureau of Statistics adds this note:

The rural municipalities are unquestionably much more lightly taxed than the urban. However, their expenditures for education are fairly heavy. Doubtless in the aggregate they raise as much in taxation as do the provincial governments. All that can be said is that the total taxation of Canada is between $60 and $65 per head of population—probably $63 would be a fairly good estimate.

So our taxation per capita is lower than that of the British Empire, not only the United Kingdom, but the other dominions as well.

But there is more. The hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Clark) asked me what was the taxation in the United States, and I did not know at the time. He told me that I should make the comparison with the United States. I have in my hand the Bankers Magazine of April, 1924, and this is what I find as regards the details of taxation in the United States. The article which is entitled "Your Government" by Carlton P. Fuller:

The final summing up shows annual taxes of $68 per person, $29 going to the federal government, and $39 to the state and local governments. Putting it another way, $7,000,000,000 out of a total national income of $63,000,000,000 go for taxes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What are the municipal taxes?

Mr. LAPOINTE: All is included in that. So that in Canada our taxation as estimated at $63 per capita is even lighter than the taxation in the United States. I hope the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) will go into all those places where he spoke last summer and make the real statement about the taxation of Canada. If you, Mr. Speaker, were to take a leaf out of his book and distribute medals at the end of the session to those of us who are specially virtuous, he would not qualify as regards accuracy in making public statements. As to the Ottawa Journal, of course I am a humble public man and I cannot have the license of the press in expressing myself. All I can say is that they have shown a peculiar lack of accurate information in this respect. No, Canada is not what the "whispers of death" and the "scaremongers" are describing it to be. I have before me the latest figures of trade which have been given to me by the Department of Trade and Commerce. We have total exports amounting to $1,058,553,297, being a considerable balance of trade in our favour.

Employment in this country is not what it has been described to be by my hon. friend opposite. I am sorry the hon. member for West Hamilton (Mr. Stewart) is not in his seat. I would give him some information about conditions in Hamilton that he does not seem to know. In his speech he read a statement showing the reductions that have taken place in the staffs of a number of Hamilton industries in the period from 1920 to 1923. He said:

Not only does this statement illustrate the unfortunate results that have already occurred, but it serves to show other changes along this line which may be expected in future if reductions of the tariff are continued.

He placed on Hansard a list of some twenty-seven plants, branches of American industries located and manufacturing in Hamilton, and he gave a tabulated statement showing the number of employees in the various plants in the year 1919 and the number of employees in the same plants in the year 1923. I do not think this was absolutely fair, because in 1919 all the manufacturers were operating to a reasonable extent, manufacturing articles for the rest of the world. Our government was then lending money to European countries, and that money was going to them in the shape of articles manufactured by Canadian manufacturers. But my hon. friend should give the figures as they are now. Steps were taken, I think in the Labour Department, to secure a check on the number of employees in those plants to-day, and the figures secured within the last week indicate the condition of employment in that city. The hon. member stated that the Hamilton branch of the American-Canadian Company, New York, had 175 employees in 1923. It is found that in May, 1924, the company employs 188. He stated that the Hamilton branch of the Canadian Horseshoe Company in 1923 had 80 employees. It is found that at present the company employs 102. He stated that the Hamilton branch of the Chipman-Holton Knitting Company employed 400 employees last year. It is found that at present this company employs 450. He stated that the Hamilton branch of the Frost Steel and Wire Company, Cleveland, in 1923 had 100 employees, and it is found that at present this company employs 200. He stated that the Hamilton branch of the Firestone Tire and Rubber Company in 1923 had 250 employees. It is found at present that the company employs 296. He stated that the Hamilton branch of the Imperial Cotton Company in 1923 had 200 employees, and it is found at present that it employs 290. He stated that the Hamilton branch of the Standard Underground Cable Company had 100 employees last year. It is found at present that it employs 180.

The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church), speaking of the International Harvester Company, said:

> It will now close up its factory in Hamilton, manufacture in Chicago and just ship its agricultural implements over into Canada. The money invested in the Hamilton plant can be considered wasted and the plant can now be scrapped.

The hon. member for West Hamilton stated that the branches of the International Harvester Company of Chicago and the International Plow Works of Chicago employed 450 men in 1923. He will no doubt be very much interested and elated to know that the investigation of the past week shows that instead of the 450 employees who were employed last year, there are at present 1160 employees in the plant of the company at Hamilton, or an increase of 710 employees over last year.

As regards our trade with Great Britain, owing to a propaganda that is carried on in my province at the present time, I find it necessary to put these figures on Hansard. Our imports from the United Kingdom for the year ended March 31 last were $153,581,716. while our imports were $360,094,021, being a balance of trade in our favour of more than double. Some people are talking of British goods that are dumped into this country. The figures show that we are selling to Britain more than twice what we are buying from her. Some people have a queer idea of what the British preference is; they think it is something that has been instituted in the interests of Great Britain. I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that it was instituted in the interests of Canada for the purpose of developing trade with Britain. That trade has been developed and we are gainers by it, because we are selling to Britain more than twice what we are buying from her. So that it is preposterous to say that because we have no particular preference in Britain we should not shape our own policy in the way we have shaped it. Our goods are admitted free in the markets of Britain and her goods pay a duty coming into Canada.

Britain has no tariff against us whereas the United States maintain a high tariff to the exclusion of our exports. I contend therefore that it is right that a preference should be given to that country into which our goods can be shipped without paying a duty, in order that we may build up a trade with her. The argument in regard to depreciated currency countries is not in my opinion a good one. I have never been able to appreciate the contention that a country whose currency is depreciated benefits by reason of the fact, as though it could enrich a nation to become bankrupt. We have been buying from these depreciated currency countries. We are told that our market is flooded with goods coming from Germany, Belgium and other countries whose currencies are depreciated. What are the figures? What is the result of our exchange trade with those countries? Belgium bought from us last year $17,452,442 worth of goods and sold to us $5,340,875 worth; a balance of trade in our favour of three times more in exports than imports. From France we imported goods to the value of $15,770,145 and exported to that country $18,879,097. That left a balance of trade in our favour of $3,000,000. I come now to Germany, and the argument in regard to that country is one we hear everywhere: we are told that German goods flood our markets. Well, we sold to Germany last year $16,153,673 worth of goods and imported $5,379,737. Italy imported from us $18,501,578, and we purchased from Italy only $1,849,844. So that there was a balance of trade in our favour in exports eighteen times greater than our imports. I say, Sir, that we are not losing by not blocking the avenues of trade with those countries. We are selling to them a good deal more than we are buying from them, and they have to pay high prices by reason of their depreciated currency. In other words, it is they and not we who are suffering; and I implore Canadian business men not to try to block the avenues of trade with any country. In this regard I want to quote the words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in a speech delivered by him at the Windsor Hotel, Montreal, on May 29, 1912:

> Oh! ye of little faith! Oh! ye Canadian business men, who refused to open wide the avenues of trade, I have more faith in you than you have in yourselves. Will you tell me that Canadians are not the equals of Americans? Will you tell me that in a fair field we cannot compete with them and hold our own against them? Until you tell me that Canadians are not the equals of Americans, I refuse to believe that we made a mistake last year.

I hasten to conclude these rather lengthy remarks. Canada is a young country and a young country cannot be immobilized: its very life consists in motion and progress. The function of Liberalism is to recognize this state of mind, to bind it with prudence and safety in making reform and avoiding danger. Our most powerful agent of reconstruction and recovery is peace among Canadians, and you cannot have peace economically or otherwise unless you extend social justice to all. Canada is a smiling country. Let it be a nation of nine million smiles, and I am willing to include my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition in that glorious demonstration of national cheerfulness.

Mr. T. W. CALDWELL (Victoria and Carleton): If I felt that an apology was necessary on my part for contributing to the debate at this late hour it would be the fact that I have occupied, not only during this session but in the last session as well, as little time as any hon. member has done. I have been particularly impressed with the speeches that have been delivered in this debate, although the whole discussion has been somewhat like one of the serial stories that one reads in the magazines; it is difficult to keep in mind just what transpired in the first chapter. However, I do not wish to review the whole story, but I shall content myself with dealing with a few things that have been said in the debate. I do not propose spending very much time in any discussion of the budget, which has been very well considered by hon. gentlemen in this group, the attitude of the Progressive party having been clearly defined not only by its leader (Mr. Forke) but also by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) and other hon. gentlemen on this side who have spoken. I was very much impressed with some of the sentences that fell from the lips of the Prime Minister this afternoon as well as from the hon. member for Marquette, both having largely stated the same views in certain respects. I refer particularly to the plea for unity in this country, if we expect to attain to that full stature of nationhood which is ours by right, by the gifts of Nature, and by Providence. I heartily agree with the Prime Minister's statement that the aim of the government should be to unify or harmonize the different elements in this country. With that feeling I desire to associate myself, although there are some very prominent men in Canada who seem to devote their whole energy to making this ideal an impossibility by trying to set one interest and one section of the country against the other. In this respect I wish to quote from a speech made in the House last year, which by the way I had not the pleasure of hearing. As a matter of fact, I was unaware of it having been made until after prorogation when I discovered that it had been printed in pamphlet form and distributed where the hon. member who delivered it evidently thought it would do the most good, or, from my point of view, the most harm. Now I quote from a speech made in this House on February 8 last year by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Baxter). I will not quote the whole speech because a great deal of it is not worth repeating.

An hon. MEMBER: Which member for St. John?

Mr. CALDWELL: The member who spoke to-night. I could define him so you would know beyond question if I thought it necessary. That part of his speech which I am now about to quote relates to the restoration of the Crowsnest pass agreement and its effect on the eastern farmer. This quotation will be found on page 137 of last year's Hansard:

> In the parliamentary agreement of last year potatoes were not mentioned. Now, can you tell me anything that distinguishes the man who grows grain from the man who grows potatoes? Is there any reason why a burden should be even partially lifted from the one and yet allowed to remain upon the other? I know my hon. friends will not say there is any reason. Well, then, what happened? The government's action paralyzed the Board of Railway Commissioners, and the potato growers of New Brunswick could not seek relief in that quarter. Railway rates were so much reduced that the railway companies, which have to pay their bills like every other company, had to get money from some source and the only source of course, of their revenue is the passengers and freight they handle. Therefore the Railway Commission could afford no relief by lowering the freight rates on potatoes or lumber, except upon one commodity only coming under the classification of building materials, namely, bricks, and in this instance the reduction was very small.

It is just possible that the hon. member was ignorant of the actual conditions when he made that statement; I hope so. Two months after the Crowsnest pass agreement was restored by legislation, and about five months before the hon. member made this speech, the potato growers of New Brunswick—whom he refers to almost with tears in his eyes—got a greater reduction in freight rates than the farmers of the West secured on their grain. We obtained a reduction of over 25 per cent on our export rate, and all the potatoes we moved that year were for export. I shall refer to the Crowsnest pass agreement a little later because even to-night the hon. member stated:

> The government makes the Crowsnest pass sacrifice for the benefit of the West.

It has been said that that agreement was only of benefit to the western grain grower. I therefore propose to show the benefit this agreement was to the eastern manufacturer and fruit grower in comparison with its benefit to the wheat grower. As we all know, the reduction of the rate on wheat was 3 cents per hundred pounds regardless of the length of haul, and in a great many cases the haul was long. We got a reduction of 6 cents per hundred pounds on a short haul on a rate that was only 23½ cents a hundred pounds originally. This made our reduction over 25 per cent of the original rate. To show the absurdity of the statement made by the hon. member—and I hope he was ignorant of the facts when he made it, because I would hate to think that any hon. member would make such a statement otherwise—to show the absurdity of the statement I have worked out the reductions per acre. I have taken twenty bushels of wheat per acre as the average yield, but I think it is above the average. That would be equivalent to twelve hundred pounds, or a reduction of 36 cents per acre to the western grain grower. Taking the average yield of potatoes at 100 barrels to the acre—which would be small, the yield last year running in some cases as high as 150 barrels to the acre,—this would mean 16,500 pounds, or a reduction of $9.90 per acre. In other words, a gain to the potato farmer of $9.90 per acre, as against a gain to the wheat grower of 36 cents per acre.

You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that two years ago I moved a resolution in this House asking the government to establish frost-proof facilities at St. John in order that we might get our potatoes to market during the winter season at a rate that would return the farmer something for his product. I had some difficulty in convincing the government of the necessity for establishing these facilities. I made several trips to Ottawa as well as to St. John, and at last almost despairing of being able to convince the government single-handed, I asked the Secretary of the Board of Trade of the city of St. John to call a meeting of his board, which he kindly did. It was well attended, but the hon. member for St. John, although he professes to have the interests of the potato-growers of New Brunswick so much at heart, did not put in an appearance. The members of the Board of Trade realizing that these facilities at St. John would very much increase the traffic through the port—a traffic which was at that time going through the port of Boston owing to our lack of facilities—got behind the project. As I say, the hon. member for St. John did not attend, although this meeting was for the purpose of urging the government to furnish facilities in his own port and to bring traffic to it, a subject upon which he is so insistent, and in which I heartily concur with him. I have estimated that the benefit to the potato-growers of New Brunswick would amount to 75 cent per barrel. As confirmation of this estimate, I shall quote an extract from a letter from one of our shippers who was very anxious to have these facilities established, giving his view of what it would mean to the potato-growers of New Brunswick. By the way, this saving of 75 cents a barrel would mean a saving of $75 an acre, because we would get the short rail haul to St. John. When we shipped through Boston we not only had the long rail haul, but we had to pay the freight in American funds from point of shipment clear to Cuba, which in 1921 meant a discount of 15 per cent on our money. The discount is less now. This shipper has been shipping to Cuba for twelve or fourteen years, from Boston in cold weather and from St. John when there was no danger of frost. In writing me to urge upon the government to establish those frost-proof facilities he said:

> Now, all we need is the government to do what they should do for this province, furnish us frost-proof facilities at the port of St. John and a line of tween deck steamers out of St. John. They will not only be helping out the revenue of the Canadian Merchant Marine, but such a boom to the farmers and shippers.

This is the interesting part:

> If we had a rate of $1 per barrel from St. John to Havana we could be paying the farmer in New Brunswick to-day $2 for potatoes instead of 75 cents. Not only this but we would have a market which is a regular market for our products.

He estimated that the saving at that time would be $1.25 per barrel. As I pointed out the discount on our money then was greater than it is to-day. However, I think, Mr. Speaker, you will admit that I am making a very conservative estimate in placing the saving to the shipper at 75 cents per barrel by the establishment of frost-proof facilities at St. John. Therefore I say that any hon. member who will stand up in this House and make a statement of that kind, if he knew the facts, is certainly not trying to promote national harmony.

With regard to the restoration of the Crowsnest pass agreement, the statement has been made repeatedly that it is a benefit only to the western grain-growers. I shall quote from the agreement itself and then give some figures as to the freight saving to other people besides the western grain grower. This is the agreement:

3 a.m.

The Crowsnest pass agreement was an undertaking entered into in 1897 between the government of Canada and the Canadian Pacific Railway, whereby in consideration of a subsidy to be earned by the construction of the Crowsnest pass railway, which subsidy amounted to $3,404,720, a reduction should be made in the rates upon the classes of merchandise.

The Crowsnest pass agreement was an undertaking entered into in 1887 between the government of Canada and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, whereby in consideration of a subsidy to be earned by the construction of the Crowsnest pass railway, which subsidy amounted to $3,404,720, a reduction should be made in the rates upon the classes of merchandise below stated westbound from, and including Fort William and all points east of Fort William on the companies railway—

I want the House to pay particular attention to this.

—to all points west of Fort William on the company's main line or on any line of railway throughout Canada, owned or leased by, or operated on account of the company. The commodities, the classes of merchandise to be affected, are as follows:—

Upon all green and fresh fruits, 33⅓ per cent;

Coal oil, 20 per cent;

Cordage and binder twine, 10 per cent;

Agricultural implements of all kinds, set up in parts, 10 per cent;

Iron, including bar, band, Canada plates, galvanized, sheets, pipe, pipe-fittings, nails, spikes and horse shoes, 10 per cent;

All kinds of wire, 10 per cent;

Window glass, 10 per cent;

Paper for building and roofing purposes, 10 per cent;

Roofing felt, box and packing, 10 per cent;

Paints of all kinds and oils, 10 per cent;

Live stock, 10 per cent;

Woodenware, 10 per cent;

Household furniture, 10 per cent;

The agreement also provided for a rduction in the rates on grain and flour from all points on the main line, branches or connections of the Canadian Pacific Railway west of Fort William and Port Arthur. The decrease was fixed at 3 cents per hundred pounds to be reached in two annual reductions of a cent and a half each.

Another contention has been made that the Crowsnest pass agreement provided for a rate on grain away below the cost of hauling. I think I can prove conclusively that that is not the case, and I wish to quote briefly from the report of the Transportation committee of this House of 1922:

The Crowsnest rate on grain and grain products remained in entirety from September 1, 1899, until October 7, 1903, when it was modified by a lower rate resulting from an agreement made between the province of Manitoba and the Canadian Northern Railway. Lower rates continued until March 15, 1918, when an increase of 15 per cent on rates generally was made by order of the Board of Railway Commissioners. This increase was granted because of representations by the railways that they could not successfully maintain their services unless granted rates that would enable them to meet the increased operating costs due to substantial increases in cost of fuel, coal materials, supplies, equipment of all kinds and wages.

Now comes the interesting part of it.

This increase was subject to the Crowsnest pass agreement, but it brought western grain rates up to Crowsnest maximum rates from most points in Saskatchewan and Alberta, though not in Manitoba.

That proves that for fifteen years the Canadian Pacific Railway hauled grain at least fifteen per cent and in some cases more than fifteen per cent below the rates provided in the Crowsnest pass agreement. I think this effectively explodes the theory that the Crowsnest rate was below what the railways could afford to haul it for, because there was nothing to compel the Canadian Pacific Railway to haul this grain at a lower rate than the Crowsnest rate. Yet we have the evidence here in the report of the committee that dealt with this matter two years ago that for fifteen years, from 1903 to 1918, the Canadian Pacific hauled this grain at rates at least fifteen per cent lower than the rate set by the Crowsnest pass agreement.

Now I wish to show exactly what these reductions mean to the eastern manufacturer and apple grower because to my mind that was a wise agreement. It was entered into to enable the eastern manufacturer to get into the western market with his farm machinery, binder twine, wire fencing, horse shoes, spikes, nails and other commodities; and by the way, our friends to my right, the official opposition, while they are the champions of these interests, did not seem very favourable to the restoration of the Crowsnest pass agreement. They were even willing to sacrifice their manufacturing friends if they could deal a knockout to the western grain growers. That seemed to me to be the attitude when this matter was discussed in the House two years ago.

On page 21 of this report you will find a statement by the Board of Railway Commissioners, called statement No. 2, showing rates on agricultural implements, in carloads, from points in eastern Canada to various stations in western Canada. From the Toronto group, prior to the Crowsnest pass agreement, there was a rate of 76 cents per 100 pounds. Under the Crowsnest pass agreement it was reduced to 68½ cents per 100 pounds, or a reduction of 7½ cents per 100 pounds while the reduction on wheat was only 3 cents per hundred pounds.

From the Montreal group, prior to the Crowsnest pass agreement, the rate was 82 cents. That was reduced under the Crowsnest pass agreement to 74 cents, or 8 cents under the rate prior to that. On September 1, 1919, the rate in the Montreal group was further reduced to 62 cents per 100 pounds, although the railway was not compelled to give that rate under the Crowsnest pass agreement. That meant a reduction of 20 cents per 100 pounds. There is quite a long table here which I would ask permission of the House to place on Hansard. Take Montreal and Toronto to Winnipeg, the shortest haul possible for agricultural implements to get the benefit of the Crowsnest rate. Very little of the implements would stay at Fort William. I want to quote the rate to Edmonton from the Ontario group. The rate was 164½ cents per 100 pounds, as compared with 148 cents, or a reduction of 16½ cents per 100 pounds, as compared with 3 cents per 100 pounds on wheat. From the Montreal group to Edmonton prior to the Crowsnest pass agreement the rate was 170 cents. After the Crowsnest pass agreement that was reduced on January 1, 1898, to 153½, or a reduction of 17 per hundred, another reduction which the railways are not compelled to make under the agreement. That shows that the railways were able to haul freight at a lower rate than the Crowsnest pass agreement provided for, which, by the way, was only a maximum rate; there was nothing to prevent the railways from hauling at lower rates.

I would like to refer to the freight rate on potatoes for a moment. You will notice, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member in his speech said that the action of the government in restoring the Crowsnest pass agreement was to paralyze the railway commission, and therefore the potato growers were not able to get any relief. We did not, as a matter of fact, even have to apply to the commission. Two of the shippers from New Brunswick and myself went to Montreal and interviewed the Traffic Department of the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National Railways and got this reduction without applying to the railway commission and we got it in one afternoon, so if the railway commission was paralyzed, the railways were not.

I wish to quote from page 23 of this report. I have here statement number 4 furnished also by the Board of Railway Commissioners to the committee who investigated the subject. It is thus described:

> Statement showing rates on binder twine and cordage, iron, bar, band, Canada plate, galvanized sheet, pipe, pipe fittings, nails, spikes, horse shoes, wire, common window glass, building and roofing paper, roofing felt, paints and wooden ware, in carloads, from points in eastern Canada to various stations in western Canada.

From the Toronto group to Winnipeg prior to the Crowsnest pass agreement a railway rate of 82 cents. Under the Crowsnest pass agreement the rate was reduced to 74 cents a reduction of 8 cents per hundred pounds. From the Montreal group to Winnipeg, prior to the Crowsnest pass agreement, the rate was 88 cents. The rate was reduced under the Crowsnest pass agreement of 1898 to 79½ cents, a reduction of 8½ cents per hundred pounds.

My hon. friends to my right would endeavour to make it appear that these reductions only benefited the western grain grower. I find that reductions for manufactures going west is in no case less than double the amount per hundred pounds, and in some cases is six times the amount of the reduction on wheat coming east.

Now the rate to Edmonton. From the Toronto group prior to this agreement the rate was $1.85 per hundred pounds. It was reduced under the Crowsnest pass agreement to $1.66½, a reduction of 18½ cents per hundred pounds. From the Montreal group prior to the Crowsnest pass agreement the rate was $1.91. The rate was reduced under the Crowsnest pass agreement to $1.72, and was further reduced in September, 1914, to $1.26. We find that in December, 1921, the rate had advanced to $2 per hundred pounds. Still our friends to my right were unwilling to give their manufacturing friends the advantage of this by putting it in operation two years ago. Possibly some gentleman will say that two years ago the eastern manufacturers were not given that advantage, and I want to show the sacrifice our friend from St. John was willing to make of the manufacturers of the east in this regard. When this agreement was under discussion in the House on June, 26, 1922, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Baxter) moved the following amendment. And he prefaced it by these remarks:

> I therefore move an amendment to the motion: That in the opinion of this House, regardless of all other considerations, the Crowsnest pass agreement should be immediately abrogated.

Well, that was a verbal amendment and he was asked by the speaker to commit it to writing which he did and formally moved it. He had the doubtful distinction on that occasion of moving a very important amendment in this House which only received one other vote beside his own. I think I am safe in making that statement. The other member who voted for his amendment got up next day when the orders of the day were called and explained that he had misunderstood the motion or he would never have voted for it.

Now I wish also to give a statement showing the rates on coal oil in barrels by carloads from points in eastern Canada to various stations in western Canada to show the saving there was in that instance also. From the Toronto group prior to the Crowsnest pass agreement the rate was 82 cents per hundred pounds. Under the Crowsnest pass agreement the rate was 65½ cents per hundred pounds, a reduction of 16½ cents per hundred pound. From the Montreal group the rate prior to the Crowsnest pass agreement was 88 cents per hundred pounds. Under the Crowsnest pass agreement in 1898 it was reduced to 70½ cents per hundred pounds a reduction of 17½ cents per hundred pounds. In 1914 the rate was further reduced to 64 cents per hundred pounds, a net reduction of 24 cents from the rate prior to this agreement going into effect. The rate to Edmonton from the Toronto group prior to the Crowsnest pass agreement was $1.85 cents but it was reduced under the Crowsnest pass agreement to $1.48. The rate from the Montreal group prior to the Crowsnest pass agreement was $1.91 per hundred pounds. It was reduced under the Crowsnest pass agreement to $1.53 per hundred pounds. In 1914 there was a further reduction to $1.24 per hundred pounds although the agreement did not compel the railways to give it.

Now, I think possibly, I am coming to the more interesting reductions yet, and I think this may interest hon. members for Nova Scotia as well as hon. members from New Brunswick. They will be somewhat surprised if they have believed statements made by hon. members in the recent by-elections in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia that this rate was only a benefit to the western grain growers. At page 25 of this report, and this was also furnished by the Board of Railway Commissioners to the committee you will find the following:

Statement showing the rates on green apples from eastern Canada to the various stations in western Canada.

This shows that it includes the farmers of the east and manufacturers as well as the farmers of the west.

Mr. STEVENS: What portion of the full schedule is now in force? The whole schedule is not in force, I presume my hon. friend knows that?

Mr. CALDWELL: I think possibly the hon. member was asleep when I dealt with that. I do not blame him for being asleep at this late hour of the morning. I dealt with that point and said that only the portion relating to grain was in force. The other will come in force on the 6th July.

Mr. STEVENS: The hon. member is mistaken, I was listening attentively and he did not make that clear. The inference throughout the whole of his remarks was that this whole agreement is in force.

Mr. CALDWELL: I am very sorry if I conveyed that impression. I thought I distinctly stated some minutes ago that only a portion of the schedule was in force. I was disappointed that some hon. members to my right did not ask me the question. I stated that possibly some gentleman to my right would make the statement that only a part of the schedule came into effect two years ago, that part affecting the grain growers. I admitted that was the fact but I think I made that clear and I also quoted the amendment of the hon. member (Mr. Baxter) seeking to abrogate the agreement in its entirety, notwithstanding that the eastern manufacturer for whom he has such great care and I presume he has care of the fruit growers as well, would be put to very great disadvantage if the agreement was abrogated. The statement issued deals with green apples in carloads from eastern Canada to various stations in western Canada. From Toronto group points prior to this agreement going into effect the rate was 82 cents per hundred pounds. It was reduced under the Crowsnest pass agreement rate to 55 cents per hundred pounds, a reduction of 27 cents per hundred pounds, while there was a reduction of only 3 cents per hundred pounds on wheat. This was further reduced in September, 1914, to 53 cents per hundred pounds. Now, from the Montreal group to Winnipeg, prior to the Crowsnest pass agreement, the rate was 88 cents per hundred pounds. It was reduced under the Crowsnest pass agreement to 59 cents, and in 1914 further reduced to 57 cents. I should like to be permitted to put these tables on the records because they give the rates from the Montreal and Toronto groups to various points in the West. I will not take the time to read them and I do not think it is necessary. These tables are quite brief but they are very comprehensive. I will, however, give one other rate, as I did before to the further points showing the greater reduction per hundred pounds. From the Toronto group to Edmonton the rate prior to the Crowsnest pass agreement was $1.85 per hundred pounds. Under the Crowsnest pass agreement it was reduced to $1,23½ per hundred pounds, or a reduction of 61½ cents per hundred pounds.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not think I need to labour that point any further. I think I have proved to any reasonable man that this agreement is not all in favour of the western grain grower. We Maritime province men who voted for this agreement have been criticized very severely and I think very unfairly because this feature of it has never been put up to any audience in the east. I have never heard of it being presented to them in that way. It was simply presented as a sacrifice of the interests of the East for the benefit of the western grain grower. I do not think I need apologize for taking up the time of the House to put this on record to-night. It should have been done long ago. I certainly would have done so last year had I known that the hon. member (Mr. Baxter) made this speech then. As I say I never knew such a speech had been made and I was amazed when I saw it. It was circulated in pamphlet form in New Brunswick to try to make the potato growers believe that they had been sacrificed in order to give the western farmer something that he was not entitled to. I think, however, that I have proved beyond question that the statements and the inferences in this speech had no resemblance whatsoever to the truth, because we had a greater reduction in the actual freight on potatoes five months before this speech was made and two months after the Crowsnest agreement went into effect, to say nothing of the great advantage of the frost-proof warehouse that saved us untold money. According to my computation the actual reduction in freight to the farmers on account of the short haul to St. John, and this was made possible by the warehouse, is 75 cents per barrel compared with 3 cents per hundred pounds on wheat.

I could hardly credit the statement of the hon. gentleman from St. John (Mr. Baxter) in reference to this matter. I spoke of the rate on green apples from Montreal to Winnipeg being 59 cents per hundred pounds. There is a table here which also gives the rates from Okanagan Valley to Winnipeg at $1.13 per hundred pounds; although the distance from Montreal to Winnipeg is 236 miles more than from the Okanagan Valley to Winnipeg, the rate is 54 cents less from Montreal than it is from the Okanagan Valley to Winnipeg, which certainly gives the eastern fruit grower a very great advantage over the fruit growers in the western country.

Mr. STEVENS: Does the hon. member consider that a justifiable rate.

Mr. CALDWELL: No, I do not. I thoroughly agree with the gentlemen from British Columbia and Alberta who contend that the mountain rate should be adjusted especially on the government road through the Yellowhead pass where the grades are easy and long trains can be hauled. But when the Crowsnest pass agreement goes into effect on the 6th July next, if it does become effective—and I see no reason why it should not—our manufacturing friends from eastern Canada and the fruit growers will certainly be able to get into the western market. There is no question about that. I am sorry I have not the rates on apples from the Maritime provinces to Montreal. I have taken the rates on potatoes from the Maritime provinces to Montreal, and I think the rates are practically the same. The rate from the furthest point in New Brunswick from where potatoes were shipped to Montreal, in 1917, was 19 cents per hundred pounds, and in 1920 it was 38½ cents per hundred pounds, and the Crowsnest pass rate provides that from any point in eastern Canada the reduction shall be 33⅓ per cent from the regular rate, which would mean two-thirds of 19 cents in 1917, which would be 12⅔ cents added to the 59 cents from Montreal to Winnipeg, which would mean that you could ship apples to Winnipeg from any point in the Maritime provinces to Winnipeg for 71⅔ cents per hundred pounds, while the rate from the Okanagan valley to Winnipeg is $1.13. In view of those facts, I do not think that any man can contend that the Crowsnest pass agreement is a discrimination even against the eastern farmer who is growing fruit. We do not ship potatoes to the West because they grow their own potatoes, but they cannot grow apples. Here is an opening for the fruit grower.

I had another table giving the comparative rates from Montreal west and from Vancouver east. If I am allowed to place this on Hansard I will not take time to read it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CALDWELL: I have one or two other matters I wish to refer to. We have heard very doleful wails indeed from our friends to my right with regard to the plight of the Canadian manufacturer and what this tariff will do to him. I am not contending that the tariff is the sole cause of the conditions that I am going to place on the records of this House just now. I hold in my hand a copy of the Royal Gazette of the date of April 30 and I find 22 farms advertised for sale under mortgage in New Brunswick. I wonder if people who are wailing about the manufacturers have any thought for the agriculturists of this country. I do not think if a man wished that he could attribute this to the present budget—because a man does not get sold out under a mortgage in one year, possibly not in ten years. A man who loans money on mortgage wants to make an investment, and as long as the farmer is able to pay his interest he is not sold out. I have never known of a case where foreclosure was made if the farmer was able to pay the interest. But here are 22 farms advertised for sale in one issue of the Royal Gazette for April.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: What size farms?

Mr. CALDWELL: It is covering pretty well the province. These are not all the farms advertised for sale in the province. I have a copy of the Weekly Mail, Fredericton, New Brunswick, in which there were four farms advertised for sale under mortgage, in the one issue. If you pick up any weekly paper in that province you will find these advertisements. People will say that that is a pretty doleful picture, and I am glad the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) is in his place, because I want to quote from the Monthly Bulletin of Agricultural Statistics, February 15, 1924, from the crop reports of the province summarized from the reports of the crop correspondents, January 31, 1924, as follows:

Maritime provinces.—Throughout the Maritime provinces, the open winter has been very beneficial for live stock. There is an abundance of feed everywhere and cattle are in good condition. The market has been dull, and farmers selling are realizing but low prices. A correspondent at Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, writes: "In many cases farmers deem it more economical to slaughter some of their stock rather than winter it with no prospect of market next spring". Prices for lambs and sheep are about the same as last year, whilst those of swine dropped badly during the summer. Poultry prices were particularly disappointing at Christmas time on account of the mild unseasonable weather during December. Buildings have increased in value the last few years, while farm land has decreased. Help is hired by the day, as farmers cannot afford to pay wages since the drop in value of farm products. Some farmers talk of leaving their land if conditions do not improve.

I am pleased to see some members from Nova Scotia in their seats. I attended with them a meeting in this House not long ago to listen to a discourse by a man who had been making a survey of vacant lands in the Maritime provinces, where there was a possibility of settling immigrants. I do not remember the number of farms he mentioned in any one given county, but I know it ran into large figures. He was asked how many of these farms had complete buildings, and I think he answered 60 per cent. I think one of the members from Nova Scotia asked the question, and received the answer that 60 per cent had complete buildings and a large number were vacant, and they were surveying with the idea of settling the newcomers on the farm, so that the statement that many farmers would leave the farms if conditions do not improve is mild indeed. I will not deal with all the provinces, but I will take the province of Quebec, because we have been told it is the most prosperous in the Dominion, and possibly the farmers in Quebec are in the best circumstances of all the farmers in the Dominion. The report from Quebec reads as follows:

Owing to the mild weather of the first part of the season, the supply of fodder was conserved, and the cattle were kept in good condition. The value of farms and of cattle has declined during the last few years. There is practically no sale for cattle and horses. Milch cows and poultry are about the only descriptions yielding any revenue. Correspondents state that if the situation does not improve, many farmers will have to give up their land.

Lambs are the best sellers and the prices quoted for wool show some increase over last year.

This is the interesting part of it:

Very few farm labourers are hired by the year, and farmers, where possible, manage without help, as they cannot afford to pay wages.

I do not know whether our city men realize what this means to a farmer; but I know—and I have farmed under those conditions years ago as well as recently—about not being able to hire farm help. It means that the wife must go out and help on the farm to do work that the man cannot do alone. It means, in all too many cases, that children are kept from school who should be in school and are thereby deprived of getting an education, which feature is the saddest of all.

By the way, I am sorry that the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) is not present, because I have a little crow to pluck with him about farm help in the Maritime provinces in the harvest season. Last year, just about the time when we got ready to harvest our potato crop, which is the crop for which we require the most help, a crop that takes a great deal of help, I saw the usual advertisement of cheap farm excursions to the Canadian West for farm help. I immediately sat down and wrote to the minister calling his attention to this, also calling his attention to the fact that, due to depressed times in the Maritime provinces and to the lure of good wages in the United States, many of our young men had left the Maritime provinces and gone to the United States; that help was very scarce. Most of our farmers in the potato growing belt hire their men by the summer; they have to do so because there is a continuous summer's work in cultivating and spraying potatoes. What happens when those posters are put up on fences, barns and every other place where they can stick them, advertising a cheap rate to the Canadian West? Your hired man puts in his team at six o'clock and he is in such a hurry, he has hardly time to feed them. He tells you that he is going on that harvest excursion next morning. That is after he has been paid good wages all summer and possibly been not overly busy all the time, so that he may be available in the rush season for the potato harvest. I got a reply from the Minister of Railways and Canals stating that this was a matter, not for the government, but for the railway management. I do not agree with the minister. In the matter of inducing people to move from one part of the country to another, it is not for the railway management but for the government to take means to see that help is evenly distributed. If they endeavour to get help for some part of the country that is in need of it, I hope they will not rob the Maritime provinces of the few men whom they are able to retain for the harvest in the fall of the year. If they need help for the western harvest fields —and I realize they do and I do not object to their getting it—let them bring it from where they can get it without robbing the Maritime provinces. Let them go to the bread line in the cities. Of course, I realize that very few of those men will go to the country; they want to be able to go to the pictures at night.

I wish to quote from the records of the special committee on Agricultural Conditions which sat last year to show the other side of the picture. I have endeavoured to give, as briefly as I can, just what is happening to agriculturists in the Maritime provinces, and I think we have had proof enough of conditions in the other provinces. Last year we had all classes of people before us. Some were summoned and some appeared voluntarily. I want to quote from the statements of some manufacturers who were before the committee. I do not wish to be unfair to anybody, nor call particular attention to any manufacturer in Canada and, therefore, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I will omit the names. This particular manufacturer who appeared before our committee painted a very doleful picture of the condition of his industry for the two previous years. We took his statement and we believed it as being possibly correct. He did not, however, state that they had lost money because they could not manufacture the article that they were manufacturing for the prices that they were receiving, but they had lost money because they were not selling; they were doing no business and they were maintaining a big overhead which was eating up, not only their profits, but their capital. After listening to this very patiently, our chairman asked this question:

> You brought forward a rather doleful picture of the last two years, and I said, to be fair, we should have a ten-year statement. Do you think there is any objection to giving that?—A. I think I have that, Mr. Chairman, and if you would like to consider it, I will pass it to you, and I would like you to consider it yourself, or with any members of the committee, but I prefer not to have it on the record.

That is, he offered to hand it to the chairman to consider it himself or with any member of his committee, but he refused to have it put on the record. If his condition was bad, why would he refuse to give us the required information. Because no man, I do not care how sharp he is, could form an opinion of the condition of any business by the condition during the two years of which he had given us the operation and cost in very minute detail. We had, however, before us another manufacturer who was more frank, and with your permission, Sir, without giving the name, I will also read a few questions and answers from this man's evidence. The first question and answer which I wish to quote are as follows:

> I think you told us your capital at the start was $60,000?—A. $125,000.
> Q. $60,000 paid up in cash?
> Q. What is your present worth?—A.—

This company was formed in 1903 and had been in operation for eighteen years at the time when this evidence was given.

> A. Our present worth on July 31, 1922, surplus $12,500,000, capital, $7,000,000,—about $20,000,000.

That is quite interesting. Starting with a capital of $60,000, they had increased their worth to $20,000,000 in working capital and in the cost of their plant. We were naturally quite anxious to know how this capital had been increased from $60,000 to $20,000,000. There is, however, another question which comes first:

> Q. How much dividends have you paid on that?—A. Over what period?
> Q. In the whole period?—A. $10,000,000 in cash and $6,000,000 in stock.

The next answer is very interesting:

> Q. How has that capital increased to the present amount?—A. By earnings. There was never any fresh money taken in.

I will admit that that is a very frank statement. Starting with a capital of $60,000, admitting there was no further capital taken in, they had increased their worth to $20,000,000 besides paying to the shareholders $10,000,000 in actual cash dividends.

Mr. MITCHELL: What line of business was that?

Mr. CALDWELL: Manufacturer of automobiles, and by the way I think there should be a reduction in automobiles this year. We require cheap automobiles and especially trucks. In New Brunswick, due to the shortage and high cost of help, many of our farmers buy trucks to haul their potatoes to market when they live any distance from the railway, and I think it would be a boon to the farmers to take the duty off trucks and cheap cars. I say that in view of some of these statements it is unfair for hon. gentlemen to accuse the government of any attempt to secure the support of the Progressives in this House through a reduction in the duties on argicultural implements and other tools of industry. I would strongly commend to the careful perusal of my hon. friends the evidence that was given before the special committee on Agriculture last year, and unless their hearts are made of stone I think they will hardly ever again object to anything that will help the agriculturists out of their present difficult position. I am going to quote a part of a letter which I have received from a gentleman in New Brunswick, and I will not refuse to give his name if it is asked for. This gentleman is not a farmer, and I think he must have been reading the evidence that was given before that special committee last year. He says:

> I have been a manufacturer and merchant, doing business in the Maritime provinces for thirty-five years, president and secretary for Connors Bros. Limited for twenty-five years, president and secretary for the Maritime Steamship Co. for fifteen years, president of Sturgeon Cove Lumber Co., Ltd. for ten years, and several other corporate and private companies in the Maritime provinces, would say:—
> I have been a believer in a high protective tariff in the past for manufacturers, such as the United States for home practice. But times have changed, and we must study our best interest and lay party lines aside, because our people that have been educated in all lines of business are leaving Canada and going to United States. High tariff is all right for them, but bad for Canada, because we cannot sell our fish, lumber and wheat we produce. Not more than half of it can be sold in Canada, and when we look to use our nearest and best markets we are up against a wall of high tariff.

Here is a man who admits that he had always been an advocate of a high protective tariff but, as he says himself now, times have changed. Well, Mr. Speaker, in concluding I might quote that old saying, that a wise man sometimes changes his mind; and much as I dislike saying unpleasant things, I cannot but add the rest of it—a fool never does.

Hon. E. M. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence): I had not intended trespassing on the time of the House or taking part in the debate, and I would not at this late hour venture to detain the proceedings were it not for the peculiar performance which the House has witnessed this evening on the part of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Baxter). After having during the past months advertised himself throughout the country as the great champion of the rights of the Maritime provinces, after spending almost three months of the present session in parliament, the hon. gentleman has taken this opportunity of putting forward in his own peculiar way what he considers to be the claim of the Maritime provinces; and he has done so at midnight at the end of this protracted debate. At no time since the session opened did this wonderful champion of our rights in the Maritime provinces venture to call the attention of the House or of the country to our needs and our necessities until the present moment, and under these peculiar circumstances. The hon. gentleman has put forward remarkable claims, and made loud assertions as to the necessity for unity among all of us who come from the Maritime provinces. I may be permitted, I think, to say that hon. gentlemen who come from that part of the country view with a great deal of suspicion these high-sounding statements on the part of the hon. member. We recall a meeting that took place a little over a year ago during the last session of parliament when all hon. members from the Maritime provinces, irrespective of politics, assembled to discuss matters and agreed that they would fight unitedly on certain questions which they considered of importance to the Maritime provinces. Within three weeks after that meeting had been held, at which my hon. friend was present and in the discussions in which he joined in the most assertive way, declaiming upon the necessity for united action, when a question arose in this House on a motion submitted by his colleague the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) to strike out of the estimates a very much needed public work in the province of Nova Scotia, this high-sounding patriot supported that action against the interests of the part of the Dominion in which he professes to take such a lively interest. Since that time, when he indulged in such high-sounding phrases as he used to-night in regard to the rights of the Maritime provinces, I asked him this evening what his platform was and just what his demands amounted to on behalf of the provinces by the sea and he failed to give any answer. Well, I do not want to detain the House, but I must say that my hon. friend is hardly the type of man to go forward as the leader of the people of the Maritime provinces. I intimated to him the opinion which the Fredericton Gleaner had of him, and he replied that he had stopped endorsing notes for that paper. Naturally the inference was that when he did endorse notes for that strong Conservative journal it praised him. And the further necessary inference must be that he was obliged to endorse notes for some newspaper in order to secure some appreciation of himself.

Mr. DUFF: And the bank would not discount the notes.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): This leading Conservative organ in New Brunswick referred to the hon. member not long ago as one who had an unenviable reputation as a public man, and declared that he was viewed with a great deal of suspicion in that province. Yet this is the gentleman who comes here and upbraids other hon. members who have been fighting continuously in the direction they deemed wisest and most prudent in the interests of their part of the country. I say that we may naturally be expected to resent this ex-cathedra tone, this air of superior dignity which this wonderful gentleman assumes when he addresses the House and alternately chastises gentlemen who sit on his left and those in this part of the chamber who represent the Maritime provinces. I happen to have under my hand a report of the debates of the legislature of New Brunswick for the year 1919 and I find here the address which was given at that time by the then premier of the province, reciting the findings of a commission that had been appointed by the government. He makes this statement:

> Then we have ex-Attorney General Baxter found guilty of assisting W. Tennant to fabricate evidence for the purpose of misleading the court, a court duly constituted to hold the inquiry concerning the Valley Railway.

Mr. BAXTER: I was never found guilty by anyone of assisting any man to fabricate evidence.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I am reading from the official debates of the legislature of New Brunswick.

Mr. BAXTER: And I am speaking from my own personal knowledge.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): My hon. friend is suggesting that the report of the commissioner, which the then Premier of New Brunswick was quoting was incorrect. I am quoting from the official report of the debates of the legislature of that province and it mentions my hon. friend in that way.

[Mr. Macdonald (Pictou).]

I need not go into the findings in detail, but I may mention this further fact—

Mr. BAXTER: I object to this, Mr. Speaker, because any report which my hon. friend professes to quote from is that of a desperately partisan commissioner, a mere hack of the government of the day. But even he never found me guilty, either directly or indirectly, of suppressing any evidence.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I am quoting, as I have already said, from the speech of the Hon. Mr. Foster who at the time in question was Premier of the province of New Brunswick. He was reading from the report and he concluded—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member to consider whether or not he is within the rules of the House in discussing the personality of another hon. member, basing his remarks on a report which is not regularly before the House. I understand that the hon. member is reading from a report which is not regularly before the House.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I do not catch what you say, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: I was about to say that it is against the rules to quote from a report which is not regularly before the House, especially a report emanating from another legislature. At page 62 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms will be found the following under rule 19:

> 234. Besides the prohibitions contained in this rule, it has been sanctioned by usage both in England and in Canada that a member while speaking must not: (1) discuss messages or reports which are not regularly before the House.

Under those circumstances—

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Excuse me, Mr. Speaker, I am discussing this proposition: My hon. friend claims that he is the great exponent of the rights of the Maritime provinces, and throughout the country and in this House he has put forward certain views and asserted his leadership respecting the exposition of those rights. He has belaboured hon. gentlemen who sit in this House from other parts of the Maritime provinces for their laxity in defence of these rights, and has asserted that he alone is fulfilling his duty. I take the point, Mr. Speaker, that other members from the Maritime provinces and the people of those provinces will not follow the leadership of this gentleman, and I am showing the House why they will not.

Mr. SPEAKER: But I cannot as Speaker—

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Let me—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I cannot as Speaker allow the hon. member to assail the personality of a fellow-member by basing his charges on a report which is not regularly before the House. This report emanates from the provincial legislature of New Brunswick, if I mistake not, and the charges contained therein are specifically denied by the hon. member in question. Under the circumstances his denial must be accepted by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Your Honour rules that I cannot quote from a report made to the legislature of New Brunswick. But your Honour will rule that I may quote from the terms of a resolution passed by that legislature?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD: That resolution, after referring to my hon. friend, and certain other gentlemen whom I do not intend to name for the moment, proceeds as follows:

Resolved that in view of the evidence and the findings of the said commissioner—

Mr. BAXTER: Mr. Speaker, I submit that the resolution is no more in order than the report.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): (reading).

Resolved that in view of the evidence and the findings—

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The hon. member, whether he is reading from a report or whatever it may be, has given utterance to certain statements reflecting upon the hon. member for St. John. The hon. member for St. John from his place in the House has declared that the statement is not in accordance with the fact. I submit to you, Sir, that under the rules of the House the word of the hon. member for St. John must be accepted, no matter what the document may be that is being quoted or whether it is in order or not.

Mr. SPEAKER: That has been my ruling. I called upon the hon. gentleman not to assail the hon. member for St. John by basing his remarks on a report or a resolution, the charges contained in which are specifically denied by the hon. member assailed, I rule that according to Bourinot, page 336, reading from a document casting reflection on an hon. member is out of order.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, the question as to whether or not a resolution was passed in the legislature of New Brunswick calling upon my hon. friend to resign is a fact which I think I can mention. I was not reading from any report of a committee or a commissioner, but from a resolution passed by the legislature of New Brunswick, stating that the conduct of my hon. friend was derogatory to the proper tone of public life in that province, and asking him to resign his seat in the legislature.

Mr. BAXTER: It is not correct.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou) My hon. friend says it is not correct. I am not going into the findings of the commissioner. All I say is that in view of the fact that this is on record as part of the proceedings of the legislature of New Brunswick, it is about time that my hon. friend from St. John should cease lecturing hon. gentlemen in this House with an air of serene superiority and intense holiness, an air which he has adopted ever since he came to this House. He undertakes to lecture everybody who happens to disagree with him upon any subject. I submit that this conduct sits very badly upon a gentleman, the legislature of whose native province passed the resolution which I have referred to, which is on the records of that body, and which will remain there forever.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I quite realize that the hour is late, and in view of the fact that the budget has been so thoroughly debated I shall not take up any more time than I can possibly help in the few remarks I am about to offer.

In so far as the tariff reductions and the provisions dealing with the sales tax are concerned, I approve of the budget. But I would call the attention of the House and of the government to the fact that there are many other items in the tariff schedules that could very well have been reduced with great benefit to the consumers of this country. In view of the high cost of living I think the government might have gone a good deal further and made such reductions as would have increased the purchasing power of the people.

We have heard a good deal about the benefits of protection, but in my opinion there is no possibility of a protective tariff making for prosperity in this country. We must all realize this important fact, that the only way whereby wealth can be produced is by applying the machinery of production and labour to the development of our natural resources, and anything that stands in the way of such development will naturally reduce the amount of real wealth that otherwise would eventually be produced.

We have about four basic industries in this country, agriculture, fishing, mining and lumbering, and I would like to make this statement, which I believe is correct: Those industries that enjoy a high protective tariff must of necessity lean on those that receive practically no protection, and under those circumstances I do not see how the system of protection can be considered fair. I remember when I left the Old Country twenty-two years ago to come to Canada to take up farming I thought I was coming to a land of freedom, but after I had been farming two or three years and got hold of a little money to buy implements I realized the very important fact that I had sold my freedom when I came to this country because I had placed myself in a position where I was exploited by those who were in the privileged position of being able to exploit me through the tariff. As far as I am concerned I am absolutely against the principle of the protective tariff.

I would like to make reference to the speech that was made by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) in this House the other day. He turned to the hon. members in this corner of the House and told us what eastern Canada was proposing to do for western Canada so far as branch lines were concerned. He said that $28,000,000 would be spent in western Canada for branch line construction, and he tried to give the House the impression that eastern Canada was going to provide that money for these branch lines in western Canada. Now I would like emphatically to deny that eastern Canada will pay for these roads. We in western Canada produce to-day wealth, and to the extent that we produce wealth we produce credit, and it is upon the credit of western Canada that these lines will be built, and eventually we shall pay for them. Eastern Canada will not be called upon to pay one dollar for the construction of those branch lines. So when the hon. member for West Toronto makes the statement that eastern Canada is doing a lot for western Canada, I must take issue with him.

Our friends who believe in the protective tariff say that we should have a high tariff in this country to take care of the industries we have built up. In my opinion the fact of our having had a tariff in this country for the last forty-five or fifty years has had the effect of stultifying our basic industries. Not only that, but we are facing this situation: During the last ten or fifteen years we have found that practically every civilized country has become industrialized, and to-day we have not the markets that we had twenty or twenty-five years ago. That is a factor that must be taken into consideration when we are dealing with the tariff, because we must remember that the real wealth we produce must come from our mines, forests, fisheries and our fields.

There is a matter that I would like to bring before the House that perhaps might be of interest and possibly of some value. I hold in my hand the Canadian Congress Journal of April 1924. This journal deals with the productive power of labour employed in certain provinces of Canada. It also gives the average salaries and wages that are earned by those who are engaged in productive industry. In the province of Ontario, for instance, the net product per employee is $2,455 and the net average salary and wages $1,048; in other words, the producer who produces the wealth of this country receives only 43 cents for every dollar's worth of wealth he produces. In the province of Quebec the net product per employee is $2,290, and the average salary and wages $922, or an average of 45 cents of every dollar's worth of wealth produced. Taking Canada as a whole we find that the net product per employee is $2,416 and the average salaries and wages paid $1,010, which makes an average payment for salaries and labour of 42 cents for every dollar's worth of labour produced. That brings us to what I consider the most important question we have to face in this country, and that is the question of purchasing power. We have heard in this House on many occasions that this country is very rich in natural resources. That is quite true. We have also heard that we have splendid factories and machinery of production. We know we have a virile labour power, and with all these factors there is no reason why any man, woman or child in this country should be without the necessaries of life. The question appears to be not so much whether we shall have a high protective tariff or a tariff for revenue, as how can we distribute the goods that are produced to the people who require them? In other words, it is a question of distribution. I do not pretend to stand before this House to-night and offer any remedy for this situation, but it is a situation we have got to face, and I am satisfied we shall have to face it in the near future.

I cannot conceive that the people of Canada or any other nation in the world, when they have valuable natural resources, the machinery of production and the labour power that can produce all they require to sustain them without any great effort are going to quietly acquiesce in any kind of a policy that will deprive them of the very necessaries of life. That I believe, is the problem we shall have to solve, it is a question of distribution. I do not propose to follow the subject any further at the moment because, as I said before, the hour is very early.

I would like now to bring before the House the very important question of rural credits for our agricultural population, and in this I do not speak alone for the part of the country I represent, but for the agriculturists of all Canada. At the present time we have practically no proper system of agricultural credits. If we require short term loans we have to go to the bank and get one for sixty or ninety days at a high rate of interest. That is not satisfactory. When a farmer requires a short term loan, he wants it to run for nine or twelve months. Consequently, even our banking system is not capable of accommodating him with that class of loan, and in that respect our banks are failing to carry out the functions they are supposed to carry out. Our banking system is more applicable to other industries than to agriculture; it does not meet the needs of agriculture at all.

Then we require what we term intermediate credits—credits such as would be available for breaking up or clearing land, buying live stock, and so forth, loans that would run from one to four years. We also need another kind of loan running from say five to twenty years or longer, at the option of the farmer.

In so far as our mortgage loans are concerned at the present time we in western Canada can only get these loans from the regular mortgage companies. The terms for their money would run from 8 to 10 per cent, and the period for which they desire to loan is something like five to ten years.

In the first place I should like to call attention to the fact that our industries which receive the benefit of a protective tariff maintain that they are incapable of paying rates of interest higher than 6 per cent when they want extra capital for their business needs, notwithstanding the fact that they receive the benefit of a protective tariff. How then can you expect the farmers of this country—who have to bear in a large measure the burden of the protective tariff in force at the present time, and who have to compete in the markets of the world against all other countries—to pay 8, 9, 10, and sometimes 12 per cent for their money when the protected industries claim they can only pay about 6 per cent and that is their limit. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this question of rural credit is one of the most important questions this House will have to deal with. We took a great deal of evidence before the special committee appointed to look into agricultural conditions last year, and we found that in so far as rural credits were concerned the farmers were asking for money at reasonable rates of interest. The government sent a gentleman out as commissioner to look into this important question, and his report has been tabled here. I have gone over that report very carefully. The commissioner in his report admits the need of a different system of agricultural credit, but he does not suggest any method whereby this important question can be solved. To come to the crucial point of the whole question the matter of where we are going to get the money to provide these rural credits is the real issue we are up against at the present time. I am going to make a suggestion to-night as to a method whereby the money could be secured so as to enable rural associations formed for the purpose of giving agricultural credits to be financed properly through their provincial governments. I think the time is coming when we in Canada will demand that instead of the banks being allowed to issue their own notes we shall have a central bank operated by the government that will be responsible for the issuing of money. That I think is one of the most important things that will have to be looked into in the near future. I see no reason why this parliament should not assume the responsibility of issuing all the currency in Canada. Then the banks desiring to have money to do business with would put up their securities for the advances made to them by the central bank of issue. A somewhat similar arrangement is provided for at the present time under the Finance Act of 1914, but I believe that the time has come when the scope of the measure should be enlarged and that all money should be issued by this bank of issue on behalf of the people of Canada. If such a bank was formed and if all issues of money emanated from this bank, then I see no reason why, for example, the provincial governments should not have the same privilege as a bank—that is they should be allowed to take the provincial securities to the central bank of issue and get an issue of notes against securities that they would pledge with the bank for the redemption of the money. From the money so borrowed these provincial governments could finance agricultural credits in the various provinces. I merely make that suggestion to the House, but I trust the government will take some action in regard to it this year because it is important that we should have the question of rural credits settled at the very earliest opportunity. I would remind the House also of this very important fact: We are spending something like $3,000,000 a year to bring settlers to this country, and what are we going to do with them when we get them here? We have no method of financing those settlers if we desire to put them upon the land. Until we have some such system it is worse than useless to spend two, three, or four million dollars a year to bring in fresh settlers to settle upon the land, and our immigration policy is absolutely ridiculous.

There is another matter I should like to refer to for a moment and that is the port of Vancouver. Representing as I do an Alberta constituency the development of the port of Vancouver is a very important necessity to us. It is estimated that we will ship through the port of Vancouver this year something like 50,000,000 bushels of grain, and as time goes on the amount of grain passing through that port will become much larger. There will also be shipped through the port of Vancouver other commodities than grain, and therefore the development of that port is a matter of great concern to us at the present time. I understand that the Board of Harbour Commissioners have made requests to the government for sums of money for different development purposes. It was rumoured at one time that the amount was something like $18,000,000. Lately I have heard that the amount they are demanding is in the neighbourhood of $12,000,000. I do not know whether that is correct or not, but the government will doubtless bring down an estimate for a substantial vote of money for the development of the port of Vancouver. The reason I bring this question up to-night is this: While we would desire to see the port of Vancouver have all the facilities that are necessary for the proper carrying on of business at the present time, we are very anxious that there shall be no over-development at that particular point for the reason that if there is over-development at that port we are satisfied the grain passing through it will have to carry the big share of the burden.

I would refer hon. members to the report of the Montreal Harbour Board, and if they look up the financial statement of that board they will find that the grain passing through the port of Montreal is bearing the big bulk of the cost of that particular port, and I submit that the charges on grain are far too high in comparison with the service they are rendering. The same thing might become prevalent in the port of Vancouver. We as grain farmers are quite willing to pay our fair share of the charges of the port, but we are not willing to pay more than our fair share, and if there is an over-development at the port then we are satisfied that we will have to pay more than our fair share on the grain passing through that port. Another matter I would like to ask the government to take an interest in is with reference to the elevators at Vancouver. I submit with all seriousness that those elevators should be placed under the grain commission. We are not satisfied the elevators at the port of Vancouver should be wholly under the control of the harbour board. We believe the Board of Grain Commissioners is the proper authority to control these particular elevators, and I trust the government will take some action in the near future to see that these grain elevators are placed under the grain commission, and that the grain commission will have full authority over them, so far as their power goes. I would like the government to look into the matter of the port and the elevators at the port of Vancouver to see that the elevators are licensed under the Board of Grain Commissioners. If they are so licensed, then we have some control over them, but if they are not so licensed under that board, then we have practically to all intents and purposes very little control over their activities.

During the last session of this parliament a considerable sum of money was voted for an addition to the No. 1 elevator at Vancouver, and I trust the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Low), or the Minister of Public Works (Mr. King), whichever is the responsible official, will take cognizance of what I have to say on this particular matter. From a return we have received in this House we find that it has cost for that new construction on No. 1 elevator, 98 cents a bushel to build that elevator. In so far as the cost at the head of the lakes is concerned, it costs usually about 23 cents a bushel to provide storage capacity. Now when we find that at the port of Vancouver it costs 98 cents instead of about 23 cents, I think we are justified in asking the government why it is that there is such an excessive cost at the port of Vancouver, as compared with the cost at the head of the lakes. Possibly the government may say that it was necessary to push on this work and make haste; but even conceding that it was necessary to make haste, I submit that the cost is far too high. I find also from returns made to this House that there there were no tenders let for this particular additional work to this elevator. The Pacific Construction Company did the work on a cost plus basis. It is all right to have work done on a cost plus basis, provided the cost is within reason, but when you have work done on a cost plus basis where the actual amount of money spent is perhaps three times more than it should be, then we can begin to realize that the profit, even on a cost plus basis, to the construction company is far too excessive.

Another matter I would like to bring before the House is in relation to the port of Vancouver. You will have noticed in the press some months ago where some arrangement has been made with the harbour board to buy what was known as the Woodward elevator. I understand that the foundation had only been built for this elevator when Mr. Woodward died, and we find that the Board of Harbour Commissioners has bought this foundation, bought the property in fact; but what are they going to do with it? They are going to complete it at a probable cost of $650,000, and license it to a private company, and for what purpose? For the purpose of buying grain and possibly mixing it. Now, Mr. Speaker, we know something of what is taking place in private terminal elevators or mixing houses at the head of the lakes, and I am very sorry indeed that the harbour board has allowed a mixing elevator to operate at the port of Vancouver. We must remember that this mixing elevator is going to be paid for by public funds or public credit, and I submit that it is no function of the harbour board to buy elevators and turn them over to private interests, for the exploitation of these private interests. I am going to bring to the attention of the House information furnished by the Board of Grain Commissioners to the special committee on agriciultural conditions at the last session of parliament. This deals with the private terminal elevator companies or mixing houses at the head of the lakes, and I am going to give the House one example of what is happening there, so that the House and the government will realize why it is we object to the mixing houses being operated at Vancouver. On this side of the page are the different grades that go into the elevator. In this particular case there were 48 different grades that went into the elevator. In these other columns are the number of bushels of the different grades. One column represents the total number of bushels of the different grades that go into this elevator. Over on the other side at the far corner appear the different grades that were shipped out. As I stated a minute ago 48 different grades went into this elevator, but only five grades came out. The grades on this side run from No. 1 northern to tough feed. We have rejected—tough and no grade running down to rejected feed, which is a pretty poor sample of wheat.

I am giving the House an opportunity to realize the different classes of grain that went into the elevator. The grades shipped out were Nos. 1, 2 and 3, No. 4 dried and No. 4 heated. No. 5 and No. 6 special. Feed wheat and rejected feed—these grades have disappeared. Where do they go? They go into the higher grades. That is where these went. I would like to remind the House also of this important fact that when we farmers in western Canada ship a carload of grain we ship it usually through a commission house, and the commission merchants sell it for us When we get our bills back the first thing we find on our bills is the freight and the interest on the freight. The next thing we find on the bill of cost is the one cent commission for selling the grain, and the next item is the weighing and inspection charges. I have looked up the auditor's report and I have found that the farmers of western Canada, pay all the salaries, the charges of both the weighing and inspection departments and when we pay their salaries, they should be to all extents and purposes our servants. But what happens? When our servants grade our grain, these are the grades they give to us. But when they grade it out of the private mixing houses these others are the grades they give to the terminal elevator companies, although we are paying the salaries.

In one column there is shown the total number of bushels shipped in, and in another column is shown the total number of bushels shipped out. I will give the figures to the House so that they will begin to realize our objection to this particular project that is going on in Vancouver. The total number of bushels of all grades of grain shipped in amounted to 704,283 bushels, 50 pounds. The total number of bushels shipped out was 831,000, or 126,716 bushels, 10 pounds more were shipped out than were shipped in. The quantity of wheat the farmer gets paid for when he ships his wheat in is 704,283 bushels 50 pounds, but when that company ship out their wheat, they get paid for 831,000 bushels. I have brought this particular return before the House in order to emphasize to the government the reason why we object to this Woodward elevator being turned over as a mixing house to private interests at the expense of this country.

Perhaps I might give a little further information with regard to the situation at Vancouver as regards the harbour board. They have had engaged there as superintendent of the harbour board elevator Mr. Colin McLean. Mr. McLean was employed by this very same company at the head of the lakes, the return in regard to which company I have read. I understand that Mr. McLean has recently handed in his resignation to the Vancouver Harbour Board, but that the royal commission is going out there to make some inquiries and he has agreed to withhold his resignation until such time as that commission visits Vancouver, takes the evidence and makes its report.

Mr. STEVENS: I am sure the hon. gentleman would not choose to injure unjustifiably Mr. McLean's reputation as regards his record in Vancouver. It is only fair to state—and I am sure my hon. friend will permit me to state this—that Mr. McLean's record during his residence in Vancouver is absolutely clear from any charges or suggestion that his administration has been in any respect faulty.

Mr. GARDINER: I thank the hon. gentleman for the information, but we will proceed a little further and see how the information that he has given to the House coincides with the information that I have received. Mr. McLean, as I stated, was connected with this Davidson Smith Elevator Company at Port Arthur; Mr. McLean is now manager of the elevator at Vancouver. The Pacific Construction Company is a company that was formed very recently for the purpose of building elevators at the port of Vancouver. Mr. Davidson, who was one of the partners of this private terminal elevator, is president of the Pacific Construction Company. He is president of the company which made the addition to the present elevator last year at 98 cents a bushel capacity, whereas at the head of the lakes it cost 23 cents a bushel. There may be some connection in that way. With regard to the explanation of the hon. member for Centre Vancouver (Mr. Stevens), I would just remind the House of this important matter in connection with the operation of the Vancouver elevator under Mr. McLean. Hon. members will remember that, during last winter, Mr. Maharg, a former member of this House, made the statement that there was a certain spout in the Vancouver elevator in such a position as to make grain shippers feel that all was not well. This particular spout was right under the spout that grain comes in through.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Does my hon. friend think it is quite fair to go into the history of this spout and at this time to repeat and to follow the gossip that has been used throughout the prairies, knowing that a commission is going to investigate this matter and report upon it within a few days in Vancouver?

Mr. GARDINER: Under those circumstances, I will say just this, that instead of one spout being found in that elevator there were four that should not have been there. In view of the representations made by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. King) I will not deal with that matter any more, other than to call the attention of the government to this very important fact, that in all these terminal elevators, we usually have overages, but so far as I am aware no overages have been published with this particular elevator. Whether there were any overages or not, I do not know, but I would suggest that the government look into that particular matter. This Woodward elevator is going to be used as a mixing elevator, and we protest just as strongly as we possibly can against the public money or credit of this country being used to allow persons to go into this character of business. It should be no function of the harbour board nor of the government to finance a corporation that will go into this particular class of grain handling.

I want to say just a word in regard to the amendment and then I have finished. I propose to vote for the amendment because it represents the platform upon which I was elected, and I am not going to vote against my convictions or against the platform upon which I sought the suffrage of the people. It is usual I believe in this House that when an hon. member votes for an amendment against the budget, the government look upon that vote as a vote of want of confidence in the government. Personally, if the government feel that way about the matter, then I cannot help it. That is their business. I do not propose to be tied down by precedent. I am here as an independent member of this House, and I propose to retain my independence as long as I am a member of this House.

Mr. JOHN MORRISON (Weyburn): I have noticed that since ten o'clock last night when each succeeding speaker has risen he has apologetically explained to the House that it was not his intention to speak for any great length of time. I observed also that when the preceding speaker intimated that he was about to close, there was some elation on the part of hon. members. I am not going to say that I intend to cut my remarks short, simply because it is five o'clock in the morning. I consider that it is an injustice to the members of this House that they should have been kept here all night.

An hon. MEMBER: Cut it out.

Mr. MORRISON: No, I am not going to cut it out; I am going to tell you just what I think. We western members and those who come from the Maritime provinces are obliged to stay here for five months never having a chance to get home once; yet, for the accommodation of those who live nearby in Quebec and Ontario, because they are anxious to get home every week end, we are kept here all this night. I am going to take all the time I want and I make the statement without any hesitation.

Now, much has been said about the reductions in the tariff ruining the manufacturers, and I am going to give you a little enlightenment on just how it will ruin them, particularly our farm implement makers, about whom we hear so much. Since last session, I had the privilege of interviewing the managers of two of the largest farm implement concerns in Canada, and I discussed matters with them. I asked one of them whether he patronized home industries himself, by buying his raw materials in Canada and he said he did not. I wanted to know why, and he pointed out to me that he was a winner by buying his raw materials abroad. He explained that when he bought his steel in the United States, the price of the steel, plus the duty, equalled the price he was charged by the home steel producer, and if he got this steel at home he received no rebate. On buying his raw materials abroad, however, he got a rebate of 99 per cent, which, to use his words, was all "velvet" to him. He could not therefore afford to patronize the Canadian steel industry, which we have bonused to the extent of $17,000,000. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) almost wept—

Mr. MARLER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MORRISON: You prick up your ears now, I see. Come a little closer and you will hear it all. The hon. member was feeling very badly about the condition of the interdependent industries; according to him, the farm implement manufacturers were going to be put out of business by the reductions in the tariff. By this system of rebates, which has formed a part of the customs tariff law, there has been a real incentive, a real inducement to the manufacturers to go abroad for their raw materials, instead of patronizing the home industries. It is not among the pet theories of these manufacturers to favour investigations into the tariff in the interests of the workers. They have not been lying awake at night considering the working men in the coal mines, in the steel industries, or in the National railways. They forget all about that; they ignore co-operation and the part that it ought to play in these industries. After speaking for some time with this gentleman to whom I have referred, I said to him: "After all, my friend, don't you think it is a miserable arrangement to build up the industries of the country by this tariff route and bonus route?" He said in reply: "Between you and me, Mr. Morrison, I think it is."

Mr. MARLER: Is the hon. member repeating something that I said?

Mr. MORRISON: Does my hon. friend not understand English?

Mr. MARLER: I thought I did, but for the moment I am not positive.

Mr. MORRISON: That is your fault, not mine. We have bonused the steel industries to the extent of about $17,000,000, and, according to some, the object has been to provide employment for the working man, others say that we have done it so that we should not be dependent on other countries for our raw materials; and hon. gentlemen to my right are of the opinion that it is necessary in order to build up a well-rounded Canada and have a home market. In looking into this matter I was surprised to learn that there was a rebate not only in respect of the raw material imported for conversion into exportable products but also in regard to many domestic sales. I have here the Customs Tariff Act giving a list of the things on which there is a rebate. On page 223 I find that there is a drawback of the customs duty allowed, under the Act of 1914, not exceeding 99 per cent of the duty that may be paid through the Department of Customs on pig iron used by the manufacturers of mowing machines, reapers, harvesters, binders or attachments for binders, in the manufacture of these and other goods for consumption in Canada. So that this new arrangement, by reducing the tariff on implements and taking off the duty on raw materials, is going to tend to the patronising of home industries by the manufacturers. It has been a real improvement. We have paid $17,000,000 to bonus steel plants in Canada. The British American Steel Corporation officials were the ringleaders in our Great Lakes Shippers' Combine that made things so interesting last autumn in shipping circles on the Great Lakes, thwarting and defying this government's regulations over shipping, and thereby charging excessive rates on grain. My observation leads me to the conclusion that it is about as logical for us to try to enrich Canada by the bonus and the tariff route as it is for a man to go on a prolonged drunk to overcome his financial difficulties. The last end of such a one is worse than the first. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) said that about $8 from each Ontario and Quebec farmer and $15 from each western farmer was not very much, but would save the great implement manufacturers of Canada.

Mr. MARLER: I never made any such statement in this House.

Mr. MORRISON: You made that statement right from where you are sitting.

Mr. MARLER: I made no such statement. I said that these munificent gains which are going to bring prosperity to the West—the hon. gentleman included, I suppose—all these small gains in the aggregate constituted a large loss for the manufacturers of implements. That is what I said, and it is quite correct, I doubt if my hon. friend at this time in the morning can analyze the statement.

Mr. MORRISON: I have noticed in this House that good, oily lawyers can make an average layman think he said something and when criticized turn around and prove he did not say it. The member for West Hamilton (Mr. Stewart) placed the figure at about $10. The right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) when speaking of these protected industries being in great danger instanced a glassworks in Hamilton, and said that for the sake of $3 extra on a $5,000 house this industry was put in jeopardy—all along the same line. In my estimation it would be about as logical to reason like this: Eight or ten dollars apiece from the head of each family in Canada would not hurt anyone much and in the aggregate would amount to about $275,000; for each high protectionist annually give this to the high-protectionist in this House, they could do an awful lot of good with the money. The right hon. leader of the opposition said that some industries have gone broke for lack of money One big and influential organization went on the rocks in 1921—not because they did not have lots of money, but because something else was not right in line with the ideals of the voting populace of this country.

The slaughtering of goods, or dumping, is another complaint of our protectionists. But our own manufacturers practise the same methods abroad. For instance, they often sell flour abroad much cheaper than at home. Within the last twelve months I ran across a Swede in my constituency who had been away from Sweden for sixteen years. He went back three years ago and thought he would take his folks a treat from Canada by taking them a bag of Lake of the Woods Five Roses flour. He said when he left his homeland his people had been using dark bread made of rye flour, and the only time they were able to use white bread was at Christmas. Imagine how delighted he was when he reached his little native town, four hundred miles inland, and found that the local flour and feed man was selling Lake of the Woods Five Roses flour at just 50 cents a bag cheaper than it was selling for in Saskatchewan. Last year one of my neighbours went home to the Old Country and found cured meats were being sold much cheaper than they could be obtained in Western Canada or even right in Toronto. Two or three days ago the member for Saltcoats (Mr. Sales) and myself went to the reading room and taking the Manchester Guardian and the Toronto Mail and Empire, we figured out prices. Here is what we found:

Wholesale Prices, May 1st

	Liverpool Per lb.	Toronto Per lb.
Canadian Wiltshire sides.. ..	13¼ cents	18½ cents
Hams..	16½ "	23 to 24 "

Ours is one of the most expensive countries in the world to live in and produce. Manufacturers in Toronto and Montreal profess wonder why they cannot compete with the manufacturers of other countries. It does not matter what wages a man gets, if you give him $10 a day and take away $9.90 for a bare living, he is not getting much for his labour. No wonder the British manufacturer can put up pretty stiff competition in this country. His employees can buy the necessaries of life much cheaper than the employees of the Canadian manufacturer right here where we grow the food.

Some of the preceding speakers have said: Oh yes, the farm implement manufacturers are going on the rocks sure; look how the manufacturers of tractors have been closed up. The facts are these. We started using gasoline tractors pretty freely when the war was on because of the scarcity of men and horses and the high price of oats, $1.40 a bushel. To-day with oats at 25 to 30 cents a bushel and good work horses at from $25 up to $70 apiece—recently ten good work horses were sold at a sheriff's sale for $210 all told—the farmers have found it is much cheaper to discard gasoline power and go back to the old horse power. That is why the tractor manufacturer is on the rocks—his market is gone.

Western Canada is also suffering very much from excessive freight rates. Transportation charges are one of our big problems in the West. Being an inland people, it is vital that equity be dealt out to all classes in the West, to carriers as well as to producers of freight. There are many inequalities in our freight rates, and this will be apparent when I inform the House that the domestic rate on wheat per ton mile is exactly double from Calgary to Vancouver what it is from Calgary to Winnipeg. It is impossible to find the original foundation on which this rate structure was built. The domestic rate is 41½ cents per 100 pounds, and the export rate 22½ cents per 100 pounds—just 19 cents more from Calgary to Vancouver than from Calgary to Winnipeg. The farmer in the Fraser River valley who wants to buy prairie grain is not getting a fifty-fifty chance with the people in China or Japan; they can buy wheat grown in Alberta or Saskatchewan much cheaper than British Columbia people can. These rates were established many years ago when very little grain or grain products moved West, but over fifty million bushels of our 1923 crop will ship through Vancouver. Surely a readjustment of these rates is overdue, now that Vancouver has such a large volume of this traffic. Lack of volume or lack of density of traffic, is a well-worn reason why shipping rates remain high on the western haul. It is high time there was a readjustment. Of the 1922 crop approximately 20,000 cars of grain were exported from Vancouver and 2,000 cars bought for domestic use in British Columbia, or about one-tenth. If it is profitable, and unquestionably it is, to haul 20,000 cars at the rate of 22½ cents per 100 pounds for export, by what process of reasoning can a rate of 41½ cents be justified on the 2,000 cars of grain needed by Canadians in British Columbia? This is just another illustration of a large Canadian corporation that received grants and bonuses from the public treasury giving people of other countries a better bargain, a cheaper service, than they give Canadians. By the end of the current crop year we will have shipped around 40,000 cars of export grain via Vancouver at the 22½ cent rate, and still British Columbia people are held up for 41½ cents. This makes living out there more expensive, as much grain is purchased for feeding milk cows, poultry, hogs and horses; in fact, those exorbitant freight rates make possible importation of grain from other countries to British Columbia, with lower rates than we get to them. There is no protection afforded our home industry, not even a fifty-fifty deal with the foreigner, but a decided handicap is imposed on the contrary.

It has always been stated by the defenders of this export and domestic rate, that all other parts of Canada were treated alike, and they all had two rates. This is not so. There is no domestic rate from Calgary to Port Arthur, for instance. The only rate in force, so far as I can ascertain, from Calgary to Winnipeg, 833 miles is 26 cents and as this is the same as from Calgary to Port Arthur, 1,256 miles, it might be considered a domestic rate, Winnipeg not being an export point, while Port Arthur is, and consequently presumably entitled to a lower rate per mile. Winnipeg takes a 26 cent rate for 833 miles, and Vancouver pays 41½ cents for 640 miles, or just double the rate per ton mile, 13 cents per ton mile to Vancouver, and 6½ cents to Winnipeg.

This unjust tax costs the members of the Poultry-men's Union, in the Fraser River valley, a co-operative egg selling association, $75,000 a year. It costs one municipality alone, between the dairymen and the poultrymen from $40,000 to $175,000 a year. These figures are only approximate, but they are not very far out.

When Ontario wanted cheap coal from Alberta, there was no difficulty in Ontario's voice being heard, with the result that a low rate of 35 cents per 100 was experimentally put into effect. The distance from Calgary to Ontario is approximately three times the distance from Calgary to Vancouver. It costs no more to haul wheat than to haul coal; the loading and unloading in neither case is done by the railway; it is simply a case of mileage. If Ontario paid the same rate on coal that British Columbia pays on grain, the rate on coal would be $1.25 per 100, instead of 35 cents, or if we paid on grain the same rate that they paid on coal, we should ship our wheat on a 12 cent rate, instead of a 41½ cent rate.

It may be argued, however, that this 35 cent rate has been withdrawn, which I believe is the case. Let us take then the regular rate, which is $12.85 per ton, or say 64 cents per 100. Then if we had the same rate on wheat for one-third the distance we should only pay 21½ cents instead of 41½ cents, or if they had our rate then they would pay $1.25 instead of 64 cents, and this 64 cents on coal, remember, is a domestic rate, not an export rate.

A few other discrepancies might be quoted to show the chaotic condition of this freight rate question. Sugar from Vancouver to Calgary, 640 miles, costs 98 cents per hundred; to haul it to Winnipeg, an additional 833 miles, only costs 62 cents. Tea costs from Vancouver to Calgary $1.50 per hundred, and to haul it an additional 1,256 miles to Fort William costs exactly nothing; in other words, the rate is the same to either point 1,256 miles apart. Grain from Calgary to Winnipeg, 833 miles costs 26 cents; Winnipeg to Port Arthur, 423 miles, costs nothing. Is it any wonder that the people in St. John say that if wheat can be taken from Winnipeg to Port Arthur for nothing, why not Montreal to St. John, which is only 480 miles.

The domestic rate on tea from Vancouver to Calgary in carload lots is $1.45, and the domestic rate from Vancouver to Winnipeg, $2.51. To Winnipeg the import rate is $1.50 in carload lots, the same to Fort William, Brandon, Edmonton, Weyburn, Regina, Moose Jaw. In less than carload lots the rate is $2.

There has been a lot said in this debate about the uncertainty the manufacturers are in if the tariff is taken off; they do not know what to do, it is said. But I wonder how much certainty the farmer who produces the grain and live stock in this country has? Who guarantees him an income? Who guarantees him a reasonable price? Who guarantees him a reasonable return for his labour? The farmer is up against weather conditions and other uncontrollable factors, but we do not lie down and whine and ask that somebody else be taxed to keep us alive and in the game. The railways through the Railway Commission have their dividends guaranteed, the same applies to the Bell Telephone Company. It is guaranteed eight per cent, and its stock has gone up to 127½ and was up to 128 yesterday. We have no dividends guaranteed to the farmers. I do not believe in guaranteeing any man's investment in this country. Every time you guarantee a man's investment you are creating a contingent liability on the credit of the other fellow. The manufacturers say that this uncertainty is killing the industry. I say it is not, and we propose to kill that heresy.

My right hon. friend, the leader of the opposition charged the government with bringing irrelevant issues into the campaign. Well, some of us fellows have the idea that members of his party did the same thing out in the West, but we are not making much complaint about it. He also said that unity in Canada was essential, and in that I entirely agree with him. Urban and rural, east and west, manufacturer and farmer, we are all solid for that doctrine. I asked the right hon. gentleman to-night if he preached that doctrine in Montreal and Toronto, he said that he did. Now all through our debates in this House the right hon. gentleman has been trying to hang every slip and every defection from the party opposite on to the Prime Minister himself. He holds him responsible not only for his ministers, but for all the members of his party. It is therefore only fair that he should accept the same responsibility for his own following, and if there is one thing that we need in this country it is harmony. Now I would say to the right hon. leader of the opposition that one member of his party, the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken), through his work is doing as much to spread dissension and distrust in this country as anyone I can think of. There is nothing to be gained by that sort of thing, and the Conservative party can never work themselves into public favour by adopting such tactics. I refer to some of the work that the hon. member for west Toronto does in the Orange Sentinel. We read in the Scriptures: "Whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report, ... think on these things." I do not see very much of that kind of thing being reported or discussed in the Orange Sentinel.

It is time that sort of stuff was dropped. While I am a member of the same church as the hon. member for West Toronto I never feel proud of the fact when I look at the Orange Sentinel, which is not very often. If we want unity we must first establish a desire for it in the hearts of men. There is something of more value than making money in this country and that is that men may think rightly toward one another. The methods of my hon. friend (Mr. Hocken) are not helping towards that end but having the very opposite effect.

In regard to the budget while it has not gone as far as some of us would like, especially in certain lines, yet it is a step in the right direction and I am going to support it.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I have no apologies to make for addressing the House at this late or rather at this early hour. We have sat here for some weeks discussing the budget, and as a previous speaker mentioned the House has adjourned on some occasions at 10.40 p.m. At other times hon. members have spoken for four hours, or pretty nearly that length of time. Now we are told that the budget is to be voted on to-day. It was really supposed to be yesterday I think. Mr. Speaker, I wish to protest against the arbitrary rulings of the whips. The day is past when whip rule is satisfactory, at least to those of us who are in a sense independent—independent so far as party politics and political parties are concerned. I am informed there is no hope of adjourning the House, and continuing this debate over Friday, because of the inconvenience it would cause to the members from Quebec and some from Ontario, and the same reason holds good as regards Monday. Therefore the debate cannot continue until Tuesday and we must go on to-night. Well, I am going on to-night.

Some hon. MEMBERS: This is morning.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): True this is morning. I say this with regret but not with apologies.

It is quite clear to me, indeed abundantly clear, that the surplus of $30,400,000 claimed by the government does not exist. I have listened to the debate from both sides of the House on this matter and the only excuse, or explanation, I have heard from the government side has been "but they did it also," referring to the Conservative party. In the budget statement we find an allowance of only $23,781,000 for the deficit on the railways, whereas according to a return made to the House, I think secured by the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), the total deficit for the calendar year was $44,962,760. Now, if we make an allowance for a possible increase—as a matter of fact there really was an increase in operating revenues over the expenditure for the months of January, February and March—we can estimate—indeed I made an estimate some weeks ago and fairly accurately—that the total deficit for the fiscal year will have been in the neighbourhood of $41,500,000, or $18,719,000 greater than the amount allowed by the Acting Minister of Finance. This obviously reduces the surplus, and the actual reduction in the national debt will then be $11,700,000 of which $8,199,000 is admitted to be a payment on an amount due by the Imperial government. What had happened in this case apparently was that the government had paid out in net cash to the railways the amount of $23,781,000 allowed by the Acting Minister of Finance, but in addition they paid out the balance of the deficit of $41,500,000 odd from the loan of $50,000,000. Now, I regard that loan as just as much a part of the liabilities of this country as any other item of the national debt. The government, in my opinion, would be well advised to take into consideration the necessity for altering the present accounting methods so that when the annual statement is laid before the country the man in the street, the ordinary business man, could appreciate at a glance exactly what was the financial condition of the Dominion.

I now come to the tariff changes. These I do not intend to discuss in detail. I simply wish to refer to the extraordinary gloom that arose, surrounded, depressed and still rests upon hon. members to my right and the horrible picture which they painted of ruined cities, destroyed industries, and a destitute and impoverished Canada. Well, that picture gave me the creeps. After all who is hurt? Has anybody been hurt yet? May I suggest to my hon. friends to my right that they might have taken into consideration the solicitude with which hon. gentlemen opposite take care that the interests of the manufacturer shall not be hurt. First by a free entry of pig iron, bar iron, and bar steel; secondly by the reduction of 7½ per cent under all tariffs of materials which enter into the cost of those articles upon which the duty has been reduced in the budget; thirdly the drawback of 99 per cent on all materials and parts on hand which were imported prior to the date of reduction; fourthly exemption from the sales tax of materials to be used in the manufacture of agricultural implements, as well as of goods consumed in the process of manufacture. On April 30, we find additional advantages brought down. The duty is reduced, or entirely wiped out, on such other articles as enter into steel and iron production. We find free entry of wood handles or stems for shovels, and on a recent date still further advantages were given to manufacturers. All this to the end that those who advocate protection may be saved from its effects. But a further precaution was taken before the budget was even brought down, the precaution of removing the 5 per cent margin that existed between the fair market value of imported goods and the invoice price. It is true that regulation was suspended and then the suspension was suspended but I would call the attention of those who are enemies of protection and the friends of freer trade to the fact that the suspension is only a suspension—it is not a removal. If this situation is not definitely cleared by the words of the Acting Minister of Finance when he closes this debate I doubt very much whether I would be justified in supporting the budget.

A body we are told is to be appointed to investigate the matter of taxation and advise this government. If that body is to be in the nature of a permanent tariff commission I want to register my grave suspicion of it. As a result of the reliefs which I have mentioned it is fair to state that the reductions made in the duty on agricultural implements have been offset entirely, and I am satisfied that were agriculture in even a reasonable condition of prosperity not only would the profit making policy of the implement manufacturers not be damaged but it would be enhanced by the action of the government.

In this connection it may be interesting to again quote—I admit it has been quoted before, but it proves my point—the letter of the Massey-Harris people who make this very clear. It reads:

> The provisions of the budget which exempt farm implements from the sales tax are most welcome, and these, combined with the lowering of customs duties on raw materials announced in the government's amendments, now enable the manufacturer to make an immediate reduction in his prices. So far as the Massey-Harris Company is concerned (and no doubt this applies to other implement companies) there will be passed on to the farmer in the way of reduced prices the complete saving effected in the remission of the sales tax and the lessened duties on raw material.

I have a further extract if necessary in support of the position taken by the implement manufacturers. Colonel J. B. Maclean is no free trader. On the contrary he has been guilty of writing articles of the most extravagantly protectionist character; yet in the Montreal Herald of May 14, appeared the following:

> Col. J. B. Maclean, who as a publisher of trade papers naturally represents the views of manufacturers of this country, evidently sees no cause for the alarm of some of the Tory politicians at the Robb budget, for one of his journals, the Financial Post, says: "The old adage that 'an old tax is no tax' applies very aptly to the present tariff situation. There is little possibility that any of our industries will be wiped out or even seriously handicapped—statements by leaders in the steel, motor and implement industries are less disquieting as the facts are faced. Looking at the business situation throughout the country as a whole there seems to be little justification for the degree of pessimism which has existed in some sections during the past weeks."

So that the manufacturers are not hurt. Unfortunately, however, we find that the chief basic industry is still in a serious position. It is loaded down with a heavy accumulation of debt, and we are attempting to pay upon those debts interest rates at 8 per cent, 9 per cent and in many cases 10 per cent. At the same time a tremendous disparity exists between the prices we receive for the goods we produce, and the prices we pay for the manufactured goods which are necessary for the maintenance of the farm, the farmer and his family. The result obviously is either a seriously curtailed or wholly destroyed purchasing power. I could give this House many examples—if it were not so early in the day, of the methods the farmer is employing to meet the situation. He is doing without implements, he is borrowing them from his neighbour, or loaning them to his neighbour, or he is patching up the worn-out implements. I think the action of the government in this matter was not brought in any too soon, but was delayed too long. We find that organizations of farmers in Western Canada are now banding themselves together to pledge each other not to purchase any implements so long as prices continue high. I read the following extract from a report of a Farmers' meeting:

> PROTEST AGAINST MACHINERY PRICES
> Nakamun local recently passed a resolution protesting against the continued rise in price of agricultural machinery, and pledging their members to "desist from purchasing any more new implements, and that in the interests of economy, and with the spirit of mutual aid and co-operation, we make our present outfits serve our purposes, and agree to assist our neighbours wherever a lack of proper machinery is observed.

The inevitable result of that situation, the lack of purchasing power, and the revolt on the part of the farmers against prices has been a tremendous falling off in manufacturers' sales. The proof that this is so may be found on page 529 of the Canada Year Book. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is exceedingly difficult for a private member of this House, and an individual not entirely friendly to the manufacturing interests of this country, so far as protection is concerned—always friendly to them in every other respect—to secure accurate information from these men as to the amount of their sales in this country; so that I cannot produce definite figures with regard to actual sales of farm implements in Canada, but I think it is fair to take the figures given in the Canada Year Book for the imports of agricultural machinery as reflecting the purchasing power of the farmer as regards the not only foreign product but the home product also.

I find that in the year 1921 the total imports of agricultural machinery from all countries into Canada was $24,458,000 worth. In 1922 it had dropped to $7,718,000. In 1923 there is a slight increase, the amount being $8,423,000. However, it should be remembered that during that last year there was a rapid rise in the price of agricultural implements; so that the $8,000,000 purchased less machinery in 1923 than the $7,000,000 in 1922. That I think conclusively shows that the sales have been reduced by two-thirds as compared with 1921, the reason being that the purchasing power of those who consume the goods was gone. But were the manufacturers on the other hand, piling up implements? Were they manufacturing? If we turn to page 525 of the Canada Year Book we will find that the iron ore importation had dropped between the years 1921 and 1923 from nearly 2,000,000 tons to just over 1,000,000 tons, or had been cut in half. Again we find that in pig, ingots, blooms and billets the value of imports was $4,638,987 in 1921, and $2,277,435 in 1923. In scrap iron or steel the amount in 1921 was $2,419,000 and in 1923 the amount was $242,632. Then there was $6,790,520 worth of castings and forgings in 1922, and $3,304,595 worth in 1923; and so the figures continue until we reach the total. The total imports of the raw product of the implement manufacturer for 1922 was $70,056,650, and in 1923 it was only $36,573,581. There had been more than a 50 per cent reduction in the activity of the agricultural implements industry. In short, we may assume that, even before the Robb budget was brought down, the implement manufacturing industry of Canada was in a half dying condition.

It must be clear that a reduction in the duty on agricultural implements can be reflected in the saving to the farmers in this country only if the reduction is passed back to the farmer in reduced prices, and if the farmer is able to purchase the implements. These are the two conditions, and these alone upon which the saving can be returned to the farmer. And so, Mr. Speaker having shown that the purchasing power is gone or practically so, then in spite of the enthusiasm with which the Minister of the Interior assured us of the benefits to agriculture of this budget—and I quote his words:

> That this budget has succeeded in extending the most clear cut and practical recognition of the needs of those immense new agricultural and commercial interests which have arisen in western Canada.

I must most regretfully express it as my opinion that, because of the lack of purchasing power, even should the saving be passed back to him, the amount would be so very small that the effect of this budget in remedying the condition in agriculture would be pitifully inadequate. I do not, however—let it be clearly understood—decry the timid step taken towards freer trade. I am glad that step was taken, but I do most earnestly point out that all the exaggerated claims of hon. members opposite cannot and will not be fulfilled while agriculture is in its present condition. The most urgent need of the moment is not a reduction of the duties on agricultural implements. That was one way in which to help slightly, but the most urgent need at the moment is some system of agricultural credits which will relieve the farmer of the great pyramid of debt which is now bearing down upon agriculture in this country, a system which would release our basic industry from at least a part of the huge interest charges that she is at this time attempting to carry.

Some hon. members think that the immense crop of Alberta this year has solved all our difficulties. May I give to the House the opinion of a banker in this connection? I asked him last winter what was the actual reflection of the crop on the financial position of the farmer. He answered that as regards current loans, they had been paid up, and that we were in that respect better off than in the previous year. I asked him then with regard to the pile of debt upon our shoulders, and that banker stated that at the most we had removed between 18 and 20 per cent of it. Let me remind hon. members that the crop of 1923 in my province was three times the size of the crop of the previous year and twice the size of any normal crop; yet it had the effect of removing only between 18 and 20 per cent of the debt on our shoulders and leaving 80 per cent carrying a rate of interest of from 8 to 10 per cent. No, the bulk of our debt is still there. Years of ceaseless and heartbreaking toil and bondage to the mortgage companies and the banks face us unless the government takes immediate action.

Let me turn for a moment to Saskatchewan. The premier of that province, Mr. Dunning, in his budget speech, called the attention of the people to the fact that the total proceeds from agricultural products of 1922 was $232,524,300, but in 1923 with, let me remind hon. gentlemen again, a much larger crop, the total proceeds were only $171,556,750, or a loss of $60,967,550 over this previous year's income. No province of the size of Saskatchewan with a population of 750,000 or so can afford to lose in one year nearly $61,000,000 worth of purchasing power and not have that lack reflected in loss to the eastern manufacturers. Does this show agriculture to be on the up grade? Is this what our professional optimists call "turning the corner," towards prosperity? Let us not forever try to fool ourselves and other people. Let me make this very clear: There is nothing wrong with this country. We have the most fertile soil probably in the world. We can raise in my province crops of a quantity and quality unequalled anywhere else in the world. I have never heard of their like. We have mineral resources beyond those of any other province in this country. We have live stock that walk off with the Chicago awards year after year. We win your dairy prizes at the Chicago fair every year. We won first prize for wheat for the world this year. We won first prize for oats. The barley king of the world lives at Claresholm, Alberta. There is nothing wrong with the country. What is wrong is that I see my people there digging in year after year in a well nigh hopeless effort to overcome the handicaps placed upon their industry by the crass stupidity and greed of their fellow men. I have been called a pessimist for uttering truths that have never been successfully contradicted, for picturing conditions that must, in Canada's own interest, be remedied, for saying things that if whispered on the roaring front pages of a Montreal newspaper or ripped down the columns of a Toronto magazine, would be called courageous publicity, or if uttered by a lieutenant governor of a province, would be called "frankly facing the facts." Let me, however, tell hon. members that at every meeting at which I have spoken during the last recess—and I addressed forty-five of them—I made one appeal consistently, that my fellow farmers at that meeting should stay in this country and fight it out with us here; that nothing would be gained by leaving this country and going to the United States or anywhere else. We want to keep them here, but we want a policy that will keep them here. These men are encouraged to know that even though our efforts are largely nullified by the attitude of opposing interests, they at least have representatives who are pleading their cause without fear of party or of press, and who will not be silent while injustice still stands.

I intend to go on fighting for my people telling the truth about conditions in Canada and no mere name-slinging politician or journalist will intimidate me, nor cause me to slacken in that attack. I appeal to this government to recognize the condition of the West where high prices and high interest rates are destroying the people and driving them from us, and to recognize that they must do something more effective than merely tickling the tariff. They must tackle it and tackle it courageously. I intend to support the amendment because it represents the principles upon which I appealed to the electorate and upon which I was elected. The timid and ineffective nature of the tariff changes themselves do not inspire me nor fill me with expectation. Let it, however, be understood that so far as they have gone, they are, in my opinion, a step in the right direction.

[Mr. E. J. Garland.]

While I am on that question, may I refer for a moment to the very able and eloquent speech of the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey)? In referring to the amendment, he quoted the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) and congratulated him on having become a convert to tariff reform. He attributed the conversion to the fact that the hon. member sat beside the genial and always friendly hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster). He quoted from the speeches of the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg of 1923, words which would lead one to believe that the hon. member thought that the tariff was but of significant character and that tariff was but of insignificant character and that he had changed his stand thereon.

What the hon. member said—and I quote the words quoted by the hon. member for Springfield—was:

> I would, however, like to point out that in the opinion of the group which I represent the mere bringing about of a larger measure of free trade does not really touch the root of the trouble to-day.

Had the hon. member for Springfield only taken the trouble to look at the speech of the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg of this year he would have found the following two passages:

> Might I suggest that all which was in that article prophesied as likely to happen if protection were abolished has actually happened within the last few years. A good deal of it would have happened even under free trade. The fact is we must get down below either protection or free trade to some more fundamental policy if we would meet the needs of the present hour.

And again:

> My last point in the analysis of the situation which I made was the necessity of basing our foreign trade policy and international relations on a clear recognition that the world has become an economic unit in which the welfare of each nation is dependent upon the welfare of all others. I venture to say that the movements which are going on in south-eastern Europe to-day, the proposals which are being put forth by the Dawes commission, the possible change of government in France after the next election, are far more vital to the people of eastern Canada than are the proposed changes in our tariff.

And I most certainly agree with him. There is no difference whatever in the position taken by the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg in 1922, 1923 and 1924. The only difference so far as I can ascertain is in the position of the hon. member for Springfield, who supports a certain policy on the hustings and then comes into the House and refuses to vote for it. I have said that we need some long time credit system in order to help agriculture in this country. The report which Dr. Tory has just brought in urges that the movement for rural credits is a normal development arising out of modern scientific agriculture. To-day in Europe the agriculturist can borrow money cheaper than anyone else in the community, while exactly the reverse is the condition in this country. In France he may borrow through the co-operative banking systems and the Credit Foncier at 4 per cent; in Denmark, through the system of co-operative banks, at 5 per cent; in Germany farm loans are obtainable at between 4 and 5 per cent; in England from 4½ to 6 per cent. The average rate of interest on farm loans in Europe is 5 per cent. In nearly every country in Europe facilities are now provided to meet in some way the demand for cheap mortgage credit and many of these systems are wholly or partly state-established.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: Does my hon. friend imply that conditions in Europe are better than they are in Canada?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Not at all; I will come to that in a moment. In Australia the agriculturist can obtain loans at 5 per cent, in South Africa at 6 per cent and in New Zealand at 5 per cent. In New Zealand there is a system that allows the farmer to get a loan for 36½ years at 5 per cent, and in the United States the maximum rate on farm loans under some of their new systems is 6 per cent, although the rate of interest may be lower. In the United States there was also established a method of equalizing the rate of interest East and West, and I submit that something of that kind should be introduced in this country. I do not wish to quote at any considerable length, but some of the matters discussed in the report of Dr. Tory are of such vital importance to this country that the government, I think, should be considering them at this time. Dr. Tory states that the present system of short mortgage loans makes it difficult, by reason of high cost of equipment and the increasing value of land,—indeed makes it impossible—to redeem mortgages out of farm production, and further that the establishment of a long term amortisation plan for mortgages at a fixed low maximum rate of interest would materially strengthen the position of farmers in competition with Europe. In my opinion, whatever system is set up, it should have as one of its objects the placing ultimately of its administration in the hands of the borrowers and not in the hands of joint stock banks or private mortgage companies which are governed by considerations of profit rather than of service. Some organization for co-ordinating the credit of the farmer is required. It would make it liquid and more readily acceptable to those who have money to lend. And when we realize that 2 per cent under amortization will amortize a farm mortgage in twenty years it must be apparent that the reduction of 2 per cent would be equivalent in thirty-five years to the total capital mortgage debt. The estimated mortgage indebtedness of the farms of Alberta is $100,000,000 and a reduction of 2 per cent on that amount would represent a saving to the farmers of that province of at least $2,000,000 annually, which would be infinitely more than the budget reductions represent. I therefore urge on the government again the necessity for setting up, without delay, a long-term mortgage system for the purpose largely of funding the present indebtedness of the farmer and extending payments at a low maximum rate of interest, such a rate, as would permit the Canadian agriculturist to enter into fair competition with the farmers of European countries. I trust that action will not be delayed another year. We have had two years of investigation already, one inquiry having been held before the special committee on Agricultural Conditions last year, in which a very exhaustive examination was made of conditions generally. In addition to that we had the commission of Dr. Tory in the winter. Again, if further information is required, the government can secure it from the reports of the American commission that toured Europe; the evidence obtained by that commission is among the records in the Library and it relates to the credit systems of the world. No further delay in my opinion should be permitted, and indeed no excuse can be found for such delay.

Hon. members to my right, and occasionally some hon. gentlemen opposite, urge that the country should be self-contained, manufacturing all that is needed within its boundaries. I have often puzzled over this and have wondered what those gentlemen meant. Do they mean the exclusion of the goods of other countries? I have listened to their arguments but have never received any logical explanation. The last voice I heard proclaiming this doctrine was that of the delightful member, whom it is always a pleasure to hear, the representative of the constituency of St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler). He said:

> I claim that we should be a self-contained nation, manufacturing what we want instead of being dependent upon other countries for our needs.

It was, I confess, somewhat of a shock to me at the moment to hear such a doctrine propounded from the ranks of those who are supposed to be a tariff for revenue party. But let us examine the statement in order to ascertain whether the doctrine is possible even if it were good. There was a time in primitive society when the economic issues were comparatively simple, when the producers were the farmers and the hunters. They produced or secured in some way what was required and they consumed it themselves. Later on came the leather maker, the tool maker and the weapon maker, and trading commenced. Even then, though the farmer of the valley traded with the herdsman on the hills and the weapon maker in the village, they lived practically isolated, neither caring nor concerned about conditions elsewhere in the world or how other people lived. Such isolation is no longer possible. The economic life even of the individual has swept out into ever-widening circles, beyond the valley, beyond the hills, beyond the oceans and beyond the continents, until to-day each individual life encircles economically the whole world. The industrial revolution with its labour-saving, space destroying, and immensely productive inventions brought about and cemented this condition. It brought to us the steamboat of 1807, the locomotive, the power press, the making of paper from wood, it brought the telegraph, the transatlantic cable, the wireless, the telephone, the radiophone. Thus we have to-day that condition which brings every individual in this world in as close touch with his fellow-men as were the people of neighbouring villages in past centuries.

Now, the effect of this industrialism and of these labour-saving inventions is to create an interdependence of nations, chiefly because nature has not located the raw materials necessary for an industrialized nation in equal quantities throughout the earth not as she has distributed sunshine and air. For example every nation under our present industrial system requires coal, iron, copper, oil and certainly wheat lands and meats. They are localized in their distribution. How localized they are perhaps the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George and other hon. members to my right have scarcely appreciated. We find for example, that Great Britain, in 1913, in 1921, in 1922, did not, and still does not produce petroleum; Germany produced 850,000 barrels in 1913, 274,000 in 1921, and 200,000 in 1922; France produced none for 1913, but did produce 392,000 barrels in 1921 and 494,000 in 1922; Russia produced 62,834,000 barrels in 1913, 29,150,000 in 1921, and 35,091,000 in 1922; Belgium did not produce any, neither did Spain; the United States, on the other hand, produced 248,446,000 barrels in 1913, 472,183,000 in 1921, and 551,197,000 in 1922; Canada produced 228,000 barrels in 1913, 190,000 in 1921, and 179,000 in 1922. But Canada imported in 1922 no less than 513,217,000 gallons of petroleum and petroleum products, and in 1922, 479,868,000.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it must be obvious to hon. gentlemen that no nation can survive in competition with other nations without at least crude petroleum. Yet we notice that it is scattered in such unequal quantities that trading is essential to secure it to all. In 1922 the United States produced five-eighths of the total of the world's petroleum output.

I have also the figures for iron ore production in metric tons for the same nations, also for coal and copper. I do not desire to delay the House or to weary members by quoting these figures in detail, so with the permission of the House I will hand them to Hansard.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The table is as follows:

	Iron Ore, Metric Tons
	1913	1920	1921
Britain	16,263,950	12,912,065	3,533,950

Canada	13,622,070	15,088,000	13,660,162	34,926	37,014	21,600

These figures are all to be found in "Mining Industry" Vol. 31, Edition 1922.

It may interest hon. members to know that the greatest copper ore deposits are the Chuquicamata deposits in Chile. Now, I could put the information in another way. In 1913 the United States produced 36 per cent and consumed 37 per cent of the world's iron ore; Germany produced 20 per cent and consumed 27 per cent; Britain produced 9 per cent and consumed 14 per cent; France produced 12 per cent and consumed 7 per cent; Russia produced 5 per cent and consumed 5 per cent; Belgium produced none, and consumed 4 per cent; Spain produced 6 per cent and consumed 1 per cent. Only in France and Spain did production exceed consumption, and four of the other nations had to depend on other countries. Belgium in spite of her great industrial development imports all her iron ore. We find the same condition of affairs in regard to coal.

	Millions of Tons
	Produced	Consumed
United States	517	495
Britain	292	217
Germany	191	167
France	40	60
Italy	1	10
Austria-Hungary	17	30

Canada to-day is dependent on other nations for coal. France, Italy, Austria-Hungary—since divided—are all dependent on outside coal supplies, especially Italy. Italy produced one million tons and consumed ten million. Modern manufacturing and transportation depends on these minerals and the fuels I have mentioned. Nations must and will depend therefor upon each other. The principal deposits of iron ore, copper and petroleum happen to be in the western hemisphere. And the world requires them. On the other hand, we require the products of the rest of the world, and must get them. Therefore trading is only natural. The United States has the largest iron supply in the world, France the second, Newfoundland the third, Cuba the fourth and Brazil the fifth. The world's interdependence is again reflected in the growth of world trade. World trade, in spite of trade barriers, increased from $4,049,000,000 in 1850 to no less than $75,311,000,000 in 1919. But the next year, the last for which I have the figures, shows a falling off of no less than $13,893,000,000. That I think is a fair reflex of the unsettled industrial condition of the world at the moment.

May I suggest to the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George that Great Britain relies largely for her wheat supply on the United States, Argentine, Australia and Canada? But strange to say she buys twice as much from the United States as she does from any other country except Canada. Belgium relies on the Argentine and the United States for the greater part of her wheat supplies. France relies almost entirely on Australia, the United States and the Argentine. It may be interesting to know that out of a total importation of 24,692,000 bushels of wheat France imported only 2,850,000 from Canada. Italy relies on the Argentine and the United States. Germany also relies on those sources of supply. In the case of Germany, out of 51,000,000 bushels imported in 1922, 26,000,000 bushels came from the United States. I hope I have dispelled from the mind of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George the extraordinary idea that to-day any industrialized portion of the civilized globe can be self-supporting and independent. At the same time I trust I have shown that the interdependence of each nation is so vital that the absurdity of making trade difficult must be clear.

The blocking of trade by artificial barriers is absurd, but the evil effects of this practice have been only too well demonstrated by the never-ending state of war in which the world has found itself. Think of the tens of millions of people who are at this moment co-operating throughout the entire world in the production of the necessities of life and in their transportation, or the attempt to distribute them, and think on the other hand of the effort that is being made by privileged interests in every nation to block and check the transporting of supplies between nations. Each great nation in the world must provide itself with the essential raw materials, and so we find that each nation is busy securing, either by aggression or by financial invasion—it is called "investment," but is as far-reaching an evil in its influence as any invasion by force could be—the largest possible resources of raw material, and each of these nations in turn is then using trade barriers to prevent other nations securing their requirements on equitable terms—all except free trade Britain. I have no hesitation, then, in stating that one of the great world problems is the competitive struggle between national groups for trade, for markets, for resources, and with this problem of course, goes its partner, the excessive concentration of world wealth in a few centres and in the hands of a few individuals. Real peace is impossible under these circumstances. But preparation for war by increasing armaments is the negation of intelligence. This problem must be solved. The war has shown that war means world-war. It also has shown to those who think, that peace must be world peace and that prosperity will be world prosperity. We suffer here because Europe suffers, and to-day we must recognize that it is impossible to destroy the economic well-being of an integral part of the world without destroying the general prosperity of the whole world. In the Manchester Guardian some time ago I read words which I would like to read to the House in this connection, the words of Sir Charles W. Macara, chairman and managing director of Henry Bannerman & Sons Limited, chairman of the Cotton Employers' Association, and a man holding many other important positions in Great Britain:

> It is impossible for any country to expect to win economic success at the expense of or in total indifference to the success of others. . . . . the good of one country is bound up with the good of another, and it is only by studying what will be mutually advantageous that we shall find the key to our good fortune. The whole world is interdependent, and you cannot injure one member of the international body without injuring all the rest.

And here, let me remind the House of the thought of the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond), a man whom we always delight to hear, a man for whom I have a great personal regard, but who slipped from his usually high plane, and in the spirit of the king of old, who challenged God to a duel, rejected as will-o-the-wisps the ideals of free trade and peace, linking those who sought them with the seekers of perpetual motion and consigning them all to insanity. If it be sanity to call free trade and peace will-o-the-wisps and madness, if in seeking them we must wander from protection and war, then may our feet earnestly seek the path of that which is free and the "madness" of peace rather than the "sanity" of war.

It is of little use to argue disarmament. There is little value in holding peace parleys so far as actual results are concerned, but I agree that they have a great force as an educational factor, and I would encourage the holding of them as often and for as long a time as possible. Let them sit all the time; I would agree to them doing that. But the great hope is not in the holding of these peace parleys or in these arrangements for mock disarmaments. The great hope is in the ever-increasing number of young men and women who to-day are looking forward, hungry for the realization of those ideals that were portrayed so eloquently by Woodrow Wilson. To use his words: "Instead of exclusive combinations I want to see universal co-operation, "America"—let me substitute the word "Canada" for that; let us have America too—"Canada shall stand for the just conception and basis of peace, for the completion of merit and the generous rivalry of liberty." Again he says: "The essential principle of peace is the actual equality of nations in matters of rights and privileges."

I urge therefore that Canada do herself the enduring honour of taking a lead in international affairs now. Let her send out a call to all the nations of the world to come and hold an international trade conference having for its object the mutual elimination so far as may be possible of international trade barriers. I admit that we cannot hope to wipe out the effects of the dense stupidity of past centuries in a breath. It may take time; it will take patient courage; it will take great idealism; it will take a clear far-seeing vision to bring this to pass. And so, by all means, while striving for peace, while striving for this great ideal of international free trade, let us prepare for that war of which everyone is at the moment speaking. Let us prepare for it in the most effective, the most comprehensive manner, by the enactment of legislation for the conscription of wealth and industry as well as of manpower. Take the profit out of war—all the profit—and there will be less eagerness for it; there will be less talk about it; there will gradually come a clear realization that the true law of nature is co-operation, not war.

It is perhaps hardly necessary for me to remind hon. members that the great bulk of our national debt and the debts of the entire world to-day, the overwhelming debt running into hundreds of billions of dollars, is the result of war and continuous war, and yet are we so deadly stupid as to keep on fostering them, building them up, preparing for the next, and never making an honest attempt to wipe wars out? Our national debt at this moment —I am dealing only with Canada, a small country of nine millions of people—is given as $2,888,827,237. And when people talk of that they think they have spoken of all the debt. The man in the street, the woman in the house, the farmer on the farm, think that is our whole national debt, the debt we owe largely as a result of the war; but it is only a fraction of it. There is the debt that has been accumulating in the provinces through the war years, and due largely directly or indirectly to war condition. There is the debt of the municipalities. I have here the figures for 1922, showing a debt for the provinces of $629,705,771 and for the municipalities of $794,941,476, or a grand total of debt, excluding individual debts, traders' debts, and debts between wholesaler and retailer, store and individual of $4,313,474,484, or more than $500 per head of population, or a sum of $2,500 per family of five.

And during the six fiscal years of the war what were the conditions? I have a statement from the Bureau of Statistics which shows that during those years—1914-15 to 1919-20 inclusive—the total revenue receipts of the Dominion were $1,461,396,304, and the total disbursements were $3,145,576,179. The total collected from special war taxes in the same period was only $183,658,287, but this was swallowed up in interest on war debt and in pensions. The total disbursements on capital account for war and demobilization purposes during the same period was $1,670,406,242. This sum is exclusive of interest on war debt, current payments for war pensions, and so on. We should have paid our war debt out of the tremendous war profits as the war was fought. As it is, not only is industry in our own country staggering but industry throughout the entitre world is in the same desperate state, and most nations engaged in the war are insolvent. Another general conflict would most certainly ruin modern civilization. The Toronto Star in a recent article expressed the following opinion:

> The world is realizing that war and civilization cannot tolerate one another much longer. One or the other must go.

The soldier went over and got $1.10 a day, and the danger, but the farmer and the workman who stayed at home fared fairly well. The manufacturer and the capitalist who operated or owned a factory made fortunes. I am in favour of legislation providing that not only shall the young of our country be conscripted, but that labour and capital be drafted as well. When the nation is at war let no one profit by the nation's peril. No one should be permitted to gain more than a soldier in war time. Action in this should not be left for the hurried frenzy of emergency but should be taken now in the bitter realization of the effects of war. Let us whilst we still stand amidst the ghastly ruins of nations and of industry, whilst we have the cold facts of wrecked bodies and minds, the result of the insanity of war still around us, plan out methods of eliminating as far as possible the recurrence of this scourge. Let us leave it not to the younger generations which, being taught now the glories of war, will hear but the beating drums and the call to arms. Let our bitter experience be our guide whilst it is still strongly present. Canada sent overseas between 400,000 and 500,000 men. Sixty-three thousand of them are dead in France, one hundred and fifty thousand of them are wounded, and we had an amputation display in Ottawa not long ago that ought to thrill men's hearts to a realization of what war means. In the United States five million men went into uniform for the war. Between sixty thousand and seventy-seven thousand lie buried in France, and two hundred thousand were wounded. And yet, according to an article by Mr. Marquis James, 6,664 American citizens became war millionaires, and more than ten thousand American citizens amassed fortunes from profiteering in war necessities. Doubtless we have like examples in this country. Mr. James further states that out of 27,000 contracts totalling 6 billion dollars there was not one single cancellation clause. In this country the evil system of "cost plus" contracts added enormously to our debts. Let us, Mr. Speaker, have equal rights for all. If man be conscripted then on exactly equal terms let industry and finance bear its share. Let there be equal service for all, and special profits for none.

At present in the United States Congress, amongst the people, and indeed all over the world there is a movement in this direction. Let Canada give her impetus to the movement. May I quote here the draft of a resolution which is only one of several attempts that are now being made in the United States to achieve this purpose. It is the draft of a resolution introduced in the United States Congress by Royal C. Johnson, ranking veteran of the United States Congress. It reads:

> That in the event of a declaration of war by the United States against any foreign government or other common enemy, the Congress shall provide for the conscription of every citizen and all money, industries and property of whatever nature necessary to the prosecution thereof, and shall limit the profits for the use of such moneys, industries and properties.

The whole case for the universal draft as we may call it is well summed up by Colonel Wainwright, who retired as Assistant Secretary of War of the United States in order to take his seat in congress. He has this to say, and I recommend his words to the jingoes and militarists in this country.

Wealth should be controlled and called into service as well as man-power. I am convinced that a way must and can be found to approach that ideal where, if we cannot avoid war, we can accept the whole-hearted support of the great majority and compel a few industrial bandits to abandon hope of gain while the struggle is on. Those who labour in factory and field to produce the things essential to the nation in war must be convinced that no inordinate profits shall result from their labour. They must find also that as the war progresses those who sell food, shelter and clothing do not profiteer.

Let us act, then, Mr. Speaker, before we:

—have forgotten ancient martial musics,
That summoned youth to blunted, faceless years,
Galloping drums, proud horns, and sounding bugles
Drowning the guns, trench-smells, before-dawn fears;—

Before we:

—have forgotten in this tree-filled valley,
Loud with the rush of wind like surf on shore,
How it grows fat, feeding on our oblivion:
The dumb and hungry cancer men call war.

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): Mr. Speaker, I put human values too high to impose on this weary house the thirty-five minute speech which I had carefully prepared, and I trust that when numbers of women come to take their seats in this chamber such nights as this will be unknown. I want simply to make my position clear on the vote that is about to be taken. It is not for the Liberal party, or for the Liberal government, or the present budget, that I am thankful, but for the independent political thinking and voting of such sections of Canadian people as are reflected by the new groups of this House, groups whose presence here and actions since coming, account for the departure by the Liberal party from a fiscal policy essentially one of protection. I am convinced that more aggressive action by us would have brought a budget more nearly approaching that called for by the Woodsworth amendment. I will support the Woodsworth amendment because I believe in the principles laid down in it, because it is part of the platform on which I was elected, and because it is part of the memorandum, at present in my hand, that was drafted by the Canadian Council of Agriculture and presented to the government no later than April 2, eight days before the budget came down. It is the goal to which we are working, and working the government ahead of us as we go. I welcome once more the presentation of this amendment, substantially the same as that presented last year, to the government for their careful consideration. I am not going to depart from the supporting of principles which I believe on technical grounds.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Woodsworth) which was negatived on the following division:

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Before asking what business is to be taken up at the next sitting, may I suggest to the Prime Minister that it might be expedient as well as convenient to meet at eight o'clock to-day instead of at three o'clock.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I have no objection, Mr. Speaker, but I should think we might get along more quickly with the work if we met in the afternoon, took up estimates, and proceeded with some of the branch line bills in the evening. I imagine those who would be primarily interested in the Department of Agriculture estimates might be willing to be here this afternoon. I think we should be making as much progress as possible with the business.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know that those who are interested in agriculture have any more enduring power than the rest of us. I do not know what advantage there is in meeting at three o'clock to-day.

Mr. BELAND: Make it four o'clock.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am only one member of the House, and I do not pretend to be speaking for any great number, but I am sure it is the general will of hon. members that we should not meet till eight.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We might meet at four o'clock.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There would have to be a motion to meet at four before the motion to adjourn. I suppose we will follow the order of business suggested by the Prime Minister,—estimates in the afternoon?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And branch lines to-night?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. I move, Mr. Speaker that the House meet to-day at four o'clock.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King, the House adjourned at 7.35 a.m. (Friday)

Friday, May 16, 1924

The House met at four o'clock.

WEDNESDAY SITTINGS

GOVERNMENT BUSINESS TO HAVE PRECEDENCE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That on Wednesday, the 21st of May instant, and subsequent Wednesdays to the end of the session, government notices of motion and government orders shall have precedence over all business except questions by members and notices of motions for the production of papers.

Mr. HARRY LEADER (Portage la Prairie): I beg humbly to protest against this resolution. It will have the effect of taking away private members' day thereby preventing hon. members from bringing resolutions before the House. I know the Prime Minister will say that we have all had opportunity to present our resolutions. That is true. In regard to the resolution that stands on the order paper in my name, I may say that I had three opportunities to bring it forward: one on a Monday night at a quarter to eleven; another on a Thursday night at a quarter to ten; and I think another on a Wednesday night at twenty minutes to six. But had I gone on with my resolution on any of those occasions I should perhaps only have had the opportunity of speaking myself; then the debate would have been adjourned and the motion would not have been voted upon. Now, this happened last year and I did not intend that the same thing should occur this year. I thought I had my resolution in in lots of time, but evidently there was so much other work ahead that it was not reached. However, I should like to take this opportunity of protesting against taking Wednesday as proposed. I might mention that a number of hon. gentlemen when speaking during the budget debate referred to the fact that if we desired to practise economy we should start here and set an example to the country by agreeing to a reduction in our sessional indemnity.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker I also wish to protest not so much perhaps at the actual motion as at the situation which results from the practice of late years of filling up the order paper with motions. sometimes before the House meets at all. For instance when we came down here first this session there were already three or four pages of notices of motion. Some of them were—I do not think I would be over harsh in saying this—of an absolutely unnecessary kind, resolutions of an abstract character—one for example dealing with what Britain should do about the Ruhr. What on earth have we here got to do with the Ruhr? I should like to know what practical end can be achieved by discussing abstract questions of that sort. There are many more such resolutions; I could point out a dozen that are equally useless as far as the actual operation of lawmaking here is concerned. What I wanted to say is this: These motions are put on the order paper and frequently not taken up when called. As the Prime Minister said on a previous occasion some of them have been called six times and still they maintain their place on the order paper. Two resolutions stand on the order paper in my name. They are unimportant, I will admit. One was the notice of a bill, and the other was the notice of a resolution that I wanted to discuss. Both however would be of some practical advantage—at least I should hope so—as regards the interests of Canada. I put these resolutions on the order paper within a month after the House met, but of course there were a great number of motions ahead of them. They never were called except on one occasion when a number of the members were going to Halifax. I stayed away from that trip on purpose because I thought my motion would come up. As you are aware, Mr. Speaker. it came up on the occasion in question at three minutes to six and by speaking to the motion I obtained the placing of it on the order paper amongst public bills and orders instead of it remaining amongst motions. Now, private members' day has been taken from us and the resolution will not come up again. If I am not very much mistaken there have been fewer days devoted to the motions of private members this session than in any other session for a long number of years past—at least for some ten or twelve years. I quite admit that a remedy is needed but I do not think it is the remedy such as suggested by the motion before the House. What I would suggest is this: That the House or the government should consider amending the rules in the following manner: First, that when these motions are called and not gone on with, unless in case of the sickness of the hon. member in whose name they stand, they shall be dropped and have to be placed at the bottom of the order paper again. That would give hon. members who have something that they really desire to bring before the House a chance to be heard. The second amendment I would suggest is, instead of going along two or three months, and then arbitrarily saying, "We cannot have any more private members' days," that after an agreed on date—say a couple of months after the opening of the House—no more new motions would be accepted; so that no one could put any fresh notice on the order paper, but that members who had notices then on the order paper which had not been called should be given an opportunity to be heard. So far as I am concerned, I am quite willing to forego the opportunity of talking on the matter I am interested in, in order to choke off a lot of these vague abstract resolutions that are before us. But some day, when the government or the opposition, as the case might be, are desperately in need of an opportunity to move some particular motion, it could be easily blocked by the opposition or the government putting a lot of abstract motions on the order paper, and then when they were forced to, taking up one order or the other until the time lapsed. But any bona fide motion put on the order paper within two months—or one month, if you like—of the opening of the House would be heard. The other sugestion of dropping those motions that were not called would facilitate, and perhaps put an end to what I really think is an abuse of the original intention of the rules.

Mr. W. C. GOOD (Brant): When the matter of taking Mondays came up some weeks ago I made a protest against the motion which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) brought in. However, my protest was unavailing. I have taken the trouble to look into the record of this House for the last thirty years in respect to private members' day, and I must say that the information which I secured in that investigation certainly is not creditable to the present government, or the present parliament, or the present procedure. I am not going to weary the House by giving them the details at the present time, I am simply going to say that in the old days there was practically always plenty of time taken to reasonably clear the order paper of these private members' resolutions. Twenty years ago Thursdays were taken first, Wednesdays were taken next, and Monday was left a complete day when a vote might be had—Monday was left until the last. This year, for the first time, the procedure has been reversed and Monday has been taken first, and that is the only day when a vote can be secured. I may say the record of this House is indeed worse than the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) has intimated. So far as Mondays, which are the only days that really concern us, are concerned, we have had nineteen days between the time that the debate on the Address was concluded, and the date that Monday was taken, and there were twenty-nine private members' motions left on the order paper unconsidered. Since the time I made this record I think there has been an addition of several to the list. No other year in the last thirty approaches anywhere near that record. There were one or two years during the war when there were not very many resolutions on the orders, and when—probably for special reasons—the number of days allowed for private members was smaller than it was, say about three or four years ago. This matter is not concluded; it will come up again; and I want to protest that the rules of the House in this respect ought to be amended. I am not prepared to endorse the suggestions already made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), but I do think this is a matter of great importance, because, as I said before, private members are figuring and will figure in the future more prominently in the business of the House than under the two party system, and we must have some extension or rearrangement. I was going to suggest, without debating the matter at any great length—I do not want to go into any further argument—that we ought to have a full day, say Monday, for practically the entire session, and let the government have Wednesdays, when they can take up estimates, or something of that nature without any trouble at all. They are now of practically no use for private members' resolutions, as they can be talked out. The government and the members know this, and why do they not look at it in a sensible way, and give some consideration to private members? I am not going to do anything further at the present time, but I want to warn the government that they have not heard the last of the matter.

Motion agreed to.

EMPLOYMENT OF CHILDREN AT SEA

Hon. JAMES MURDOCK (Minister of Labour) moved that the House go into Committee of the Whole on Monday next to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to confirm a certain Convention relating to the employment of children at sea, adopted at Genoa on the 9th day of July, 1920, by a general Conference of the International Labour Organization of the League of Nations; and to provide that no child under the age of fourteen years shall be employed on any ship except as permitted under such convention; that a list of persons under sixteen years of age so employed, or a register thereof, shall be kept; that penalties be imposed for violation of the proposed legislation; and that the Act shall not apply where all the crew are members of the same family, or the child was lawfully employed at the commencement of the Act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS GUARANTEE ACT

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the House go into Committee of the Whole on Monday next to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Canadian National Railways Guarantee Act, 1923, chapter 37, by repealing subsection four thereof and providing,—

2. That where parliament has authorized expenditures on equipment to the extent of twenty-five per cent of the cost of such equipment, the company may make or cause to be made one or more equipment issues for the remaining seventy-five per cent of such cost.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

MOUNTED POLICE ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment) (for the Minister of Justice), moved that the House go into Committee of the Whole on Monday next to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act by providing,—

1. That the Governor in Council may by regulation determine the pay and allowances to be received by the Commissioner and other members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Force.

2. That the time served by officers in the Dominion Police Force may be included in the term of service for pension purposes, and this provision shall apply as from the first day of February, 1920.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT—HALF-BREED SCRIP

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (West Edmonton): Will an opportunity be given at an early date for the third reading of Bill No. 5, to amend the Criminal Code?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): In the absence of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), I would not like to reply to the question, but I will bring it to the attention of the minister.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I may say that I brought this matter to the attention of the minister some days ago and he stated that an opportunity would be given.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is correct.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not see why we could not pass the third reading now and be done with it. It would take only three minutes to do so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would not have any objection, but probably the Minister of Justice should be here when the matter is dealt with.

DIVORCE

EQUALITY OF GROUNDS FOR RELIEF AS BETWEEN THE SEXES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOS. T. SHAW (West Calgary): Might I direct the attention of the Prime Minister at this stage to an item appearing under Public Bills and Orders referring to the second reading of Bill No. 24, respecting divorce. The Prime Minister will undoubtedly recall the undertaking of the government in connection with this matter, and I simply want to suggest to him that I would be prepared to take it up at any time convenient to the government.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I think there is an agreement with the hon. member that an opportunity will be given, and we shall try to arrange for it at an early date.

RESIGNATION OF MR. WALTER G. MITCHELL

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): It is stated in the press to-day that the recent hon. member for St. Antoine, Mr. Mitchell, who has resigned, has given the Prime Minister his reasons for his resignation from this House. Is the Prime Minister prepared to give those reasons to the House to-day?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I saw a message to the press from Mr. Mitchell, in which he mentioned that the communication that he had sent to me was a private one, and I think it probably should be for him to make his own explanation. I do not know that I am expected to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Did the Prime Minister say that according to the press despatch, Mr. Mitchell said that the communication to the Prime Minister was private?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I saw a communication to a member of the press from Mr. Mitchell, from New York, in which communication he said that he had given his reasons to me in a private letter. The mention of the letter as being private causes me at this moment to say that it is for Mr. Mitchell himself to make known its contents to the public should he so desire.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Marcil (Bonaventure) in the chair:

Agriculture—health of animals (administration and enforcement of Animal Contagious Diseases Act and Meat and Canned Foods Act), $2,000,000.

Mr. TOLMIE: Will the minister kindly give to the committee some particulars with regard to the dismissal of the late Veterinary Director General?

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): The story is a fairly long one and I do not want to make it any longer than I can help, but that depends upon how much information my hon. friend requires. The recent Veterinary Director General placed upon file with my department correspondence that he had with an appointee at Washington holding the same position there as he did here, complaining of the Veterinary department in connection with the administration of this particular appropriation being administered politically. I can read the parts of the letter that I have reference to, if the committee so desires; but it is of such an extraordinary nature from my standpoint that I asked Dr. Torrance for an explanation of it, why he sent to an officer holding a similar position to his in Washington a letter of this nature and also where the political interference was on the part of myself or the government in the administration of the department, especially in connection with the embargo on our cattle going to Great Britain and the quarantine provisions in relation thereto. He stated that the interference complained of referred, not to the Canadian government, but to the British government. That seemed so absurd that it was no excuse, so I told him I thought the time had arrived when we should dissolve partnership. We discussed the matter in a business way and he thought he would retire under the provisions of the Calder Act. This was quite agreeable to me. I am willing to read the letter to the committee or to place it on file.

Mr. MEIGHEN: When the minister suggested the dissolution, did he suggest that he himself be the party to leave instead of the official?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I had no idea of that and I have no idea yet. Dr. Torrance has a position in another part of this province.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister suggest that he could not get one?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No. I am very glad that he did get one.

[Mr. Motherwell.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: Any suggestion that the minister himself could not get a position, so that that was the better way out of the matter?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No. If my hon. friend wants a scrap, I am ready for him. We have done a good day's work already, and if he wants to start right now, I am willing to start. I am not particular whether I get this vote through to-day or not, if that is the humour my right hon. friend is in. I am trying to give the limited amount of information out of consideration of Dr. Torrance. We got on very nicely together; but a document of this nature, even though it is a private document, placed upon file in the office of a foreign government, could not be tolerated. That is all there is to the matter.

Mr. TOLMIE: Was the letter a personal communication to the chief of the Bureau at Washington?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr TOLMIE: Will the minister read it?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It was a personal letter written by Dr. Torrance to Dr. Mohler, but the whole staff was aware of the fact that it had been sent.

Mr. CRERAR: How did the minister get possession of it?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It was sent to my office by Dr. Torrance.

Mr. CALDWELL: Had a copy been kept of it?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It was sent to my office, that is all I know.

Mr. CRERAR: Then I take it that the letter would be in the nature of a public communication.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, so far as Dr. Mohler was concerned it was private; it was marked "confidential."

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But who gave this confidential communication to the minister?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Dr. Torrance.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Did the minister ask Dr. Torrance for it?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I should think it would be a pretty good letter. Perhaps the minister would have no objection to reading it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Dr. Torrance showed it to me after he had sent it.

Mr. MANION: What is the nature of the letter?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think I had better read the whole of it. As I have said, it is marked confidential and is dated October 28, 1922. It reads:

Dr. J. R. MOHLER,
Chief, Bureau of Animal Industry,
Washington, D.C.

Dear Mr. MOHLER:

You are no doubt familiar with the fact that the negotiations for the removal of the British embargo against Canadian cattle have reached the point where a discussion of details is taking place. The Canadian delegates in England are discussing these questions with the British government and information has reached me that it is quite probable we may be asked to modify the Canadian Quarantine Regulations as regards imports of cattle from Great Britain.

You might have noticed that when the Canadian case was being argued before the British Commission it was suggested that if Great Britain removed the embargo against Canadian cattle and allowed them to enter Great Britain freely, that Canada should reciprocate by permitting British cattle to enter Canada under similar conditions. Dr. Tolmie, who was representing Canada at that time, stated that if health conditions in Great Britain, with regard to live stock, were as satisfactory as they are in Canada, such a proposition might meet with favourable consideration, but that he did not consider the cases were parallel, and pointed out the frequent outbreaks of foot and mouth disease from which Great Britain had suffered in recent years.

It is quite possible, however, that a suggestion may be made that we should modify our quarantine so as to reduce the time of detention, and it is with regard to this possible demand that I would like to have confidentially your opinion as it affects the relations between the Bureau and the Health of Animals Branch. We have always felt that we were under agreement not to alter our quarantine regulations without previously notifying you of our intention, and we have received from you the same consideration.

I am strongly of the opinion that quarantine regulations should be based upon scientific knowledge of the diseases against which we desire protection, of the conditions surrounding the traffic in animals, the freedom from disease of the country from which the cattle are exported, and the time occupied in ocean travel. If political considerations are to be introduced into the consideration of the question of quarantine it places the scientific advisers of the respective governments in a very anomalous position, and I feel that where we have to undertake the responsibility of carrying out any regulations that are made we should also have a decided influence in the planning of these regulations.

Should political pressure force me to accept a shortened period of quarantine for imports from the British Isles I have been wondering what would be the attitude of your Bureau in regard to the matter. I have, therefore, thought it well to consult you privately before the matter has reached a decision, and I would appreciate anything you may say and treat it as confidential if you desire me to do so. You may, therefore, feel quite at liberty to tell me frankly what your opinion of the situation is, and what you think would be the result upon our mutual relations regarding the traffic in cattle across our border should any such action as that suggested be taken.

With kind regards, and thanking you in anticipation of your prompt reply, I am,

Yours sincerely,

F. TORRANCE.

This letter will probably appear unintelligible to the committee unless hon. members know certain facts. Dr. Torrance, naturally enough, wanted to be one of the delegates who should go overseas. Two gentlemen went over, Dr. Grisdale and Mr. Duncan Marshall, and they were accompanied by two ministers. They went for the purposes of conference and I considered that such a representation of the department was ample. Dr. Torrance made it known quite candidly to me that he thought he should be one of those to go overseas and apparently—I suppose quite naturally—he was disappointed at not having been permitted to go. I explained to him that in my opinion two delegates in addition to the two ministers were quite sufficient for the purposes we had in mind. I drew his attention to the following paragraph in the letter as well as to the two preceding it:

Should political pressure force me to accept a shortened period of quarantine for imports from the British Isles I have been wondering what would be the attitude of your Bureau in regard to the matter.

I asked Dr. Torrance to explain to what this paragraph had reference and he said that it related to political interference on the part of the British government. I replied that this was nonsense inasmuch as we had never heard for many years of any such interference. I was not aware of anything of the kind nor did anyone else know anything about it and I intimated that in my judgment there was no justification for the writing of such a document.

Mr. TOLMIE: Will the minister read the reply to that letter?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The reply is not on the file but the substance of it was that the desire was to carry out the old arrangements with regard to quarantine.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The minister says that this letter was written on October 28, 1922. It seems to me that it took rather a long time for the gentleman to hand it over to him. How does it come that so long a time elapsed before the minister got hold of the letter?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Before taking action I was anxious to see whether this was typical of the manner in which Dr. Torrance had administered the department or whether it was merely an isolated case.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The question is when did the minister get the letter?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not recall when I got it.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Was it long ago or recently?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I received the letter shortly after it was written.

Mr. CHAPLIN: And apparently the minister waited some time before taking action.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes I was waiting for some corroborative evidence that would either confirm or rebut the suggestion that this was the manner in which, on the whole, Dr. Torrance administered the department.

Mr. CHAPLIN: And what is the nature of the "corroborative evidence" which the minister received?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I will give that, too.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Yes, come along with it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: In justice to Dr. Torrance I want to say that such evidence as existed tending to show dereliction of duty on his part in other respects, was not, I thought, in itself sufficient to warrant dismissal, or, to put it in a nicer way, to warrant the severance of our relations.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Or, the dissolving of the partnership. That was the first phrase used and it is so good that I do not like to see it dropped.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, that would be a satisfactory term. I say that none of the reasons that have been enumerated on these pages would be sufficient in themselves, because a great many of them are incapable of proof. But, taking them in conjunction with this correspondence, I felt that there was ample warranty for the action I took in regard to Dr. Torrance.

Mr. MANION: Perhaps I am a little dense, but I do not quite understand yet, having heard the letter read, wherein the offence consists; I do not see the crime in it. Perhaps the minister would be good enough to explain to us, who are not so familiar with agricultural conditions, just what is wrong about the letter.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: He is suggesting that the whole question of embargo and quarantine is being administered politically.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, no, not at all.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Where does he say that?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: All right, we will read it over again. Dr. Torrance writes:

> I am strongly of the opinion that quarantine regulations should be based upon scientific knowledge of the diseases against which we desire protection of the conditions surrounding traffic in animals, the freedom from disease of the country from which the cattle are exported, and the time occupied in ocean travel.
> If political considerations are to be introduced into the consideration of the question of quarantine it places the scientific advisers of the respective governments in a very anomalous position and I feel that where we have to undertake the responsibility of carrying out any regulations that are made we should also have a decided influence in the planning of these regulations.

What he had in mind there was that he should not only have framed the regulations but should have gone over to Great Britain and negotiated any change therein. I know that, for he had a conversation with me regarding it.

Mr. LADNER: What was the conversation?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That he should go to Great Britain as one of the representatives.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is the fact that he wanted to go to Great Britain as one of our representatives, apparently instead of Mr. Duncan Marshall, part of the corroborative evidence?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No. If I had not known what was in his mind I would have been more astounded by the nature of this letter. But I do know that he wanted to go.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is wrong with that?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not know whether what he had in mind as "political interference" was the appointment of my deputy or of Mr. Duncan Marshall.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: He does not say it was either.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The whole thing was so astounding that when I asked him candidly what he meant, he said that he meant interference by the British government. I pointed out that that could not be so, and he did not say any more.

Mr. STEVENS: I think the committee ought to get a clear perspective of this incident,—I call it an incident, but it is a great deal more when it affects an individual of the standing of Dr. Torrance. We have here one of the most flagrant violations of the statutes of Canada, indeed, a defiance of those statutes, that perhaps could be imagined. In 1920 this parliament passed the Civil Service Act. We all know perfectly well that the task of the Civil Service Commission was a tremendous one and could not result in complete harmony and success in the course of a few years. We also realize that the Civil Service Commission has not in all its activities given complete satisfaction to everybody. But the principle and the idea behind the legislation has appealed to the people and has been accepted by the Civil Service generally as a very welcome protection against unreasonable interference. Here was a civil servant of high standing whom the minister dismissed at a moment's notice, as I will show in a moment. He brings to the House a letter—a copy of which I have under my hand and which I shall analyze, perhaps a little more fully and a little more fairly than the minister has yet done—and he admits that that letter alone is not sufficient justification for his action in dismissing the Doctor. Then he holds in his hand what he terms "corroborative evidence." And what does he say about that corroborative evidence? Without presenting it he says: Well, I admit it is not very significant and the offence is not serious.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I will read it all if you wish.

Mr. STEVENS: And he says that it could not be proved. Furthermore, as the final and deciding factor in the case, he states that he knew Dr. Torrance had some idea in the back of his mind. That is a pretty flimsy ground upon which to dismiss a civil servant of the standing of Dr. Torrance. Now, let us examine the letter. I want the committee to bear in mind that the charge against Dr. Torrance was that he had declared there was political pressure being brought to bear upon him. That is the charge of the minister. Let us see upon what it is based. The letter, written by Dr. Torrance, head of the Health of Animals branch, is addressed to Dr. J. R. Mohler, chief of the Bureau of Animals Industry in Washington. The letter is marked "confidential"; it was confidential between these two gentlemen. Now let us get the perspective. Dr. Torrance and Dr. Mohler administer the Health of Animals in their respective countries. In order that the quarantine regulations of Canada and the United States, regulations which are always irritating in a measure to these who are subject to them, should be carried out with as little irritation to the public as possible, these two chief officials of their respective governments were in constant touch and working in substantial harmony. Let me give an illustration to show there was nothing sinister in Dr. Torrance's action. Take the immigration authorities—and my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) who handles that branch is now in his seat and will bear me out—supposing the immigration authorities of Canada and the United States did not work in harmony in many respects, would there not be tremendous irritation to the public? My hon. friend will agree with that. It is one of those little courtesies between officials of two governments which is necessary if friendly relations are to continue. I am not going to read the whole letter because it is already on Hansard. The first portion the minister will not himself complain of in the slightest degree; it is a reference to the foot and mouth disease. At this time negotiations were on foot with Great Britain. Great Britain was demanding that her animals should have access to our market with a minimum of quarantine and a lowering of the standard of the regulations which at that time obtained. But it must be borne in mind that even in that very year there were twenty-two cases of foot and mouth disease in Great Britain. To show that Dr. Torrance's and Dr. Mohler's apprehensions were well founded, all I have to do is to remind the committee that since that time, animals to the value of millions of pounds sterling have been destroyed in Great Britain because perhaps of one of the worst outbreak of this disease every experienced in that or any other country so far as I know. Let us keep that in mind. Is it not an indication that both Dr. Torrance and Dr. Mohler were careful, cautious and well-informed officials of their respective governments? Now, up to this point we have nothing but what is of the highest and most commendable character in regard to this official who was so summarily discharged. The first clause I read is in these words:

> It is quite possible, however, that a suggestion may be made that we should modify our quarantine—

Remember, Dr. Torrance is writing to Dr. Mohler. Now, this is the point:

There was an expectation that a request for modification of the quarantine regulations would be asked for by Great Britain.

Hon. members will note that the request is expected to be made by Great Britain. This is the crux of the whole business, and I am sure, will persuade hon. members that there is nothing in the contention of the minister.

> —so as to reduce the time of detention, and it is with regard to this possible demand that I would like to have confidentially your (Dr. Mohler's) opinion as it affects the relations between the Bureau and the Health of Animals branch.

That is, between the third country, the United States, and Canada. Now I come to the paragraph which is so offensive to the minister. Dr. Torrance continues.

> I am strongly of the opinion that quarantine regulations should be based upon scientific knowledge.

Is there any objection to that? Is that sound, or is it offensive? Is it right or is it wrong? Is Dr. Torrance on good ground, or is he flirting with some influence that is injurious to this government? These are the questions that the committee are called upon to decide. He continues:

I am strongly of the opinion that quarantine regulations should be based upon scientific knowledge of the diseases against which we desire protection, of the conditions surrounding the traffic in animals, the freedom from disease of the country from which the cattle are exported, and the time occupied in ocean travel.

These, he said, are the considerations that should be borne in mind; these are the influences that should determine the nature of the regulations to be passed. Now we get to the offence. I ask the minister,—and I wish the Prime Minister were in his seat, because this is an important matter, and it affects the government—and I ask the committee, to listen to this point, keeping in mind what I said a moment ago, that it was anticipated that pressure would be brought to bear upon the Canadian authorities—Dr. Torrance—to lower the quarantine period of the admission of British cattle into Canada. That is the basis; that is the apprehension; that is the anxiety in the mind of this official. This is what he says:

If political considerations are to be introduced into the consideration of the question of quarantine it places the scientific advisers of the respective governments in a very anomalous position.

Now, let us think that over. That is the offence; that is what Dr. Torrance is charged with having done to warrant his dismissal from office. Dr. Torrance said to the minister that what he meant was that political pressure, political relations of Canada with the Mother Country, considerations affecting the general relations of countries, would enter into this and outweigh the scientific reasons upon which the regulations should properly be founded. Is there anything unreasonable in that deduction? Is there anything unreasonable in Dr. Torrance's explanation? Is it not the most sane and reasonable explanation of his statement?

Mr. HOEY: What would those "political considerations" be?

Mr. STEVENS: There are two classes of political considerations. I admit that you can narrow the word "political" until it becomes nothing but a sinister term—word political. But the word "political", applying to political considerations as between Canada and the Mother Country, would be something of this character: We are asking Great Britain for access to her markets. Great Britain says "All right, we will remove our embargo, but in order to do that we have to satisfy our breeders in England, who object to your cattle coming in here, who say your cattle have to be slaughtered at the port of entry. Let us have something to give to our people. Let us have a political consideration: you lower your quarantine regulations and give us favourable access for our breeding stock into your market." Now that is a political consideration. Let us look at it from another angle. How could there be a party political consideration in this matter? How could anyone with the widest stretch of imagination interject into it a party or local political consideration? You cannot do it and read this letter as being from a sane person; and no one will question the sanity of the letter. Now, I read further:

5 p.m.

And I feel that where we have to undertake the responsibility of carrying out any regulations that are made, we should also have a decided influence in the planning of these regulations.

There is nothing unreasonable about that. Now I come to the next clause, and this the minister says is awful, it is terrible. Any official who would use the words I am about to read should, according to the minister's idea, be summarily dismissed, should not be retained in the service for a minute, even though he is, as this official was recognized to be, a leader in his profession, a man of high standing and integrity and so regarded in other countries. Furthermore he was appointed not by his political adversaries, but by the Laurier government in 1896. I merely interject that to show that there was not, as a matter of fact, any party consideration at all. Dr. Torrance says—and I would like the committee to note this:

Should political pressure force me to accept a shortened period of quarantine—

Now, let me pause there. At no period in this letter does Dr. Torrance—

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?—I regret that I was not in when he commenced his argument. Is that letter written to the Veterinary Director General of the United States with reference to a discussion between the Canadian and the British governments?

Mr. STEVENS: This is a letter written to Dr. Mohler. Let me continue this point. Keep in mind that the charge is the use of this word "political," and keep in mind also that the subject of the discussion was the possible demand for the lowering of the quarantine regulations in Canada so far as admitting British cattle was concerned and its immediate effect upon our relations with the United States in the interchange of that traffic. He goes on to say:

Should political pressure force me to accept a shortened period of quarantine for imports from the British Isles, I have been wondering what would be the attitude of your bureau in regard to the matter.

Am I not justified in saying that Dr. Torrance was strictly adhering to a reasoned and proper attitude—that should friendly political relations bring so much pressure upon this government as to override the considered scientific opinions of him and his associates, what effect would that have upon the attitude of the government toward the traffic between Canada and the United States? Is that not clear? Could Dr. Torrance have put the matter more moderately or inoffensively? I submit that he could not; I submit that he did it in the most reasonable and gentlemanly manner possible. The minister may analyse this letter from now until doomsday and he will not get out of it the slightest indication of offence or insult to him—not the slightest. If he has taken it out, it exists in his own imagination; certainly it does not exist in the letter. We asked the minister to be good enough to read Dr. Mohler's reply, but he refuses to do so.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have not a copy of it here.

Mr. STEVENS: I have a copy of it under my hand, and I will read it, because it indicates again the reasonableness, the soundness of the correspondence on the part of Dr. Torrance. This letter is headed:

United States Department of Agriculture. Bureau of Animal Industry, Washington, D.C. Address reply to "Chief of Bureau of Animal Industry."

It is dated the 31st of October, 1922—and that point ought to be borne in mind; all this correspondence was in October, 1922. It is addressed to Dr. Torrance, Veterinary Director General, Department of Agriculture, Ottawa, and reads:

Dear Doctor TORRANCE:

I have read your letter of October 28th and am deeply interested in any action you might be forced to take which would weaken the protection of Canada against invasions of foot and mouth disease and other foreign animal plagues.

Dr. Tolmie presented the case truthfully when he stated to the British commission that he did not consider the cases of Canada and Great Britain parallel, and pointed out the frequent outbreaks of foot-and-mouth disease that have occurred in Great Britain in recent years. We in America know that the conditions are much more favourable in Great Britain for controlling outbreaks of highly contagious diseases than in most sections of Canada and the United States. I believe it would be impossible to eradicate foot-and-mouth disease on our great plains if it once got a good start.

I would be very sorry to see you forced to shorten the time you now hold imported animals at your quarantine stations as I am of the opinion that thirty days quarantine gives only a reasonable margin of safety. Usually we would expect symptoms of foot and mouth disease to appear within a week or ten days after natural exposure, but in some instances in our last outbreak the symptoms did not appear so soon.

I know your feelings in the matter and appreciate the position in which you are placed. Of course the bureau would regret to see a modification of your quarantine reducing the time of detention. If you are finally obliged to make such a change, it will be necessary for the bureau to alter its import regulations so as to prohibit importations from Canada until sufficient time has elapsed to know certainly that the animals to be imported are not infected. I think that, considering the little inconvenience from holding animals in quarantine for so short a time as you now hold them, and the possible results to the Canadian live stock industry from shortening the quarantine period, it would be a mistake for the British commission to insist on any change in your quarantine regulations at this time.

Sincerely yours,

J. R. MOHLER,
Chief of Bureau.

Mr. CRERAR: Is that letter marked confidential, too, or private?

Mr. STEVENS: This letter is not marked confidential as far as my copy goes.

Mr. CRERAR: That is the answer to the confidential letter?

Mr. STEVENS: That is the answer to the confidential letter written by Dr. Torrance to Dr. Mohler, October 28, 1922. Now, I ask the committee to get this point clearly: All this correspondence indicates two things—first, the anxiety on the part of the Canadian and United States Health of Animals officials as to the possible result of lowering the quarantine period in Canada; secondly, the imperative necessity on the part of the American bureau to increase their restrictions against Canada should this country take that step. Follow me back and I will repeat what I said a moment ago in regard to the other letter. Dr. Torrance in his turn expressed his anxiety that the pressure from Great Britain, other than scientific, would be such that it might be necessary for Canada to do this, and therefore he wrote this letter to find out what the effect would be. He was forced to do it in order that when the time came he would be in possession of the whole information. I say that Dr. Torrance ought to be complimented for his foresight, for his moderation, and for the manner in which he handled this very difficult problem. Instead of that, what occurred? The minister called Dr. Torrance into his office one day, and without notice, without any warning, without any charge, without time to give any answer, told Dr. Torrance, within a few moments after he had entered his office, to give him his resignation or take his discharge.

If he resigned he would be entitled under the Calder Act to his retiring allowance of about $1,500 a year. If he did not resign on the spot without leaving the office he would be dismissed in his sixty-fourth year and would get no retiring allowance. That was the choice before Dr. Torrance. I ask the committee to consider that. No charges, no opportunity to explain, no opportunity to answer, no impartial tribunal—nothing of that kind at all.

Mr. CRERAR: How long was it after the correspondence may I ask?

Mr. STEVENS: That occurred about a year after. I have the exact information here somewhere.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: July of the following year.

Mr. STEVENS: In July following the correspondence in October—July 7th. Now picture to yourselves the position Dr. Torrance was in after having given seventeen years of his life and the very best period of his life—because when Dr. Torrance was engaged in 1906 he was at the top of his profession and remained so during that period—to the service of this country. Dr. Torrance at the age of sixty-four is not the Dr. Torrance, with his prospects, at the age of forty-seven or forty-six as the case may be when he entered the service. He was faced with losing his $1,500 of retiring allowance and he did not at that moment sign the resignation. He asked for twenty-four hours. Is that unreasonable?—I ask this committee. Mr. Chairman, during your long parliamentary experience have you ever seen a case parallel with this? Would the minister himself attempt to justify an alternative of that kind placed before an official of this standing and upon the flimsy basis which I have presented to the committee? Not only that. Such conduct was utterly uncalled for, not only from the standpoint of equity, but from the standpoint of common decency from man to man which ought to be accorded to the most irresponsible individual. Not only that, but there was an utter disregard of the general provisions of the Civil Service Act and the whole spirit of that legislation. I know of many such cases and we purpose as time goes on to bring a few more of them before the House. I have one in mind that a minister sitting near the Minister of Agriculture perpetrated which does not show so wanton a disregard of legislation as this, perhaps, but is also an indication of the way in which the spirit of this legislation is not only disregarded but flagrantly and impudently violated by this government. I feel pretty warm about this. I have a high regard for Dr. Torrance. There was no political significance in Dr. Torrance's services to this or preceding governments—none whatever. He was appointed in 1906 under the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. He continued down through the years until last year and was a public servant of the highest standing—of the highest standing in his profession—and highly respected not only by officials of the Canadian government but by those governments with which he had to deal. "Oh," the minister says, "I know what was in the back of his head, I saw through his head. I saw a picture there in the back of his head." What was this thing, this sinister and terrible thing, he saw in the back of his head? You would think Dr. Torrance was contemplating murder. You would think my hon. friend (Mr. Motherwell) saw or divined that this civil official was about to rob the treasury or run off with the minister and his office, or something of that kind. What was in the back of his head? This: Dr. Torrance said that if they were going to discuss again in Great Britain the question of quarantine regulations regarding live stock, the head of the live stock branch ought to be at the discussion. Hon. gentlemen may pause and consider that for a moment. Was that a sin, was that a crime? Supposing we were going to discuss some highly technical legal matter affecting the Justice department would you send out to Alberta and get Duncan Marshall, or would you send for the Deputy Minister of Justice? The Deputy Minister of Agriculture went. There was no objection to that; no objection to Duncan Marshall; no objection to an officer other than the deputy minister if he wanted to go for a little trip. But should not the Director of the Health of Animals branch have gone, not only as a matter of course but as a matter of necessity? If he is to properly administer this branch, if his professional services are of any value to the country, then surely he ought to have been there when the regulations in which he was to have a part in framing were under discussion. Let me refer to this letter. This is the matter which the minister had in the back of his head:

I am strongly of the opinion—

This is what was reflected from Dr. Torrance.

—that quarantine relations should be based upon scientific knowledge—

Did Duncan Marshall have that scientific knowledge? I think the answer is so obvious that the only possible escape of the minister is to frankly admit that in a moment of impetuosity and temper, unbecoming to his age and experience, he gave way to a little jealousy in regard to this official, exercised his power and ordered his dismissal. Dr. Torrance did not have to resign under those circumstances. I do not think this government had the power to demand his resignation, but Dr. Torrance was faced with this proposition; he did not have time to take chances as to whether legally or not he could resist this demand and await a dismissal and investigation. He did not know that. He saw $1,500 of pension being ruthlessly taken away from him—"Resign or be dismissed and you lose your pension." These were the words of the minister. If you can imagine, Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, a more unjust and iniquitous piece of work than that, I would like to know it.

Mr. GAUVREAU: The hon. gentleman will remember that in 1911 his friends dismissed a large number of employees.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Perhaps we will have to go back to the beginning. I did not want to spend too much time on this matter. I thought perhaps we could get through this and make some progress. The hon. member, I presume, has made the best case he is capable of making for the gentleman whose case is under consideration. Let me read from Dr. Torrance's letter to Dr. Mohler which would have covered the entire case he was asked to cover. I requested Dr. Torrance to write a friendly letter to Dr. Mohler asking what effect the change on the quarantine regulations would have on our relations with the United States. Here is the paragraph that covers that:

> It is quite possible, however, that a suggestion may be made that we should modify our quarantine so as to reduce the time of detention, and it is with regard to this possible demand that I would like to have confidentially your opinion as it affects the relations between the bureau and the Health of Animals branch. We have always felt that we were under agreement not to alter our quarantine regulations without previously notifying you of our intention, and we have received from you the same consideration.

In order to comply with the usual international courtesies of giving notification, I asked Dr. Torrance to write Dr. Mohler confidentially, stating that there was a possibility of this being done and what would be the possible effect upon our relations if it were done. That is all I asked him to do. I know what I asked him to do and what was in my mind. When my colleagues went over to Great Britain I asked them to inform me if there was any change in the quarantine relations that might possibly affect our relations with the United States, and I also intimated that, from the standpoint of international policy, there should be some communication of a confidential nature from myself or some one of my department to the staff at Washington tentatively, telling them what might be done. Instead of quitting at that, here is the kind of letter he writes, and deliberately hands it to me afterwards as if it were all right. That shows the disposition and temperament of the party. He writes a dissertation on political pressure, and if he is "forced" to do this, and so on. The reply is to this effect: "If you are forced or if you are compelled," showing that Dr. Mohler got the impression that there was some sort of wrong pressure being exercised on this side; if Dr. Torrance had to yield to them such and such would ensue in regard to the regulations. Keep that in mind, Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, while we are discussing this.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister think, if Dr. Torrance had the slighest notion in his head that he meant by his words—"political pressure" what the hon. minister had suggested, he would have gone immediately to the minister?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: You would scarcely think that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Or do you think any mar with brains would think that?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is why I hesitated for six months, to see what kind of man he was. One has to believe his own senses in the matter, and come to his own conclusions. Here is the paragraph that was supposed to be a complete fulfilment of my instructions to Dr. Torrance to write a diplomatic letter that would comply with the proper international courtesies that should be observed between one country and another considering the pleasant relations we had had with the United States on this question; and I should say he gave a political dissertation on the political pressure exercised by this government or the British government to bring about something he objected to strongly. I do not want any officer of that nature around me, and I exercised my right to say so.

Mr. BRETHEN: What reply did Dr. Mohler give?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: He could only give one reply. The reply was put in his mouth practically. What would you do if some political pressure was brought upon Canada of some sort to compel us to do this? He could only say one thing: "We would cancel our regulations under which we are working with you." It was put in his mouth by Dr. Torrance.

Mr. CRERAR: Did the minister suggest to Dr. Torrance that the letter to Dr. Mohler be a confidential letter.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, it was marked that way, and this is the way it is being treated as confidential.

Mr. SHAW: The minister tells us he got a copy of the letter within a week or so after it had been sent. Did he complain to Dr. Torrance at that time about the contents of the letter?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, I did not read the letter at the time he forwarded it to me. In fact, I do not think I read it for some little time, if I remember rightly; and I think he sent it through the mail shortly after that. The House was in session for five months. Further, the period between October and July, was a reasonable length of time to find out if that was the general way in which Dr. Torrance administered the department he presided over. After the session closed in July, I was cleaning up affairs of one kind and another that had been hanging over, before going West and this was taken care of at that time. If the committee desires to know the corroborative facts and reports that came to my ears from many sources to substantiate the very conduct that is outlined in this letter I will give it to the committee, but I do it with some reluctance. It is hardly fair to Dr. Torrance, and on the other hand it is hardly fair to me. If I am to be blamed for this act alone of Dr. Torrance, and for delayed action on my part for six or eight months without some valid reason, I may say there was a valid reason. I wanted to give him a show. Dr. Torrance and I were personally friendly. I think he treated the department in what he thought was the right way, but he was constantly committing blunders of this nature and of a similar nature. I am prepared to read a memorandum handed to my deputy, compiled by a member of the staff of the department who should know, with respect to Dr. Torrance's administration of the department in many respects. There is nothing confidential about it, but it is not fair to Dr. Torrance.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Go on with it.

Mr. MANION: Was the deputy requested to give this information, or did he give it voluntarily?

[Mr. Motherwell.]

Mr. STEVENS: Probably it was "voluntary" on request.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It just shows how foreign it was to my mind to do what my hon. friend has suggested. I did not ask my deputy to give it to me; I did not ask him to prepare it, and I do not think he asked that it be prepared. But it was prepared by another member of the department and handed to him to give to me.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who was he?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not know for sure.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the minister be good enough to read this memorandum from somebody he does not know?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I got it from my deputy, and that was sufficient evidence to me that it was worth while handing it to me.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The person who takes the responsibility, the minister does not know. I think it would be interesting to have it read. I think it would be a curiosity.

Mr. DOUCET: Before the minister reads that document, does the deputy minister take the responsibility for it?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I understand, no.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does anybody take the responsibility for it?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: For some of it, I will.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the minister read it now and tell us what parts he will take the responsibility for and what parts nobody will?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The first one I will read but will not take the responsibility for.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Read it all.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The whole file?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is as follows:

Some reasons why.....could have been asked to resign:—

He used the frank of the deputy minister for his personal mail and the personal mail of his family. Every Monday morning he brought his mail to the office and handed it to the messenger to be franked. This practice went on for a considerable time and the Postmaster General wrote to him asking him to discontinue it. He did not discontinue it and kept up this practice and the Postmaster General had to write him the second time before he discontinued it.

I do not know anything about that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Nobody responsible for that?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, but it can easily be found out. I did not go to the Postmaster General to find out.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the minister thinks this may have occurred a year after the dismissal, it may be well to find out.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This is one before his dismissal and I believe it is true:

He had the power to issue scrips for liquor and he would issue scrips and send the messenger to the vendors to buy the bottle and have the messenger deliver it to certain members of parliament.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister take responsibility for that?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I believe it is true.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister take responsibility for it?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, but I believe it is true.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But he will not be responsible for it?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No; you will have to substantiate it by sworn testimony.

Mr. MANION: I may say, as a physician, if he had the right to issue prescriptions to patients that he was committing no offence in any case if he knew the members required it, and knew that they were ill.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: They have certain privileges, I suppose, that other people do not enjoy, but I was not aware that that was one of them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No privileges more than anybody else.

Mr. MOTHERWELL:

He used to spend his vacations down the Saguenay and his family and son-in-law generally accompanied him. After being at the summer resort for three weeks he expressed all his belongings from the summer resort back to the branch collect and the department paid for it. During the war his son was overseas and he used to call his son and sign his name and his son would cable back and sign his name and all the cablegrams each way were charged to the department.

A site was picked out at Hull for a research station and could have been bought at a low figure, but his son-in-law got an option on this property and it is rumoured that he got quite a rake-off for selling it. The same thing applied to the quarantine station at Quebec.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister take responsibility for that?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister take responsibility for one line of it?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Where you have all those reports coming from a fairly responsible authority in the same department and substantiating this letter—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who is the authority?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not know whether I know the name of the party or not.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the minister ask his deputy who wrote that memorandum?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My deputy just told me that it was given to him confidentially. There is just one way of getting at this. The hon. gentleman is pressing me for corroborative evidence that I acted properly in connection with this letter. The letter to me was sufficient, but I wanted time to elapse just to see whether it was a letter he wrote on the spur of the moment without knowing the importance of it. I did wait and I have this. This is not sufficient in itself, but it is corroborative; it is very important. Before you could substantiate it, you would have to set the Enquiries' Act in motion or something of that nature in order to get sworn testimony regarding this.

Mr. STEVENS: What is the date of the memorandum?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is no date on it, but it was not very long ago.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Was it after the dismissal the minister got it or before?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: After the dismissal I received the written memorandum, certainly, but I knew a number of the complaints before. Reports were coming to me frequently.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Hon. gentlemen are evidencing by their corn and their appropriate bushel how they would act. Several of those reports came to me last session, two or three months before the dismissal took place.

Mr. MEIGHEN: From whom?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: From many sources, even people I met on the street.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Wait until I read the memorandum and I will come to the ones I have reference to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister says that he made the dismissal on the strength of the letter he read and on the strength of certain facts contained in the memorandum, which memorandum has the authority of nobody, and which memorandum the minister never saw until after the dismissal took place.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: But I had some of the information before. It had to be compiled.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was just on the street, in the air.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, you even got it from individuals on the street.

Mr. MEIGHEN: From whom?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Wait until I come to that:

In 1917 the deputy minister sent him. . . .

That is Dr. Torrance.

. . . .West to meet the Western Canada Live Stock Union to make arrangements for the eradication of mange and he attended one meeting staying for about fifteen minutes and left for the golf links and he was never seen at any of the meetings after. As a result, nothing was done regarding the eradication of mange at that time. About six months later the deputy minister and Dr. Hilton had to go West to Calgary to attend a meeting to arrange for the eradication of mange which should have been done six months previous if the gentleman in question had attended to his business and stayed away from the golf links. When Dr. Grisdale and Dr. Hilton arrived in Calgary to attend this meeting the first question that was thrown at them was "Where is the man with the golf sticks" and this name stuck to him all the time he was in the department.

He also furnished inside information to the members of parliament regarding the cut in the Estimates before they were published which caused the minister considerable trouble.

Mr .STEVENS: Will the minister at that point take responsibility for that statement?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I got information a year ago. I do not know whether it was from members, but judging from the questions asked by members, it could have been got in no other way than through Dr. Torrance's office. Only he and my deputy knew it.

Mr. STEVENS: Was the memorandum prepared by Dr. Hilton, the gentleman who was kept in the position?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, and I am informed, not by any official of the Health of Animals Branch.

Mr. STEVENS: Does the minister recollect yet who prepared it?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think I know. I am not sure, however. It was given to Dr. Grisdale confidentially by a member of the staff of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the minister say this? Would he consider it fair, reasonable and just to read a memorandum without presenting the person's name, using it as corroborative evidence to deprive a prominent official of his position, without giving that official a single moment even to see that memorandum or reply to it?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Did I not say at the very beginning that, out of deference to Dr. Torrance, it was not fair?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister said he would take responsibility for it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: For one or two of the items.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He has taken the responsibility for none. He says there is someone responsible for the rest, and he will not say who it is. Can the minister conceive of more dishonourable conduct than what he is exhibiting in this House at this time?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: What would my hon. friends have said if I had not read it? My hon. friends pressed me for further information and I gave it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The moment the minister read a line of it he was bound to give the authority, and I demand that authority now in behalf of common justice.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If I get permission from my deputy I will give it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The deputy is there; ask him.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The whole correspondence with Dr. Mohler was confidential and I so informed hon. gentlemen; but because the committee demanded it I gave it. It seems to me that the whole procedure is manifestly unfair to Dr. Torrance, and hon. members on the other side of the House were warned that if the matter were brought up in parliament evidence would be forthcoming that would be none too creditable to this gentlemen. I had no desire to give any evidence of the kind to the committee, because I wanted to save Dr. Torrance this unpleasantness.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the evidence? What is the nature of this evidence which the minister describes as being "none too creditable" to Dr. Torrance?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Here is sufficient evidence for any reasonable person.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the minister abandon all the other rubbish that we have been hearing, about no one taking any responsibility, and stick to the letter?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I can stick to the letter, yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And will the minister go further and say that he has no other reasons for Dr. Torrance's dismissal?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, I will say nothing of the kind.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, if the minister has other reasons, what is the nature of the evidence?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have said, I have evidence which, while I would not be prepared to swear to it in a court of law, some of it, if not all, I nevertheless believe very largely.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I should like to know what other reason the minister has besides that letter.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is sufficient reason.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will he submit any other evidence to the committee?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I did not want to read the letter, but my right hon. friend himself insisted upon its being produced.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But what the minister has just read is not evidence. The minister could have had a clerk write it, and he knows it. He refuses to give the name of any authority for scandalous and defamatory statements made against a public servant; and any one who will quote such statements and refuse to give the authority for them, when urged to do so, is not fit to be a Minister of the Crown.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: All that is required is to bring the matter before a committee of the House and we shall see whether we can prove it or not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Prove what? Is the minister going to appoint a committee to investigate something that has been said by no one, or by some one whose name we do not know?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend knew what the matter was.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister said he would take responsibility for a part of the allegations, while some one else would be responsible for the rest.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No; I did not say that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But now apparently he will not accept responsibility for a line of it; and although he will hold no one else responsible for it he retains, and gives expression to, a doubt to the injury of Dr. Torrance.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend insisted upon my reading it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The moment the minister reads a line of it he is bound to give the authority.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Let me say this, Mr. Chairman, that if we had observed the proprieties in this matter, if hon. gentlemen had not insisted so strongly on the thing being read, these confidential communications should not have been made public at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is nonsense. The letter is marked "confidential" at the minister's request, but it is a matter of public business and it is absolutely proper that it should be brought to the attention of the committee. We are prepared to discuss the dismissal of Dr. Torrance on the basis of that letter; but it is highly improper for the minister to introduce allegations and repudiate all responsibility for them.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why does the minister not give us the authority if there is one?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I stated that I would accept responsibility for one particular item.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We have not got it yet; what is it?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My right hon. friend's state of mind is something like what it was yesterday in regard to his dates; he does not remember.

This man had power to issue scrips for liquor, and he would issue them and send messengers to buy a bottle and have them deliver it to certain members of parliament. I will assume responsibility for that statement, for I inquired into the allegation and I believe it to be true.

Mr. TOLMIE: Who were the members of parliament?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: And in view of that fact I hold that I was justified in asking for his dismissal.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister pretend that even if that were true it constitutes an offence against any law or regulation?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have already asked my right hon. friend to keep his chair warm.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will keep the minister warm to-day, I can assure him.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Don't get fussed up; I have a good case. Let me tell my right hon. friend that if any of my officers do the same thing they will meet with a same fate. and after all, what was that fate, if you like to describe it thus? Two months' salary and four months' leave of absence with pay; and before the expiration of that time he had a second job. Nothing was done in any way to prejudice him.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Except his dismissal.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: And, if you ask me, I am sure that if Dr. Torrance's feelings were consulted in this matter he would request to be saved from his friends.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think he would, seeing that the minister has included himself among his friends.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not see the point. However, let me continue with the letter. Evidently, Mr. Chairman, hon. gentlemen do not like the corroborative evidence.

Mr. CHAPLIN: We have not heard it yet.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who does not?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Let us get back to the document itself. I say with all respect that I have never seen an officer in any department, and certainly have never had anything to do with one, who would write a letter of that character, especially to a foreign government in whose files it would be kept. There is no question that all the members of the staff would know about it. And as a matter of fact, word came back to us that they were astonished at Washington that we should keep in our employ a man who would write such a letter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who said that? Will the minister tell us who is responsible for the statement that the officials in Washington had expressed astonishment at the fact that, as he puts it we should have kept such a man in our employ?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It came through Dr. Mohler.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Very well; but who said it?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I understand it came from Dr. Mohler.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Did Dr. Mohler say that he was astonished?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the minister take the responsibility for saying that Dr. Mohler so stated?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I could not do that as he did not tell me.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would be an affront to common sense to suggest anything of the kind.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: In fact, I expressed my own astonishment and my astonishment was given visibility by my interview with Dr. Torrance on the subject. My hon. friend forgets apparently that Dr. Torrance writes this:

> If political considerations are to be introduced into the consideration of the question of quarantine, etc.

What can that mean—"if political considerations are to be introduced?" Obviously it is a complaint against some government or the department of some government; there is no question about that. All that fine-spun theorising on the part of my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) is the sort of argument of which only a lawyer could be capable; only a lawyer could so split hairs and pare cheese—

Mr. STEVENS: That is an accusation I cannot allow to pass unchallenged, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It was not intended as an accusation.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister charged me—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I never charged you with anything. I simply say that I defy any hon. member over there, or for that matter anywhere else in the House, who has not a legal mind, to split hairs the way the hon. gentleman has done.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not a lawyer.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That being the case, then, I have to compliment the hon. gentleman, for he certainly betrays a lawyer's mind in his aptitude for analysis and his ability to twist things and make them appear what they are not. Now, let me quote again the sentence to which I was calling the attention of my right hon. friend:

> If political considerations are to be introduced into the consideration of the question of quarantine, etc.

I ask hon. members again, what can that possibly mean?

Mr. LADNER: Does the minister infer from that sentence any suggestion that Dr. Torrance is insinuating a play of party politics?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If that is not his meaning, what then is it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: How in the name of common sense could party politics have anything to do with the statement as quoted by the minister?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is precisely what I wanted to understand from Dr. Torrance; I wanted to know why he introduced politics into the matter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Surely the minister can perceive the true significance of the sentence.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The minister cannot interpret the sentence as my right hon friend does; the minister must be very dense.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think he is.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, hon. gentlemen will have to decide just where the density is.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister want to suggest that political pressure does not exist all the time, quite properly, between this country and Great Britain and every other country in the world? And does not political pressure in that connection always mean—unless any one wishes to import party into the matter—that there exist certain necessities and exigencies of government because of the demands of the people? Could anything be more manifest than that? And that is precisely what Dr. Torrance had in mind. Nothing else makes common sense; and while the minister may possibly be unable to conceive of a letter written in terms of common sense, I do not know why he should attribute such a state of mind to any of the officials of the department. The importation of the party sense into the meaning of the adjective in this case is utterly absurd and ridiculous, and the interpretation which the minister puts upon the sentence is altogether false; and the fact that the doctor sent the letter at once to the minister would show that if nothing else would.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend is at liberty to put any construction he likes upon it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Dr. Torrance never thought of putting any construction on it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: What the doctor said—

Mr. MEIGHEN: I wonder who put that in his head.

Mr. LADNER: Will the minister tell us what he said?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: He wrote:

> If political considerations are to be introduced into the consideration of the question of quarantine, it places the scientific advisers of the respective governments in a very anomalous position, and I feel that where we have to undertake the responsibility of carrying out any regulations that are made we should also have a decided influence in the planning of these regulations.

That was a straight intimation to me, who knew the circumstances, that it was penned because he did not have an opportunity of going over with the experts.

Mr. LADNER: Did the minister charge Dr. Torrance with the political partisanship that has just been referred to?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Dr. Torrance was a political partisan of the first water.

Mr. LADNER: That is not my question. Did the minister discuss that aspect of the question with him?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, I do not think I did.

Mr. LADNER: Did the minister have a discussion with him at the time of his resignation?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That was the only discussion I had with him.

Mr. LADNER: When was that?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: About the first week in July.

Mr. LADNER: The 7th of July?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. LADNER: Did the minister have this letter from Dr. Mohler in reply of the 3rd November, 1922?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not know whether I had or not, I have not the letter here. The 3rd November is a month afterwards. It would be about that, the reply came inside a month.

Mr. LADNER: It is five days after.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is inside a month.

Mr. LADNER: Has the minister that letter?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Not here.

Mr. LADNER: May I read a copy?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Do you mean from Dr. Mohler? Certainly. It has been read once already.

Mr. LADNER: Did not the minister five days after, receive the letter of Dr. Mohler and a copy of Dr. Torrance's letter to him?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think so. We have Dr. Mohler's letter on file. I have read it. But as he is not responsible to this House I did not bring a copy of his letter.

Mr. LADNER: When did the minister ever ask Dr. Torrance about this political partisanship?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have no recollection of discussing it with him at all until the July following.

Mr. LADNER: Did not the minister have the letters there?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, but the session came on in January. Departmental business accumulates and is attended to when the session is over.

Mr. LADNER: Will the minister tell us the nature of the conversation at the time Dr. Torrance was dismissed?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes. I have already done so. I produced this letter and asked him to give an explanation of what he meant, who was bringing political pressure upon him to do so and so. His explanation was that it was not the Canadian government nor myself that he had in mind, but that the political pressure was being brought by the British government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Wasn't it?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, but reverting to my previous remarks, apparently for reasons that led Dr. Mohler to say: If you are compelled to do so and so in connection with these regulations, then we will have to do so and so. There is no question Dr. Mohler's answer was prompted by the nature of Dr. Torrance's letter.

Mr. STEVENS: Has there been at any time pressure from the British government to reduce the period of quarantine?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It has been discussed in connection with breeding cattle, but there has been nothing of what we usually term political pressure; there was a conference.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What kind of pressure would the minister call it?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Just simply friendly negotiations. When you use the term political pressure, it is always capable of being understood as party politics.

[Mr. Motherwell.]

Mr. STEVENS: Has the minister the correspondence in that matter with the British government?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I understand from my deputy that the correspondence is in connection with the lifting of the embargo and is marked confidential.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister could not lay it on the Table of the House?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We will look it over. I think we took the file off last year and laid it on the Table with the Prime Minister's correspondence.

Mr. LADNER: On July 7, when the conversation took place, did the minister demand Dr. Torrance's resignation?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: After I showed him this letter I told him I thought the time had come for us to dissolve partnership.

Mr. LADNER: Did Dr. Torrance ask for an opporunity to consult his friends?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No and yes. He asked for an opportunity to see Premier King.

Mr. LADNER: Did he ask for time to reflect upon it?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: He asked for an opportunity to see Premier King. I told him that I had already seen the Premier.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You would not let the Doctor see the Premisr.

Mr. LADNER: Did he ask for time to consider his position?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not recall whether he did or not. He asked for an opportunity to see the Premier.

Mr. LADNER: Was the question of his gratuity or allowance discussed?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Surely.

Mr. LADNER: Were any arrangements made?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We started right there to discuss it when he asked for an opportunity to see Premier King. I said I had already seen the Premier and my colleagues with respect to the matter. When he found that out he began discussing the retiring regulations and the amounts.

Mr. LADNER: What was the nature of the discussion?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Along the lines of his length of service and the computation based upon it. I remember there were a number of years when he was engaged intermittently in Winnipeg, and there was some doubt whether those would count.

Mr. LADNER: Was any amount discussed?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We discussed the length of time, and my memory is that his total service, including the period in doubt, was seventeen years, and excluding this period it was ten or eleven years of continuous employment. He was employed by the government intermittently in Winnipeg as inspector for about six years. He raised the question if I did not think that under the circumstances, he was within a year of being entitled to retire—he was sixty-four years of age—and would I consider a proposal to count the whole period. I do not know what the terms were. I said I would put a favourable interpretation on his claim to be considered as having been in the service seventeen years. We did so. It went through the usual routine —I can never remember all the different rigamaroles that have to be gone through—but that computation was refused by the Auditor General.

Mr. LADNER: The minister is now getting away from the point. I am referring to the discussion about the specific amount that Dr. Torrance would receive if he resigned instead of being dismissed. What was the amount mentioned to him?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have told my hon. friend.

Mr. LADNER: No, you have not mentioned the amount at all.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I cannot remember all these things. I do remember the period of years because it came up two or three times later. It does not make any difference what the amount was. We put the most favourable construction on the time, and called it seventeen years.

Mr. LADNER: That is not the point.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not know.

Mr. LADNER: I am asking a specific question respecting a specific conversation and a specific fact mentioned in that conversation. Did the minister represent to Dr. Torrance that if he resigned the specific amount would be $1,500?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If those in authority over me, that is the Auditor General or the Audit Board—my hon. friend must remember that I am not the court of last appeal—

Mr. LADNER: That is not my question.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, we discussed it, and so far as I am concerned, I was going to favourably consider the longest period that he suggested, seventeen years.

Mr. LADNER: That is not an answer yet.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not know the amount. How could I remember it?

Mr. LADNER: Did not the minister mention $1,500?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not know today how the time is computed.

Mr. LADNER: That is not the point. Did not the minister tell Dr. Torrance that if he resigned instead of being dismissed he would get an allowance of $1,500?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: On the face of it that could not be so.

Mr. LADNER: That is not the question. Did the minister tell Dr. Torrance that he would get an allowance of $1,500.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No.

Mr. LADNER: That is the answer.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: How could I tell him that? I did not tell him anything specific, because the matter was in doubt. But I did tell him he would get the most favourable consideration that I could give him, based upon the long period that he suggested—seventeen years. It went through the usual formula until it got to the Auditor General, and the Auditor General would not let the last six years count. Then he came back to me and we had negotiations with the Civil Service Commission. I had correspondence with Dr. Torrance; he wrote to me about it too, indicating that the amount that he was being allowed was less than he had anticipated. I wrote back and said I had recommended the amount that he wanted, but that the Auditor General would not let it go through. I presume that is one of the reasons the Auditor General is there—to check up anything that exceeds the exact regulations and to see that these things are subjected to the proper interpretation, which a great many of us cannot be expected always to have at our fingers' ends.

Mr. MANION: Before the clock strikes six, may I make a suggestion? There were a number of letters that the minister did not have on the file. I presume that this matter will go on this evening, and I suggest that he bring the remainder of the file with him.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The hon. gentleman means the letter from Dr. Mohler and the correspondence with Dr. Torrance? I shall be pleased to produce those.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And particularly produce the evidence that Dr. Mohler expressed the opinion that we should not retain an official who would write that letter.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Oh, he would not put that on file.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I do not think he would put it on file or on his lips or anywhere else, and never did.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Oh, yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is merely a pipe dream on the part of the minister.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I will venture the guess that there was not an officer in Washington in the department concerned by whom this was not a subject of conversation, and just of the nature I have suggested.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING

Bill No. 38, respecting the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway Company.—Mr. Humphrey.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

BILLS PROPOSED TO AUTHORIZE THE CONSTRUCTION OF BRANCH LINES

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the House go into committee to consider Bill 31, respecting construction of a Canadian National Railway line between Grande Fresniere and Rinfret Junction.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

GRANDE FRESNIERE—RINFRET JUNCTION

Mr. GRAHAM: Suggestions were made in committee by the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) and by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Baxter). The amended bill provides that the average mileage of each line and the cost per mile shall be stated. In one bill there was a suggestion that a fuller statement than we had proposed in the original bill as to expenditure and so on shall be provided and placed on the Table of the House each year. An amendment was proposed by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Baxter) that the construction of the line should not begin if, after final estimates had been given by the engineers, they were of the opinion that the line would cost more than the amount stated in the bill. I think these were the three things.

On section 1—Power to construct and complete line described in schedule.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is a branch line connecting with the Huberdeau line.

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Company may issue securities and Governor in Council may authorize guarantee thereof.'

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We are not objecting to the line. It is a proper one to be built. But we will have to adhere to the principle we invoked last year, that the amount to be guaranteed to any Canadian National line shall be shown in the estimates, as has already been done in reference to past construction. The bill as it stands does not require that. I therefore, move that the following proviso, which gives the right to the government to guarantee, shall be added to this section:

Provided the amount so to be guaranteed shall first be included in the Estimates and voted by parliament for that purpose.

This was thoroughly debated last session, and there is nothing new in it. Our position still is that parliament should be in control of all matters of capital expenditure year by year, and we contend that the control of parliament is lost if the bill is put through in this form. The other point that we think of great importance is that unless the amounts so to be spent are included in the annual budget of the railways submitted to the House there is no proper basis of comparison, and we are changing in a very vital manner our past practices, thus forbidding anything like a proper comparison. For those reasons, which were urged at great length last session, I move this amendment.

Mr. GRAHAM: This matter, as my hon. friend says, was very thoroughly discussed last year and parliament decided that the three-year programme, as we have outlined it, is the more practical way of constructing these lines. There is a precedent in the way, not of a guarantee, but of a straight vote of cash, in which the item did not appear at all at any time in the Estimates. That is the grant to highways. There are many other statutory payments as regards which the items appear in the Estimates only as a matter of record and guidance noted as "paid by statute." and are not voted year after year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What are those?

Mr. GRAHAM: Technical Education, Employment Service of Canada, Aid to Agriculture and the Highways Grant did not appear in the Estimates at any time. I speak having some knowledge because the highways were in the same department over which I am now presiding, and I know the reasons which actuated the government then in not putting those items into the Estimates. If those items were placed in the regular Estimates each year, they would be confined to a certain expenditure. The amount to be expended each year on highways depended altogether upon the amount that the provinces to which this grant was given would expend; but nevertheless, this expenditure was, to a certain extent, under the control of the Department of Railways and Canals, because no money could be paid out of the consolidated revenue of Canada except on the report of the engineers of the Department of Railways and Canals and the approval of the plans and of the construction as well. It was practical to do this in that way, although it was somewhat of a departure. This is practical, and I submit that even if there were no precedent, it is time that we had one. Take the construction of branch lines scattered throughout the Dominion of Canada. If you have a vote each year, there is a constant fear of interference with construction. because each year the estimates have to be voted. To-day we find ourselves asking for authority to construct these lines, but they cannot be commenced before these bills pass through this House, go through the Senate and are signed by the Governor General and approved. If there were estimates, the case would be just the same. The estimates are not before the House yet, and we would be dragging along with our estimates until June or, perhaps, later. In this way, while no control is taken away from parliament, because provision is made in the bill that every expenditure and proposed expenditure must be placed on the table of the House each year for discussion by parliament, action can be taken on this construction each year. But there is this great advantage, that construction is continuous until the expiration of the act. Next year, say during the winter, on account of this act being in force for three years, the companies who have charge of this construction can get out their ties without any fear of having their railway construction stopped on account of the estimates. They can proceed with their construction on the very first day that the season of construction opens. Consequently, before harvest time comes, when so many men are wanted, particularly in the West, they will have a great deal of construction done. I will give a concrete example. In 1920, if I remember correctly, one-half approximately of the branch lines that we are now asking for power to complete were started under an estimate. Had there been a three-year programme, one-half of the lines which we are now asking for power to construct, would have been constructed and the trains running over them; but no estimate was asked for in a later year and the construction stopped. The only practical way to work out this construction is on the basis of a three-year programme, with full particulars of everything done and proposed to be done to be laid on the table each year for the consideration of members.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have heard the minister's argument on this point several times, and I have no doubt that he has heard me express my contentions several times. Nevertheless, I purpose repeating them, because, needless to say, I have not in the slightest degree altered my view, and it becomes more and more firm every time I hear the minister express his views. The minister says: The reason we do not want to come to parliament for this appropriation each year is, first, that there are precedents in respect of other legislation where a several years' programme was provided and where the money did not require to be voted to be spent each year. He cites some at my request. I will deal with this argument first. There is no precedent in connection with the National Railways. From the very commencement of that enterprise, every dollar from the beginning to the end of the year each year was voted by parliament, whether it was to be raised by way of specific loan to the enterprise or by way of guarantee, and it is of some importance that the books of this country present a sequence; that we do not keep turning and twisting our method of bookkeeping and thereby confusing the whole electorate and taxpayers of Canada. This is what we are doing in more spheres than one now. But there is no precedent, not only in the National Railways, but in anything else, save based on a definite principle, and that principle sticks out from every case cited by the minister. What were the cases he mentioned? He mentioned the Technical Education Act, the Agricultural Instruction Act, the Employment Service of Canada and the Highways Act. Those were the four. I do not think there are any more. The minister knows just as well as I the great difference in that class of cases from the ordinary case. What is the difference? Why, there we were passing legislation for co-operative work with other governments. The other governments had to have the basis of a statutory enactment. They had to know whether they would enter into this construction extended over a period of years with the government of Canada. They wanted to know what they could depend upon. This was, in a word, not something wholly within the compass of this parliament; it was something that depended upon the will of another body over which we had no control at all, which was not our creation, a distinct and separate government. That applies to the whole of them. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) will remember all this because he was in the government then.

Mr. CRERAR: I have just come in and I did not catch the first part of my right hon. friend's remarks.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am calling attention to the distinction of the cases where we have passed legislation providing for statutory annual payment up to a definite maximum each year, without the necessity of coming every year to parliament for a vote. The cases cited by the minister were Technical Education, Agricultural Instruction, Highways and Employment Service. Each and every one of them was a case in which there was co-operation with other governments who contributed their share. I know of no other case.

The minister said that we are going to establish a precedent now if we never had one before. I submit that in the first place this utterly destroys the sequence of our bookkeeping; and if the minister is going to take this course, then for goodness' sake let him put a curb on the tongue of his Prime Minister or some of the other ministers, maybe his own, instead of continually coming to the House and saying, "Just look at the estimates; see how much less they are than those of last year. Behold the economists now in power!" For the sake of presenting intelligently to the people of Canada the real state and currency of public affairs, do not let us keep changing our methods of bookkeeping. If we are bound to do so we shall; but we certainly do not have to in the present instance. "But," says the minister, "we have to get out ties and we want to know whether or not we shall be able to go on. We are building so many miles this year and we want to know just what we shall be able to do in this direction next year." Well, have we never built lines before? What is the obstacle now? The minister knows that the government of which he was a member, when it built the National Transcontinental, came to parliament every year for the money that was required; and I never read in Hansard in those days, nor did I hear while I was in the House, any complaint from the minister or any suggestion that there was a handicap in the government's having to do this. The minister objects that he has to wait for the vote. How long is he obliged to wait? No sooner has parliament met than the government can secure an appropriation; they can get one-sixth right away. There is absolutely nothing in the world to hinder them from doing this any year. The minister must realize that it is all a humbug to talk about having to wait until parliament votes the money. There has been no difficulty at all in getting preliminary estimates passed. Why not accept the amendment? I should like a suggestion from the minister before I sit down. I am quite sure that he would not be hampered in the slightest if he accepted the system suggested, and it would preserve the sequence of the methods of bookkeeping and enable the public really to judge of the comparisons of one year with another.

The minister said that we had control anyway. My contention is that we have no control, and I should have pointed that fact out before. We have no more control after we have committed ourselves. It is true we could repeal the act; but we could also repeal the Agricultural Instruction Act or any similar act. But that would not be the right thing to do in the case where we have a contract with other governments; it would not be honourable. The minister argues that we have control even though we may not vote the money every year, because parliament must be told each year what is to be done, so that parliament can complain and grouse about it if it wants to. That is true. But what is the use of doing that when parliament has no check? And then the next breath the minister says that if in 1920 the late government had adopted the course which is now proposed, instead of the course it then took, the roads would have been built. What does that mean? It means that if we had put a bill through and tied the hands of parliament, whether or not we felt we could afford to go on from year to year, we would have had the work done. Is that consistent with the minister's contention that parliament has control? The fact is that in that case parliament would have no control. So that we are taking out of the hands of parliament its primary function in the control of annual expenditure. That is the first duty of the House, and if we are going to establish this precedent now where shall we end? We could advance in respect to any mortal thing just the argument that the minister is making to-night. For instance, in the construction of this building, the minister of that day could have stood up and said: "We do not want to have to come to parliament every year because we may find ourselves, with the foundations laid, unable to proceed, and parliament might refuse to vote the money. The contractor wants to know whether he will be able to go on next year and the year after that and for that reason we do not want to be under the necessity of coming to parliament every year." That is exactly the argument which the minister is presenting at the present time; and I say that if we adopt any such course the temptation to every government will be to do the same thing and we should be in a hopeless mixup and the public in a worse.

Mr. GRAHAM: The matter was so thoroughly discussed last year, when it was approved of by parliament, that I do not intend taking up the time of the committee at any great length to-night. I outlined in committee the method of financing the undertaking but it was not discussed; and while I fully expected my right hon. friend to raise the point he has brought up, I really do not think that there is anything in it. I am not speaking with any intention of being discourteous. Parliament has just as much control in the matter as it has ever had, for a full statement is given to the House every year. My right hon. friend suggested that we could repeal other acts, such as the Highways Act, but that inasmuch as they involved co-operation with provinces it would not be honest to do that. In other words, if such an act had no reference to any province it would be all right to repeal it. Now, if it were found that there was something radically wrong there is no question that any of these bills could be repealed as easily as an estimate can be dropped. But for practical purposes I submit again that the method we propose is the most advisable, under present labour conditions and the conditions generally in the country which are of a character that did not prevail at all when the Transcontinental was constructed. The conditions in relation to the Transcontinental were different from those under which the work in this case is being done, because labour was especially provided for in the case of the Transcontinental, whereas in connection with these branch lines the labour that is available in the particular district will be utilised, it is expected, without interfering unduly with the farmers' help in the busy season. Parliament undoubtedly has full control in the matter, but this I say is the practical way of doing it. The government, the railway board and the engineers are of the opinion that the lines could be built fairly expeditiously and at a minimum cost, and there is nothing to hide nor is there any intention of hiding anything.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How does the minister distinguish these branch lines from the hundreds of branch lines that have been built before?

Mr. CHAPLIN: The minister is constructing the Welland canal, but he does not take in respect of that work, the position he holds now. He lets a contract in that case, to run, say, three or four years, but each year he comes to parliament with his estimates so that parliament can decide what money shall be spent in any particular year. This is all we ask in respect of these railways.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The controversy seems to be as to whether we shall vote a definite sum for a period of three years if the bill is passed.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We do not vote anything.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Each one of these lines calls for a fixed sum.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We are voting nothing; this is not a voting bill. The bill is to get away from that. The whole question is whether we are to vote funds or not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The mind of my hon. friend (Mr. Stewart) is in the right state, and I hope he will not have it affected by contact with his colleague the Minister of Railways.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My understanding was that there was to be a fixed sum in each of the bills.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But we are not getting a chance to vote it.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Is it not in the bill?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We are asked to pass the bill.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I think there is a fixed sum attached to each bill and beyond that the railway board cannot go unless they secure a further sum for the purposes for which it is required. My hon. friend says that annually we should put that sum in the estimates of the proposed amount to be spent that year. If that is done, each year the contractor or the board will have to await the vote before they make their arrangements to carry on the work, which undoubtedly means, as my hon. friend knows perfectly well, that it will be at least June before construction work is started, quite apart from the purchase of ties.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Was it June in the case of the National Transcontinental? Was it June in the case of the Grand Trunk Pacific? Was it June in the case of the branch lines that are already mostly built? In respect of every one of these there was a vote.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Both my hon. friend and I are familiar with the railway guaranties given by both the federal and provincial governments. For example, $20,000 a mile was guaranteed on a certain mileage of road. Parliament voted it and the government were given authority to pay it out on progress estimates. My recollection is that we did not vote the money annually by way of estimates.

[Mr. Chaplin.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: We voted every dollar.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have a perfectly clear recollection of the provincial procedure. I merely mention it in passing as the method by which construction was carried on. There was no cessation of construction; it went on continuously until the amount voted by parliament for the specific purpose was exhausted. Now you have here a three-year contract. I have no particular desire to withhold anything from parliament, but my understanding is that we are voting for each one of these lines a certain specific sum of money—if I am wrong I should like to be corrected—and that it is to be spent over a period of three years. If that is the case, I fail to see that parliament has not full control of the amount voted specifically for each line. If that amount is exhausted, certainly parliament will be called upon to vote more money. If we were not voting this specific amount I am not sure that there would not be a good deal in the contention of my hon. friend, but under the circumstances I cannot see why we have not complete control.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Why would not everything the minister says apply to the Welland canal or any other public work?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I do not know the conditions surrounding the Welland canal. My argument is that you are voting, for example, $2,000,000 by the enactment of this bill, and you are consulting parliament now as to the amount that will be expended upon each one of these branch lines.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why should this parliament decide what the next parliament may do?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): There may be something in that contention. But my hon. friend is arguing that parliament has no control over the expenditure. I contend that parliament has absolute control under this bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I argue that parliament has no control year by year as it ought to have over all expenditure year by year. Think of a Liberal government, boasting its liberalism standing here between parliament and its rights in a case which is not distinguishable in any degree from any public works that have been undertaken for the past fifty years!

Mr. GRAHAM: I am not going to follow my right hon. friend, because I have stated the case from the pure business standpoint, and my friend the Minister of the Interior has supported my argument. I am not sure after all that it would not save this country money if in every public work the full amount of the expenditure was put in at the start, either in the bill or otherwise.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister favour that?

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend as a member of former governments has consented to start a work costing $200,000 on a $20,000 estimate. Unless a member has had experience he will imagine he is voting for a $20,000 expenditure, and in the absence of a full explanation he will be surprised when year after year the vote eventually runs up to $200,000. Now, we are inserting in these bills the full cost of construction, and a clause, suggested by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Baxter) has been added that if the engineers find after final surveys that the work is likely to cost more than this amount, construction is not to be started until after we have come back to parliament. That is pretty good control.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Has not that control always existed?

Mr. GRAHAM: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Of course it has in every other case.

Mr. GRAHAM: The clause suggested is not in any other bill that I know of.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly it is not, because in the other cases the money is voted year by year; why in the world would it be inserted there? How does he think the country is going to save any money merely because it is stated in the bill in the first place what the total cost is to be? If it turns out that the cost is more, you just come back to parliament and get the extra money; that is all.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend does not catch the point. Before the company start this work if they find out it is going to cost more than the amount stated they have to come back to parliament before they spend any money on construction at all; while with the usual estimate, after you have spent $10,000 or $20,000 you cannot stop even if in the long run the total cost exceeds $200,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Suppose the engineers turn out to be wrong in their estimate?

Mr. GRAHAM: There is a possibility of that always, but we have to depend on human agencies. In the estimate, I suggest the engineers know when they start that the work will cost $200,000, but only $20,000 is asked in the estimate, and those of us not in touch with the situation would be committing the country for $200,000 when we thought we were only committing it for $20,000. In this case every member knows exactly the amount intended to be expended on each branch line. Let me point out that I am informed that in the United States all large contracts for public works are voted for a term of years with the entire amount expected to be expended contained in the first vote. They have to report progress to congress each year with full information of what has been done, but until the amount voted in the first estimate is exhausted congress is not asked for any further vote. That is the principle of this bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Suppose a work is to cost $10,000,000, and to be built over a period of ten years, is the whole $10,000,000 charged in the estimate of the one year in the comparison of that year with another?

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not know how the bookkeeping works out, but I do know they state the whole amount in the estimate for the entire work; at least full information is given as to the entire work.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly; and in this parliament too.

Mr. GRAHAM: There is nothing new in this, it is a purely business proposition. It was the same in respect to our highways, where parliament had power to step in any year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: As I understand the minister, certainly the legislative body gets full information. And we ought to get every time all the best information the engineer can give of what the total expenditure will be. But to suggest that the United States Senate and House of Representatives vote one year the money that is to be expended over a long period of years in great enterprises—why, does the minister suggest that the cost of the Panama canal was voted in one year?

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not know what legislation was in force then.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There would be no continuity in the estimate at all then. Do what is done in the United States; that will be satisfactory to us.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We are voting for this particular line, $357,000, and we are asking that construction may be over a period of three years. The amount may be expended in two years if the work is carried on successfully. I confess I have no particular objection to what my hon. friend says, except this: You will run the construction to a late period in the summer if you have to wait annually for estimates for construction. If you vote $20,000 for this line this year and you spend the whole of that amount, no further work can be done until a new vote is taken after the 31st of March next.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the trouble about getting a new vote?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I do not suppose there would be any trouble. if parliament decides that this line shall be built. But you do stop the continuity of construction.

Mr. CHAPLIN: In what way?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Any railway construction in this country must be carried on before frost sets in, and if you have to wait for an estimate the next year, with a short season for railway construction, you will be into June before you can begin work again. Labour is a movable commodity in Canada; railwaymen desert railway work in the harvest season, particularly in the West, and that means that the cost of railway construction is added to. I would be the last to argue that any right should be taken from parliament or that parliament should not know exactly what is being done with the money voted. But when you vote this $357,000 for 12 miles of railway, there is absolute control under the provisions of the present bill, and you have a period of three years within which to spend the money if that length of time is required for the construction.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not like to see my hon. friend do so much violence to his principles. He does not want to take away parliamentary control. Well, he does not have to do it; he can stay by his principles if he wants to. In the first place, we are not voting money by this bill; we are simply enabling the government to exercise certain rights of guarantee. I am sure my hon. friend will be horrified to find that a single cent should be spent unless it is properly voted by parliament, but as I say we are not by this legislation voting a dollar. My hon. friend knows how votes are made effective. He knows about the Supply Bill; he knows about the statutory estimates. He knows that our supply bills are charges upon our consolidated revenue fund. He knows all about our system of bookkeeping, and checks here and checks there. He knows how these systems are used for the purposes of comparison in arriving at an idea of the value of services here and services there. These are the principles my hon. friend stands for, but they all go, so far as these lines are concerned. It is idle to talk about a three-year period within which construction may be completed. There is no reason why this little line should not be built at once, particularly in the prairies where no difficulties in construction are encountered, and the way to get these lines built at once is to have the votes appear in the year's estimates. My hon. friend is right in saying that railway construction work cannot proceed when the frost is in the ground, and that there is only a short season. But every autumn and winter the preparations can be made, material, ties and all that sort of thing got ready, for the commencement of work as soon as the frost is out of the ground. That is what always has been done under the annual vote. My hon. friend knows, too, that the vote is carried over for six weeks after the statutory year. and also that as a matter of course interim supply is voted. Looking at it in the light of his own principles, which he has already enunciated, my hon. friend, it seems to me, will have to vote against this proposition.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am sure my hon. friend does not want to misquote me. I do not see that I am violating any principle. I understand perfectly well that the company may issue bonds, notes, or securities which the government may guarantee for the construction of these lines. My hon. friend says that these lines ought to be built in one year. I do not know whether that could be done, but it is obvious that there can be no guarantee beyond the amount specified in the act, and if you were voting the money direct the same principle would apply. As I understand it, my hon. friend is not objecting to the amount, $357,000; he simply says that such portion of that amount should be voted each year as may be required for that year.

9 p.m.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend has not quite got the point If there is to be any real consistency in the carrying on of the public business these items ought to appear in the estimates this year and just the same for the one year as for the three years.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I must confess that I cannot see the point.

Amendment (Sir Henry Drayton) negatived; Yeas, 11; Nays, 65.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 4.—Mileage and cost are estimates only but not to be exceeded by more than 15 per cent.

Mr. MILLAR: In view of the fact that clause 5 is now incorporated in the bill—

The CHAIRMAN: We have not got to clause 5 yet, we are considering clause 4.

Mr. MILLAR: I wish to discuss clause 4 in the light of clause 5. I should like to ask the minister if 15 per cent is not rather small. As I understand clause 5, it means that should a re-survey of a branch line that has been already started disclose the cost to be more than 15 per cent above the amount named in the bill, the work will not be undertaken. In view of the fact that the cost of labour and of material fluctuates, and delay in construction work is sometimes caused by bad weather, a 15 per cent margin is very small. That would mean that many of the branch lines might not be built this year. If that is the case the situation is rather serious because many families in some of these districts are simply holding on believing they are going to have these branch lines this year. Should the lines not be built they intend to move out. I may be wrong in my interpretation of this clause and if so I should like to be set right.

Mr. GRAHAM: There may be something in what my hon. friend says. This provision of 15 per cent was placed in the bill to meet an objection which had been raised that the minister had too much authority and could go on under the old bill and spend all that he desired, as his estimates as to distance and cost were only approximate. I think the interpretation my hon. friend has drawn is all right, and being of that opinion I am inclined to believe it is not a bad idea to hold the engineers to the estimate. In the case of lines partially constructed they ought to be able to estimate pretty carefully, because in a good many instances all they are going to do is to lay the steel. It may be a small percentage as my hon. friend says, but the engineer assured me the other day in discussing this matter we were safe in fixing that amount in any of the estimates particularly in the case of those lines in which there had been partial construction.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think that so far as the prairie lines are concerned there ought not to be the slightest difficulty, unless a sink hole is encountered or some unforeseen trouble. But I anticipate the only place where there may be trouble is where an expensive piece of bridge work has to be done or some extraordinary bit of country encountered. In the case of prairie lines I should think there would be absolutely nothing of the kind. The whole proposition was as to whether there was to be an absolutely free hand given without the slightest control. I do not think my hon. friend need worry about the way the section reads.

Mr. GRAHAM: There might be difficulty where rock was unexpectedly struck or something of that kind, or where deep cuts were needed, but provision for that would be made in the final estimates. In the construction of prairie lines I do not think there will be any difficulty.

Mr. LEWIS: I think the limit is quite adequate. If the engineers have made a careful survey of the line they ought to be able to tell within 15 per cent of what the estimated cost would be. If rock should be struck, where there has been partial construction, as the minister suggested, and the amount is insufficient, the matter could be rectified the following year.

Mr. GOULD: But if construction was to take place this year, and by chance 15 per cent was not sufficient to complete the line to, say, within one mile of its terminal, that would be a very serious difficulty, and very great hardship might result. I am inclined to take the same view as my hon. friend (Mr. Millar).

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Statement to parliament annually.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There are a couple of changes which ought to be made here although the minister will think they are merely formal. Doubtless my hon. friend's idea there about presenting these returns to parliament is that they should come down when the other statutory returns are called for. It would not be fair to parliament to table them at the end of the session.

Mr. GRAHAM: Oh, no.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think what my hon. friend contemplates is bringing down the statement during the first ten days of the session.

Mr. GRAHAM: No doubt.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then I would move with my hon. friend's consent, that the first line should be changed so as to read "The minister shall present to parliament during the first ten days." Just add the words "the first ten days."

Mr. GRAHAM: Carried.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The other point is that a statement might be submitted that would simply show the results in gross. I think the different activities, whatever they are, should be shown. So I would suggest inserting the words "in detail" after the word "showing."

Mr. GRAHAM: In what line?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In line three, to have it read "showing in detail."

Mr. GRAHAM: The few amendments we have here will go into the other bills; the amounts only will be different.

Amendment agreed to, and section as amended agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

KAMLOOPS-KELOWNA DIVISION

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the House go into committee on Bill No. 33, respecting the construction of a Canadian National Railway line, Kamloops-Kelowna division, province of British Columbia.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 1—Power to construct and complete line described in schedule.

Mr. GRAHAM: The same amendment will be inserted in this bill, except the schedule.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Company may issue securities and Governor in Council may authorize guarantee thereof.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This line is in the same position as the other line, and we think it is a line that ought to be completed. I desire to move the same amendment as I moved to the last bill, and I presume the hon. minister would like my speech to be taken as read.

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The amendment reads:

Provided the amount so to be guaranteed shall first be included in the estimates and voted by parliament for that purpose.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

I do not want to delay the House by taking a vote. I am quite content that the amendment should be declared lost on division, the whole Conservative opposition voting in favour of the resolution, and the whole Grit party voting unanimously against it.

Mr. GRAHAM: Very well.

Amendment (Sir Henry Drayton) negatived on division.

On section 3—Certificates of minister as to mileage of said line of railway.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister agrees to exactly the same amendments as were made in the last bill.

Mr. GRAHAM: Surely.

On section 8—Statement to parliament annually.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This clause is to be amended, by adding after the word "during" in the first line the following words:

The first ten days of.

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes, and after the word "showing" the words "in detail" are to be added.

Amendment agreed to.

PEEBLES, NORTHERN SASKATCHEWAN

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the House go into committee on Bill No. 41, respecting the construction of a Canadian National railway line from Peebles southerly in the province of Saskatchewan.

Motion agreed to, and the House went into committee, Mr. Marcil (Bonaventure) in the chair.

On section 1—Power to construct and complete line as described in schedule.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is no objection from this quarter of the House to this bill. It is a bit of line that we think ought to have been built before.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Company may issue securities and Governor in Council may authorize guarantee thereof.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In connection with this section, you will please note the amendment made to the other bills and defeated. To save time, I am perfectly willing that they should be considered as now put and lost on division. I move that section 2 be amended by adding thereto the following words:

Provided that the amount so to be guaranteed shall first be included in the estimates and voted by parliament for that purpose.

Amendment negatived on division.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Statement to parliament annually.

Mr. GRAHAM moved that section 8 be amended by adding after the word "during" in the first line the words "the first ten days of" and after the word "showing" in the third line the words "in detail."

GRAVELBOURG-NEIDPATH EXTENSION

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the House go into committee on Bill No. 42, respecting the construction of a Canadian National line extending the Gravelbourg branch to Neidpath, in the province of Saskatchewan.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Marcil (Bonaventure) in the chair.

On section 1—Power to construct and complete line as described in schedule.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This line also is a railway which we think ought to be built, indeed, ought to have been built before now.

Mr. LEWIS: I want to make just a little explanation while this bill is going through. When this matter was in the resolution stage, I spoke on behalf of this line being connected up with Swift Current, and the Swift Current paper made a comment on the situation that the bill was not providing a railway running into Swift Current. The Regina Leader took up the situation and said: How could they expect the government to approve a railway running into Swift Current when the hon. member for Swift Current was opposed to the railway policy of the government? I should like to know just when I was opposed to the branch line policy of this government. This bill has been before parliament for two years and never has it been the government's intention to extend the railway from Neidpath into Swift Current. I have spoken on this bill for three years in succession and placed before parliament the arguments why the line should be completed to Swift Current. The hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. McTaggart), whose constituency is in close proximity to the line spoke in favour of the situation also. I called on the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) to speak on behalf of it, and he said that he understood the people of Swift Current wanted the line, but that he felt there were far more important branches needed in the rural district and, until they were completed, he did not feel that this line was essential. All I want to say is this, that so far the government has never suggested that this line be brought into Swift Current. Furthermore, I understand that railways are out of politics, and even if I were against the government's branch line policy, they would not penalize a member or jeopardise a city just because I was against the bill. Moreover, I understand that this policy is being brought forward by the National Railway Board and not on account of politics. For that reason I think the Regina Leader is altogether out of order. I trust the government's policy in this respect.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Company may issue securities and Governor in Council may authorise guarantee thereof.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I move that the following words be added to section 2:

EYRE-ACADIA VALLEY

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways) moved that the House go into committee on Bill No. 52, respecting the construction of a Canadian National Railway line between Eyre, in the province of Saskatchewan, and Acadia Valley, in the province of Alberta.

Motion agreed to, and the House went into committee, Mr. Marcil (Bonaventure) in the chair.

On section 1—Power to construct and complete line described in schedule.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The position here is again the same. It is a line that should be built, and would have been built, if it had not been for my friend's desire to adopt a novel procedure last session. But it seems to me there is a mistake in the schedule. The mileage already graded is forty-two miles, and the mileage, including the existing grading, is stated to be twenty-five miles.

Mr. GRAHAM: They are going to put steel on the twenty-five miles.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is, the twenty-five miles of steel will be put entirely upon the existing grade?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

ST. PAUL SOUTHEASTERLY

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the House go into committee on Bill No. 55, respecting the construction of a Canadian National Railway line from St. Paul, in the province of Alberta, southeasterly 21 miles.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Marcil (Bonaventure) in the chair.

On section 1—Power to construct and complete line described in schedule.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I would like the word "southeasterly" in the title amended to read "easterly." The Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National had some controversy about the line running south of the Saskatchewan. That, I understand, has been adjusted and the line will go in so as to give service to the people along the river. It is suggested that the one line would serve that north country by its diversion to the north. However, the engineers have been asked to make a reconnaissance of that country to see whether by going a little further north with this extension easterly from St. Paul they could give the needed service, when the line is built in between the Canadian National and the river, to the south.

Mr. STEVENS: This does not make any material change, does it, in the direction and location indicated to the committee on the maps when we were examining into the matter? If it does, of course we ought to scrutinize it with a little more care.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): If the line runs in a southeasterly direction from St. Paul de Metis it certainly will not be of any service to Bonnyville and the thickly settled territory to the north of St. Paul. These settlers requested that another line be built 10 or 15 miles to the westward of St. Paul, which would mean two lines in that locality. By this line running a little more to the northward it might serve the locality much better and would still connect with the line coming in from the eastward.

10 p.m.

Mr. STEVENS: There is no material alteration in the general direction of this line?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No.

Mr. KELLNER: Is it the intention to use the present survey, or will there be an entirely new survey?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): They would have to change the survey for this line, because it connects most directly between a point in Saskatchewan and St. Paul de Metis in Alberta.

Mr. KELLNER: I questioned the engineer very definitely on that point in the committee and he said they were going to use the same survey. I also asked about that other proposed branch: The request is that that line branch out at Ashmount and go up to the Cold Lake country, and he said it was one of the branches that they anticipated building some time, but not immediately. I tried to get him to make a commitment in the matter, because the provincial government are also considering building branches into that same territory.

Mr. STEVENS: The hon. member refers to what we described in the committee as the northerly route?

Mr. KELLNER: Yes. I thought it fair to the provincial government that the engineer should at least definitely state whether there was any prospect of their changing the route of this proposed branch and going farther north, and he said that was not expected at all, they were going to make use of the existing data.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am going to ask that we be given the opportunity, unless it is impossible, to serve these people; it is possible to go closer to them than is contemplated by the proposed line. It is a very difficult thing to interfere with the engineers. We will have to abide by their decision after all.

Mr. SPENCER: It is my opinion that the country about which we are talking is so large that it cannot be served by one railway.

I think that a line will have to go somewhere along the proposed route. Perhaps it may go a little north but of course that will have to be left to the engineers. There will have to be another line running farther north probably starting from Ashmont and serving the country of St. Vincent, Rife, Bonnyville, Durlingville and tapping the Cold Lake country. I think this will be necessary because the country north of the Beaver river is a good country, and just as soon as there is railway transportation within reasonable distance there is not the slightest doubt in my mind but that it will be settled. The Minister of the Interior mentioned that there was a line going from Lloydminister in a northwesterly direction between the river and the present Canadian National line, and he intimated that this would serve those people as far as the river, possibly those just the other side of the river. I think that was his intention. It is pretty difficult without having a map before us to get hon. members to realize the huge distances that have to be traversed in that part of the country. For instance the distance from Vermilion to the river, Saskatchewan, is about forty-seven miles. Now if you split that country with a railway, as it is the intention to do, even then there are twenty-three odd miles before you get to the river. Then there are the very steep banks of the Saskatchewan river to be crossed before you reach the other side. Therefore I do not think that railway will be of very much service to the people on the other side of the Saskatchewan. Of course it would have to be left to the judgment of the engineers, but in my opinion if we are going to keep the people who are already settled in that country in great numbers—having gone in on the promise of a railway years ago—two railways will have to be constructed to serve that huge territory. Of course we realize that we cannot get all these facilities at once, but I do hope that the railway suggested in this bill will be started this year. I have had letters this last week from several people in that vicinity recounting the number of settlers who were losing heart and pulling out. They have been there for many years, and they hoped every year to see the railway come along. Up to the present time it has not come, and they now hear rumours that the route may be changed to this point or the other point. It is this very uncertainty that is losing us at the present time a number of settlers. I sincerely hope that if this bill goes through, as I hope it will, that it will be started this year.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Am I to understand my hon. friend does not want the amendment?

Mr. SPENCER: I have no objection to the amendment as long as the railway is not taken too far north. It could go northeasterly or southeasterly, but if the route followed is easterly I do not think there will be much harm done.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): That is agreeable to me.

Mr. SPENCER: But it is my opinion that we cannot serve that country properly with only one railway.

Mr. KELLNER: Regardless of what the amendment provides there ought to be some information as to what particular township you expect to land up in when you get that twenty-one miles constructed.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My proposition is to leave it entirely to the engineer.

Mr. KELLNER: If you do that, in the event of the engineer being sincere in the statement to the committee, it will go right where the survey is now.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I cannot help that. I may say for the information of the committee that I had representations from a delegation that came down here from Bonnyville at considerable expense. These people have been in the country for sixteen years. I am not sanguine that the engineers will change this route but what I did ask them to do was to make a reconnaissance of the country from Ashmont via Bonnyville to Cold lake. If the line were to run in an easterly direction it might not serve the Bonnyville territory because they would have to travel a considerable distance to the railway.

Mr. KELLNER: Is it your opinion that one railway will serve that country?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I would not like to say.

Mr. GRAHAM: I suppose the real object of the amendment is to give the engineers a little more latitude rather than to tie them up to one location?

Mr. STEVENS: How does the amendment now read?

Mr. GRAHAM: That the line shall be easterly.

Mr. STEVENS: Instead of a southeasterly direction? Is that the only change?

Mr. GRAHAM: That is the only change.

Mr. STEVENS: It is in some township.

Mr. KELLNER: There is no township mentioned.

Mr. STEVENS: The schedule of the bill reads:

From St. Paul in a southeasterly direction to a point in or near township 57, range 6, west of the 4th meridian, in the province of Alberta.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The title reads now:

From St. Paul in the province of Alberta southeasterly twenty-one miles.

Mr. STEVENS: We are not concerned about that. That is merely a title.

Mr. KELLNER: I should like to point out that if this railway is going to end up in township 63 or 64 it will be an entirely different matter. You are getting the line away altogether from the settlement which is down along the Saskatchewan river.

Mr. GRAHAM: Township 57, range 6, it says in the schedule.

Mr. KELLNER: But if the road is run in an easterly direction it will probably end in township 63 or 64. The committee should have more information on the matter.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): If the line is going to end in section 57 there is no use in amending the bill. We might as well leave it alone. I do not think it is a mistake, however.

Mr. SPENCER: Do I understand the minister aright that he considers the Elk Point country not as good as the Bonnyville country?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I would say they are about similar.

Mr. SPENCER: I think they are very similar. I appreciate the position the Minister of the Interior is in, having had a delegation down here, but the trouble is that I have had representations from two sources, pulling in opposite directions.

Mr. GRAHAM: Which direction do you pull in?

Mr. SPENCER: The largest representation is asking for the railway along the line of the original survey, but I realize that another railway has to be built to serve the people further north.

Mr. KELLNER: I think the Minister of the Interior has brought some of the trouble on his own head. I have a copy of a letter which appeared in the Edmonton Journal purporting to be from the Minister of the Interior to the Edmonton Board of Trade, and which reads:

I have been very busy securing an extension of this line from St. Paul de Metis eastward, and have succeeded in having an amount included in the branch lines bills. It does not necessarily follow that any particular location has to be adopted, and I am now prepared to discuss location with the delegation, and to press their views upon the engineers who will be in charge of the extension.

The Edmonton Journal comments on this letter as follows:

What the delegation is seeking is an extension of the St. Paul branch in a northeasterly direction toward Cold Lake, so that it may serve a better and more productive section of the country than if it were routed in a southeasterly direction along the Saskatchewan river, as originally planned.

I thought I would mention this matter because I am quite convinced that it would probably be a good idea to leave these branch lines to the judgment of the engineers; we are advised from time to time that there is no undue political influence used, and I would not say there was even political influence in this letter.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Pretty strong, but perhaps not undue.

Mr. KELLNER: I am willing to congratulate the minister on the careful wording of the letter. It is very carefully worded.

Mr. STEVENS: I would like to suggest, in view of the precedent laid down this afternoon in the peremptory discharge of an old civil servant for political interference with scientific procedure in connection with one department, that the minister who has undoubtedly allowed politics to enter into this important matter, interfering with the decision and opinion of the engineers, should be summarily dismissed and asked outright for his resignation. That would create harmony in keeping with the policy of the country.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am delighted with the letter and glad to hear the statement of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens). I am sure my hon. friend has often sought to work in the interests of his constituents. These are not my constituents; but I am interested in all the people in Alberta, and in any delegation that comes here, and I certainly will continue to try to use my influence to meet what I think are legitimate requests. If there is any harm in that then I am guilty. The Edmonton Board of Trade were interested in the line, and knowing the country as I do, I saw no harm in bringing it to the attention of the engineers, which I did. I got no promise from the engineers that they would change the route. I did get a promise that they would make a survey of the whole country and make up their minds as to which was the best location to serve the people up there.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps the committee will excuse the minister if he promises not to do it again.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I will not promise that.

Mr. KELLNER: Will the minister explain if this statement that he was instrumental in getting a grant for an extension for 21 miles east of St. Paul de Metis is correct or was that done under the ordinary methods of procedure?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): There is no grant. It is just in the same position as any other extension.

Mr. KELLNER: The hon. minister does not get my point.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes, I got it a long while ago. I get your point very frequently. Your point is to try to discredit anything that the Minister of the Interior might do in the vicinity of Edmonton. Now just keep right at it, so far as I am concerned. I am interested in all the people in the different localities. These branch lines are being discussed; delegations are coming here; letters are being written, and out of courtesy to the people who write the letters I have to take an interest in these things. In a sense the Board of Trade of Edmonton did make a request at the instance of the people in that locality, and I certainly have no apology to make.

Mr. KELLNER: What authority has the minister to make a statement that I was trying in any way to embarrass him? I have never done so in this House. If the reading of the letter is the trouble, I do not think the Minister of the Interior should be bothered.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Do you think the letter is material to anything that has transpired to-day?

Mr. KELLNER: I did not say it was.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Then what is the object of bringing it up?

Mr. KELLNER: There is one thing the minister might explain. He said he was instrumental in having a bill brought in in reference to the branch lines we are now discussing. That is not the function of the minister.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): If suggesting this is one of the matters for the consideration of the railway board of the Board of Management of the Canadian National Railways or of the Canadian Pacific Railway,—because I have gone to both on the same mission, pressing the claims of these localities—is a crime, I have been guilty. Further than that I have not gone.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Would the minister be kind enough to tell us how to get in touch with the board? How is it done?

Mr. BELAND: Go to Montreal.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think my hon. friend really knows. Will the minister not tell us how it was done.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I invariably see the chairman, Sir Henry Thornton.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Company may issue securities and Governor in Council may authorize guarantee thereof.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON moved that the section be amended by adding the following:

RESIGNATION OF MR. WALTER G. MITCHELL

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I see by the press that Mr. Walter Mitchell is desirous of having his letter to me regarded as a public one. I therefore beg to lay these letters on the Table of the House.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): In view of the fact that the resignation is plainly designed to test public opinion on the question of the budget, can the Prime Minister make any statement as to the probable date of the by-election in Mr. Mitchell's constituency.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The government has not yet decided on the date, but as soon as a decision is reached public announcement will be made.

5. What is the resultant operating ratio of the year's operations based upon the retention of but 60 per cent of the receipts?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

2. Are citizens of United States permitted to be directors on Canadian steamship companies?
3. What citizens of United States hold position of directors on Canadian steamship companies, and in what companies?

[Mr. Graham.]

Hon. Mr. COPP:

1. This is a matter of United States law upon which there is no information at hand.
2. Yes. The persons who are qualified to be owners of British ships are set out in section 1 of the Imperial Merchant Shipping Act, 1894. This section includes among those qualified to be owners, "Bodies corporate established and subject to the laws of some part of Her Majesty's Dominions and having their principal place of business in those Dominions." This section applies to Canada. The provisions of this section were modified by The British Ships (Transfer restriction) Acts of 1915 and 1916, which are still in effect in the United Kingdom, but do not apply to Canada. The parliament of Canada, by Chapter 42 of the Statutes of 1919, enacted similar legislation but this act was in operation only for three years and expired in July 1922.
3. No information.

FRUIT DIVISION TELEGRAPHIC REPORTS

*Mr. MERCIER:

1. Is it the intention of the government to publish in French, telegraphic reports received by the Fruit division of the Department of Agriculture, and to send that French version to those interested?
2. If so, with what delay?

Hon. Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. Yes.
2. With no unnecessary delay.

OLYMPIC GAMES, 1924

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What grant has been made towards Canada's entries for the Olympic Games, 1924?
2. What entries has Canada made so far, and how are the Canadian teams or contestants chosen or selected? What teams or contestants are yet to go?
3. When was the grant paid over and to what organization?
4. How much has been spent to date, and what remains, if any?
5. Is it the intention of the government to make up any deficit or grant a supplementary appropriation to take care of the rowing, track, canoe and other teams not yet gone over to the games?

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

1. $15,000.
2. No information.
3. Payment was made on December 21, 1923, to the Canadian Olympic committee.
4. No information. As in the past, the amount was voted as a grant and not as an accountable expenditure of the government.
5. The amount which has been voted and paid represents the government's contribution towards the expenses of the Canadian athletes at the Olympic Games in 1924.

PROPOSED TORONTO RAILWAY VIADUCT

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has a report been received by the government from Sir Henry Thornton strongly recommending the carrying out of the contract for the construction of a railway viaduct at Toronto and asking for an immediate decision by the government and for funds and for power to immediately proceed with the work?
2. What is the exact terms of the recommendation in question?
3. What action has been taken or will be taken by the government?
4. Will a copy of the reply of the government be laid on the Table of the House, and when?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM: A letter has been received and I will lay a copy of it on the Table of the House. That will be better than answering this question.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Could the letter not be handed in with the answer?

Mr. GRAHAM: There is some other correspondence and I have not yet looked into it. In reply to the fourth question, I might say that the matter is under consideration. Let the question stand for the time being and I will look into it.

Question stands.

4. If purchased from H. J. Daly, is he the H. J. Daly who was president of the Home Bank?

Hon. Mr. KING (Kootenay):

1. From the H. J. Daly Company, Limited.
2. In 1921 under authority of order in council dated August 31, 1921, date of deed of conveyance September 19, 1921.
3. The price was $1,000,000 payable in ten annual payments of $100,000 each with interest at 6 per cent per annum on deferred payments, with the right to make all or any of the payments, subsequent to the first payment, before they become due; in which case a corresponding reduction would be made in the amount of the interest. Three payments have been made as follows: 1921-22, $100,000; 1922-23, $154,000; 1923-24, $148,000.
4. Yes.

Mr. LAPOINTE: These documents have already been placed on the Table of the House. I do not know whether there is any other correspondence. I have no objection to the motion being passed.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved that the House go into Committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

1. That the Governor in Council may appoint one or more deputy local judges for any Admiralty district, and a deputy registrar for any district or registry division of any district;

2. That when the local judge of the Quebec Admiralty district resides at Montreal, the deputy local judge residing at Quebec shall be paid the salary, if any, which he would have received if he were the local judge of the district; and when the local judge resides at Quebec, the deputy local judge residing at Montreal shall receive the salary, if any, which he would have received if he were the local judge of the district; but not more than one deputy local judge in the district shall receive a salary.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

LAUSANNE TREATY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Is the Prime Minister in a position to lay on the Table of the House the correspondence with regard to the Lausanne Treaty or to make any statement thereon?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: (Prime Minister): It had been my intention to suggest this evening that to-morrow we take up a consideration of the Lausanne matter. I have, however, received within the last few hours, a cable from the British government to which I have replied. Pending further possible word I think it would be well, perhaps, to allow the discussion to stand until Wednesday that I may have the correspondence with the British government complete.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): After the correspondence is on the Table in full, it would be unfair to bring the discussion on immediately. Certainly the House would want an opportunity to read the correspondence and to see if some light or clear line of action can be deduced from it. I suggest that unless the correspondence is laid on the Table to-day, it would be unfair to bring the discussion on so soon as Wednesday.

[Mr. Coote.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I agree with my right hon. friend. I may say that the government has not yet obtained the consent of the British government to lay the correspondence on the Table, but I hope it will be possible to get that consent, and it is in that hope that I still am waiting. If this consent is obtained I shall be pleased to allow whatever time hon. members may wish for the purpose of reading the correspondence in the first instance. That, I think, would be the quickest way of disposing of the whole matter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Has the Prime Minister yet received replies to those telegrams which were despatched some weeks ago to the other dominions in order to ascertain which was the recalcitrant dominion?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have the answers here and I may as well take this occasion to read them to the House. On May 6 I sent a message to the Prime Ministers, respectively, of Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and Newfoundland; I did not include the Irish Free State as I understood that it had not been organized at the time the Lausanne Conference was being arranged. The message I cabled to Australia was as follows:

Ottawa, May 6, 1924.

Premier Bruce,

Melbourne, Australia.

Canadian government desires to have tabled in Great Britain and Canada correspondence between Canada and Great Britain respecting Lausanne Conference and invitations thereto. Cable despatches state Secretary of State for Colonies says Imperial government does not object but that by agreement at Imperial Conference consent of all dominions should first be obtained. Please advise by cable if government of Australia is agreeable to having tabled such correspondence between Canada and Great Britain as may be agreed upon by British and Canadian governments.

MACKENZIE KING.

Premier Bruce, of Australia, replied on May 7:

Your telegram dated 6th May Lausanne Conference. Commonwealth government has no objection tabling correspondence between Canada and Great Britain Have however already advised British government that so far as Australia is concerned prior to making of any statement purporting to summarize the views of the Dominions on this question the desirability that such statement be communicated to us prior to publicity.

A cable, in words identical to that sent Australia, was sent to the other dominions.

On May 12 General Smuts, the Prime Minister of the Union of South Africa, cabled:

Your telegram dated 6th May: I have not seen the correspondence but I raise no objection to publication.

On May 8 the following reply was received from Premier Warren, of Newfoundland:

Referring your telegram May 6: Government Newfoundland is agreeable to having tabled such correspondence between Canada and Great Britain as may be agreed upon by British and Canadian governments respecting Lausanne Conference and invitations thereto.

On May 11 Premier Massey, of New Zealand, replied:

Your telegram sixth Understand communications mentioned were not written with view to publication and if made public am afraid would interfere with clear and frank information being given Dominions to which they are undoubtedly entitled.

I cannot say whether that last message is intended to imply that the correspondence should not be brought down. If it is not so intended, it would appear that all the dominions were agreeable to having the correspondence tabled. I should observe however that the Secretary of State for the Colonies in a despatch to me referring to the press despatch which had appeared regarding his answer in the House of Commons, intimated that the despatch which we received from the press here was not wholly in accord with the answer he had made in the House of Commons. I expect to get word to-day some time, or to-morrow, as to whether the British government will be agreeable to the whole of the correspondence being brought down or not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the Prime Minister say what is the significance of the words "such as may be agreed upon between the British government and the Canadian government" appearing at the end of his own message to the dominions and re-echoed in the reply of at least one, the Prime Minister of Newfoundland? These words imply that all that is suggested by the Prime Minister of Canada is that only such correspondence shall be brought down as shall be later agreed upon between the governments. If so, the agreement to bring down correspondence amounts to nothing.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The purport of these words is that our government would like to have all the correspondence brought down. The British government, however, may object to all of it being brought down, and in that event we should like to have submitted as much as they will agree to. That is the significance of the sentence.

ANNUAL RAILWAY STATEMENT

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Will the Minister of Railways intimate when he expects to make his annual railway statement?

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways): I cannot to-day fix any date positively but I hope it will be very soon.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This week?

Mr. GRAHAM: Hardly this week.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. C. A. GAUVREAU (Temiscouata): In view of the fact that the civil servants are anxious to know what are the provisions of the superannuation bill in order that they may compare the bill with the Calder Act, I should be glad if the Acting Minister of Finance could inform the House just when he proposes to bring the bill down.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance): I hope we shall be able to proceed with the resolution to-morrow.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT—HALF-BREED SCRIP

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (West Edmonton): Will the Prime Minister promise that an opportunity will be given at an early date for the third reading of Bill No. 5 standing in my name under "Public Bills and Orders?"

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I move, Mr. Speaker, that the House proceed to Public Bills and Orders so that the third reading of Bill No. 5 may be taken up.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Mr. D. M. Kennedy (West Edmonton), Bill No. 5, to amend the Criminal Code was read the third time and passed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I move, Mr. Speaker, that the House return to Orders of the Day.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

The House in committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Labour—Conciliation and Labour Act, including publication, printing, binding and distribution of Labour Gazette, and allowance to correspondents, $46,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will the minister inform the committee how much was spent last year? The public accounts have been closed for some time.

Hon. JAMES MURDOCK (Minister of Labour): There was spent $49,966.58.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What changes have been made?

Mr. MURDOCK: We hope to be able to save about $4,000 by having the Labour Gazette printed in the Printing Bureau.

Mr. HOCKEN: What is the cost of the Labour Gazette now?

Mr. MURDOCK: The December issue, 113 pages, 12,725 copies, cost $2,405.63; the January issue, 89 pages, 12,737 copies, cost $1,687.70; the February issue, 120 pages, 12,930 copies, cost $2,177.96; the March issue, 69 pages, 12,655 copies, cost $1,274.86. Smaller type was used for this number.

Mr. HANSON: How many correspondents are there for the Labour Gazette; where are they situated; how are they appointed; and what is their pay?

Mr. MURDOCK: The Labour Gazette has sixty-two correspondents.

Mr. HANSON: I did not think they were quite so numerous. How are they paid?

Mr. MURDOCK: Of these sixty-two correspondents five are in Alberta, six in British Columbia, two in Manitoba, four in New Brunswick, five in Nova Scotia, twenty-five in Ontario, nine in Quebec and one in Prince Edward Island.

Mr. HANSON: Who are the correspondents in New Brunswick, and what are they paid?

Mr. MURDOCK: Fredericton, C. W. Clark, salary $125 per annum; Bathurst, M. H. Levasseur, salary $125 per annum; Moncton, J. C. Graves, salary $150 per annum; St. John, W. H. Coates, salary $225 per annum.

Mr. HOCKEN: In addition to the printing cost what is the total cost of producing the Labour Gazette, including correspondents and other incidental expenses?

Mr. MURDOCK: The sixty-two correspondents cost $9,999.84.

Mr. HOCKEN: And the editors and office staff?

Mr. MURDOCK: An editor, grade 1, $1,800; an assistant editor, $1,680, rising to $1,710; a senior clerk-stenographer, $1,320,—or a total of $4,800.

Mr. HOCKEN: That is the entire staff?

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes, chargeable to the Labour Gazette. There would also be possibly the circulation manager and other staff, and the assistant deputy minister, some of whose time might be chargeable to this work.

Mr. HOCKEN: I suppose there are no overhead charges. But why should there be a circulation manager for a publication of this kind?

Mr. MURDOCK: Only a small portion of his duties deal with the circulation management of the Labour Gazette. He is an expert on labour organizations and keeps in close touch with them all. As a matter of fact, a very small portion of his work has to do with the circulation of the Labour Gazette.

Mr. HOCKEN: I would think so.

Mr. MANION: What is the name of the correspondent of the Labour Gazette at the head of the lakes, and what is his salary?

Mr. MURDOCK: I have the whole list here.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Let us have it.

Those indicated as receiving no pay are fair wage or employment service officers under monthly salary.

Mr. MANION: Why the difference in salaries? One would imagine they would be the same.

Mr. MURDOCK: The salaries in the past have been set, usually on the basis of the importance of the industrial centre that it was proposed to get information from. Usually the correspondent was started at a lower rate and as the work increased, if it did increase, salary increases were at times given. Where there is no ground for complaint the officer is left at the salary as originally established.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What are the duties of the correspondents?

Mr. MURDOCK: Correspondents of the Labour Gazette are expected to keep the department in touch with all matters of importance relating to labour and industry in their several districts and especially to keep the department informed of any developments with regard to the following subjects: Retail prices; strikes and lockouts; changes in wages and hours of labour; industrial agreements and schedules of wages; labour organizations; organization in industry; industrial accidents; employee representation plans; profit sharing; sale of stock to employees, and so on; company stores; housing; any other matters of industrial interest; correspondents in mining districts are expected to forward to the department monthly reports of the mineral production of their locality, showing as far as possible quantity of ore of the various kinds mined and shipped.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I was wondering whether among their other duties they were expected to report on the closing of industrial activities and the reason therefor?

Mr. MURDOCK: It is important that they should let us know what the conditions are in that respect.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I noticed that that was not in the list. Would it be added, or is it added?

Mr. MURDOCK: I presume the correspondent would let us have that information under the heading "changes in wages and hours of labour," or "any other matters of industrial interest."

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: As a matter of fact, do they so report?

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes, from time to time we hear from correspondents as to the conditions respecting employment.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is not an answer to my question? Do these correspondents report to the department on the shutting down of places of business, mills, factories or anything else, and if so, under what head?

Mr. MURDOCK: That particular function would come more properly under the duties of the Employment Service of Canada. We receive from the officers of that service every week, for every town in 78 centres throughout the Dominion, a statement indicating the conditions as to employment.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That would be as to the number of people employed. I take it from the minister's answer that the matter does not properly come under this head. Am I right in assuming that?

Mr. MURDOCK: It has not been regarded as a specific duty of the Labour Gazette correspondent to report as to factories closing down, but we receive reasonably accurate data as to that condition.

Mr. HANSON: Apropos of what the minister has just said, has he received notice that four cotton mills in New Brunswick have in the last week been put upon three days' time?

Mr. MURDOCK: I understand that the only definite information we have got in that respect is from news clippings that have come to us.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That will undoubtedly be cheaper and more accurate than the other information that the minister has. Under what vote will this question as to reports of closing factories come?

Mr. MURDOCK: I presume the hon. gentleman can take it up at any time. We might deal with it under the vote for the co-ordination of employment offices.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If the minister says it should come up then, we will wait till then.

Mr. MURDOCK: I think that would be appropriate.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps the minister would also tell us, so that we can have segregated for general information, the main items making up this vote.

Mr. MURDOCK: The printing of the Labour Gazette is the most important item. Last year that cost $35,097.36. Other items are as follows:

Correspondents' Salaries	$9,999 84
Travelling Expenses	256 40
Rental Surveys	735 90
Retail Prices' Reports	150 00
Wages Report	5 00
Expressage	45
Services Securing Reasons for judgments	42 75
Newspapers and Periodicals	2,066 75
Mailing lists, indices, wrappers, index cards, binding, etc	1,623 13

Mr. LEWIS: Why is this vote called the Conciliation and Labour Act vote? It simply includes the publication, printing, binding and distribution of the Labour Gazette, and allowances to correspondents, does it not?

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend will note by looking at the Conciliation and Labour Act, which gave life in the first place to the Labour department of the Federal government, that it provided for the printing of the Labour Gazette, and so forth, and that is the reason why this vote has come to be known as the Conciliation and Labour Act vote.

Mr. LEWIS: It does not include provision for conciliation boards?

Mr. MURDOCK: No, that comes under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act vote.

Mr. HOCKEN: The minister has told us that by the use of smaller type the volume of the Labour Gazette has been reduced to about 69 pages.

Mr. MURDOCK: I did not mean to imply that. We are making a very determined effort to reduce the number of pages in the Labour Gazette, and have made some headway in that respect. By doing that and using smaller type, last month we were able to reduce the Labour Gazette to 69 pages, the smallest for a long while.

Mr. HOCKEN: Does the minister expect that the information contained in the Labour Gazette will be provided in the same number of pages right along in the future?

Mr. MURDOCK: We think that the essential information can be given in possibly a smaller-paged Labour Gazette than we have had many times in the past. That is the aim, to give all the essential and necessary information as concisely as possible.

Mr. HOCKEN: Is not that one means by which a substantial economy could be effected in the production of the Gazette, by the use of smaller type? There has to be about the same circulation, I presume, but if the book were kept down to between sixty and seventy pages, instead of one hundred and twenty, the mechanical cost would be pretty nearly one-half what it has been. Would the minister tell us that there is an idea of practising economy in that direction? I presume that the Gazette is now set in nine-point type?

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes.

Mr. HOCKEN: Why not set it in seven-point? That would make a very substantial reduction in the volume of the work, and still be good clear type.

Mr. MURDOCK: I am not an expert on that, but the matter has been discussed at considerable length, and it is thought that the nine-point type is about as small as we could properly make it. That is the size used in the printing of Hansard, and we were governed by that to some extent.

Mr. HOCKEN: I do not quite agree with those experts who have been advising the minister. Nearly every daily newspaper printed in this country is printed in seven-point type, which is plenty large enough for people to read by artificial light. I should think that-size type ought to be sufficient for those who read the Labour Gazette. It would reduce the size of the volume very much and effect economy without—and I would emphasize this point—lessening the efficiency of the book.

Mr. MURDOCK: I would be very glad to bring the views of my hon. friend (Mr. Hocken), who I know is a great expert on these matters, to the attention of the officers of the department, and take this matter up further.

Mr. HOCKEN: I would like the minister to use his own eyes and his own judgment.

Mr. MURDOCK: In the final analysis I shall do that, of course. But I do not like to go altogether against the recommendations made to me by the officers of the department and they have intimated that when we get down to the size of type used in Hansard, that ought to be sufficient. I did not like to say to them: No you shall use something smaller than that. But as I say, I shall be very glad to take the matter up again.

Mr. HOCKEN: You see, I am thinking of economy, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MURDOCK: So is the minister, I can assure you.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Can the minister tell us what the circulation of the Gazette is? Are we getting it distributed at useful points, or is it just going to waste-paper baskets?

Mr. MURDOCK: The circulation runs between 12,000 and 13,000 a month. Libraries in all the provinces get 91 copies.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How many copies go to the libraries?

Mr. MURDOCK: The complimentary list is as follows:

Total	7,796

Mr. HANSON: How many paid subscriptions out of 12,000?

Mr. MURDOCK: For the English edition, 6,654, and for the French edition, 1,142, or a total of 7,796, and that is in all the various provinces.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What do they pay?

Mr. MURDOCK: Only 20 cents.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: A year?

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes. That is the price which was established some years ago which, for various reasons, no one has ever thought it advisable to change. They wanted to get the information into the hands of persons who possibly should have the information. As a matter of fact the Labour Gazette costs about 30 cents a copy to print, and 20 cents hardly pays for the bookkeeping.

Mr. HOCKEN: "A guarantee of good faith."

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the minister's view on that subject?

Mr. MURDOCK: I have held that we ought to make the subscription about 50 cents a year, and I have been talking for some time about fixing that price.

Mr. HANSON: Is there any advertising matter in it?

Mr. MURDOCK: No.

Mr. HOCKEN: Is the book set up by monotype or linotype?

Mr. MURDOCK: Monotype and linotype, in the bureau, now. I think it was all linotype when it was done outside.

Mr. HOCKEN: The minister will find linotype composition about 40 per cent cheaper than monotype, and it has been good enough in the past.

Mr. MURDOCK: We have both monotype and linotype in the bureau now, and I shall certainly bring to the attention of the bureau officials the suggestion made by the hon. member. Of course I may be mistaken as to just how it is set up, whether monotype or linotype.

Mr. HOCKEN: The minister will inquire as to the difference in the cost between the two?

Mr. MURDOCK: I shall be glad to do that.

Mr. LEWIS: I would like the minister to consider the question of economy of eyesight when he is dealing with this matter.

Mr. MURDOCK: In what way? Does the hon. member suggest that we should not make the type smaller?

Mr. LEWIS: In considering the value of the type, also consider people's eyesight.

Item agreed to.

Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, $35,000.

Mr. HOCKEN: What was spent last year on this item?

Mr. MURDOCK: The amount last year was $25,375.12.

Mr. HOCKEN: Would that not be enough this year?

Mr. MURDOCK: I am afraid not, for this reason. The year before last we had to come to parliament for a supplementary vote of $4,000. In other words, we ran $39,000 for that year, while this year has been exceptional. We have only thirteen boards sitting this year, the second lowest number for any year since 1907; and therefore the cost has been exceptionally low. We had no board that cost us a great amount of money. The chief expense was in regard to the controversy we had up in Toronto.

Mr. HOCKEN: Does the minister think that with fewer strikes a conciliation board is necessary?

Mr. MURDOCK: My hope is that we will be able to get along next year with even less than $25,000; but I feel that, as this item of $35,000 has run along for a number of years, and sometimes is up a little and sometimes down a little, possibly the safest way is to leave it at that amount, because no hon. member in this House can say what is going to be the conditions for the next six months.

Mr. HOCKEN: It would help the minister to make a good showing.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Can the minister tell us as to the cost of the commission which investigated the steel workers' dispute this year? I think this does not come under this department, but it is part of the industrial conciliation idea.

Mr. MURDOCK: I think that was laid on the Table of the House in response to an order. I am not quite sure of the figures, but my recollection is that the amount was $20,000. If this report is not already on the Table, it will be tabled.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Can the minister tell us the cost of the troops which were despatched to Nova Scotia this last year?

Mr. MURDOCK: No, I have not that information.

Mr. HANSON: Can the minister give an opinion as to the advisability of sending any troops there?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: These are items which very closely affect this matter. The purpose of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act is to prevent industrial trouble. Apparently it has not been successful in a number of instances, and we have other large items coming before the House, expenditures such as that of the special commission in the Nova Scotia Steel strike, and sending troops down there. I think it is fair to ask whether any action has been taken by the government to prevent these troubles.

Mr. MURDOCK: I do not know of any action that could have been taken by this government to prevent the troubles which caused the riots in Nova Scotia which resulted in the calling out of the troops.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask whether the recommendations which were made by the previous Industrial Board with regard to the situation in Nova Scotia, and the recommendations made by the recent commission, have been considered and acted upon by this government?

Mr. MURDOCK: The recommendations and reports of the board have certainly all been considered, and, in so far as this government has any legal authority or right they have been acted upon.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Could we have a little expansion of that statement.

Mr. MURDOCK: In a nutshell it is this: As I have intimated to my hon. friend before—although I know that he would wish that it was not necessary to agree with me—we have no authority to do the things that my hon. friend would like done, and that I also would like to have done.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What things?

Mr. MURDOCK: The things that are necessary to deal with some of the conditions and some of the reports that my hon. friend refers to. Under the British North America Act, as I have said before, and as my hon. friend possibly knows better than I do, the provinces have exclusive jurisdiction over property and civil rights; and therefore in regard to very many of these questions that my hon. friend naturally brings before parliament and the federal Labour department, and asks to have them dealt with, or asks, "What are you doing about it?"—we have not any authority to act except by conciliation, or by an indication of our readiness to do anything we have authority to do, or that we are capable of doing. We have no authority to do anything different to change some of the conditions to which my hon. friend objects. That is the exact position in which we have been as regards some of the conditions my hon. friend speaks of in the coal mining industry.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Do I understand that the minister takes absolutely the ground that there is no possible way in which this federal government can ensure to the steel workers of Nova Scotia a shorter time than the twelve-hour day as they have it at the present time?

Mr. MURDOCK: So far as I know, under the authority that is vested in this federal government or in the Labour department, there is no way to change that condition. I should be glad if my hon. friend, feeling that that is a mistake, would advise how it can be done and give us what we should have done under the circumstances, chapter and verse, so that we would know how to proceed. I would then assure him that the Labour department would move in the direction indicated by him if there was not a blind end to the lane he starts us down.

Mr. HANSON: I will tell the minister how to go about the matter. He might just take the matter up with his friends in the Nova Scotia government. They have authority to change conditions down in Sydney. Has the minister made any representations to the Nova Scotia government in regard to the matter? While he is thinking that over, I should like to ask him this further question: What steps, if any, did he or the officers of his department take to bring about any change in conditions down there, and what, if anything, did they do to settle the difficulties in Nova Scotia before the troops were sent there?

Mr. MURDOCK: In 1923, the steel workers asked for a board of investigation. We did the best that the Labour department could do to get that board of investigation for them, but it was impossible to do so.

Mr. HANSON: Why?

Mr. MURDOCK: In the first place the dispute was in a private industrial concern over which it has never been held that the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act has jurisdiction.

Mr. HANSON: That is to say, the company did not yield to the representations.

Mr. MURDOCK: Although section 63 of the act gives permission, of course, to the minister to establish a board where the two parties agree to have a board, in this case the steel workers made an application for a board; we tried to get the agreement of the company to establish a board, but they declined. That made a situation where we seemed to be powerless to do anything further. There was no law or authority under which we could act further. We went along until June when the steel workers made other requests and finally went on strike, later getting the mine workers with them, and with the result, still later, that the troops were called out. At every stage where there seemed reasonable opportunity for us to do or to offer to do anything, we did what appeared possible, but my hon. friend will realize how powerless is any one who has not authority, to do something. All he can do is to offer his friendly offices or the friendly offices of his department, and this was done in every case as opportunity presented itself.

Mr. HANSON: The minister has overlooked my first question. What representations, if any, has the minister or the department made to his friends in the Nova Scotia government with regard to working conditions at Sydney?

Mr. MURDOCK: Officially, I do not know that we have undertaken to say to our friends, the Ontario government or any other government in any province: You are, in our judgment, maintaining conditions of employment that are not fair and equitable. As opportunity is presented we have taken up matters with all the provinces.

Mr. HANSON: Never mind the others what about this one?

Mr. MURDOCK: We have done exactly the same with Nova Scotia as with the rest?

Mr. HANSON: What representations were made to the Nova Scotia government?

Mr. MURDOCK: I would have to get a good deal of correspondence in order to give in detail just what has been done. What has been done with Ontario, Quebec and the other provinces has been done with Nova Scotia.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I take it from that, that nothing has been done with Nova Scotia as regards the steel industry, because my hon. friend would not have to write to Ontario regarding the trouble in the steel industry in Nova Scotia. If all he has done in Nova Scotia is what he has done in Ontario, then he has done nothing in connection with this steel industry. Surely, my hon. friend must see that that is the fact.

Mr. MURDOCK: The hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) is getting a little ahead of me. As each one of those cases developed, there was certain correspondence by letter or by telegram, between the representatives of the two governments, and we both wrote and telegraphed, in nearly all of these cases, extending our friendly offices to do anything that appeared to be helpful.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is not the question.

Mr. HANSON: What, if anything, did the government represent to the Nova Scotia government, or did it content itself with offering its friendly offices?

Mr. MURDOCK: A good deal more than that has been done. For example, the recent strike in Nova Scotia was settled, it is said, as a result of officers of the Labour department insisting that the representatives of the company and the workers should not get away from one another in Montreal; that they should not break up and adjourn as they had proposed to do on a certain Friday night. The insistence of the representatives of the Labour department kept them together for three or four days longer, with the result that a settlement was reached. The settlement was later repudiated by the men directly concerned, that is the miners, but the facts are that operation has been going on uninterruptedly under an agreement that was pressed for earnestly by the Labour department.

Mr. LEWIS: Has the government any power to refuse to send troops into this area if requested to do so by the provincial authorities?

Mr. MURDOCK: My understanding is that, under the present terms of the Militia Act, the government has no authority to refuse to send troops when called upon to do so. In answer to the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth), who, I think, asked that before, I believe I can say that before this session of parliament is over, the House will have an opportunity of considering proposed amendments to the Militia Act dealing with that question.

Mr. HANSON: Is it not true that in the by-elections of Cape Breton, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) pledged himself to introduce amendments to the Militia Act in that respect?

Mr. MURDOCK: I do not know. If he did, I have just said that I think he is going to make good on his pledge.

Mr. LEWIS: Who will be the authority to decide as regards the calling out of troops if trouble occurs in a certain place?

[Mr. Murdock.]

Mr. MURDOCK: I could not say. I presume that will be in the amending bill when it comes before the House.

Mr. LEWIS: Is it possible for the Minister of Labour to protest against the sending in of troops to those industrial areas? Would his protest have any effect?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That might depend upon how he did that or who he was.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Has the Minister of Labour notified the International Labour Conference that Canada that signed the peace treaty granting the eight-hour day, finds herself quite incompetent to carry out that clause of the treaty?

Mr. MURDOCK: On several occasions we have laid before the International Labour Conference the conditions existing, and the Director and all other officers of the International Labour Conference know quite well that the question is one with which the federal government cannot deal except in so far as it may be authorized by the various provincial governments.

Mr. HANSON: Has the minister ever requested the provincial governments to put these recommendations into effect?

Mr. MURDOCK: On several occasions, and he will continue to do the same.

Mr. HANSON: What has been the result?

Mr. MURDOCK: The provincial governments have the various questions under consideration. Some of them have made headway with a few of the questions that have come from the International Labour Conference.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I presume that the Dominion government's own employees come under federal jurisdiction, whatever may be true of Nova Scotia. I am informed that the stationary engineers and the firemen who look after government furnaces are on duty Saturday and Sunday, on Good Friday, on Christmas and Labour Day and on every holy day and every holiday; so too are the watchmen, who work twelve hours a day and seven days a week. Is the Labour department taking any steps to see whether the eight-hour day and the six-day week are being observed in regard to these employees of the Dominion government?

Mr. MURDOCK: These are matters in regard to which this parliament has given complete jurisdiction to the Civil Service Commission, so that any representations that might be made concerning hours of labour, holidays and so forth would have to be considered by the commission. I hope there is no doubt as to where the Labour department or its minister would stand on that question, but as I say the Civil Service Commission has entire jurisdiction.

Mr. MICHAUD: Since when?

Mr. MURDOCK: My understanding is, since the act of 1919 was passed. Let me inform my hon. friend opposite that a recommendation was made by a subcommittee of council some weeks ago to the commission to the effect that these questions should be taken up and dealt with, and I understand that meetings are now being held in regard thereto.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: At the Peace Conference there was a sort of charter of labour drawn up and a large number of nations pledged themselves to see to it that labour should be given an eight-hour day. I notice by literature that comes to us from various European countries that many of these countries are placing legislation on their statute books to give effect to this convention. Now, we are in competition with these other countries and it seems we are claiming exemption. We have been told by the Minister of Labour that Canada has absolutely no jurisdiction in this matter. We have been further told recently that even the Canadian parliament has no jurisdiction over its own employees.

Mr. MURDOCK: I wish to correct that statement lest it go out. I did not say that Canada has no jurisdiction in the matter; or if I did say that, then it is unfortunate. At any rate, what I say now, and what I intended to say, was that Canada has no jurisdiction other than that which is given to the federal government by the British North America Act. The provinces have jurisdiction in this particular matter, and when they accept the eight-hour day proposal and so notify the federal authorities, the federal authorities will be glad to pass it on to the International Labour Conference.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think that is the sense in which I used the term when I said that Canada had no jurisdiction: the federal parliament is incompetent to act except as explained by the minister. We are further told even that we as a parliament have no jurisdiction over our own employees. It seems to me that this is not playing the game fairly; it is not taking the matter seriously. If we have no power in relation to our own employees, then I think that at this very session of parliament the government should introduce some measure providing such power. If we have deputed the power to other authorities it should be retracted. I cannot conceive of this Dominion government being earnestly desirous of bettering the conditions throughout this country and having absolutely no power with regard to this matter. I think that if the department and the government took this matter up very definitely with the different provinces an arrangement could be arrived at. The time has come when we cannot allow such important matters any longer to be made a football and kicked back and forth. I say that the thing is becoming very serious, so far at least as the workers are concerned. These people go to the provincial authorities who, in many instances, say, "We cannot act in this matter"; then they go to the federal authorities only to receive the same intimation. And in the meantime an immense amount of irritation is provoked, as well as disgust with governmental institutions, resulting finally in trouble such as we had in Nova Scotia. I take it that if the government has power to send troops down to Nova Scotia to quell riots in that province it ought to claim power in some way to remove these evil conditions.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister stated that a large part of the cost was due to the trouble in Toronto. Does he refer to the dispute with the Toronto Electrical commissioners?

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How much did that dispute cost?

Mr. MURDOCK: The board that was appointed cost $697.94 and the legal services, $6,998.90.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How on earth did it cost all that?

Mr. MURDOCK: That is the cost of legal advice by legal gentlemen who were appointed to oppose the numerous lawyers who were secured by the other side. I may say, however, that we shall get that back because the decision was filed in our favour, with costs.

Mr. HANSON: What retaining fees were paid by the government in this case? I mention this because in going over the Auditor General's report the other day—

Mr. MURDOCK: No retaining fees

Mr. HANSON: —I noticed that the government had paid to a Mr. Wilson, now Mr. Justice Wilson, in the Merchants Bank case, a retaining fee of $3,000, and to Mr. Creelman, of Montreal, in the same case a retaining fee of $2,500. These sums seem to be exceedingly large and out of proportion to what should have been paid; it is more than a private corporation would have to pay for similar services. Perhaps the minister can give us some information as to what services these sums represent.

Mr. MURDOCK: There were no retaining fees in this particular case.

Mr. HANSON: You will see when you get the bills.

Mr. MURDOCK: We paid only for legal services.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Was there not a per diem? What was it?

Mr. HANSON: And to whom was it paid?

Mr. MURDOCK: To Mr. H. H. Dewart, for services and expenses—taxed by the Department of Justice, understand—there was paid $1,825.90; to Mr. Lewis Duncan for services and expenses there was paid the sum of $4,532.60; to Mr. Bernard Rose, $140.40; and to Heaton Kortright and Company, electrical industrial experts, $500 was paid for services rendered.

Mr. HANSON: What rate per diem was paid Mr. Hartley Dewart?

Mr. MURDOCK: I cannot give that information, I am sorry. My recollection of the other bill is that some $60 a day was paid for the actual handling of the cases.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How many days did the case occupy?

Mr. MURDOCK: It was considered by three courts. First of all the judge who dealt with it issued the injunction, then the matter went before Mr. Justice Mowat, taking up some time in his court; finally it went to the Appeal court. I am not sure how many days it occupied altogether. The Department of Justice taxed the bill.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would point this out in connection with the trouble. We have in Toronto a body that is just as responsible to the voters as is my hon. friend; we have there a municipal commission which under a provincial statute is carrying on public business, not for profit but merely for service. That commission has a dispute with its workmen, and my hon. friend rushes in. It may be that under present conditions my hon. friend can, as in the Toronto case, do the unnecessary thing.

Mr. MURDOCK: Surely my hon. friend does not think it fair to ask me, as Minister of Labour, to justify my position when the matter he refers to is before the courts? We have a four-to-one decision in our favour from the appellate court of Ontario, and the case is going to the Privy Council. I do not want to claim any authority for the department except such as the courts may determine it is entitled to exercise. This matter has been pending for many years, and I am entirely willing that the courts should deal with it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The courts do not put those proceedings in motion. My hon friend asks me what I think is the fair thing to do. I answer: Leave municipal representatives to look after municipal business. On the one hand we are told that the province has everything to do with property and civil rights. If that is so, one would think that the minister would keep his hands off a commission which is running a public utility for service, not for profit. Surely if any effect is to be given to the argument of property and civil rights it should be given in such a case. But apart from that, what is the use of one governmental body interfering with the jurisdiction of another governmental body and at the same time saying: We cannot do anything in connection with the Nova Scotia Steel Company's dispute with their workmen because property and civil rights of the province are there called in question? That is the situation. The result is that property and civil rights, where they are in the hands of the Nova Scotia Steel Corporation, are not interfered with, nothing is done; but when they are in the hands of the Toronto Electric Light Commissioners—and it does not make the slightest difference to them personally what the wages of their workmen are, for, as I say, the utility is being operated absolutely for service to the public and without profit—then it is a case for interference on the part of the minister. I do not say anything as to what the courts should do; I am pointing out this absurdity in connection with the administration of the act.

Mr. CARROLL: The hon. ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) suggests that the Labour department rushes into the dispute between the Toronto Electric Light Commission and their workmen. I presume this trouble came before the department in the ordinary way?

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes.

Mr. CARROLL: That is what I would point out to my hon friend. The matter came before the minister's department in the usual way, that is, a conciliation board was asked for?

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes.

Mr. CARROLL: I presume my hon. friend would be the first to criticize the Minister of Labour and his department if this conciliation board had not been granted.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I certainly would not.

Mr. CARROLL: Then, does my hon. friend suggest that the Labour department rushed into something not within its sphere of jurisdiction? With regard to the Nova Scotia Steel Company, my hon. friend from Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) is continually harping on our labour troubles in Nova Scotia. I thank Heaven that to-day we have no industrial troubles in my province. Why does he not sometimes make reference to similar troubles in the West? I have never yet heard him say a word in this House on behalf of the miners of the West who at present are on strike.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is there no trouble at Stellarton at the present time?

Mr. CARROLL: It is not an industrial trouble at all, it is an internal trouble which the union is trying to straighten out.

Mr. HANSON: Will the hon. member be good enough to tell the House how it is that Mr. McLachlan is out of jail?

Mr. CARROLL: My hon. friend knows as much about that as I do.

Mr. HANSON: I do not think so.

Mr. CARROLL: He is out of jail because the Justice department granted him parole under the criminal code. Is my hon. friend complaining because Mr. McLachlan is out of jail?

Mr. HANSON: Yes, I am. He was paroled within two or three weeks after being put in Dorchester penitentiary. It is a case without parallel in the history of this country.

Mr. CARROLL: I am not complaining of Mr. McLachlan being out of jail, because I know of hundreds of people in this country who should be sent to the penitentiary if he merited imprisonment.

Mr. HANSON: I hope you don't mean me.

Mr. CARROLL: Of course not. I think Mr. McLachlan's is the second case in which the Justice department exercised its powers, another man in Toronto having also been liberated on parole. But I am not going to discuss Mr. McLachlan's case—he and I are not the best of friends. With regard to the Nova Scotia Steel Company, now a part of the British Empire Steel Company, it does not come within the scope of the Industrial Disputes Act, and I believe something should be done to bring all such corporations under the jurisdiction of the Labour department. but, notwithstanding, the Labour department last year sent a commission to Sydney under the chairmanship of Dr. Robertson, a very capable gentleman. They investigated labour conditions in the plants of the Nova Scotia Steel Company and the Dominion Steel Company, and I believe the report which they later made has already had a very good effect upon the industrial relations in both those companies. I agree with my hon. friend that something should be done as quickly as possible to bring all large industrial corporations within the scope of the Industrial Disputes Act. It does seem to me to be the height of absurdity—I am not criticising the Labour department—that while the British Empire Steel Company is subject to the jurisdiction of the Labour department, three of its components, the Nova Scotia Steel Company, the Dominion Steel Company and the Dominion Coal Company are outside such jurisdiction. I hope that the Labour department will look into this anomalous condition and take steps to bring all such corporations within the scope of the act. Personally I wish to say a word of praise for the manner in which the Labour department handled the unfortunate lock-out in connection with the coal mines of Nova Scotia. It was not a strike; the miners were given a holiday, so to speak, by the mine managers. The representatives of the miners and of the companies met at Sydney and could reach no agreement. Then with representatives of the International Board they met in Montreal, and there was a deadlock. Our people from Nova Scotia were on the point of going home when the Labour department intervened by wiring to these people to stay there until they could send a representative down. This they did, with the result that an amicable arrangement was arrived at, and in that connection the Minister of Labour and his department did very good work.

The matter of the eight-hour day, to which the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg has referred, is a very serious and a very knotty problem. It strikes me that there should be a conference of representatives of the provinces and of the Department of Labour to discuss this matter. I am not sure that the present law takes away any jurisdiction from the federal parliament in the matter of dealing with the eight-hour day. I think that a better argument could be maintained on behalf of federal jurisdiction in connection with the eight-hour day than can be maintained with regard to this very act which is under consideration, the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. Everything in connection with the eight hour day points to the fact that it is a matter that should be dealt with by the federal parliament.

Mr. HANSON: Is it not a matter of civil rights?

Mr. CARROLL: I am not so sure that it is a matter of civil rights. I believe that if the question were referred to the Privy Council—and I am not charging my hon. friend anything for the opinion—they would reach the same conclusion that they reached with regard to liquor legislation as affecting this country; they would say that it was a matter for the well-being of Canada at large, as they did in connection with various other matters which we sent over to them. I believe that if the argument were put strongly before them they would decide that our federal parliament has the right to legislate in regard to the eight-hour day. Why? Is not the matter of temperance a matter of civil rights within the various provinces? In enforcing prohibition you are taking away a right from the individual. The Privy Council decided that both the provincial legislatures and the federal parliament had power to deal with this matter. How much more is the eight-hour day a matter of civil rights than the question of taking away from a man the right to a drink of beer, two per cent or otherwise?

Mr. HANSON: The Privy Council did not say it was a matter of civil rights; they said it was a matter of police regulation.

Mr. CARROLL: They said more than that. They said it was a matter in connection with the peace, order and good government of Canada; that was their final judgment.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is the police section—peace and order.

Mr. CARROLL: A matter of the peace, order and good government of Canada. I believe that the matter of the eight-hour day comes as squarely within that category as anything the Privy Council have given their decision upon. But I shall not discuss the matter any further, except to suggest to the Minister of Labour and to the Labour department that after a conference such as I have suggested there should be a reference —and I am not particular whether it costs the country $10,000 or $50,000—either to the Supreme Court of Canada or to the Privy Council of England, as regards legislative jurisdiction on the eight-hour day. I hope the minister will take my suggestion seriously and act upon it during the coming recess.

Mr. MURDOCK: We did have such a conference last year, when this matter and other subjects of mutual interest emanating from the International Labour Conference were discussed at considerable length. We have taken some action as a result of that conference and other action is still under way looking to further co-operation.

Mr. SPENCER: How many strikes took place last year?

Mr. MURDOCK: The Labour Gazette for February, 1924, gives the complete information, arranged under such headings as the following: Industry or occupation; locality; cause of object; method of settlement; result; date of commencement; date of determination; employers involved; employees involved; time lost in working days; duration in working days. There were 91 strikes during the year; The number of employees affected was 32,868 and the number of employers 419, and the time lost in working days, 768,494, or something like 1,206,000 days less than the year, 1922. My hon. friend can get the full information covering a period of years from the February issue of the Labour Gazette.

Mr. SHAW: The point brought to the attention of the minister by the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg is worthy of serious consideration, that is, the question of the hours of work of federal employees. I noticed a recent editorial in an Ottawa newspaper drawing attention to the fact that, as pointed out by the member for Centre Winnipeg, stationary engineers and firemen are on duty Sunday, Saturday, Good Friday, Christmas, Labour Day and every other holy day and holiday. Watchmen apparently work twelve hours a day seven days a week. I was rather surprised the other day to find upon inquiry that the policemen who patrol this building, both inside, I presume, and outside, work seven days a week. I believe they work, however, only eight hours a day. I see no reason why the federal government should not make the necessary regulations to provide that the employment of its own servants shall come within the provisions of the conventions arrived at overseas and also within the provisions of the Lord's Day Act. The minister says these are matters which are under the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission, but I would like to be referred to the section of the Civil Service Act which gives authority to the commission to override the action of parliament in the matter of holidays and the Lord's Day Act. This matter, especially that aspect of it bearing upon the hours of work of federal employees, should receive the serious consideration of the minister, because I am sure that without very much difficulty legal changes could be made to bring these employees under working conditions which would be more in accord with the findings of the Genoa conference. Certainly the federal government, in suggesting these changes in labour regulations, should be the first to adopt them, and from that standpoint alone the minister should see to it that relief is given to federal employees in this regard.

Mr. MURDOCK: I am very glad to hear the hon. gentleman take the position he does, and I can assure him that I regard the conditions he speaks of as absurd, obsolete, and unfair to Canada. If he can assist in any way in having those conditions changed I will regard his action as something that is very desirable. The department and the Minister of Labour are doing everything possible to change the conditions, but others have some authority and jurisdiction over them. I agree with my hon. friend that men should not be required to work seven days a week, but I insist that he is in error in thinking that the Civil Service Commission regulations have nothing to do with some of the positions that were enumerated before. I am not referring to the staff of the House of Commons, because that was not referred to by my hon. friend from Centre Winnipeg, but to firemen and others who were mentioned before. I think my hon. friend will find that they come under the regulations of the Civil Service Commission. I have made representations in regard to them on numerous occasions, because I agree with my hon. friend that the conditions ought to be changed.

Mr. SHAW: This occurs to me at the moment: If an amendment were made to the Lord's Day Observance Act, providing that federal employees were to get the benefit of the act regardless of any other provisions, I can see no reason why that could be questioned.

Mr. MURDOCK: As my hon. friend knows, all the provinces have a Lord's Day Observance Act or regulations on the subject.

Mr. SHAW: It is a Dominion government act.

Mr. MURDOCK: If my hon. friend will look into it, he will find that the federal government has to work in consultation with the provincial government on the matter. As a matter of fact, we are now undertaking to do just that very thing, to draw up a regulation that will be held to conform to a certain recommendation emanating from the International Labour Conference.

Mr. SHAW: My recollection of the Lord's Day Observance Act is that it is federal in its character and in its scope, but that before a prosecution for a violation of the act can take place, the attorney general of the province concerned must give a fiat authorizing such prosecution. I see no reason at all why the federal government cannot legislate with regard to its own employees, and I would like to see the minister make an effort in that direction, at all events.

Mr. MURDOCK: We have been making every effort, and if my hon. friend will assist to the extent of going before the Civil Service Commission and urging that some of the conditions now being maintained are absurd, obsolete and out-of-date, he will help some.

Mr. SHAW: I shall be glad to do it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If the Lord's Day Observance Act is intra vires of the Dominion parliament, there seems to be no reason why eight-hour day legislation should be ultra vires.

Mr. LEADER: When was this conference held?

Mr. MURDOCK: September 4, 5 and 6, 1923, in Ottawa.

Mr. LEADER: I presume I am in order in bringing to the attention of the House an item which I see in the Auditor General's report, volume 2, page M-14, under the heading "Unforeseen Expenses."

Mr. MURDOCK: So that my hon. friend will get the matter straight, that item refers to the conference held in 1922. But it is entirely all right for my friend to bring the matter up.

Mr. LEADER: It says here, September 5, so I thought it referred to last year, but I see it says 1922. I was going to say that the word "unforeseen" should be deleted, and the word "unwarranted" substituted therefor. The item reads:

Expenses in connection with Dominion-Provincial Conference on Unemployment:
The Royal Golf Club, Aylmer Road, Que., dinner of 60 covers.. .. .. $347 20

Mr. Chairman, I object to the high cost of dinners, as this is almost $6.00 per plate. The item continues:

A. J. H. Bruce, services of orchestra at dinner.. .. .. $65 00
The Hull Electric Co., special street car service to Ottawa Golf Club.. .. .. $25 00

I would ask the minister whether he, as a representative of the people, thinks that this is a judicious expenditure of public money.

Mr. MURDOCK: I am not taking any particular point of disagreement with my hon. friend. I would like to have it here and now determined by this House whether it is a consistent thing. I was not altogether enthused over the necessity for it, for the simple reason that I have not been very familiar with these things in the past; it has been a case of work and eat and sleep with me. But the responsible officers of the department and others in the government indicated that as upon that occasion we had here in Ottawa representatives of all the provincial governments in Canada—perhaps my hon. friend would like to have the list?

Mr. LEADER: It is not necessary.

Mr. MURDOCK: I think when it comes to a question of criticizing the Minister of Labour of the federal government, the House ought to have the list now, especially as this matter has been given some newspaper publicity. There is no desire on my part to justify this thing or to dodge any criticism of it. The delegates in attendance were as follows:

Nova Scotia: Hon. G. H. Murray, premier; Hon. R. E. Finn, minister without portfolio; W. B. MacCoy, secretary, Industries and Immigration; Mr. J. C. Tory, M.P.P.

New Brunswick: Hon. Clifford W. Robinson, Minister of Lands and Mines.

Quebec: Mr. Jos. Ainey, General Superintendent of Employment Service; Mr. J. A. Metayer, Deputy Minister of Public Works.

Ontario: Hon. E. C. Drury, premier; Hon. Walter Rollo, Minister of Labour; Mr. J. H. H. Ballantyne, Deputy Minister of Labour.

Manitoba: Hon. R. W. Craig, Attorney General; Mr. A. MacNamara, secretary, Bureau of Labour.

Saskatchewan: Hon. J. P. Gardiner, Minister of Highways; Mr. Thos. Molloy, Commissioner of Labour.

Alberta: Hon. Alex. Ross, Minister of Labour.

British Columbia: Mr. J. D. McNiven, Deputy Minister of Labour.

Other gentlemen were also present, attending the conference, but the list I have read comprises the representatives of the provincial governments. At that conference in September, 1922, it was suggested that it would be the proper thing, gathered as we were there for a three days' conference, with all the provincial representatives present, to have a little dinner, and I assume full responsibility for giving the necessary permission. But if it was not right, you tell me so now, and there will not be any more of it in my department while I am here.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Can the minister inform the committee what tunes were played by the orchestra?

Mr. GRAHAM: "Work for the Night is Passing."

Mr. HOEY: Did the Dominion government pay the entire expenses of that conference?

Mr. MURDOCK: We paid the expenses of the dinner, but so far as the general expenses of the conference are concerned, the provinces paid the expenses of their own representatives.

Mr. LEADER: I am very glad to hear the minister say that he is not particularly enamoured of this method of spending public funds. I know that the city of Winnipeg has made a claim against the Dominion government for $47,000 towards an unemployment obligation incurred by that city. On the ground of economy the Dominion government, no doubt, cannot help to pay that bill, but $6 per plate that was spent at this dinner would have fed a good many of these unemployed. I am not taking the part of the unemployed particularly; some of them do not deserve it, but a great many of them undoubtedly do. I am very glad the minister has taken the stand he has taken just now. Every department of the government is permeated with these little entertainments. There are more to come, and I intend as a representative of the people to bring them before the House, and, if the newspapers will take note of them, before the people of this country. If the people are willing to pay for these entertainments, I can afford to pay my share, but I honestly believe that people in general do not know that our public moneys are being used in this manner. Therefore I am making this protest and I am glad to see the minister backing me up. If he wants the House to decide, I hope they will decide in the right way.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Who is responsible for the music?

Mr. MURDOCK: I really could not tell my hon. friend.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Was there dancing?

Mr. MURDOCK: I do not think so.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): As the minister has apparently been so sincere in this matter, is he prepared to ask the House to say whether they are willing that he shall continue to expend money on this kind of entertainment or not? I think we can get an expression from hon. members if the minister so desires. As a private member I am unable to bring the matter to the attention of the House, but the minister can bring it up.

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend from Bow River (Mr. Garland) will understand that I can only properly speak for my own department; and I think my hon. friend will agree that each and every case would have to stand on its merits and be determined at the time. I have noted the objections of my hon. friend, I will pay attention to his suggestions, and will be prepared to assume full responsibility, if there is any failure to comply strictly with his suggestions.

Mr. SPENCER: The hon. minister read to the House the names of various guests from the different provincial governments. Were any of those guests responsible for the activities?

Mr. MURDOCK: No, I simply gave the names in order to indicate the personnel of the conference that was being held, and I did not read all the names. Other gentlemen at the conference were representatives of labour and soldier organizations, and so forth. There were some sixty all told.

Mr. LEADER: I think the House is in a receptive mood this afternoon. Therefore, in order to test the feeling of hon. members in regard to items of this nature, I move that item 270 be reduced by the sum of $347.20, the amount paid for the dinner.

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend will understand that the dinner was not paid for out of this item.

Mr. HOEY: Has it been paid for yet?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The minister read the names of the delegates present, in order to give us an idea as to the kind of people who attended on that occasion.

Mr. MURDOCK: The personnel of the conference.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Would that indicate the necessity of taking them over to the Royal Ottawa Golf Club to be entertained? Could they not have been entertained in Ottawa?

Mr. MURDOCK: They could no doubt have been entertained equally as well in Ottawa.

Mr. GOULD: In his reply the minister stated that this sum was not to be paid out of the item before the House at the present time. Nevertheless the minister possibly can inform the House whether, when this item which we are now discussing was being compiled, a smaller or greater sum was included in the item for like expenditure or similar events this year.

Mr. MURDOCK: No, the item the hon. member from Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) speaks about, would be paid out of contingencies. When we come to the contingency vote I will be glad to see how close to the edge we have been travelling with contingencies year by year, so as to ascertain whether it would have made any material difference. It would not have anything to do with this vote at all.

Mr. GOULD: Contingencies and consolidated revenue might be classed almost as the same. For instance, the amount of money which the western people think is due them from the activities of the old Wheat Board might possibly be contingencies or consolidated revenue, and provide a nice little feast for gentlemen who come down from Saskatchewan.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): That is a trust account.

Mr. GOULD: But the people who produce the money apparently are not entitled to their share of it. It seems to me it is being divided up improperly, if these hon. members receive their share through the pleasures or activities of the Ottawa Golf Club, and the rest of the people who contribute do not get any of it.

Mr. MURDOCK: Would my hon. friend be willing to let his motion deal with the particular item involved? I am sure he would not want to stint a vote that is for the purpose of maintaining industrial peace in Canada, which is the purpose for which this money we are now voting is to be used.

Mr. LEADER: I will accede to the minister's request, and will raise this question when the proper item is called. The amount is so infinitesimal, however, that it will not make any difference on any vote. I brought the matter up to test the feeling of hon. members, and I will now withdraw it.

Item agreed to.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What was spent last year?

Mr. MURDOCK: Every cent of the $5,000 was expended. The items are:

Travelling and office expenses	4,107 46
Freight and expressage	63 26

	$5,000 00

Mr. SPENCER: Can the minister give us figures of the average wages of farm labourers in Canada?

Mr. MURDOCK: Does the hon. member want the average current wages paid to labour in Canada?

Mr. SPENCER: Farm labour.

Mr. MURDOCK: No. that would be entirely too large an order.

Mr. SPENCER: Does this item relate to the Fair Wages Board?

Mr. MURDOCK: No, they deal only with Federal government undertakings. They have nothing to do with the fixing of farm wages, or for that matter, any wages, except that they determine what is a fair wage for employees on work which is assisted by Dominion government funds.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I suppose the minister would say that in fixing a fair rate of wages to be paid by the government he does not divorce himself from the proposition of applying the prevalent wage on the labour market generally?

Mr. MURDOCK: Oh no, I take that into consideration, because when you canvass the entire field you then know what fixes the correct wage for a government undertaking.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Looking at it in that way, I think if the minister tells us his own fair current wage it would give us a pretty good indication as to what the fair prevailing farm wage would be.

Mr. MURDOCK: Wages differ in different localities. For example, last winter we had a carpenter's rate, as I recall it, at Blind River on the Soo branch of the Canadian Pacific, fixed at 65 cents an hour. The wage for the same class of work in Ottawa or vicinity would be 75 cents an hour, in the Welland district, 80 cents an hour, at Haileybury on the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railroad, about 55 cents an hour and out in the West, around Edmonton, about 80 cents an hour. Wages differ in different parts of the country. The same thing is equally true with regard to common farm labour. The rate depends largely upon the demand and the supply, the necessity for getting the labour at any particular point.

Mr. SPENCER: I was trying to find out if the minister had given any study to the difference between wages paid in any particular part of the country to men working on farms and men working in other industries, taking into consideration the cost of living, because there is a fairly large difference.

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend may not know that the Labour department or its Fair-wage officers have nothing whatever to do with fixing rates of wages for farm labour in any part of Canada. In the various provincial employment offices which are partially paid for by the Dominion, the instructions are that all that the officers shall do is to ascertain what wages are offered and to convey that information to the prospective employee. We take no action whatever in determining that this, that or the other rate shall be the wage set. In cases though like the Welland ship canal, we are called upon to determine what is the fair and current wage for a long list of employees.

Mr. SPENCER: How does the department come to a conclusion regarding that fair wage?

Mr. MURDOCK: By canvassing the entire district where the work is to be performed, and finding, for example, where blacksmiths, and blacksmiths' helpers, in that territory are employed, how many of them are employed by this, that or the other concern and what they are getting per diem. When the Fair-wage officers go over the entire field, then a reasonable, fair, consistent, current wage is struck and those are the wages set for the particular Welland canal job. That is the way in which the wage is struck.

Mr. MANION: Has the minister any way of checking up wages paid in Canada in different occupations with wages paid in other countries?

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes.

Mr. MANION: Has he at hand the wages paid in different countries for different lines of occupation?

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend might be interested in this publication entitled, "Wages and Hours of Labour in Canada" comprising 1921, 1922, 1923, issued as a supplement to the Labour Gazette of January, 1924. It gives rather interesting data regarding all classes of labour in Canada for those three years. Then we have Report No. 5, which gives hours of labour in Canada and other countries.

Mr. MANION: What about wages?

Mr. MURDOCK: We have not in these pamphlets the comparison of wages with other countries.

Mr. MANION: Has the minister that in his department?

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes.

Mr. MANION: Can the minister offhand give me comparisons, I do not mean absolutely to a cent?

Mr. MURDOCK: I could possibly intimate what my hon. friend is thinking of and that is that Canada is well in advance of many other countries as respects wages, and approximately close to the United States as respects rates of wages paid for different classes of labour in that country.

Mr. MANION: I know that we are well in advance, but I should like to know how well in advance, if the minister can give me an idea. I have seen figures showing wages in England, Germany, France and other European countries as one-third to one-half wages paid in Canada covering practically all lines of occupation. Can the minister confirm that or has he the figures to give an estimate as to the difference?

Mr. MURDOCK: I have no doubt that is a practically correct statement, but we shall take care to send to the hon. member a statement giving that exactly.

Mr. MANION: I appreciate the courtesy, but I should be glad if, instead of sending it to me, when the minister goes on again with his estimates, he would place those figures on Hansard. It would be convenient for the House to have them on Hansard in connection with discussions on various matters.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: When the minister gives those figures, would he also give us the cost of living index figures for the various countries?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister pointed out how he gets at what the fair-wage is as regards the Welland canal contract and he instanced blacksmiths. I think I am right in saying that there is a different remuneration for all the different activities.

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: He gets his average as to blacksmiths from blacksmiths in the neighbourhood, and in the same way for carpenters and so on. As regards direct labour, I understand that the rate is arrived at by finding out what direct labour is paid in the locality. That being in a farming country, a great deal of the labour there would be farm labour. Can the minister give to the hon. member interested in this question of farm labour, any comparison between the rate paid for unskilled labour on the Welland canal contract and the rate for farm labour in that district?

Mr. MURDOCK: There would not be very much farm labour taken into consideration in making a computation of this kind. For instance, we took the Hydro-electric big ditch, the labour employed thereon, and also the labour employed in the various large industries in the St. Catharines and Niagara districts. That would be nearer to the class of labour the rates of which we were going to determine on the Welland canal. I do not think we went to any farm labour to make a comparison, because it could hardly be held that a man working in the big ditch would be in the same class of labour. As a matter of fact, the labourer's rate on the Welland canal job was practically fixed by the contractors themselves.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What was the rate?

Mr. MURDOCK: Forty cents an hour. It was offered by the contractors in May last and it was fixed by an order on June 20 last.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Supposing the minister had to fix the fair-wage rate in the West where there was no other work going on than farm work, and he had to fix the rate in connection with unskilled labour, what attention, if any, would be given to wages paid to farm labourers in that district?

Mr. MURDOCK: As a matter of fact, we have at the present time in Edmonton, a controversy over the rate of wages for labour. The rate is said to be, and to have been, forty-five cents an hour, whereas, on the other hand it is contended by the contractor that wages came down to forty cents an hour. We are having a survey made now to determine whether that is the case or not. In connection with elevator construction I do not think that much attention will be given to the rate paid to labourers on the farm; the wages paid for work of practically the same nature done in the city will as far as possible be taken as the standard.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Do I understand that the standards are fixed irrespective of farm rates?

Mr. MURDOCK: I think it would be almost entirely correct to say so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And fixed entirely without regard to any question of demand for farm labourers?

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes, I think so.

Mr. SPENCER: I suppose the Department of Labour had something to do with the thousands of men who were sent out west to help in the harvest of last year. Some of these men, it is true, were skilled, but a great many of them were unskilled, and they came west expecting a certain wage. Did any suggestion come from the minister's department as to how much should be paid, and, if so, how was the rate arrived at?

Mr. MURDOCK: Absolutely no suggestion whatsoever was made, with any authority, by any one in the department as to what wages were to be paid. My hon. friend will remember that eleven thousand or twelve thousand of the harvesters last year came direct from overseas, going to the West, and with these the Department of Labour had nothing to do. The department however, did cooperate with the employment service and with the railways, as it has done in former years, in the recruiting of unemployed labour in the eastern provinces and sending it forward for service in the West. But in no case were any suggestions made as to wages to be paid, for that is a matter to be determined between employer and employee on the ground.

Mr. SPENCER: That was not the case in regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway, who had a good deal to do with bringing men from Great Britain.

Mr. MURDOCK: I can say nothing so far as that is concerned.

Mr. ROBB: Does my hon. friend object to the labour brought into western Canada last year to move the crop?

Mr. SPENCER: I object to unskilled men being brought from Great Britain on the strength of the promise that they will be paid the wages of skilled men, although they know nothing about the work which they are going to undertake.

Mr. ROBB: We have made no such promise.

[Mr. Murdock.]

Mr. MICHAUD: There are a great many labourers in the Maritime provinces who go west during the harvest. They do not complain about the wages, which they consider fair; but the hours of labour they think are too long: they are required to work from twelve to fifteen hours a day and sometimes as long as seventeen hours. That is something which I should like my western friends to take into consideration.

Mr. LEADER: I challenge that statement, so far as Manitoba is concerned.

Mr. MICHAUD: I have had it directly from men who have gone west and have returned to my constituency; I could give their names.

Mr. LEADER: As an old Manitoban I can say that the hours of labour during harvest time in that province are from 7 a.m. to 12 noon, and from 1 p.m. to 6 and, on some farms, 7 o'clock.

Mr. MICHAUD: They are not as bad in Manitoba as they are in other places in the West.

Mr. GOULD: I wish to follow this question up a little further. I have personal experience in this matter, having frequently gone down to the railway for a number of years to meet harvest excursion trains. Every year I am accosted with the statement that these men have been promised $4, $4.50 and even $5 a day, and what my hon. friend (Mr. Spencer) is no doubt trying to find out is the source from which this information comes. It is useless trying to engage these men at any lower wage. It is quite true that a good many of them are worth the money; but going on a train and looking over four or five hundred men who are going west in search of work one can invariably pick out the competent man. But the trouble is that the incompetent man will repeat with gusto the same story in regard to these promised wages, and it seems to me, from a long experience, that as these harvesters are all armed with this promise or alleged promise, it would be just as well to trace the origin of the information which apparently is given them in the first instance. If the Department of Labour does not make any definite statements to them, the question is, does it convey by implication any promise that these men will receive a certain wage if they go west? The Minister stated something about employers getting together in the case of the Welland canal, for instance, and suggesting 40 cents or 45 cents to be paid. The committee will realise that the farmers are unable to get together to arrange a definite rate of wages. I believe that if the department would co-operate with certain farmers' organizations it might be possible to arrive at some definite rate, or to come to some understanding, that would be equitable to all concerned.

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend forgets that the provinces are really in closer touch with the employment service in the various parts of the Dominion than is the federal government. All that the federal government does is to co-operate with the provinces in maintaining a chain of employment offices clear across Canada. There are provincial employees in all these offices, but we have at Winnipeg one superintendent and two other employees who staff what is called a clearing house to keep in touch with the western territory. That is all the connection we have with the service in that particular regard. My hon. friend asked whether we suggested the wages to be paid. When labour is to be recruited in the East the labour offices in that part of the country indicate what wages the farmers are offering, and that information is given to the prospective employee in the east. We only act or intend to act as a messenger or go-between.

Mr. GOULD: It seems, then, that the abstract becomes the concrete when these men go west, and that the general idea as to what is being offered in the West is construed as a definite promise.

Item agreed to.

Administration, Employment Offices, Co-ordination Act, $50,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is an increase of $20,000.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We have, I think, really three departments that have to do with employment, namely, the Labour department, the Immigration department and the department that has charge of the settlement of soldiers. Will the minister give us a statement regarding the relations that exist among these three departments, and the measure of co-operation that is practised?

Mr. MURDOCK: The Soldier Settlement Board is under the Department of Immigration. This particular vote contemplates an increase of $20,000 as indicated by my hon. friend (Sir Henry Drayton). The intention is to take from the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment the employment service activities that have been handled in certain large cities of Canada for handicapped ex-service men and to co-ordinate that service with and handle it in the present employment offices, with possibly some additional staff where necessary, to be paid out of this vote, the federal government paying 100 per cent. This vote, and it is an increase of $20,000, contemplates a co-ordination of existing employment services, that is, coupling up the D.S.C.R. employment service for handicapped ex-service men and the general employment service of the federal and provincial governments. The Soldier Settlement Board employment service is under the Immigration department.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is in regard to that that I want a little clearer light. When the twelve thousand harvesters came over from Great Britain last year was there a consultation between the Immigration department and the Labour department before the campaign was started?

Mr. MURDOCK: Generally fairly close touch has been maintained between the Immigration department and the Labour department. Usually, if not always, when additional help is requested from various concerns or individuals the Immigration department ascertain from the Labour department if the Employment Service of Canada is able to furnish the help required, and only in the event of being advised that the help is not available do the Immigration department give permission for this additional labour to come forward. My hon. friend will recall that last year we had in prospect one of the biggest crops in the history of western Canada. It was rather difficult to determine accurately the approximate number of labourers required to handle that crop. It might be said that possibly there was not that collaboration between the Immigration department, the Employment Service of Canada and other bodies which there might have been if we had known beforehand exactly how many men Alberta or Saskatchewan or Manitoba needed. But we could not take a chance of failing to meet the requirements of the West and we had to start to get labour from the East and, to a considerable extent, from overseas in order to be sure of a full supply. As a result I can appreciate my hon. friend may say that we might have known some things that under the circumstances it was impossible for us to know.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I understand the Labour department has been doing rather good work in trying to dovetail seasonal employment. For example, at certain seasons it is becoming customary for workers in British Columbia to be brought over the mountains to the prairies. Last year that arrangement was more or less disturbed. Then there was a great scurrying around by the Soldier Settlement Board—I happened to be in Alberta in the autumn and observed it—which sent its agents all over the country trying to place newly arrived Old Country immigrants. This of course meant that British Columbia and other Canadian workmen were replaced by newer arrivals. Has the minister any information on this particular point?

Mr. MURDOCK: I do not know that I quite get my hon. friend's question. I can assure him that by co-operation and co-ordination we hope to prevent any conflict of effort that may have occurred in the past. This particular vote is to bring about co-ordination that we think will be valuable and effective. Possibly later further co-ordination can be brought about that will also be valuable.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I asked about a particular matter last year. We had the Soldier Settlement Board sending officials all over the country to find places for some of these Old Country immigrants, and I understand that this resulted in upsetting more or less the arrangements which the employment office had been building up by which men were brought in from British Columbia to work in the western part of the prairie provinces.

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend is correct. It was alleged that to a certain extent there was that condition. But he must not overlook the fact that about twelve thousand immigrants came from overseas to help gather the western harvest. The Soldier Settlement Board and the Department of Immigration were naturally keeping in close touch with those immigrants and doing everything possible to secure them employment after the harvesting operations were completed. In doing so there was possibly some little conflict, which it is hoped may not recur.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Coming to this year, I have resolutions from Winnipeg, passed within the last few weeks, complaining of the hundreds of unemployed who are finding it impossible to obtain any work in that city, and that notwithstanding this serious condition of unemployment thousands of new arrivals are pouring in. So bad has this become that the city itself is protesting, and, I understand, has been making advances to other Canadian cities with a view to lodging a united protest against the dumping of immigrants who take the place of our unemployed.

Mr. MURDOCK: I think my hon. friend should wait until the Minister of Immigration comes forward with his estimates and talk to him about that.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I will.

Mr. BROWN: I appreciate the difficulty of the unemployed in the cities. When I was home at Easter I tried to get the employment service to send men out to my farm, but none have been sent along so far. We have always to take into account the fact that in Winnipeg and other cities there are men who simply will not go on the farm—and many of them are no good when they do go. I think from the standpoint of the men themselves, when large numbers are brought out to this country they should not be advised that any kind of man is going to get $5 a day in the harvest field. I have distinctly in mind cases last harvest where men came out with the impression that they were going to get that high wage. The farmers simply would not pay this rate and the men had to be sent adrift. Both from the standpoint of the farmers and the labourers themselves I think there should be great care exercised in advising men just what wages they are going to get in the harvest field, because otherwise it means disappointment all around. I realize that the whole question is a very difficult one. While naturally I am desirous of getting our wheat harvested at a price which we can afford to pay, yet I think we must be reasonable and recognize the difficulty of those who undertake to provide a supply of labour in gauging just exactly the number of harvesters required. I should like to see the fullest co-operation between the farmers' organizations, the various government departments and the railroad companies; there might even be more co-operation than there has been in the past. I would urge upon officials of the department and upon railway officials and others who promise men high wages in the harvest field to put in a qualifying clause—that the men must be such as can earn the wage that the farmers are willing to pay. There is dissatisfaction all around if that is not done.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, if I might drag this discussion back from the harvest fields of the West,—I would ask the minister what is the custom of the department on receipt of a report from one of its employment officers that in some town, we will say in Ontario, there are from forty to two hundred unemployed? What would the minister's policy be with regard to immigrants going into that town? What does he do? Does he do anything?

Mr. MURDOCK: I do not know that it could be handled in the way my hon. friend suggests.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I have not made any suggestion yet.

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend suggests that there might be 200 unemployed in a certain city. As a matter of fact there are more than that in Toronto all the time. Every month of the busiest year there are more than that number who, perhaps, do not want to work, who, perhaps, would not work no matter what kind of job they were offered, and Toronto is the chief point, with Montreal or Winnipeg, to which very many of the people of this country go. Therefore we do not maintain any supervision along the lines suggested by my hon. friend.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I will give the minister a specific illustration which will show exactly the information I want to get. I hold in my hand a despatch dated Sarnia, May 13, as follows:

> The Sarnia Council has decided unanimously to endorse the proposition instituted in the city of Toronto for concerted action by cities on the Dominion immigration policy.

Now this is the point that concerns the minister:

> Employment Officer W. P. Lott stated this afternoon that Sarnia had received 200 immigrants within a month while there were 180 of the permanent population of the city on unemployed lists.

In that case what will the minister do? Will he go to the Minister of Immigration or the Department of Immigration and say: "Here, we cannot handle any more of these fellows. You hold them off for a while; store them in Halifax, or, as at present, in the immigration sheds at Winnipeg until we can ship them to Vancouver and thence, if possible, on the Empress to China."

Mr. MURDOCK: The Minister of Labour has nothing to do with the Sarnia employment office other than to see that it is conducted in accordance with an agreement between the minister and the Ontario government and to pay a proportion of the costs of operating it. Therefore the circumstances in connection with the number of employed there would be reported in the first place to the superintendent of the provincial employment service at Toronto, who would have first-hand knowledge of the conditions; then later it would go to the clearing house in Ottawa. The Department of Immigration through their own officers or through the Soldier Settlement Board are handling the immigration end of it. So my hon. friend will see that the Minister of Labour does not deal directly with the situation he speaks about.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Surely the minister is fully aware of the movement that is on foot not only throughout the East but also in the West, particularly in cities like Winnipeg and Edmonton. For example, the mayor of Edmonton refused to accept a relay of immigrants from Winnipeg on the appeal of the mayor of Winnipeg, on the ground that Edmonton had its own unemployed problem and had no room for these immigrants. I would like to ask the minister if his department is going to let that condition continue, or is he going to take the matter up with the Department of Immigration and see that the flow of immigrants in this country is guided by the conditions here?

Mr. MURDOCK: The Department of Labour and the Department of Immigration are closely in touch with each other and in conference on these matters almost daily.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): And the problem is still in that state, in spite of the co-operation that the minister speaks of?

Mr. MURDOCK: Conditions arise which give occasion to the statement, "We do not want immigrants," while on the other hand we get just as insistent demands in the other direction, for immigrants.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): From whom do the latter come?

Mr. MURDOCK: From many and varied quarters, from all walks of life. My hon. friend could get that data more accurately from the Minister of Immigration when he takes up his estimates.

Mr. LEADER: I understand that the Dominion government co-operates with the provincial government in maintaining employment offices. Then I notice that this item is increased this year by $20,000, and there is the further fact that the employment office at Portage la Prairie has been closed, indicating a saving there. Does the minister contemplate taking on any new work which neessitates the increasing of this vote by $20,000?

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend must have been out when I gave the explanation of this vote. It has nothing to do with the office at Portage la Prairie. The additional amount is provided to take over the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment employment service for handicapped ex-service men, the Department of Labour to make arrangements with the provincial governments to handle that work in connection with the existing employment offices, and, where necessary, to appoint additional officers. It is to prevent duplication of effort on the part of the D.S.C.R., the Labour department and the provincial governments, to co-ordinate the employment services and therefore to reduce the cost.

Mr. LEADER: I thank the minister for his answer. I do not want the committee to think I am kicking about the closing of the employment office at Portage la Prairie. I am not sufficiently conversant with the conditions to know whether or not it was actually a necessity. I am one of those who will not ask for anything, even for my own constituency, if I do not think it is necessary.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): As I understand it, there is to be a co-ordination of services with a view to assisting disabled ex-service men to get work. Is that the idea?

Mr. MURDOCK: No. The D.S.C.R. has for a number of years been maintaining a separate employment service for handicapped ex-service men. That service has been diminishing during the last two or three years until now, for example, in Ontario they have offices at Toronto, London, Hamilton, and Ottawa only. This extra amount is to take that service over and to provide for its being handled where necessary in connection with the existing employment offices.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I understand from the last few days' discussion that the government are returning to the Liberal platform of 1919. As I recall it, that platform included some provision for unemployment insurance and other kinds of insurance that would be a benefit to the workers. Are steps being taken to provide for some measure of unemployment insurance? We may deal with this matter in a fragmentary or a spasmodic way, but we shall not really touch the root of the problem until some very definite work is done along this line. We are told that other countries are moving. Is the government even going as far as securing information as to what might be done in organizing an unemployment insurance scheme?

Mr. MURDOCK: Of course, a great deal of information has come to the department from time to time, and we have also a very complete statement from the British Ministry of Labour dealing with unemployment insurance, as it has been developed in England.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Can we get that?

Mr. MURDOCK: I have not got it here, but I will bring it the next time my estimates are up.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): Is farm labour classified by the department as skilled or unskilled?

[Mr. Murdock.]

Mr. MURDOCK: I would say that it should be skilled, but it very often is not. The labour department does not classify it either way. All the department does, through the employment service, is to suggest that experienced farm labour is required.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The hon. member for Lisgar seemed to think, when he was speaking on the question of farm labor, that the present rates were entirely too high, but he did not help the minister by saying what he thought would be a fair rate. He simply objected to $5 a day.

Mr. BROWN: My objection was not to harvest wages at all; I think the hon. member has misunderstood me. My objection was to information which is evidently given to men who come there expecting to get $5 per day, whether they are able to earn it or not, and when some of them do not know anything about farm work. Some men come to the harvest fields who are worth $5 a day, and others are not worth fifty cents, and I maintained that it was unfair, from the standpoint both of the man and the employer, that men should come there under the misapprehension that any kind of man was worth $5 a day. Unfortunately, the disposition seems to prevail not only that any man can be a farmer, but that anybody can be a competent farm hand.

Mr. CALDWELL: I do not know whether I am in order in bringing up this question under this vote, Mr. Chairman; I just came in while my hon. friend from Lisgar was speaking, and I heard farm labour being discussed. I referred to this matter when I was speaking very early last Friday morning, and am pleased to see the Minister of Railways and the Minister of Immigration in their seats now.

The point I wish to bring up relates to the harvest excursions that are run to secure farm help for the West. I urged at that time that the Minister of Railways—he was not then in his seat—or some other responsible minister should see that one part of Canada was not robbed of harvest help to supply some other part. In my province we feel very strongly about this matter. Our farmers in the potato-growing belt have to hire their help by the season, for six or seven months. We pay them good wages in order that we shall have them when the potato harvest comes round, and you can imagine the feelings of a farmer in New Brunswick who has paid a man good wages for four months, and whom he did not need for more than half that time, but kept on just so that he would have him for the potato harvest, when he sees these big posters advertising harvesters' excursions to the West, and his man comes in at six o'clock and informs him that he is going West on the harvest excursion to-morrow or next Monday.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What wages do you pay them?

Mr. CALDWELL: It depends on the skill of the men. I think the point of my hon. friend from Lisgar was that one man might be worth $5 or $6 or $7 a day, and another man might not be worth his board, because he did not know anything about the work, and it would take one man to show him what to do, and he might as well do the work himself. We do not have that difficulty in New Brunswick, because our help is mostly native help, and they are familiar with the work. But we regret very much to see these excursions put on. They practically rob us of the help we have been paying for four months in order to have them with us for the harvest season. I wrote the Minister of Railways last season and urged that the Canadian National Railways should not put on excursions from points where farm help was needed worse than in any other part of Canada, because it was simply robbing us of the men we must have if our crop was not to go to waste, and he replied that it was a matter for the management of the railways.

Mr. GRAHAM: That would be protection, would it not?

Mr. CALDWELL: No, justice.

Mr. GRAHAM: Deny these men the right to go any place in Canada?

Mr. CALDWELL: No, but do not hold out special inducements for them to leave the farmer who has been paying them good wages for four months. It is getting labour under false pretences in many cases, too, I think. I contend that this is not a matter for the railway management. This transferring of people from one point to the other should be a matter of government policy. If you leave it to the railways, of course, they like to get the fares, although I submit they are not making very much money out of these harvest excursions. I think the government should take some stand in this matter and see to it that one part of Canada is not robbed of help to supply another. It is like robbing Peter to pay Paul, or worse.

Mr. MURDOCK: I will give very careful thought to the question of running harvest excursions out of New Brunswick next year. Nova Scotia once asked us not to do it, and I think we asked New Brunswick whether they wanted us to do it. But I will take into consideration the representations my hon. friend has made.

Mr. CALDWELL: Whom did you ask in New Brunswick, and what was the reply?

Mr. MURDOCK: I could not say without looking up the files, but in every case we take it up with responsible ministers of the government.

Mr. CALDWELL: Before these excursions are put on?

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes, we ask them whether they want these excursions advertised to run from their respective provinces.

Mr. CALDWELL: Would the minister bring down the correspondence the next time his estimates are up, showing to whom he wrote and what the reply was? If we have any responsible minister or public man in New Brunswick who will advise the running of harvest excursions from our province, the farmers would like to know who he is.

Mr. MURDOCK: I will bring down such correspondence as we may have in the department.

Mr. BROWN: We like the men from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and would be very sorry to be deprived of them.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Does the minister exercise control over the rates on the railways?

Mr. MURDOCK: Not at all.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I do not know what else we can infer from his last remark, that if certain provinces take exception to these excursions being run, due consideration will be given to their representations. I think the objection is a very pertinent one, and one that ought to be emphasized in this parliament. We have been accustomed for quite a number of years back to having these excursions run every fall, and to see the men after the work is over in the West come trooping back to the older provinces with the result that in the larger cities you have a large number of unemployed who are maintained during the winter by the cities, and the impression goes abroad that there is an army of unemployed here in Canada, and this is being used in the Old Country to deter desirable people from coming here. Only a week ago, while passing through Toronto, I noticed a large gathering in front of the city hall. They were supposed to be unemployed, and they were being addressed by a man whom I noticed was sent to gaol for six months by a Toronto magistrate only a few days ago. The magistrate claimed that he was a rebel, and that he was encouraging other people to rebel against the conditions they found in this country. This man claimed to be a leader of the harvesters who had been induced to come out here and go to the West, and who, when their work is through, come back to old Ontario and put in the winter in Toronto and other cities. I heard this man myself advising these people what to do.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

TRADE AND COMMERCE

Bounties on crude petroleum, administration of act, $3,000.

Mr. SPENCER: Could we have an explanation of this item?

Hon. T. A. LOW (Minister of Trade and Commerce): This vote is the same as last year, and is for the purpose of administering the act in relation to the claim for bounties in connection with crude petroleum. There is no change.

Mr. MANION: Would the minister explain what the staff consists of?

Mr. LOW: There are four officials on the staff; Mr. McDermid, Mr. Boyle, Mr. Slipper and Mr. LeBlanc. Mr. McDermid is located at Petrolea and is paid a salary of $1,500, Mr. Boyle at Sarnia, with a salary of $200, Mr. Slipper at Edmonton, salary $200, and Mr. LeBlanc at Sarnia, salary $100.

Item agreed to.

Bounties on copper bars or rods, administration of act, $2,500.

Mr. MANION: Will the minister explain the decrease?

Mr. LOW: This item has been reduced by $2,500. It is thought that this sum will be sufficient to carry on for this year.

Mr. MANION: How much was spent last year?

Mr. LOW: We spent last $540.78.

Mr. MANION: Out of a vote of $5,000?

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Sutherland.]

British and foreign news service, $32,000.

Mr. SPENCER: Will the minister explain the increase?

Mr. LOW: This item is for $32,000. Last year the amount was voted for only eight months. This includes the full twelve months. The amount last year for eight months was $21,333.34. The amount for this year for twelve months, is $32,000.

Mr. MANION: How much was spent last year?

Mr. LOW: The full amount, $21,333.34 That covered eight months.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the minister explain this a little more fully?

Mr. LOW: The object of this is to present to the outside world what is going on in Canada and to keep alive in Canada interest in Canadian industries through Reuter's Limited.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What control has the government over this service?

Mr. LOW: The control is that Reuter's agree to transmit at least 10,000 words a month of interest to Canada in connection with all matters that will be of benefit to Canada in the United Kingdom.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: This is simply a kind of advertising service for Canada.

Mr. LOW: It is an advertising service. It is a well known fact that it pays to advertise sometimes.

Item agreed to.

Administration of Canada Grain Act, $1,100,000.

Mr. LOW: In the past the estimate has included both the cost of administering the Grain Act and the management and operation of Canadian government elevators. In the estimate this year these are separated. Last year the appropriation amounted to $1,558,839. Although the two appropriations are distinct, the total amount of both this year is $1,520,000, a decrease on the combined appropriations of $38,839.

Mr. MANION: This is a big item and one of a great deal of interest particularly to hon. members from the West and also to others interested in the grain trade. Will the minister give the committee some details as to how the money is spent?

Mr. LOW: The expenditure is as follows:

Board of Grain Commissioners	$ 34,154
Western Inspection division	875,205
Eastern Inspection division	21,912
Grain Research Laboratory	9,610
Miscellaneous	16,256
Total	$957,138

Mr. MANION: How much of this is spent by the Grain Commission as their own salaries and the salaries of their employees?

Mr. LOW: The total amount is spent by the Grain board: The commission staff consists of:

Chief Commissioner	$6,500
Commissioner Snow	6,000
Commissioner Robinson	6,000
Secretary	3,600
Total	$22,100

Mr. MANION: I know there is an elevator at the head of the lakes and one at Saskatoon. I think there is one at Vancouver. Will the minister explain the costs and returns from those elevators?

Mr. LOW: There are five government elevators. The total revenues are as follows:

Port Arthur	$374,861
Moose Jaw	20,841
Saskatoon	27,392
Calgary	76,674
Vancouver	96,106
Total	$595,876

The total expenditures are as follows:

Port Arthur	$137,261
Moose Jaw	57,709
Saskatoon	78,624
Calgary	62,095
Vancouver	90,566
Screenings account	2,759
Total	$429,016

Mr. MANION: Would the minister explain the heavy loss on the Saskatoon elevator?

Mr. LOW: The only reason I can give is lack of business. The same thing applies to Moose Jaw.

Mr. HOCKEN: Does the staff remain the same whether there is 100 per cent business or 50 per cent business?

Mr. LOW: It takes a much larger staff to operate at Port Arthur or Fort William than at Moose Jaw or Saskatoon, but we have to retain a certain staff at the latter two points.

Mr. HOCKEN: At Vancouver where the revenue was $96,106 the cost was $90,566. At Saskatoon, where the revenue was $27,392, the cost was $78,624.

Mr. LOW: It takes a certain organization to carry on the work at the elevator at Moose Jaw. We have a plant there that cost over $2,000,000. We have to maintain a certain staff whether the business comes in or not unless we decide to close the place up.

Mr. HOCKEN: Are there any capital charges in this amount?

Mr. LOW: No.

Mr. CRERAR: It includes the maintenance charges?

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Mr. HOCKEN: It is an enormous sum of money to spend for a revenue of $27,000.

Mr. LOW: I am not responsible for the elevator having been built there.

Mr. MILLAR: Has the inspection staff been very materially increased in the last few years? I have heard the complaint that while business has greatly increased there has been but a slight addition to the staff so that to-day they are not able to do the work efficiently.

Mr. LOW: There has been a considerable increase due to the increase in business.

Mr. MILLAR: How much of an increase?

Mr. LOW: I cannot give the figures to-night but I shall be glad to get them.

Mr. MILLAR: Comparing the revenue with the outlay in connection with the Board of Grain Commissioners and the elevators, is there a surplus or a deficit, and how much is it?

Mr. LOW: The operations of the elevators during the past thirteen years and ten months have produced a surplus of $94,000.

Mr. MANION: There has been some talk for some time of a change in the location of the Board of Grain Commissioners, which, ever since the institution of the Canada Grain Act, has been situated at the head of the lakes. Is there any intention this year of changing the situation of the board?

Mr. LOW: We have not so far thought of any change.

Mr. MANION: I take it that the matter is not under investigation with a change in view.

Mr. LOW: No.

Mr. CLARK: Are all the elevators in the city of Vancouver administered by the Department of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. LOW: No, they are under the Department of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. CLARK: I cannot understand how it is that the minister gives us the report on the Vancouver elevators.

Mr. LOW: The Department of Trade and Commerce has charge of the work of inspection and weighing.

Mr. CLARK: I understood the Department of Trade and Commerce had handed over the elevators to the Harbour Commission.

Mr. LOW: The business of inspection and weighing is still carried on under the Board of Grain Commissioners.

Mr. CRERAR: Is it the intention of the department to maintain the inspection and weighing at Vancouver under the control of the Board of Grain Commissioners?

Mr. LOW: That is what we are doing now. As to what we shall do in the future, I should not like to venture a prediction.

Mr. CRERAR: I desire if possible to have some assurance from the minister that this will be done. The matter is one of considerable importance and such an assurance from the minister is I think necessary. Most hon. gentlemen who are familiar with the grain situation in the West know that the Board of Harbour Commissioners in Vancouver desire to secure the control of the weighing and inspection at that point. That in my opinion would be a very great mistake. The control of the inspection, of the inspection of officials, and of the weighing should certainly remain under the Board of Grain Commissioners at Vancouver just as in the case of the terminal elevators at the head of the lakes, and at Moose Jaw, Saskatoon, Calgary, and, I presume, Edmonton when the new elevator there is completed. I repeat, I should be glad if the minister would give us an assurance that this will be done. I can tell him that it is the universal wish not only of the growers of grain but as well of the handlers of this commodity that the inspection and weighing should be under the control of the Board of Grain Commissioners.

Mr. LOW: When the matter is under consideration I shall be glad to bear in mind the representations of my hon. friend.

Mr. CRERAR: I do not wish to embarrass the minister at all but the matter is of very great importance and I am anxious to have some assurance from him that if any change is contemplated, and before a change is made, whereby the supervision of the inspection and weighing passes from the Board of Grain Commissioners, the growers of grain who are vitally interested in this matter, as well as the handlers and dealers, will be given an opportunity to make representations to the minister.

[Mr. Low.]

Mr. LOW: I shall be glad at any time to receive such representations and as a matter of fact I have received some.

Mr. CRERAR: The minister is evading my question entirely and I do not propose to let him off that way. I want to know whether the minister will give the committee an assurance that before a change is made an opportunity will be given to those who are interested to make representations either to himself or to the government.

Mr. LOW: Yes, I shall be glad to do that.

Mr. MILLAR: I support the request of my hon. friend (Mr. Crerar) 100 per cent. It is very important that the control of the inspection and weighing should be retained under the Board of Grain Commissioners. Now that the minister has given us the information that there is a surplus of $94,000 each year—

Mr. LOW: Not each year; I said that was the surplus for thirteen years and ten months of operations.

Mr. MILLAR: Does that include the inspection department, the fees from that department, the sale of samples, and all that sort of thing? If it does, it seems rather small.

Mr. LOW: Yes, it includes the total revenue. My hon. friend must remember that in the early years of the operations of the Canada Grain Board there was a considerable loss.

Mr. BROWN: In view of that statement, what is the present situation? What would be the surplus over expenditure for the past year including all branches of administration?

Mr. LOW: For the past ten months it was $242,000.

Mr. BROWN: That means that the grain trade, in other words the farmers, are asked to contribute that much to the consolidated revenue.

Mr. LOW: We had that surplus last year; we do not know what the surplus will be this year.

Mr. CRERAR: I appreciate very much the cautious attitude of the minister in approaching this question, but I think, in view of the surplus the department has had not only within very recent years but in previous years as well, the department might very well consider a reduction in the weighing and inspection fees.

Mr. MANION: I would ask the minister to let this item stand for a while. My hon.

friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) informed me that he had some questions to ask regarding it and he is not here at present. He has been out of town and will be back this evening; in fact I expect him in a few minutes.

Mr. LOW: I shall be glad to let it stand.

Mr. CAMPBELL: How does the situation stand at the head of the lakes in the matter of shipping, and what is being done there to cope with it?

Mr. LOW: I am not aware of any congestion at the head of the lakes at the present moment; everything is working out all right.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I am aware that there is no congestion at the present time but it seems to me that this is the very occasion to take some means to prevent such a condition in the future. The situation that exists there to-day is one for which perhaps the government can take no particular credit; it is due to the fact that there is a surplus of American shipping. The rates have come down since October to about less than half what they were then, by reason of that fact. I think therefore that something ought to be done now to prevent a recurrence of the condition we had last fall and the fall before.

The remarkable feature is that Canadian vessels are taking grain from the head of the lakes to Buffalo for two cents rather than carry it half the distance to Georgian bay ports for two and a half cents a bushel. This discrimination is not new; it has always existed. Our vessel owners are doing it simply and solely because our coastal laws prevent American vessels carrying grain to Georgian bay ports. The purpose of these laws, as I understand, was to secure Canadian trade for Canadian ships. But they are abusing the privilege, and as a result a lot of our grain is being diverted to American ports and reaching seaboard by American railways instead of our railways getting the benefit of the haul. It seems to me that if these coastal laws were suspended our Canadian ships would not only stay in their own waters but we would get probably the same number of American ships in the trade as we are getting to-day. Something should be done to prevent a recurrence of this discrimination.

Mr. BROWN: What is the intention of the minister with regard to the work being done by Dr. Birchard in Winnipeg? We were very sorry to know that it had been suspended, temporarily at least.

Mr. LOW: We are waiting for the report of the Royal Grain Commission. After considering that report certain changes may be made.

Mr. CAMPBELL: What does the minister say with regard to the shipping situation?

Mr. LOW: Nothing untoward happened last fall, and I do not think there is any danger of anything happening during the early part of this season. Before the session is over we hope to introduce certain amendments to the act passed last session.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Would the minister tell us something of the nature of the changes that are proposed?

Mr. LOW: As the bill is not yet drafted I should not like to venture any forecast.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Will the amendments deal with the coastal laws?

Mr. LOW: I should not like to venture any forecast of what the bill will deal with.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Was that Halifax by-election elevator under the Trade and Commerce department?

Mr. LOW: There is an item in the estimates for the Halifax elevator.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is that under the Trade and Commerce department?

Mr. LOW: Yes, and later on I am sure there will be ample opportunity to discuss it.

Mr. HOEY: Does this item contain anything for carrying on the work which Dr Birchard has been engaged in until recently?

Mr. LOW: The item is contained in the vote for the Canada Grain Act, with the exception of Dr. Birchard's salary, which is included in the civil government estimates.

Mr. MILLAR: I think the work done by Dr. Birchard is more important than is generally understood. In past years our grain growers have been losing heavily because certain interests have been picking out the grain that is strongest in gluten and the cars containing this grain are diverted to the mixing elevators. The American interests need our strong wheat to mix with their soft wheat, and they too have been selecting our stronger grades. We have had to bear a heavy loss because we have no effective means of finding out the strength of our wheat. Then again, certain kinds of wheat when discolored by a little moisture are thrown into number three, whereas it has been found by milling tests that they are really as good as number one. This wheat is really number one slightly discolored. Therefore the grower and shipper have been losing seven cents a bushel, simply because milling value of the wheat was not known. I would urge on the minister that this department not only be maintained but that it be developed and put in closer touch with the chief inspector. I think if more money were spent on this department in order to make it more efficient and constitute it an adjunct of the inspection department, so the inspectors would have the full benefit of expert knowledge of this kind, our farmers would get more than sufficient to warrant the increased expenditure.

Mr. BROWN: I hope too that publicity will be given to Dr. Birchard's work. It has been very difficult in the past to get any kind of report of the results of his work, except surreptitiously.

Mr. LOW: I quite agree with the hon. member that the work is very important. If we find that we can carry on the laboratory work as it has been conducted in the past we will do so; if not we will probably introduce a more efficient method. In regard to publicity, I may say that we have received no report from Dr. Birchard since 1921. I assure hon. members that I have no desire to eliminate any work that will be of benefit to our agricultural interests.

Mr. KNOX: Was it the fault of Dr. Birchard that no further report was made?

Mr. LOW: He sent in a partial report in 1921. Up to the present time he has never completed that report.

Mr. KNOX: I have a hazy recollection of a certain report of Dr. Birchard's being suppressed some years ago.

Mr. LOW: I do not know of any report being suppressed since this government came into office.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Are these reports available to the public? If so, where may they be secured?

Mr. LOW: All reports are tabled.

Mr. MILLAR: May I revert to a matter that we were discussing a few minutes ago? To a question asked by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Evans): What was the value of such overages to the government?—referring to the overages in elevators—the answer was: The value of such overages due to the government for the period 1920 to 1923, inclusive, amounts to $477,152.03. Is that included in the calculation given by the minister?

Mr. LOW: That is included in the surplus.

[Mr. Millar.]

Mr. CARROLL: Do my hon. friends wish to have another report in order to boost a civil servant and incur a further expenditure of three or four thousand dollars?

Mr. KNOX: I say we should have a report from the laboratory to show the work that has been done. Our grain growers feel that such information would be to their distinct advantage if contained in annual reports, so as to overcome the difficulty of having the best types of grain taken away while the man who has grown that grain does not get the full advantage of it. If we had the reports to show the quality of the grain it would make a material difference.

Item stands.

Canadian Engineering Standards Association, grant to, $10,000

Mr. MANION: Will the minister explain this vote?

Mr. LOW: It is a grant to the Canadian Engineering Standards Association for the promotion of uniformity of standards in metallic and other products.

Item agreed to.

Canadian Government Motion Picture Bureau, $25,000.

Mr. MANION: Will the minister explain?

Mr. LOW: The amount is $10,000 less than last year. The vote includes salaries of temporary employees, travelling expenses, expenditure for films, chemicals, photographic supplies, printing and stationery, repairs to instruments and sundry expenses.

Mr. MANION: What is the purpose of the whole vote? Is it advertising?

Mr. LOW: The Motion Picture Bureau under the Department of Trade and Commerce was established for the purpose of advertising abroad Canada's scenic attractions, agricultural resources and industrial development.

Mr. CRERAR: When was that started?

Mr. LOW: In 1918.

Mr. MANION: How is it that we are able to reduce the vote by $10,000 this year?

Mr. LOW: A general curtailment.

Mr. SPENCER: How much was spent last year?

Mr. LOW: Spent last year—$23,303.17. I may say that there is a revenue in connection with the Motion Picture Bureau. For the year ending 31st March, 1923, the revenue was $16,141. For the period ending 31st January, 1924, it amounted to $10,490.

Mr. MANION: Where does the revenue come from? And will the minister give us some more details in regard to the reductions? The expression "a general curtailment" is not very definite.

Mr. LOW: We have reduced the number of the temporary staff and also the travelling expenses.

Mr. MANION: What does the revenue come from?

Mr. LOW: Moving picture films.

Mr. CLARK: To whom are these disposed of?

Mr. LOW: To a number of firms—Canadian Universal Film Company; First National Exhibitors of Australia; Premier National Pictures, Australia; African Films; Centre Theatre; Monument National Theatre, Family Theatre. Films are made for other departments of the government also.

Item agreed to.

Mr. LOW: With regard to item 372, the hon. member said that the member for Centre Vancouver wished to discuss the Vancouver elevator. He will have ample opportunity under item 379 to do that—operation and management of Canadian government elevators.

Mr. MANION: I thought the member for Vancouver Centre was coming in on to-night's train, but I am informed that he spoke to-day in Toronto at noon so that it is likely that he will not be here. The minister has a number of important items to deal with before he deals with that, and I suggest that he hold it over or at least that he keep it until the last item to-night.

Mr. LOW: I shall be very glad to meet the wishes of hon. gentlemen in that respect.

Mr. LOW: Item 380.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why is the minister adopting the kangaroo method of skipping items?

Mr. LOW: To meet the wishes of my hon. friends.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We only asked that the one item be held.

Mr. LOW: All right we will take up 379.

Elevators, operation and management of the Canadian government, $420,000.

Mr. MANION: Are these the elevators in connection with which the minister gave some figures some time ago under the Canada Grain Act item?

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is not one of the items I referred to as being skipped. The ones I had in mind were such as these: Commercial Intelligence Service; Dominion Bureau of Statistics; Electricity and Gas Inspection. Items relating to elevators might be held.

Mr. LOW: I did not think my right hon. friend was going to ask that all the large items be held over.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am asking that we take up some that are skipped.

Mr. LOW: We are skipping them to meet the wishes of hon. members on the other side.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We are asking that these elevator items stand.

Mr. LOW: Then we will take up No. 375.

Item stands.

Commercial Intelligence Service, $324,720.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is this increase in pursuance of a policy of general enlargement?

Mr. LOW: Yes, this is one branch of the department in connection with which I think it is wise to spend money—the extension of our export trade. There is an increase of $4,720. A number of new offices have been opened up. I do not think it would be wise to curtail the Intelligence branch of the department.

Mr. LADNER: Does this vote include the publication that is issued regularly?

Mr. LOW: It includes all publications of the Commercial Intelligence Service.

Mr. LEADER: I notice in the third volume of the Auditor General's report, on page ZZ-30, under the heading "Trade Commissioners and Commercial Agents" an item designated Entertainments. I would like to have some information on that.

Mr. LOW: Does that come under the item we are discussing?

Mr. LEADER: Yes.

Mr. LOW: What is the amount?

Mr. LEADER: There are several items.

Mr. LOW: There is an allowance made each year for the trade commissioners. I do not know just what my hon. friend has in mind, but unless it is something special it would be included, I presume, in the usual allowance.

Mr. LEADER: Perhaps I might explain further. In going through the Auditor General's report I see a number of items—I have found twelve to-night, and there may be others—for entertainment. They are not very large in themselves, but in the aggregate they amount to considerable, and these expenditures I would classify as unwarranted. They have not even the virtue of patronizing the home market. Here, for instance, is an entertainment in Paris costing $76.09; one in Japan, $113.65; one in India, $134.74; one in Italy, $46.68; one in Old England, $34.14; one in Barbados, $59.30; one in New York, $222.75 —the larger the city the greater the expenditure, of course; another one in Rio de Janeiro $184.05; coming back to England again, another one costing $58.53; one in Jamaica, $66.30; one in Singapore, $46.80. I have not had time to total them up, but they amount approximately to $1,200.

Mr. LOW: I suppose my hon. friend will agree that at times the trade commissioners will be called upon to entertain trade delegations. That is not an unusal thing in business. Quite frequently in my own firm we have accounts come into our business offices for entertainment, and we do not look upon that expenditure as a waste of money.

Mr. MANION: Before dinner there was a question raised as to an entertainment on the other side of the river in connection with the interprovincial delegates to a labour conference here at Ottawa. I am wondering if the same principle is upheld by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Does the government live up to the Ontario Temperance Act in these entertainments?

Mr. LOW: Was my hon. friend a guest of the Minister of Labour?

Mr. MANION: I was not. I read about it.

Mr. HOCKEN: Is there any limit put upon the amount that is to be spent by a trade agent for entertainment, or has he carte blanche?

Mr. LOW: He is not allowed to spend an unlimited amount. The accounts have to be approved by the minister.

Mr. HOCKEN: What is the limit of the minister?

Mr. LOW: It is a matter of judgment for the minister.

Mr. LEADER: These commercial agents do a good deal of travelling, I presume, for I see items here amounting to a considerable amount of money. Sometimes they travel alone and the amount is not so large, in the neighbourhood of $1,400; another trade agent takes his wife along and it runs the bill up considerably, to over $2,000. I do not blame him for taking his wife along, but in some cases he takes his family also; I think we might draw the line there. In that case the travelling expenses amount to almost $3,000.

Mr. LOW: It would be utterly impossible to secure the services of good men unless we agreed to pay the travelling expenses of their families en route to their posts. It would hardly be reasonable to expect a trade commissioner to leave his wife and family in this country while he went abroad for two or three years.

Mr. LEADER: I do not find so much fault with that, but I am really pleading for economy to-night. I do not think the Dominion of Canada can stand these unwarranted expenditures at this time, and therefore I would like to see a stop put to this practice. I believe the ministers themselves desire that, but someone has to take the initiative, and I believe parliament should do it.

Mr. HUGHES: On what principle are the trade commissioners appointed? What qualifications are considered necessary, and does the minister think he is getting value for the money expended in this way?

Mr. LOW: The trade commissioners are appointed by the Civil Service Commission. I cannot say that I agree with the system of appointing them, but that is the way they are appointed. The qualifications are that they shall be graduates of some recognized university. and under the age of thirty-two, so if any member of parliament is thinking of applying for a trade commissionership, he is limited in that respect. I do not agree that that is the best way of securing trade commissioners to send abroad. I think the first essential should be that a man should have a good education, and secondly, some business experience. A young man, fresh from a university, who is sent to Africa or Japan or China. can hardly be expected to give the best results. I will give you an example of what happened a few years ago. A gentleman came out from Scotland, a graduate of a Scottish university, and a lawyer by profession. He located in Winnipeg, and after spending a couple of years there noticed an advertisement for a trade commissioner. He put in an applcation, and needless to say, with his education, he came out at the top of the list. and he is now one of our trade commissioners abroad. Now I think that a man should have lived in this country a longer period than two and a half or three years before being appointed a trade commissioner, because in that period he cannot have acquired a sufficient knowledge of the business and commercial affairs of this country to represent it abroad. That is my opinion at least. I think one of the essentials should be that he should have some knowledge of Canadian business. Nor do I think that the age of 33 should bar an applicant. There are many good men of experience from 40 to 45 years of age, who would make first-class trade commissioners. Probably much better ones than a university graduate, 23 or 24 years of age, without any business experience whatever.

Mr. HUGHES: The statements made by the minister are quite startling. Whoever were the authors of that system evidently did not know anything about their business, and the sooner the system is amended or ended the better. To select a young man of thirty-two perhaps with no business experience at all, as is the fact in the case indicated by the minister, for a position of this kind, would seem to be a total waste of money and a total disregard of the qualifications necessary for such a position. In connection with trade matters men of experience should be selected, and not professional men. A few years ago I happened to meet a young man, a graduate from one of the universities—no harm in being a graduate but rather a recommendation—and this young man was going as a commissioner to Newfoundland as a representative of the Maritime provinces. He belonged to the province of Ontario and had passed his examination no doubt. I had the opportunity of speaking to him for about half an hour, and I found that he did not know anything at all.

An hon. MEMBER: Did he know a codfish?

Mr. HUGHES: He would not know a codfish from a herring. He might, perhaps, if he were sent into a business office, know something about the business at the expiration of eight or ten years, but to send a stripling from the university to represent the business men of the country and the Department of Trade and Commerce, to meet business men, when he himself knew nothing of business, would be simply a farce. He was going to St. John's, Newfoundland. No business man would waste an hour talking to him.

Mr. CARROLL: Who sent him?

Mr. HUGHES: The Civil Service Commission, the minister says.

Mr. CARROLL: Who laid down the regulations by which such officials are appointed?

Mr. HUGHES: I think two gentlemen who prepared that Civil Service Act in 1918, and they were in my opinion the most overrated and impracticable men in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who were they? Was one of them the present Chief Justice of the Exchequer Court?

Mr. HUGHES: I do not care who he was or what position he holds.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member might at least pay him that compliment and have it go direct to him, so that there will be no mistake.

Mr. HUGHES: I am talking business now, and my hon. friend wants to be a little smart.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I could not recognize the reference myself. Will the hon. member be good enough to state to whom he refers?

Mr. HUGHES: I am not asking the right hon. member to recognize anything.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member tried to talk a little politics in his last few sentences, and he is making about as good a fist of it as he did of the business end.

Mr. HUGHES: Oh, indeed. I do not expect to suit my hon. friend. I am inclined to think he does not know very much about it either. I am making my statement to the business men of this committee, and I think they will recognize that my suggestion has merit. This system has to be changed if we are to get results.

The markets for the province from which I come and the Maritime provinces generally are in the West India islands, in the island of Cuba, and the United States of America. The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan), speaking some weeks ago in this chamber, stated that when he was in the West Indian islands recuperating from his illness he made it his business to try and find the trade commissioner there. The description he gave of the office of the commissioner and the way in which it was conducted was simply discreditable to Canada. There is nothing—and I make this statement in the presence of hon. members from the Maritime provinces—that the Minister of Trade and Commerce could do that would be of such advantage to the Maritime provinces as to send experienced business men from those provinces to the West Indies, to Cuba and the southern States, where we sell potatoes, to interview the business men there and to establish markets. We do some business with that part of the world at the present time, and, the business could be greatly enlarged. They want our butter, eggs, cheese, hay, potatoes, and grain, and we want their products, but that market is neglected. It is of no use whatever sending inexperienced youths down there to try to open these markets and to develop trade and commerce. If the Civil Service Commission will not allow the minister to send qualified men of experience, something will have to be done with that commission. The business of the country cannot be tied up in that way, and it is up to the Parliament of Canada to see that these conditions are changed. If there were business men, or even one good business man, on the Civil Service Commission, I do not believe they would try to hold up the Minister of Trade and Commerce in this way. I have brought this matter before the committee, and I think it should receive attention. I have no hesitation in saying that the money we are paying out for this service at the present time is largely wasted and the country is not getting the benefit.

Mr. CLARK: I have always understood that the minister had power to dismiss a civil servant, and certainly he has the power to refuse to accept an appointment made by the Civil Service Commission. These two things should rather safeguard the situation. Another phase of the matter which appeals to me is that the present system has one merit, and that is that it makes it impossible to appoint men as a reward for political services. I think we should seriously bear that in mind. But I would like the minister to state just what he has in mind. He condemned the system. Surely he has a remedy, and perhaps he would outline it to us.

Mr. LOW: When parliament decides to amend the Civil Service Act I am sure I will be very glad to give parliament the benefit of my suggestions, but I think it is a waste of time discussing it to-night.

Mr. CLARK: I think it is far from a waste of time. Perhaps, if the hon. minister would give the House the ideas he has in mind, pressure might be brought to bear on the government in the matter. If I am not mistaken the Prime Minister always declares that he must hear the voice of parliament before he introduces legislation; therefore, I think it is a most opportune time for the minister to tell us what the remedy is, and then perhaps parliament can voice its opinion.

Mr. LOW: I have no hesitation in telling my hon. friend that I think the minister should have at least some voice in the selection of trade commissioners who are to be sent abroad.

Mr. HOCKEN: Do I understand the minister is compelled to accept a man who has no business experience for a business position?

Mr. LOW: We have to give him a trial. Of course, the minister can refuse to accept a man who is appointed. For instance I laid off four junior trade commissioners the other day because I was of the opinion that, while they were probably good men in some other lines they would not make good trade commissioners abroad. It is in the power of the minister to refuse to accept an appointee, but what is going to be accomplished by that? If we continually refuse the men whom the Civil Service Commission send to us, where is it going to end? I do not see that that would be a remedy at all.

Mr. HOCKEN: It is a great mistake to have a regulation that fixes the age limit at thirty-two in connection with a position of that kind. I agree with the hon. member for Kings, P.E.I. (Mr. Hughes) that a more mature man ought to be taken for such a position. Surely it is within the power of the government to amend a regulation of that nature. I should judge that the hon. member for Kings, P.E.I., would make an admirable trade commissioner in Jamaica or the Maritime provinces. He is beyond the age of thirty-two, I am afraid; but certainly to take a young man of thirty-two who has just come out of a university and who has no business experience and make him a trade commissioner, is about as asinine a procedure as I can imagine.

Mr. HOEY: Is it not true that these men are trained for a year at least, sometimes more, before they are sent abroad? What is the nature of that training?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is it a statutory law that university training must be had?

Mr. LOW: It is a Civil Service Commission regulation.

Mr. CLARK: Does the minister think he should have entire control in his appointments? Is he the man who should be the judge of who is to be employed?

Mr. LOW: I would not ask to have the complete decision as to who should be accepted; but I think the minister, who is responsible to parliament and the people of the country, should have at least something to say in the selection of those trade agents who are sent abroad.

Mr. CLARK: The minister has power to refuse; he has power to lay off; he has power to reduce a first class trade commissioner to a fourth class trade commissioner, and so on. Just what additional power should he have?

Mr. LOW: I think the minister should have the right to meet these applicants and should have some discretion as to the age limit. Of course, that is a regulation that is fixed by the Civil Service Commission. I agree, however, with the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) that a man of thirty-five or forty years of age should not be barred from applying for a position as trade commissioner. On the other hand, I do not think a man who is under thirty-five should be barred. Many young men at twenty-five or twenty-eight have experience that is very valuable. There are, however, many men at forty years of age who would make first class trade commissioners abroad. I think the minister should be the judge largely; and if I had the decision I would say that the minister, being responsible to parliament and the country for the work of these trade commissioners, should have the selection of them. I have had some business experience, and I do not think I would care to allow the Civil Service Commission to select the man to represent me in the city of London, England. I usually select a man for his business experience. He certainly requires to have a good ground-work,—good education.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I had nothing at all immediately to do with framing the Civil Service Act or drawing up the regulations but I do not think the minister is doing quite justice to the matter in his presentation of it to the committee. This appears to be a regulation of the commission; but if it was a regulation of the commission, it was submitted with the others to the government, considered by the special committee which had to do with it, submitted to parliament in the usual way and accepted by parliament as all these regulations must be. The matter was chiefly under the immediate supervision of a member of the government, now Chief Justice of the Exchequer Court of Canada, and I venture to say that if the minister will look into the history of the subject, especially if he will look into the discussion which took place on this phase and possibly into the evidence given,—for I would judge it likely that some was given before the Civil Service committee of this House of last session, certainly of previous sessions, and I would think, probably of last session—he will find much more of intelligent discussion of the question than any that he has initiated this evening. I venture also to say that he will find that other countries, perhaps not all, follow pretty much the same regulation. I have an indistinct,—by no means a distinct—recollection of discussions of this subject in this House, and unless my memory is wrong—I do not claim it is right, because it is very indistinct—the British Civil Service follow the same rule. This is a regulation that was seriously recommended by a commission and accepted by parliament; if it was accepted by parliament it was certainly accepted with acclaim by all hon. gentlemen opposite who were in the House at the time; with all those regulations they were heartily in accord, and I would not like it to go out that this was done merely in a spirit of narrow prejudice against governments or parliaments and without that full consideration that such questions usually receive. There is far more to this question than the minister has revealed. I am pretty sure that the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey) is right, that a period of training is required, similar to what other countries require. To say that because the minister is responsible, therefore he must appoint, is merely to accept the whole patronage system and all that appertains to it. It may be there are some exceptions. I do not know just what they are in the Department of Trade and Commerce, and certainly I do not see why any special exception should be made of a junior trade commissioner or of any of these ordinary trade commissioners from the regular provisions of the act. The minister says that there must be some control. He has some control. He can look into the qualifications; he can examine any man who is sent to him; he can look into his history and record; he can put an absolute veto on any man, and this is very frequently done, not only before trial, but after trial. Surely that is some control. If some control means more than that, that means the minister appoints him, and the minister knows, if he was in any parliament under any government, and particularly under the one he is supporting, that appointees who are the consequence of that system are by no means a very creditable array.

Mr. LOW: I am not criticising to-night those who made the regulations. The regulations were there when I took over the department; but I would like to submit this question to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen). Does he think it would be wise to appoint a young man who had just graduated from Osgoode Hall to the Supreme Court of Canada? The same thing applies in this case, to my mind, and I look at it only from a practical business standpoint. I think a young man who has just graduated from Osgoode Hall might just as well be appointed to the Supreme Court of Canada as that a man who has just graduated from a university should be appointed as a trade commissioner abroad.

Mr. MANION: According to my best knowledge, young men as a rule graduate from the universities very much under thirty-two; most of them graduate around twenty and twenty-two. So that they have from eight to ten or twelve years in which to study the duties of the office before they become junior trade commissioners. Can the minister give us a list of the trade commissioners whom we have in the various countries, together with their salaries? I do not think it would be a very long list and it would be interesting to the committee.

Mr. HOEY: What is the length and what is the nature of the training that is required, before these men are sent abroad?

Mr. LOW: Usually they remain in the department about one year. But I do not think that my hon. friend would say that the training which a young man would receive in a department in the course of a year would constitute practical business experience. Regarding the request of my hon. friend (Mr. Manion), I shall be glad to put a list of the names on record in Hansard.

Mr. MANION: How many names are there on the list?

Mr. LOW: About thirty.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Was this subject reviewed, or reported upon, by the committee of last session which was presided over by the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Malcolm)?

Mr. LOW: I do not know whether it was specially commented upon.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the government was of the minister's view would it not have been a wise course to have reviewed the matter then?

Mr. LOW: I may remind my right hon. friend that it was only last August that I took over the department.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Apparently the minister's predecessors were not of the same views or prejudices as himself.

Mr. CALDWELL: The minister says he has little responsibility in the matter of appointments. I take it however that he is responsible for the decision as to where these men shall be sent.

[Mr. Low.]

Mr. LOW: The matter is one of promotion.

Mr. CALDWELL: That is not my question. Does the minister not decide to what countries the commissioners shall be sent?

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL: I have discussed this matter with the minister before, particularly with reference to the reopening of the trade commissioner's office in Cuba. At one time we had in that country as trade commissioner one of the best business men in eastern Canada, but he was dismissed and his position was taken by a Cuban. The minister speaks of one man who had lived in Canada only one year. Well, this Cuban never had been in Canada at all and could speak very little English; yet he replaced as trade commissioner in Cuba one of our best Maritime business men. He knew nothing whatever of our country, but was appointed to take the place of a Canadian, as one of this Dominion's trade commissioners, in a place with which we do a large export trade, a trade that has been on the increase. But that is not all, for even this Cuban himself has been dismissed and I believe the office has been closed.

Mr. LOW: The office has been closed, yes.

Mr. CALDWELL: I understand that the trade commissioner in Jamaica has supervision over the Cuban situation.

Mr. LOW: That is right.

Mr. CALDWELL: Before this item passes I shall ask the minister to give us the amount of Canada's exports to Jamaica and the amount of exports to Cuba, particularly to Havana where this trade commissioner was stationed. Cuba is our only market to-day for potatoes, and potatoes to us people in the Maritime provinces are what wheat is to the people in the West. Less than two years ago an embargo was imposed in Cuba on the import of potatoes from certain countries in which there prevailed a very destructive potato disease, and because we had no trade representative in Cuba with a knowledge of the Canadian situation, that injurious regulation was made to apply to this country as well. It was modified later on, so that to-day we can get our potatoes into Cuba upon complying with certain conditions. We have to have a plant pathologist in Canada certify that the potatoes are free from this disease, although as a matter of fact this particular disease has never existed in this country. I have urged upon the minister repeatedly the reappointment of a trade commissioner in Cuba, especially in view of the extent of our exports to that country, running into a good many millions a year from the province of New Brunswick alone. As I say, Cuba is our only export market for potatoes and our exporters are hampered by this restrictive regulation which the Cuban authorities have imposed; they must get a plant pathologist to certify that the potatoes are free from the disease and then they must obtain a certificate from the consul. It will readily be seen to what enormous trouble and inconvenience our shippers are subjected,—trouble and inconvenience which would be wholly unnecessary if we had in Cuba a trade commissioner such as the gentleman who held that position prior to the Cuban to whom I have referred. I am sorry I have not with me a letter which I have on my files at home, written by a former Minister of Trade and Commerce to this gentleman, Mr. Manzer, when he was trade commissioner in Cuba. Mr. Manzer was particularly interested in the potato export trade, having been a potato shipper himself before he took up the position of trade commissioner in Cuba, and he was able on a great many occasions to adjust differences between shippers in Canada and consignees in Cuba. A letter was addressed to him from a former Minister of Trade and Commerce—not the immediate predecessor of the present minister nor the one next preceding him, but a minister who held the office some time ago—in which Mr. Manzer was instructed to discontinue his activities in the interests of the potato export business; he was virtually told that he was to pay no attention to the interests of the potato exporters. Instead, the then minister urged him to devote his time and attention to securing a market for cheesecloth and another commodity on a par with it in importance; he was not to give any assistance to the exporters of potatoes. Now I submit that the trade commissioner in Jamaica most certainly is not able to exercise any sort of supervision over the business of exporting potatoes from Canada to Cuba, and I would strongly urge the minister to consider either removing the present commissioner in Jamaica and establishing him in Cuba, or appointing a new man in the latter place. I thoroughly agree with the remarks of the hon. member for Kings, P.E.I. (Mr. Hughes); I think we should have a man who has not only had experience in Canada but who knows precisely what this country has to export, a man who would be able to present that feature as forcibly and successfully as possible to the people in the country in which he represented us. That is a matter of great importance, and I am anxious to have an answer from the minister; I want to know whether he will favourably consider reopening the office in Cuba.

Mr. LOW: The matter is under consideration; it is a question of money. No definite decision has been reached yet, and it is altogether a question as to what degree we should extend our offices.

Mr. CALDWELL: I am not by any means asking the minister to spend money for the purpose of extending the activities of the department into new fields; I simply want him to reopen an office which has already done good work and which is highly important to the people of the Maritime provinces. I trust he will not delay the matter too long. I have been urging him to do something ever since he has assumed office, just as I did in the time of his predecessor.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I asked the minister a little while ago whether there was an agent at Havana. I notice by the Auditor General's report that there is.

Mr. CALDWELL: That was two years ago. There is none now.

Mr. LOW: No.

Mr. MICHAUD: Some time ago I received several letters from Mr. Manzer and other persons regarding the business interests of this country in Cuba. Judging by the extent of our exports to that country it seems to me that we ought to have a representative, one of our own business men at Havana. I understand that some three or four years ago Mr. Manzer was dismissed and a man of whom we knew little if anything was appointed to take his place. I understand he is doing the best he can, but he does not really represent Canadian sentiment and does not know anything in relation to our trade and commerce.

Mr. MARTELL: Who is the trade commissioner at Singapore? When was he transferred from Bristol? What does he know of the industries of Canada? And what are his qualifications to represent Canada and tell the people of Singapore what we have to export?

Mr. LOW: A. B. Muddiman. I do not know when he was transferred to Singapore, but I shall be very glad to secure the information for my hon. friend.

Mr. CALDWELL: What was the name of the last agent who was regularly stationed in Cuba? And had he ever resided in Canada?

Mr. LOW: J. C. Manzer. I cannot say whether he ever resided in Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why was the Cuban office closed? Really at first sight it does seem strange that we have not an agent there.

Mr. LOW: It was decided to handle the business through the office at Jamaica.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who decided that?

Mr. LOW: The agent in Cuba was let out before I took office.

Mr. LOGAN: Mr. Chairman, this probably is about the most important matter we have discussed this session, not even excepting the budget—because after all the budget did not make many changes. I look upon the present system of appointments to trade commissionerships as an absolute farce, and the sooner that we as business men representing the taxpayers take this matter in hand and back up the minister in his efforts the better it is going to be for Canada, and particularly for the maritime parts of Canada, west as well as east. I have every confidence in the minister as a business man, and I can quite appreciate that he sees the farce himself as he sits in his office trying to do business with the world under present conditions.

Let me give the committee some personal experiences. I am very much interested in Canadian trade with the south, particularly from the Maritime provinces. I do not believe that we can ever build up in the Maritime provinces a great trade with central Canada on account of the excessive freight rates; but we have a market to the south of us reached by the cheapest transportation in the world, where trade is beckoning to us. Last winter I spent some time looking over the situation there. Unfortunately I was not able to go to many of the places which I most desired to visit, but I went far enough to see that the conditions should be remedied. I went to Nassau in the Bahama islands, three hundred in number, doing a tremendous trade with the Old Country and with the United States. I called at the Royal Bank and inquired about our representative. Allow me to say just here, Mr. Chairman, that while we have been laggard in our duty as a parliament in developing Canadian export trade, we owe a great deal to the banks of this country for going to the West India islands and to the South American countries and developing a great business and advertising Canada. This applies particularly to the Royal Bank which I think has ninety branches south of Bermuda. I inquired, as I say, for our trade commissioner in Nassau. I was told: "There used to be one, there is none now." This does not look like progress to me. I asked how we were represented in the Bahama islands, and was informed: By an agent away around in Kingston, Jamaica. They had never seen him, they did not know his name, but they thought he was there. Now, Mr. Chairman, having had experience of travel you can appreciate the difficulties that lie in the way of the people in Nassau dealing with a commissioner in Jamaica, because it takes four long days and nights to get from Nassau to Kingston—it is almost as bad as going across the Atlantic. Next there is the great island of Cuba, of which my friend from Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell) has spoken. I looked at the trade returns and found that even without a trade agent—although much of this trade was worked up by the former trade agent—our trade in 1923 amounted to nearly sixteen million dollars. What could we do if we had a proper trade agent to look after our business with that country? When the railway estimates are brought forward I propose to make a few remarks with reference to the Government Mercantile Marine, so for the present I will confine my attention to the Trade and Commerce department. I inquired for our trade commissioner. I was informed: We formerly had one, but we have not got one now. We are going backwards, Sir, instead of forward in seeking trade in that southern island. We should have agents in Havana, in North Cuba and in Santiago, in South Cuba, looking after our trade with that wonderful land. The other day I was examining the trade between that country and the United States, and comparing it with our Cuban trade. Ours is simply a bagatelle. I passed by Haiti, where last year even without a trade agent we did a considerable trade. Then I proceeded along the island of San Domingo, from which last year we imported $9,600,000 worth of goods and exported over $6,000,000 worth. That was without a trade agent—no one looking after the business. Everybody tells me in that country our business could be doubled and trebled if we had some one to look after our interests. We have spent $70,000,000 in providing a mercantile marine, and we are losing in actual operation nearly $8,000,000 annually. Yet there is an island where our ships do not even call. I went on to Kingston, Jamaica, and inquired for our trade commissioner. I was told that his office was down in a back street, but I could not find it. I looked up the main street and saw the flag of the United States clearly indicating where their agency was. Finally I went to a friend of mine, the manager of the Royal Bank and said to him: Can you tell me where the trade agency of our country is in Jamaica? He sent one of his staff to accompany me to the agency. I found it in an old miserable broken-down warehouse in a back street. I climbed up a flight of rickety stairs that I thought would break under my weight, and finally reached a loft, where with scarcely light in day time, and no electric light at night, I found our representative.

Mr. LEADER: Was not the flag flying?

Mr. LOGAN: Flag nothing! In this British colony, the people are even more British than we are, intensely British. They do not like the United States but are compelled to trade with them. They love Canadians and desire to trade with us. This was the office of this great country in that magnificent island with all its great trade possibilities! I noticed in a Jamaica paper recently that one American concern has recently added three new twenty-thousand-ton ships to its fleet to take care of its trade with Jamaica while we are represented there by a man in a loft, dimly lighted by day and in utter darkness at night. Our representative is a gentleman, an Old Country solicitor, and I have no doubt he is a very able man in his own profession. I was told he was a gold medalist of Edinburgh university. He came out to Canada, went to some town in the western country, to practise, and finally secured a position in Winnipeg, I think in the attorney general's office. He saw an advertisement of the Civil Service Commission calling for applications for a trade commissionership, took the examination—why, he could examine the examiners—and passed the examination, I have no doubt, with flying colours. But how in the name of Heaven can the training of the University of Edinburgh be of use to a man down in that country in the selling of Canadian goods to build up Canadian trade? He may know all the classics that are taught; he may be a mathematician of the highest degree, but if he does not know how to increase Canadian trade, if he does not know Canadian conditions, he is not of much use to us down there. I do not like to attack this man, because he is a creature of circumstances; it is not his fault. I am bound to say that he is doing the best he can, but any one who was with him for half a day would know that he does not know Canada.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Has he not two assistants?

Mr. LOGAN: No.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The Auditor General's report states that he has two assistants and a messenger.

Mr. LOGAN: He has a young man in the office, a native of Jamaica, if I mistake not. He has not two assistants and a messenger. That may have been the case under a former commissioner but I know it is not the case now, for I was in and out repeatedly. Would any sensible manufacturer who wanted to sell goods in Jamaica—and after all, that is what we are trying to do; we are trying to build up trade; it is not particularly a diplomatic position—send to that country a man who, even if he was a graduate of Edinburgh university, had never had a single day's training in trade in Canada? Why, it is a farce, and the sooner we stop the better. I made up my mind that if I ever got back to this parliament I would raise my voice in protest against this expenditure of public money which is bringing no return and cannot bring returns because the men who represent us have not the necessary qualifications. Mark you, Mr. Chairman, this gentleman up in that loft down in Kingston, Jamaica, not only represents this country in that magnificent island with its million inhabitants but represents it also in Cuba, in the Bahama islands, in San Domingo, in Haiti, and in British Honduras. He represents all the countries in Central America and I do not know how many others. Why, he could not go over his territory properly in two years if he travelled all the time. He is trying to deal with five million people, scattered. one might almost say, over half a continent, and yet we expect to get trade, and we expect the Canadian merchant marine to pay. The whole thing should be condemned; the whole service should be reorganized. I am not blaming anybody; I do not know who organized it in the first place, but I do know that it is not properly organized now.

There is a wonderful trade in that southern country. I have some figures here—I will not detain the committee by giving them—showing the possibilities of that trade. It is the hope of eastern Canada at any rate, but we shall never secure the results we desire unless we put down there bright active men who know what goods are, not merely professional men.

The hon. member (Mr. Caldwell) has referred to Cuba. I believe that in Cuba there is one of the greatest fields for Canadian trade that can be found in the southern countries, but we have no one there. In the boat I fell into conversation with an English traveller—many of them down there—and I said to him "How is business?" He said, "good; we are getting it all back. We lost it during the war but we have already got back at least 80 per cent of it." They will get it back; do not make any mistake about that. In the course of conversation he said. "What is the matter with you Canadians? Why do you not try to develop trade down there? I visit these islands and I find in each of them an American consul—really a trade agent, really a commercial traveller for the United States; I find in every commercial house American catalogues and price lists up to date, telegrams showing the fluctuations in prices, and so on. But I never see Canadian catalogues nor price lists. There seem to be no Canadian agents down here; where are they?"

Now, I say to the Minister of Trade and Commerce this is a most important matter and instead of increasing this vote by a paltry $4,000 or $5,000 the amount of it should at least be doubled and an up-to-date business man, not a doctor or a lawyer or a preacher—an up-to-date commercial traveller should be sent to Nassau, to Cuba—not only at Havana but also at Santiago; to San Domingo, that wonderful negro republic; to Haiti, to Porto Rico and to Jamaica.

So much for the western islands; let us now go from Bermuda out to the eastward. What do we find? A country in which the Royal Bank of Canada, if I mistake not, has about twenty flourishing agencies carrying on business and reporting most favourably to their head office in this country. These islands include a very large area. Four days after you leave Bermuda you get to St. Kitts; then you pass on to Antigua, Barbados, Trinidad, then away down to Demerara. But in all that country, the different parts of which can only be reached by eight days' travel from Bermuda there was only one Canadian trade agent, located in Barbados, and now that office has been closed and the minister has sent down to Trinidad an official from his department who, I believe, knows no more about the trade of the West India country than I know about a pharmacy. and that is not much. Why, if the thing is a farce down Jamaica way, in this other area to which I have referred, down the Windward and Leeward islands, it is a double comedy. We are trying to create business; we are not only sending our Canadian merchant marine down to those islands maintaining vessels that are going up and down like chips on the water, without cargo, but we are subsidizing the Royal Mail line to the extent of nearly $400,000 annually to go into that country where we have not a single man properly qualified to secure trade for Canada.

[Mr. Logan.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not attacking the present minister. I am very thankful he is in his present position. We have had doctrinaires long enough in the Trade and Commerce department; we have had worn-out politicians there long enough. The department has ceased to be an asylum for men who have served their country and their party, and it is now under the control, so far as he can control it, of a man who, as all the business men of Canada know, is a first class business man, and all I ask parliament to do is to give the minister practically the same power over the great trade of that country that he would have if he were sending out his own travellers, as he does send them out from his manufactories in the city of Renfrew. One only needs to visit these countries to see the farce of the conditions I am portraying here to-night; I am not overdrawing them in the slightest respect. I had no idea before going there of the trade possibilities, but when I saw them and talked to the people there who wanted to trade with us, when I found we were not even taking the trade that was offered to us, when I found we did not have the agents there to secure the trade, I came back determined to make parliament acquainted with the condition of affairs as they exist.

Let me speak of one other small matter, and this I think ought to be remedied by the minister. Even this trade agent in Kingston, Jamaica, has not got sufficient power. I said to him, after having travelled over the island and visited different parts: "You want to get out and go all over this island as soon as you can, and get acquainted with the exporters and importers." "Well," he said, "I have made application to the department to go over to the other side of the island." "Oh, you have made application to the department" "Yes," he said. Now, hon. gentlemen who have been down there know that it takes two weeks to get a letter from Jamaica up here, and two weeks more to get an answer back, but the trade agent in Kingston, if he heard of a big lot of business in, say, Port Antonio, about 75 miles away, could not go there unless somebody in the Trade and Commerce department gave him permission to go. He is presiding over a trade agency in a country that, as I said before, is almost as extensive as an empire, and that is all the power he has got! I can quite appreciate if you let trade agents go hither and thither, and run up a lot of travelling expenses it might become a serious matter, but I think the time has come when we should have trade agents in whom we could have sufficient confidence to believe they would not incur travelling expenses unless absolutely necessary. But I repeat that agent, if he heard of business he could pick up 75 miles away, could not go and look into it without first receiving permission from some clerk in the Trade and Commerce department here. Well, that becomes a double-headed farce.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I am a little surprised at the manner in which the hon. member has criticized the trade agents. He ended up by pointing out that they had absolutely no control over their own movements.

Mr. LOGAN: May I be permitted to say that I have not attacked any trade agent. I did not attack the trade agent in Kingston, Jamaica; I said that he was a creature of circumstances. I am attacking the way they are appointed, namely, by passing a civil service examination, and without having had any experience in business.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I may have misunderstood my hon. friend, but a little earlier in his address I understood him to say that this man was a graduate of Edinburgh university and was possibly qualified to examine the examiners of the Civil Service Commission, but that he was not a competent man for a trade agent.

Mr. LOGAN: That is not attacking him.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I do not want to be understood as criticizing in any way the expansion of our trade and commerce. I think that is a matter that is deserving of the utmost attention on the part of the government. I do, however, wish to point out that the discussion so far, particularly from hon. members behind the minister, has led up to a certain point; they have absolute confidence in the minister's ability to appoint competent agents, and I am inclined to think that every member in the House would have that same confidence in the minister if he had a free hand in the matter; but I can also imagine how free his hand would be when I hear hon. gentlemen behind him denouncing the Civil Service Commission and clamouring for the old system of political patronage. The pressure would become so great that I am afraid even the Minister of Trade and Commerce would be inclined to give way and allow certain things to be done that he did not feel inclined to do himself. We all realize what was taking place in this country a few years ago when the political patronage system was in vogue, and before these appointments came under the Civil Service Commission.

I do not think it is a crime to be thirty-two years of age, providing the agent is qualified and has lots of energy and vigour. In fact, it is men of that age that business concerns all over this country are anxious to pick up to-day. I have no doubt that the age qualification may prevent the department from getting some very useful men, but I am inclined to think that if you get the right man at thirty-two years of age he will render splendid service to this country in the years that follow. I have a very vivid recollection of some of the appointments that were made in the years gone by, of some political hacks who had no earthly means of obtaining an existence in this country being appointed to responsible positions abroad, and I believe that brought greater discredit upon the government responsible for that condition of affairs than anything else I know of. Some of these men were sent to China, some to the Old Country and other parts of the world. It was that system that was in no small measure responsible for bringing government appointments under the Civil Service Commission. I am not going to condemn or uphold the Civil Service Commission but there has to be somebody somewhere to stand between this clamour for political patronage and the rights of the people of this country, and we may just as well realize that first as last.

The hon. member for King's, P.E.I. (Mr. Hughes) criticized an appointment that had been made to Newfoundland on behalf, he said, of the Maritime provinces. Now these trade agents are not appointed on behalf of any particular province, but to represent the whole Dominion of Canada in the country to which they go, and if the party to whom he referred did come from the province of Ontario, I do not think that that is anything against him. The hon. member says that this man did not know the difference between a codfish and a herring, but he may have known a great many other things, and I have no doubt that he would learn even that in a week in Newfoundland. So, after all, there is not so very much back of the criticism.

The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) would lead us to believe that there were no trade representatives in Cuba and the West Indies, but I notice from the Auditor General's report that there are four of five down there, and that the trade agent at Kingston has two assistants and a messenger. That is up to March 31, 1923; there may have been dismissals since then. The hon. member also admitted that this country was doing a tremendous business I think he said $17,000,000 worth, with these countries, so those agents down there must be doing some good. Do not let us attack every one who is in the service, just because this government has not had the privilege of making the appointments. Even though the appointments have been made by the Civil Service Commission, the minister, as has already been pointed out, exercises a good deal of control in examining them; and he does not need to accept them unless he is assured they are competent for the position. Some regulations must be maintained, and if we had a minister who was free from the pressure of his supporters, with the business ability which my hon. friend undoubtedly has, I have no doubt that he could pick up good men for these positions; but it does not follow that that would always be the case.

Mr. GRAHAM: The government might change.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The Minister of Agriculture has been clamouring for the right to make all appointments in his department: other ministers have been doing the same thing, and hon. members will see where it would end. If the Minister of Trade and Commerce were granted the right to make his own appointments, every member of the government would want this same right. They would say, "Look what the Department of Trade and Commerce is doing; we must have that right". We would get back to the old condition of affairs and every old political hack in this country would be appealing to the government for some appointment. I think the position is untenable. As has been pointed out by the hon. member for Cumberland, if these agents are so hampered and restricted in their operation that they cannot render good service, that is a matter for the minister to look after, to see that they are given the liberty to carry out what they think is in the interests of the country. I do not believe there is anything to be gained by condemning the system; if the system is not right we must make it right. But to say that we must discard the system and go back to the old condition is a proposition the people of the country will not tolerate for one minute.

Mr. SHAW: The constant attacks which I hear from time to time on the Civil Service Commission in this House induces me to make some observations in connection with the method of appointment to these particular positions of trade commissioners. If I understand the situation correctly, and if my information is correct, the qualifications of prospective trade commissioners are agreed upon between a representative of the Trade and Commerce department, and a representative of the Civil Service Commission. Public notices are then posted and applications are made, ratings are given, or possibly examinations are held, and the candidates who have presented themselves who seem most likely to be suitable for the vacant positions, are called before an advisory council consisting of a representative of the department, a representative of the Civil Service Commission, and a representative of the soldiers' organizations, the latter merely for the purpose of seeing that the rule with regard to soldier priority is maintained, and in addition leading representatives of business life in Canada are called in. This advisory council examines these applicants, ascertains their business experience and knowledge, and then makes a recommendation to the commission as to the most suitable man. Then that particular candidate who may be selected is given training in the department for a period, I believe, of from one year to one year and a half. If I am correctly informed he is trained not only in one branch, but acquires a general knowledge of all branches and upon the completion of his training to the satisfaction of the minister he is eligible for appointment as trade commissioner. That is the situation with regard to training, and that is the opportunity for testing out these particular individuals who may be applicants for the position. Not only is that the situation, but, in addition to that, the matter of whether or not the man gets an appointment in the service—

Mr. LOGAN: Who gives the training?

Mr. SHAW: The Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. LOGAN: Does the hon. member know who really does the training in reference to trade matters?

Mr. SHAW: I am sure the minister can tell us, but I take it that in every branch of the department these men are under the constant supervision of superiors who should be familiar with the requirements of the foreign offices.

Mr. LOW: The training is given by an officer who has been appointed under the system by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. SHAW: Does the minister suggest that the officers appointed by that commission are inefficient for the task? If he does, all I have to say is that the power of dismissal rests, not in the hands of the Civil Service Commission, but in the hands of the minister. Not only is the power of appointment in the hands of the minister, but the power of dismissal is in the hands of the minister.

Mr. LOW: The power of appointment is not in the hands of the minister.

Mr. SHAW: The minister must accept the appointment. I am simply outlining this matter because I think in fairness to the merit system the facts should be made known.

Mr. HUGHES: There is no merit in that.

Mr. SHAW: It would have been easy for the hon. member for King's, P.E.I. (Mr. Hughes) to make that statement before the Civil Service committee last year. He had ample opportunity on that occasion, but he was not able, nor was any individual member of the committee able, to bring to the attention of the committee a single case in which it could even be suggested that the Civil Service Commission had neglected its duty in any particular. That is a fact and I challenge contradiction—

Mr. HUGHES: I wish to say that there was so much irrelevant matter brought before that committee that I simply refused to attend it.

Mr. SHAW: It was easy for the hon. member—

Mr. HUGHES: And it was largely due to my hon. friend from West Calgary (Mr. Shaw).

Mr. SHAW:—when he was discomfited to keep away from the committee, but that does not justify his action nevertheless in my humble judgment. There may be difficulties in connection with the working of the Civil Service Commission, I am not defending them if they are guilty of any wrongdoing, but I say that so far as the people of Canada are concerned I am convinced at least that they are substantially in accord with the merit system. They want to see that principle upheld and maintained. Not only that, but I believe that the civil servants themselves are satisfied that that is the proper principle to apply. Not only did this committee last year to which my hon. friend refers, find that that was a vital principle to maintain, but in addition to that they held that we should have some independent body to look after this matter of finding out the most capable persons to fill positions, in order to see that political and personal considerations were totally disregarded in all appointments. Under those circumstances, not knowing whether the trade agents are appointed under the old system, not knowing whether they are appointed by reason of the Civil Service Act, one cannot say as to their particular qualifications, and I am certainly sure that little has been shown to-night that would justify anybody in suggesting that the method of appointing trade commissioners is either inadequate or that it has not merit. I understand the minister to say that these qualification rules which are established provide an age limit of thirty-two. I would like the minister to investigate into the salaries paid these trade commissioners and tell the House if he thinks that, with the salaries provided, he is going to get successful business men like himself to live down in a hot climate like Cuba? I think it is entirely out of the question. I think adequate salaries should be paid, and I am satisfied that with the system which the Civil Service Commission provides proper and competent representatives can be secured if such adequate salaries are paid.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am very much in accord with the remarks of my hon. friend from West Calgary (Mr. Shaw) but the reason I rise now particularly is to ask, why is it that, in the face of these constant complaints about the system, the government does not take its courage in its hands and propose a change? Why are we treated to these whinings every year about the awful restraint under which they labour? They cannot govern the country, they cannot change this and cannot change that; they are tied hand and foot, chained down and helpless. Let them come to parliament and submit their policy. Deputations from boards of trade come to Ottawa, go before the Prime Minister and beg for economy, and the Prime Minister tells them, "I cannot economize; there is that awful Civil Service Commission. Look at the law which places it all in their hands. In this way I am tied hand and foot," thus leading them to believe the Civil Service Commission were dictating salaries and everything, that it was superseding parliament and that the government could not escape from its chains no matter how it struggled. But all the Prime Minister has to do, if he does not like it, is to come to parliament, take his courage in his hands and propose a change. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell), with all his beneficent designs for the country, is thwarted by that hostile Civil Service Commission, and if it were not for that commission he could lift agriculture into the seventh heaven. The Minister of Trade and Commerce says to-night: I cannot do anything; here is this Civil Service Act. If the government want to change the act, let them come to parliament, take the responsibility, propose the change, and do not let us hear this whine session after session, trying to load upon someone else the responsibility that now is theirs and that they and they alone can discharge.

Mr. ROBB: My right hon. friend had the courage at one time and was attempting to change the act, but he withdrew the bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But I was not whining. I came to parliament and asked for it. I submitted it to a committee and what the committee recommended, we did. We did no more. The hon. gentlemen submitted a change to a committee; the committee brought in a report which was completely antagonistic to all their claims and complaints to-night, and still they come back and try to throw on a commission and on an act of another government the responsibility for their own failure.

Mr. LOW: I am not given to whining, but I find the conditions here and I am simply explaining them to parliament. I am not whining about anything at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Propose a change.

Mr. LOW: I am not suggesting a change to-night.

Mr. CALDWELL: I am not rising to discuss the merits or demerits of the Civil Service Commission. I should, however, like to make one or two practical suggestions to the minister with regard to, not only the appointment of a trade commissioner to Cuba, but some other things I think he should take up for the benefit of the export trade of Canada when he is appointed. Possibly I would go a little further and urge that the minister should take this matter up himself, because I do not think a trade commissioner would have authority to do something, I would like to have done, that is, to arrange for some measure of reciprocity between Cuba and Canada. We have arranged reciprocity agreements with countries with which we do very little business. As I pointed out before, Cuba is to-day our only market for potatoes. Our ships go there loaded with potatoes and come back loaded with raw sugar. In view of the extremely high price of sugar at the present time, we might very well arrange for some reciprocity agreement with Cuba for a freer exchange of potatoes and sugar, because at the present time the United States has a preference over us in the duty on potatoes of about twelve cents a bag, which is quite an item when the margin is so very close as it is to the potato grower. I hope the minister will make a note of this, not forget it and not keep it under consideration too long. I hope he will not keep it under consideration as long as he has the appointment of a trade commissioner to Cuba. He should appoint to Cuba, the best man he can get, and he should also give his personal attention to the matter I have just suggested, that is a measure of reciprocity with Cuba.

Mr. HUGHES: It is very unfortunate that a matter of this kind, that is a purely business question, cannot be discussed in this committee or in this House without party politics being brought in. I regret very much that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen), not only to-night, but on former occasions, and particularly to-night when there was no reason for giving the discussion that turn, should see fit to speak in the way he has. I made no attack on the Civil Service Commission beyond this particular question. I presume that the Civil Service Commission is capable of doing good work, of filling an important position in the country; but it is not capable, judging by results, of appointing trade commissioners, and it is hardly probable that we can get practical, useful, experienced trade commissioners under the system now established. The results show that. I was a little disappointed at the remarks made by the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw), who knows a good deal about actual conditions of the Civil Service Commission. Under ordinary circumstances, for some positions, I believe the merit system, the system adopted by the Civil Service Commission and the examinations held by them, would give good results; but surely the hon. member for West Calgary will see that we cannot get results with regard to this question from the Civil Service Commission under present conditions.

Mr. SHAW: Why not?

Mr. HUGHES: Because the best trade commissioner that could be sent from Canada to the West Indian islands or to Cuba, might be a man who could not pass the Civil Service examination at all, who would have no chance of being appointed under the present system. If my hon. friend were a business man, I think he would realise that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HUGHES: I presume he is a capable lawyer, a capable man.

Mr. SHAW: Do not make any violent assumptions.

Mr. HUGHES: If he is not a capable man, a capable lawyer, I am sorry. I would presume that much. I will agree with one remark made by the hon. member for West Calgary, that is that it would be practically impossible to get men engaged in active business to accept the salaries that are paid to trade commissioners. The salaries ought to be increased in order to get good, suitable men, because if you cannot get good, capable men, there is no use in appointing any one at all. The men who might be obtained would be men above forty years of age, suitable, practical, capable men, men who are advanced somewhat in years, who have perhaps, retired from active business, who have had wide experience and who would be ready to take a trip and a position of that kind for a few years. They are, in my opinion, the very best men that could be appointed.

Mr. LADNER: How much would you have to pay such a man?

Mr. HUGHES: I do not know, but that man would take a smaller salary than a man about forty years of age who was engaged in active business, and he would be just as suitable and capable at fifty years of age. The experience he had gained in his own business would be of great value to him. Another thing that should be taken into account in appointing a trade commissioner is that he should have experience in the business of the part of Canada that he represents. For instance, if a trade commissioner were sent to the West Indian islands or Cuba where probably seven-eighths of the business is carried on with the Maritime provinces, then a Maritime province man should be selected, who is especially acquainted with the business of that part of Canada. If he is wanted to represent business in which Ontario or western Canada is chiefly interested, he should be a man from that part of Canada. It is results that we should look for. American consuls in different countries are, I think, really trade commissioners; they are generally men somewhat advanced in years, while the tendency in this country is to send boys. It is no crime to be a young man, or to have a diploma from a university or to be a graduate from a university; but keep those men in the position for which they are qualified. In a large place, one of those young men might very well be an assistant, and in time to come, he might prove very useful. But I do want to repeat the observation so well made by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan). What man of common sense in this country would imagine that a graduate from Edinburgh university who went to Winnipeg and was not a success at law, although perhaps useful in other respects, could be of any use at all in Cuba as a trade commissioner? That is the kind of result you get under the present system. I do not want the leader of the opposition or anybody else to say that we are attacking the Civil Service Commission. I am not doing so at all events, but I repeat the statement that under the present system it is a farce for the Civil Service Commission to make appointments in this particular work. It is ridiculous and is a waste of money.

Mr. CALDWELL: I asked the minister some time ago to give us the exports and imports between Canada and Cuba on the one hand and Canada and Jamaica on the other.

Mr. LOW: The exports to Cuba last year amounted to $5,816,568 and the imports $8,992,490. That was for eleven months ending February 1924. In the case of Jamaica the exports amounted to $2,793,387 and the imports $2,949,232.

Mr. CALDWELL: Of what did the imports and exports chiefly consist, between Canada and Cuba?

Mr. LOW: I have not the details. The hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw) asked me whether I thought that the trade agents were paid an adequate salary. I can only say that in this case also the salaries are fixed by the Civil Service Commission, so that I have very little say in the matter. The hon. member expressed the view that a university graduate with a year's training in the department was sufficiently equipped for the position of trade commissioner. I know that my hon. friend is recognized as one of the leaders of the bar in his province, and I would ask him the same question that I asked the leader of the opposition some time ago: does he think that a graduate from a law school, after a year's experience in a law office, would make a good judge for one of the high courts of the country? The hypothesis is analogous to the present case.

Mr. CALDWELL: In view of the fact that, as the figures which the minister has given show, our trade with Cuba is so much greater than it is with Jamaica, what excuse is there for the transference of the trade commissioner from Cuba to Jamaica? I venture to say that the trade between Canada and Cuba is capable of far more development than the trade with Jamaica, and the exports from this country to Cuba consist chiefly of potatoes while the imports from Cuba are made up almost entirely of sugar. I would impress upon the minister once more the necessity for the appointment of a trade commissioner in Cuba.

Mr. LeSUEUR: We have this evening heard a great many remarks about the inefficiency or the incompetency of our trade commissioners, and the blame has been placed upon the Civil Service Commission. I have failed however to see any specific statements or any specific proof which would connect these two things. If you are going to judge of the appointments made by the Civil Service Commission, of the efficiency of trade commissioners, or of the regulations under which the Civil Service Commission appoints these men, your first study must be of the duties which the commissioners are expected to perform. I ask the committee, what are the duties which Canadian trade commissioners in foreign countries are called upon to discharge? In the first place, they are supposed to have a fairly accurate knowledge of the products and manufactures of Canada which will be suitable to the particular country in which they are representing us. In the second place, I would assume that they would be expected to mix with the people of that country, to get acquainted with the buyers there, and then to supply them with the necessary information regarding Canadian products and manufactures. Furthermore, a very essential thing is that they should be men of address and of a certain culture who can become acquainted and stand in with those with whom they do business. These commissioners require very different qualifications from the mere ability to sell goods in Canada for a particular industry. The situation is absolutely different: it requires intelligence, a general knowledge of the products and manufactures of this country—although not a detailed knowledge of any particular line—and then energy and push, along with a certain address so that these men may be able to ingratiate themselves into the esteem of the people of the country in which they represent Canada. If, as I believe, these are the qualifications, then the remarks of the hon. member for West Calgary are very pertinent, and the investigation and examinations which he shows that the Civil Service Commission makes are indispensable to the choice of men suited for the business. I have been personally in very close touch with the commercial attachés of the United States, and with the representatives of Great Britain, in a great many of the southern countries; I know the duties which they are expected to perform, and I know that these are the qualifications which they require. When we speak of choosing a man at the age of thirty-two we must remember that this is the age that is set for entering the service. A man is not supposed to enter the service one year and go out the next; he expects, I presume, to be entering upon a career. Such a man believes that he will ascend in the service, and naturally after having trained in the department for a year and a half or two years, during which time he has got acquainted with Canadian conditions generally, he goes abroad and takes a minor post and gets experience in his new location. At thirty-two a man's mind is plastic, his nature is not set, and he adapts himself to people more or less easily. Then, again, the psychology of the people in these foreign countries in which our trade commissioners represent us is entirely different from that of our own people; and it has been the experience of a great many of our manufacturers and our big business concerns that the travellers who have been sent out from Canada and the United States do not make the success in those countries which they achieve here for the simple reason that they do not understand the people. A man of thirty-two has certainly been out of college several years, and there is no reason to doubt that he has acquired a certain amount of experience.

Mr. LOW: Does the hon. member think that a man of forty should be barred?

Mr. LeSUEUR: I was coming to that. I was saying that a man of thirty-two is plastic in mind, and he can more easily get into close touch with the people of a new country and better understand them than can an older man. Now, a successful business man at forty is not likely to be jumping into a trade commissionership. The man of forty who seeks such a position does so because he has been a failure in business or for reasons of health, but in any event he is not seeking it as a career. If thirty-two is too inelastic an age limit, why not change the regulations? But I am putting that forward as the possible reason for the limit. As regards the Civil Service Commission, I do not see why they are not completely fitted to choose men with those qualifications. If our trade commissioners are not giving effective service, I believe it is due to the instructions they receive or to the way they are handled. As the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) very properly said, they are tied down too strictly, they have not sufficient freedom. A trade commissioner who cannot move out of his office to get after business when he sees it, who cannot spend a certain amount of money in maintaining his status and getting in touch with people, cannot of course be expected to secure results. It is the system and the organization surrounding trade commissioners more than their selection and appointment that I believe is at fault, if fault there be.

Mr. LEADER: Mr. Chairman, I rise to correct an impression that possibly might grow out of the remarks made by the hon. member for Cumberland and the hon. member who has just taken his seat, to the effect that a certain trade commissioner was not allowed to travel over his constituency, as it were, without authority from the Civil Service Commission at Ottawa. That may be true in an isolated case, but as a matter of information I propose to give the committee a few items which I have taken from the Auditor General's report during the last few minutes. I find the following set out as the travelling expenses incurred by our trade commissioners overseas; $467; $336; $1,357; $4,057; $1,031; $2,085; $352; $271; $397; $2,846; $2,918; $1,636; $2,791; $2,472; $1,230; $424; $13,809. They total approximately $40,000. Evidently some of these trade commissioners have been stepping out.

Mr. GOULD: How many trade commissioners are representing Canada in the central states of the United States?

Mr. LOW: We have only one trade commissioner in the United States. He is located in New York.

Mr. GOULD: Our trade commissioners over there seemingly have lost the market for us in cereals in that we have now to overcome a forty-two cent per bushel duty on our wheat. I do not know whether that reflects upon the hon. gentleman in that he was an appointee of the former administration, but we, in common with practically all countries, erect tariff barriers and then appoint trade commissioners to regain the trade which we have obstructed by these artificial barriers. I merely interject this remark to emphasize how unnatural it is that we should incur expense to undo the very thing we have done.

Mr. EVANS: Are these trade agents appointed to furnish information to the Customs department?

Mr. LOW: No, but I am sure they would be very glad to furnish any information that the Customs department might ask for.

Mr. EVANS: Are they used specifically for that purpose?

Mr. LOW: No, they are not.

Mr. LADNER: In view of the varied conceptions of what trade commissioners are supposed to do, perhaps the minister as head of the department can tell the committee precisely what are the functions of a trade commissioner?

Mr. LOW: To my mind a trade commissioner is simply a glorified salesman.

Mr. LADNER: With all due respect and humility, I submit that the minister has an entire misconception of what a trade commissioner is. Like my hon. friend from Cumberland, I have done some travelling, and I have found that the British trade representatives in Italy and the other countries of Europe do not regard themselves as glorified salesmen. A trade commissioner cannot possibly be a salesman because he cannot be expected to have specific knowledge of every article manufactured in any country. My conception of his function is that he brings in contact the people of one country wishing to do business with the people in another country, and then their respective experts do the actual business. If the minister is of opinion that a trade commissioner is a glorified salesman it is little wonder that he and his followers are disappointed with the results obtained and wish to institute some kind of patronage system in connection with the appointment of these commissioners. I think the committee will be disappointed in the minister's conception.

Mr. LOGAN: The hon. gentleman apparently does not understand anything whatever about the functions of a trade commissioner of this country whom he is mixing up with consular agents and ambassadors. As the minister says, our trade commissioners are men sent to secure trade. When any of our trade commissioners are brought back to Canada from time to time, as Mr. Ross is just now, they visit our manufacturing centres and get in touch with our manufacturers to see what they have to sell. In the Commercial Intelligence, published by the department, will be found a list of articles which any particular country desires to buy or sell.

Mr. LADNER: Does the hon. gentleman know the functions of a British trade representative in foreign countries?

Mr. LOGAN: Yes.

Mr. LADNER: Does he assist there as a salesman?

Mr. LOGAN: No. But conditions are entirely different in Europe from what they are in the West Indies. We are endeavouring to secure trade between buyer and seller, and our trade commissioners come between the two.

Mr. LADNER: Does the hon. member suggest that the manufacturer of a special line of machinery in Canada would send to our trade commissioner in Cuba and get him to sell that machinery?

Mr. LOGAN: Why, certainly, Mr. Chairman. The hon. gentleman has been asleep! If he reads the Commercial Intelligence he will find that that is being done all the time.

Mr. LADNER: I think my hon. friend has been at sea!

Mr. LOGAN: I have been at sea, but not overseas.

Mr. LeSUEUR: Are there any trade commissioners in any country that do the actual selling of goods? Their duty as I have always understood it, is to bring the producer in touch with the buyer, but not to make the actual sale.

Mr. LOW: The hon. member is right. Our agents do not do any selling; they simply bring the buyer and the seller together.

Mr. WHITE: Are additional offices to be opened this year?

Mr. LOW: Some may be opened during the course of the year, but nothing has been definitely decided.

Mr. WHITE: I understand that the position of director has been abolished and the occupant of that office sent to the West Indies. That should make a saving instead of an extra expenditure should it not?

Mr. LOW: The office has not been abolished, but the director has been transferred to Barbados.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

Labour—Administration, Employment Offices Co-ordination Act, $50,000.

The CHAIRMAN: This is the vote that was allowed to stand before six o'clock.

Mr. SHAW: This employment service is undoubtedly doing very valuable work in regulating the distribution of labour, particularly that variety of labour which is engaged in seasonal employment. I have before me, as illustrative of what I am referring to, the figures indicating the movement of farm labourers to and from western Canada during 1923. In the spring and harvest seasons 5,519 men were transferred from British Columbia to the prairie provinces, and of that number 2,963 were subsequently returned to British Columbia. During the harvest season 34,599 harvest hands were transported from eastern Canada to western Canada and of that number 29,021 returned to eastern Canada. Then, of British harvesters 11,883 were brought to western Canada; 1,385 returned to eastern Canada, and 2,284 to Great Britain; 225 were deported, and there remained 7,939, so that the estimated increase of farm labourers remaining in western Canada following the 1923 movement totalled 16,073, according to the figures. The work of transporting these men from British Columbia and from eastern Canada to western Canada during the spring and harvest seasons was largely, as I say, done by this employment service, and in order to see that the work is properly co-ordinated it is essential that it be continued in their hands. But there is another organization, the Land Settlement branch, attached to the Immigration department, which is engaged in bringing farm employees and labourers from overseas. The work of that branch has interfered very seriously with the work of the employment offices, and as a result of there being no co-ordination between the activities of those two departments there is a considerable amount of unemployment in various parts of Canada even to-day. I have noticed resolutions passed by the town council of Sarnia, by one or two other cities in Ontario and by some cities in western Canada, complaining of this unemployment and of the failure of the federal government to assume the responsibility. I suggest simply that it should be the minister's aim to endeavour to co-ordinate the work of this Land Settlement branch and that of the employment service with a view to seeing that there shall be no overlapping and that no injustice is done either to the employers of labour or to the employees themselves, especially those engaged in seasonal employment.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think the minister was going to give me some information regarding the possibility of the establishment of unemployment insurance—what is being done in other places.

Mr. MURDOCK: During the interval since six o'clock I have tried to get that information, but the file clerks in the department had gone home; consequently my hon. friend will have to bear with me until I can go into the department in daylight. I will get the information.

Item agreed to.

Administration, Technical Education Act, $3,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How long does this statutory grant last?

Mr. MURDOCK: Until 1929.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh well, I will not inquire further. The minister will not have anything to do with renewing it.

Mr. MURDOCK: You cannot tell.

Item agreed to.

Administration of the Act respecting Annuities for Old Age, $25,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the minister say what progress his department has made toward establishing old age pensions? Could he give us an illuminating address on the subject?

Mr. MURDOCK: There is a special committee of the House appointed to consider that matter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister would be on that committee?

Mr. MURDOCK: For some reason, my name is not on the committee, but the committee is splendidly equipped to go thoroughly into the matter, and I shall be glad to give it any advice and assistance I can.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think I could guess the reason why the minister is not on the committee, especially as the committee was moved by the Prime Minister. I think the chief reason would be that he does not want to be on.

Mr. MURDOCK: I did not ask to be left out.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I do not think the request would be necessary; it probably was suggested to him that that would be the part of wisdom. How is it that the government has not made any progress with the subject? I would have thought from the prognostications of the Liberal campaign programme and from the known convictions of the minister, that we would be far on now with the subject of old age pensions. I am naturally interested in the question; I am approaching that stage myself, as is the minister, and I would not like to have a committee appointed session after session, merely as a means of shunting this question over from year to year. Has the government got nothing done? Has it nothing to lay before the committee? What is the government's idea of what an old age pension ought to be, and at what age ought it to start? How much is it going to cost?

Mr. MURDOCK: How many questions are you going to expect me to remember and answer?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister can remember all these; if he is sincere, he must have been thinking of all these for years. Before going any further, I would like to know what the minister can do in answering these I have already suggested.

Mr. MURDOCK: The government has been very busy for the past four weeks dealing with a number of very important subjects. There was the long debate over the budget, for instance, and there have been many other very important questions, possibly no more important than the question of old age pensions, but questions that appeared to have priority having regard to the financial condition the country is in. I can assure my right hon. friend that the question of old age pensions has not been overlooked, but it is realized, as my right hon. friend will realize, that with the enormous financial obligations this country has to face, it cannot take too hurriedly upon itself an old age pension scheme that would entail a very large responsibility, without full investigation as to what it might involve. That is now being undertaken, and all in reasonably good time, not too hurriedly, and with due regard to the financial position of the country, it is hoped that something will be definitely recommended to parliament. Further than that I cannot give my right hon. friend any information except that the matter has been very carefully considered and will be carefully considered.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: This is not beyond the jurisdiction of the federal authorities?

Mr. MURDOCK: It has not been so ruled by the Justice department so far as I know.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hopes are slowly sinking. Apparently the government have been giving very thoughtful and prayerful consideration to this question, but they have not got any further; they have not reached any views. Something is going to be submitted, some time, somewhere; the trouble is the country has a large debt, and consequently we must go slow in this thing. It is amazing that that idea did not enter the minister's mind in 1919. It is also amazing how it escaped his mind in 1921.

Mr. MURDOCK: How do you know that it did?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It escaped in 1921.

Mr. MURDOCK: In what way?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because the minister did not make any statement to the country to that effect.

Mr. MURDOCK: What statements did the minister make in 1921?

Mr. MEIGHEN: He made a lot he should not have made.

Mr. MURDOCK: My right hon. friend cannot point to one statement I made in 1921 on the subject of old age pensions.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I am complaining that he should have. He comes now and tells us: We have to be very careful; we have a large debt. Well, we had a debt in 1921, not quite as big, but pretty nearly, and he had a platform in his hand, promising old age pensions, and he did not tell the people then we could not do it. I say it is a wonder the idea did not enter his mind at that time. No progress has been made since, none at all; other things have priority. Perhaps he would tell the committee just what priority the Union club and the Scribe hotel would have over old age pensions, and why.

Mr. GRAHAM: Would my right hon. friend tell us his views on old age pensions? Does he think the government ought now to establish old age pensions, and if so, on what basis?

Mr. MEIGHEN: My view is, if you do not think so, you should not say so.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is safe, anyway.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is a line of safety that the minister did not follow, unfortunately.

Mr. MURDOCK: My right hon. friend cannot prove one word of that statement; he cannot prove a word of it. It is all in line with his beautiful inaccuracies, that is all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Have I the floor or has the minister?

Mr. MURDOCK: I am drawing attention to the fact that he cannot get away with that sort of misrepresentation with me. He is stating things that are absolutely and unqualifiedly false.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Nothing worse?

Mr. MURDOCK: No, just that, and I realize that it is all a part of the function that he thinks he has to perform, but he cannot get away with it with me. The right hon. gentleman cannot point to one statement I made about old age pensions in 1919 or 1921. He is only trying to make a noise to convince the country that he is doing something. The statement that I have made is in accordance with the facts. The government is proceeding in an orderly and considered way, having regard to the financial load that the right hon. gentleman, his government and his predecessors left with the country, to investigate this question of old age pensions. It may not be to the liking of my right hon. friend and his "special interest" friends but the government is doing fairly well.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the minister has anything else to say I will gladly listen. I would rather listen to him than be talking myself.

Mr. MURDOCK: There is a lot more, and it is all due you.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the minister is exhausted, I will interject a few thoughts. I thought I had made clear to him that I did not say he had made any statement in 1921, but he subscribed to a platform in 1921, a platform which promised action in respect of old age pensions. This is the statement I made, and nothing more, and all the minister's hackneyed adjectives, drawn from his long experience in other spheres, will not produce much more than amusement in this House. I thought he had learned the lesson in the early days of his first session that that kind of spread-eagle oratory is some century or two out of date, and unless he has something really to say, the less noise inflicted upon the House of Commons the better. It was with some difficulty, I know, that his colleagues restrained his exuberance in the early days of his entry into this House, but they did it, and the discipline was certainly most beneficent. Why forget the lesson he was taught?

Now, answering the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham), he wants to know my views. I have never expressed to the people of Canada the belief that we could enter upon a period of old age pensions. I never intimated that we had; consequently I am not now answerable for intimations before this House. That is my position on the subject. I know the position the country is in, but I know the country was in virtually the same position two, three and four years ago. The contrast, of course, will appear to the Minister of Railways at once. But apparently the government has done nothing, except, of course, this very anxious thought they have been giving to the question. They have not got past the thought. Why the committee of the House? What is the idea? The government had ideas on the subject years ago; what has become of them? Are they dissipated? Why the committee of parliament now to furnish new ones? Why not let some come from the administration? Could the Minister of Railways and Canals give us any idea of when this something, at some time, is going to come before this House? I mean this proposal suggested by himself.

Mr. GRAHAM: I have not said that any proposal would come before the House. I hope that a report will come from the committee, a very ordinary method of dealing with all these affairs in order to get all the information requisite for parliament to form its conclusions. I do not know what proposals will be made, if any. I am in hopes that the committee will be able to report before the session is over and give us the benefit of the information they have received, as well as their deliberations in the matter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Could the minister give us his views—because we will respect his opinions, if he has any,—as to whether we should have these old age pensions?

Mr. GRAHAM: My opinion is that we should thoroughly investigate the matter before dealing with it.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Graham the House adjourned at 11.05 p.m.

Tuesday, May 20, 1924

The House met at three o'clock.

REPORT

Abstract statements of Loan and Trust Companies in Canada for the year ended December 31, 1923.—Hon. Mr. Robb.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the name of Mr. Euler be substituted for that of Mr. Mitchell on the select standing committee on Banking and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

PRISONS AND REFORMATORIES ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 120, to amend the Prisons and Reformatories Act.

He said: Under the Prisons and Reformatories Act, when a girl of Protestant faith in New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island is convicted for certain offences, the judge, instead of sending her to prison, may send her to the Maritime Home for Girls at Truro. The object of this bill is to apply the same provisions to a new institution in New Brunswick called the Interprovincial Home for Women, which was established in Moncton last year.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PRIVILEGE—HON. MR. MARCIL

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): I rise to make an explanation. I notice in the Ottawa Evening Journal of yesterday an article in the editorial column under the caption "The Liberal Revolt," which states that, though present in Ottawa, I did not vote and did not have a pair. If I was not present, it was because I understood that I was paired; for that reason I did not turn up for the vote. As to my views on the budget, they are contained in Hansard of April 15, the third day of the debate, when I gave the budget unqualified support.

PRIVILEGE—MR. FOURNIER

Mr. C. A. FOURNIER (Bellechasse): I rise to a question of personal privilege. The same thing that applies to the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) applies to me. As the article in the Ottawa Journal of yesterday is very short. I will read it:

The Liberal Revolt

The revolt in the Liberal party against the budget is much more formidable than press reports would indicate. Here is the record of the vote on Friday morning last:

Marler, of Montreal, against the budget.

McCrea, of Sherbrooke, absent (though in Ottawa) without a pair.

Euler, of Waterloo, against the budget.

Raymond, of Brantford, against the budget.

Hon. Walter Mitchell, resigned from Commons because of opposition to budget.

Sir Lomer Gouin, absent from House, without a pair.

Hon. Jacques Bureau, Minister of Customs, absent from House (though in Ottawa) without a pair.

Hon. Charles Marcil, Bonaventure, absent from House (though in Ottawa) without a pair.

Mr. Fournier, of Bellechasse, absent from House (though in Ottawa) without a pair.

Thursday morning I had an urgent call to go out of town. I made arrangements to leave Friday morning at 6.55, and I kept my engagement. Had it not been for some of my hon. friends, particularly the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland), I would have had ample time to vote and my vote would have been recorded as in favour of the budget.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

BILLS PROPOSED TO AUTHORISE CONSTRUCTION OF BRANCH LINES

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the House go into committee to consider Bill No. 26, respecting the construction of a Canadian National railway line between Kingsclear and the St. Croix river, in the province of New Brunswick.

Motion agreed to, and the House went into committee Mr. Gordon in the chair.

KINGSCLEAR-ST. CROIX

On section 1—Power to construct and complete line described in schedule.

Mr. HANSON: Will the minister be good enough to say if the preliminary survey of this line has been completed? He will recall that when the resolution in connection with this bill was first introduced, he stated that the preliminary survey had not been completed, and that was correct at the time. I presume that by this time it has been completed. I merely wanted to know.

Mr. GRAHAM: No surveys have been made except a reconnaissance of two alternative distances, rather than routes, one over the 41 miles, contingent upon our being able to secure the running rights, and the other over the shorter course to connect with the Canadian Pacific Railway. Before we go further I might call the attention of the committee to the fact that, as in the case of the other bills, an amendment has been made in section 6 at the instance of the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton).

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Mileage and cost are estimates only but not to be exceeded by more than 15 per cent.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think it is understood that we shall include in this and the other sections where necessary the amendments that have been made in the bills which have already passed.

The CHAIRMAN: The amendments are all included in the reprinted bill.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Issue of securities limited if running rights obtained.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): In regard to running rights, have any negotiations in that direction taken place?

Mr. GRAHAM: It is not practicable to carry on negotiations for running rights until the company has been given the right to build. When that is done application can be made to the Board of Railway Commissioners for the purpose of obviating duplication.

[Mr. Graham.]

Mr. MACLEAN (York): The government may exercise that right?

Mr. GRAHAM: The Canadian National Railways will exercise the right of appealing to the Board of Railway Commissioners. Personally I have no doubt that some arrangement will be arrived at.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—Statement to parliament annually.

Mr. GRAHAM: I want to be absolutely fair about this. In a similar section in the other bills I think the committee passed an amendment the other night. The ex-Minister of Finance moved then to add after the word "during" in the first line the words "the first ten days of", together with another slight amendment.

The CHAIRMAN: The present section, with the amendments as passed in the other bills, reads:

The minister shall present to parliament during the first ten days of each session held prior to the date mentioned in section 1 of this act a statement showing in detail the nature and extent of the work done, etc.

Mr. LOGAN: I suggest that we use the word "within" rather than during. The latter word almost implies that this presentation is to be made every day. Personally I think the word "within" would be better.

The CHAIRMAN: All the other bills have been amended in this way, and it would seem desirable to have the present bill in conformity with them.

Mr. HANSON: Before this bill is passed, Mr. Chairman, I desire to read to the committee, so that it may appear in Hansard, a resolution passed by the Fredericton Board of Trade at a meeting held on May 14, 1924, in favour of this branch line. The resolution is rather long and enumerates a good many reasons in its support, and in view of its importance I feel I am in duty bound to read it. It reads:

Whereas, the Canadian Government Railway system is the important railway system serving the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island, with a total mileage of about 2,769 miles,

And whereas, the whole of the province of Prince Edward Island, the greater part of Nova Scotia, and about half of the province of New Brunswick are entirely dependent upon the Canadian National Railway system, both for the transportation of all goods imported, and all merchandises exported, as well as for passenger traffic,

And whereas a very large proportion of the exports of the Maritime provinces go to the New England, and other eastern states.

And whereas, a very large passenger traffic originates on the Canadian National Railway bound for the eastern states,

And whereas, the Canadian National Railway system in the Maritime provinces has no direct connection with any American railroad, thus making it necessary for the government system to hand over its freight and passenger traffic for points in the eastern states, to a competitive railway,

And Whereas, this system either increases the freight to be paid on all exports, etc., thereby reducing the returns of the producers, or else reduces the earnings of the Canadian National Railways,

And whereas, there is now before the House of Commons, Ottawa, a bill providing for the building of a connecting link of railway between the Canadian National Railway system in the Maritime provinces and the United States system of railways, from a point at or near Kingsclear, York County, N.B., on the St. John and Quebec Railway, to or near the town of Vanceboro in the State of Maine,

And whereas, this proposed construction is advocated by the directors of the Canadian National Railways as being of great importance in the development of traffic to and from the Maritime provinces and the United States, over the said Canadian National Railways, from a revenue standpoint,

And whereas, a similar policy was advocated by Mr. Gutelius, formerly general manager of the Canadian Government Railways:

Therefore be it resolved, by the Fredericton Board of Trade assembled this 14th day of May, 1924, that it is in the interest of the patrons of the Canadian National Railways in the Maritime provinces, and in an economic way in the interest of all Canadian taxpayers, that a branch line of the Canadian National Railways be constructed from some suitable point on the Saint John River, to connect with the Maine Central Railway at a point at or near Vanceboro, Maine,

And further resolved, that copies of this resolution be forwarded to Mr. R. B. Hanson, Federal member of York-Sunbury; the Senators from New Brunswick, and the Minister of Railways, the Hon. George P. Graham.

W. J. OSBORNE,
President Fredericton Board of Trade.

Fredericton, N.B., May 17th, 1924.

Section agreed to.

On the Title:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I desire to point out somewhat more in detail what I have already said in connection with this railway. Briefly, the railway is not one which in my opinion can be justified as a matter of business; and I am referring to the subject now only in that respect. In the first place, I would point out that we already have a good many different connections on the Intercolonial with New England points. The next thing I point out is that since this matter first came up we know what the actual freight movements are. On May 5, after this bill had been considered in committee, the following information was given by the minister and will be found at page 1722 of Hansard. He was asked as to the volume of revenue freight traffic transferred to the Canadian Pacific for furtherance to United States points. His answer was:

The tonnage of such traffic handed to Canadian Pacific Railway during 1923 was 187,909 tons and tonnage received during same period from Canadian Pacific Railway was 8,419 tons making a total of 196,328 tons.

Then on the question of receipts he answered:

(a) Canadian National earnings on above traffic were $321,606.65. (b) The St. John & Quebec Railway earnings were $53,255.69 of which the Canadian National retain 60 per cent.

Then with regard to the amount of money which the National system would have earned had this connection been built the answer is:

The Canadian National would have received one hundred per cent of the tonnage shown in reply to Question 1 and additional revenue amounting to $246,917,33.

It will be observed in the first instance, Mr. Chairman, that, based upon actual business—because here we get a photograph of what the situation is—there will be a gross added revenue to the Canadian National of $246,000 odd. I would point out to the committee that another question was answered very shortly afterwards, and it will be found at page 1862 of Hansard. The question here deals with the operating ratios, which give us some slight index as to the amount of money the system would be able to hold out of the $246,000 odd to which I have referred, and it is shown that on the Atlantic region the operating ratio is 123.23; that is, for every $100 worth of revenue received on that part of the system the sum of $123 odd is required to earn it. This added traffic cannot change that ratio very much one way or the other, for those results would be smeared over the whole. Supposing we take this ratio at 120 instead of 123, the result is we would be out of pocket 20 per cent, and, further, we would be out of pocket the whole amount of the carrying charges of the investment. The matter is carried further by the information which my hon. friend gave me yesterday in connection with the operating ratios of this particular line. Hon. gentlemen will remember that we are proposing to build a branch line, from a line owned by the province of New Brunswick, 40 per cent of the receipts from which line have to be paid over to the province of New Brunswick, the Nationals retaining 60 per cent The answers and questions are to be found a page 2264 of Hansard, as follows:

Sir Henry Drayton:

1. In discharge of the contract to pay 40 per cent of the gross traffic receipts earned on the St. John and Quebec Railways, how much money did the Canadian National system pay the province in respect of the operations of the year 1923?

2. How much did the said sum so paid fall short of discharging the obligations of the province as the owner of the said railways?

3. What sum did the 60 per cent retained by the Canadian National Railways amount to in the year 1923?

4. By what amount did the said 60 per cent of receipts fail to meet the operating expenses on the St. John and Quebec Railways in the year 1923?

5. What is the resultant operating ratio of the year's operations based upon the retention of but 60 per cent of the receipts?

Hon. Mr. Graham:

1. $109,199.75.
2. No information on this question.
3. $163,799.64.
4. $340,455.81.
5. 307.80 per cent.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this whole proposition is absolutely against the interest of the Canadian National Railways. It cannot be defended from a traffic standpoint. These are not my figures; they are the figures of the system. They ought to be an answer to any reasonable man on the question as to the necessity of building this branch. I really think that if my hon. friend is at all well advised he will withdraw the bill. I am quite confident that if parliament is foolish enough to enact this legislation the line will never be built.

Mr. CALDWELL: Mr. Chairman, while the information given by the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) is correct, I think it should be supplemented by some further information. In the first place, the St. John and Quebec railway, when projected, was to have been built from St. John to Grand Falls to connect with the Transcontinental at that point. Unfortunately only the middle section has been built and it has never been connected with either end. For instance, the last ten miles from Westfield to St. John has never been built and we had to get running rights over the Canadian Pacific into St. John. Three or four years ago I went before our provincial government at the head of a delegation to urge the necessity of completing the northern end of the railway from Centreville to Grand Falls. The then premier informed us that if the Dominion government would build the connecting link, which is the subject of this bill, the province would build the northern end. He said: "Unless this outlet is built we do not feel that it would be prudent for the province to build the northern section and continue to gather freight for the Canadian Pacific." A railway from Centreville to Grand Falls is very badly needed. I venture this prediction, and I have made it repeatedly in this House, that if this connecting link is built, thereby enabling the province to build the northern section, it will be one of the best paying lines in Canada. We simply gather freight to turn over to the Canadian Pacific Railway at four or five different points where we might begin to make something on the haulage of it. We are at present sustaining a deficit of close to half a million dollars a year on this line, about half of which is the Dominion's and the other half that of the province. If this completion does not take place we shall continue to lose half a million dollars a year. There is no doubt that the minister will be able to get running rights over the Canadian Pacific from Harvey to Vanceboro. If that is done it will not cost over $800,000 to build the 14 miles from Kingsclear to Harvey, and according to the figures given by my hon. friend (Sir Henry Drayton) himself, our earnings would be increased in the neighbourhood of $200,000 per year. If by spending $800,000 we can increase our earnings by over $200,000, that would be a pretty good showing. If the northern end of this road were completed to Grand Falls it would be one of the best-paying roads in eastern Canada, because all the freight destined for New England states points originating on the whole government system in that country—and there are about 2,200 miles of government railways in the Maritime provinces and eastern Quebec—would be routed over the St. John Valley railway to this outlet, from one end or the other. At present, however, we are simply maintaining sidings, stations, station agents and a train service to gather freight to hand over to the Canadian Pacific at various points. I am sure that the hon. member for West York is candid in his criticism, but if he knew the situation as I know it I am confident that he would revise his remarks with regard to it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Apparently I cannot get the interest of the minister, but I will try again. I will take another point: Is it necessary to build lines unless we save mileage? Is it necessary to build lines which largely amount to duplication? Again, is it necessary to build this railway through a territory which twenty-five years hence will probably contain the same number of people that it has to-day? When this matter was discussed before, it was admitted freely that no freight would originate in that territory, that the line would merely serve the purpose of getting freight out. If there is any dispute about that I would sincerely like to hear it. Who is rash enough to say on his responsibility as a member that any new traffic will result from the building of this line in the territory that it runs through? Well, no member is rash enough to make the assertion. Here then, is a place where we get no new traffic. The hon. member (Mr. Caldwell) says it looks to him as if an income of $249,000 would be a good return on the investment. He would be right if we held the money, but the figures brought down by the minister himself—they are not mine—in connection with the operation of the St. John Valley system, show that for every $100 of revenue we pay out in the cost of performing that service $307.80. No one who knows anything about this matter—and I challenge the minister to contradict me if I am wrong—will say on his responsibility as a member of the House that with the construction of this line the operating expense ratio can be cut down to anything like the ratio prevailing on the main line and the system generally—$123 for every $100 earned. Let us know what we are doing; let us understand what our action involves. We are building a line which cannot pay. This is not a net receipt; it is a gross receipt, and the figures produced by the government show that it costs $307.80 to earn $100 on the St. John Valley line.

Let me go into the matter a little further. In the original discussion the question of traffic over the National Transcontinental as against the Intercolonial was discussed. Nova Scotia business or any other business passing through or originating at Moncton may be routed, first, Intercolonial to St. John and then transferred to the Canadian Pacific. The distance from Moncton to St. John is 90 miles, the distance from St. John to Vanceboro, 91 miles. Hon. gentlemen will observe that Vanceboro is the common point in both schemes. Then again, the traffic may be routed by the Transcontinental to McGivney and thence south over the old Canada Eastern to Fredericton for transfer at Fredericton to the Canadian Pacific. In other words, as matters stand to-day it is open to the management of the Canadian National to route their Nova Scotia traffic, Moncton traffic and that of points further than Moncton, either by the Transcontinental through McGivney or by the Intercolonial through St. John. If the new line is built the mileages will be as follows: Moncton to McGivney, 95.7; McGivney to Fredericton, 34.6; Fredericton to Kingsclear, 16; Kingsclear to Vanceboro, 41; total, 187.3 miles as against 181 at present. In other words, this new gateway which is to be built through a barren territory, producing nothing, is to have a greater mileage than that now available.

Now, as to the north shore and northern New Brunswick business—and I want the minister to interrupt me if I am wrong; we ought to be able to arrive at a common point in respect to a business matter of this kind so that there will be no room either for recrimination or misunderstanding. He has his figures; he knows what his reports are and he will correct me if I am wrong. The north shore and northern New Brunswick business moves: Intercolonial to Newcastle and Canada Eastern to Fredericton. Potatoes and lumber from Carleton county—and I would like to say something about Carleton county that I know the hon. member representing it will like; It is, I think, probably the best farming county in New Brunswick, it produces a great many potatoes, and Centreville, I suppose, is just about the best point in that whole county—

Mr. HANSON: What about York county?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We come to York county afterwards. The density of farm produce would be very fairly put, I think, at Centreville, and my hon. friend from Carleton will correct me if I am wrong—

Mr. CALDWELL: You are only getting into the thick of it there.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think Centreville is just about the centre. However that may be, it certainly is a very important point. Now their traffic moves on the St. John Valley line to Woodstock, and is there transferred to the Canadian Pacific; the distance there is 25 miles. Supposing it did not move that way, it would go over the St. John Valley to Woodstock, pass through Woodstock to Kingsclear, 48 miles; you have the total of these two mileages there. But the present business from the north is transferred to the Canadian Pacific at Woodstock. Business now from King's county, which is another very good agricultural county, would run on the St. John Valley from Westfield to Kingsclear, 85 miles. That is what would have to be done if we were going to work it that way. If it went by way of Westfield to Kingsclear it would travel 10 miles on the Canadian Pacific tracks. Now the proposition means these additional mileages, these unnecessary mileages, as against these intervening points of transfer at present.

Here is another point I would put to my hon. friend, and he knows a good deal about railway operation: Is this line to conduct a passenger business? Everybody knows it must. My hon. friend I should think at once would say that if the Nationals build this line they are going to put a passenger business on it. Now I wonder if he has ever considered what that means. Everybody knows that the passenger business at this point is passenger business which has to do with the larger New England points. Boston and the like. He also knows that, so far as passenger business is concerned, St. John is the most important point in New Brunswick. Now, just see how that works out. I have already shown the increased length of haul for freight; let us now take this passenger business, at the points where the passenger business would be heaviest. Se. John would certainly have to have its passenger service; that is the point where my hon. friend's regular passenger trains on the Nationals are to be found. The passenger haul from Boston and New England points by the new route from Vanceboro, the common point again, would be 140 miles, and by the Canadian Pacific from Vanceboro, 90 miles. What chance is there for anything like a profitable return on a mileage over fifty per cent greater than the Canadian Pacific's movement? I venture to say that my hon. friend has not thought of it. and I think it might be a very good thing for him to think over even now. If the whole object in question is to control cars, instead of handing over traffic to the Canadian Pacific, running rights can easily be obtained on existing mileage, which is shorter than that proposed to be built.

Let us go back for a minute. When this matter was discussed before, the great cry was that the Canadian Pacific held up cars which the Nationals should get. Now, I ask my hon. friend, is there any dispute about that? Is it not true that when this matter was first discussed in this House, and when it was discussed in the committee, the great argument was control of the cars?

Mr. CALDWELL: One of the arguments, a minor one.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend says it was a minor argument. I do not know that he talked on it. Will the minister say it was a minor one.

Mr. GRAHAM: My experience with the shortage of cars last year in the Maritime provinces would convince me that it was an important question. My hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Caldwell) gave one or two instances of its importance, from his own knowledge.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Certainly it was a very important question. The information of the House was that the Canadian Pacific were holding up Canadian National cars, and that was the great ground for the building of this line. Well, another question was answered a few days ago, with which my hon. friend is very familiar, and that question was as to how many cars of the National Railways at the end of each month of the current year the Canadian Pacific was holding, and how many cars belonging to the Canadian Pacific the Canadian National was holding, and it was found—the information is on Hansard, and any one can turn it up—that in every single month the Nationals had far more Canadian Pacific cars on their tracks than the Canadian Pacific had Nationals on its tracks.

Mr. CALDWELL: Would you claim this would apply to the St. John and Quebec railway?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: All I am talking about is the figures I am supplied with by the management itself.

Mr. CALDWELL: That is for the whole National system.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is the whole system, of course. Railways do not keep separate accounts as to cars over this mileage here and that mileage there; it is the whole system. Of course, it transpired in the committee, and I want my hon. friend again to interrupt me if I am wrong, that there had never been application made by the Nationals to the Railway Board to compel the return of cars. The whole question of the car business was an excuse, and not a reason; the facts were against it. But let us assume that it was a reason, and not an excuse; let us assume in violence to all the facts that the Canadian Nationals are being robbed of cars. Now, under existing arrangements to-day—and again I am going to ask my hon. friend to correct me if I am wrong—running rights may be obtained over existing connections which would give the Canadian National Railways absolute control of their cars, and would save the expenditure of this large sum of money, with all these resulting railway deficits. Are we interested in keeping down deficits? Do we really want to see something like a proper show given to the National system? Well, we are not going to do it, if in the face of figures produced by the government itself, we persist in throwing away money.

I go back to the alleged reason, and I say that without the expenditure of five cents the system could control its cars. Suppose we stop handing over any freight to the Canadian Pacific at all. Running rights without any new construction can be obtained from Fredericton to Vanceboro over the Canadian Pacific Railway. The minister knows that. He knows that the Board of Railway Commissioners has the power to order running rights.

Mr. GRAHAM: Under certain conditions.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does my hon. friend suggest that under these conditions it cannot be done?

Mr. GRAHAM: They may grant running rights to save duplication. If there is no duplication threatened I doubt whether they would do so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know about that.

Mr. GRAHAM: It was discussed thoroughly in the committee by counsel for the Canadian National. My hon. friend was there.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend has not got the point.

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, my hon. friend has not. The argument advanced by Mr. Ruel as showing the necessity for a pool of some sort was, not that running rights could not be granted unless there was duplication, but that there ought to be a statutory right to operate. But here to-day without the construction of a line, we can get running rights, Fredericton to Fredericton Junction, that is twenty-two miles, and from Fredericton Junction to Harvey, a total of forty-three miles, as against Fredericton to Kingsclear seventeen miles, and Kingsclear to Harvey, a common point, nineteen miles, or a total of thirty-six miles.

An hon. MEMBER: No, sixteen miles and fourteen miles respectively, a total of thirty miles.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I got my figures off the map. If they are wrong I want to be put right but I do not think they are much out. It would be a bit longer mileage but you would save an awful lot of money in connection with it, and you would save an operating deficit which is infinitely worse than the whole of the capital expenditure. Now, where does that leave the whole matter? It simply leaves it here: That on the one hand for the purpose of getting control of our cars we are to do something that is entirely unnecessary, for, as I have said, we can get these running rights. We are to build this considerable mileage through an absolutely barren bit of country. We are to build that in connection with a system the operating ratio of which is 307, so that we are spending, under the company's own figures, $307 for every $100 we get. If this would make such a difference in the St. John Valley system as to make the operating ratio more nearly comparable to the general operating ratio of the whole system there might be something to say for it, but that ratio would be far exceeded here and I am sure the minister knows it. The operating ratio shown for the whole of that territory is $123 plus for every $100 brought in. That is what is meant here, and I should like the minister to show whether it can be done more cheaply.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend has striven hard to get up a good brief against this railway. Two of his propositions for obviating the construction of this line involve in the first place running over the St. John railway, to which my hon. friend objects, and in the second place the Canadian Pacific. These suggestions do not materially help the Canadian National Railway to swell its income. My hon. friend says that if the Canadian National asked for running rights they would be granted. He adds, however, there would have to be some amendment to the act—the railway would have to have statutory power of operation before this was asked for.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I said that was Mr. Ruel's argument.

Mr. GRAHAM: If that be true, and it was not denied in the committee, unless some agreement is arrived at there can be no running rights unless the Canadian National had operating rights over some other line. In a railway bill of its own the Canadian Pacific Railway Company insisted, as the Canadian National Railway insisted recently, that if a certain line was built by the latter, there should be a clause inserted in the act compelling the Canadian National to make a joint arrangement with the Canadian Pacific. Now, if the Board of Railway Commissioners had the right to order a joint arrangement why the necessity of putting such a provision in the act?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Running rights and joint arrangements are different.

Mr. GRAHAM: They surely are, but they are a good deal alike. If the Canadian Pacific railway had been sure that it could get running rights it would not have asked for an amendment to be inserted in the statute.

4 p.m.

All this talk about running rights is a bit of a myth unless running rights can be agreed upon between the two roads. The St. John railway does not belong to the Canadian National line. They only operate it under an agreement and its operating ratio of course is high. The Quebec and St. John railway was constructed by the province of New Brunswick under an agreement that the old Intercolonial would operate it. The Intercolonial took 60 per cent of the receipts and the province of New Brunswick 40 per cent, the latter guaranteeing the bonds and paying the interest thereon.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not want to delay my hon. friend, but I really have only one object and that is to see that unprofitable lines are not built. Would my hon. friend say that before he gives his guarantees he will get a certificate from the Board of Railway Commissioners that it is in the public interest?

Mr. GRAHAM: I certainly will not undertake anything of the kind. That would be placing the Canadian National system under a disability that no other railway suffers from.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The Canadian Pacific is in that position to-day.

Mr. GRAHAM: Not at all. The Canadian Pacific cannot locate its line, the Board of Railway Commissioners do that, but the company is not compelled to say whether the line is going to pay or not.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will my hon. friend say that the board cannot stop any Canadian Pacific construction that involves duplication?

Mr. GRAHAM: I admitted that some time ago, but my hon. friend said the line must not be built unless we get a certificate from an outside body that it was going to pay.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In the public interest that is all I say.

Mr. GRAHAM: Parliament must depend upon the men who run the Canadian National railway and if we are going to take the advice of any person it must be their advice. I did not draw the act that excepts the Canadian National in the Board of Railway Commissioners in the matter of location, that was put through the House before my time and I am not responsible for it. It may be right and it may be wrong, that is not the question. The question is should this line be built. I was proceeding to point out to my hon. friend that although theoretically he had made out a case for running rights, yet when it came down to practice, it would be impossible to get running rights at all over the lines which he suggests could be used for that purpose.

Then my hon. friend referred to the ratio on the St. John Valley railway which I was describing when he interrupted me. The ratio is high, and the ratio is high in the whole Atlantic region,—and I want to speak of that in a moment—but let me point this out: My hon. friend himself admitted that the proposition would improve the ratio of operating expenses against revenue, but he said it would only improve it a little. Well, the Canadian National railways are made up of a conglomeration of systems, and it is by these little savings and reductions of ratio all over the entire system that the management is going to be able to bring it to a point where it will pay approximately. It will take many years, I admit that, before it will be able to pay its carrying charges; but if we are going to reject all these little savings because some person objects to them then we will never get the operating ratio down to a place where it will balance the revenue.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend said it would take a little time to meet the carrying charges. Until that time comes is he not making the worst of the operating ratio?

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend stated a moment ago that the operating ratio was $123 throughout the Atlantic region, the ratio here and even if reduced in this case to $120 that reduction would not amount to anything. But if the ratio is reduced by anything, the reduction will amount to something.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not necessarily.

Mr. GRAHAM: In arguing the point, my hon. friend does not want me to get along this far. The ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) was arguing at the time as regards ratio and nothing else. I am answering that and he admits that it will reduce the ratio of operating expense to income.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You do not necessarily gain by reducing the ratio. Your reduction of ratio may not compensate for the increase of overhead.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is possible in a large matter, but it is not possible in a small one of this kind. I was answering my hon friends opposite. I want to be fair to what is known as the Atlantic region. The operating ratio there is 123; but if the traffic on the system which the Maritime provinces feed and from which they are fed were all credited to the Atlantic region, the ratio would be much better than 123. Therefore, in order to be fair, we would have to go beyond that. It is not fair to say—my hon. friend has not said this, but some others have said it—that the traffic which goes through eastern Quebec and the Maritime provinces costs $123 to earn $100, because that is not true. The traffic that comes from Halifax, St. John and Sydney to Montreal helps to make the central region have a better showing and so does the traffic that the Atlantic region takes to those places. That, if credited to the point where it originates, say Montreal, if the Atlantic region were extended to that point, would make a much better showing for the Atlantic region than exists to-day.

Mr. HANSON: Does the minister not think that his argument is a justification for making representations to the management that they should extend the Atlantic region to Montreal?

Mr. GRAHAM: It does not make a bit of difference to the freight or anything of that kind. It makes a difference only as regards the comparisons and I have tried to clear up the injustice of the comparisons.

Mr. MacLAREN: It makes a difference to the ratio.

Mr. GRAHAM: You cannot buy anything with the ratio.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, it is the wrong way.

Mr. GRAHAM: As to the cars, the hon. member for Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell) put his finger on the weak spot in my hon. friend's argument. The Canadian National or the Canadian Pacific, might have a surplus of cars in its possession belonging to the other road in some parts of Canada and a deficit in other parts of Canada. When there is a great rush of cars to the West for the movement of the grain crop, it is almost impossible to prevent a dearth of cars in eastern Canada. The telegrams which I received a year ago from New Brunswick, the eastern part of Quebec and Nova Scotia complaining that they had no cars to move their products, were very embarrassing, because I could not find any way out of the difficulty. I asked the management and they put two or three men across the line endeavouring to get cars back. The difficulty is that in eastern Canada more is exported in pulpwood and so on across the line; you think you are going to get the cars back, and under present circumstances even if a car is sent to the boundary, it is not sent to the Canadian National, but it engages on another line, not working for us. The car argument has not been demolished. It is admitted that the ratio of operation will be improved. The men who are paid to advise in this matter are very urgent that this line should be built, and I think the committee should adopt the report of the committee on Railways and Canals and give assent to the clauses of the bill.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend says one thing that I am surprised to hear. He says that there is an unfair method of accounting on the Canadian National.

Mr. GRAHAM: I did not say that at all. I said that on account of what is called the Atlantic region, there is on that region much traffic which, if the region were extended to Montreal, would be credited to that region; but it being a smaller region, the traffic is not so credited. It depends upon where you divide the region what the result of the traffic on that region will be to a large extent. The Atlantic region, as we have it is not given full credit for everything that would be credited to it if it were enlarged.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Why should the proper thing not be done then?

Mr. GRAHAM: The question about the ratio is immaterial.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think my hon. friend is really wrong in his premises. He is going back to a very old question in connection with railway accounting and figures. Different companies and also different railway managements look at the matter in different ways. For example, the ratio in some years has been very much better in the West than in the East, or rather the central territory, and merchants and shippers in the central territory used to insist that the reason they had a bad ratio was that a great deal of western traffic came through under a very low furtherance rate, entirely out of line with the rates which they had to pay. But it was generally looked upon as being satisfactory, provided that the same rule was observed by all. In that case there was nothing wrong in what was being done. If my hon. friend has satisfied himself, for example, that there is very much more freight originating in the Atlantic division for furtherance through the central division, than there is freight originating in the central division for furtherance through the Atlantic division—if he knows that to be the case, there is a good deal in what he says. But until he knows that the Atlantic division is supporting the central division to a greater extent than the central division is supporting the Atlantic division, he cannot advance us further in connection with the question. Has my hon. friend been considering that?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps, then, he will give us the result in tonnage in each centre.

Mr. GRAHAM: I could not do that; I have not the figures at my fingers' ends.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps my hon. friend will bring them down.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am not going to get into an argument with my hon. friend regarding freight rates here and there; but speaking as a layman, I think the committee will agree with me that if the eastern region had the traffic that originates in the province of Quebec, say in Montreal, and all the credit of the traffic from eastern Atlantic ports down to Montreal no matter where the traffic originated, surely the ratio in the Atlantic region would be reduced, just as the assessor succeeded in reducing the ratio in the central region.

Mr. MacLAREN: If the Atlantic region comprised an area which we consider it should—and I think from what the minister said, he also appreciates that there would be an advantage in extending the Atlantic region—I hope he will follow this up and exercise such influence as he has in giving this Atlantic division its proper area. When this branch line was before the committee a short time ago the minister said he would obtain the information explaining how the cars would be brought back to the Canadian National in more ample numbers than at present. Will he give us that explanation now? He has said something upon the point but so far as I am concerned it has not served as an explanation. The minister might explain how the extension of 41 miles to the boundary line to connect with the Maine Central will bring back the cars to the Canadian National in a more satisfactory way than would be possible if the line passed to Harvey. I should also take this opportunity to point out, as I did before the Railway committee, that the extension of this line as proposed does not go through McAdam; it goes within two miles of McAdam. Therefore, it would be necessary to establish a new custom house, with officials, at St. Croix. This is an item of expense which, while it is not paid by the railways, has to be met by the country and it is an element in connection with the necessary expenses of the new line that must be taken into consideration.

Mr. GRAHAM: If I understand rightly, Harvey is the point at which it is proposed to join the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Harvey is the common point.

Mr. MacLAREN: I understand it is proposed to build from Kingsclear to Vanceboro.

Mr. GRAHAM: What is the distance between these two points?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Forty-one miles.

[Mr. Graham.]

Mr. GRAHAM: Let me try to explain the point to the hon. member as clearly as possible. It is intended to ask for running rights and to build the shorter rather than the longer line. If they can obtain those rights, as the Canadian National Railways think they can, application will be made to the Board of Railway Commissioners for the purpose of avoiding duplication. And the Canadian National Railways, having the right to build the 41 miles, will probably decide to construct over the shorter distance of 14 miles instead. If that is done there will be no necessity for the customs house as my hon. friend thinks. This, of course, presumes that things will work out satisfactorily, as I believe they will. My hon. friend asks what I think is a fair and proper question: By what process will the return to the Canadian National of their own cars from the American side be improved? That return will be expedited in this way. At present the Canadian National Railways hand over their freight to the Canadian Pacific, and the cars are then in the possession of the Canadian Pacific Railway until, of course, they are returned. With running rights, however, the Canadian National would run their own trains to the border to connect with the Maine Central—perhaps even running on the other side as well—and when the cars came back they would be handed over direct to the Canadian National Railways at the border and not to the Canadian Pacific to be handed over in turn to the Canadian National, as at present. In other words, the cars would not be diverted; they would come directly into the possession of the Canadian National Railways on their return.

Mr. MacLAREN: Does the minister think that a diversion would occur in that distance? Would there be a diversion between Vanceboro and Harvey?

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not get the idea. The Canadian National Railways would have their own transfer rights and all that sort of thing, and any rolling stock that came back they would receive directly.

Mr. CALDWELL: Knowing the situation as I do, perhaps I might be able to explain it clearly to the hon. member.

Mr. MacLAREN: I just want to finish this point. In the event of the 41 miles being built, which was the position taken originally when the matter was before the committee, how would the Canadian National Railways get their cars back any easier after they have connected with the Maine Central?

The Canadian Pacific Railway does not come in then.

Mr. GRAHAM: The Canadian National cars would be got back more easily inasmuch as they would never see a Canadian Pacific track; they would come from the Maine Central right on to the Canadian National.

Mr. MacLAREN: Is the Canadian Pacific Railway a more dreadful menace in this matter than is the Maine Central?

Mr. GRAHAM: I think I understand my hon. friend's point. Of course, we shall not be able to make the American lines any more expeditious in the return of our cars, but undoubtedly the cars would be returned to the Canadian National more readily and more satisfactorily if they were handed over directly to the company instead of being returned through the medium of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. MacLAREN: My point is that in the event of the building of the 41 miles there is no advantage from the standpoint of getting the cars back more quickly.

Mr. GRAHAM: The hon. member does not get the point.

Mr. MacLAREN: Does he not? I do not get the minister's point of view.

Mr. GRAHAM: That may be so, too.

Mr. MacLAREN: All I say is that the building of this 41 miles does not ensure an easier or more satisfactory return of the cars than we have to-day, because the Maine Central comes in and we have no control over the American lines within American territory. The other point I want to make is this, that this would seem an opportune moment for the minister to give us some encouragement in regard to the extension of the Atlantic division.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not think that has anything to do with the bill; it is something for the board of management to consider.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I want to say just a word or two in order to make the record complete. In this matter of cars, it seems the Canadian Pacific Railway are bad robbers; they are making trouble. My hon. friend is not worried very much over the American line, but he is willing to spend over $2,000,000 to get rid of this Canadian Pacific Railway bugaboo. We have heard about the Canadian Pacific shortage of cars as a result of the harvest movement, and my hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Caldwell) has told us about that. So as to make the record complete I will give to the committee again the government's own figures—not my own—as to how the thing works out; they will show what a bad holder-up of Canadian National cars the Canadian Pacific is and vice versa. Let us take the figures for last year; hon. gentlemen will find them at page 1641 of Hansard. Last January, when the rush was not on in connection with the western grain crop, the Canadian Pacific Railway had 2,206 of the National cars and the Canadian National had 4,355 of the Canadian Pacific Railway cars. So that the Canadian National was not doing badly in the fight for cars; it was beating the Canadian Pacific then.

In February the National cars with the Canadian Pacific numbered 1,968; on the other hand, Canadian Pacific cars with the Canadian National, 3,479. In March of National cars with the Canadian Pacific there were 2,068; and the Nationals had of Canadian Pacific cars, 4,025. April, the Canadian Pacific have of National cars 2,399, while the Nationals have of Canadian Pacific cars, 4,110. May, the Canadian Pacific have 1,414 National cars, as against 4,495 Canadian Pacific cars held by the National. June, 1,964 National cars held by the Canadian Pacific, as against 3,413 Canadian Pacific cars held by the National. July, 1,748 National cars with the Canadian Pacific, 3,067 Canadian Pacific cars with the National. August, 1,525 National cars held by the Canadian Pacific, as against 3,981 Canadian Pacific cars held by the National. September, 1,691 National cars with the Canadian Pacific, and on the other hand 2,940 Canadian Pacific cars with the National. October, 2,050 as against 3,399; November, 2,757 as against 3,898; December, 2,526 as against 3,545. And we are to spend two million dollars odd so that the Nationals can get even a better showing!

Mr. GRAHAM: It might not affect this situation one car.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In fairness my hon. friend ought not to make that statement.

Mr. GRAHAM: Surely.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does my hon. friend really think that a fair statement to make?

Mr. GRAHAM: Absolutely.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Here is the scramble for cars, and one system with percentages one hundred per cent more in many cases and occasionally worse than that, and yet my hon. friend says it is a fair thing to increase those percentages by the expenditure of two million dollars. He knows that the cars are right in those figures, and yet he says they have nothing to do with it.

Mr. GRAHAM: I beg my hon. friend's pardon. I do not know anything of the kind. All the cars are in those figures, but this statement might be absolutely true—which it is—and yet show a surplus of Canadian National cars held by the Canadian Pacific in this particular vicinity and not interfere with the figures at all because those cover the whole Dominion.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Surely if all the cars are included, these cars are in these figures?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Of necessity, if the government is bringing down truthful information, the cars at this interchange point are in these figures. Why does my hon. friend say they are not?

Mr. GRAHAM: I did not attempt to deny it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I certainly understood my hon. friend to deny it.

Mr. GRAHAM: Oh, no.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to delay the committee any further. Mileages, returns, business—every proper consideration that can be thought of—show that this line ought not to be built.

Bill reported.

Mr. GRAHAM moved the third reading of the bill.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): Mr. Speaker, I notice it has been stated that the opposition are guilty of obstructing these bills. I should like to know from the Minister of Railways and Canals himself what he thinks of the treatment accorded to him by the opposition when they have allowed him to put through in a short sitting twelve of these bills, when instead of obstructing the opposition waived their rights under the rules of the House. Does my hon. friend himself think that that is a fair criticism of our action? Let us try to remember one or two things. It is against the rules of the House to advance a bill more than one stage at a sitting unless by unanimous consent. I do not think my hon. friend would question that statement. Consent was given by the opposition to this procedure in connection with each one of the twelve bills. Is that the attitude of obstruction? This bill can only go through to-day with the consent of the opposition, Mr. Speaker, as you well know. We have done everything to expedite the passage of these bills. The last day that they were before the House, in considerably less than two and a half hours the House put through guarantees in connection with them amounting to over ten million dollars when the plus per cent is taken into account. Mr. Speaker, we are not obstructing. We believe there ought to be a business reason for the construction of every one of these lines, and we have tried to get this considered by bringing forward business facts and consideration of railway operation. Surely that is not obstruction. I have a pretty good idea that the system itself is not going on with much of this construction. Indeed, if much of it ever is gone on with I suspect that the contracts will be advertised just about election time. But, Mr. Speaker, the opposition have not obstructed but have facilitated the passage of these bills, and I know my hon. friend will agree with me in this.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, I have not found fault with my hon. friend (Sir Henry Drayton). We know that he has talked a good deal and has not always thrown much light on the subject, but he was within his rights. We are making fairly good progress. This poor bill has taken a lot of time both in committee and in the House, but it is finally emerging. I admit that the bill cannot go through more than one stage without consent, but the custom of the House is this: Unless there is something essential to intervene, when bills go through the first and the second reading they go to a committee and when they come back from the committee there is not much difficulty about their getting a third reading. The literal rule to which my hon. friend refers is not very often invoked in practice. The reason that we had so many stages in this case is found in the fact that although government bills need not go to the Railway committee, these bills went to the Railway committee and were thoroughly discussed. Ninety-nine per cent of the bills that go to a committee—private bills, for example—are not subsequently discussed in the House unless there is some particular reason for it. But I make no complaint of my hon. friend's discussion of these bills.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does the minister not think we did pretty well the other night?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes, though nearly all the bills were in respect to roads that had already been started. But they had to go through just the same, and I think we are making good progress. I do not offer any complaint as to my hon. friend's delaying the House; that is his business.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the third time and passed.

SUNNYBRAE-GUYSBOROUGH

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railway and Canals) moved that the House go into committee on Bill No. 32, respecting the construction of a Canadian National Railway line between Sunnybrae and Guysborough, in the province of Nova Scotia.

Motion agreed to, and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 1—Power to construct and complete line described in schedule.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I suppose my hon. friend had the amendments that were agreed to inserted in the bill? I would not expect to see in it, of course, the one we moved as a matter of principle, but I refer to the insertion of the words "in the first ten days of" and the reference to the detailed statement.

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes. Every amendment I think, was put in except the particular motion to which my hon. friend refers.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We have not yet got any light on the building of this line, that is, light of such a character as would convince us that at a time like the present this expenditure is justified. But after having discussed it both here and in the committee I recognize that it is idle to debate the question any further. I merely desire to say that we think the amendments already agreed to should be incorporated in the bill—and in this the minister concurs. I suggest also that it should be noted as moved, as was done before, that the amount should be included in the estimates, and that the motion be recorded as lost on division. Just put it on the scroll, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): When the resolution in connection with this bill was before the committee, my hon. friend (Sir Henry Drayton) intimated that this was purely a political road and that it was being built for political purposes. My hon. friend must now admit that there was no ground for any such assertion; indeed, I should think he would be prepared frankly to take that position, even though he might believe he had reason to object on other grounds. But apparently my hon. friend is not disposed to take that course. I say this because the hon. gentleman was present in the Railway committee when his political friend, Colonel Cantley, showed conclusively the necessity for the construction of this road and declared that there could be no possible justification for the assertion that political matters were involved in it in any way. It seems to me that my hon. friend is not taking the proper attitude toward his political friend and associate, who has a knowledge of the local conditions. The situation in regard to this road is this: It has been approved of by every government since 1910—by the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who provided for the construction of a portion of it in the estimates of 1911; by Hon. Mr. Cochrane, who is on record in Hansard in 1915 as approving of the road; by the board over which Mr. Hanna presided and of which Colonel Cantley was a member, which passed a resolution providing for the commencement of construction, the war, however, intervening. The new board presided over by Sir Henry Thornton again took up the matter and recommended to the government that in the programme of branch line construction which was necessary for the advancement of the interests of the railway and of the country this road should be included. I venture to say that that record of commendation and approval cannot be duplicated in regard to any one of the other branch line proposals before the House We are in a peculiar position in Nova Scotia. Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia have only the Canadian National Railways to afford them means of transport to and from the other provinces. The adjacent province of New Brunswick has the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National, to both of which those interested in advancing that province can resort with proposals for the construction of lines for the development of the province; and so also in Quebec, Ontario and the various western provinces. But in the province of Nova Scotia, and particularly the eastern part of Nova Scotia, we have natural conditions that are not equalled in any other part of this country, and there is no other railway company to which we can go for initiating development except the Canadian National. There is no use talking about the incorporation of smaller companies and the running of independent roads; that is not possible to-day; they could not be financed. So the Canadian National is the only railway that can deal with this situation. This country has entrusted to Sir Henry Thornton and his board the task of deciding where railway development shall take place. and unless we are going to take their judgment, and more especially in regard to matters where it is supported and justified by the records of this House and the records of the railway department, we may as well not ask for advice on transportation matters from anybody. In this particular locality through which this road is to pass, we have a varied situation in regard to natural resources that is hard to duplicate anywhere in this country. Not only have we vast timber resources of both hard and soft wood, but mineral resources also have been proven to exist; we have iron, for instance, and the gold deposits of Guysborough county, from which large quantities of gold have been taken in the last twenty-five years. These gold deposits are not high-grade ore, but low-grade, and can only be treated by machinery which cannot be transported there at the present time on account of the utter lack of railway facilities. Then, in addition, we have inexhaustible fishery resources in eastern Nova Scotia, in reference to which Colonel Cantley explained to the committee that on account of the shortening of the distance, which would enable the fish to find a market in Montreal and the central portions of this country, one could hardly make a prediction so far as the development of future traffic was concerned which would be too rosy. So, that is the situation in regard to this road and I do submit that the proposition is one that is entitled to the sympathetic consideration and support of every member of the committee. I again reiterate. I am surprised and disappointed that my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance should take the position which he has done.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is indeed a matter of great pain to me that I should at any time disappoint my hon. friend. I had really thought after hearing him in the midst of his usual diatribes that I never could disappoint him; I thought he had me outside of the corral altogether, as somebody that he had no hope in and no hope for. It is therefore pleasing to know that I have disappointed him, because that evidences the fact that some of the things I have said in the past he does not quite agree with. But I am afraid I shall have to go on giving the hon. gentleman pain.

I had hoped, Mr. Chairman, that we could get rid of this bill without further discussion. I wonder if I shall be able to answer the hon. gentleman without having the party press of the government say in the usual letter which they send out, as they did the other day, that I am obstructing; but I will take the chance of that, and direct a few remarks to the committee in answer to what has been said by the hon. gentleman. After all, there is some penalty paid by all of us when we make unnecessary remarks for Hansard for the purpose of local copy. Mr. Chairman, I am of the view that a responsibility rests upon this parliament—that may be all wrong but I am at least honest in that view—in connection with all matters of capital expenditure in connection with the railways We have not that responsibility in connection with the management. Our position always has been that the fullest, freest hand should be given the management in connection with all matters of management and operation, but that so far as new capital expenditures are concerned, parliament had to take the responsibility.

There is another thing which I also believe, and that is having regard to the deficits of the National system, the first thing we should do is to get those deficits down. Capital expenditures ought to be held within the narrowest possible limits. Now that may be a matter of treason in the minds of some gentlemen; I do not know; but that, at all events, is my view. There is a responsibility on parliament to do its best to see that capital expenditures are kept down. We all know that in connection with new lines—and I am not saying that no new lines should be built; we have already consented to an awful lot of them—it takes some time at least before such a line becomes profitable. Now Sir Henry Thornton was a witness in this case. I do not know whether my hon. friend heard it, or whether, if he heard it, he remembers it, but Sir Henry Thornton said that he thought it would be at least four years before this line could be self-sustaining; that is the view of Sir Henry Thornton himself. It is perfectly true also that while he believes there will be deficits on this line for four years to come, he thinks it ought to be built. That is a matter in connection with which every member of this House has a right to have his own opinion, whether it is wise to multiply lines that are not going to pay for four years, and multiply deficits at the same time. Every member of this House not only has the right, but the duty thrown on him to exercise his own judgment in connection with that matter, and therefore I venture to have a mind of my own. I offered, this afternoon, and I now repeat the offer, that so far as I am concerned, if the enactment which was recommended by the report of the royal commission in 1916 becomes the law—that none of these railways ought to be built unless the Board of Railway Commissioners certify that their construction is necessary in the public interest—I am quite content to leave it at that. After all, that is only doing what is being done in the United States to-day. Railway companies there cannot build under their charters unless the Interstate Commerce Commission or the other commission in charge certifies that the building of the line is a necessity in the public interest. I do not think it is a good thing to build lines that are not going to pay for some years, and notwithstanding the appeal of my hon. friend I am going to stay of that opinion. I do not know whether my hon. friend wants me to go back over the old recommendations or not, but I may say that they were not recommendations in favour of this line. Why, one of the things Colonel Cantley said was, that he was very disappointed at the grades which were going to be followed upon this line. His desire was to cut out the bad grades on the old line, and to get this construction to a point where sixty cars could be drawn by one engine. That is the scheme the late Mr. Cochrane considered, but that recommendation is not one which would justify the building of this line as now proposed.

CHINA CLAY BRANCH EXTENSION

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the House go into committee on Bill No. 64, respecting the construction of a Canadian National Railway line from the end of the China Clay branch to St. Remi d'Amherst, in the province of Quebec.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 1—Power to construct and complete line described in schedule.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: When this bill was in committee, I pointed out to the minister that there was a question of a land grant tied up with it. The land grant was one authorised by the Quebec government and it would be earned as soon as ten miles of railway of this particular line were built. The Canadian National Railways have already built eight of these ten miles, and notwithstanding the fact that that construction was by the Canadian National, the promoters of the private bill have made a claim for that land grant. They cannot get it until these two additional miles are built. For them to get this land grant would be an absolute scandal, a theft practically of public domain, because these people would not have built a single mile of the railway as it was being built at the public expense. Nevertheless, that claim was put forward and persevered in, by reason of some defect, I understand, in the legislation. When I brought the matter to the attention of the minister, he said that he would look into it very carefully and that Mr. Ruel had it up. How does the matter stand now? Do we get the land grant, or has the claim of the private company to this land been withdrawn?

Mr. GRAHAM: I think whatever claim there was has not been withdrawn, but I have the assurance of the Canadian National Railway Company that these two miles will not be constructed until the matter is settled that the company that did not earn the land grant shall not get it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How will that be secured? With what assurance will the National Railways be satisfied? There are only two things that can be done, and that is either to put something in this statute which will deal with the matter and prevent what really would be a first-class steal, as I see it, or have Quebec legislation getting rid of their present legislation. I do not see how any agreement with the Canadian National can very well discharge the Quebec legislation. Perhaps the minister will tell the House, so that it will appear as a matter of record, that if this line is built, any benefit arising out of its construction by way of land grant or otherwise from the province, will be taken by the Canadian National or the line will not be built.

[Mr. Graham.]

Mr. GRAHAM: To make the matter clear, it might be that the Quebec legislature would cancel that grant altogether. That being the case, there would be no benefit; but I can assure my hon. friends that this line will not be built until the Quebec legislature or some other authority makes it clear that the building of this line by the Canadian National will not enure to the benefit of a third party that may at the present time be technically entitled to it, but that in reality is not entitled to a cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then the position is just the same as regards this bill.

VICTORIA BEACH SUBDIVISION

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the House go into committee on Bill No. 62, respecting the construction of a Canadian National Railway line to Pine Falls in the province of Manitoba.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 1—Power to construct and complete line described in schedule.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is this an extension of what is known as the Victoria Beach line?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Hon. members are aware that we have no stenographic reporters in the Railway committee. It was there pointed out that this line would not serve any agricultural country, and as a term of getting the bill through the committee the railway management undertook that the line would not be built unless a proposed pulp mill was constructed, because the resultant traffic was the only reason for building the line. I think we should have that understanding clear.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend has rightly stated what was agreed to in committee. My understanding is that this line was originally projected on account of traffic that would be received by the construction and operation of the pulp mill referred to, but it was thought that the line could be started at another point and so serve some agricultural country. However, those representing

[Mr. Graham.]

Mr. Ruel of the Canadian National assured the committee that if the proposed pulp mill were not constructed the line would not be built—under this bill at least.

DUNBLANE-MAWER

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the House go into committee on Bill No. 49, respecting the construction of a Canadian National Railway line between Dunblane and Mawer in the province of Saskatchewan (as amended, and recommending that the title be changed to "An Act respecting the construction of a Canadian National Railway line between Dunblane and Mawer or a point west thereof, in the province of Saskatchewan").

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee on the bill, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 2—Company may issue securities and Governor in Council may authorize guarantee thereof.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON moved that section 2 be amended by adding thereto the following words:

Provided that the amount so to be guaranteed shall first be included in the estimates and voted by parliament for that purpose.

Amendment negatived on division.

On section 8—Statement to parliament annually.

Mr. GRAHAM moved that section 8 be amended by adding after the word "during" in the first line the words "the first ten days of," and after the word "showing" in the third line, the words "in detail."

Section as amended agreed to.

On the schedule:

Mr. CARMICHAEL: I understand that if the Eston-White Bear line is built as proposed there will be three dead ends of Canadian National Railway line in this district. There is at present a line running from Dunblane down to Beechy. The original intention was to connect up the two ends at Beechy and White Bear, but this past season our competitor, the Canadian Pacific Railway, has been permitted to come in midway between White Bear and Beechy, thus blocking the prospect of closing up those two dead ends. This proposed line is intended to run from Mawer up to Dunblane and leave another dead end from Mawer to Riverhurst, thus leaving three dead ends of Canadian National Railway line with no prospect of their being connected up. I am not sure that the people in the vicinity of these three branch lines are satisfied with that method of procedure. The original intention was to cross the river due north at Riverhurst and connect up with the line that runs by way of Beechy, having the through line from Alsask by way of Eston, White Bear and Riverhurst down to Moose Jaw. I do not know whether or not the action of the Canadian Pacific in building there last year has changed that plan, but if so I would like to know why such action has been permitted and what the reasons are for diverting all around as is proposed.

Mr. GRAHAM: I was not in the committee, but the bill was amended in some respects after a full discussion in the committee. My hon. friend will notice that the committee recommended that the title be changed to "An Act respecting the construction of a Canadian National Railway line between Dunblane and Mawer or a point west thereof, in the province of Saskatchewan." I imagine that is to give the engineers some latitude as to where this line shall run. Of course I am only speaking from the point of view of the amendments made by the committee and the discussion that took place there.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: The provision for starting from a point further west than Mawer does not obviate the necessity for leaving three dead ends. That is the point that is objectionable.

Mr. GRAHAM: What would my hon. friend suggest?

Mr. CARMICHAEL: I suggest that the original plan should be carried out, namely, that the line should run from Riverhurst across the river, connecting up at Beechy and connecting up the two ends between Beechy and White Bear.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am afraid I cannot undertake to do that at present. The view of the committee would seem to have been expressed in the amendments as presented.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: I was assured that when these bills came before the Railway committee, members interested would have a chance to be present, but the committee met and the bills were put through before I had any knowledge of it.

Mr. GRAHAM: That point is not well taken. The meetings of the committee are always, in newspaper parlance, advertised in the Votes and Proceedings four or five days ahead, and I did not think it was necessary to notify each member of the committee individually, because the Votes and Proceedings are in his hand every morning.

Mr. LEWIS: I was in the committee at the time, and the chief engineer informed us that some years ago it was the original intention to do as suggested by the hon. member for Kindersley. There were practically under construction two lines, one from Dunblane to Beechy and one from Eston to White Bear, but at the time these lines were under construction the Canadian Pacific Railway construction was not under way. The chief engineer said that since the Canadian Pacific has practically dropped down in between these two lines. and has a charter running right practically between White Bear and Beechy, if the Canadian Pacific line were completed the Canadian National would never attempt to connect these two points, but at a later date they might make application for running rights over the constructed Canadian Pacific line. As far as a point westward in the amendment is concerned, it was not intended that the lines should go as far as Riverhurst, but to go as far in that direction as possible and still keep the present half of one per cent grade. I still feel that the people in the vicinity of this railway would much prefer that it should run to Riverhurst. and over the river to Beechy but the engineer informed us that it could not be done under a one per cent grade, and that with such a grade it would not be able to compete with the Canadian Pacific bringing coal from the west to Moose Jaw; that is the only point he raised. I have noticed, however, that there are many bills going through parliament at the present time providing for railways that have a one per cent grade, and it is an admitted fact that from the river to Mawer there is a rise of 300 feet, and also from the river up to Dunblane. where this line intends to go. If economies can be made by wiping out the three dead ends as suggested by the hon. member for Kindersley you would get a much nearer route from Alsask to points east. I believe that this route would save not only a good many miles of construction, but also certain duplication. But if it is impossible for the Canadian National to run the line parallel to the Canadian Pacific between Beechy and White Bear, I do not wish to stop this line from going through, although I would much prefer the other route. I believe the Canadian National engineers intended to look this matter over again to see if economies can be made by taking this alternate route, and if so, I understand they intend to do so.

RADVILLE SOUTHERLY

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the House go into committee on Bill No. 54, respecting the construction of a Canadian National railway line from or near Radville, Bengough or Ritchie, in the province of Saskatchewan.

Motion agreed to, and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 1—Power to construct and complete line described in schedule.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: When this bill was in committee I objected, and I only now speak because we had not any report of what went on in the committee, and I do not want to see a very grave error made in connection with the location of this railway. I pointed out that the construction from Radville would be extravagant, and would not serve the great mass of the people who very badly require a railway service in this territory. There was an amendment made to the bill in committee, adding to the description of the location "from or near Radville" the words "Bengough or Ritchie". If the line is built from Bengough, or indeed from Ritchie, and then runs south to a proper distance from the boundary line, about two townships, and then west, it will serve a large number of people in a very excellent farming territory who most grievously require the service at the present time. But on the other hand, if the construction is made from Radville the line must travel over a most difficult country, and will serve only a comparatively small pocket of people, and fail very much in doing the best that can be done with this construction of 115 miles. If the amendment made by the committee was carried out and the line constructed for 115 miles from Bengough, it would carry the construction to a point in the seventh range, completely serving the people who really require this service very, very much. I do not understand how the mistake was made of mentioning Radville in the first place instead of Bengough. I am quite sure the people of the whole district want the line built where it will do the most good. If the minister will accept the suggestion—I am not going to move it—it should be made clear now that this line will be built either from Bengough or Ritchie. That will give a good service to the people and save a great deal of money. The hon. member for Maple Creek has a most intimate knowledge of the whole of this country, and I am quite sure can corroborate what I say.

Mr. GRAHAM: This is one of the most contentious locations, I suppose, in the whole list. I was at the committee for a few minutes, and after I had left I heard the echoes of the discussion as to where this line should go. The committee, after hearing all the discussion, came to the conclusion that they would practically leave it in the hands of the engineers of the Canadian National to decide what was the best thing to do with this line. When the location of the line comes to the minister I shall probably hear all the discussion again. If I did not feel myself qualified to reach a decision after hearing this discussion I should hand the matter over to the Board of Railway Commissioners and let them say where the road should go.

Mr. McTAGGART: I do not wish to take up time in a lengthy discussion of this bill. The matter was gone into very fully before the railway committee and I have not much to add at this time except to say this: I am familiar with the country as the hon. member (Sir Henry Drayton) has stated. The statement of the hon. gentleman in summing up the situation is substantially correct. I am not a railway man but I give it as my opinion that if the railway is built from either Ritchie or Bengough it will serve more people and absorb much more tonnage than if built from Radville. I submit that if the management be not forced to build from Radville in a southerly and westerly direction but be given the opportunity, after making a thorough survey, to build from either Radville, or Ritchie, or Bengough it would be the most satisfactory solution of this question. I understand that the survey which was made of this line from Radville south-westerly was really nothing more than a reconnaissance survey; and as a matter of fact the engineers of the National system know little of the tremendous difficulties they will encounter in that south country. As we have just reached the hour for 6 p.m. taking recess I shall not take up more time except to say while I feel convinced the line should be built from Ritchie or Bengough I am perfectly willing to leave the decision in the hands of the engineers of the National Railways, provided this decision is the result of a thorough investigation.

Mr. LEWIS: Before we proceed further with this bill, I might say that the hon. member who sits next to me saw that it was nearly six o'clock and he did not expect that this bill would be reached. He left at six o'clock, understanding that the House would rise at that time, and he wants to speak on this bill. It is hardly fair to go on in this way. I am not objecting, but I know that in the committee he asked me to send him a note if this bill was going on. I sent him a note, and when he saw that it was nearly six o'clock and there were two other bills ahead of this one, he went home.

Mr. GRAHAM: Does he want to make any changes?

Mr. LEWIS: I do not know. He wants to make some remarks about the bill.

MELFORT NORTHEASTERLY

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the House go into committee to consider Bill No. 40, respecting the construction of a Canadian National railway line to Mile 41 of the Melfort branch near Nipawin in the province of Saskatchewan (As amended, and recommending that the title be changed to "An Act respecting the construction of a Canadian National railway line either to Mile 41 near Nipawin or in a northeasterly direction to a point in Township 48, Range 13, west of the Second Meridian, in the province of Saskatchewan.")

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 1—Power to construct and complete line described in schedule.

Mr. KNOX: I should like to point out that the bill, as reprinted, has a mistake in the number of the township that was quoted—it should be 48—in the title and in the schedule.

The CHAIRMAN: That will be amended. It is an error in printing.

Section as amended agreed to.

On the schedule:

Mr. KNOX: Those who were in the committee will remember that this matter was discussed at some length, and it was pointed out that it was not wise to go to Nipawin at the present time, because the Canadian Pacific have a charter through there too and they are already building on that line. Some ten or twelve miles of the line that is specified in this bill would parallel, in fact duplicate the Canadian Pacific where they are building. I pointed out at that time that work was already going on there and that the people to the east were petitioning and sending delegates here to have this Ridgedale extension go in an easterly direction along the Carrot river. I think I convinced the committee that that was where it ought to go, but I found that I could not move in committee an amendment to change the substance of the bill; that that was a matter for the House to do. I wished to have the words "to Nipawin" deleted, but I was informed that that would have to come before the House. I understand it is the wish of the engineer to have this left in so that he may have a choice of routes, but the people who need the service cannot see the matter in that way. There is no request at all, I might say, by the people of Nipawin, to have the line continued to that point, because they are depending upon the Canadian Pacific who are already building in there. Here is a short extract from a letter which I read to the committee, from Mr. Raymond Courteau, of Zenon Park who has been writing to have the line run in an easterly direction. He says:

In further reference to the railway extension from Ridgedale, I beg to write and give a few more facts that we have learned lately. The Canadian Pacific railway has started work on its line to Nipawin from Tisdale, and gangs are employed at both ends now, men from our settlement have left to work on the line.

That was dated the 9th May. In the Saskatoon Star of May 10, there is an article which states that:

Three hundred men, two hundred teams and three machine graders are already in operation on this stretch of line.

I do not want to delay the House by reading this extract, but I would just like to point out that this article shows that the Canadian Pacific is intending to cross the river at Nipawin and to continue on and give service to people who are settled on the north side of the river. It has been announced that the Canadian National does not intend to cross the river there. This is the concluding portion of the article:

This would place the Canadian Pacific in a strategic position to head for Hudson bay the moment competition and the exigencies of traffic force it to open the northern route to Europe.

I cannot say just what the Canadian Pacific has in view, but this was brought to my attention at the time and I thought I should point it out. The object we have in view is to give the people on the Carrot river service. The people of Nipawin are not asking for this and the other people are. I have no brief for the Canadian Pacific, but I have a brief for the people on the Carrot river who require this service. If the minister will give us some assurance that the matter will be taken into consideration I shall be satisfied. There is no doubt that the opinion of the committee was as I have stated, apart from the question of our power to make any alteration in the substance of the bill.

Mr. GRAHAM: These bills are based on resolutions and we cannot even in this committee amend them in such a way as to involve any question of expenditure. We can make amendments only in so far as we are assured that they will entail no increased cost. If we should change this bill in such a way as to increase the cost we should simply be obliged to drop the whole thing. I shall bring to the attention of the board my hon. friend's representations but that is all I can promise to do unless he wishes to drop the bill.

Mr. KNOX: I have no wish to drop the bill.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think that if the minister would confer with the chairman the thing could easily be straightened out, because there is merely a mistake in printing. I am familiar with the character of the district and I think that the hon. member (Mr. Knox) is right. There were some things of which the engineers were not quite sure. The intention at first was to run pretty close to Carrot river, which is a very fertile district; but when the matter came before the committee again it was suggested by the engineers that there was too much water in that vicinity and that they would have to swing further south. The bill is all right except that we have the line swinging westerly instead of easterly.

Mr. CAHILL: The hon. member for Prince Albert wants to delete from the bill the word "Nipawin", but as I understand the matter, if that amendment is carried it will involve certain features that will destroy the bill. The engineer was not able to give an estimate of the cost of the line to township 48 and by leaving in the word "Nipawin" it makes it possible to construct to either point.

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): The contention is not well founded. We had an amendment similar to this proposed in the bill for the construction of the Kelvington line, in which case we not only altered the direction but changed the destination. Nevertheless that bill passed the House.

Mr. KNOX: I merely wish to point out that we were informed in committee that such an amendment as is now proposed might be made in the House. I had been relying on that assurance—at least I so regarded it—and if the minister will promise to bring the matter to the attention of the officials I am prepared to let it go.

Mr. GRAHAM: I shall do so to-morrow.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM: (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the House go into committee of Supply.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

Labour—Administration, Technical Education Act, $3.000.

Item agreed to.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight-thirty o'clock.

International Labour Conference, $15,000.

Mr. STEVENS: I presume the minister is going to enlighten the committee on the proceedings of the International Labour Conference.

Hon. JAMES MURDOCK (Minister of Labour): The expenditure under this head arises out of section 13 of the Peace treaty. The 1924 conference will be held in Geneva, and if the minimum number of delegates from Canada is sent the amount will be more than sufficient to meet expenses. Canada is also a member of the governing body of the International Labour Office, being one of the eight nations of chief industrial importance in the League of Nations, and the expense of sending representatives every three months to the meetings of the governing body, which are also held in Europe, usually at Geneva, is paid out of this vote.

Mr. LEADER: What was the expenditure last year?

Mr. MURDOCK: The expenditure last year was only $6,644.47, by reason of the fact that there was only one item on the agenda for discussion at the conference, that item being workmen's compensation, in which the provinces alone are interested. Therefore, only one federal government delegate was sent from Canada, and the Commissioner General at Paris acted as our other representative.

Mr. LEADER: The Auditor General's report gives the expenditure at $12,645.83.

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend will recall that the Auditor General's report deals only with expenditures up to March 31, 1923. The expenditure for the last fiscal year is not yet before us.

Mr. LEADER: I notice in that report a living allowance of $15 a day is granted to delegates, and then there is this item:

David Carnegie, London, England, services, 20 days at $40 a day.

What is the explanation of this expenditure?

Mr. MURDOCK: Where a representative of or an adviser for the Canadian Manufacturers' Association or a representative of Labour attends these conferences the living allowance is $15 a day. Where persons other than officials of the Dominion government are asked to represent the government they are paid $40 per day.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is Labour given any opportunity of nominating the man who shall represent it?

Mr. MURDOCK: Section 389 of the Peace treaty provides that the representative of the employees shall be chosen from the organization chiefly representative of the work people, and it is claimed that the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada answers this description in respect to the work people of Canada; therefore under the previous government and under this government the congress has been deemed without question to be entitled to name the representative.

[Mr. Murdock.]

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The representative is or has been named by the Trades and Labour Congress?

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: Could the minister give the committee some indication of what was done at past conferences and what it is expected will result from these conferences in the future?

Mr. MURDOCK: As I stated a few moments ago, the item on the agenda last year was workmen's compensation. So far as Canada is concerned, that is a matter in which the provinces are specially interested, the federal government having no authority to deal with it. The results from these conferences are slow at times in becoming manifest in the form of social justice for the workers of the world as contemplated by the Peace treaty. There have not been as many ratifications of conventions emanating from the International Labour Office as have been desired by the director and officers of the International Labour Conference, but very many nations have taken action to deal with some of those conventions. These have been set out in detail from time to time in the Labour Gazette. The following brief summary may be of interest to my hon. friend:

A considerable increase is noted during the past year in the number of ratifications by various countries of the draft conventions adopted by the International Labour Conference (League of Nations) at its annual meetings. The Secretary-General of the League of Nations has been advised of 93 ratifications of draft conventions by various countries. At the beginning of 1923 the total number of ratifications recorded was 62. In addition to the 93 ratifications recorded by the League of Nations, 58 other ratifications have been authorized by the competent authority in different countries but have not yet been formally communicated. In 120 other cases ratification has also been recommended to the competent authority. Two hundred and seventy-eight legislative measures in all have been adopted, introduced, or prepared with a view to the application of conventions and recommendations of the International Labour Conference. The total number of measures taken to date looking to ratification and application of conventions and recommendations is 549.

Mr. ARTHURS: Are the subjects to be brought before the Labour Conference announced in advance of its meetings?

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes, usually many months in advance.

Mr. ARTHURS: That being so, what particular reason was there for sending delegates last year when the matter on the agenda was one over which this parliament has no jurisdiction?

Mr. MURDOCK: Because Canada being a member of the League of Nations holds membership in the International Labour Conference and on the governing body of that conference as one of the eight nations of chief industrial importance. Canada cannot delegate her authority to any or to all of the provinces. Therefore if the views of the provinces are to be heard at the conference it is necessary that they should be presented through a federal representative. That briefly, I think, is the reason that it appeared necessary for the federal government to be represented last year, for even although the matter to be considered was one within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces, it was of material concern to Canada as a whole. Mr. Chairman, I find I was in error in stating that workmen's compensation was the item on last year's agenda. I find the subject then discussed was "general principles for the organization of factory inspection."

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The minister has referred to work people. Whom would he define as work people?

Mr. MURDOCK: They are understood to be organizations of labour under section 389 of the Peace treaty.

Mr. SIMPSON: What recommendations of the International Labour Conference have been adopted by Canada?

Mr. MURDOCK: No recommendations have been adopted by Canada. There is a motion now on the order paper to deal with one that Canada has a right to deal with under the British North America Act, that is, the question of the employment of children at sea under the age of fourteen. Many of the matters which are the subject of recommendations by the International Labour Conference are matters of provincial and not of federal jurisdiction, therefore this House has to wait until the provinces indicate their desires in respect to them. When those desires are communicated to us we are only too glad to give the necessary ratification for Canada and pass along the convention, thus ratified, to the conference.

Mr. CALDWELL: Yesterday I asked the minister on another estimate about the matter of harvest excursions, and he said he had some correspondence he would bring down in regard to the request for excursions from New Brunswick.

Mr. MURDOCK: I had that for my hon. friend last night, but he was not here. The hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) and the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) also asked for some information, and if the committee desires I will give that information now. The hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River inquired as to a comparison between wage rates in Canada and those in other countries. The Labour Gazette of November, 1923, contains an article, found on pages 1306 and 1307, concluding with a table which gives the figures that I think my hon. friend desires. If agreeable to the committee we could have it printed in Hansard, and I will just mention two or three of the rates showing the comparison.

Mr. MANION: I suggest that the minister take more than two or three. Take one branch of each of eight or nine lines of work.

Mr. MURDOCK: The occupations are divided into the following: Building trades, unskilled labour, engineering trades, furniture trades, printing and bookbinding trades, and then a comparison of all occupations. We will take the case of a mason. The index number, weighted, of comparative real wages, March-August, 1923, at London, is given as 100. The rate at Amsterdam will be 107; Berlin, 61; Brussels, 70; Christiania, 86; Madrid, 50; New York, 274; Ottawa, 217; Paris, 71; Prague, 63; Stockholm, 95; Vienna, 57; Warsaw, 79.

Mr. MANION: If I understood the minister correctly, he said that was the index figure of real wages?

Mr. MURDOCK: I will read a paragraph to show how this index figure is prepared:

> The figures were used, first of all, to ascertain for each occupation, the quantities of bread, meat, flour and so on, which could be purchased with the wages of 48 hours' work. It was found, for example, that the Berlin bricklayer's wage for 48 hours would purchase 390 lbs. of bread, or 123 lbs. of flour, or 10 lbs. of butter, or 227 eggs, and so on. The corresponding quantities purchasable with the wages of the London bricklayer were then taken as a basis and called 100.

Mr. MANION: The reason I mentioned the index number is because the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) followed my request with a request for the figures as to the cost of living. This combines the two; it combines wages with the cost of living, showing the real wages of the labourer or worker in the respective countries. That is exactly what I wanted.

Mr. FORKE: I do not think that is very clear. You have the index number for Prague, 63, and for New York, 274. Does that ratio bear a proper relation to the purchasing power of money in the respective countries? That is the information that the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River wanted. I claim that it does not, by a long way.

Mr. MANION: I claim that it does, according to the figures given by the Minister of Labour. I did not ask for it that way. What I asked the minister to give us—and what he has given is still better—was the wages in money. The member for Red Deer supplemented that, to check me up, I presume, by asking for the real wages, that is, their purchasing power. The minister has explained that the figure he gives is based upon the amount of food which can be purchased, rent, and so on, by 48 hours of work in each of these countries. No better judgment could be arrived at with respect to the real wages of a country, I should think, than that which is based upon the purchasing power of money, and that is exactly what we wish.

Mr. FORKE: But we have not exactly what it purchases.

Mr. MANION: The index figures are all based on the same line of work. It is not a question of money at all; it is food, rent and so on.

Mr. FORKE: I know that, but reading over those figures without having them tabulated before you, you cannot form any definite judgment of what the purchasing power of that money is. If my hon. friend can tell, I cannot.

Mr. MANION: They furnish it for us, we do not have to furnish it.

Mr. FORKE: Let us have it.

Mr. MURDOCK: This is prepared by the British Ministry of Labour.

Mr. STEVENS: If that is so it is bound to be correct.

Mr. MURDOCK: I suppose my hon. friend means that it is more correct than it would be if furnished by the Canadian Ministry of Labour.

Mr. STEVENS: The point raised by the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) is very important and it ought to be made perfectly clear. As I understand these figures, they do not represent money at all; they reduce the value of the wages and the cost of living to an index number. The figure 100 in London indicates the wage in London of a mason; the mason in Prague gets 63/100 of what the London mason gets, and the mason in Ottawa gets 217/100 of the wages of the London mason. Now, that comprehends purchasing power, cost of living and everything, so that we can clearly understand the relative value of these figures.

Mr. MURDOCK: My personal opinion is that the matter is so involved that one can get almost any argument he wants out of it.

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. MANION: I do not agree with that at all. The minister stated that these figures had been made up by the Ministry of Labour in London, and we have no reason to discredit their ability to make up such figures. It is not a very difficult thing to do; any good accountant could do it. There may be a very minute variation from exactness, but generally speaking I should say that the figures are almost absolutely correct at the date given. I agree with the suggestion of the minister that he put the whole statement upon Hansard I do not wish to bring in any of the budget debate at the present moment, but I would point out in passing how well this illustrates the difficulty of producing in this country in comparison with other countries. It was for that reason I wanted the official figures put on Hansard. I think that any fair-minded man looking at them will realize the difficulties of producing in this country, whether on the farm or in the factory, as compared with other countries.

Mr. MURDOCK: I am not at all disposed to disagree with my hon. friend, but when he is considering that point I hope he will remember that the mason's wages I quoted for New York, 274, as compared with 217 in Canada, also provides food for thought in connection with the exodus of our skilled workmen from this country. Perhaps there is the lodestone that has helped to some extent to deplete Canada of its artisans.

Mr. MANION: That, and lack of work in this country, due to the fact that we are not producing as we should be in Canada.

Mr. FORKE: If the minister can tell me that the Canadian with his wages cannot purchase as much as the New York mason with his wages, I will admit that that may be the lodestone, but it is quite possible that the Canadian can purchase as much in Canada with his 217 as the New York man can purchase with his 274. I know my hon. friend from Rainy River has not very much patience with what I am saying, but I am not entirely convinced by the argument that has been put up. An hon. member whom I do not see in his seat at present, accused me the other night of a lack of penetration; he said it was difficult to penetrate my cranium, so I would be glad if the minister would put the official figures on Hansard so that I may have time to study them. Being in communication with the Old Country I know the conditions there, and I am not convinced that there is that much difference between living in the Old Country and living in New York as the wages would indicate. There is more behind it than appears on the surface.

Mr. MURDOCK: I will take the first class in the engineering trades, for instance. The figures for a fitter are as follows:

London	100
Amsterdam	108
Berlin	57
Brussels	73
Christiania	104
Madrid	83
New York	162
Ottawa	196
Paris	58
Prague	54
Stockholm	79
Vienna	62
Warsaw	61

Mr. MANION: How is it that that higher figure in Canada than in New York does not keep our people at home?

Mr. MURDOCK: This is only one special class. I wanted to read it because I knew the hon. gentleman would be glad to hear that a fitter receives higher wages in Ottawa than in New York.

Mr. FORKE: The minister quoted 54 for Madrid or Prague. How does the man live at Prague or Madrid?

Mr. GRAHAM: He does not have any of what the hon. member for Portage la Prairie calls entertainments.

Mr. MANION: The index figure for China would probably be about 2.

Mr. MURDOCK: I will give the figures for unskilled labour:

London	100
Amsterdam	111
Berlin	71
Brussels	78
Christiania	136
Madrid	63
New York	150
Ottawa	173
Paris	64
Prague	65
Stockholm	95
Warsaw	62

My hon. friend will note that Ottawa is again higher than New York.

Mr. MANION: Would the minister put that whole statement on Hansard?

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes, with the permission of the House I will put on Hansard this article and table appearing on pages 1306 and 1307 of the Labour Gazette for November, 1923.

A Comparison of Real Wages in London and certain cities throughout the World, March-August, 1923

In the July issue of the British Ministry of Labour Gazette, there appeared an article giving the results of an inquiry into the purchasing power of wages for certain trades in terms of food in a number of the chief cities in various countries in March, 1923. In succeeding issues corresponding figures for the months April to August have been summarized.

The Minister of Labour secured figures as to the rates of wages for certain classes of labour and as to the retail prices of certain staple foods for March, 1923, from the governmental office, state or municipal, in each case, responsible for their collection, or from the published reports of such bodies. The method of computation was set forth as follows:

"The figures were used, first of all, to ascertain for each occupation, the quantities of bread, meat, flour, and so on, which could be purchased with the wages of 48 hours' work. It was found for example, that the Berlin bricklayer's wage for 48 hours would purchase 56 lbs. of bread, or 123 lbs. of flour, 16 lbs. of butter, or 227 eggs, and so on. The corresponding quantities purchasable with the wages of the London bricklayer were then taken as a basis and called 100, and a series of index numbers was computed, which showed, in respect of each article of food, taken separately, the relative purchasing power in London and in the foreign capitals under comparison, of the earnings of 48 hours in each occupation. In the case of the Berlin bricklayer referred to above, the numbers were found to be 88 for bread, 31 for flour, 26 for butter, 43 for eggs, as against 100 in each case for London."

The index number of real wages, or of the purchasing power of money wages, so calculated were then averaged, two tables being constructed and published the first being a table of simple arithmetical averages, in which no allowance was made for the relative importance of each article of food, using the proportions in working class family consumption in the United Kingdom. It is the latter table which is kept up to date month to month. No allowance was made, however, for the number of workmen in each trade in calculating the average. The significance of the figures thus obtained was interpreted as follows:

"It may be well perhaps to state with some emphasis that the index numbers shown afford no absolutely safe basis for conclusions as to differences in the general level of real wages even in the selected cities. For this purpose it would be necessary to secure wages data for a much larger number of occupations, including those in which women are largely employed. Still less can the figures be accepted as accurately reflecting differences in national real wage levels. The most that can be claimed for them is that they afford a rough indication of the differences that existed on or about 1st March, 1923, between the real-wage levels of the selected categories of typical urban male labour in the various capitals."

It is also pointed out in the article that for an accurate measurement of purchasing power of wages in the various countries, figures as to items other than food would be required, especially figures as to rent and clothing. Owing to the scarcity of houses in some cities and the restrictions imposed by law on rentals in some countries, the greatest divergence is known to exist in the rents. For instance, in Germany reports indicate that rent is a negligible quantity in working class expenditure, while is New York owing to high rentals, this item is very important in family expenditure. A comparison made from figures including rent, as well as food, would therefore, show the purchasing power of wages in Berlin somewhat higher than a comparison using food prices alone, and for New York, for instance, the reverse.

The accompanying table is the summary of the figures resulting from the investigation published in the July issue of the British Labour Gazette with the figures for all occupations for each month, April to August added. The changes in the figures from month to month are due to the changes in retail prices of foods as well as in the rates of wages.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: In view of the statement the minister has made that you can draw any deductions you wish from these figures, will he vouch for their reliability?

Mr. MURDOCK: I advised the committee that they were compiled by the British Ministry of Labour, and I presume that they are as nearly accurate as index figures can be.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: There is just one question I would like to ask. I think I understand the method of preparing index figures fairly well. Taking 100 in London, as the purchasing value of 48 hours' work, that is used as a basis of comparison with other countries. I notice the minister referred purely to foods, and I was wondering whether the purchasing power of the wages included all lines of necessaries, boots, shoes, textiles, and so on. I wondered if those figures he quoted applied in the same ratio to the full cost of living.

Mr. MURDOCK: I think the article itself, which will appear in full on Hansard, will clear up that point.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I do not care what argument can be drawn from the figures; I simply wanted the facts as to what the figures included.

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Caldwell) made some inquiries yesterday as to harvest excursions being run from the Maritime provinces, and I intimated that the Labour department had found some diffidence on the part of the governments in the Maritime provinces in respect to having harvest excursions run from those parts during the harvest season, to take farm labour out to the Canadian west. Last year we again had this matter before us, and on June 21, I wrote the following letter to the Prime Minister of New Brunswick, a copy of which was also sent to the Prime Minister of Nova Scotia, and the Prime Minister of Prince Edward Island:

Ottawa, June 21, 1923.

The Honourable PETER J. VENIOT,
Prime Minister of New Brunswick,
Fredericton, N.B.

Dear Mr. Premier,

Crop reports from western Canada indicate at the present time the probability of an even larger yield of grain than the splendid results of last year's harvest, and it will be necessary within a very few weeks to give consideration to the matter of directing harvest workers from other parts of Canada to the prairie provinces for the harvest period. The need of the prairie province farmers for outside help will be for not less than thirty thousand and may even run to a considerably larger number.

As you are aware, it has been the practice of the railways to run excursions from the Maritime provinces, Quebec, and Ontario as far west as Sudbury, at very cheap rates for the purpose of assisting in the harvesting of the western crop. During the past three years very cheap rates have also been provided from the Pacific coast in order that all the available help in Canada might be pooled for the purpose of ensuring that the crop would be fully harvested.

The policy of running these excursions from certain sections of the Maritime provinces has not always met with the unanimous approval of all the interests affected, and there have on occasions been somewhat strong protests voiced against this policy. These protests, I think, have been based mainly on the ground that the excursions resulted in taking labour from the Maritime provinces to an extent which unduly depleted the provincial labour market.

As we shall in the very near future have to discuss with the railroads the subject of making adequate arrangements for providing the Prairie Provinces with labour sufficient to handle this year's crop, I should like to be advised as to your views with respect to the subject of the railways running excursions from your province, and I shall greatly appreciate your favour if you will write or wire me promptly stating the position of your government in this matter.

I feel sure that in determining your attitude upon this matter you will not fail to take into consideration the fact that the western crop is one of the fundamental and most valuable of our national assets and that the measure of our success or failure in the harvesting and handling of same reflects itself upon the general prosperity of Canada.

For your information I may say that I am forwarding an identical letter to the premiers of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island.

Yours very truly,
JAMES MURDOCK,
Minister of Labour.

To which Premier Veniot replied under date of July 5.

My dear Minister,

I am in receipt of yours of the 21st of June re the policy of excursions from certain sections of the Maritime provinces to the West, in order to help in the saving of the harvest and I note that you would like to be advised as to my views with respect to this matter.

In reply I beg to say that I have discussed the matter with my colleagues in the Executive Council and we are of the opinion that while it is necessary that labour should be procured to help save the harvest in the West, we do not think that it is fair to have an excursion with rates fixed the way they have been in the past, when the people of our province were induced to go west at a very low rate of travel, but in order to return home, had to pay more than for the trip to the West. We feel that if the same rate going would be given for the return trip, that less of our people would be liable to remain permanently in the West, as in many cases we have discovered that some had difficulty in raising sufficient funds to return home, notwithstanding that they desired to do so. Otherwise I see no objection.

This letter is signed by the Premier of New Brunswick. On July 10, I replied to the premier indicating that we would do what we could to ensure the same rate of return, and intimating to him that outside of that objection we understood that he was not opposed to the running of excursions from New Brunswick. Last year they were run from no further east than from Moncton to the West.

Mr. CALDWELL: You had no excursions from Nova Scotia points?

Mr. MURDOCK: No.

Mr. CALDWELL: I am pleased to have this information from the minister. I am somewhat surprised however that Mr. Veniot did not take the view that these excursions would be a very great injury to our farmers in New Brunswick. I am glad, however, to have this information, and to know that the Minister of Labour is not entirely to blame for these excursions. However, I should like to impress this on him and I trust he will not forget it—that the Premier of New Brunswick did not speak for the farmers of that province. There is no question about that, because our farmers in New Brunswick resent these excursions and have done so for years. We have never been able to get any satisfaction from anybody in regard to this matter; the correspondence read to-night is the first intimation that I have ever had that anybody was ever consulted in New Brunswick. I should like to impress upon the minister just as strongly as I can the fact that it is very unfair to our farmers who hire their men by the summer for this special inducement to be held out to take the men to the West when they are so badly needed at home at that time of the year.

There was another point brought out by the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) and it was this: These men come back in winter and we are not in such a situation as they are in Ontario: We have plenty of work for them in winter; our men are not at a loss for work at any time in New Brunswick; in fact, our lumbermen are anxious to have them before we are through with the harvest. We have no idle men in New Brunswick. There is plenty of work for them all the year around, and there is no necessity for taking them away when we can provide them with work and certainly need all the men we have.

In New Brunswick we are up against another situation for which, of course, we cannot blame our own government, only in so far as it is a fact that conditions are not as good in our own country as in Maine. I live in what is known as the potato belt, which includes part of New Brunswick and part of the state of Maine which territory is separated by an imaginary boundary line. The Maine farmer is able to purchase his fertilizer anywhere from $8 to $10 a ton cheaper than we can in New Brunswick. That will be overcome by putting fertilizers on the free list this year however. But due to the fact that the Maine farmer can get 50 cents per hundred pounds more for his potatoes than we can—because we have to pay a fine of that amount in order to get into his market—he has been able to pay higher wages than the New Brunswick farmers can afford to pay. There is another drain on our help in addition to the inducement held out to our men to go west. These are serious handicaps, and the wages question is a serious problem for us because we cannot afford to pay the wages that the Maine farmer can although we are compelled to do so. I have had to pay $6 and $7 a day to young fellows to dig potatoes, but a man will go to extreme lengths to save a perishable crop before the bad weather sets in. The circumstances I have outlined show the position of the potato growers in my section of New Brunswick.

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend from Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) yesterday twice asked for certain information in regard to unemployment insurance. I did not have that information last evening but it is now at my disposal. It is a printed statement which is full of interesting details in the shape of an address given by Mr. T. W. Phillips, C.B., C.B.E., Principal Assistant Secretary, Ministry of Labour, on the subject of unemployment insurance at a conference of the League of Nations Union on March 26, 1924. With the permission of the committee I should like to have the statement appear in Hansard. It is as follows:

Address given by Mr. T. W. Phillips, C.B., C.B.E., (Principal Assistant Secretary, Ministry of Labour) on the subject of Unemployment Insurance at a Conference of the League of Nations Union on March 26th, 1924.

The subject for discussion this afternoon—Unemployment Insurance—is one which the pressure of events has brought very much before the public eye. Its fundamental principle is just the principle of mutual thrift—that something should be set aside for a rainy day and that the strong should help the weak. But when it comes to practical application all sorts of schemes are advocated. As we may very likely hear this afternoon, some support a national scheme common to all industries; others would have separate insurance for each industry, while yet others advocate local territorial schemes. Or again some would keep unemployment insurance strictly within its own sphere while others would combine with it provision against some or all of the other ills to which human flesh is heir.

I am going to confine myself to the working and principles of the National Unemployment Insurance Scheme in operation in this country. I do this the more readily because I am to be followed by Mr. J. L. Cohen and others, who are both better qualified than I am, and have a freer hand to discuss the wider aspects of the matter.

The Unemployment Insurance Scheme has, since November, 1920, covered practically all trades, except agriculture and private domestic service. It includes between 11 and 12 million workpeople. Benefit is paid after the first six days of unemployment and the weekly rates for adults are 15s. for men and 12s. for women, with an additional allowance of 5s. for a wife (or invalided husband) and 1s. for each young child. During the period of rather less than 3½ years since November, 1920, about £155,000,000 has been paid in benefit. The administrative expenses during the financial year 1923-24 have been between 8 and 9 per cent of the revenue.

There appears to be a wide-spread impression that unemployment benefit is paid out of the taxes. In point of fact, only one-fourth is contributed by the Exchequer. The remaining three-fourths is contributed by insured workpeople in employment in about equal shares.

The sum of 155 millions paid in benefit since November, 1920, together with the greater part of the cost of administration and certain other minor charges, has been raised in contributions during that period, with the exception of two items—a sum of £22,000,000 was taken over from the more limited Unemployment Insurance Scheme which existed before November, 1920, and there is at the present moment a loan advanced by the Treasury of between 10 and 11 millions, which has to be repaid and on which of course in the meantime interest is paid.

As the scheme is one of contributory insurance, one naturally expects to find the period of benefit limited in relation to the number of contributions paid by the individual making a claim. The act of 1920 contained very definite limits of this kind. There was, first, a qualifying requirement of 12 contributions before any benefit could be paid; next, there was a limit of 15 weeks—subsequently increased to 26 weeks—on the period of benefit which could be drawn in a year; finally, and most important of all, the period of benefit could not exceed one week for every six contributions paid. Temporarily, in order to give some benefit immediately to new entrants into the scheme, these rules were relaxed to the extent of allowing eight weeks of benefit as soon as four contributions had been paid; but this was to apply only for one year, up to November, 1921.

The act of 1920 was passed in August of that year; it was a time of good trade and few people had any premonition of the troubles that were so soon to come. The act came into force in November. The trade depression had then begun to reveal itself. Unemployment rapidly increased in severity until, accentuated by the great coal dispute, it reached its highest point in June, 1921. Since that date there has been, in spite of ups and downs, a gradual improvement, but the level of unemployment even now remains very high.

The effect has been to alter the entire outlook of the Unemployment Insurance Scheme. One pair of figures will suffice to illustrate the crisis with which it has been faced. On the basis of pre-war experience, it had been estimated that the average of unemployment, taking good years and bad together, would be about 4 per cent; in the 3½ years since November, 1920, the average of unemployment has in fact been 12.1%, and its highest point was 17.9% or, if account is taken of short-time workers, something like 22%.

It might have been possible for the Unemployment Insurance Scheme to content itself with merely performing its contract. It might have limited itself to paying benefits strictly in accordance with the limitative conditions I have described. Had it done so, there is little doubt but that the contributions fixed in 1920 would have been sufficient and more than sufficient to provide the benefits.

But, however interesting and valuable this might have been as a demonstration of the financial soundness of the scheme, it would have failed lamentably in achieving the object for which unemployment insurance is designed, namely, that of paying unemployment benefit to insured persons genuinely unemployed. Two-thirds of the insured persons came into insurance in November, 1920. Under a rule that benefit should be limited to one week for every six contributions, it is obvious arithmetically that even those in constant employment would take some years to build up the right to any long period of benefit—and great numbers were far from being in constant employment, while many had no work at all and therefore could not qualify for any benefit.

In this state of affairs only one course was possible. The insurance benefits had to be extended. What was done was to add to the rights to benefit which I have described, and which have come to be known as covenanted benefit, a system of uncovenanted benefit granted over and above the benefit strictly due on account of contributions. Insured persons who had exhausted their covenanted rights, or who, in some cases, had not acquired such rights at all, were granted greatly increased periods of benefit on conditions which, broadly, amounted to this that they were genuine workers, able and willing to work, but unable to obtain work. Without going into tedious details, I may say that during the period of 137 weeks, from March, 1921 when uncovenanted benefit was first instituted, to October, 1923, benefit might in extreme cases be drawn for a total of as much as 110 weeks.

The finance of the act of 1920 made no provision for this extensive grant of uncovenanted benefit, and new money had, therefore, to be found. Three things were done. An accumulated balance of over £22,000,000, handed over from the earlier insurance scheme, was spent in benefit instead of being kept as a reserve. The weekly rates of contributions from employers and employed and the Exchequer were largely increased. Finally, power was taken to meet a defict by borrowing up to £30,000,000. I am happy to say, however, that the amount borrowed has not so far exceeded at its highest point about £17,000,000, and at the present moment it is under £11,000,000.

The great pressure of unemployment led also to the introduction of the special allowances, in addition to the ordinary rate of benefit, which are now paid to unemployed persons who have a wife or young children dependent on them. Like uncovenanted benefit these allowances formed no part of the scheme of 1920. They were instituted in the autumn of 1921 as a temporary scheme for six months, with the object of doing something additional during that winter to relieve the distress among unemployed workpeople with families. When the six months came to an end, the allowances were continued and they now form in all probability a permanent part of the unemployment benefits.

In any system of unemployment benefit the chief danger of abuse comes from those—happily only a small proportion of the total number—who try to come on benefit when they might have stayed at work, or might get work, on reasonable terms. At the same time, it is clear that the insured person cannot be required to stay in any kind of job, or accept any kind of job, regardless of the circumstances, under penalty of being refused benefit. The rules of the Unemployment Insurance Scheme in this connection will serve to illustrate the general principles which have to be applied.

A claimant may be disqualified for benefit owing to the reason why he left his last employment or because there is some other suitable job open to him which he refuses to accept.

The disqualification on account of the reason for leaving employment may arise in one of three ways.

The claimant for benefit may have been discharged from his employment owing to his own fault, and if the circumstances amount to what is technically called "misconduct", he loses his benefit. The precise limits of what would or would not be held to be misconduct for this purpose cannot be shortly defined, but among the commonest classes of cases are continual bad time-keeping, breach of workshop rules, or refusal to obey orders.

Or he may have left his employment "voluntarily without just cause". This again cannot be briefly defined but the effect is broadly to disqualify for benefit anyone who throws up his employment without some adequate reason.

Or finally he may have lost his employment owing to a stoppage of work due to a trade dispute at the establishment at which he was last employed. This particular disqualification has given rise to a great deal of controversy. The rule as laid down in the Unemployment Insurance Scheme is that all the workpeople at the works at which a trade dispute occurs are disqualified for benefit, and it is quite immaterial whether or not they are themselves taking part in the dispute. On the other hand, workpeople in other works are not disqualified even though thrown out as a direct consequence of the dispute, as, for example, they were on a vast scale during the great coal dispute of 1921.

Trade unionists object strenuously to this rule because it deprives non-combatants of benefit. In other quarters there is equally strenuous objection to any change, the argument being that if non-combatants are admitted to benefit, the door would be opened to collusive arrangements under which the stoppage of a few "key" men would bring a whole works to a standstill and all except the few key men would draw benefit during the stoppage.

Let us suppose, however, that the claimant for benefit has escaped these disqualifications and that he can show a clean sheet as regards the circumstances in which he lost his employment. He cannot go on drawing benefit if there is some other suitable work which he might get. Rules have, therefore, to be laid down for deciding what work he can refuse and what he cannot refuse without danger of forfeiting his benefit.

The first of these rules can be stated quite shortly. A person drawing benefit is not bound to take a job vacant owing to a stoppage due to a trade dispute—in other words he does not forfeit his benefit if he refuses to be a "blackleg".

There are other and more complicated rules with regard to the rates of pay and conditions of employment necessary to constitute suitable employment for a claimant who is entitled to covenanted benefit. If the employment is in the claimant's own district, the standard is ordinarily that of the employment last ordinarily followed by him. If in another district, the wages and conditions have to be those agreed upon between employers and employed, or, in the absence of such agreement, those ordinarily observed by good employers in that district.

In the case of uncovenanted benefit there is a more onerous requirement; persons drawing uncovenanted benefit must be willing to accept any work, on fair terms and conditions, which they are reasonably capable of performing.

This latter requirement serves to indicate a gradation in the severity of the rules which to some extent can be traced also within the limits of covenanted benefit. I may perhaps put the matter in this way. When men or women first fall out of work, after a considerable spell of steady employment and payment of contributions, it is reasonable that for a period they should be allowed to hold out for a job in their own district with wages and conditions approximately equal to those in their last job. The length of the period must of course depend upon a good many circumstances,—the degree of specialised skill, age, family circumstances, the likelihood of a good post becoming vacant and so forth. But after a time, longer or shorter according to circumstances, it begins to be necessary to consider less attractive jobs, or, it may be, taking a job in another district, even if this means in the case of a married man, living in lodgings and keeping up a separate home for wife and children. For men and women in skilled trades, however, it is rarely, if ever, the case that so long as they remain entitled to covenanted benefit they can be required to accept a job outside their own trade.

If covenanted benefit has been exhausted it may pretty safely be assumed that the claimant has not recently been in steady employment. It is not unreasonable, therefore, to make it a rule for uncovenanted benefit that any job, on fair terms and conditions, which the claimant can perform, must be accepted. I should point out, however, that this rule, while it expresses a perfectly proper requirement and is useful in a certain number of cases, does not admit of practical application to any great extent in present circumstances. The hard fact is that owing to the almost universal unemployment nearly every post which becomes vacant could be filled at once several times over from the list of applicants with skill or experience in the same class of work, so that there is seldom need or opportunity to use the vacancy for testing the bona fides of anyone else. If the vacancy cannot be filled, it is almost certainly because some special skill or experience is required, and here again there is no opportunity to use the vacancy as a test.

The practical effect of rules and conditions depends very largely on the machinery for deciding whether they are complied with. It will be appropriate, therefore, if at this point I say a word or two about this machinery. An important distinction has to be drawn between covenanted and uncovenanted benefit.

Covenanted benefit is something which the insured person can claim as of right, if he is qualified for it; if his claim is refused and he is dissatisfied with the refusal, he can appeal to certain quasi-judicial tribunals, over whose decisions the minister has no control.

The decision in the first instance is given by the insurance officer. The claimant or, in certain cases, an Association to which he belongs can appeal against a disallowance of benefit to a Court of Referees, which sits locally and consists of an independent chairman, a representative of employers and a representative of workpeople. From the Court of Referees there is a further right of appeal to the umpire, which may be exercised by the department, by the association to which the claimant belongs, or, if the Court of Referees gives leave, by the claimant personally. The decision of the umpire is final and conclusive, and his decisions, naturally, are followed by the insurance officer and Court of Referees in other similar cases. On the basis of the umpire's decisions a large body of case-law has gradually been built up, dealing with a great variety of points in connection with claims to benefit.

Uncovenanted benefit is not a matter of entitlement Certain qualifying conditions are, it is true, laid down by the acts; but even in the case of persons who come within these conditions it rests in the discretion of the minister to grant or refuse uncovenanted benefit, and the guiding rule for him is that before he grants uncovenanted benefit he must be satisfied that it is expedient in the public interest to do so.

In practice, even in the case of uncovenanted benefit, claims are referred to the insurance officer, Court of Referees and the umpire if the point to be settled is one which is common to covenanted and uncovenanted benefit, as for example whether the claimant lost his last employment owing to misconduct or a trade dispute.

In general, however, the question whether uncovenanted benefit should be allowed or refused is dealt with by the local employment committees, which also carry out from time to time a scrutiny of claims to uncovenanted benefit or of such of those as seem to be of doubtful validity.

The local employment committees are unpaid advisory bodies formed in connection with the employment exchanges. The majority of the members of each committee are representatives of employers' and workpeople's organizations in equal numbers. In dealing with claims to uncovenanted benefit, the members of the committee are in effect acting on behalf of the general body of contributors among employers and employed whose interests they are appointed to represent. Usually, the work is done through a small rota committee of about three members, which interview the claimants personally and are thus able to form a much better opinion as to the genuineness of a claim than would be possible from mere paper records. The volume of work done by these rotas is immense—during the year, 1923, for example, they dealt with something like ¾ million cases.

Strictly speaking, the committees do not give decisions. What they do is to make recommendations to the minister. Actually, however, their recommendations are nearly always put into effect, and in the small minority of cases where their recommendations are not at once adopted, the practice is to refer the claims back to them for further consideration.

The machinery for paying out the benefit is in general the employment exchange. It will be clear from what I have said that the work of dealing with claims to benefit is by no means simple and easy. The claim itself has first to be taken, with all necessary particulars; the reason why the claimant lost his employment has to be found out from the last employer; the state of the claimant's contribution account has to be ascertained from the central records in London; if necessary, the claim has to be put before the local employment committee; evidence of continued unemployment has to be taken periodically from the claimant by means of signature of the unemployed register; every effort has to be made to offer any suitable opportunity of work which may be within the knowledge of the exchange; and each week, all the varying amounts of benefit due, sometimes running into tens of thousands and amounting to many thousands of pounds have to be calculated and paid.

The employment exchange, however, is not the only agency for paying out benefit under the state scheme. A number of associations of workpeople—principally trade unions—which pay unemployment benefit out of their own funds, make arrangements with the department to pay out the state benefit also. They are subsequently repaid by the department the amount of state benefit disbursed, together with a sum for administrative expense.

These arrangements do not in practice relieve the department of any appreciable amount of work or expense; but they are valuable because they secure close co-operation with associations which in many cases have considerable experience in the payment of unemployment benefit and usually have ready means of checking fraud or abuse. It is regretable that a number of associations have had to discontinue their arrangements, principally because the long continuance of severe unemployment makes it impossible for them for the time being to provide benefit in addition to the state benefit, out of their own funds—this being an essential requirement before an arrangement can be sanctioned.

At the present time the number of associations having arrangements is 142 with a total membership of 1,006,640; of these 120 with a total membership of 937,596 are trade unions. Approximately 7.01 per cent of the weekly benefit is paid through these associations.

Another and quite different agency for paying benefit has come into the field very recently. Under an act passed last year, local education authorities in England and Wales are authorized to administer unemployment benefit for boys and girls up to the age of 18, and indeed are bound to do so if they wish to exercise what is called choice of employment powers, that is, advising and guiding boys and girls in the choice of employment. It is not yet possible to say what proportion of local education authorities will decide to exercise these powers but it is likely that a considerable number will do so. Any authority which does exercise the powers will in effect have to set up an exchange or exchanges to deal with boys and girls up to 18, and will deal with claims to benefit from these boys and girls exactly as the employment exchange now does.

Before coming to a close I should like to refer to two of the criticisms directed against the unemployment insurance scheme.

The first is the criticism that the payment of unemployment benefit is demoralizing.

What is sometimes meant is that it is much better for men and women to be at work rather than be unemployed and draw benefit. We should all agree with that. But it is not a fair criticism of unemployment insurance which does not claim and has never claimed that it can find work for the unemployed—what it does is to provide benefit for those who are unemployed. And, in fact, it is a task of extreme difficulty to create work for any large number of those for whom there is no work in their ordinary avocation. Heroic efforts have been made by successive governments to get work put in hand to relieve unemployment and a great deal has been done. But the difficulties are enormous and the result so far has been to absorb no more than a small proportion of the unemployed.

Commonly, however, the meaning of the criticism that unemployment benefit is demoralizing is that those drawing benefit could get work if they liked. For after all it is the unemployment and not the benefit which is demoralizing, and hardly any one would seriously object to paying a reasonable sum in benefit to those who are genuinely unable to get work.

I believe, however, that a close examination of the facts will convince any unprejudiced person that there is little or no foundation for this particular criticism. I am not going to be so foolish as to say that among the millions who claim benefit are not a few malingerers who may have succeeded in slipping through the meshes. But, taking the matter broadly—and particularly if we look at the great manufacturing and seaport towns of this country—the plain fact is that there has been no work of any kind or at any price for the great majority of those who have been unemployed.

I am convinced that, in all but a negligible number of cases, the rules and machinery I have described, and above all the close scrutiny by the local employment committees, have eliminated those who are not genuinely trying to get work.

Let me illustrate the position by giving a few figures from an analysis of 10,000 claims made last November. This analysis was made in such a way that the results can pretty safely be accepted as typical of the whole number. The figures show that two-thirds of the males drawing benefit and nearly three-quarters of the females were persons who in normal times would usually be in steady employment, while if those who would in normal times be fairly well employed are added these proportions become nearly 90 per cent. At the other end of the scale are the persons classified as "verging on the unemployable." These amounted only to 3.6 per cent for males, and 2 per cent for females, and consisted for the most part of elderly workpeople who in the past had not infrequently been for many years in pretty constant employment. These figures be it noted, are proportions of the numbers drawing benefit; if the number classified as "verging on the unemployable" were taken as a proportion of the whole number of insured persons, the figure would be a fraction of one per cent.

Certain other figures of great interest can be given for the period from October, 1922, to October, 1923. During that period there were on the average about 1,000,000 persons claiming benefit each week. It is sometimes thought that this means that there are a million individuals or something like that number who remain continuously unemployed and on the books. The actual fact is very different. The individuals on the books are continually changing. Anything up to 150,000 come on each week and about the same number go off, so that there may be during one week a change-over of as many as 300,000 individuals or even more. In all, about 3¾ million different individuals made claims during the period referred to. Of these 13 per cent drew no benefit at all, usually because they were not unemployed on any one occasion for as much as six days. More than a quarter drew benefit for a fortnight or less, while one-half drew eight weeks or less. The maximum period of benefit which could be drawn was 44 weeks and the total number who drew this was about 170,000, of whom all but about 6 or 7 thousand were men.

The second line of criticism on which I would like to say a final word is more acutely conceived. I have known it argued somewhat paradoxically that the Unemployment Insurance Scheme has been too successful, that it has been a mere palliative, that it has dulled the symptoms of unemployment and so made it possible to avoid a cure.

Let me admit at once that unemployment benefit has been a palliative, but a very necessary one. It is not too much to say that the provision of benefit has saved this country from an upheaval, the consequences of which might easily have been disastrous. Even as it is great numbers have suffered and are suffering severe privation and hardship. But it is probable that the total burden of distress and suffering has been lighter than it was in past years when unemployment was less pronounced and of far shorter duration.

When it is contended therefore, that the unemployment insurance scheme has prevented a remedy for unemployment from being found, I think rather less than justice is done to a valuable specific for this terrible disease of modern industrial organization. I am not going to attempt any answer to the question whether there is a remedy—that is a question of political therapeutics on which there is room for much discussion and for more than one opinion. One thing, however, is certain. The immediate cause of our great and long-continued unemployment is the failure of foreign trade. Until that revives, there is little likelihood that the industrial population of this country, organized and distributed as it now is, can again be restored to full employment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The minister has just given us some information in regard to the operation of the farmers' harvester excusions. Now, last night I asked whether he had any influence in arranging for the rates which were given, and I believe he said, No. Yet, from the statement which he presented a few minutes ago he has been writing to the Premier of New Brunswick with a view to arranging this matter. I should assume from the minister's remarks that he has had something to do with these excursions. What I want to emphasize—and it is the very matter that the Premier of New Brunswick emphasizes—is the fact that it was the habit for a good many years to grant a very low rate to these people to go out to the West. When the work in the West was completed many of them had enough money to pay their fare back but had no means when they arrived here. The consequence is that by charging for return fare a rate almost double the fare to the West many of these people congregate in the large centres of Ontario and the local authorities have to maintain them during the winter. This is a very serious matter. We have had professional harvesters in this country who do nothing else but go out west during the harvest time to harvest. We have had them parading around Toronto and even coming down to Ottawa. Some men came from the Old Country to harvest the western crop last year and who apparently have done nothing since the crop was harvested but reflect on the industrial conditions in this country. Because they have been very assiduous in scattering broadcast throughout the Old Country reports that there are thousands of men out of employment in Canada. We cannot get these men to do anything else but harvesting no matter what work you offer them, and I was glad to see the ringleader was sentenced to six months in gaol last week.

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend yesterday asked:

Does the minister exercise control over the rates?

My answer was "Not at all," and it may be possible I gave my hon. friend a wrong impression. As a matter of fact the Labour department does negotiate with the railways on two questions that affect the railway rates. One is the question of securing a continued rate for the removal of surplus unemployed labour from one province to another. Under the arrangement that we have had since I have been in the department, although it is made to run for a few months at a time usually and then is re-instituted as from the date of expiration, that rate is 2.70 cents per mile for the removal of surplus labour from one province to another, with a minimum of four dollars. In other words, the 2.70 cent rate would apply when the reduced rate ticket is four dollars or more. I realize fully that we are in a very favourable position to be criticized by the farmers of the Maritime provinces of Ontario as regards these harvest excursions, while on the other hand, our good friends from the western provinces want to get all the assistance that the Labour department can give them in times of stress to ensure a proper supply of labour to harvest the western grain crops. So, officers of the department do make certain representations to the passenger departments of the railways in regard to the rates both from the Pacific coast to the prairie provinces on certain occasions and from the Maritime provinces or Quebec or Ontario to the West. We do not exercise control. We only make representations for a rate that will meet the purpose desired, and offer encouragement to the young men to go to the West and help with the harvest. We do not want, of course, to deplete the farms of New Brunswick or Nova Scotia or Ontario or Quebec, but we are between two fires, as it were, and the department wants to be as helpful as possible in the matter.

Mr. CALDWELL: We shall have to make our fire a little hotter.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Does the minister think it fair that after these men are taken out to the West, they should be charged to come back nearly double the railway rates that they were charged going West, and realizing that there is no work for them when they come here, to land them stranded in these old provinces where they will have to be maintained by the cities? Does the minister think it fair that they should be charged these exorbitant rates coming back?

Mr. FORKE: In the great majority of cases there is no such happening as that pictured by my hon. friend (Mr. Sutherland). The average harvester last year was getting six dollars a day for harvesting and he did not need to work many days to earn enough to take him home. That sort of talk is absurd. I do not impute any absurdity to the hon. member's statement because I know he is talking candidly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: How long does the harvest last in the West or any other part?

Mr. FORKE: Six weeks, or probably two months, sometimes longer. I have seen the harvest last for three months. I have paid as much as $350 to $400 to one man for harvesting and threshing. Two-thirds of the harvesters who come West come from Toronto, Montreal and other big cities. We do not get many men from the farms.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes, you do.

Mr. FORKE: I cannot get them anyway. Two-thirds of these men would not be of any use to the farmers of Ontario. They come from the cities out West for the wages, and we have to board them for nine or ten days before they are of any use. We have to feed them a little before they can do any work on the farms. All this story about not being able to get enough money to come back is just so much moonshine.

Mr. MURDOCK: The rate in 1922 from Moncton to Winnipeg was twenty dollars, while the return rate from Winnipeg to St. John or Moncton was twenty-five dollars. I think that is about a fair comparison with what the rate usually is. I should like to ask the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) what he would think we should do when we receive a telegram sent on July 17 when the harvest is just commencing, and reading as follows:

> Meeting this morning confidential statement will be prepared for press Manitoba requires fifteen Saskatchewan thirty-three and Alberta thirteen thousand harvesters three thousand available locally each province first excursion for Manitoba to arrive August seventh Saskatchewan and Alberta August fifteenth wages probably three fifty for stooking and four dollars for threshing. Meeting later of railroad officials to consider points your wire fourteenth result to be announced later.

In other words, pressure was being brought to bear upon the Labour department and the Director of the Employment Service to do something. We could not, under those circumstances, decline to do what might be possible to assist the West, even though, by so doing and without personal knowledge, we may have helped to deplete somewhat labour in the Maritime provinces or Ontario or Quebec.

Mr. CALDWELL: I notice the minister said that no excursions ran from Nova Scotia or Prince Edward Island. What was the tenor of the reply from the premier of those two provinces last year? Did they object and was that why they did not run the excursions?

Mr. MURDOCK: The Premier of Nova Scotia on July 17 wrote this letter:

> Referring to your letter to me of the 21st ult., asking for an expression of opinion as to the advisability of advertising railway excursions from the Maritime provinces for harvesters, I beg to advise that as far as I was able, I consulted with my colleagues and others, and it was the consensus of opinion that it would not be desirable to make any special efforts to attract harvesters from Nova Scotia. This opinion would cover your desire to be advised as to my views upon railways running excursions from Nova Scotia.

We got a similar reply from Prince Edward Island.

Mr. CHURCH: Some of the larger municipalities have grievances about the way in which they have been treated as regards these harvester excursions and the way those known as British harvesters were used. In my opinion, the British harvesters did not get a fair deal from the Labour department. They were brought out here by railway and transportation companies. They went out West, did their work, and when they came back to the large city of Toronto seeking work and finding none they came down to interview the government, but they were all sent back to Toronto. The city of Toronto wishes to protest against this to-night. It is a dumping ground after the harvest is over, for a large portion of the unskilled harvest labour that comes from the West. Dear knows, we have, unfortunately, owing to many industrial troubles in that city, enough men of our own out of work without being made the dumping ground for the whole of Canada. As regards some of the men that came down to interview the government, it was said by some ministers that the men did not want to go to work. To show that that is not the case, three of these men took jobs at snow cleaning at Mimico and three of them were killed there in the yards of the Canadian National Railways, where they were getting the mean wage of fifteen to twenty-five cents an hour shovelling snow. I protest against the way in which these British harvesters were used. I do not say that the government is altogether responsible for this because I think part of the fault belongs to the transportation companies; but I urge upon the government that if these men are brought out, they should not be brought out in September, October, November, December and January when there is practically no work, and people are out of employment. There should be a closed season for immigration in winter as in some of the larger municipalities we shall have to go back perhaps next winter to the dole system. The way these British harvesters were used was bad advertising for Canada in the Old Country. In connection with immigration agents, I do not say that the Minister of Labour is to blame for this particular case, because this may not come under his department, but in immigration matters and in bringing men to Canada there should be co-operation between the federal, provincial and municipal authorities on immigration matters in general. The cities and municipalities all have their own labour troubles to contend with and in winter, by reason of natural conditions arising in their own limits, they have enough unemployment to take care of without having men who are imported from outside dumped upon them and left to depend upon charity. Many of these men who are brought into this country from the Old Land and left to shift for themselves in our cities in winter have wives and children depending upon them. and some of them are men who have fought for the flag. This sort of thing gives this country a black eye and something should be done to remedy the situation. This matter may not come within the minister's department, but I would suggest that, this notwithstanding, he urge upon his colleagues to do something in the way of co-operation with the Old Country authorities, the transportation companies, the provincial governments and the municipalities, with a view of having some joint satisfactory arrangement arrived at to check this work up. The larger municipalities are protesting; as I say, they have men of their own to look after in the winter. The minister has made the statement that unemployment was not so bad; personally, I have never known it to be as bad as it was during the last winter. Many of the industries are closed altogether and 50 per cent of them are running only 25 to 30 per cent of their time. The government, I submit, can exercise control, through the Railway Commission, over the transportation situation, and in my opinion the damage done to these men should be collected from these companies. These men have been brought out to this country under false pretences: they were told that there was plenty of work for them on the farms in the summer and that in the winter they could get jobs in the cities. The British Welcome League in Toronto had to be reformed to help these poor men, give them accommodation and house and feed them. I cannot over-emphasize the mistake that was made in bringing these people to Canada in the first instance; and if the government did not enter into any contract with them, then the least they should do is to find out who did, and bring the parties or companies to time. As a result of this misrepresentation these unfortunate men have been stranded in this country. I do not say that the Minister of Labour is to blame; indeed, I believe he has done what he could himself to remedy things. I would suggest that during certain winter and semi-winter months there should be no immigration; there should be a sort of closed season for immigration. At all events, I think it is highly improper that men should be brought into this country in the depth of winter and then abandoned and left to shift for themselves with their families and ill fed children as a result of the misrepresentation of immigration agents and the greed of transportation companies. It was a bad advertisement for Canada in the Old Land the way our kith and kin, many of them returned soldiers, were used in this unfortunate British harvester episode.

Mr. HOCKEN: The government of this country brings out a number of harvesters who are an asset to the West while the harvest is on. They are brought for that purpose and they render a certain service. They are well paid, of course, but I presume that those who pay them believe that they are getting value.

An hon. MEMBER: No, sir.

Mr. HOCKEN: An hon. gentleman says they do not get value. Why do the farmers employ these men, then? They are the best help that can be got, and are brought three thousand miles to be of service on hon. gentlemen's land. What I object to is that while these men are brought out to be an asset to the West, the moment they become a liability they are dumped upon the cities of Winnipeg, Toronto, Hamilton and Montreal. I do not ask the farmers to keep them all the year, but I do say that the government that undertakes to bring men out in such large numbers for a specific purpose surely has some responsibility for their maintenance when their service has been rendered; at any rate, the government has a responsibility for providing for their return home. Why should the cities and towns have this liability imposed upon them such as they have had particularly in the past year and in previous years? It simply means that out of private charity hundreds and sometimes thousands of men have to be maintained throughout the winter period, and maintained by people who did not bring them out and who could not possibly derive any benefit from them. The residents of the cities are under the necessity of maintaining these men if they do not wish to see them die on their doorsteps. I say that the government that brings them out ought to find means by which they can be employed, or at least fed, when their services are no longer required and they become a liability. If they are to be a liability on any one, it should be the government that brought them out and not the municipalities who should be responsible for them. Surely it is not beyond the genius of this government, which is made up of geniuses, to formulate some plan whereby this burden may be removed from the shoulders of innocent people, who cannot benefit in any way by the presence of the unemployed, and placed, if not on the shoulders of those who have benefited from their labour, at least upon the nation as a whole. Certainly, no individual section of the country should be made to bear the brunt of this condition. I think the Minister of Labour might signalize his term of office by creating a great reputation, if he would devise a plan by which these people could be properly taken care of and not left as a burden on people who have had no part in bringing them out. I suggest to the minister that he take the matter up in council and see if there is not wit enough there to do something to relieve the situation, and take care of these men when unemployment is unavoidable. In a country such as Canada, with its rigorous climate, there must be always a good deal of unemployment in the winter, and the municipalities and such centres as Hamilton, London, Guelph and these other places, all have their troubles and their burdens in the shape of unemployment every year. That burden comes naturally in the care for their own men who have been employed in these cities during the period when outdoor work is possible. But there comes a time when for three or four or five months there is no outdoor work to be done: building operations cease, road work ceases and the many other forms of work that must be done in the open are closed down. I believe that every municipality is willing to take care of its natural liability in that regard, but I do think that any city or town has a perfect right to protest against being shouldered with the burden of caring for those who are not a part of its local liability. I hope the minister will think enough of my suggestion to take it up with the members of the government to see whether some plan cannot be worked out in co-operation with the provinces and perhaps with the municipalities. Certainly these people must be taken care of and at the present time the burden is forced upon those who have no responsibility whatever in regard to them. The matter should not rest there, and I am satisfied that something could be done to solve the problem. These people are here as a result of national activities and they should be taken care of by the nation.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I want to endorse the position taken by the members for Toronto. The member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) has said some very harsh things about one of the harvesters who was recently sentenced in Toronto. It seems to me that we should perhaps consider the circumstances of these men and ask ourselves whether our neglect of them has not led directly to some of these infractions of the law. I have in my hand a very interesting and illuminating document with regard to two young men who were sentenced in a British Columbia court for stealing a rifle. With your permission, Mr. Chairman, I will read the following notes made by the presiding county court judge with regard to one of the prisoners:

I came from Halifax, England; left England 8th June, 1923, in C.P.R. ship "Montcalm." The shipping agent, Mr. Crossley, represented to me that I would never be out of a job as he had been to Canada a number of times. I paid him about £19 for ticket from Halifax to Toronto. My parents paid this money and gave me some money—£5.

I went straight to Toronto and got rooms and looked for a job. I was offered $12 a week but found I could not live on this as I had to pay my keep out of this.

I then left Toronto by boat and sailed for four hours to Port Dalhousie and got work on lake boat. Sailed from Port Dalhousie on steamer "New York News" of Chicago Tribune Co. I worked for two months there. I got $55 and board. I left that boat for another called the "Dresser," the Keystone Line; there about three weeks. I went to Benny Siding in Ontario near Sudbury to cut wood; worked there a month.

I did not make any money cutting wood except enough to buy my working clothes.

I went back to Sudbury and then to a place named Burwash east of Sudbury; stayed a month there, then I came back and paid fare to Winnipeg; arrived there about middle of September. I could not make anything. I worked for my board and lodging in a candy manufacturer's; worked for about three months.

I went to the immigration office and complained. They told me they could do nothing for me except a job on a farm for $5 a month. So I came out and asked to get on the relief in Winnipeg but could only get on two days. Then I went back to the immigration officers and they took me in; I stayed there probably about a month and a half.

Mr. SALES: What season of the year was he offered the $5 a month job?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: About Christmas time.

Mr. SALES: Five dollars a month, and his board and lodgings?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I suppose so.

Then a job came in for a 1,000 hands wanted for the bush in B.C. I heard these were to be used as strike breakers, so I asked at the immigration office from one of the permanent staff and he said there was no such thing as a strike in B.C.

Then 23 of us who were on the immigration relief signed up for B.C. We came to Wardner, B.C. and found a whole crowd of strikers waiting for us. They told us that the men were all out on strike and asked us not to go to work. Twenty-one of us never went to work but another and I talked it over and thought as the immigration office paid our fare out that we should go to work and pay this amount back, which we did. We worked a month in the bush $2.50 with board.

I left there and came down to Cranbrook and stayed in Cranbrook a few days. Then I met Gilbert and we decided to go to Trail and try and get work and on our way we got in this trouble. I had no money for two days. We went into this house to try and get something to eat and as we had no money we took the rifle and sold it to get something to eat. $8 we got for it. We sold it in Grand Forks. We got there by walking and freight.

We stayed in Nelson one night. Gilbert was a member of the G.W.V.A. so got a ticket from them for the night for a hotel.

The judge makes this comment:

I am leaving the writing of this letter to go into the court room to sentence two lads—one from Halifax, Eng., and one from Glasgow, Scotland, for theft. They were enticed out here by the shipping agents of the Canadian railway companies. They paid about $100 to these shipping agents who get their rake-off and the rest goes into the coffers of the railway companies. These poor dupes who are being enticed out to Canada on false and misleading promises are victims of railway corporation cupidity. These lads were eking out a precarious living in the bush of Ontario and the farms of the prairies until they had to take refuge with scores of others in the emigration sheds at Winnipeg. Then they were shipped out to take the place of strikers in the timber areas of East Kootenay; they were told by the emigration authorities (so they have stated to me) that there was no strike.

Reduced to starvation conditions these lads lifted a rifle from a shed to sell to get food. They must go to prison for this crime. I will impose a short sentence but they have pleaded "Guilty" and I cannot avoid sentencing them.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

The railway companies and steamboat companies are agitating for more and more population. Not a thought as to the class so long as they can get the passage money. Not a thought as to the future of these penniless lads so long as their fares are paid and go into the "Receipts" column.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that when one comes into close contact with these men and realizes the brave struggle that many of them have put up in order to try and gain a foothold in this country, many of them having done their piece of work when work was available and were afterwards driven from pillar to post, some of them not fitted for the kind of work for which they were brought over, we ought to consider very seriously our whole policy, and I for one think we should rigourously refrain from wholesale condemnation of men who come to a new country to find that there is not the machinery here for fitting them into what, to them, are novel conditions.

Mr. MILLAR: I fancy this is rather a storm in a teacup. One would think from the remarks made by the members from Toronto that the sacrifices are made entirely by the large cities. Let me say that many of our best settlers on the prairies and, I suppose, in other parts of the country as well, were young men that came out just in this way. In fact my mind now reverts to a young man who came out with no knowledge of driving a team in Canada—of course, horses are handled differently in the Old Country—and Canadians were amused at the way in which he would talk to his horses, which would go just where they pleased. I will not say in what part of this chamber that man sits now, but he sits here. I think I could go over the country and find hundreds and thousands of such men. At the present time the farmers in the prairie provinces are doing their share in looking after these immigrants. They regard such men in the right light, for they realize these newcomers are living under entirely different conditions to what they have been accustomed. Very often when given a team of horses they will let them run away. I remember a case last fall: A young man was given a team to help stook-thresh, as we call it; he let his horses stand alone a short distance from the engine; when he wanted to stop them he said "whoa" and they stopped, he called to them a second time with the same result, but the third time they did not stop, they went home of their own accord and smashed the wagon and rack. Such mishaps will occur again and again, but the farmers realize that these men are inexperienced and with training will become useful; therefore they are making a sacrifice to train them, paying them sometimes three or four dollars a day which is often more than they are worth, confident that they will eventually become good Canadian settlers. The Englishman likes to be free; he resents being herded in the fall of the year and being told where he should go. Nobody dumps him on Toronto or any other city; he simply goes there of his own accord. I would remind hon. members from Toronto that much of the money which those men are helping to make on the prairie farms finds its way eventually to Toronto. Much of what we pay for our farm implements, our textiles, and our mortgage interest, finds its way to Toronto. And I think if you look at the Auditor General's report you will observe that last year the federal government paid out to Toronto for unemployment $178,000. So I think the people of Toronto have no reason to make very much complaint. Let each one do his share by these men who come from the Mother Country, from conditions that are not very favourable, to a new country where they will make good if they are given a chance. But, I assure hon. members, the farmers of the prairie provinces are doing their share in dealing with these newcomers. As I said before, they are paying them good wages and training them at the same time, knowing they will become useful later on and good Canadian citizens. I think far too much has been made of this matter. If we all do our share I do not think any one will be badly hurt, and we will have so many more good Canadians.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Why do not the prairie farmers employ these men during the winter months if they are doing so much to assist them?

Mr. MILLAR: To my knowledge many of these men were able to work during the winter months, at low wages it is true, but in very good homes where they would have a chance to learn how to handle horses and to farm. I know near my own home two immigrants were given such an opportunity by a farmer, but both refused. Later on last winter the farmer was himself doing chores on his two farms because he could not get help at what he considered a reasonable rate.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: In the Hansard report of my remarks yesterday just before the committee rose at six o'clock when referring to a man who was sentenced to gaol for six months in Toronto I find I stated that the magistrate termed him a rebel. The newspaper report was that the man himself admitted he was a rebel, but, as I pointed out, it was the magistrate who said he was a rebel. In regard to what the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg has said, I wish to point out that I did not without good reason make the statement that I made. I heard this man in Toronto about two weeks ago make the most reckless statements that I ever heard and I could not help being surprised that he had been permitted to say what he did. He admitted that he was the leader of this farmers' movement. He was advising these unemployed men what to do in case they made a contract to go on a farm.

Mr. MILLAR: Did the hon. member say the farmers' movement?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: They claimed they were farmers—harvesters' movement, I should have said.

An hon. MEMBER: Immigrants' movement.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The hon. gentleman does not need to sneer at the immigrants. No province in Canada has done so much to bring people out here and to see them comfortably established as Ontario has, and that is why I asked the minister last night how it was that these men were charged a great deal more for coming back from the West than they were charged to get out there. The excursion rate from Ontario is $15 going West and $25 coming back. Ontario has for many years had to do that work itself; there has not been that co-operation between the federal government and the province that there should have been and the result is that Ontario has provided all the machinery for bringing these people out here and seeing that they are satisfactorily located with employers who will give them a reasonable wage and good care. It is the natural desire of nine-tenths of those who come to this country to become owners of land and to build up homes for themselves, and they are obliged to go to Ontario and obtain the necessary experience, because diversified farming is carried on there to a greater extent, I believe, than in the newer districts of the West at any rate. Well, a few months after they become installed with the farmer in Ontario they read about these excursions to the West. They are able to get out there at a low rate and get big wages and the result is that in many instances they become dissatisfied. Although they have made a contract perhaps for eight months of the year, the Ontario farmer realizes that there is no use trying to keep a man who wants to leave; it is better to pay him off and let him go. And when these men come back the farmers whom they left under these conditions at the beginning of the harvest season do not feel like taking them in for the winter, because if another opportunity presents itself they will leave again. The farmers of Ontario have been maligned by many of these men, and the arrangement entered into by the Department of Labour through representations made to the railway companies are in no small measure responsible for this condition. If it is advisable to have excursion rates, then give the men the same rate back that they get going out. I am not saying anything about the West that my friends from that part of the country need take exception to; they know this is the case. They know that it is necessary for them at certain times of the year to have a great deal more labour than they require at other times, and so long as that is the case there will be this going backwards and forwards between Ontario and the West, and there will be many men accepting these excursion rates and going out to remain there, but it is unfair to Ontario that these inducements should be held out at the very time of year when the Ontario farmer needs help the most. As to this man who was sentenced in Toronto two weeks ago, I stood there and listened to the statements he was making to the men before him, and had I had the authority I would not have hesitated to have him deported within an hour. He is not the kind of man we want in this country; he belongs to that disturbing element which are doing their utmost to create friction between the labouring classes and their employees. Our country with its great undeveloped resources affords ample opportunity to every willing worker who can come here, and will afford that opportunity for many years. It is not necessary for anyone to go around the streets of our cities and towns complaining that he is unable to get employment. It is not the case; I know of many contracts that have been standing idle during the last two or three years for lack of people to do the work. This is the condition of affairs in Toronto, and along then comes the minister and makes arrangements with the railway companies regarding these excursions. I thought it was the Railway Board who had charge of the regulation of railway rates, but we find the minister inducing the help engaged by the farmers of Ontario for a term of months to leave those farmers at harvest time and go to the West. Then we have hundreds of thousands of dollars paid out in doles to carry these people through the winter and we find people sneering at the farmer and saying that he will not take these men in for a few months. Those who are out of employment in Ontario are largely those who have refused to accept work in Ontario or who have gone out to help our friends in the West as a result of the inducements which the minister has arranged or is to-day offering to them through the excursion rates on the railways.

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend flatters me if he suggests that I fixed the rate applicable to these harvesters' excursions. The Labour department found out from the passenger departments of the railways what the rates were to be, because the excursions are believed to be a benefit to all concerned, to the western farmers and to the men who possibly want to be moved.

Mr. CHURCH: An independent investigation into this British harvester matter was held by Canon Vernon for the Church of England in the diocese of Toronto. These men were sent back to the city of Toronto by the government of Canada. I will tell my hon. friend from South Oxford that while there may be an occasional one or two of them a socialist or an agitator, the great body of these men are British born, and anxious to work. Here is a picture that appeared in the Toronto Globe of a military funeral that was given to three British harvesters who met death while snow-shovelling for the National Railways in the Mimico freight yards. These three men, George Platt, Frederick Ward, and S. J. Harper, had been in every British war since the Crimean. They were all married men, and they leave families of two, three and four children. The transportation companies brought these harvesters to Canada, and there was misrepresentation. These men are not loafers. I have seen many of them myself, and they are the best possible type of immigrants we could get. These three good returned soldiers were killed while out working in a snow storm at Mimico, seven miles from Toronto, and here is what Rev. Canon Vernon said at their military funeral in the Church of the Ascension:

> They knew the bitterness of criticism and misrepresentation and they have answered with their lives. Last Saturday they went forth to their work and laboured until the evening, and, in the Providence of God, that evening was the evening of their life on earth.

These men, killed on the railway tracks, were not given a pension by the Canadian National Railways, and their wives and small children were left destitute. The Standard Stock Exchange and other bodies got up a public subscription for them. These men, after seeking work in vain for days, were given work at Mimico on the Canadian National Railways at fifteen and twenty cents an hour, and one night an engine, backing down on the track, killed the three of them. The National Railways have not provided any pension or made any other provision for their widows and families, and I hope the Minister of Labour will see that justice is done to them. There was an inquiry, after the funeral of these three men, into the whole question of who brought these immigrants here, the conditions under which they came to Canada, went out west and were returned to Toronto and other urban centres of population in Ontario, and the inquiry showed that the men were brought out here under misrepresentation, that the transportation companies were to blame. Here is the Toronto Globe, an organ of the government, criticising the government's policy in this regard. They say that the government should not have allowed these transportation companies to bring these men out here, these men who had served in every British war since the Crimean war, and whose wives and families are now left to be taken care of by charitable institutions in Toronto. I am glad to say that a large number of these harvesters who came out from the Old Country have got work in Toronto, because we are a British-born city, and we are not going to see men who have fought for the Empire left to be dealt with by charitable bodies. It is a disgrace to the whole country the way these British harvesters were used, and as the Rev. Canon Vernon says, somebody is responsible for bringing them out. I tell you that it was the biggest black eye that was ever given to British immigration. I do not wish to criticise the government so much, because I think the transportation companies put something over on them. We have the president of one of the transportation companies in this country talking of the need for immigration, and this is the way the transportation companies use the British immigrants when they are brought to Canada. The Canadian National Railways paid these men fifteen, eighteen or twenty cents an hour for shovelling snow. These men went out in the depth of winter and worked under intolerable conditions seven miles from the city of Toronto, and were killed during one of the severest storms. There have been several sermons preached from pulpits about them. I know the Minister of Labour sometimes takes the pulpit himself. I do not think he is to blame for this particular case, but I urge him to take this matter up and sermonize Sir Henry Thornton and see if he cannot do something to get pensions for the widows of these three British-born soldiers who were killed while working on the National railways. I think the government should hold an inquiry into the bringing out of these British harvesters. I wish to protest against the way they were used.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. This vote is for the International Labour Conference, and the hon. member is out of order.

Mr. CHURCH: I appreciate what the vote is for, but the Minister of Labour has brought up this matter of the harvesters. I am glad I called the attention of the House to the mean way the British harvesters were used.

Mr. MacLAREN: Before I say something in reference to this subject, Mr. Chairman, I want to be quite sure I am in order. I wish to say a little on the transportation of harvesters, which has been discussed under this vote. Is that in order?

The CHAIRMAN: I do not think it is in order. There was an inquiry made of the minister, and then finally some addresses were given on the subject.

Mr. MacLAREN: I shall be very brief in the reference I have to make.

Mr. MURDOCK: Yesterday afternoon my hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Caldwell) asked for certain information in regard to harvest excursions from the Maritime provinces which I did not have with me at the time, and I promised I would let him have the information at the earliest opportunity, and I therefore brought the matter up tonight.

The CHAIRMAN: The question is not a question of immigration, but purely one of transportation of labour from one part of Canada to another

Mr. MacLAREN: That is the point I wish to confine myself to, Mr. Chairman. I quite understand that the minister has no jurisdiction over transportation rates for harvesters within the Dominion, but I wish to take this opportunity of protesting against the conditions existing, that is to say, against harvesters being induced to proceed from their homes to the prairie provinces at a reduced rate, and at their having to pay a higher rate to return home. I protest against any such arrangement as that What is the object of that special rate? Is the return rate larger in order that these men may be retained in one portion of the Dominion to the detriment of another portion, which loses them? That to some extent is the effect, whatever the object may be.

Mr. FORKE: I will answer that question.

Mr. MacLAREN: I want to address myself particularly to the minister. I want to enlist his sympathy in the matter. I wish to present the matter from another point of view than what the leader of the Progressive party would probably put forward. The railway companies—and in this case the National Railways especially—should bring back the men to their homes at the same rate at which they took them to the West. They are being sent there to meet the needs of the middle West, they are taken from their own provinces, and the least that could be done in fairness to the sections from which they come is to return them at the same rate. Is it fair to deplete certain portions of the Dominion in order to meet the needs of the West, and to grant special railway rates to assist in that depletion? I submit it is not? Surely the members of the Progressive party are not in favour of granting special inducements that will be in the interest of one section of the country more than in that of another. If they are not, how can they reconcile that position with the fact that an additional charge is made for returning the harvesters to their homes. I would submit this to the consideration of the minister so that he may, if he thinks fit, pass on to the proper quarter any views that appeal to him, more especially the view that if harvesters are brought from the East to meet the needs of the prairie provinces there should be no increase in the rates but rather a reduction in order to facilitate the return of these men to their homes.

Mr. MORRISON: There has been considerable criticism of the railways for taking harvesters west at a lower rate than is charged them to return. I submit that the railways are entirely responsible for that course. They take the men from congested districts of the country to the West where they will have an opportunity to make a new start. Before they do this they advertise that the return rate will be higher than the rate to the West, so that if the men take in the excursion they do so with a full understanding of what the return fare will be. The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church) has just stated that the British-born among the harvesters deserve better treatment than they receive. I wish to say that last year there were 12,000 harvesters and only about 800 of them were dissatisfied. I submit that was a very gratifying result—there was less than one in twelve that did not fit in with his new surroundings. About the time that some dissatisfied harvesters held up the Prince of Wales at Winnipeg, ten of them refused an offer of $5 a day in the district where I live. They would not work under such conditions for $5 a day, and I know that at that time the crop was not half threshed up in Alberta. There is always a percentage of dissatisfied men who will not accept the treatment offered them and go to work. I cannot understand any strong, unmarried man being in want in the winter after having worked at the harvesting in the West. If any such person found himself stranded it was his own fault. Some of the married men, however, were deserving of some consideration. Three years ago the city of Regina maintained eight hundred men for the winter. Two years ago they advertised that they were not going to feed men, unless applicants were able to prove that their condition was not due to any fault of their own. As a consequence they had none to feed. As long as municipalities will assume the burden of feeding men without requiring them to prove that their condition is not due to any fault of their own they will continue to have applications from needy men for assistance.

Mr. MILLAR: Although I have spoken already I wish to state that something has been said about misrepresentations and about the too rosy stories that were circulated—

The CHAIRMAN: I question if the hon. member is in order. This is purely a question of the transfer of labour from one province to another in the interests of western Canada. I do not think the question of immigration comes in if the hon. member will permit me to suggest that.

Mr. ARTHURS: How much was spent on this vote last year?

Mr. MURDOCK: The sum of $6,644.47.

Mr. ARTHURS: Who were the parties that represented Canada?

Mr. MURDOCK: At the International Labour Conference? Miss C. E. Carmichael, president of the National Council of Women and Philippe Roy, Agent General at Paris, were the two government representatives. Mr. G. H. Sherrard, of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, represented the employers, and Mr. Tom Moore, the workers.

Mr. LEADER: Will the minister tell us what it cost to keep an automobile for Mr. Roy?

Mr. MURDOCK: I am unable to answer that and my hon. friend will agree the subject is not in my department.

Mr. LEADER: You mentioned his name in your answer. I can tell my hon. friend it is $3,000 a year.

The CHAIRMAN: That has no reference to this item at all.

Mr. HUMPHREY: Can the minister state what the policy of employment agencies is in regard to transferring labour from one province to another in case of a labour dispute? Is it the policy of the employment agency to supply labour to another province as a result of representations by an employer, who has had labour difficulties but nevertheless states that no such trouble exists.

Mr. MURDOCK: It is most decidedly not the policy of the employment offices of Canada under those conditions to assist in transferring labour from one province to another. If representations are made, as they were made during recent months in British Columbia when the I.W.W. had a lumbermen's strike, or if representations are made to the employment offices of the prairie provinces that labour is wanted, the instructions are that the superintendent of employment offices must state the exact conditions in effect at the point where labour is required leaving the workmen then to act in accordance with their own judgment. Possibly the information desired by the hon. member is covered by order in council 3111, section 5, sub-sections (a) and (b). It will be observed from these sections of the order in council that employment offices should maintain a strictly neutral attitude in industrial disputes. Reports in this connection should be made in triplicate on form E.O. 25—report of trade disputes—one copy being sent to the provincial clearing house, one to the interprovincial clearing house, and one copy retained on file in the office. When disputes are settled advice to that effect is also to be sent on this form. I repeat, that in so far as is possible a neutral attitude is maintained.

Item agreed to.

Joint industrial councils, $5,000.

Mr. MURDOCK: This appropriation is intended to meet charges arising out of work done for the formation of a system of joint industrial councils as between employers and workmen. The system is largely identical with that known in Great Britain as the Whitley councils, and it is thought likely to be helpful in meeting industrial situations arising out of industrial unrest. The appropriation is intended to cover expenditures for salaries, allowance and travelling expenses, temporary assistance and so forth.

Mr. ARTHURS: Is the minister of the opinion that they are less helpful? Otherwise, why the reduction in the vote?

Mr. MURDOCK: There have not been any extensive expenditures under this item for the past two years, one important reason being that there is generally in effect throughout Canada a commendable spirit of compromise as between employer and employee. There seems to be a desire on the part of both, generally speaking, to co-operate. There are some exceptions to that. The appropriation is maintained, but it has not appeared advisable to make any extensive undertaking. We pay out of this appropriation certain expenses, for instance, salaries last year of $1,308 and allowance and travelling expenses of $3,039.75. The expenditures shown under allowance and travelling expenses covered the amounts paid to an officer of this department who is on part time, who works by the day, who has been a very valuable officer to the department, whom we found working on the same basis when I came to the department, and who has accomplished some very commendable results in the way of mediation and conciliation since that time. The largest amount of this appropriation has been paid to take care of the salary and expenses of that officer.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: How many such councils have been organised during the past year?

Mr. MURDOCK: Not any. I said a moment ago that during the past two years no expensive undertakings have been made in regard to the establishment of joint industrial councils.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If no councils have been organised, what is the man doing who is working on half time?

Mr. MURDOCK: He is by mediation in numerous cases bringing about settlements between employer and employee. For example, within the past six months, six applications for boards of investigation were made to the department, on each one of which a settlement was reached as a result of the efforts of this officer in the way of mediation. If we put that in comparative figures, I think we could readily show that if, in each case, boards had been formed, and had gone through the usual mode of procedure, and the three members of the board had been paid, with the expenses of witnesses and the delays that would occur, this would have cost very much more than this particular item amounts to in paying this officer his allowance and travelling expenses for the last year.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That may be a very laudable work, but I submit it is not the work of establishing industrial councils. Has the government given up the idea of the advisability of establishing councils?

Mr. MURDOCK: Not at all. I hope that the time may come before many years, possibly before the next fiscal year, when we can say that the time has arrived when we can proceed in a more insistent way to bring about the formation of industrial councils. It has not appeared advisable to move very urgently in that direction during the past two years, according to the view of the department and the minister.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am informed that certain groups of civil servants are very anxious that councils should be formed in the branches of the Civil Service. Surely, it would seem as if there was a field in which the government need have no great hesitation. This does not impinge in any way on private rights, private corporations. Is it the intention of the government to establish Whitley councils or industrial councils within the Civil Service?

Mr. MURDOCK: I would hope that my hon. friend would ask the Prime Minister for a declaration on that point. I think I could go so far as to say that the government would expect that government employees should have all reasonable and consistent opportunity of making known their aims and claims. To that extent the government has indicated its desire during the past few weeks in regard to the postal employees' revision of salaries.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But in this again I think the Minister of Labour will hardly attempt to tell us that making known the claims of employees is anything like the establishments of Whitley councils as advocated a few years ago in England.

Mr. MURDOCK: I agree that it is not by any means, and again I hope that someone will not criticise me for saying this. This is a question on which the Civil Service Commission would have something to say; I think a question upon which they would have the most to say. In other words, under the law, they have authority to determine certain questions as those questions affect the wage rate or conditions of employment of civil servants. There is nothing in the law which would specifically say to them: You shall give civil servants an opportunity for a voice and a vote in the determination of those questions.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does the minister imply that the Civil Service is in opposition to the commission?

Mr. MURDOCK: I imply nothing. I am not touching on that point. I say that it is a matter on which the Civil Service Commission would have a good deal to say.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Has the minister ever inquired of the Civil Service Commission whether they would be willing to have Whitley councils established?

Mr. MURDOCK: I have not asked the Civil Service Commission if they would be willing to have established in the Civil Service Whitley councils or industrial councils.

Mr. ARTHURS: The minister has justified this appropriation by stating that he has a very efficient officer who works part time. He gave instances where this officer had prevented disputes, in fact I understand had prevented all the disputes that had occurred in the department this year. Am I correct?

Mr. MURDOCK: No, far from correct. I said that in six applications which were made, the officer was able to effect a settlement without the necessity of forming a board, but twenty-two applications were made during the year.

Mr. ARTHURS: It would appear that this officer on part time was more efficient than the other wage investigators. Is that true?

Mr. MURDOCK: His duties are somewhat different. Fair-wage officers have a different line of duties to perform under the Civil Service classification.

Mr. ARTHURS: Fair-wage investigators?

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes, and of course this officer is a good wage investigator. He can do that class of work or other classes.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not suppose his assistance was requested in the dispute between the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) and Dr. Torrance.

Mr. MURDOCK: No.

Mr. STEVENS: It is rather too bad he was not called in.

Mr. MURDOCK: He might have been able to settle that.

Mr. STEVENS: There might have been a little justice done.

Item agreed to.

Combines Investigation Act, including $1,000 to the registrar, $20,000.

Mr. FORKE: Could the minister give us some information as to the working of this act? Have there been any prosecutions or any discoveries?

Mr. MURDOCK: There have been no prosecutions.

Mr. FORKE: Any investigations?

Mr. MURDOCK: There have been a considerable number of investigations regarding some of which I will give the details. The following is a memorandum I have on the subject:

Preliminary investigations initiated by registrar as a result of representations received:

1. Boot and shoe manufacturers and jobbers interrogated regarding fixing of resale prices. Result: complaint found to be unjustified.

2. Inquiry of canners as result of an inquiry as to why act was not functioning in connection with canners' combine. Result: information received from canners and enquirer requested to make formal application, which to date he has not done.

3. Inquiry of dealers in wholesale plumbing supplies in connection with inquiry received re refusal of dealers to supply inquirer. Result: applicants decided not to make formal application, as investigation resulted in wholesalers agreeing to furnish supplies.

There are a number of other lines in which investigations have been held. Does the hon. member want me to read them?

Mr. FORKE: I think the committee is anxious to know how the act is working out.

Mr. MURDOCK: My memorandum on this question continues:

4. Inquiry into conditions existing in the western provinces relating to the marketing of B.C. fruit and vegetable. Attention of department directed to the matter by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the member for Centre Winnipeg, who enclosed clipping from Nelson "Daily Sun" containing letter signed by O. J. Wigen of Wynndel, B.C., complaining of alleged combine regarding merchandising of fruit. Mr. Wigen was invited to make application under act on March 20th but so far has failed to do so. In the meantime an investigation into the matter is being conducted by departmental officer at Vancouver.

Mr. ARTHURS: How many formal complaints have been made?

Mr. MURDOCK: There have been no formal complaints. No application has been made under section 5 of the act, which requires that six citizens shall take the necessary steps. We have asked that application be made on several occasions when complaints have been lodged, but in no instance has the application been forthcoming when it came to final action on the part of the persons concerned.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Have there been any investigations of the banks?

Mr. MURDOCK: No; we have not assumed that this was a part of the function of the Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. FORKE: I do not think that it is a wise provision to require six citizens to make the application; it is quite difficult to get six persons to agree to do this. One complainant may be quite prepared to make application but it is not so easy to get five others who are willing to stand behind him in the complaint and share in the responsibility. In that respect I think there is a weakness in the act.

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend will recall that originally framed the act required only one person to initiate the complaint. That provision was amended, I think with the general if not, indeed, the unanimous consent of both Houses, to require the joint action of six citizens, it being held that one disgruntled individual or a discharged employee might make the application on entirely insufficient grounds. Indeed, if it appeared proper I could cite an instance in which this very thing has occurred. During the past few months an employee who had been discharged alleged all sorts of things which on investigation were found to be unwarranted. It was decided when the act was passed that six citizens should initiate the complaint before any business might be interfered with, perhaps unfairly; and the department has tried, and the minister will try, to conform to that view. It is not a question whether I personally believe that some other action should be taken; but generally speaking I think that this plan should be followed, especially in view of the fact that both Houses have endorsed it. One hon. member brought to the attention of the department a case in which it was thought that a combine existed, and after some correspondence and investigation he called upon the departmental officers and discussed the matter. Later on, hearing nothing further and thinking that possibly an application would be filed, the department inquired as to the result, receiving this reply:

Your favour 11th instant is received and contents noted.

In reply I am pleased to say that the mere threat of an investigation has had the desired effect, for the present at least; if repentance, and atonement, does not continue I will be pleased to let you know.

That is an indication of what was done in one case, and I think that the correspondence would disclose a number of similar cases in which inquiry for certain information has had the desired effect.

Mr. HUMPHREY: Is it possible to give the date of the investigation into the fruit situation in British Columbia?

Mr. MURDOCK: This investigation has taken place only in the past few weeks and is still proceeding.

Mr. HUMPHREY: What is the date of the clipping which has been referred to?

Mr. MURDOCK: It is dated March 8, 1924 and is taken from the Nelson Daily News.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the minister read it?

Mr. MURDOCK: It is as follows:

BAR WHOLESALE BROKER COMBINE WIGEN DEMANDS

Urges Federal Enactment to Prevent Interlocking of Interests

Seeks to Arouse Public Opinion

Wynndel Co-operative Head Claims Growers Being Given Over to Combine

To the Editor of The Daily News.

Sir,—This is an appeal through your valuable and much circulated paper (and others in sympathy with the fruit growers, that will copy it) to bring before the public the fundamental cause for the deplorable economic condition prevailing in our industry. And to pray for assistance from other commercial units, public bodies, boards of trades, and our provincials and Dominion governments to help us out of the entanglement with the two commercial combinations operating in our four western provinces, and known as the broker-wholesale combination, controlling the distribution of our fruit and vegetable products.

The true commercial condition that we are subjected to is this: That before we can use these fruit and vegetable wholesalers as our distributors, we must engage their brokers as our brokers, so that they legally can sell our products to themselves. And if we refuse to concede to their conditions they will get these requirements some where else, when a quantity of our products will have to go to waste.

A much similar condition prevails with the wheat and cereal farmers on the prairies, as their products must pass through the Winnipeg Grain exchange, a legalized gambling institution, for want of something more economic at present.

Farmers Discriminated Against

You men of commercial brain, as well as you law-makers for our provinces and our Dominion, must realize the deplorable state of affairs that such a condition creates, for in no other industry would the laws permit such a condition to prevail, and if they did, no other industry subjected to it could ever hope of surviving beyond its stage of infancy.

Had nature not endowed the agricultural class with such a tenacity of life, it would, as an industrial unit in the nation's organic life, have been extinguished long ago.

We now appeal in the name of the British Columbia fruit industry to all fair-minded citizens to assist us in bringing to the attention of the governments in each of the western provinces and at Ottawa, the immorality of permitting interlocking combination in restriction of legitimate merchandising of the farmer's products, such as prevail with the mutual brokers, operating for the so-called Nash houses and the Growers Sales Agency, operating for the so-called independent houses.

[Mr. Murdock.]

As long as these two combinations are legally permitted to operate there is no hope for the British Columbia fruit industry ever getting out of the path of bankruptcy, organized or unorganized. And the much hoped for co-operative movement of last spring only serves to hand the growers over to this combination in an organized form.

No Need to Buy Out

Mr. Howe of the Associated Growers says that it will take two and a half million dollars of the grower's money to get out of this broker-wholesale combination. Whereas we maintain that an order in council with the stroke of the pen, or the passing of an act by our federal government, would accomplish the same by making it unlawful for any wholesale house to own, control, or have any interest in any brokerage concern handling commodities of the same class as the respective wholesalers.

As farmers and fruit growers, we wish no quarrel with any legitimate wholesale house. On the contrary, we wish to foster a closer and more friendly relation along economic lines.

The wholesalers would not be human if they did not use to their own advantage the inquity of the law permitting such an interlocking combination to operate amongst us.

When we consider that the farming class constitute the Old Dad of the nation, providing the victuals for its inner sustenance, it becomes inconceivable that its family should subject him to bankruptcy, knowing, as they must, that it finally is bound to reflect upon themselves, causing suffering, if not social collapse.

On behalf of the British Columbia fruit and vegetable industry,

O. J. WIGEN.

Wynndel, B.C., March 6, 1924.

We have invited the gentleman to file an application with certain definitely alleged facts over the signature of six citizens. So far he has failed to do so. But regardless of his failure, we are undertaking as careful an inquiry as it is possible to make under the circumstances.

Mr. ARTHURS: The minister has given the names of two or three parties who were complained against. He might as well give us all of them.

Mr. MURDOCK: I do not think my hon. friend would really want me to do that.

Mr. ARTHURS: Then why single out one or two, such as the boot and shoe men and the plumbers?

Mr. MURDOCK: I have just read a newspaper article, but I did not give the names of any persons or indicate in what part of the country they were located. I think as much or more information than that has appeared in the press from time to time.

Mr. STEVENS: Would the minister inform the committee if the Combines Investigation Act would meet the case complained of, providing the necessary charge were properly filed?

Mr. MURDOCK: Personally, I am of opinion that a thorough investigation under the provisions of the act could be initiated if the charge were regularly laid; but it is a question whether the department should initiate such an investigation on the representations contained in this newspaper article. After we get further information from an officer of the department who is inquiring into the matter in Vancouver and elsewhere it may be considered that there is sufficient involved to warrant our asking council for the appointment of a commissioner to make an investigation.

Mr. STEVENS: Did the signer of that letter refuse to file any formal complaint when invited to do so?

Mr. MURDOCK: He has not definitely refused, but he has not yet laid a formal complaint.

Mr. STEVENS: The reason I ask is that the charge in the letter as published is of a very sweeping and a very damaging nature. I know nothing about it myself, whether it is even approximately correct or not. It does seem to me that an effort should be made, on the one hand, if the charge is well founded, to remedy the situation; on the other hand, if the charge is not well founded, to dispel from the public mind the idea that such a nefarious combination exists; and I think the minister should press for particulars of a definite character in connection with such a serious charge.

Mr. MURDOCK: I agree with my hon. friend entirely, and I would not have felt it proper to place before the House references to certain concerns but for the fact that the letter had been published in the press. I would not think it proper to subject a business man to the notoriety of having his business methods condemned broadcast unless the charge was well founded. I believe, with my hon. friend, that after such investigation as the department may make it should indicate in some measure what are its views on the facts alleged in this communication.

Mr. HUMPHREY: I am personally acquainted with the writer of the letter which the minister has just read. He is a thoroughly responsible and reliable man. For some time he has been head of a very flourishing co-operative association, and he is, I believe, in a position to give very valuable information regarding the conditions complained of. Although perhaps he may hesitate to file a declaration signed by six citizens, I think that on the strength of the charges he has made it would be well for the department to institute an investigation under the act.

Mr. MURDOCK: We wrote the gentleman on March 20, but he has not even favoured us with an acknowledgment. We proceeded to make inquiries concerning the statements contained in the published article and are continuing those inquiries. We proceeded to make other investigations on the basis of the statements made in the published article, and are continuing those investigations.

Mr. HUMPHREY: I take it that the department would eventually have some further progress to report, if investigations are still taking place.

Mr. MURDOCK: I hope so.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Graham moves that item 277 be amended by adding thereto the following words after the word "registrar":

—which amount may be paid notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act or in the Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. MURDOCK: That is necessary in accordance with a letter from the Auditor General dated March 13.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the minister read the letter?

Mr. MURDOCK: It is as follows:

Dear Sir,

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 12th instant respecting a proposed remuneration to Mr. Hereford, a permanent employee in the Labour department, for his services as registrar under the Combines Investigation Act.

Any remuneration that may be proposed for Mr. Hereford will need to be voted notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act or in the act to provide for the Investigation of Combines, Monopolies, Trusts and Mergers.

Section 22 of the Civil Service Act prohibits payment to any permanent employee of the Civil Service additional to his salary unless specially voted by parliament and section 4, Subsection 2 of the Combines Act provides that in case the registrar holds office in conjunction with any other office in the public service he shall not be entitled to any additional remuneration.

The item in the estimates should, I think, provide as follows:

"Combines Investigation Act including $1,000 for the registrar, which amount may be paid notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act or in the Combines Investigation Act."

Yours sincerely,

GEO. GONTHIER,
Auditor General.

Mr. STEVENS: What other duties does this gentleman perform, and what is his present salary in addition to the proposed $1,000?

Mr. MURDOCK: For the past several years he has been classified as an industrial engineer in the Department of Labour, and his salary for this fiscal year for that position is $3,615.

Mr. STEVENS: Are his duties as industrial engineer of a very important and onerous character? Do they occupy a large portion of his time?

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes, he is busy all the time.

Mr. STEVENS: Some people can keep very busy doing nothing, but I will be charitable in this case and assume he has some duties. Could the minister tell us what they are?

Mr. MURDOCK: He is a technical officer who can deal with many of the questions that come before the department. His services are valuable also on account of the fact that the Minister of Labour has charge of the Printing Bureau. His work as industrial engineer and his recommendations in connection with the installation of machinery and the activities of the Printing Bureau have been extremely valuable and have resulted in a considerable saving to the government.

Mr. STEVENS: How much of his time is now to be diverted from these highly important duties to the Combines Investigation Act?

Mr. MURDOCK: That depends on the number of cases that arise. The department has not been extremely busy with cases arising out of this act, but there is considerable correspondence requiring attention and involving work which on many occasions has to be done after hours. It was thought that it would be well if we could get a responsible officer of the department to carry out these extra duties, and that it would be proper to give him additional compensation for that work.

Mr. STEVENS: What was the total expenditure under this item last year?

Mr. MURDOCK: Practically nothing—to be exact, $82.24.

Mr. STEVENS: Would it not be possible to have this registrar's work done by some other official in the regular hours of employment without additional salary? The position is certainly a very modest one in spite of the rather distinguished title which he bears. "Registrar under the Combines Investigation Act" sounds imposing, I know, but the duties outlined by the minister do not seem to call for a very highly paid official. I am not objecting to this form of paying the official, of adding $1,000 or of taking that amount out of this vote for the purpose. But in view of the situation disclosed during the past year it does seem to me that one of the officers of the department could act as registrar without any additional salary. To add $1,000 to another salary of $3,600 for the purpose of administering an act that last year cost the country $82.24 seems to me to be carrying the thing a little too far.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should like to support that contention. This man has been relieved from certain duties that he had hitherto been performing, and I cannot see that there should be an additional salary. We are talking economy; why not begin along these lines?

Mr. MURDOCK: Very often my hon. friend talks for justice, and I am quite sure that when he comes to analyse this question he will view it in that light. This officer is doing just as much work in his regular position as he was doing before, but it was not considered advisable that we should go outside and appoint some other person to this particular position. We want to economize; we want to carry on with as little expense as possible, and that we are doing so is shown in the expenditure of only $82.24 out of $30,000 voted last year.

Mr. STEVENS: We want to prevent the minister from breaking his good record.

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend (Mr. Stevens) suggests that we may not have much to do during the next year. That may be so, but we must be in a position to deal promptly and effectively with any cases that arise or any complaints that are made under the act. I do not think that even my hon. friend from Centre Winnipeg or my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre would suggest that this is a situation that could be handled by any clerk in the department. It certainly deserves the attention of an employee possessed of more than ordinary capability and experience. That has been the thought at least, and I certainly hold that view. Now considering the actual weeks of investigation and research that have been entailed by these additional responsibilities thrown upon an officer classified by the Civil Service Commission as an industrial engineer, it does not seem to me unreasonable to ask that for the present fiscal year some additional compensation be given him. No additional compensation was paid from August last until March 31 of this year. The additional work and research was all undertaken free. I think it is only reasonable to suppose that the registrar is better fitted to go ahead and determine what should be investigated during the present year by reason of this research work which he has already done, and I would hope that it will not be indicated here that we are not prepared to pay reasonably for extra responsibilities, service or duty required by a classified government employee.

Mr. COOTE: I think if we are to have a registrar under the Combines Act, the House might very well vote the $1,000 that the minister asks for, but I would suggest to him that he might give this registrar some work to do, so that he can earn this extra salary. He might very well have him investigate, for instance, whether we have not a bankers' combine in this country that limits the rate of interest to depositors to 3 per cent. I do not think that he would have very much difficulty in proving that that is the case.

I would also suggest that the minister might have the registrar investigate and see whether we have not a millers' combine in this country. In support of my contention that we have a millers' combine let me just bring to the attention of the committee, that in Australia it is possible to buy a barrel of flour with the proceeds from four bushels and five pounds of wheat, whereas in Canada it takes the proceeds from six bushels and twenty-seven pounds of wheat to buy a barrel of flour I cannot understand why there should be that great difference in the spread between wheat and flour in Australia as compared with Canada. Flour is the basis of bread, which is the staff of life for all the people in this country, and I do not think it is right, when we have a registrar under the Combines Act, that he should allow this apparent combine to continue without making some investigation. In Alberta I believe you can buy flour that is made in the city of Calgary for the same price in any part of the province, so there would seem to be some combine among the millers when they are able to fix a price for the whole province in that way. They also fix the price in Montreal at the same level as in Toronto, and sometimes they fix the price in Great Britain lower than it costs right here in Ottawa. I would suggest to the minister that he might very well have the officer in his department make some investigation into the millers' combine in this country.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I must express my surprise that so little of this amount that was voted a year ago has been used by the minister or the officers of his department. I have a very vivid recollection of how the minister went up and down this country from one end to the other, railing against the trusts, mergers and combines that had everybody by the throat. We voted $30,000 a year ago, and the minister states to-night that of that amount it has not been necessary to expend more than $82.24 in order to settle this whole difficulty, and that now the coast is clear. I put some questions on the order paper during the session, and the answer with regard to this settlement that had been made was that it was not in the public interest to make known what had been done by this minister who has settled these combines once for all at a cost of $82.24 to the public. There is something so absolutely absurd about the whole thing that I am not at all surprised the minister should smile. We had evidence taken before a committee of this House a year ago with regard to the charges that were being made by the sugar refineries in this country. Sugar could be shipped over a long distance cheaper than it could be shipped to a point nearer to the refinery, and it was absolutely impossible for any grocers to buy except under those conditions. I brought this matter before parliament a year ago, but nothing was done. The minister, with all this $30,000 at his disposal, has not seen fit to take any action in that matter.

The hon. member for Macleod has just referred to a millers' combine in this country. I think the millers of this country are being discriminated against to-day in the discriminatory freight rates that are being charged against certain points. Only last week my attention was called to the rates for flour and wheat from certain points, which showed that there is some discrimination being shown, and the result is that we have mills idle in many parts of the country to-day simply because they cannot compete with mills in other districts that are receiving a preferential rate. But the minister thinks all we have to do is to vote this money without being given any more information than he has seen fit to give to the committee, and he is even asking for $1,000 additional to be paid to some officer in his department. Surely the minister does not want the country to believe that these mergers, trusts and combines that were throttling industry and robbing the people of this country have all faded away since his advent to office, without any action on his part. If they have, I think it is up to him to inform the committee just what he has done in that regard, instead of answering a question I put on the order paper as it has been answered. My question was this:

1. What prosecutions, if any, have been held under federal legislation against trusts, mergers, and combines in restraint of trade in Canada during each of the years 1922, 1923 and 1924?

2. What penalties were imposed during those years for the offences committed by any or all of said trusts, mergers and combines in restraint of trade?

That was answered on March 20, as follows:

1. During the year 1922 and until August 25, 1923, when a registrar was appointed under the Combines Investigation Act, 1923 the only federal legislation in effect under which prosecutions could be held was the Criminal Code (Sections 496, 497, 498). No prosecutions were held under this Statute. Under the Combines Investigation Act, 1923 no prosecutions have taken place, though complaints informally laid have been investigated with results which have avoided the necessity of prosecution.

2. Answered by above.

I put another question on the order paper, with reference to the Combines Investigation Act, as follows:

1. What complaints were laid and by whom?

2. Against what persons, companies or corporations were such complaints laid?

The anwer was:

It is not in the interest of the public to give the information requested.

Does the minister want the members of this House to understand that if there are combines of that kind, and there are, the people should not know anything about them? Is it only the minister himself and those in the department who are entitled to know where these combines are located, and what means have been adopted in order to put an end to them? I do not think there is much evidence so far as the people generally are concerned that the minister has been active in this respect because, in so far as I can see, the very combine referred to by the member for Macleod (Mr Coote) is in operation. To-day we have vacant mills in the central part of Ontario that cannot be disposed of by reason of the discrimination that is shown in regard to rates. We have the sugar combine to which I referred which compels the grocer to pay those excessive rates. That grocer cannot have sugar shipped to him without purchasing from the wholesale grocers at a point distant from his place of business. He cannot purchase by the carload lot and have it shipped to him direct; he must go to the wholesale grocer at a greater distance. These are some things that the people are aware of. The minister ought to be frank and let us know in what respect he has relieved the people from the pressure that has been exercised by these combines.

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend I am sure knows what is largely, or most often, the cause of combines, I hope this government is going somewhat in the direction of removing the cause and that it will move further in that direction. My judgment is that protection which has been improperly in effect in Canada has permitted some of the combines to grow, and exist and flourish; and if we can remove from Canadian business improper protection that only contemplates the protection of certain special favoured individuals we will remove combines that affect the welfare of producers and consumers largely from the realm of possibility. That is my opinion.

Now as regards my hon. friend's suggestion. I understood from the questions he placed on the order paper, and I understand now, that he would like me to give the name, and date and place of all the investigations, or inquiries, that have been made. Well, the two Houses of Parliament indicated that possibly that would not be the proper thing to do. The law itself contemplates that shall not be done unless real cause and necessity for it is shown. While those instructions are in effect I do not think it would be fair for me to say that we investigated Mr. Jones at such a place because it was alleged that he was conducting, or alleged to be conducting a combine in the plumbing trade, or Mr. Somebody else at another place because he was conducting, or alleged to be conducting, a combine in the boot and shoe industry. It would not be fair to do that and I think the discussion last year in both Houses indicated this view. I can assure my hon. friend that if he and the hon. member for Macleod (Mr Coote),—knowing all these facts as to the millers' combine that they have talked about—will touch the pen, and get sufficient other citizens of Canada to do the same, we will initiate an investigation under the Combines Investigation Act, and I personally will endeavour to see that we go to the full limit by investigation to secure all the facts possible; but until someone makes the application contemplated by the law I shall have to abide by the instructions of both Houses of Parliament as understood and not appear to harass business unduly, but act only as the result of securing complaint as the law requires over the signature of six citizens. Now, whether that is right or wrong it is the position that I contend the minister in charge of the department should take in view of the instructions of both Houses when this law was passed.

Mr. STEVENS: It is rather difficult to allow to go unchallenged the little political byplay that the minister indulged in in the early part of his remarks He says that the government have gone in the right direction towards removing the cause of combines in this country by dealing with this iniquitous thing known as protection. Will the minister say that the reduction of the duty on farm implements, for instance, is proof that there was a combine in restraint of trade—an unreasonable combine such as he referred to before his election to this House, and such as is contemplated in this act? Will he say such a combine existed up to the time this budget came down, and that the budget by the reduction of these duties dealt with that iniquitous combine?

Mr. MURDOCK: I am not saying so.

Mr. STEVENS: I am putting a logical interpretation upon the minister's argument. If the minister does not say that, if he cannot claim that, then his argument a moment ago is senseless, meaningless, and pointless.

Mr. MURDOCK: Just a moment—

Mr. STEVENS: Will the minister recall for a moment those vociferous denunciations of that terrible cotton combine—

An hon. MEMBER: Textiles.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, of the Canadian Cottons and Dominion Textiles, a combine that was grinding the very faces of the poor in the mud according to the minister's statements, in one of his numerous speeches before the election. He said the government has removed all these things because the other day he told the country that there is no combine in Canada. He said if you searched the country from the east to the west, from Halifax to Vancouver, there was no combine in Canada.

Mr. MURDOCK: Neither the minister nor any officer of his department made any such statement. I want to challenge that now because my hon. friend and others have used that too often; you cannot get away with it. There are combines in Canada detrimental to the public interest and they should be dealt with.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister now comes forward and makes these statements. He is Minister of Labour, administering the Combines Investigation Act on which last year he spent $82.24, out of $30,000 that parliament gave him for the purpose, and he declares to-night that there are combines in Canada that ought to be dealt with. Well, why does he not deal with them? Has he not the power under the Combines Investigation Act? He spent an hour a little while ago—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. STEVENS: It seemed to me that he spoke almost for an hour. However, previous to a few moments ago he indulged for about an hour—I think I have got it straight now—in a long dissertation, assuring the committee that after careful inquiry no combine was found; that a certain individual wrote him a letter, and that he looked into it and challenged the individual who made the complaint. Now he turns to the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) and says "Put your finger to pen, and get six others to put their fingers to pen and look out for what I will do." If the minister himself knows of combines why does he not himself put a finger to pen? Has he not sufficient power? Can the minister not get six of his friends to put their fingers to pen and make a charge against these combines that he knows to exist, that ought to be suppressed, that ought to be dealt with? The minister comes before parliament as a minister of the Crown and deliberately charges that he knows of combines that exist, that ought to be suppressed. Where are they? We have a right to know. That surely is not a secret sacred in the mind of my hon. friend. Has parliament no right to know where combines exist, where the minister knows that fact and how they ought, in the interest of public safety and having regard to public welfare, to be suppressed? Is parliament not entitled to know that? The minister has indulged in heroics in this chamber to-night. He indulged in heroics in a speech which, perhaps I have exaggerated a little. I admit that, but sometimes we have to exaggerate in order to stir the minister up, as I have succeeded in doing.

Mr. MURDOCK: I am going to repeat it in a minute.

Mr. STEVENS: I would be surprised if he did not repeat it in spite of his denunciations to-night.

Mr. MURDOCK: I will give day and date and include some of my hon. friend's friends in it.

Mr. STEVENS: But if the minister is going to make charges on the floor of this House and say in one breath that there are no combines, that they vanished simply because he got his act passed—that is one of the statements that he made to the public—

Mr. MURDOCK: Not at all. I must tell the hon. gentleman that he is making a gross misstatement. I said no such thing. I shall be glad if the hon. gentleman will simply stick to the facts.

Mr. STEVENS: I have learned from experience that it is very difficult to put any interpretation upon the minister's remarks, because he invariably denies or twists his way out of them. Any one who has read any of his speeches or who has followed, in the slightest measure, in the most casual way, his speeches, knows perfectly well that he has time and time again charged that there are combines in Canada. He charges that to-night, and yet, although he pleaded with the people to let him once get into office and what he would not do with those combines was not worth talking about, in spite of two and one-half years in office, he has not discovered any. In all his reports to-night of incident after incident he, with a good deal of heroics and self-complacency, boasted that these persons who had charged or indicated that combines existed had failed to make good their charges. Now he comes before parliament and what we are dealing with particularly is the voting to an official who is already getting $3,600, or $1,000 additional salary, for the purpose of administering an act the expenditure of which last year was $82.24. In my estimation, the official who administered this act last year, who has been receiving $3,600, if he is administering this act, is not performing the duties that he was performing previously. I think that is a fair deduction to make. He certainly is not down in the Printing Bureau shifting printing machinery around and reorganizing the Printing Bureau; he is not advising the minister on that work—what was it the minister said?—he is reading and studying the records of other investigations and so on in order to fit himself for this job. A little less of these heroics, a little more common sense, a little more of performance and fewer charges would be more becoming to the minister.

Mr. MURDOCK: From which source? I said and I repeat that, in my judgment, there are in Canada combines which should be investigated. I am substantiated in that view to-night by two hon. gentlemen who named them in this House. I think there may be others. I said something about combines and monopolies in the textile trade a few years ago. I think that could have been proven and I think it could be proven yet. A committee of this House, if my hon. friend will recall, with a member of this government sitting as chairman, investigated certain textile and other industries and found a percentage of profit brought about directly as a result of protection, that was absurd and unfair to the people of Canada. In 1920, when an investigation into the textile trade was instituted by a questionnaire sent out to all concerns manufacturing textiles in Canada, what was the result? At once the textile branch of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association came to their friends in Ottawa and appealed to them, the cabinet with which my hon. friend was connected, to relieve them from being required to fill out that questionnaire. With what result? On the 27th January, 1920, they got a draft recommendation to council prepared relieving them from filling out those questionnaires, and on the 28th January the cabinet with which the hon. member was connected were challenged as to their right to relieve the textile manufacturers from filling out this questionnaire. With what result? They told the textile manufacturers that they should comply with the order of the board and fill out the questionnaire. When the questionnaires were turned in, what was the result? Profits of two, three, yes, and more than three hundred per cent were shown on the business of some of these textile manufacturers that you have been hearing tales of woe about from my hon. friends across the aisle during the past two or three years. Those profits were shown over their own signatures in a sworn statement, and my hon. friend's friends took care to see that, even though that was shown, there would be no interference with the business that they were conducting; that no action would be taken to prevent a recurrence of that, because they just proceeded to make moribund, to put out of business, a board which was supposed to investigate and to deal under the law with those things to which I have referred. If my hon. friend wants information and data, why does he not insist on an investigation? These facts are not too old and too cold, and the data is not too much out of date to be looked into thoroughly in order that it may be found out whether the protection of the textile manufacturers was not simply taking unfair and indecent profits from the people of Canada for several years. Yet listen to the tale of woe that we heard last year about some of these concerns being put out of business, and that we have heard even during the present year. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre should realize that there is a long story to this, and I am personally willing to go into the whole story. But again I say to my hon. friend that even though holding the opinion that there are still in Canada combines that should be investigated, I know that parliament indicated last year the view that investigations should be initiated by six citizens of the age of twenty-one years. The view was, as I understand it, that there was to be no undue investigation or possibly undue interference that might develop later as being unfair to some concerns. We are trying to follow that policy or what we regard as the instructions of parliament. Personally, I think it should be changed. I think an investigation might be very properly instituted on the signed statement of one citizen of Canada.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: My hon. friend is a member of the government and the government has control. I would ask him, what did he do in regard to Sir Charles Gordon whom he threatened to have gaoled when he was railing against trusts and mergers?

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend once again is inaccurate; I have never in any speech in my life referred personally to Sir Charles Gordon. I do not think my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) will think it improper for me to call his attention to his own statement last year:

> Why there would be no difficulty at any time, anywhere, day or night, summer or winter, to get six citizens of Canada to complain against some institution. I do not say ignorant people, but uninformed people are very prone to complain of businesses or institutions wherever they may be. Six uninformed, irresponsible individuals may ask for an investigation. The registrar proceeds to investigate. He calls for all documents, contracts, books and so forth of the company. He can step into the office, examine into prices, obtain any information he demands. All that he asks for must be produced; the concern which is the subject of inquiry has no recourse but to give up everything that is demanded pertaining to the secrets of its business. I submit that one rival desiring to get information regarding another rival's business, perhaps more successful than his own, perhaps underselling him on the market, would find it the simplest thing in the world to get that information through such an institution as this.

It is that and similar representations made by hon. members of this House that lead me to the belief that we should go very carefully, and know our ground thoroughly, before undertaking an investigation that might later prove altogether unwarranted. That is the reason, and the only reason, why some of the institutions which I think should be further investigated have not been inquired into and will not be inquired into, so far as I am concerned, under existing instructions and conditions and with the law as I see it.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend undoubtedly has in mind the Board of Commerce Commission of which he was a very proud member when he refers to this application of the textiles for relief from answering a certain questionnaire. The committee ought to observe; in justice to the government which the minister condemns so vigorously, that no such relief was given to the textiles; and the minister of course is taking a great deal of credit to himself for that. Now, this whole quarrel, if I might refer to the matter in that way, between my hon. friend, other members of the Board of Commerce, and the preceding government, regarding the Board of Commerce and the acts controlling it, is an old quarrel which the minister very frequently resorts to when he wants to escape an awkward dilemma. He tells the House that he personally as a member of the Board of Commerce was convinced, and so convinced that he vigorously protested against the government of the day taking action, that certain combines existed during the year 1920, which was the last year of the preceding government, which was defeated in 1921. The minister personally knows all that; yet he has been in office two and a half years and has not given the slightest indication, either before the passing of this act or since, that it ever has been his intention to make any investigation. He said to the House to-night, however, that this government had discovered a way to cure the very source of these evils, the means being to reduce and remove the protection on these various industries. Well, I do not think that the House has noticed very many reductions in the duties on cottons and textiles; there has been absolutely no indication of such reductions. I am not asking the government to make any reductions, but I do ask both the government and the minister to be consistent in their arguments. The minister condemns his opponents because they did not remove the protection on these industries, under which these combines grew up; but although he has been over two and a half years in office he and his colleagues have made no attempt to apply that remedy. Why? Largely because they are convinced that there is absolutely nothing in the minister's argument; there is no other explanation for it. I venture to say that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) will scarcely corroborate what the Minister of Labour has said to-night.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I would not corroborate what the hon. gentleman is saying now.

Mr. STEVENS: Will he corroborate the statement of his colleague?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am not going to corroborate the statement of the hon. member that there was no reduction on textiles. There was a reduction under the British preference.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, of 2½ per cent.

Mr. MURDOCK: Which we are told was enough to put half of them out of business.

Mr. STEVENS: Let me ask the minister, has he fully dealt with the combines?

Mr. MURDOCK: No, by no means.

Mr. STEVENS: Then we may expect action from the minister in the future.

Mr. MURDOCK: I hope you will get it.

Mr. STEVENS: Let me say in regard to the quotation from my speech, which the minister has read to the committee, that I take exactly the same position now as I did then, absolutely. I say that no investigation should rest upon the basis of a single complaint, as was originally intended in the act before it was amended in accordance with the present provision. I am satisfied that with the signed statement of six or more responsible citizens an investigation, under the act as amended, is warrantable.

Mr. MURDOCK: And do you not think that such is the plan which the department should follow?

Mr. STEVENS: In so far as the public is concerned, yes. But I do not think that the minister can shield himself behind that provision so far as he himself is concerned.

Mr. MURDOCK: Is the minister's opinion worth more than that of any other citizen?

Mr. STEVENS: His opinion as the opinion of the Minister of Labour should be worth more than that of a private citizen, yes. The Minister of Labour has all the information to hand; he has all the facilities available to secure that information; and his opinion ought certainly to be worth more than that of a private citizen who has no such means of getting at the facts.

Mr. COOTE: In view of some of the remarks that have been made since I spoke before, I want to give to the minister the authority which I had for my statement regarding the spread between wheat and flour. In the Commercial Intelligence Journal of April 19, 1924, there appears at page 485 an article regarding Australian commercial conditions:

> Wheat is still quoted at 4s. 7d. per bushel and flour at about £9 10s. per ton in 150-pound sacks, both free on board at Australian ports.

That works out at $1.10 per bushel for wheat and $4.48 per barrel for flour, 196 pounds to the barrel. The statistics in regard to Canadian prices are found in the Monthly Bulletin of Agricultural Statistics for the month of January, at page 57. It will be found there that flour is quoted at Winnipeg at $6 a barrel, while wheat is quoted in the same bulletin, at Winnipeg, No. 1, at 93¼ cents per bushel. These figures show that it takes 6 bushels, of 27 pounds, of No. 1 wheat to purchase a barrel of flour at Winnipeg, while in Australia it takes 4 bushels and 5 pounds.

Mr. LEWIS: Is the minister aware that last year a special parliamentary committee on Agriculture investigated ocean freight rates, and on April 23, 1923, they brought in their fourth interim report, which reads as follows:

> Your committee are of the opinion that upon the regular steamship lines trading from Canadian ports the price of transportation service is determined neither by the law of supply and demand nor on the basis of cost plus a reasonable profit, but that a combine exists among the various shipping companies, which combine is known as the North Atlantic and U. K. Conference Eastward-bound.

As this committee was composed of nineteen members of this House, their number should at least be sufficient to demonstrate to the minister that a combine does exist. Under the circumstances I wonder if the government intends to do anything.

Mr. MURDOCK: That particular question would come under another act. As a matter of fact I think it is being investigated at the present time.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): By whom is the investigation being carried on?

Mr. MURDOCK: By persons who are qualified to investigate. I do not think it would be advisable for me to say who are engaged in the work.

Mr. SPENCER: What department of the government has the work in charge?

Mr. MURDOCK: That would be more closely connected with the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. LEWIS: It would be true to say that the government has this matter under consideration at all events?

Mr. MURDOCK: I think it is absolutely correct to say so.

Mr. LEWIS: And that an investigation is taking place?

Mr. MURDOCK: I understand so.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): How long are these investigations to continue before the public may expect some action to be taken?

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member's question is not in order under this particular vote, the minister having stated that the matter referred to is under the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): We are discussing combines.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. gentleman's question was not directed to combines.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I wonder how long the minister will consider the nature of these combines before taking action against them. Complaints have been registered in the press and by members on this side and a number of investigations have been held, yet we find the cattle and other freight rates still rising.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Chairman, I might advise the committee that the discrimination existing against Canadian products by the North Atlantic Conference has been corrected in part. We are following up other cases of discrimination.

Mr. STEVENS: Probably this will answer my hon. friend's question. Is the British Imperial Shipping Committee, presided over by Sir Halford Mackinder, which was recently in Canada, dealing with this discrimination?

Mr. ROBB: No; but as the result of our representations they are looking into certain complaints.

Mr. STEVENS: That is in connection with the North Atlantic shipping rates?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. MILNE: I understand that a committee investigated a shipping combine on the Great Lakes last season, and that the charges were substantiated. Is it the intention of the government to prosecute the offenders?

Mr. MURDOCK: I cannot advise my hon. friend just what the government intend to do further in that matter.

Mr. LEWIS: Will the minister tell us just how far-reaching the Combines Act is? Does it simply cover industries and not ocean freight rates?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It does not reach anywhere.

Mr. MURDOCK: No, it would not have anything to do with freight rates.

Mr. LEWIS: With ocean freight rates?

Mr. MURDOCK: No, it would have nothing to do with ocean freight rates. The interpretation clause of the Combines Act reads as follows:

> The expression "combine" in this act shall be deemed to have reference to such combines immediately hereinafter defined as have operated or are likely to operate to the detriment of or against the interest of the public, whether consumers, producers or others; and limited as aforesaid, the expression as used in this act shall be deemed to include (1) mergers, trusts and monopolies so-called—
> (3) any actual or tacit contract, agreement, arrangement, or combination which has or is designed to have the effect of (i) limiting facilities for transporting, producing, manufacturing, supplying, storing or dealing; or (ii) preventing, limiting or lessening manufacture or production; or (iii) fixing a common price or a resale price, or a common rental, or a common cost of storage or transportation.

It has not even been assumed by the Labour department that the Combines Investigation Act would cover an investigation of ocean or lake steamship rates.

Mr. GARDINER: A few minutes ago the minister stated that some of the textile companies were making enormous profits.

Mr. MURDOCK: I know the hon. gentleman does not intend to misquote me. I said that in 1920 the questionnaires filled out by the textile company indicated that they had made profits higher than 300 per cent.

Mr. GARDINER: That is, you did not refer to the same companies as to-day making enormous profits?

Mr. MURDOCK: There is a very great difference between the profits the textile companies were making in 1919-20 and the profits they are making to-day. Many hon. members tell us that the textile companies to-day have been put out of business by the 2½ British preference of last year.

Mr. MILNE: Does not the minister consider a combine on the Great Lakes as detrimental to the public interest as any combine that could be imagined?

Mr. MURDOCK: I would say yes, probably a good deal more so.

Mr. MILNE: Why should not they be included in the Combines Act?

Mr. MURDOCK: They have been held to come under the Trade and Commerce department. As a matter of fact, an investigation was held under the direction of that department and a report made.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The minister has informed the committee that the protection enjoyed by those trusts, mergers and combines is responsible for the whole trouble we have here.

Mr. MURDOCK: The minister did not say any such thing—certainly not in that way.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The minister attributed the existence of trusts, mergers and combines to the protection which they are to-day enjoying.

Mr. MURDOCK: Largely as the result of unfair protection.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: In the debate on the Address and in the debate on the budget the tariff was discussed, and now the Minister of Labour has interjected it into his estimates as well. It reminds me somewhat of certain gentlemen down in the Maritime provinces, who shortly after the Liberal government came into power in 1896 referred to the promises which they had made and to their unfulfilment in these words:

> We promised them freedom from tariffs,
> We promised them freedom from toil,
> We promised to break up the robber combines for the tiller of the soil;
> We have helped our friends wherever we could,
> And we have made it rough for our foes,
> But we have saddled the same old robber combines on our Lady of the Snows.

I think this very clearly shows how active the minister has been. He claims that while a member of the Board of Commerce he obtained an intimate knowledge of conditions prevailing at that time. It is rather remarkable that when put in a position of power and authority he has done absolutely nothing to check combines, mergers and trusts. Of the $30,000 that was voted a year ago he has spent only $82.24, and he comes back to-day and asks this House to vote him another $20,000 without giving us any assurance that anything is going to be done to these combines. "No," he said; "the remedy depends on reducing the tariff or removing it entirely." That is really the only remedy he has for ridding the country of the trusts, mergers and combines which have saddled themselves upon us during the last few years. It has been pointed out to him that he has referred to certain research work carried on by his department. Surely if his department has all this intimate knowledge as to these leeches which are sucking the lifeblood from Canadian industry, he is in a position to cure the evil. Surely it is not necessary for him to sit back in his seat and say: "Why, the requisite application over the signatures of six citizens has not come to the department asking for such an investigation." That was not the intention of the act. With the officers of his department it is his duty to investigate, and the research work to which he has been referring ought alone to have placed at his disposal the necessary information—and he has told the committee that he has the information—therefore I think he has been recreant in his duty as minister in not taking steps to put a stop to this condition of affairs. Conditions are not the best in this country, and if the condition exists that the minister acknowledges, then it is the duty of the government to see that the people are afforded relief from it.

[Mr. Murdock.]

Mr. MILNE: There is no doubt about this matter of a combine on the Great Lakes, and I think the minister should give us some assurance that something will be done. I am satisfied, and I think others are too, that this condition still exists on the Great Lakes. Perhaps they are not quite as bold as they were before the investigation, but I suppose when the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb) comes before us with his estimates he will say that it was a matter for the attention of the Department of Labour. I think we should have some definite statement in this regard.

Mr. MURDOCK: That combine on the Great Lakes was regarded as sufficiently important to call for the appointment of a special royal commission to investigate and report.

Mr. COOTE: Was that commission not appointed before we had the Combines Investigation Act?

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes. I think the report of the commission was in before last August.

Mr. SPENCER: To what extent did the government carry out the recommendations of the commission?

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend will have to ask some other member of the government for that information. I suggest that he make inquiry of the Minister of Trade and Commerce when he comes on with his estimates. The matter was under his direction.

ATLANTIC PORTS AND FISHERMEN

Mr. LADNER:

1. Has the government by order in council or otherwise closed the Atlantic ports of Canada to the use of fishermen who come from or are citizens of the United States and carry on their business from that country and who are engaged in fishing in Canadian waters, or waters adjacent to Canada?

2. Is it the intention of the government to take similar action with respect to the Canadian ports on the Pacific coast?

3. If the government does not intend so to do what are the reasons for such a decision?

4. Are salmon trollers, who are citizens of or carry on business from the United States, allowed to use the ports of Canada on the Pacific coast?

5. If not, why are not halibut fishermen who are citizens of and carry on business from the United States also refused the use of Canadian ports on the Pacific coast?

6. Does the government intend to take any action with respect to the use of Canadian ports by the said halibut fishermen?

Hon. Mr. CARDIN:

1. Under the Treaty of 1818 inhabitants of the United States are allowed to enter Canadian ports for wood, water, shelter, and repairs only, except on a specified portion of the Atlantic coast where they have the liberty of fishing in common with British fishermen. Chapter 47 of the Revised Statutes of Canada provides that the Governor in Council may authorize the issuing of licenses to United States fishing vessels on the Atlantic coast conferring additional privileges on them; but as no such authority has been granted for the present year, United States fishermen are restricted to their privileges under the Treaty of 1818.

2. Not at present.

3. The conditions existing on the Pacific coast are different from those on the Atlantic.

4. No.

5. The order in council authorizing the special privileges on the Pacific coast contemplates the issuing of the licenses to United States vessels and not to trolling boats. Such licenses would give the United States trolling boats on most portions of the coast an unfair advantage over Canadian trollers.

6. Matter under consideration.

GEORGE WILSON

Mr. DOUCET:

1. Why is the lighthouse keeper of Mistook wharf at Delisle, in the electoral district of Chicoutimi-Saguenay, Quebec, George Wilson, a resident of the city of Montreal?

2. By whom was he recommended?

3. Does the government intend to name a resident of the locality for the position?

Hon. Mr. CARDIN:

1. No information. He lives in the neighbourhood of the lights during the season of navigation. No check is kept on his movements when his services are not required.

2. He was appointed by the Civil Service Commission as a result of local competition.

3. If a vacancy occurs the Civil Service Commission will doubtless appoint a resident of the locality.

TORONTO VIADUCT

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has a report been received by the government from Sir Henry Thornton strongly recommending the carrying out of the contract for the construction of a railway viaduct at Toronto and asking for an immediate decision by the government and for funds and for power to immediately proceed with the work?

2. What is the exact terms of the recommendation in question?

3. What action has been taken or will be taken by the government?

4. Will a copy of the reply of the government be laid on the Table of the House, and when?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM: In reference to the question:

Has a report been received by the government from Sir Henry Thornton . . . What is the exact terms of the recommendation in question?

The information was laid on the Table at the request of the hon. member on May 1. As to the question:

What action has been taken or will be taken by the government?

I answer: Under consideration. In regard to the fourth query:

Will a copy of the reply of the government be laid on the Table of the House, and when?

A copy of the reply to the Minister of Railways is laid on the Table now:

May 14th, 1924.

Dear Sir HENRY THORNTON:

I understand the contents of the letter written me by you on April 9th re the Toronto viaduct have been given out in Toronto. I find I cannot lay my hand on copy of any reply sent you but there certainly should have been an acknowledgment, at least. On the day after the receipt of your letter, if I mistake not, a large deputation from the city of Toronto waited on the government and expressed their views from every angle. The Prime Minister reviewed at length the conditions. Since that date, however, conditions have been somewhat changed possibly by the fact that it has come to my notice the Harbour Commission has entered action against the railways and the city of Toronto.

At the present moment I am awaiting a full statement of the case, legally and otherwise, from the Canadian National Railways. When that is received, consideration will be given by the government as to the next step to be taken.

Yours sincerely,

GEO. P. GRAHAM.

Sir HENRY THORNTON, K.B.E., President,
Canadian National Railways,
Montreal, Que.

CANADA AND THE BRITISH BUDGET

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Have any representations been made to His Majesty's government of Great Britain regarding the British preference and the damage done to Canada from its withdrawal or part of it as per the recent British budget?

2. What representations, if any, were made to the British government on the question so as to protect Canada's interests, and what action does the government propose to take in the matter?

3. What damage has been done to Canadian industries in the new budget re the British preference, and what communications, if any, have been received or made by the government on the question?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think I should draw the attention of the House to the character of this question. The first clause reads:

Have any representations been made to His Majesty's government of Great Britain regarding the British preference and the damage done to Canada from its withdrawal or part of it as per the recent British budget?

The last clause is:

What damage has been done to Canadian industries in the new budget re the British preference, and what communications, if any, have been received or named by the government on the question?

These two questions contradict each other. I do not think that as at present drafted the question is in proper form to present to the House: It would involve a reflection by one government upon another within the British Empire. I think it should be withdrawn.

Mr. GRAHAM: And the opinion of one government might not be the opinion of another.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The question might be re-drafted and presented in more acceptable form.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

MOTION FOR PRODUCTION OF PAPERS

Hon. Mr. STEVENS moved:

For a copy of all reports received from the officer commanding the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, Vancouver, regarding the violation of the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, during the years 1920 to 1924, inclusive.

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE: I regret to be obliged again to object to the production of these papers. The order calls for information which is of a confidential character and which it would be subversive of public interest to disclose. Apart from these general reports, monthly reports are received from the officer commanding the police describing the work done in connection with the enforcement of the Narcotic Drug Act. Even these are of a confidential nature. But I am quite willing to let my hon. friend use such files as he thinks contain information which he would like to have. I must, however, oppose the motion for the production of these papers.

Mr. STEVENS: All I ask is for the production of such records as it is proper to produce.

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried as amended.

PRIVILEGE—MR. GARLAND (Bow River)

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I was absent yesterday when the House met, having to keep an important appointment. However, my attention has been called to some remarks by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Fournier), who read from the Ottawa Journal the following words:

Mr. Fournier, of Bellechasse, absent from House (though in Ottawa) without a pair.

Then he said:

Thursday morning I had an urgent call to go out of town. I made arrangements to leave Friday morning at 6.55, and I kept my engagement. Had it not been for some of my hon. friends, particularly the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland), I would have had ample time to vote and my vote would have been recorded as in favour of the budget.

I must respectfully decline, Mr. Speaker, to allow the hon. member to use my name under these circumstances as an excuse for his not being present and voting. It was through no desire of my own that I was compelled to speak at that late hour, but I exercised my undoubted privilege in so doing. May I suggest that had the hon. member arranged a pair all this trouble would have been avoided?

PRIVILEGE—HON. MR. BUREAU

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. JACQUES BUREAU (Minister of Customs and Excise): Mr. Speaker, since my

hon. friend from Bow River (Mr. Garland) has called attention to the matter, I see something quoted in Hansard about the "Liberal revolt," in which my name is mentioned as being one of the rebels. I am not a rebel and never have been. A man must be lacking something to insinuate that I was opposed to the budget. I took my seat in the evening and stayed for some time, but eventually, being sick and tired, I went home to bed. I was sure the budget would carry by the biggest majority given to any budget in the history of the country.

TORONTO VIADUCT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (North Toronto): The reply to-day of the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) and his answer to-day to question No. 15 on the same subject are technically not correct. The production of papers shows that Sir Henry Thornton wrote on April 9, last, forwarding a strong legal opinion of Mr. Gerald Ruel, chief counsel for the Canadian National Railways, that the system is by contract liable legally and every other way for this contract, and strongly urging action and funds to carry it out, and urging immediate consideration. The answer to question No. 15 is wrong also because the litigation mentioned has been contemplated for years and was started many weeks before the recent deputation was here. I would like to find out from the minister when he will give the House a definite answer and what will be done.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals): The only letter the Minister of Railways received from Sir Henry Thornton on this matter was laid on the Table on the first of May at the request of my hon. friend.

HECTOR CELEBRATION

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. ALEXANDRE J. DOUCET (Kent, N.B.): Mr. Speaker, with reference to order of the House No. 140 stating:

> That the proper officers do lay before this House a return showing the detailed expenditure of the money voted by parliament of Canada at the last session for the Hector celebration at Pictou, Nova-Scotia.

The answer received yesterday was:

> I have the honour to inform you that so far as the Department of National Defence is concerned we have no information.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I submit that when the House—

[Mr. Bureau.]

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member cannot discuss the answer to a question. His proper course is to put another question.

Mr. DOUCET: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister when he will take steps to secure the information asked for by order of this House?

Hon. E. M. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence): The payment referred to had no connection with the Department of National Defence, but with the Department of Finance. The answer given is absolutely correct so far as my department is concerned.

GREAT LAKES SHIPPING COMBINE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. L. P. BANCROFT (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I would ask if the government, in view of the suspicion that traffic on the Great Lakes is still controlled by a combine, intends to suspend the coastal laws in an endeavour to meet the situation?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The matter has not been considered as yet. I undertake to say that it will be considered.

IMMIGRATION

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. FRANK S. CAHILL (Pontiac): Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand a despatch which appeared in the Ottawa Journal this morning and in which the Duke of Connaught is reported as having said in London on the 20th instant:

> I often regret the large number of foreigners from Slav and Eastern European countries emigrating to Canada. What we would like to have in western Canada is English, Norwegian and Swedish people, who make the best immigrants and, coming from civilized countries, are accustomed to our habits.

I wish to ask the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Robb) if he can devise some means of informing public men in England that immigration into Canada is a Canadian question and should be dealt with in Canada.

Mr. ROBB: I have not read the article referred to. The government have been endeavouring to increase the flow of British immigrants to Canada, and, following that policy, have arranged for preferential rates from the British Isles to Canada. Regarding the latter part of my hon. friend's question, perhaps at the same time I might advise some Canadians that it is the British government's business to manage affairs in Great Britain.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Finance) moved that the House go again into committee on the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for the superannuation of civil servants, to provide for contributions by civil servants to the consolidated revenue fund, to provide for payment out of the consolidated revenue fund to civil servants and to the widows and children of deceased civil servants of superannuation allowances or gratuities, and to provide for the making of regulations by the Governor in Council to give effect to the terms of the said measure.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Explain.

Mr. ROBB: The bill to be introduced will be based upon the recommendations of a special committee that had this matter under consideration at the last session of parliament. Hon. members will recall that that committee reported to the House on the 22nd of June last year, too late for consideration of the report at that session. On that occasion the Prime Minister promised that consideration would be given to the matter this session. We had hoped to bring down the bill a little earlier, but owing to the debate on the budget it has been delayed. It is now proposed that after the bill is introduced it shall be referred, with the concurrence of the House, to a special committee, possibly the same committee that considered the matter at the last session.

When the bill was first printed it was intended that it should come into force on the 1st of July this year, but as it has been somewhat delayed the committee may in their judgment change the date. That will be a matter for further consideration. I submit that the whole matter might very well be left to the committee.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): May I ask the minister whether the Calder Act is to be extended for another year? That is important in view of the fact that under this measure civil servants will be called upon to select either one plan or the other. The time is so short now that I think the Calder Act should be extended for another year.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Let this one pass first.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): Has any decision been arrived at on the subject?

Mr. ROBB: It has been suggested that after we have the report of the committee the Calder Act might be extended so as to carry on a little further. We will leave it to the committee to determine.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee on the resolution, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister said a moment ago that he was going to leave it to the committee to decide whether or not the Calder Act should be extended?

Mr. ROBB: No, I think my hon. friend misunderstood me. I said that the committee might consider it and that when we had their report we could discuss whether it was advisable to defer the Calder Act or to set forward the date upon which this act should come into force—perhaps provide that it should come into force the day following the expiration of the Calder Act; we might extend the Calder Act for six months or a year. We shall be able to determine that after the committee have considered the whole measure. We will see what progress the committee make and then the government will take the responsibility of fixing the date.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Can the minister give us the information that was asked for when we were previously in committee on this resolution, namely what is expected to be the annual cost to the country, or say the average cost for the first five years and the anticipated cost for the second five, or such periods as those for which the minister may have the information systematized?

Mr. ROBB: As my right hon. friend knows, the cost to new entrants will be 5 per cent of the payroll; the civil servants pay 5 per cent and the government pay 5 per cent, so it is impossible to determine exactly what the cost will be without knowing how many will transfer. It is estimated that if all transfer, the cost to the government will be about $1,435,000 a year in respect of future service.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That would be the government's contribution to the fund?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That $1,435,000 must be 5 per cent of the present civil service salary total?

Mr. ROBB: I imagine so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is that the case? If not, what percentage of the total does that $1,435,000 represent? I apprehend it could not represent 5 per cent of the grand total, because certain of the civil servants are under other schemes. I presume the minister means that only those can come under this bill who are not under these other schemes. But, assuming that all come under this measure who are not under the other schemes, then the government's contribution will be $1,435,000. Am I right in that?

Mr. ROBB: My understanding is—and I am bound to say that I am speaking only from memory—that the other schemes will be merged with this one. There are now a certain number under the other schemes. It will be a matter for the civil servants themselves to consider; I understand that they are willing that all shall be merged. The memo I have is that if all transfer, the annual cost to the country in respect of future service will be $1,435,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister say that the total civil service list of Canada comprises a pay-roll of only $28,000,000?

Mr. ROBB: I have not figured it up. That is the memorandum I have from the Superintendent of Insurance.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have not looked it up for some time, but I think the minister is wrong there—

Mr. ROBB: We can thresh that out in committee.

Mr. MEIGHEN: —I think he is not only wrong, but very far wrong.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Can the minister tell us how it is proposed to handle this? For example, we are told that all classes of civil servants will be included. Of course it would not apply to military pensions; they are not in the nature of superannuation. But apart from the military pensions there are a large number of military superannuations. Would they be brought under this scheme?

Mr. ROBB: I would not think so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: They would be kept out. Then we have the judicial superannuations; would they be brought in?

Mr. ROBB: I would not think so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Again, we have the old scheme which has not yet run out, in connection with which there is, I think, a balance of $1,200,000 odd. On what basis will that be brought in? How can it be brought in? Can the minister give us some general idea as to how we can bring into a new scheme which has no balance to its favour a fund to which the civil servants have been contributing in the past for a large number of years, and now have as a trust fund standing in their favour and amounting, if my memory is right, to $1,200,000 odd?

Mr. ROBB: It can only be brought in by the government appropriating an amount equal to the amount that is in those funds now.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is what I would think. So that, in addition to the charge of $1,435,000 there would also be an initial payment equal to the sum which is now to the credit of the civil servants in those funds.

Mr. ROBB: A book-keeping payment.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It would really be more than merely book-keeping. It would be an obligation.

Mr. ROBB: It would be an obligation.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: An obligation just as real as those Canadian National Railway bonds; it would be something real. My hon. friend says it should be doubled. Why doubled? Would it not depend upon the ratio between those already covered by the existing schemes and those coming into the new scheme? I would not think you could handle it by the rough-and-ready way of doubling the balance.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend might be right about that. There is Superannuation Fund No. 1., with 614 contributors, and salaries of $1,443,668; and Superannuation Fund No. 2 with 189 employees, and salaries of $416.980. The total of the Retirement Fund approximates, $12,000,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think the mere rule-of-thumb of doubling the figures would work.

Mr. ROBB: The committee will thresh all that out.

Mr. STEVENS: Before this resolution goes out of the committee, there is one point that I think should be considered. If I am not mistaken the legislation based upon this resolution must conform with the resolution in principle. Now the resolution only provides for the introduction of a measure: First, to provide superannuation, second, to provide for contributions by civil servants; and third, to provide for payments out of the consolidated revenue fund, and so forth. But the resolution does not provide that under the new system to be inaugurated by the bill there shall be power to consolidate any of the old funds. I do not think it should be made obligatory, because those interested ought to have some option in the matter; but at least there ought to be provision in the bill making it optional. Now the question is whether this resolution is broad enough to provide for that contingency.

Mr. ROBB: I think it is intended to be.

Mr. STEVENS: But it is not, if I understand the procedure correctly. As I understand it, you cannot introduce a principle into a bill that has not been agreed to in the resolution preceding it; I think I am perfectly sound in that view. And my opinion is that this resolution ought to be amended so that the legislation to be introduced could incorporate such a clause. I do not know what is now in the legislation, but I apprehend from a reading of this resolution that such provision is not made in the legislation based on this resolution.

Mr. ROBB: If there is any doubt about it, and my hon. friend has an amendment to suggest, I would be disposed to consider it.

Mr. STEVENS: It is more a technical question for the Minister of Justice, for instance, to advise on.

Mr. ROBB: The bill has been considered by the department of Justice.

Mr. STEVENS: If that point has been considered and settled by the Justice department, then it is all right. I quite understand that the Justice department would declare this resolution in order, but the point is whether it goes far enough.

Mr. BUREAU: You have the principle here in favour of superannuation, and that ought to include everything that is necessary to bring it about.

Mr. STEVENS: There are other things besides merely providing for superannuation. We have three funds, I think.

Mr. BUREAU: But they are all for the same purpose of providing superannuation.

Mr. STEVENS: Not necessarily. There are funds under different acts.

Mr. BUREAU: But they are all for the same purpose. If you are buying an apple it does not matter which pocket you take the money out of to pay for it.

Mr. STEVENS: I doubt very much if the legislation based on this resolution will accomplish what I have pointed out to the committee. I will leave it at that.

Mr. ROBB: The memorandum given me by the Superintendent of Insurance, who has carefully considered the legal aspects of the whole matter, says:

> Provision is made in the bill for the voluntary transfer to the new scheme of members now contributing to these funds, and the cost to the government in respect of those members who transfer will be made up of two parts:
> 1. The government's contributions in respect of their future service, and
> 2. The initial liability assumed by the government in respect of their past service for which, with the exception of Superannuation Fund No. 2, the government has made no contribution.

Mr. EVANS: As five per cent of the wages of the civil servants are to be contributed to this superannuation fund, I would ask the minister what rights have the civil servants to this five per cent they contribute should they leave the service before the superannuation age arrives? Or, if they depart this life, will their relatives benefit under this scheme, and how?

Mr. ROBB: That is all provided for in the bill, which is based upon actuarial experience. I imagine the committee will fully consider that feature of it.

Mr. CRERAR: The resolution provides for the civil servants contributing to the consolidated revenue fund. Now, is it the intention of the legislation that the contributions made by the civil servants shall be paid into the consolidated revenue fund, or is there to be some special fund created to which the civil servants and the government will contribute, such a fund to be invested, perhaps, and the earnings from it added to that fund?

Mr. ROBB: It will have to be properly ear-marked and kept separate. It will have its own special fund.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Would my hon. friend go on reading the memorandum?

Mr. ROBB: The memorandum continues:

> With reference to No. 1, it may be stated that the cost to the government for future service will be 5 per cent of the pay-roll. The difficulty arises in estimating how many will transfer and the annual salaries attaching to their positions. If all transfer, it will be seen that the government's contribution of 5 per cent would amount to approximately $1,500,000. This would not mean that this amount would have to be actually disbursed, but would have to be dealt with in the same way as the contributions in respect of new entrants; that is, it would have to be recognized, ear-marked and set aside to meet the future liability. It should be pointed out that for the fiscal year 1922-23 the income of the Retirement Fund was $2,123,735 including interest, while the payments from the fund amounted to only $324,225, and the income of Superannuation Fund No. 2 was $194,953 including $101,000 transferred from consolidated revenue fund, and the payments from the fund amounted to but $36,326.87.

The accounts are kept separately.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, they are kept separately, but I am not sure my hon. friend is right when he says these are particularly ear-marked and invested. I think that is the point the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) was making. I think we are just carrying this thing as part of the consolidated fund. As I recollect it the ear-marking is a matter of book-keeping, and the interest granted is the current rate of interest which the government have to pay for money. The moneys are ear-marked for the purpose but beyond that nothing special is done with them.

Mr. ROBB: The money is properly ear-marked so that the amount is kept separate.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the contemplated amount in the supplementary estimates to take care of next year's obligation in respect to this?

Mr. ROBB: Nothing has been considered yet. My right hon. friend means the supplementary estimates—

Mr. MEIGHEN: For this year.

Mr. ROBB: We have no supplementary estimates under consideration yet.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But there will be some?

Mr. ROBB: Do not urge that too strongly. Do not remind any person that there may be supplementary estimates.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What fund would the minister take it out of?

Mr. ROBB: I imagine provision will have to be made if the committee report in favour of the resolution.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I should think so. The estimate of a million and a half per year is based, of course, on an annual civil service list of thirty millions. This must be the minister's estimate of the civil service list aside from temporary employees. The act is not to apply to temporary employees at all?

Mr. ROBB: No, I would not think so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is not the proportion of civil servants who are temporary employees very large?

Mr. ROBB: I should not like to get into a controversy over that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The figures are easily ascertainable. The number of each class is known within very close approximation.

Mr. ROBB: Yes, but very conflicting. The real basis for an estimate of the number of civil servants is the cheques that are issued monthly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, I suppose that is one way of estimating, but each department has a list of its civil servants. The minister says there is a conflict as to who are temporary and who are permanent?

Mr. ROBB: No, as to the total number of employees.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: There may be as to the exact number, but we could tell pretty closely. Are there not temporary employees who have been in the service for over ten years?

Mr. ROBB: I think so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How does the government distinguish the one class from the other?

Mr. ROBB: I imagine that will be considered in the bill to be presented.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not see it. The bill is here and imagination does not help much when cold print is before you.

Mr. ROBB: That might be considered by the committee.

Mr. CRERAR: Has my right hon. friend a copy of the bill?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I just have the introduction copy that I got from the Clerk.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Robb thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 122, to provide for the superannuation of civil servants.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the bill be read a second time?

Mr. ROBB: Now, with the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. COOTE: Have copies of the bill been printed and distributed?

Mr. ROBB: The bill has been printed and is ready for distribution.

Mr. COOTE: I think we should object to the second reading until copies of the bill are in the hands of hon. members.

Mr. SPEAKER: The bill has not been distributed and objection has been taken to the second reading now. Motion stands until the next sitting of the House.

WAYS AND MEANS

CUSTOMS TARIFF ACT, 1907, AMENDMENT

The House in committee of Ways and Means, Mr. Marcil (Bonaventure) in the chair.

1. Resolved, That the Customs Tariff, 1907, be amended by adding after paragraph (d) of section four the following as paragraphs (e) and (f) of section four:

(e) Extend the benefit of the British preferential tariff to any territory administered under a mandate of the League of Nations by any British country to which British country the benefit of the British preferential tariff has been extended; and from and after the publication of such order in council in The Canada Gazette the British preferential tariff shall apply to goods the produce or manufacture of such territory, subject to the provisions of this act.

(f) Withdraw the benefit of the British preferential tariff from any territory administered under a mandate of the League of Nations which has received said benefit; and from and after the publication of such order in The Canada Gazette, the general tariff or the intermediate tariff, as mentioned in the said order, shall apply to goods the produce or manufacture of such territory subject to the provisions of this act.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Would the minister be kind enough to tell us to what countries he proposes by order in council to extend the preference, and from what countries he intends by order in council to take the preference?

Mr. ROBB: This is done at the request of the Prime Minister of New Zealand. Under the League of Nations treaty, Samoa is now under the mandate of New Zealand. That is the only country at the moment to which this applies.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That would have to do with the first question. That would allow the British Preference to be extended to Samoa, as that country is under the mandate of New Zealand with whom we have this reciprocal arrangement. So we may look upon the resolution as extending the preference to Samoa?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What trade has the minister in view in connection with Samoa?

Mr. ROBB: While this is granted at the request of New Zealand, I imagine the trade will not be very great. There will be a trade in fruits, or cocoa which we may import from there, and some of our products now going to New Zealand will be admitted into Samoa at the New Zealand preference rates. There are no countries from which the preference will be withdrawn at the moment; we have simply taken authority to withdraw.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We may take it then that the produce of Samoa is similar to that of the West Indies?

Mr. ROBB: It might be.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well, is it? I think this House should have some idea as to what extension of trade we are going to get and on what articles.

Mr. ROBB: It is a fair assumption to say that they are similar to the West Indies or the Fiji Islands.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We have no preference with the Fiji Islands, but we have with the West Indies. What does Samoa export, for example, and what does she import?

Mr. ROBB: They will export coconuts, cocoas, some fruit. And they buy our canned fish. They do not buy Canadian butter; they buy the products that usually go to a tropical country. The hon. gentleman is in error regarding Fiji. We have a preferential tariff with Fiji.

Mr. STEVENS: The Fiji preference is a subject I have been very much interested in for a long time. Has an arrangement been recently consummated with Fiji which has been under contemplation for quite a time, including the question of adequate transportation?

Mr. ROBB: I think they have the benefit of the Canadian British preference, and we have whatever preference the Fiji islands give. My hon. friend will be interested in transportation to and from Fiji. The treasurer of the colonial government of Fiji is now in Ottawa, and has been for some days, negotiating with some transportation companies for a better service as between Fiji islands and the Pacific coast and Canada, and, he tells me, with some hope of success.

Mr. STEVENS: I am delighted to hear it, and I hope the government will facilitate matters to its utmost, because a very excellent trade with Fiji may be developed. What is required is an improvement in transportation. I understand however, that the preference arrangement, so far as duties are concerned, is the previous or the old arrangement, not the new arrangement.

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. BAXTER: Is this power of extension and withdrawal under the Customs Act exercised by the minister or by the government by order in council?

Mr. ROBB: Under section 4 of the Customs tariff it is by order in council. The whole government must take the responsibility for it.

Mr. BAXTER: It is not intended to put it on the basis of something else we have had this session, namely the dumping clause. Why should this matter require action by the whole government, and why should the dumping clause be put in the hands of a single minister?

Mr. ROBB: The clause has been many years in our customs tariff.

Mr. BAXTER: It was passed only two years ago, and I would have thought that considering the facility with which the dumping clause could be applied and could be withdrawn, it would be applied again. It would rather commend itself to the government in connection with the preferential tariff. It really seems impossible for me to understand why, for the very small trade which would take place with Samoa, for instance, that you would require all the efforts of the combined governor in council to extend or withdraw the preferential rate, while you could have the trade relations of Canada with the entire world affected by the simple dictate of the Minister of Customs.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I agree with the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Baxter) that it is pretty hard to understand. There is a lot more of it that is hard to understand. You require to have an order in council to extend the leave of absence of a clerk, but you can switch the rates of duty on natural products up and down under the act of two years ago, or you can switch it up and down under the dumping clause under the act of 1907 by the mere will and caprice of a minister.

Mr. McMASTER: I think the hon. member voted for it when it was before the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was not in the House when it was passed.

Mr. McMASTER: Oh, yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the natural products provision. I protested against it, but it was a question between that and making desolation of the Okanagan, and I had to take the best I could get. Sometimes when we have an incompetent government we have not a very good choice. Is there anything in these resolutions not included in the resolutions presented to the House at the time the budget was introduced and the various amendments that have followed to date?

4 p.m.

Mr. ROBB: There were three resolutions presented, were there not? April 10th, April 14th, and April 30th, I think. They are all in here, I understand.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We have had only three budgets, besides two dumping clauses. Outside of these three changes, is there anything else? Have the new series of changes started yet?

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. CRERAR: They are all in the right direction.

[Mr. Robb.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is what they say down in Almonte.

Resolution agreed to.

2. Resolved, That it is expedient to amend The Customs Tariff, 1907, by adding at the end of section five thereof as enacted by chapter forty-two of the statutes of 1923 the following proviso:

Provided that in computing the ad valorem rate of duty on tea purchased in bond in the United Kingdom, the value for duty shall not include the amount of the customs duty payable on tea for consumption in the United Kingdom.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Can the minister tell us what the duties on tea are today, and what the effect of the remission of duties will be?

Mr. ROBB: It will be seven per cent preferential, ten per cent intermediate and ten per cent general.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is not answering the question. What duties are collected under the law as it now stands, and what will be the duties under this resolution? That is a matter of value and not of amount.

Mr. ROBB: This is to enable them to get ten per cent off the rate.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The English duty is ten per cent, is it?

Mr. ROBB: No, under the resolution of last year tea of a certain price entering Canada was not entitled to the ten per cent reduction. My hon. friend will remember that a full ten per cent was introduced last year on goods coming into Canadian ports. Under the tariff as applied in Great Britain, it deprived Canadians of the benefit of that ten per cent. This is to make it clear, and provide for it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think the minister is properly instructed in connection with that. This has only to do with the question of teas purchased for Canada by Canadian purchasers from England. The ordinary law is that the value would be based upon the value of the tea in Great Britain. The change that is made has nothing to do with seven, eight, five or any other per cent. This change is reducing the value of that tea for Canadian customs purposes, as shown by the minister's own resolution, by the amount of duty paid in England. I want the concrete information as to how the change works out on a pound of tea.

Mr. ROBB: It will depend upon the value of the tea. My hon. friend must understand that under the resolution last year, certain tea entering Canada was not entitled to this ten per cent reduction, and we want to make it clear that they will get this ten per cent reduction coming to Canadian ports.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the minister's idea of the resolution is all right, mine is all wrong. Is it not this, that heretofore in estimating the value of tea imported into Canada through Great Britain the value, for duty purposes, was taken to include not only the import price into Great Britain but, as well, the very high duty added to the import price, that is to say, the British duty? With this resolution passed, that import value into Canada will be the import price into Great Britain, excluding the duty into Great Britain. If that is so, then is it not merely a matter of percentages to ascertain what the loss of revenue will be? If the minister knows what the revenue was last year then, assuming that we shall import the same amount of tea this year, he can tell us what we shall lose.

Mr. ROBB: I have not that information before me.

Mr. CRERAR: What is the duty on tea imported into Great Britain?

Mr. McMASTER: It has been substantially reduced by the last British budget.

Mr. LEWIS: Does not this resolution mean that the Canadian people will have to pay a double duty, the duty which the British people pay, and our own duty?

Mr. ROBB: No. The duty on tea going into Great Britain, I may say, has been reduced from 8 pence to 4 pence a pound.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is the duty specific or ad valorem?

Mr. ROBB: It is a straight duty.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What we shall lose will be our duty applied to that 4 pence?

Mr. ROBB: Yes; 4 pence is the British duty now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And our loss of revenue will be the present duty as applied to that four pence over the whole import. It will be easy to calculate what the loss will be. I am astonished that the advocates of a revenue tariff should rejoice over that.

Mr. JACOBS: It will encourage our people to drink more tea.

Mr. ROBB: It will encourage the importation of tea from Great Britain. Of course, we could bring it in direct from India.

Mr. CRERAR: What is the duty on tea entering Canada from Great Britain now?

Mr. ROBB: It is 7 cents, under the British preference.

Mr. STEVENS: Some of the large tea importers contracted for the purchase of great quantities of tea from British houses. As I understand the amendment the invoice of such imports now will not include the British duty price.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It do not think the resolution should carry until we know what we shall lose in revenue. The minister evidently does not expect to be Minister of Finance a year from now, because he does not seem to have the slightest concern as to where we are to come out.

Mr. ROBB: I will have the information procured for my right hon. friend.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Are there any considerable number of Canadian tea importers buying in the English market or is the buying confined to one large house?

Mr. ROBB: There are many Canadian houses importing tea into Canada.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Certainly there are. We have those that do business regularly on the Pacific and there are others that buy in India. I am referring to English purchasers who are the only ones that benefit at all by this resolution. Is it the practice for Canadian buyers to purchase from one large concern?

Mr. ROBB: I do not quite understand the question.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think everyone else understands it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is not the English business pretty much Mr. Larkin's business?

Mr. ROBB: I understand his largest warehouses are in Colombo and Boston.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, but he blends in Great Britain and sells here. It is practically his business only that is affected.

Mr. ROBB: Not at all.

Mr. CRERAR: I fail to see what on earth that has to do with the question we are considering. The plain reading of the resolution is that the duty collected on tea imported from Great Britain will be reduced by the percentage of our duty that was chargeable on the duty paid on the tea entering Great Britain. It simply means that we are going to be able to get our breakfast tea a little cheaper than before.

Mr. McMASTER: And afternoon tea as well.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How much cheaper?

Mr. CRERAR: The ex-Minister of Finance asks how much. I am not concerned particularly with the extent of the reduction but I do know that the tea will be cheaper, and that is of interest to me although I am not a heavy tea drinker.

Mr. ROBB: The leader of the opposition inquired a moment ago as to the revenue. The duty collected in 1922-23 on tea imported direct from the United Kingdom was $475,000—I omit the hundreds—and the duty collected on tea direct from India was $1,027,000. We shall lose in revenue about $47,000 which will go to the Canadian people.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will it?

Mr. ROBB: I hope so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is not the English exporter to Canada in competition with the others? All he has to do is simply to sell at such a price as will get him his share of the business. Can the minister see what he will reduce it for? The minister said a moment ago, frankly, and he was right, that this will tend to increase the amount of tea coming in. But inasmuch as the exporters from Great Britain have to compete only against those who are selling from other countries not affected by this resolution at all there will be very little incentive for them to reduce the price.

Mr. LEWIS: Is there any duty at all on tea in the United Kingdom when it is there in bulk? If there is not, what is the value of this resolution? Of what value is the resolution if tea is bought in bond in the United Kingdom?

Mr. ROBB: Under the customs laws they are compelled to add the duty to the value of tea coming into Canada.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend, I know, wants to be frank. Surely he will see that the only tea affected by this is tea imported into England, mixed there, and shipped to Canada. Is not that true?

Mr. ROBB: That is a fair conclusion; but in the administration of the act the duty is added.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes; but the only activity which is at all affected by the law as it stands, apart from this resolution, is the mixing and blending of tea in Great Britain. Before this resolution was brought in tea could be imported into Great Britain in bond if it had not to be blended. If tea was imported into Great Britain in bond, having paid no duty, it would not be subject to the provisions of the act so far as the English duty is concerned; no duty would have been paid. The only one who benefits under this change is the merchant, the mixer, who blends tea in Great Britain. Certainly tea is not grown there. It is also true that the tea so blended in Great Britain comes into direct competition with tea from the Orient, from China, India and other Asiatic countries whose tea is not subject to this provision as the English article is. Am I right?

Mr. ROBB: Based on my hon. friend's own statement, does he object to this legislation? Would he not put the Britisher in as good a position as the man who operates in China or India?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am just asking if I am right.

Mr. ROBB: Fairly right.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then if I am, what justification is there for the claim that this will reduce the price of tea to the Canadian consumer, when the minister shows that the great bulk of the tea imported is imported direct and is not subject to the additional value of the British duty?

Mr. BUREAU: You have to get your invoices through England.

Mr. ROBB: I will not press that. I gave this in answer to my hon. friend.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Let us see who is right, the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) or the Minister of Customs (Mr. Bureau).

Mr. BUREAU: What are you driving at, anyway?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I want the figures as to the importations of tea, first, from Great Britain and, secondly, from other countries.

Mr. BUREAU: The tea may be imported from other countries but the invoice is sent from Great Britain.

Mr. LEWIS: Has it been the custom of the department to add the British duty on tea coming from Great Britain to this country?

Mr. BUREAU: We took that off last year.

Mr. McMASTER: Mr. Chairman, is the situation not this, that, prior to the introduction of this legislation, when tea came into Canada the price which was taken in order to assess the duty was the price of the tea laid down in Great Britain, plus the British duty on it?

Mr. ROBB: That is right.

Mr. McMASTER: For instance, if $100 worth of tea came into Great Britain, and $40 duty was placed upon it, when that tea arrived here we would place our duty upon $140.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Certainly.

Mr. McMASTER: That being the case, is there any possible objection to this legislation? It says: When we value tea for duty purposes we are going to value it merely on its import value and not on its fictitious market value, which has been arrived at by placing on top of the invoice price the British duty. It seems to me it is very wholesome legislation. Now, endeavouring to look at the dark side of things, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) and the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) say: Oh, the people of Canada are not going to get the benefit of this reduction, it is going to be all absorbed by the men who draw supplies of tea from Britain into Canada; they are the people who are going to get the benefit, and not the Canadian tea-consuming public. I think I am right in describing that as their attitude. The hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) nods his head in approval. Now, are they right in that? According to the figures, last year, $147,000 was collected on tea which came from Great Britain.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, $497,000.

Mr. McMASTER: There was collected $475,000 on tea which came to Canada via Great Britain, and which therefore bore for duty purposes in Canada the additional British duty; and there came directly tea on which the duty amounted to $1,027,000. Therefore, roughly speaking, we got 40 per cent of our tea via Great Britain and about 60 per cent direct.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You are away out; it would be more like 30 and 70 per cent.

Mr. McMASTER: Let us say 30 and 70 —I do not think it affects the argument which I propose placing before the committee. If 30 per cent of the tea supply of Canada by this change can be cheapened, it is quite possible, and quite probable, that that tea will be reduced in price, and that the other tea which comes direct must follow its price downward, and the possibility is that we will get all our tea somewhat cheaper. What may happen is that the price of tea will be between the lowest and the highest price. I trust I have made myself clear to the committee, that this reduction may operate to reduce the price not only of tea which arrives via Great Britain, but of tea which arrives direct. Therefore it seems to me there can be very little objection to this legislation, except possibly on the ground of loss of revenue. That loss of revenue may not occur. I take it that tea and coffee are what we might term competitors in the temperance market, so to speak; the temperance people drink tea or they drink coffee.

Mr. JACOBS: My hon. friend drinks ginger ale.

Mr. McMASTER: But ginger ale does not come in competition with tea and coffee. The point I make is that if tea is reduced even slightly in price, that slight reduction may increase the consumption to a very substantial extent, and thus the amount of tea duties collected at the lower rate may be as great or greater than before. These considerations, I think, will include most people in this House to regard this as wholesome legislation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Starting at the hon. gentleman's last point first, he says that tea and coffee are competitors in the temperance market, and that the reduction in the price of tea will cause more tea to be drunk.

Mr. McMASTER: And the same loss on coffee.

Mr. MEIGHEN: So, obviously, he loses as much on the one hand as he gains on the other. I will not pursue that further. Coming to his first point, that this will mean a reduction in price of English tea blends, and consequently force a reduction in the price of other teas, this is entirely correct provided the purpose of the British exporter to Canada is to get tea as low as he can to the Canadian people. But if his purpose is to make all the money he can out of the business, the price of our tea will remain precisely what it is now. I would not want to say that there will be absolutely no change, but the change will be so slight in the one direction, and will be absorbed so fully in the other, that the beneficiary of this legislation is not hard to discern.

Mr. STEVENS: The interjection of the Minister of Customs (Mr. Bureau) a moment ago rather disturbed my mind as to the question I had asked the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) when the Minister of Customs was not in his seat.

Mr. BUREAU: I am sorry I disturbed you.

Mr. STEVENS: I should like confirmation from him, because to my mind this is an important point. Am I correct in saying—and the Minister of Customs by his large experience will be able to answer this question—that tea contracted for with a British firm whose head office is in London, the invoices and bills and statements for which are sent from London to the Canadian importer, but the tea itself is shipped direct from Ceylon or India or other point of production,—has that tea in the past, in so far as invoices for duty purposes is concerned, carried the addition of the British duty?

Mr. BUREAU: Tea sold by the Englishman has always carried that addition.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Although it never saw England?

Mr. BUREAU: Although it never saw England.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I should like to see the law which supports that.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not quibbling over this. This is a practical question which has been before the government for some time and with which I have had to deal myself. Does the legislation which the minister now introduces relieve that importer from the addition of the English duty on tea which is still imported from the point of production and never touches Great Britain? The resolution says:

> Provided that in computing the ad valorem rate of duty on tea purchased in bond in the United Kingdom—

It would appear from this that only such tea as was carried to England, was there in bond and was re-exported to Canada would be favoured by this legislation. Am I right in that?

Mr. BUREAU: It must be in bond in England, yes.

Mr. STEVENS: Then this legislation does not meet the previous case I put?

Mr. BUREAU: There has been some discussion about that previous case; the legislation is designed to prevent that. Tea can be purchased from an English exporter, in his warehouse in bond, without the payment of duty on the duty the Englishman would have to pay because he re-exports it.

Mr. STEVENS: And it applies also to the previous case I mentioned, where only the invoices were despatched from London, the tea being shipped from Ceylon or India, the point of production.

Mr. BUREAU: That would not be bought in bond in England.

Mr. STEVENS: That is exactly where we are not clear, and it is exactly what the legislation is intended to do. During the past year the customs authorities have imposed a duty upon tea imported from India which never saw England at all.

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister says "no," but I am right.

Mr. JACOBS: How could a duty be imposed on goods that never went to England at all?

Mr. STEVENS: That is the anomaly of the whole thing. That is where those who take the view that I do claim there is an injustice.

Mr. JACOBS: If it never touched the shores of Great Britain how could there be a duty on it?

Mr. STEVENS: Because it was invoiced from London, and the customs authorities of Canada collected a duty not only on the invoice price of the tea but on the invoice price plus the British duty of 8 pence per pound although the tea never touched Great Britain at all.

Mr. ROBB: I think my hon. friend is wrong, because it is a specific duty that is on tea, so much a pound.

Mr. STEVENS: It does not matter whether the duty is specific or ad valorem. The British duty was a specific duty of 8 pence per pound, now 4 pence.

Mr. ROBB: But the Canadian duty?

Mr. STEVENS: I am not talking about the Canadian duty, and I am sure I am not wrong. The Minister of Customs sees the point of my remarks. What I want to be clear on is that this clause covers that case, relieves the Canadian importer of that added duty. It is intended to do so, is it not?

Mr. BUREAU: Surely it is.

Mr. STEVENS: Then if it does not actually do so I suppose later on we may come back to the minister, show him Hansard, and say that this legislation was intended to give that relief.

Mr. BUREAU: It is so intended.

Mr. ROBB: I think my hon. friend must misunderstand his information, because the duty on tea coming into Canada is so much a pound. It is possible that in the case referred to the import was not entitled to the 10 per cent rebate granted last session. That is what we want to cure, because under the legislation of last session there is this proviso:

Provided further that this discount shall not apply in the case in which the duty does not exceed 15 per centum ad valorem.

Some of the tea coming into Canada under the existing British laws did not come under that provision, and we want to cure that.

Mr. STEVENS: That is not what I am talking about at all. The Minister of Customs, I know, understands my point, and I think, agrees with me, but apparently the Acting Minister of Finance does not. I am accepting the assurance of the Minister of Customs that this legislation does cover the point.

Mr. ROBB: All right.

Mr. BUREAU: It is intended to.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think we should really try to find out what the facts are. One minister does not agree with the other, and I do not know which minister is right.

Mr. BUREAU: Oh yes, we agree.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend (Mr. Stevens) thinks the Minister of Customs is right. Well, he may be, or perhaps the Acting Minister of Finance is right. Suppose we assume—and I hope it is not a rash assumption—that the Minister of Customs knows how his department is administered, we have the fact that goods that never see England but are sold by English houses are valued for duty purposes as if they had gone to England and as if the English tax had been paid upon them. Now, am I right in that?

Mr. BUREAU: Well, you know whether you are right or not.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am asking the minister; I am not responsible for this legislation. Now, let me repeat; and I hope the minister will listen to me this time. The practice of the Customs department has been to value tea shipped from Ceylon direct to Canada and invoiced from a London house as if it had gone to Great Britain and paid the British duty. Am I right?

Mr. BUREAU: It paid 7 cents preferential duty.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Now let us try to find out where we are. There was a specific English duty of 8 pence per pound, now reduced to 4 pence per pound. The practice of the Customs department was to add for the purposes of valuation 8 pence per pound as being the amount of the British duty, although that tea may have come direct from Ceylon to Canada and merely been invoiced by a British exporter. Am I right?

Mr. BUREAU: Well, you say the British duty was 8 pence?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: If it is 8 pence you are right. I do not know whether it is or not.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If that practice is right, the present provision relieves tea of this extra valuation only when it is purchased in bond in the United Kingdom. Surely the right thing to do would be to put all these shipments on the same basis. That is not done, and anyone who takes the trouble to read this resolution, unless, perhaps, he is one of the ministers, will agree that I am right.

Mr. BUREAU: That you can charge the tea that did not go to England?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, my hon. friend has not the point at all. I despair of getting anything into his head this afternoon.

Mr. BUREAU: My hon. friend is despairing of something that is very easy.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I know, but I am losing faith.

Mr. JACOBS: I think I rather agree with the ex-Minister of Finance on this thing. If there is to be a reduction on these goods coming in bond from England, a fortiori if they never went to England at all the reduction ought to apply. It seems only reasonable.

Mr. STEVENS: I know this is a very technical point, and the only reason I speak upon it with any confidence is that I have been through it all with the officials of the Customs department. It has been discussed for some months. It might be well for the minister to allow this resolution to stand until his expert advisers in the Customs department consider that very point and see that it is properly covered in this resolution. I doubt very much if this resolution covers anything except tea that is actually carried to Great Britain in bond, and then re-exported from Great Britain to Canada, whereas it should cover goods purchased and invoiced in London but shipped from Ceylon to India or some other British point to Canada. It should cover that as well as the other, and if it does not, this legislation is not very effective at all.

Mr. BUREAU: There have been a couple of cases where mistakes have been made by the officers, but the duty paid was refunded.

Mr. STEVENS: That may be true, but does this legislation correct the situation?

Mr. BUREAU: It is supposed to correct it.

Mr. STEVENS: That is the anxiety I have. I am afraid it does not, and that is why I am rather insistent upon this point.

Mr. ROBB: I do not think we can make it any clearer than it is now.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does the government object to an amendment something along this line:

Provided that in computing the ad valorem rate of duty on tea purchased in bond in the United Kingdom or tea purchased through British exporters but shipped from the country of origin to Canada direct—

Mr. ROBB: We cannot accept that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Why?

Mr. ROBB: It could not be properly administered that way.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then let us just understand where we are. This is simply and solely something which is done to look after the man who is doing his mixing in London. It is not something which is done for the trade generally; it is not something which is done in ease of the general Canadian situation. I ask my hon. friend, can he seriously say it is just for purposes of valuation to add this British duty on tea that has never seen Britain, and then when it is taken to Britain and pays the duty, to take it off? It is ridiculous.

Mr. ROBB: Let me draw the attention of the House to the provision of last year which was put in to meet the wishes of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. It takes care of the whole position we have been debating:

Provided that goods entitled to the benefits of the British preferential tariff shall be entitled to the discount authorized by this section, when such goods are shipped on a through bill of lading consigned to a consignee in a specified port in Canada, when such goods are transferred at a port of a British colony or possession not enjoying the benefits of the British preferential tariff, and conveyed without further transshipment into a sea or river port of Canada.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. STEVENS: I want the minister to understand that I am not criticising this clause; I want to support it, but what I want to point out to the minister is that upon that very clause he has just read the officials of the Customs department have placed an interpretation which resulted in adding to the invoice of the very goods mentioned in that clause the amount of the British duty on that tea which never touched England, because they claimed the tea was invoiced from London, the head office or the central office of the vendors. Now these Canadian companies who are blenders and distributors of tea are very, very large distributors on the Pacific coast and in the United Kingdom, and when they found that this British duty was added to their invoices they complained. Then I understand that this clause was put in the resolutions to fully meet the case. From a reading of this clause I would interpret it, and I think such an eminent lawyer as my hon. friend from George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) will agree with me, to limit the application of the clause to tea that is purchased in bond in the United Kingdom. Now that certainly would not include tea that is purchased in England, but actually shipped from Calcutta or Ceylon or some other place.

Mr. ROBB: My colleague the Minister of Customs has frankly admitted that in the early days of the operation of this new clause there was a mistake made in one or two cases, but the minister discovered it and authorized a refund. The ruling is now as my hon. friend wants it to be. May I point out that the clause is very clear. It makes no reference to shipments from the United Kingdom. It says:

Provided that in computing the ad valorem rate of duty on tea purchased in bond in the United Kingdom—

I should think that makes it quite clear, and as my hon. friend wants it. I would prefer not to make any change.

Mr. COOTE: This discussion is very mystifying to most members of the committee. I would ask the minister to explain just why he makes this new regulation, which reads:

In computing the ad valorem rate of duty on tea purchased in bond in the United Kingdom—

When I look up the Customs tariff I can find no ad valorem duty on tea at all. The duty is given under tariff item 28a as follows:

Tea imported direct from the country of growth or production, and tea purchased in bond in the United Kingdom per pound, 7 cents, 10 cents, 10 cents.

There is no ad valorem duty. Then 29a provides:

Tea not otherwise provided, per pound, 10 cents, 10 cents, 10 cents.

Now what is the real purpose of this new regulation?

Mr. ROBB: Under the legislation of last year there was 10 per cent added to the British preference on goods entering through Canadian ports direct.

Mr. COOTE: Would not that be simply 10 per cent of the specific duty? It is not an ad valorem duty.

Mr. ROBB: If my hon. friend will allow me to continue, there was a provision put in the legislation of last year that if the duty, 7 cents a pound, when computed to an ad valorem basis, was not 15 per cent, this additional 10 per cent did not apply. I will read the clause:

Provided further that this discount shall not apply in the case in which the duty does not exceed 15 per centum ad valorem, or in the case of a specific duty or a specific and ad valorem duty combined in which the computed rate does not exceed fifteen per centum ad valorem—

Some goods came below and were not entitled to the 10 per cent. It is to cure that, we are bringing in this legislation.

Mr. COOTE: If we had had that explanation at the start I think this item might have been passed already.

Mr. ROBB: I imagine my hon. friend was not in the House.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In order to make this perfectly clear I am going to ask my hon. friend to point out why we should not say in plain words what I understand he admits we are doing. The amendment that I wanted him to consider was this: and so forth. We have already got that. For the life of me I really fail to see why, when we already have that principle active in so far as the 10 per cent is concerned, we ought not to have the same principle recognized as regards the valuation. I submit my hon. friend ought either to stick to that or reconsider it.

Provided that in computing the ad valorem rate of duty on tea purchased in bond in the United Kingdom or tea purchased through British exporters but shipped from the country of origin to Canada direct—

Mr. ROBB: I am not prepared at this moment to accept the amendment offered by my hon. friend. This recommendation has been prepared in consultation with the officers of the department who administer the act, not with the intention of favouring any special person but purely and solely to clear up an ambiguity in the act and give to the British exporter, or blender if you will, and to the Canadian people, the advantages of the 10 per cent discount of last year. However, I will meet my hon. friend in this regard: He can prepare his amendment and I will submit it again to the officers of the department who will have to administer the act.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: All right.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend has been administering acts and he knows that it is the officers who understand how they work out.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. ROBB: No, it stands. If my hon. friend will give me the amendment I will consult the customs officers about it and see how it works out.

Resolution stands.

3. Resolved, That Schedule A to The Customs Tariff, 1907, as amended by chapter twenty-six of the statutes of 1914, chapter nineteen of the statutes of 1922 and chapter forty-two of the statutes of 1923, be further amended by striking thereout tariff items: 275, 445, 445a, 446, 446a, 446b, 447a, 447b, 448, 448a, 448c, 449, 450, 453b, 591, 663, 682, the several enumerations of goods respectively, and the several rates of duties of customs, if any, set opposite each of said items, and to provide that the following items, enumerations and rates of duty be inserted in Schedule A:—

On item 275:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will the minister tell us what item 275 means, and what was collected under it last year?

Mr. ROBB: We are striking out the word "petroleum." The change will permit an oil called "Scotch blast furnace oil" free entry. The revenue is very small.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How does the present item read?

Mr. FORKE: It is dangerous stuff if it is Scotch blast furnace oil.

Mr. ROBB: The present rate is 15 per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How does the present tariff item read though?

Mr. ROBB: The word "petroleum" is struck out. That permits the admission of "Scotch blast furnace oil."

Item agreed to.

On item 445:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the change there?

Mr. FORKE: It has to do with mowing machines and harvesters.

Mr. STEVENS: Is this the point where we should discuss this item 445, dealing with mowing machines, harvesters, binders and so on?

Mr. ROBB: Perhaps we could discuss that item when we come to the duties on those implements. These are just items that are being struck out.

The CHAIRMAN: We are striking out these different items, we have not come to the duty items yet. Shall the item carry?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think we can get along as quickly as that because the minister cannot replace these items without making considerable change. We are entitled to know what is being dropped and the reason why.

Mr. ROBB: The present item reads:

Mowing machines, harvesters, self-binding or without binders, binding attachments, reapers and complete parts thereof—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What were the old rates?

Mr. ROBB: The old rates were 7½ per cent, 10 per cent and 10 per cent. It is now proposed that the rates shall be: Free, 6 per cent, 6 per cent. The estimated reduction in revenue is $21,863.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What was the actual amount collected last year, or do the figures just given represent the amount actually collected?

Mr. ROBB: The estimated reduction in revenue is $21,863.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Can the hon. gentleman tell me what was collected under the British preference last year of 7½ per cent?

Mr. ROBB: No I have not that information separately.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Surely my hon. friend can tell us whether anything was collected or not?

Mr. ROBB: We will look it up. However, I admit at once, if it will lessen my hon. friend's anxiety, that there was a very small amount collected under the British preference.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My present anxiety is to find out what the truth is, what the real purpose is, that is all.

Mr. ROBB: There was nothing collected under the British preference.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I see, so we have nothing whatever collected under the British preference under item 445. Now, under the intermediate tariff what was collected?

Mr. ROBB: Nothing under the intermediate tariff.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: So the whole amount was collected under the general tariff item?

Mr. ROBB: The general tariff.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What countries would that refer to besides the United States if any?

Mr. ROBB: I think the United States would be the only country.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, that is the fact. So that all the imports under tariff item 445 came from the United States? Now, what was the total amount collected under the general tariff under this item?

Mr. ROBB: We have estimated $21,863 as the reduction of revenue.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well, perhaps that will do. That is the loss of revenue?

Mr. ROBB: Mowing machines, $23,123.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We have had two figures given. My hon. friend said first $21,863 and now he says $23,123.

Mr. ROBB: Mowing machines from the United States, duty collected, $2,405.49.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: On what?

Mr. ROBB: On mowing machines. Then on the harvesters and selfbinders from the United States the duty collected was $25,-714.03. On binding attachments from the United States the duty collected was $1,799.50, and on reapers the duty collected was $222.20.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is that all?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the total result?

Mr. ROBB: I have not added it up.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Figuring roughly and quickly, I make it $30,141.22. On what basis is the loss calculated?

Mr. ROBB: The difference between ten per cent and six per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How would that work out if these figures are right?

Mr. ROBB: Perhaps I did not give my hon. friend the revenue loss on parts.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: These figures cannot be right and that basis correct.

Mr. ROBB: I will give my hon. friend the parts. The figures for agricultural implements under tariff item 445 are as follows:

From the United Kingdom	$ 2 50
From France	3 00
From Denmark	3 20
From Sweden	954 50
From United States	26,742 24

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: You take what you actually brought in last year and apply the reduction to it, and it gives you a resultant loss of $21,863?

Mr. STEVENS: One of the reasons given for this change is that it is going to make a substantial saving to the consumer, and the justification, as far as the manufacturer is concerned, is that he gets a corresponding or compensating reduction in certain raw materials entering into the manufacture of the goods. With a little assistance, and with absolutely authentic price lists for the last ten years, I have made some computations here which certainly are interesting to me, and which I believe will interest hon. members of the House; and if the Chairman will permit me, I will include in this item, mower, binder, and farm wagon. I take the binder first, and I am taking what is looked upon as a standard article, a seven-foot binder, on the basis of two annual October payments. I am simply taking the price list and not discussing cost as delivered at any special point. This is the price list issued presumably the eastern price list, but in any event the comparison is all on the same basis.

Mr. CALDWELL: Will that be f.o.b. the manufacturer?

Mr. STEVENS: I would not say that. These would be the entered prices. I will read this and give it to Hansard, so that it will appear in proper shape. I will not violate the rules of the House by inserting in Hansard anything which I do not deal with here. The figures are as follows:

—	1916 May 1	1916 Dec. 1	1917 Dec. 1	1918 Dec. 1	1919 Dec. 1	1920 Dec. 1	1920 Dec. 1	1921 Dec. 1	1923 Feb. 21	1923 Nov. 1	1924 Apr. 11
7 ft. Binder, 2 Oct. 1st payments	139 00	155 00	216 00	230 00	227 00	247 00	293 00	235 00	243 00	264 00	251 00
Farm Wagon, 3½ arm, tires 3 x ½, 2 payments, 6 and 12 months	69 50	74 50	96 00	109 50	110 50	125 00	147 50	119 50	119 50	126 00	119 00
6 ft. Mower, 2 Oct. payments	61 00	65 00	88 00	91 00	89 00	98 50	122 50	99 00	101 50	108 50	103 50
Bar iron and steel per 100 lbs. base price	2 27	2 41	3 34	4 11	2 98	3 32	3 73	2 52	3 52	3 14	2·92

Now, referring to the case of the binder, I would ask hon. members to note that after November, 1923, came the budget and we have a reduction on April 11, after the budget to $251. The reduction made in price on account of sales tax and duty changes in the budget of April 10 is $13, from the November, 1923. The actual reduction of sales tax and duty amounts to $24. On this basis the price to-day is $11 higher than it was on the last list of November 1, 1923. That ought to be borne in mind. As a matter of fact, the sales tax alone which has been taken off is $14.20, and yet the reduction in price is $13.

Mr. COOTE: Are you including the sales tax on the retail price of the binder?

Mr. STEVENS: I am including the sales tax on the list price in Ontario.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Factory price.

Mr. STEVENS: Then, in the case of the 6 foot mower, on April 11, following the budget, there is a reduction of $5. But the sales tax reduction is $6.14, so that the reduction is within the sales tax and does not include the reduction of duty.

Then take the farm wagon; after the budget there was a reduction of $7, but the sales tax reduction alone in this case is $7.13.

Mr. McMASTER: Do the prices quoted include the sales tax?

Mr. STEVENS: I am quoting the exact Ontario list price officially issued by the factory.

Mr. McMASTER: Does that list price include the sales tax or not?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, in each case. In any event it would not make any difference whether it did or not, although I am informed it does, because in each case the net price is exactly the same. They issue the list to the dealers, who I presume get their discount of 10 or 15 per cent; whatever their commission may be. The prices are the same in all cases and they are taken from the official lists issued from 1916 to 1924.

Mr. FORKE: What is the date in relation to the second last item, the wagon, mentioned by the hon. member?

Mr. STEVENS: November 1, 1923. I gave two figures for 1923. Two price lists were issued, one on February 21, 1923 and the other on November 21, 1923, and in regard to each article there was a substantial increase in the November over the February, 1923, price.

Mr. HEALY: What is the name of the firm who issued the list from which the hon. member is quoting?

Mr. STEVENS: I am giving the lists of the Massey-Harris and International companies.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I want to be quite certain as to whether the sales tax is added to the prices or not. If the hon. member is quoting one set of prices to which the tax is added and another set of prices without any sales tax the difference is an important one.

Mr. STEVENS: It does not make any difference whether the price includes the sales tax or not, because I am showing that the reduction in each case is approximately only that of the sales tax, or a little less.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: If the sales tax is added to the list price afterwards, during the years in which the tax was applied, then it does make a difference.

Mr. STEVENS: In all cases the International and Massey-Harris include the net sales price in their list.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: That is what I wanted to be sure of.

Mr. STEVENS: Now let me turn to another aspect of the case. We have to consider the price of material, and I am taking now the base price of iron. The base price, as all hon. members know, is the price of iron of a certain standard; then different processes, different sizes, and so forth tend to vary it. This price is known as the base Pittsburgh price, or the base price Canada, as the case may be. That is the reason why I have given in the table the figures in regard to the base price of iron in Canada per 100 pounds during a period of years, and while I do not expect hon. members to bear the figures in mind as I have read them, they will be available in Hansard for purposes of comparison. It will be interesting to the committee to study them at leisure.

I have here the average price, Canada and Pittsburgh, and I want to give the figures over a number of years. These are the various prices of bar iron and steel per 100 pounds, the base price in Canada being as at Hamilton. I am giving the average for each year in Canada with the average at Pittsburgh, and one will be in a position to compare them. I would ask hon. members to note the first figures and compare them carefully with the later ones because this comparison has a bearing on the argument I wish to present.

	Base Price Canada	Average for Year Pittsburgh	Average Canada
1914..	$1 65	$1 60	$1 27 Plus 33c.
1915..	1 55	1 60	1 32 Plus 30c.
1916..	2 12	2 27	2 59 Minus 32c.
1917..	3 14	3 34	4 09 Minus 75c.
1918..	4 01	4 06	3 50 Plus 56c.
1919..	3 42	3 20	2 80 Plus 40c.
1920..	3 37	3 52	4 13 Minus 61c.
1921..	3 52	3 02	2 30 Plus 72c.
1922..	2 37	2 45	2 04 Plus 41c.
1923..	2 72	2 93	2 68 Plus 25c.

It will be noted that during ten years Canada had a lower price on three occasions and a higher price than the base price Pittsburgh in the other years. With the exception of two years the price ranged about 30 cents higher than the United States price.

Mr. CALDWELL: The hon. member read so quickly that I did not gather whether he had given the average Pittsburgh price.

Mr. STEVENS: I have given it.

Mr. HEALY: Does the base price, Canada, apply to Hamilton alone?

Mr. STEVENS: It is the base price quoted in Hamilton for this steel. I do not wish to be drawn off into a discussion as to whether the Dominion Iron and Steel Company in Nova Scotia and the Canadian Steel Company in Ontario give the same base price. I do not know. I am giving the base price in Hamilton.

Mr. HEALY: I was not intending to enter into any discussion about Nova Scotia. But when the hon. member is giving the base price in Canada, I would tell him that the freight rate from Pittsburgh and from Hamilton, for instance, to the border cities has a great deal to do with the base price of steel, and that in giving those figures he is misleading the committee.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not say this with any desire to arouse the ire of my hon. friend. I am quite aware that one can go into all manner of analyses and discussion on this subject. I am trying to give the committee certain basic figures, and then I want to make some reference to them.

Mr. McMASTER: Before the hon. member proceeds may I ask this question? Is the base price at Pittsburgh which he has quoted for the year or on a certain date?

Mr. STEVENS: The average for the year. I gave the average in Canada as well as a specific figure for the month of November. I could give others but there is no object in doing so. Now, this is a point which the committee ought to consider: In the production of these iron and steel products certain processes are gone through. The reason I am referring to these processes is because I purpose showing that the losses to Canadian industry are far beyond the very small advantage given by the so-called reduction in the sales tax; in a word, the immediate gains are not such as to warrant the serious losses to these other industries. A great many industries are affected. First you have the blast furnace, which simply takes the ore and produces the pig; then you have the open hearth system, the raw material of which is pig iron and steel scrap, and which produces steel ingots; then you have the blooming mills, the raw material of which is the steel ingot, and the product of which is the billet; then you have the rolling mill, the raw material of which is scrap iron and steel billets, and the product of which is iron and steel bars; then you have the next step in connection with implements, the factory which turns out bolts, nuts, bars, screws, washers, and so on, whose raw material of course is the iron and steel bars. Let me turn from them to a very brief analysis of the effect of the reductions upon these industries. Coal for use in the manufacture of coke for blast furnace operation is subject to a drawback of 90 per cent. I should like the committee to bear in mind that this drawback is given only on coal used for the production of coke. Now then, if these resolutions pass, iron and steel bars used in the manufacture of the articles which we have under consideration will be admitted free. The Canadian rolling mills are called upon to pay a duty of 53 cents a ton upon their coal, and on the class of coal they use this runs to a duty of between 20 and 22 per cent. They also pay duty on their machinery and on their rolls of 27½ per cent, and a sales tax on all supplies of castings and parts of machinery—all the vast quantity of material that enters into their daily operation.

Mr. McMASTER: If I may interrupt, the hon. member stated that the duty on coal would amount to an ad valorem of almost 20 per cent. Would he develop that a little? It seems a very high duty.

Mr. STEVENS: The class of coal and the quantity used would permit of its purchase, I presume, around $2.50 to $3 a ton.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Slack.

Mr. STEVENS: It would be a very low-grade coal.

An hon. MEMBER: What sort of coal?

Mr. STEVENS: It would be probably what is known as bituminous slack after the larger steam coal was taken from it. For instance, a large sugar refinery in my city buys nothing else but this slack coal and gets it at the very low figure of about $2 a ton. My hon. friend will see that a specific duty of 53 cents a ton amounts to a substantial ad valorem in such a case.

Mr. HUGHES: Is it not a fact that on that class of coal the duty is only 14 cents?

Mr. STEVENS: Not that I know of.

Mr. HUGHES: I know the coal miners were complaining that the duty on slack coal was very much less than on other classes of coal.

Mr. STEVENS: I would be very much surprised if my hon. friend is correct.

Mr. HUGHES: I think I am correct.

Mr. MALCOLM: The duty on slack coal is 14 cents a ton.

Mr. STEVENS: I am told my hon. friend is right. But the higher grade coal used in these rolling mills, which I am informed is not always slack, is subject to a duty of 53 cents a ton.

Mr. HUGHES: But my hon. friend was advancing the argument that slack coal was used by the industries he mentioned.

Mr. STEVENS: I quite admit that, but I did not affirm definitely that slack coal was used. I was questioned as to the low price. I think the industries I am referring to get their coal at a very low price.

Mr. HUGHES: It would work out at about 7 per cent.

Mr. STEVENS; Well, they pay this duty of 53 cents a ton. The mills whose product enters into the manufacture of these implements are called upon to compete with United States mills which do not pay the taxes to which I refer, neither have they any sales tax to pay, and of course they are not subject to duty in the sense that our people are because they are the mass producers and the controllers of the world's market in respect to steel products, and also in respect to coal so far as eastern Canada is concerned. Now, as a matter of fact, when you analyse this resolution it constitutes, not merely free trade but an actual premium to American manufacturers of these raw materials which enter into the manufacture of our implements. The only article which the producer of the raw material has any advantage on is fire-brick; he gets a reduction which really amounts to very little. I presume it is hopeless to make any suggestions in this line; the budget has been debated and the government has a substantial majority. But, now that we are away from the generalities of the budget debate it might be well to consider the effects of the item which is under consideration. Now, I do not wish to be misunderstood; I am not advocating a lowering of duties, but I am tempted to ask the Acting Minister of Finance this question: When the government reduced the duty on farm implements why did they not apply the same principle to rods, bars, bolts, nuts, screws, iron products and all the other articles that enter into the manufacture of farm implements? Why not apply the same principle to them? Why not extend to them a compensating reduction? Let me make myself clear; I am not arguing for it; I am absolutely opposed to it. But when you adopt that principle in connection with farm implements, why penalize the Canadian manufacturer of the raw material? The minister was about to answer me a moment ago; perhaps he would be good enough now to give his views on that point.

Mr. ROBB: I was going to ask my hon. friend if he would assure me of his support if I undertook to do that.

Mr. STEVENS: Absolutely no, and I will say why: I believe in a fiscal policy for Canada that will enable us to develop the natural resources in iron, coal, copper and other mineral products, their manufacture in Canada and the perfecting of them to the highest degree possible from a manufacturing standpoint, and I believe that cannot be done under any free trade policy. But the minister does not give me any reason why he follows this half-and-half policy of giving a reduction to the manufacturer of farm implements, of which that manufacturer hands to the producer merely the sales tax.

Mr. KELLNER: Would my hon. friend repeat the figures he quoted in respect to the price of binders and the reduction by reason of the sales tax?

Mr. STEVENS: I will give my hon. friend the figures; they are really interesting. These three sets of figures alone will warrant one in pausing to consider whether any benefit is to result from the present proposals. In February, 1923, the list price of a binder was $243. In November, 1923, the manufacturer raised the price to $264. That is the point I want hon. members to become seized of. Then on April 11, after the budget was brought down, they issued a new list reducing the price to $251. The reduction of the sales price from the previous list of $264 should amount to $14.20, whereas the actual reduction is only $13. Taking a further calculation of duty—and I am not certain of the figure I am about to give, though I am quite satisfied it is correct—the American price for this article was $226. Add to that the sales tax and the duty, and you get approximately the Canadian price. If you calculate the reduction of the tariff plus the sales tax you are left in the position where you are actually $11 worse off than you were prior to the bringing down of this budget; that is, you are getting $11 less than you are supposed to get. But even leaving all that calculation aside—this is the point I want to make clear—it must be remembered that the sales tax has nothing whatever to do with the protective principle or the protective policy of this country. The sales tax is a specific and special tax and is so designated in the statute. Parliament can remove the sales tax off anything. For instance, in our list of exemptions we have a very long list of foodstuffs, canned goods, and so on, and now farm implements; so that the reduction or removal of the sales tax is simply a voluntary act of parliament which nobody criticises or questions. But while the duties have been reduced on farm implements the farmer is not getting one cent of the value of the so-called reduction. On the other hand, the manufacturer of the raw material entering into these implements is faced not with fair free trade competition with his competitor south of the line, but with the granting of an actual premium to that competitor because of the added taxes on this side compared to those prevailing in the United States.

Mr. COOTE: What was the date of the price list in which the price of a binder was given at $264?

Mr. STEVENS: November, 1923.

Mr. COOTE: Has my hon. friend the price list which was issued about the first week in January, 1924?

Mr. STEVENS: No. I was under the impression that a price list had been issued in Jnauary, 1924, but I have not discovered it; I have not been able to obtain it. When I myself raised that very question the answer came that the November, 1923, list was intended for the trade of 1924.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): I notice that the Massey-Harris price list for 1923-24 gives binders at $280.

Mr. STEVENS: That may be a different size. There are a number of different kinds of binders—the 6-foot binder, the 7-foot binder, and I think there is a larger one. Then there is a binder with certain stooking attachments, and so on. But the binder I had reference to was the one which I think is most commonly used, the ordinary 7-foot binder. I remember the price list figure that my hon. friend refers to, $280. It had certain identifying letters beside it; I have forgotten just what they represented, but I presume stookers, bundle carriers, or certain attachments of that kind. That is really all I want to say in connection with this matter. I wanted to lay before the committee what appeared to me to be these very stubborn and unanswerable facts. I wanted to show to the committee that the assumed benefit to the consumer is very slight, and largely, if not wholly, imaginary if you remove the sales tax, and that the so-called compensating features to the implement manufacturer constitute really a threat of ruin to a large number of the industries supplying the raw materials to these manufacturers.

Mr. COOTE: I was much interested in the statement that has just been given to the committee by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, and I would like to ask the Minister of Customs this question in regard to the sales tax and the duty which the hon. member for Vancouver Centre referred to as having to be added to the price of this binder in the United States. He said the price in the United States was $226, and if we added to that the sales tax and the tariff, we would find that the price was approximately the same as the Canadian price. Would the minister be good enough to tell the committee whether in computing the sales tax and the tariff on these imported goods, they use the retail price of the implement in the United States, or do they take what is called the manufacturers' price, simply the cost of producing the implement at the factory? I think that is a very important point. I have been told that the factory price of these implements is not more than 50 per cent of the price the farmer has to pay when he buys the implement.

Mr. BUREAU: The price on which we compute the duty is the consumption price at the place of manufacture. If a retailer imports a machine, he pays on the retail price; if a wholesaler imports a machine, he pays on the manufacturer's price. It is the consumption price at the place from which the goods are exported.

Mr. COOTE: Then it would not be fair to assume that the International Harvesters Company or the John Deere Company would pay the sales tax and the tariff based on the retail price in the United States?

Mr. BUREAU: No, it is the home consumption price. Suppose you buy 1,000 machines; the duty will be computed on the price the wholesaler in the United States pays.

Mr. COOTE: I just wanted to have that made clear to the committee.

In regard to the argument of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre as to the hardship which is worked on the manufacturer of these bars, I think that simply proves that you cannot make a tariff that will not work a hardship on somebody, and the farmer is in this position to-day with respect to these implements that are now being placed on the free list, that he has to pay a tariff tax of 75 per cent on all the stuff he buys, and accept a free trade price for practically everything he sells.

I have been very much interested in the discussion regarding agricultural implements and I have been appalled by the ignorance displayed by some hon. members in this House with regard to this question. I would like to take a few minutes to give to this committee some reasons why the farm implement manufacturers in this country are not able to return dividends at the present time to their shareholders. I have had some actual experience in connection with the farm implement men.

Mr. BUREAU: The hon. member says they are not paying dividends any more.

Mr. COOTE: I am not saying so.

Mr. BUREAU: I thought the hon. member said they were not paying dividends any more, and the question I would ask is this: If we take the duty and the sales tax off an article, and you still have to pay the same price for it, where does the difference go? I should like some one to enlighten me on that point.

Mr. COOTE: I will leave it to some of the members on my right to answer that question. I think that the committee possibly needs some enlightenment in regard to this farm implement question. I have talked the matter over with some farm implement men in western Canada, and I think I can give you a little first-hand information. In the first week of January there was announced in western Canada an increase in the price of farm implements. That may be the list the hon. member for Vancouver Centre has given us, and which he referred to as dated November 1, but the advance I refer to was not made public in western Canada until the first week of January, I think. I am not going to read a list at all, but I should like to quote one paragraph from the Manitoba Free Press of January 11 last:

> One reason given by Winnipeg manufacturers and distributing branches for the increase is the advance in the sales tax on agricultural implements, which has gone from 4½ to 6 per cent. The other explanations are increased cost of labour and raw materials, which the implement men claim have driven nearly all the big concerns close to the financial rocks.

Now the sales tax has been removed; the duty has been taken off most of their raw materials, and the increase in the cost of labour is a myth, because I find from returns that I have obtained from the Department of Labour that the wages of mechanics show no increase over their wages of last year. When I was in Calgary in the first week of January, in conversation with the manager of one of the large implement warehouses there, I was informed that the price of implements was being advanced again, and that the price of the 8-foot binder, which is the standard binder in Alberta, was being increased from $287 to $317. "Surely," I said to him, "you would not have the heart to ask the farmer to pay $30 more for a binder than he did last year." "Well," he said, "to make anything on this binder we must advance the price." I said: "I can tell you with equal truth that the farmer must have more than 74 cents a bushel to make anything at raising wheat, but that is the price he must take to-day." "Well," he said, "we are in a different position from the farmer, because we do not have to sell these implements until we get our price for them."

[Mr. Coote.]

Now I want to ask hon. gentlemen, would they blame any representative of a farming community for voting for a budget that was endeavouring to provide cheaper implements? It is the callous indifference of the implement men that would induce me, if I had no other reason, to support a reduction in the tariff on agricultural implements.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Would the hon. gentleman tell me who that was?

Mr. COOTE: I would, in private.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think it should be private at all. If the House is to rely upon the statement, we should know who makes it.

Mr. COOTE: The same gentleman also told me that the four big machine companies operating in Alberta, in collecting from the farmers on their notes, had secured only 12 per cent in the case of the lowest one, and 20 per cent in the case of the highest. The percentages for the different companies were, if I remember rightly, 12, 15, 18 and 20 per cent. Alberta had the biggest crop in her history last year.

Mr. ARTHURS: What companies does the hon. member refer to?

Mr. COOTE: The Cockshutt Plow Company, the International Harvester Company, the Massey-Harris Company, and the John Deere Company. Now if that was all these machine companies were able to collect last year, when Alberta had the biggest crop in her history, we can readily see that the position of the farmer is certainly a serious one, and it is no wonder they are not able to buy these implements. Hon. gentlemen should be aware by this time of the fact that a very large percentage of the farmers in western Canada are now working for the banks or the mortgage companies; they are managing their farms for the benefit of those institutions. Let me say that in conversation with the manager of a branch bank in Alberta in January last in regard to this very advance in the price of implements he said: "The prices of these implements are altogether too high and the farmers should go on strike and not buy implements at all. As a matter of fact we have made it a practice here of insisting, in the case of any farmer that we are financing to any extent, that he should not buy any new implements." Now, these banks are in a position to tell the majority of the farmers in Alberta just what they can or cannot buy. If the bank managers will not let them buy implements it is a certainty that the implement companies cannot sell their machines.

I understand that the president of the Bank of Commerce, Sir John Aird, is also a director of the Cockshutt Plough Company. If Sir John Aird cannot solve this problem of how the farmers are to be allowed to buy the implements that the Cockshutt Plough Company is making, then this House will have to take a hand in the matter and see if it can help out in any way; otherwise the farm machine business is going to be in a worse plight than it was before. The way the farm implement men of Canada now take care of their overhead is by simply adding it to the number of machines that they sell, and as the number of machines which they are able to sell dwindles, the overhead which is charged to each of the implements increases. Where is this thing going to end? I think this budget has done one thing: It has put the machine men in the position where they can offer the farmer cheaper implements. If they do not do so I think this House should take some action at its next session to see whether cheaper implements cannot be offered to the farmer.

I should like now to take a few more minutes, if I may be allowed the necessary time, to show why the farmer must have cheaper implements if he is to carry on, particularly the western farmer. I know we should not discuss these matters in a sectional way but in a little booklet issued by the Massey Harris Company—a copy of which was sent I think to every member—it is stated at page 12 that the gross yearly return of the farmers in the Maritime provinces was 35 per cent on their invested capital.

Mr. CALDWELL: That is the gross return?

Mr. COOTE: Yes. In Ontario and Quebec the gross return was 27 per cent on the capital invested. In the prairie provinces the gross return was equal to 15 per cent on the invested capital. In this same booklet, on the following page, I find these sentences:

> The purchasing power of the farmer's and the manufacturer's dollar has greatly shrunken since 1913. The farmer's dollar worth 100 cents before the war, is estimated by the government bureau of statistics to be worth now only 54 cents.

Then I find that according to the monthly bulletin of agricultural statistics for March, page 104, index numbers of agricultural prices which show that compared with the period from 1909 to 1913 the prices to-day of all field crops are 100.7 per cent practically the same as they were before the war. Carrying these figures out will show that wheat to-day has a purchasing power of 54 per cent of what it had before the war; oats 52 per cent; barley 48 per cent; and rye 35 per cent. The farmers' cattle to-day have a purchasing power compared with the period 1909 to 1913 of 33 per cent, and select hogs have a purchasing power of 57 per cent.

Now I want to come to the item which I think is the biggest handicap under which the farmer, particularly the western farmer, is labouring to-day. We have all received pamphlets through the mail from woollen manufacturers stating that they could not compete with the manufacturers who live or operate in countries with a depreciated currency. The Canadian farmer to-day is producing largely for an export market, and the price on that market is setting the price for his produce. That is particularly true as regards grain and cattle. When we come to export our wheat to Britain we find that we are competing principally with these countries. Australia whose currency has depreciated about 9 per cent compared with ours; the Argentine whose currency has depreciated about 16 per cent; India with a depreciated currency of about 39 per cent; Denmark with a depreciated currency of about 39 per cent; and Britain whose currency has depreciated about 12 per cent compared with ours. These depreciated currencies constitute a real handicap. I should like to quote from a report in the Commercial Intelligence Journal of March last, page 373, by our trade commissioner in Australia. Referring to the price and sales of wheat in that country he says:

> British importers * * * being penalized by the low conversion rates of sterling into dollars, endeavoured to obtain their wheat requirements from Australia rather than from Canada and the United States and this accentuated the demand.

I shall not dwell on this subject any longer but I wish I could impress upon the House the necessity of dealing with this question of depreciated currency. I wish the people of this country could be led to think of something else than the pride they feel in the national dollar. They might even consider whether it would not be wise to allow our dollar to depreciate a little so that we could compete with these other countries.

Mr. McMASTER: Inflation.

Mr. COOTE: You can call it inflation or anything you like. I put it up to every hon. member to explain to the western farmer how he is going to compete in the British market with all these countries which are raising products similar to ours if our exchange is at such a premium compared with theirs. When the Canadian farmer sends enough wheat to Britain to be worth £100 on bringing the proceeds back he finds it to be worth only about $440. On the other hand when the Australian farmer brings back the proceeds of his £100 he finds he can convert it practically into Australian money at par.

Mr. ARTHURS: Would my hon. friend follow that example in regard to Germany?

Mr. COOTE: No, Mr. Chairman, in this instance I am not going to Germany for an example. I am trying to put the problem before the members of the committee. It is a real problem, and is more responsible for the condition in western Canada, I think, than even the tariff, and cannot be lightly dismissed. The question of the position of the western farmer is a very burning one, because in the case of a large percentage at least of our farmers their total production over the actual existence line—that is their bread and butter, food and clothing—goes to pay interest. When the rate of exchange was depreciated about eighteen per cent two years ago, if one of our farmers shipped a car of cattle to Chicago and brought back a draft on Chicago for $1,000, he was able to take that draft into the bank and secure $1,180 for it, and the $180 that he received as a premium would go a long way to offset the amount of tariff which he paid to get his cattle into the United States. The same principle holds true with the wheat and cattle that we are shipping to Great Britain.

Mr. McMASTER: But when the Canadian dollar was at a relatively lower figure than the American dollar and the Canadian farmer wanted to buy goods from the United States—and some goods had to be bought there—he would have to pay more.

Mr. COOTE: Yes, he would pay more; but the share of his production which was going to pay interest and to pay off his debt he was formerly able to bring back as premium, namely about one-sixth. This is a question that must be faced, because of the load of debt resting upon our farmers. We must act so as to bring prosperity to our farmers. And when the farmers prosper the result is prosperity to the manufacturers. The farm produces the largest share of the market for manufacturers, and I know that my hon. friends to my right will not despise the home market. The manufacturers must have a home market as well as the farmers, in fact I think they are more dependent upon it. I think in this country we all appreciate the value of a home market; at the same time we know we must import certain goods. We have an interest bill to pay on five billion dollars, and we must have exports to pay this interest. We are going to depend more largely upon the farmer than on any other one class to furnish the exports. Under present conditions I do not think the farmer can very well continue to carry on long. I wish that I could impress strongly upon the committee the necessity of dealing with this question.

Mr. ROBB: Before you leave the chair, Mr. Chairman, I desire to move that the figures "456" be inserted after 453b. This is in regard to the ingot moulds used in the production of steel. The present rates are 5 per cent, 7½ per cent and 10 per cent. We propose to make them free. I will explain the matter when the item is taken up.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I thought we were going to get through the first day without any changes. Would the minister give us the significance of this amendment?

Mr. ROBB: It has already been announced. The announcement has been on Hansard for some time.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question being put, pursuant to rule.

The House met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

CANADIAN NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL TRAINS—MAIL

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River):

1. Do the Canadian National transcontinental trains numbers 1 and 2 carry mail in either direction from coast to coast?
2. If so, what are the revenues received therefrom?
3. Does mail from stations in the vicinity of Jasper Park go through to Vancouver when westbound?
4. If not, what is the routing practised, and what railway company carry the mail?

Hon. Mr. STEWART (for the Postmaster General):

1. Mails are carried on these trains between the following points: Halifax, N.S., and Montreal, P.Q.; Cochrane, Ont.; and Winnipeg, Man.; Winnipeg, Man.; and Melville, Sask.; Lucerne, B.C.; and Kamloops, B.C.
2. $270,094.62 per annum.
3. Yes, but not direct.
4. By Canadian National Railway train 3 to Lucerne, B.C.; Canadian National Railway train 1 Lucerne to Kamloops, B.C.; Canadian Pacific Railway train Kamloops to Vancouver, B.C.

ARMENIAN IMMIGRATION

Mr. ELLIOTT (Waterloo):

1. Is the government discouraging Armenian immigration into Canada?
2. If so, why?
3. How many Armenians have entered Canada since January 1st, 1924?

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

1. The immigration regulation impose upon Armenians as well as upon immigrants of many other nationalities an occupational test and also upon Armenians as well as upon other Asiatics the money test. The occupation test restricts immigration from Armenia to, (a) farmers and farm labourers coming to settle on the land; (b) women coming to engage in housework; and (c) the wife and minor children of any person legally resident in Canada. The money test is $250 and Asiatic immigrants are required to be in possession of $250 as a condition of landing. This, however, does not apply to a wife or minor children. As Armenians seldom farm in Canada, it naturally follows that the application of the immigration regulations reduces Armenian immigration to a small number annually.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. Incomplete returns to the end of April give the number of admissions as 163.

HOME BANK

Mr. SPENCER:

1. Did the officials of the Home Bank approach the Finance department of the government in 1923 to obtain an advance or advances under the Finance Act?
2. If so, on what date or dates, and for what amounts?
3. If a refusal was made, what reasons were given for same?

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

1. No fresh advances were applied for.

2 and 3. Prior to May 1st, on which date all loans under the Finance Act became due, the bank made formal application for the authorization of a standing credit up to $3,000,000 against securities acceptable to the Treasury Board, including the renewal of an outstanding loan of $220,000 secured by Dominion bonds of a like amount. This application was approved, but the bank did not submit any additional securities or avail itself of the provision apart from the renewal of the existing loan.

HON. MR. MURDOCK AND HOME BANK

Mr. E. GUSS PORTER (West Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I propose to move a resolution which affects not only the public interest but the honour of this House. It affects more particularly, in fact very particularly, the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock). I have taken occasion, Sir, to notify him of my intention, and I have also supplied him with a copy of the resolution. I have received a reply from him that the action about to be taken by me is satisfactory to him.

The matter concerned is the relation of and dealings by the hon. minister, in his personal capacity and as minister of the Crown, with the defunct Home Bank, these dealings being confined to the day or two prior to its failure. It had been my intention to bring this matter before the House at an earlier date, but unfortunately I did not find an opportunity of doing so.

In presenting what I have to say in this connection I have no desire whatever to express a personal opinion or to comment upon the facts. I desire only to bring the facts as they have been disclosed to me to the attention of the House for such action as the House may see fit to take in the circumstances. I can only undertake to state, in addition to the facts as they have been disclosed to me, certain principles and rules of parliament which, the evidence has convinced me, have been infringed by the hon. minister.

In moving this resolution I hope that my intentions will not be misconstrued or my language misapprehended. I have no personal quarrel with the hon. minister; in fact I have no personal acquaintance with the hon. gentleman further than to have met him occasionally in the corridors of the House. I have no quarrel with him as minister of the department over which he presides or as a representative of that class of people with whose interests he is most intimately connected. I have no Home Bank depositors or shareholders, so far as I know, in the riding which I have the honour to represent in this House. I have no political feeling in the matter; I have tried as best I can to divest myself of any feeling of that character, and I only desire and hope that what I may say in connection with this matter may be received by the House in that spirit. My only desire, my only intention in moving this resolution is that the dignity and the honour of parliament may be preserved, that its rights, its privileges and its traditions may not be infringed upon either by the hon. minister who is here charged or by any other hon. member. It is just as important that the honour and integrity of a member of the House or the government should at all times be sustained as it is that the honour of the House should be sustained, and it is with that double view that I take this action. Without that preservation of the integrity of ministers of the Crown particularly, and of members of the House in general, it would be impossible to carry on with any degree of safety the affairs of government. A disregard of the honour and traditions of parliament can only bring condemnation to any government, and it must in the end bring not only utter failure but disgrace upon the government of Canada. The importance, therefore, of the maintenance of the honour of a member of parliament or of a member of the government is evident.

I find, not only from my own recollection of political affairs, but upon searching the public records of Canada, that the Canadian government has been singularly free from lapses of public rectitude. There are only a few cases on record, and I find that in all those cases—and it is only what might have been expected—neither the parliament nor the public of Canada were slow in applying punishment where the conduct of a minister or of a member called for it. In all my searching, which has been somewhat extensive, I have not found a case where upon conduct being alleged such as I intend to charge here, the investigation asked for was refused by parliament. It is therefore with a great deal of confidence that I bring this motion before the House, believing, as I do, that the precedent established by parliament will be followed in this case and that an investigation of the charges I am about to make will be granted, in order not only that the honour of parliament may be vindicated and the traditions of parliament maintained, but, that the integrity, honesty and faithfulness to office and duty on the part of the minister will be established.

The matter to which I particularly refer came to the public knowledge as long ago as the 20th of February, 1924, in an article published in the Ottawa Journal, in which the minister was charged with the same offence, if I may so designate it—charged with the same thing that I am about to charge him with to-day. In the Mail and Empire of the 29th February he was similarly charged. I do not propose to read those articles, because I do not think it would be fair or just, nor do I believe that newspaper articles are competent or sufficient evidence. I only mention these charges made through the public press to indicate to the House that the public, and that includes the minister and the government, became aware of them at that time.

The British parliament, which we are all glad to look to as our example in connection with the preservation of the dignity of parliament, the proper conduct of public affairs and many other matters, has always been very careful in preserving the dignity of that House and in seeing that the conduct of ministers of the Crown is in accord with the principles that they have laid down and have always, I believe, succeeded in following. That is one of the principles—the principle laid down by the British parliament—that I am invoking here to-day. Let me quote the words of a very eminent minister of the British government, Sir Rufus Isaacs, then Solicitor General, in this connection. He said:

> If a minister should use any information which he obtains as a minister for the purpose of furthering his own interests, he is deserving of censure.

Further he says:

> Whether the minister was personally wicked is not the point. The question is whether the precedent which he sets up is a bad one.

And further:

> Apart from all personal motives and personal considerations, whether the facts as known to the public establish a precedent which he can safely allow to stand.

The British parliament, so far as I have been able to discover, has never undertaken to define in so many words, or in any one particular rule, what conduct shall, or what conduct shall not, constitute an infringement of that rule. It is, as has been stated in some of the discussions, a matter of the honour of a member and of the dignity of parliament, which alone is in the keeping and charge of parliament itself. No one could possibly imagine exactly what line of conduct might come before parliament in a matter of that character, and so I take it that it has been impossible, or if not impossible, that it was at least considered inadvisable, that parliament should lay down any particular rule within the four corners of which a minister or a member must come in order to merit condemnation for any action that he might be guilty of. Sir Rufus Isaacs, to whom I have referred, was himself charged with a breach of his duty as a minister of the Crown, and I might say also that in that he was charged jointly with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and on that occasion when the matter came before parliament on a direct charge against these two ministers of the Crown, Sir Rufus Isaacs used this further language:

> No minister should use any information which he obtains as a minister for the purpose of furthering his private interests.

And Mr. Asquith, when Prime Minister of Great Britain, on that same occasion used this language:

> No minister is justified under any circumstances in using official information that has come to him as a minister for his own profit or for that of his friends—

He adds this further, broadening out the rule and seeing that it is not too much confined:

—or as to which from their position and their special means of early or confidential information, they have or may have an advantage over other people.

Now with those principles established on the authority to which I have referred, and which principles I invoke, I would like for a few moments to direct the attention of the House to the position that a minister of the Crown occupies, in his duty to the Crown, his duty to the public, and his personal interests. As a minister of the Crown I think it is apparent, and will at once be acknowledged, that he becomes a trustee for the Crown. His election to parliament makes him necessarily a trustee for the people, and his position as a minister makes him more so perhaps, if the obligation can be increased, than if he were an ordinary member of parliament. His personal interests are, at once upon his election to the honourable position of a minister of the Crown, subordinated to his obligations as such trustee. His obligations as a trustee for the Crown and as a trustee for all the people are far and away superior to any rights that he may personally enjoy. The general law of trusts, which is founded, as we all know, by centuries of practice on what is just and right, applies with all its force to a member or a minister who occupies the position of a trustee. I do not think it will require any elaboration or argument on my part to establish that point. May I add that if a trustee in any capacity uses his position as trustee to gain some advantage to himself or in his own personal right, that is a breach of the very first obligation, and the greatest obligation that a trustee can possibly assume.

Now may I ask the House to assume, and only for the moment to illustrate my argument, that the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) did receive as a minister of the Crown, information as to the financial condition of the Home Bank. Could he go out on the street and divulge to the public the information that he received? The very obligation of his office would prevent his doing that. If he could not do that and give the public, those for whom he is a trustee, the benefit of his knowledge, let me ask, in all decency, could a minister of the Crown use that knowledge that he was denying and was bound to deny to the public, for his own personal knowledge? I have only to state the case, I think, to convince hon. members of this House that such conduct would merit the condemnation not only of parliament but of the people as a whole.

I had occasion to read a synopsis of the evidence given by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) before the Home Bank Commission just a few days ago, and I was very glad to see that the right hon. gentleman himself took the very position that I am—I was going to say urging on the House to-day, but I do not need to urge it, I need only mention it—the Prime Minister himself took the position I have mentioned, for he stated that his obligations of office precluded him from making any statement to the Home Bank Commissioner as to what had taken place in cabinet meetings, and he even went so far as to say that he could not—and he did not—disclose the names of members of the government who were present at a meeting of the cabinet.

Now, when the minister (Mr. Murdock) became aware of the charges contained in newspaper reports, and that his honour was impugned, it seems to me the obligation devolved upon him at that time to rise in his place in the House and clear the matter up, and disavow if he could those charges. The course was open to him to rise in his place and deny the charges that had been made. He could then have furnished proper and sufficient evidence, if such was available, giving all the particulars in regard to his withdrawal of his funds from the Home Bank at that particular time. Had he done that, parliament and the public might have been satisfied and the matter might not have gone any further. But the hon. minister did not do that. He prefered to remain silent, preferred to make no answer to parliament at all; and the charges made stand to-day so far as parliament and the public are concerned.

Then the matter came up incidentally in this House on the 27th March. I say "incidentally" because the questions put at that time were not of a direct character. On the date referred to the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) questioned the Prime Minister as follows:

Will the hon. Prime Minister give us now, if he has them, the representations made by the directors who were here begging government assistance? He has got them.

Mr. Mackenzie King: I do not know what representations my hon. friend has reference to, but any representations made to the government will be placed before the commission, whatever they are and wherever they are.

The Prime Minister has been before the commission, "whatever they are and wherever they are" and I fail to find in his evidence anywhere that that information was placed before them.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I may say to my hon. friend that as soon as the commission was appointed I forwarded to it the representations that were made to the government.

Mr. PORTER: That does not appear in the public records.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It appears in the records of the commission.

Mr. PORTER: What I am stating is that there was an opportunity for the Prime Minister at that time to make a statement in a public way and not by private letter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was a public letter.

Mr. PORTER: In giving his evidence he had the opportunity of meeting what I am alleging here. On the occasion in question the discussion proceeded:

Sir Henry Drayton: What I am referring to I think my hon. friend understands.
Mr. Mackenzie King: I do not.
Sir Henry Drayton: I refer to the representations made by the directors who came to Ottawa for the purpose of acquainting the government with the situation, and the statements made by them, the action taken by the government in allowing the bank to go, and the reasons for it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Those are the very matters I referred to the commission, not privately but publicly.

Mr. PORTER: I am not saying there was not a reference made to the commission. What I am stating, and reiterating, is that there was an oportunity for the Prime Minister to make a statement at that time but he did not do it. Therefore I think I am perfectly justified in saying that not only has the Minister of Labour had ample opportunity to disavow these charges, but the Prime Minister has also had the opportunity, if he desired to do so, to state before parliament what took place. The Prime Minister had the second opportunity of making such a statement when he was before the commission.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is my hon. friend referring to now? Is he saying there were representations made to the government in reference to the very charges he is preferring at the present time?

Mr. PORTER: Not to the charges but to the facts upon which the charges were based.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There have been no representations made to the government in this matter. The hon. member is at the present moment making the first representation that has been made on this subject.

Mr. PORTER: My right hon. friend does not understand me, apparently.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I certainly do not.

Mr. PORTER: I thought I had made it quite plain. The Prime Minister was asked by the hon. member for West York to state what representations were made by the directors of the Home Bank. My right hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King) has never made any statement as to what the representations were.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have made the statement over and over again, that I would transfer to the commission all representations that were made to the government, and I have done so.

Mr. PORTER: I am bound to accept the Prime Minister's statement but the public is not aware of that fact.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, it is.

Mr. PORTER: I cannot find in the evidence any statement of such a character at all. Now, what the Prime Minister said was that any representations made to the government would be placed before the commission, "whatever they are and wherever they are." Ample opportunity has been given for the Prime Minister to inform the House and the public just what was brought before the cabinet, or members of the government, in connection with this matter and he has not taken advantage of that opportunity. Neither has the minister (Mr. Murdock) made any statement which would satisfy the public and clear his own reputation, and the fact of his not having done so leaves the public and this House in a condition of suspense and suspicion which might otherwise not obtain.

These considerations, and the fact that neither the minister nor the Prime Minister have seen fit to avail themselves during the many weeks of opportunity offered for explaining, have urged me to move this resolution in order that the facts may become known, and the honour of parliament and the honour of the minister too may be vindicated, and it is only from that motive that I have done it.

May I now, as briefly as I can, invite the attention of the House to the facts as they have been disclosed to me and upon such reliable authority as I will be able to produce upon an investigation and evidence, which, so far as I am personally concerned, I have not the slightest doubt was honestly given to me, and that I will be able to establish these facts, as follows:

(1) That the Home Bank on the 14th day of August, 1923 held a meeting of its directors in Toronto, when it was made evident that the bank must fail unless it received assistance, and this position apparently was known for some time before.

(2) On the same day, about ten or eleven o'clock at night, certain directors of the Home Bank having proceeded to Ottawa by order of its directorate, to consult the government with regard to obtaining assistance, one or more of the directors met the Prime Minister (Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King), the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) and other members of the cabinet at the Prime Minister's house, when the disclosure of the bank's affairs was made in such a manner and to such fearful purpose as to leave the Prime Minister aghast, and under the impression that if demands were made upon the bank within the next few days the bank could not meet them; and assistance was positively and absolutely refused—on which date the government became fully aware of the serious financial condition of the bank, and on that date the members of the government became aware by the statement of the directors themselves as to what the financial condition of the bank was. There was no pleading want of knowledge after that.

(3) On the following day, the 15th of August, the cabinet held a meeting having all this knowledge before it, which was doubtless fully discussed. I do not think I need even to state that undoubtedly such an important matter as this would be fully discussed.

(4) Not obtaining assistance from the government the directors and the Acting Finance Minister proceeded to Montreal on the evening of the same day, the 15th of August, and consulted financial interests there for the purpose of obtaining help. The interests consulted in Montreal could not give answer until the following morning the 16th of August, and when they did so, no help being forthcoming, the directors returned to Toronto, and I presume the Acting Finance Minister returned to Ottawa.

(5) The next day, the 17th of August, the bank failed and closed its doors, and I need only mention the sickening trail of suffering, poverty, hardship and alleged crime left in its wake.

(6) The Hon. James Murdock had a deposit in the Home Bank, Ottawa branch, to savings account, of several thousand dollars from about the 1st of July, 1923 to the 15th of August, 1923, the day of the cabinet meeting at which the financial condition of the Home Bank was fully known and doubtless was discussed, and on the same day and very shortly after the cabinet meeting adjourned, and just before the close of banking hours, the Hon. James Murdock withdrew from his deposit in the Home Bank, Ottawa, having knowledge as such minister of its financial condition, thousands of dollars, and leaving only a small sum remaining to his credit, and from which he made further withdrawal, leaving only the infinitesimal sum of $89 there when the bank failed. I think that is the amount he stated.

(7) That in making such withdrawal the Hon. James Murdock refused to accept a marked cheque in the usual course of business, and demanded cash or legals for the amount of his withdrawal, and it being near the close of banking hours, the strong box of the bank had to be re-opened to obtain the cash which was paid over to the minister.

(8) That immediately after such withdrawal the Hon. James Murdock re-deposited the same cash or legals he had withdrawn into another bank in Ottawa to his credit.

(9) That on the following day, 16th of August, the same legals withdrawn by the Hon. James Murdock from the Home Bank were returned to it by the Royal Bank through the clearing house at Ottawa.

(10) That the Hon. James Murdock did not use the said withdrawal at that time for any purpose, but deposited it in another bank.

(11) That thousands of depositors in the Home Bank lost their deposits, entailing poverty, hardship and ruin. Many of them lost all they had in the world.

(12) The Hon. James Murdock saved his deposit, thus profiting to the extent of thousands of dollars by making use of knowledge confidentially obtained as a minister of the Crown, through the means aforesaid; and in breach of his obligation as a minister of the Crown, and in violation of the honour, dignity and traditions of parliament.

The hon. minister had saved his deposit and profited to that extent, because had his money remained in the Home Bank, as did the money of these thousands of other depositors to whom I have referred, he would have lost that money. By his action he profited to the extent of thousands of dollars that he withdrew from the bank.

Now I challenge that this was in breach of his obligation as minister of the Crown and in violation of the honour, dignity and tradition of this parliament; and for these reasons I desire to move the following resolution, seconded by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie):

That E. Guss Porter, a member representing the electoral riding of West Hastings, in this House, having declared from his seat in the House, that he is credibly informed and that he believes he is able to establish by satisfactory evidence that:

The Honourable James Murdock, Minister of Labour, did withdraw from the Home Bank, at its Ottawa branch, on the 15th day of August, 1923, two days before such bank's failure, thousands of dollars on deposit therein, to his credit, using certain information he had received as such minister, of the likely immediate failure of said bank, and had received advantage and profit to himself to the extent of such withdrawal, contrary to his obligations as such minister, and in derogation of his office and the honour, dignity and traditions of parliament:

That it be referred to the select standing committee on Privileges and Elections of this House to inquire fully into the said allegations with power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses under oath or affirmation, and that the said committee do report in full the evidence taken before them, and all other proceedings on the reference, and the result of their inquiries to this House for such action thereon as this House may determine.

Hon. JAMES MURDOCK (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am under an obligation to the hon. member for West Hastings (Mr. Porter) for having advised me yesterday that he was going to bring this matter up to-day in the resolution that he has moved. I indicated to the hon. member that his proposed action was quite agreeable to me. I am not going to make any extended remarks in regard to this matter, leaving that for the members of the House. I am as much interested as the hon. member in maintaining the honour and dignity of this House, and I have an additional concern, namely, my personal integrity and honour in the matter. May I refer to one charge that seems to be made against me. The hon. member charges that I made no attempt to clear up the charges that were made against me in the press as early as 20th February last. I should like to say in all seriousness that my experience has been that if I attempted to clear up all the charges that are made against me in the press, I might not have time to do much else.

4 p.m.

I am going to read some correspondence that speaks for itself and deals with this matter. This is the first letter:

Home Bank of Canada,
Head Office,
Toronto, May 7, 1924.

Hon. JAMES MURDOCK,
Minister of Labour,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Mr. MURDOCK,—The statement has been made to Mr. Weldon and myself, as liquidators, of the Home Bank of Canada, that withdrawals of funds from the Home Bank of Canada were made just prior to the suspension of the bank, and in some cases after its suspension, by various persons who received knowledge or an intimation of the condition of its affairs. The matter has come before the creditors' committee and counsel for the bank, who inform us that it is our duty—as we believe it is—to take steps to have these withdrawals returned. We have already in a number of cases dealt with the matter and received returns. In going over the reports we notice the withdrawal by you from the Ottawa branch, of some $4,000, and the statement made to us is that this money was withdrawn after banking hours. The contention is that you received a preference, which the statute would not allow if the facts as stated to us are correct. Under these circumstances I have felt that I should write to you about the matter and ask whether you are prepared to return the money and rank as a creditor against the estate, receiving the 25 per cent dividend that has already been paid in the connection. I shall appreciate it if you will be kind enough to let me hear from you as to whether you are willing to do so or not, or whether on the contrary you would prefer to have the matter brought before the referee for adjudication.

Yours truly,
G. T. CLARKSON.

I replied to that as follows:

Ottawa, May 14, 1924.

Dear Mr. CLARKSON:

I have your letter of the 7th instant, relative to my withdrawals of moneys from the Home Bank of Canada.

On August 15 last I withdrew from the Home Bank, Ottawa branch, $4,050 and made this withdrawal in the ordinary course of business.

In view, however, of what is set forth in your letter, and of what has been disclosed in connection with the bank's transactions in recent weeks, I propose to return the money which I then drew out.

I may say that I do not think that I am under any legal obligation to do so, but no depositor of the Home Bank will suffer through any act of mine, and especially so in my position as a minister of the Crown.

I enclose to-day my cheque for $1,050 and hope within a few days more to send you the balance, namely, $3,000. If, however, I am entitled to the benefit of the 25 per cent dividend already paid to depositors I would understand that I should only have to pay $2,000 more.

I might add that although I had already a balance of $80.24 or so there, and had filed my claim, I received no dividend on that.

Yours truly,
JAMES MURDOCK.

Mr. G. T. CLARKSON,
15 Wellington St., W.,
Toronto.

Yesterday morning, just before I received the notification from my hon. friend that he was going to deal with this matter to-day, I received the following letter:

Toronto, May 16, 1924.

Hon. JAMES MURDOCK,
Ottawa, Canada.

Re Home Bank of Canada

Dear Sir:

I am in receipt of your letter of the 14th instant for which I am obliged. I send you herewith a statement of the amount which, under my computations, it will be necessary for you to refund. From it you will see that the 25 per cent dividend paid can be credited against the withdrawal and that the net amount only will be refunded.

Your truly,
G. T. CLARKSON.

Accompanying that was this statement dated May 20, 1924:

Memo for Hon. James Murdock, Ottawa, Ont.

James Murdock Withdrawal Account

August 15—Charge.. .. ..$4,050	bal. $4,050	debit
May 16—Refunded.. 1,050	bal. 3,000	debit
May 16—25 per cent dividend on bal. ($4,140.89) 1,035 22	bal. 1,964 78	debit
Interest 5 per cent Aug. 15, 1923-May 16, 1924.. 150 30	bal. 2,115 08

That leaves a balance due, as claimed on this statement, of $2,115.08, which I might add, will go forward shortly.

Mr. PORTER: What is the date of that?

Mr. MURDOCK: The letter which accompanied the statement is dated May 16; the statement itself is dated May 20. The postmark on the envelope shows that the letter was posted at 8.30 p.m. on May 20.

So, Mr. Speaker, that is all which it would seem necessary for me to say at the present time. I leave the matter entirely in the hands of the House.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with all that the hon. member for West Hastings (Mr. Porter) has said respecting the importance of maintaining the honour, the dignity and integrity of parliament, of members of parliament, and particularly of ministers of the Crown, I am, and I believe every hon. member of this House is in most hearty accord. The hon. member was careful to state when he made his presentation to the House that he was doing so, to use his own words, "in the light of facts as they have been disclosed to me". Since he has made his statement he has had further facts disclosed to him; he has now that full information before him which hon. members would wish to have in judging matters of this kind, and I leave it to him to say whether in the light of the full knowledge which he now has he thinks he will be maintaining the dignity, integrity and honour of this House by pressing his motion to a division.

I might add, Mr. Speaker, that with respect to this particular matter any necessity for an inquiry by a select standing committee of parliament is unnecessary in view of action which the government has already taken. My hon. friend said that he hoped the government would permit an investigation of the charge which he had made. Possibly he has forgotten that quite early in the session, after the government had announced to parliament that Mr. Justice McKeown had been appointed to investigate representations which had been made to the government with regard to the interests of the depositors of the Home Bank, some hon. members drew attention to the fact that the commission appeared to be limited in the matter of time, and did not extend up to the moment of the bank's failure nor did it go back to the time when the bank itself was established. Rather than have it appear—quite erroneously, certainly—that the government was in any way seeking to circumscribe the extent of the inquiry, and in order to demonstrate our desire for the fullest possible investigation into all phases of the bank's failure, the order in council originally passed was amended on the 17th March last. I laid on the Table a copy of this amended order at the time, and I will now read it to the House in order that its terms may be incorporated as part of the record. It is as follows:

The Committee of the Privy Council have had before them a report, dated 11th March, 1924, from the Hon. G. P. Graham, for the Prime Minister, submitting that since the publication of the order in council of the 23rd February, 1924 (P.C. 306), providing for an investigation into the affairs of the Home Bank of Canada, representations have been made to the government, in the House of Commons and from other quarters, as to the advisability of extending the inquiry.

It was explained by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister that, in referring to a commissioner allegations prepared and presented to the government by the depositors of the bank, the government were possibly going as far as the depositors would think it necessary or advisable, but that in view of the representations now made, the government was prepared to have the fullest possible investigation made and to authorize the commissioner to investigate the affairs of the said bank from the issue of its charter down to the date of its failure.

The Committee of the Privy Council therefore advise that the powers of the commissioner under the said order in council be not limited to the specific years 1915, 1916 and 1918 referred to in the petition of the depositors, but should extend to an investigation of the affairs of the said bank during the whole interval between the issue of the bank's charter and the failure of the said bank, including any representations made to the government of the day, as to its condition, any action taken by any of the Ministers of Finance upon such representations as may have been made, and the effect on the position of the depositors of any audit under section 56a of the Bank Act if made at any time in consequence of such representations.

In view of additional representations which have been made to the government that at divers times while the said bank was in existence deposits were made and afterwards withdrawn by various depositors, under conditions which might require explanation, the Committee of the Privy Council further advise that the attention of the commissioner be especially directed to this feature in the course of his investigation.

So, Mr. Speaker, on the 17th March last this government had already by order in council referred to the commissioner who has been, and is still, taking evidence, any "representations which have been made that at divers times while the said bank was in existence deposits were made and afterwards withdrawn by various depositors under conditions which might require explanation." The commissioner has completed one part of the inquiry. The government have asked him not to continue to the end, but rather to hasten the part of his report which is of most concern to the depositors, and to present this to the government as quickly as possible so that we can deal with it this session. It has of course, been assumed that the commissioner would continue his work after he had made an interim report on the one phase he has been inquiring into and take up other matters which still remain to be investigated and which are included in the amended order. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this particular matter is fully covered by the amended order and can be brought before the commissioner by any person who may desire so to do, and that there is no necessity for the committee on Privileges and Elections to make a further inquiry. If, however, my hon. friend or those who are associated with him on the other side of the House feel that any right and proper purpose for maintaining the honour, dignity and integrity of this House or of any member or of any minister will be served by having the further investigation which he now suggests, then on behalf of the government I wish to say that we will be only too ready to have this motion pass.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this is an occasion and this is a subject which do not afford pleasure to any hon. member on any side of the House. It is very rarely indeed that questions of personal propriety as respects ministers or members come before parliament. Only once or twice in our history has it happened. On this occasion the proper course undoubtedly has been pursued by the hon. member for West Hastings (Mr. Porter). He has made allegations of conduct against a minister of the Crown, conduct inconsistent with the traditions and honour of parliament, conduct designated as improper in every case where similar questions have arisen in this or in the British House. He has taken the full responsibility, and in a speech temperate in tone and very fair in every aspect has laid his charges and made his motion. The motion is the right motion. The Privileges and Elections committee historically is the committee which always deals with any contested question affecting the privileges of parliament. There has never been a case in our history where, a charge being formally laid, the full responsibility being taken and a reference to this committee asked for, such a request or such a resolution has been negatived.

It is solemnly important on an occasion of this sort—it is indeed, imperative—that in this discussion the utmost fairness be manifested toward the minister accused—important because of the nearness of the whole subject to the fortunes of his career, to his personal self-respect; important also because he is necessarily and rightly absent during the debate. I take the Prime Minister's attitude to be not one of criticism of the method pursued but rather one of request to the mover of the motion that in view of two things the motion be withdrawn. The first fact upon which he bases his request is that the accused minister has now returned the money, or purposes returning in full the money, which he wrongfully withdrew.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is not quite correct.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Which it is alleged he wrongfully withdrew.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No; my point is this: The hon. member said in presenting his motion that he was doing so, to use his own words, in the light of facts as they had been disclosed to him. My point now is that he has before him facts which he had not at the time he introduced the resolution and that in the light of those facts he might possibly not desire to press it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is exactly what I intended to say; the first of these further facts being the fact of the return, or prospective return, of the money, in response to a request from the liquidator of the bank. The second basis of the request is that, as claimed by the Prime Minister, there has been a commissioner sitting looking into Home Bank matters for certain purposes and that under the terms of the reference to that commissioner the hon. member might have gone to him, or might yet go, if he so desires, to press his case.

Dealing with the request and the double basis therefor, I want to draw to the attention of the House a very remarkable circumstance. We are here in the presence of a charge definitely made of misconduct, of personal impropriety on the part of a minister of the Crown; we have heard the statement of the minister, which statement, so far as I gathered from his words, contained no denial of the charge at all. This is a most extraordinary situation. The charge, mark you, is one undoubtedly of grave misconduct, misconduct that never can be cured by subsequent repentance or restitution; it was either wrong or it was not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think I should let my right hon. friend's statement that the minister admitted some charge made against him go unchallenged.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not say he admitted it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He denied it in his letter. He said clearly in his reply to the liquidator that his action was in the ordinary course of business.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is not a denial to this House. Whether the minister intended to deny it or not, he did not deny it, and if he intended to it is most unfortunate that he did not. In all fairness to him I think an opportunity should be given him even yet to deny in toto the allegations of the hon. member. There was no specific admission on his part, but within the four corners of his address he never disputed the allegation that he obtained information as a minister of the Crown and as a trustee of this nation, and that of this information he made use to his own advantage, made a use which others for whom he was trustee could not possibly make.

Mr MACKENZIE KING: How could my right hon. friend say that he made use of this information for his own advantage? I think he made it quite clear that the money he returned was his own money and that he paid $150 odd in interest in addition to that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think the Prime Minister is quite fair or well-advised in thus interrupting me. I did not say that he had done it; I said such was the charge against him, namely, that he had used information so secured for his own advantage by withdrawing a large sum of money and thereby saving three-quarters of that money. Now, this is the allegation definitely made. That such conduct is wrong there can be no dispute, and I cannot appreciate the attitude of the Prime Minister—I hope he really does not persist in it—that conduct fundamentally wrong in itself is altered if subsequently the minister returns the money. Such a course does not alter the original conduct at all. I do not say it is not to the credit of the minister that he returns the money, but it does not alter the character of the initial conduct in the least; it does not change its colour in any sense at all. So that the minister stands now in the position of being charged with a grave impropriety and of leaving that charge unchallenged before his withdrawal from this House.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Assuming for the moment that what is alleged here were being considered there is, to my mind, a very great difference between doing a thing for the purpose of gain and taking a course which, "without injury or injustice to third parties," avoids loss in regard to one's own affairs.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I make no objection to that interruption, because the Prime Minister now is directly on the point. The allegation is that the information obtained as minister was used for his own advantage—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And profit to himself.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Prime Minister intimates that while it may be wrong for a minister to use information obtained as such to make a profit over and above the money he already has, it is quite right—at least he says it is a different thing—for him to use the same information to avoid a loss of the money he has. I do not think the Prime Minister on reflection will urge that contention; I do not think he can sustain it in his own mind. Where is the difference in the moral position? Not the slightest. It may be that some six months or a month before, this money was worth its whole weight. At the time the money was withdrawn, or just before, it was not; it was worth three-quarters, but it was raised to one hundred per cent of its par value by the action of the minister. But the authorities are all so clear. If the Prime Minister will read the expressions of Mr. Balfour, now Lord Balfour; of Mr. Cave, now Lord Cave; of Sir Rufus Isaacs, himself, the accused; of Mr. Lloyd George, himself, jointly accused; of Mr. Asquith, at the time Prime Minister; of Sir Edward Grey,—of every one who took any part in the debate on a question of alleged impropriety exactly similar to this, he will find that in every case they laid down the dictum that no minister for his own advantage, whatever it might be—and it is as much advantage to save what you have as to make more—may use information which he secured as a minister of the Crown.

No, there is no disputing what the rule is. There is no disputing that on all sides of all politics, in all times in the history of the British Parliament and wherever a question has arisen in our own, it has constantly been held that no minister can use information gained as such to gain any advantage for himself. Why, if this rule is to be looked upon lightly, or is to be shaded, as suggested by the Prime Minister, what is going to be the effect on, say, the rest of the servants of this Dominion? Constantly in the practice of departments, deputy ministers, heads of branches and others in positions of trust, necessarily receive information as such which they could use to their own advantage, but which if they did they would be held accountable to the head of the department, and if rightly held accountable, would find their positions gone. If ministers are to be permitted to do these things and their conduct go unchallenged by this House, how can we ever after hold accountable those who, under ministers are put in equal temptation and to whom the same conduct is open? No, as to the rule and its inexorable necessity there is no doubt.

Now, are we to be told that the government will not accede to the motion, or at least that the hon. member for West Hastings should not push the motion, because the hon. the minister has since returned, at the request of the liquidator, the money which we say he should not have withdrawn? If the accused minister will state that the allegations of fact set forth in the resolution and set forth in the formal statement of facts preceding it, are not wrong, that the hon. member for West Hastings is not in the position of having falsely accused a fellow member of this House, then I see no reason at all to press the motion further. But as the case stands now if the motion is not pressed, then the hon. member for West Hastings is in the position of having put forward claims and allegations against a fellow-member which stand unsustained. It is owing to the hon. member for West Hastings to give him an opportunity to establish his allegations if they are denied by the hon. minister; but if they are not denied, of course, there is no object in going any farther.

Now the Prime Minister says, as well: Oh, the member for West Hastings could have gone, or he could go yet, to Judge McKeown; others have been. Judge McKeown's is not the tribunal before whom the honour of a minister of the Crown should be tested in a matter affecting the privileges of parliament. Why, it is so absurd as almost to defy argument, the suggestion that because within the powers of a commission, which commission was appointed for a distinctly different purpose—to find out whether or not the government of Canada or the parliament of Canada should recoup depositors of the Home Bank—because within the general sweep of its powers, all impliedly for that purpose, all impliedly to be exercised in order to ascertain what shall be his report on that single question, the commission might track down the circumstances now before us therefore the regular procedure of this House is to be reversed and the committee on Privileges and Elections is not to have the opportunity of performing its duty. No, this suggestion does not admit of argument at all. The motion in your hands, Mr. Speaker, embodies the proper procedure, and when charges are formally laid the committee on Privileges and Elections is the proper tribunal. Consequently, I do not see how the hon. member for West Hastings can be asked to retreat from the position he has taken, a position which on all fours is right, and which I think the government should accept.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Meighen.]

LAUSANNE CONFERENCE

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I would like to inform the House, on the Orders of the Day, that on Monday next I purpose to lay on the Table of the House by agreement with the British government certain of the papers respecting the Lausanne Conference and the Lausanne Treaty. They will be laid on the Table of the House in the Commons in London at the same time they are laid on the Table here. As I assume that members of the House will wish to have the opportunity of perusing this correspondence, I will take steps immediately to have it printed, assuming that the House will be willing to order the printing of a number of copies after the treaty has been laid on the Table.

WAYS AND MEANS

CUSTOMS TARIFF ACT, 1907, AMENDMENT

The House in committee of Ways and Means, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

3. Resolved, That Schedule A to The Customs Tariff, 1907, as amended by chapter twenty-six of the statutes of 1914, chapter nineteen of the statutes of 1922 and chapter forty-two of the statutes of 1923, be further amended by striking thereout tariff items: 275, 445, 445a, 446, 446a, 446b, 447a, 447b, 448, 448a, 448c, 449, 450, 453b, 591, 663, 682, the several enumerations of goods respectively, and the several rates of duties of customs, if any, set opposite each of said items, and to provide that the following items, enumerations and rates of duty be inserted in Schedule A:—

On item 445:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would ask the minister, in connection with this resolution, whether the statement made, I think, by the Minister of Agriculture, that the manufacturers of agricultural implements were to have restored to them the Crowsnest pass rates, was or was not correct.

Mr. ROBB: I submit to my hon. friend that that has nothing whatever to do with the resolution under consideration now.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It has a very profound influence upon the effect of these reductions on that industry. Their market is the western market, and it has been used before as an argument against reducing at all the customs tariff. In this budget debate, unless I am entirely mistaken in my recollection, the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) made that statement. Is there any mystery about it?

Mr. ROBB: None whatever, so far as I am concerned.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well, is it true?

Mr. ROBB: Hansard will show whether or not the hon. member made that statement.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am not asking whether he said it. Supposing he did say it; is it true? Is that the arrangement, that the manufacturers of agricultural implements are to have returned to them the Crowsnest pass rates?

Mr. ROBB: I must ask my hon. friend to raise that point when the Minister of Railways is before him with his estimates. I submit to my hon. friend, who is an old parliamentarian, that that question has absolutely nothing to do with the question now under consideration.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I really do not know what the mystery or the difficulty is in this matter. It seems to me that if I were a party to an arrangement I would not be ashamed of it, and if I were not a party I would frankly say so. I really cannot understand the trouble here, nor do I understand the point raised that this question is not relevant. Why, the basis of an argument made from the government benches in this very debate was that it was relevant.

Mr. FORKE: What arrangement does my hon. friend refer to?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I will state it again: That the manufacturers of agricultural implements were to have restored to them the Crowsnest pass rates.

Mr. FORKE: The hon. gentleman knows that no arrangement is necessary for that purpose; the rates would go into effect automatically.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not say whether it is necessary or not.

Mr. FORKE: There is no arrangement.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The hon. gentleman is very quick at rushing to the rescue when any issue uncomfortable to hon. gentlemen opposite has been raised, he does that all the time and I expect it from him. He may not be as wise as hon. gentlemen opposite but he is certainly more courageous, there is no doubt about that. However I do not think such action on his part is wise. We all know that previously parliament suspended those rates, and it is equally true that if parliament does not suspend them again the lower rates will come into effect. But I am just trying to find out what the fact is—whether the arrangement or understanding of the manufacturers is that the Crowsnest pass rates on agricultural implements are to be allowed to go into effect.

Mr. FORKE: May I ask another question?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Let us see if we can get my question answered first.

Mr. FORKE: All right. I was just going to ask—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: One minute. Let us hear what the minister has to say.

Mr. ROBB: While I do not like to press my genial friend so far as to ask for the ruling of the Chair, I appeal to him as an old parliamentarian and a man of common sense if the question he has just raised has anything whatever to do with the matter now being considered in connection with this resolution.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Questions of costs, questions of marketing, questions of the difficulty of carrying on business would have to be looked into in seriously considering any tariff—at any rate I would have thought so. And one of the chief elements of costs in doing business to-day is transportation rates. Now the effect of allowing, by a total absence of government action, the Crowsnest pass rates to go into effect will make a decrease in connection with rakes, binders and mowers, a decrease ranging from 20 to 24 per cent in the cost of transportation to western Canada, which is something which enters vitally into the question. That is, of course, if these questions are approached from a business standpoint to some small degree and not entirely from a political standpoint. If we are considering the business effect of tariff changes we have to bear in mind these very matters that I have referred to—expense to carry on business or manufacturing, the expense of marketing, and so on. Does my hon. friend say that railway rates have nothing to do with the expense of marketing?

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We had better do what the minister suggests, allow the Chair to rule without further discussion.

Mr. ROBB: I am satisfied.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister suggests, Mr. Chairman, that you should rule upon the materiality of my request.

The CHAIRMAN: No point of order has been raised. When it is raised I will rule.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think the minister would be serious in raising such a point of order. Manifestly my request is in order. Why should we not have the information? Why should we not know—in connection with the changes in tariff rates on agricultural implements—whether that change is to be so tempered as that this large reduction in the cost of transportation, largely at the expense of the Canadian ratepayer generally, will come? Now why should we not have the information?

Mr ROBB: Do I infer from the last sentence of my hon. friend's observations that he is opposed to the Crowsnest pass agreement coming into force?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have spoken more than once in connection with the Crowsnest pass agreement. I am absolutely opposed to a system that differentiates among Canadians as to the railway rates they shall pay. I believe in having railway rates honestly and fairly fixed by the body appointed for that purpose. I further realize that the basis of railway rates varies from time to time and that changes either up or down have to be made. My position is no secret. The whole secret here is, that apparently my hon. friend does not want to give any information in connection with an absolutely vital question—the question of carrying on this business under the present tariff.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Why should my hon. friend (Mr. Robb) make any statement that will bind the freedom of this House in any respect in regard to railway matters when he is discussing a question connected with the tariff? Until the last day of this session the House will have the right to take whatever action it may think best in regard to railway matters when railway matters are under consideration. At present we are discussing the tariff which is an entirely different subject.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Of course I fully appreciate the point my right hon. friend makes. I fully appreciate the position he takes, that matters of public policy are to be fixed by this House, that the government is not to be responsible for them. I am not disputing that position of the government's for one minute. But in this very debate, as showing that the agricultural implement manufacturers could carry on and will carry on, a member of the government stated that they would get the benefit of the Crowsnest pass rates. Now, I am merely trying to find out whether the government has so stated or merely an individual member of it; whether on the question of any such arrangement the government has any mind at all.

Mr. CALDWELL: I cannot help but think that we are discussing the effect of the reduction of the duty on farm implements from one angle entirely, and I think possibly that is the fault of members in our corner of the House. I should like to discuss the matter from a little different angle. As I said, nearly the whole discussion so far has hinged on how these changes will affect the manufacturer. I should like to point out how the reduction in the duty on farm implements and fertilizers especially will affect the producers of Canada, who after all should be considered in some small measure, I think, in view of the fact that they are the most numerous class; I will go so far as to say they have more money invested in their occupation than the manufacturers of farm machinery have invested in theirs. Last year a witness from the province of New Brunswick appeared before the committee on agricultural conditions, a man who both grows potatoes and exports them, a man who lives very close to the international boundary in the province of New Brunswick, a man who buys both American and Canadian potatoes and is very closely acquainted with the cost of growing potatoes in the two countries and the price received for them. I will quote briefly from this gentlemen's evidence, question and answer, as follows:

Q. I believe you live very close to the American boundary?
A. Yes.
Q. Is there any difference in growing potatoes in New Brunswick and in Maine?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Where can they be grown the cheaper, would you say?
A. Maine.
Q. Would you tell us why?
A. For several reasons. Fertilizer is higher in New Brunswick.

Further down he states that fertilizers are from $8 to $10 a ton cheaper in Maine. That has been overcome absolutely by the abolition of the duty on fertilizers. I had better give the prices. These are the cash prices on mixed fertilizers in Maine and in New Brunswick in 1921—lists issued from the same Canadian office:

	Prices
Analysis	Maine	New Brunswick	Difference
4-6-4..	$58 12	$72 07	$13 95
5-8-7..	70 45	84 40	13 95
4-6-8..	63 01	76 96	13 95

I may say that that year there was more difference in the price than there had been formerly, due to the fact that the cost of fertilizer was higher, and the difference is the amount of the duty higher in New Brunswick in addition to a premium on American money at that time, although our fertilizer concerns pay no duty on the chemicals, and bring them all practically from the United States.

I wish to go back to this gentleman's reasons for stating that potatoes could be grown cheaper in Maine than in New Brunswick. I can give it from memory, but I would rather quote the exact words of the witness. He said the price of farm machinery was from 25 to 35 per cent higher in New Brunswick than the state of Maine.

Mr. CHAPLIN: When was this?

Mr. CALDWELL: In 1921. He gave the evidence last year before the committee on agricultural conditions. He gave the date and the price.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Twenty-five per cent higher, with a duty of ten per cent.

Mr. CALDWELL: I think you will find that on potato machinery there was a much heavier duty. We do not use a binder to grow potatoes.

Mr. STEVENS: You are talking about binders.

Mr. CALDWELL: No. We use binders too, and there would not be so much difference in binders. We will all admit that. He was asked about the price of land, and he said it was cheaper in New Brunswick than in Maine, although here is this block of country about the shape of a big serving platter, one hundred miles long and possibly fifty miles wide, with the American boundary running through it lengthwise, and the soil exactly the same on each side of the boundary and weather conditions certainly the same. The only difference is that our fertilizer costs the farmer from $8 to $10 a ton more in New Brunswick than in Maine, due to the tariff. This gentleman was asked if he did not purchase both Maine and New Brunswick potatoes and he said yes. He purchases them and ships them all out of New Brunswick. His warehouse is in New Brunswick close to the boundary line. He is allowed to buy American potatoes, haul them across to New Brunswick and ship them out as American potatoes, because they really are American potatoes. He must keep them in separate warehouses. He was asked the difference in price and he said he paid the Maine farmer 85 cents to $1 more per barrel that he paid the New Brunswick man who was on the same siding, simply because potatoes were grown across the line, and therefore could be shipped to the American market without paying duty. Hon. gentlemen can imagine the effect of this on the farmers in New Brunswick. This condition has had the effect—and I want to give a concrete illustration—of depopulating the province of New Brunswick and populating the state of Maine. In the potato belt in the Maine section one-third of the farmers are men who have been raised in New Brunswick, and who either abandoned their farms, or sold them for whatever they could get, went to Maine and bought farms at a very high price. A neighbour of mine, who lived very close to me some years ago, sold 105 acres—of as good land as there is in Maine with good buildings, for $1,750. This farm was about four miles from the American boundary on the Canadian side in the potato belt, and about two miles from a railway, very advantageously situated for potato growing. Of course you must be near a railway in order to market potatoes, because it requires a good deal of hauling to get them to a railroad. He went over to the state of Maine, to a point about four miles from the boundary line, about two miles from a railway, and bought land in the district, and I think if you dropped a man in the middle of one farm, and then dropped him in the middle of the other farm, he could not tell by the soil or crop which farm he was on. He bought 55 acres of land in Maine with no better buildings, and paid $7,500, simply because he could buy fertilizer and machinery cheaper, and his help would cost no more; but he could get 85 cents to $1 more per barrel for his potatoes. That has had the effect of driving people from New Brunswick to the state of Maine. About one-third of the farmers in that potato belt in the state of Maine are New Brunswick men who migrated to the States on account of these conditions.

I thought I should not let this opportunity pass without showing the other side of the picture. I sincerely hope that putting fertilizer on the free list, reducing the duty on machinery as well as removing the sales tax—which by the way the Maine farmer does not have to pay—will improve conditions. These things possibly account for the difference in price of machinery being even greater than the duty on machinery, because they do not pay any sales tax in the United States on farm machinery, or on anything else. I do not think they have any sales tax.

These are the conditions, and I hope these reductions will stop the flow of people from

New Brunswick into the state of Maine, because we certainly have as good a soil and the same climate.

We have individual potato growers in New Brunswick who produce enough potatoes to feed the largest city in New Brunswick along with their home market, and they export all their output except what the farmers eat themselves. We have few large towns in New Brunswick. I doubt if we ever will have very many because our geographical situation will never tend to develop large industries or large cities in the Maritime provinces.

Mr. TOLMIE: What protection does the American farmer get on his potatoes?

Mr. CALDWELL: Fifty cents per hundred pounds. Our farmer is also protected with a duty of 20 to 30 cents per hundred pounds.

Mr. HUGHES: Twenty-five.

Mr. CALDWELL: It would not make any difference if they were free, because potatoes will not go from a market that will pay a dollar a barrel more than the grower can get at home. Therefore we have no fear of competition because there are no potatoes coming our way.

Mr. BROWN: You would not like the protection raised to fifty cents?

Mr. CALDWELL: That would not matter because nobody in our country is importing potatoes. With the exception of the people in a few towns that are supplied by the farmers immediately surrounding those towns, we are all producers of potatoes. The price in the home market is fixed by the price for export.

Mr. BROWN: You do not suggest, as some of our friends do, that our duty should be the same as that in the United States?

Mr. CALDWELL: I should like to quote from a clipping to show that a high protective tariff has not made the farmers rich in the United States. This is from the Montreal Gazette of January 24, 1924, and is contained in Mr. Coolidge's address to Congress:

> Mr. Coolidge told Congress that these were measures by which without undue alarm or agitation, but nevertheless promptly and effectively, we can bring to bear on a serious, though happily a localized emergency, every resource of the federal government, and all the assistance which the business and farming community can render.
>
> The economic situation in certain wheat-growing sections of the northwest, the president said in his message, is reaching a stage that requires organized co-operation on the part of the federal government and the local institutions of that territory for its solution.
> Great numbers of individual farmers are so involved in debt, both on mortgages and to merchants and to banks, that they are unable to preserve the equity of their property.

If more evidence were needed than what I have given, this will show that high protection does not benefit the farmer, especially in a country that is growing vast quantities of farm produce, more than can be consumed in that country, because in that event, the natural law of supply and demand has this result, that the price in the home market is set by the price that can be obtained for your export, especially when your exports are much greater than what is used for home consumption. I could not let this opportunity pass withou presenting the other side of the picture.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know what other side of the picture my hon. friend is referring to. I was referring to the concession which was said to have been given to the manufacturer, and we shall try to get back to what we have been speaking about. I just want to point out to the minister that this is something which cannot be got rid of just by a laugh or by saying that it has nothing to do with the question. It has everything to do with the question. It may have a good deal to do with the question which the hon. gentleman thought was of such importance, namely, the announcement of the company as to reductions.

5 p.m.

In connection with these very rates in 1922, I gave the House—and I am going to show the minister the size of this concession—information as to rates on agricultural implements. I showed how trifling was the question of duties in influencing costs as against railroad rates and that statement was never controverted. It cannot be controverted. I will take the same examples that were given at that time for the purpose of saving time. The first article that was given was a sixteen marker western drill with single disc attachment. This drill with its single disc attachment weighs complete 1,260 pounds. The freight as then paid was $16.82 and the shipment was from Hamilton to a good characteristic point in western Canada, namely, Moose Jaw. No one ever complained that that did not represent the actual movement. It did. No one ever complained that the two points selected were not fair. They were.

Mr. ROBB: Is my hon. friend quoting carload rates?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes. The rate given is $16.82, and that was under the reduced rate that was negotiated by Sir Thomas White in connection with his former budget.

I mention this fact merely to show how closely interrelated these matters are, so that at that $16.82 rate, it was entirely out of line; but if the Crowsnest pass rate is put in, the rate will be $12.47, a reduction of $4.35, or a reduction on the implement of 25.86 per cent.

The next item was a ten-foot horse rake weighing 460 pounds. The then existing freight rate was $6.14 for the same movement, Hamilton to Moose Jaw. The Crowsnest pass rate will reduce that to $4.55, a reduction of $1.59 or 25.89 per cent.

The third instance given was a six-foot binder with bundle carrier and transport attachments, weighing 1,560 pounds. I give the weights so that my hon. friend can easily check these calculations from the rates, because the rate is so much per hundred pounds. The rate is $20.83. The Crowsnest pass rate is $15.44, or a reduction of $5.39. Surely my hon. friend must see how material this question is. I again ask: Was the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell), when he said, in connection with this debate or used words to this effect, that these people that manufactured these implements would get the benefit of the Crowsnest pass rate? Is that the situation?

Mr. ROBB: Did he say that they would get it or that the western farmer would get it? Who does my hon. friend think would get it?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I will not play with words with my hon. friend. I am not playing at catch words at all.

Mr. FORKE: It makes a great difference to the farmer.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We do not gain time by senseless interruptions. I am asking a question as to a matter of fact. If my hon. friend says that it is not a matter of moment to the eastern manufacturer to be able to ship his machines in at a much lower rate to western consuming territory than his American competitor can, I will take his answer, but it will be very much at the peril of my personal opinion of his good sense. He knows very well that that is a matter of the greatest importance to every trade. It is idle to play with words. Cannot we get the truth somewhere in this matter? What is the reason for the delay in answering a perfectly plain question? Why are we not entitled to the information?

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): Is my hon. friend in favour of the reduction?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Are we making these reductions? Of course, I know the policy of the government is to throw responsibility on everybody and anybody except themselves. But unfortunately we are not running things. I have already said what I think about it. Is there any necessity for my saying it again?

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): We would like to have an answer to the question.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have not changed my mind in this brief time, and whatever answer I give will make not the slightest difference to the question of the veracity of the Minister of Agriculture's (Mr. Motherwell's) statement.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): I thought my hon. friend was in favour of giving assistance to the manufacturers; apparently he was very anxious to protect them on the duty. This is something that will help them if it goes into effect. He is surely also in favour of helping the consumer in the West. What is his position? We would like to have the logic of his argument.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Just at present I am not arguing at all, I am trying to get facts—the truth—if it is possible; it may be impossible to get this information, but I intend to go on trying. So far as helping the manufacturer or anybody else at the expense of unfair and privileged railway rates is concerned I am not in favour of it, and I have said so many times. What is the use of my repeating it? I have said it plainly enough I should think to get into anybody's head. Am I to get an answer to a question which is absolutely pertinent to these very items and is being considered from time to time in connection with them: Is it true that there is an understanding between the manufacturers of agricultural implements and the government that the old Crowsnest pass rates will be allowed to again come into effect?

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Chairman, if there was before the committee a question as to the price at which agricultural implements had been sold and were to be sold in western Canada, I could understand the argument of my hon. friend. That is not the question under consideration at all. It is purely a question of readjustment of the customs tariff, and my hon. friend is only delaying the information which he seeks, because the government will be prepared in due course to announce its stand upon the question of freight rates. But this is not the proper time to discuss freight rates. Let me remind my hon. friend, who was not in the House at the time, that I was a member of the opposition and had something to do at least with keeping members in the House while the legislation was being enacted and I recall distinctly when Sir Thomas White introduced the legislation reducing freight rates on agricultural implements to western Canada points, and I can assure my hon. friend that at that time there was no obstruction on the part of the Liberal party to that small concession being given to the western farmers.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I suppose Sir Thomas White told the truth at once. If the opposition could get that, there was no necessity for obstruction.

Mr. FORKE: Mr. Chairman the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) has referred to interruptions preventing him from getting along with the business of the House. It is very difficult for an ordinary member to interject even a few remarks when the hon. gentleman is engaged in a disputation. Althought I do not want to interrupt, I certainly want an opportunity to speak once in a while during the debate. We have occupied pretty nearly an hour discussing a simple question which the hon. member has asked the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb). and which apparently he is not going to answer, yet the hon. member has plied the same question backwards and forwards for at least half an hour anyway. I wonder who is wasting the time of the house. I have got on my feet scarcely half a dozen times but members to my right have remarked about my obtuseness and the difficulty of getting anything into my head. But that does not hurt me when I consider where it comes from. Indeed I think it a slight personal tribute that those hon. gentlemen take the trouble to make such remarks. I should like some information on this change of tactics by my hon. friends to my right during the last day or two. For weeks we listened here to their woeful tales of the way in which our manufacturers in Toronto, Brantford and Hamilton were going to be ruined, in fact they were already going out of business; now it seems that these hon. members have completely turned around and are of opinion that those very manufacturers whose misfortunes they so much deplored are getting too many good things altogether. I do not know what has happened to bring about this change of front. I think it is pretty well recognized in the House to-day that the success of our manufacturing industry depends to a very large extent on the prosperity of the prairie provinces. As everyone admits that without further argument why so much disputation if there is any chance of a little reduction in freight rates on agricultural implements? Such a reduction will help everyone —manufacturers and others—all along the line. I think we all realize that the great question before the country to-day is cheaper transportation, and unless freight rates are brought within reach of the western producer, we are not going to see very prosperous times in Canada for some time to come. I am very pleased to know that there may be a chance of a reduction in freight rates on agricultural implements to the West, but I am quite willing to wait until the proper time comes for that announcement to be made by the government. I do not see what is to be gained by having the question asked so repeatedly all this afternoon. Let us get on with the business of the House.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In answer to the last remark of my hon. friend (Sir Henry Drayton) as to whether there is an understanding between the government and the implement makers that the Crowsnest pass rates will go into full effect, I might say there is no such understanding. The only understanding between the government and the implement makers is contained in the records that have already been brought down.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is all the information I have been asking for.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What I wanted to make clear when I spoke a moment ago was that parliament is free to deal with the question of freight rates as it may think best and has up to the end of the session to take action. If my hon. friend asks me whether there is an understanding in respect to freight rates, I tell him there is no understanding. The really important thing, as the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Forke) has said, is: How in fact is the budget affecting the industries which it is intended to affect; how is it affecting them and of what advantage is it going to be to the country? I happen to have in my hand a letter which is quite pertinent on this point. It comes from the sales manager of the John Deere Manufacturing Company, Limited, and has been sent out to their agents. It is as follows:

WELLAND, ONT., May 14, 1924.

Dear Sir:

Re Price Revision Effective by the Budget of April 11.

We are now able to pass on to the trade the benefits that the new budget will enable us to do, as set out in the schedule of price reductions attached hereto. There is every reason to face this new price situation with great enthusiasm because we are able to give the consumer this price reduction that he has been looking forward to. This now imposes the responsibility upon the user of farm implements to allow no further postponement of buying more freely what he requires in farm implements, enabling himself to produce at lower cost and to once more enable the manufacturer to set his wheels going, and which is bound to help increase consumption for the products of the farm.

We will depend upon every dealer in John Deere implements to stimulate his trade, which you are now in position to go ahead and do.

Yours very truly,

JOHN DEERE MANUFACTURING CO., LIMITED.
JNO. W. KOTTMEIER,
Sales Manager.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Are the figures given?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have not the attached schedule.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It would be very interesting to have that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have no doubt that I could get it for my hon. friend. The point I wanted to make clear is this, that the manufacturers of implements found it was not necessary for them to wait to see what action parliament would take on railway rates before determining what their reduction should be. They indicate that already they are prepared, with the reductions in duties that have been proposed, to make very substantial price reductions.

Mr. MEIGHEN: "Reductions in duties" is good in that connection—really good.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Duties and sales tax.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I felt rather sorry at the cruel rebuke embodied in the Prime Minister's remark to the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke), though I knew he would not accept it that way.

Mr. FORKE: I would not bother about that if I were you.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I knew he would not accept it that way. Here was a question to which he had been trying for an hour to get an answer, but in vain; now it is answered, and the responsibility for the whole of that would be obvious to the hon. member.

Mr. FORKE: I am glad that the right hon. gentleman came to the rescue of the hon. member for West York.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, the Prime Minister came to the rescue, apparently to the discomfiture of my hon. friend.

Mr. FORKE: Oh, I am quite happy.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would look as though, from the letter read, the John Deere Company have confidence that they can rely upon this Crowsnest return. I do not know what they rely upon. I will accept the Prime Minister's statement that there is no understanding; I fancy, though, that some of them will wonder whether they have misunderstood things. Now, this letter says that by reason of these changes there will be reductions, but until we know the reduction we do not know what to attribute it to. So far as we know now we have had a reduction which is scarcely the amount of the sales tax reduction. I wonder if it demonstrates to hon. members just what the effect of the duty reduction was? Does any hon. member think that there would be the slightest particle of difference now in the price of these goods to the consumer had the duty never been touched? Does any hon. member think that the price would not be exactly what it is now had the sales tax alone been removed? Does not the John Deere letter precisely indicate that? I fancy that the schedule would wholly confirm it. However, hon. gentlemen just wanted some excuse to be able to say, "We got these reduced." But I would advise them always to carry with them the schedule of prices to the consumer of December, 1921, before this government got at elevating the sales tax and tinkering with the duty. Let them do that and then put beside it the schedule of prices to-day.

Mr. FORKE: Would my hon. friend allow me to make a remark in regard to these prices?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh yes, I am very generous to the hon. member.

Mr. FORKE: I think I mentioned on a previous occasion about pricing a double disc drill at Pipestone when I was home. The Massey-Harris agent told me at that time that he was authorized to state that any further reductions that could be made when the changes proposed in parliament came into effect would be made. He was allowed to make that statement.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I should think he would be. I do not think it was a very world-shaking statement. All the man said was that any that could be made would be made. Yes, and what could be made have been made.

Mr. FORKE: They are not the final figures. They may be lower yet.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They may? "Hope springs eternal in the human breast," especially in the breast of a Liberal-Progressive with respect to a Liberal government's budget. The whole thing is so plain that I should think a child could understand it. All this performance, all this trumpeting, all these manifestoes about duty reductions, all this deliberate unfairness to a long line of industries —I am not thinking now of implement industries—has resulted in what? In saving not a single cent to a farmer. Nobody is hurt by the sales tax reduction except the treasury, but all the rest has been demonstrated to have had no result at all. But of course hon. gentlemen to my left, being co-partners in this scheme with the government, always have to smile, always have to try to convince somebody of their great achievement—and the poor farmer is in the position of paying more for his implements than he was paying when they came down here and started at their task. That is the position he is in.

Mr. FORKE: It is very discouraging.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, it is the fact.

Mr. EVANS: What is that owing to?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, certainly there is no decrease to be owing to anything, that is sure.

Mr. EVANS: The prices of raw material increased.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They have been reducing the duties on the raw material, and I should think the prices would come down by that reduction. I thought that living costs were coming down under this government, and one would think that raw material would come down with living costs. What is dearer?

Mr. EVANS: Steel is dearer the world over.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, I do not know that it is. Has the hon. gentleman compared the price of steel now with the price of steel in December, 1921? I did not have that impressed upon me by any one with whom I reviewed the subject. I do not think the hon. member is correct. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) would know about that.

Mr. CHAPLIN: There has been no increase in steel since 1921.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Again the straw seems to have escaped which the hon. member was clinging to. The fact is that except for the political effect, whatever hon. gentlemen may dream that is, the whole thing is a total failure, all this tinkering with the duties.

Mr. EVANS: Does the right hon. gentleman infer that if implements were on the free list there would still be no difference?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If implements were on the free list I would expect to happen what happened with glass—the foreign manufacturer, having us in his grip, would make us pay the price.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. EVANS: Then why the calamity howling?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would howl if the foreign manufacturer had me in his grip and I think the hon. gentleman would very soon howl. The effect on his understanding would be excellent, because he has a good understanding. Had he not come here prejudiced by the teachings of his boyhood he would never be talking as he does to-day at all; he would have learned from experience. No, this reading of letters and reading of statements, this telling about the reduction and trying to get some one to believe that it is due to reduction of duty when it is due entirely to the taking off of sales tax, most of which this government put on—well, it will not appeal to the understanding of very many people in the country, and apparently does not.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The average price of steel in Canada in 1921 was $352 per hundredweight, and the average price in 1924 was $292.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Come again.

Mr. CALDWELL: After I sat down, an hon. member, who had too much regard for my bashfulness to put a question to me while I was on my feet, asked a question which led me to believe that I had not sufficiently elaborated the subject of men leaving New Brunswick and going to Maine, and I would just like to complete my statement. He asked, why the great difference in the price of land as between areas so near to each other? The point had evidently not been made plain to him, and I want to make it plain by this statement. Suppose two men, one on each side of the line, plant 50 acres of potatoes—and that would be a small planting in that potato belt. They get 100 barrels an acre. The price was from 85 cents to $1 more to the American than to the Canadian, and on that basis the farmer in Maine would receive $4,250 more for his 5,000 barrels of potatoes than the farmer in New Brunswick would receive, although there is only an imaginary line between the two farms. So you can readily see why a man would go over to Maine and pay what seems to us fabulous prices for land. I want to make this statement in connection with the one case I spoke of. The man who sold his farm in New Brunswick for $1,750 had been on that farm for ten years, and had not got it paid for; he still owed about $300 on it. He went into Maine with $1,500 and an old pair of horses as his whole capital, and bought 55 acres of land for $7,500, and in four years he had paid for his farm and was driving as nice a car as any man in Maine, and he had it paid for. That just illustrates the difference.

Mr. CHAPLIN: All done under a good duty on potatoes.

Mr. CALDWELL: I want to add that this man struck four years as good as could be experienced. There have been years when they did not make big money in Maine. But whether they make big money or small, the New Brunswick farmer is getting $4,250 less for every 5,000 barrels of potatoes than his Maine neighbour, and this is enough to induce him to pay five and six times more for land in Maine than he can sell his land in New Brunswick for. We would be thought stupid if we did not go into Maine under those circumstances; and the wonder is that we have any farmers left in New Brunswick; it is only our great patriotism that has kept us at home. We have the most patriotic people in the whole country, and we are practically living on our patriotism. However, we hope this reduction in duty will add to our wealth.

Item agreed to.

On item 445a:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Can my hon. friend give me the same information as to the old rates?

Mr. ROBB: The old rates were 15, 17½ and 17½ per cent. The proposed rates are 5, 6 and 6 per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The British preference is 15 per cent, intermediate 17½, and general 17½ per cent, and now the duty is reduced to 7½ per cent all round?

Mr. ROBB: No, the proposed rate is 5, 6 and 6 per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: According to the printing I have here, the proposed rate is 7½, 7½ and 7½ per cent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend has only the second budget; the third budget changes that, and we are not through yet.

Mr. ROBB: If my hon. friend will refer to the resolutions of Wednesday, April 30—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We are getting badly mixed up, because I thought we were considering the resolutions of April 10. Is this an amendment we have not got yet? We have had distributed to the committee this sheet headed "Ways and Means Resolutions—Resolutions of 10th April, 1924." That is in this type, and here is another one which Mr. Russell has, with a different heading and in different type. Had we not better confine ourselves to the sheet before we go on? I would ask the Chairman what resolution he has in his hand.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Marcil): It is dated the 10th of April.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What duties are shown in that resolution?

The CHAIRMAN: For item 445a, the duties are 7½, 7½ and 7½ per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is what has been distributed to the members. Perhaps we had better get right before we get any further wrong. I do not think the hon. member for Brandon can say it is my fault this time; I did not give the Chairman that print. It is an awful thing to think he cannot find fault with me.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is this sheet a supplement to the other, or a substitution?

Mr. ROBB: There are three sets of resolutions. I am not sure which of them was called.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Maybe the minister has been changing his policy too fast for the printer.

Mr. STEVENS: Would it not be a good thing to have these four or five sets of resolutions all brought into one pamphlet, so that we could have them all before us? I think the committee should rise, so that the minister could have that done.

Mr. ROBB: We can correct the items as we go along.

Mr. STEVENS: Apparently what the Chairman has been reading from yesterday and to-day are not the resolutions that should be passed at all.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have had another one put into my hand. It is just the same as the one I have, 7½, 7½ and 7½ per cent.

Mr. ROBB: Hon. gentlemen will find the amended resolutions in the Votes and Proceedings of April 30.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think we had better get it into the hands of the Chairman.

Mr. ROBB: He must have it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In order to save the time of the House as much as we can, perhaps the minister would inform me as to what the duties were on imports under the British preferential tariff under this item, 445a?

Mr. ROBB: The imports all came in under the general tariff.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No imports under the British preferential tariff, none under the intermediate tariff, all under the American or general? What was the amount of imports?

Mr. ROBB: It was $95,918.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What will the loss of duty be?

Mr. ROBB: We collected $16,785.79 in duty, and we estimate the loss in duty at $11,030.

Mr. CALDWELL: What rebate was given on this raw material on which $16,000 was paid?

Mr. ROBB: I would not have that information before me now.

Mr. CALDWELL: That would be a very important thing to know.

Mr. ROBB: Nothing under mowers, binders and reapers. Forty per cent was rebated on the others.

Mr. CALDWELL: Steel bars that enter into mowers, reapers and binders are free—they were free anyway.

Mr. ROBB: Ninety-nine per cent rebate.

Mr. CALDWELL: Was not that material on the free list when it entered into the manufacture of binders, mowers and sowing machines?

Mr. ROBB: It is on the free list now.

Mr. CALDWELL: But before?

Mr. ROBB: There was ninety-nine per cent rebate.

Mr. CALDWELL: Then we should have the amount rebated under the old system. The minister might bring that down later.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Cannot the hon. gentleman give us a list of all the articles he is exempting from duty? His expert will have the information in front of him.

Mr. ROBB: There are a number of articles which enter into the cost of manufacture of agricultural implements and which are to be entered at the rate of duty specified.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That does not give us very much more information. I am asking the minister what the articles are that he is exempting from duty, what the specific articles are. Surely the government know what they are exempting?

Mr. ROBB: This is rolled iron and rolled steel.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Ah! but there is more than that. Does my hon. friend say that only rolled iron and steel are affected.

Mr. WHITE: What is the item under consideration?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Marcil, Bonaventure): The item is 445a.

Mr. WHITE: That does not concern rolled iron or steel.

The CHAIRMAN: The resolution we are considering is the amending resolution brought down on April 30, and which reads as follows:

2. That said resolution be amended by striking out tariff items 445a, 445b, 533b, the several enumerations of goods respectively and the several rates of duties of customs, set opposite each of said items, if any, and by substituting therefor the following items, enumerations and rates of duty:

Tariff item 445a. Articles which enter into the cost of the manufacture of goods enumerated in tariff items 445, 446, 446b, 447b, 448 and 591, when imported by manufacturers of such goods for use only in the manufacture of goods enumerated in tariff items 445, 446, 446b, 447b, 448 and 591. Provided that goods which are entitled to free entry or a lower rate of duty than is mentioned in this item shall not be entered at the rate specified in this item. British preferential tariff, 5 per cent; Intermediate tariff, 6 per cent; General tariff, 6 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend was asking what items were affected?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, I was asking what the articles are.

Mr. ROBB: The articles that are affected?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Certainly.

Mr. ROBB: The articles that go into the manufacture such as bolts, nuts, malleable castings, rubber belting, canvass—anything entering into the manufacture of implements.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think my hon. friend is doing himself justice. There is a very large list of articles. My hon. friend surely knows what he is doing. But he cannot know what he is doing unless he knows each and everyone of these articles, and will tell the committee that no other articles enter into the manufacture and should come under these items.

Mr. ROBB: All the articles that go into the manufacture of the machine—all the component parts of the machine will be affected.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Ah! But there is a great deal of material used.

Mr. ROBB: Yes, I admit that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And this large quantity of material is made up in different places and under different conditions.

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And the circumstances as to the production of one part may not have anything to do with the circumstances under which another part is produced. Surely the minister will agree with me that it is important that we should get this information and should know—that is if we are looking at the question from the point of view of business and not from the point of view of politics—just what articles are affected. At present we do not know what the articles are. I should have thought the minister would have had that information.

Mr. ROBB: I can give my hon. friend a list of some of the articles. For instance there will be canvass, rubber belting, castings, bolts, nuts, paint possibly—articles going into the manufacture of tools that go with the machine. My hon. friend will quite understand that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know if the information I have here is correct, so I hesitate to give it. My hon. friend referred to malleable castings.

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: They are certainly one of the things.

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Grey iron castings.

Mr. ROBB: Yes, I have just mentioned castings.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But I am taking the different classes of castings, because they are under a different tariff. Grey iron castings are covered?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Core compound. Is that covered?

Mr. ROBB: Yes, I should say that would be covered.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Core oil?

Mr. ROBB: Yes, I should think so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Do chisels come under this item or not?

Mr. ROBB: Yes, if used as tools with the machine.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is how they would be used, would they not?

Mr. ROBB: They might be, yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend will see he has not got very much information.

Mr. ROBB: I am following my hon. friend.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I suppose chisels might come under the low rate. Now cotter pins—that is steel cotter pins and wooden cotter pins—and steel crucibles.

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I see my hon. friend nods his head but Hansard cannot record a nod. Now, dowel-rods and dowels?

Mr. ROBB: I should think if they were part of the machine they would come under it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I should think they would but my hon. friend ought to know what he is doing, whether he is hitting the dowel people or not. This is the subject matter of his resolution, surely he is the one to know, not me. What is the answer?

Mr. ROBB: We will admit they are going in as farm machinery.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not want to be unfair to my hon. friend. If he does not know, it is unfair for me to go on establishing facts, because he may be stating something which is not correct. I only want the truth, and I want to know what we are legislating about. I suggest to my hon. friend that he should bring down a list of all the articles entering into the manufacture of articles which will be covered by these reductions. He will have it right then.

Mr. ROBB: That would involve a long delay.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have a statement here, but I do not know whether it is correct or not, and I do not want to use anything which is not right. This gives a long list. I will let my hon. friend have it, and I am not going to delay the House by going over this tremendous list. If he will say that he will have it checked up and let us know what the facts are, we can put it on Hansard and save time. If he will acquiesce in my suggestion I will desist.

Mr. ROBB: I would suggest that my hon. friend send the list to some reputable manufacturing firm and have it checked up. I am not a manufacturer of agricultural implements.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But you have an expert adviser here. Surely the minister will not take the position that he does not know what he is legislating about.

Mr. ROBB: Oh, no.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is the position unless you tell us what articles are going to be affected. It must be so. I am quite content to take the answer of the minister. If he will admit that the government does not know what it is doing—

Mr. ROBB: I will be quite content to take the list and have the customs authorities who are to administer the act, look carefully into it and check it over.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I will put it on Hansard, and then the minister can have it checked. My instructions are that these are only some of the things.

Mr. ROBB: Carried.

The following is the memorandum submitted by the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton):

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Mr. FORKE: We have certain numbers following 445a. Do those numbers correspond with the numbers in the customs tariff here?

Mr. ROBB: We are striking out these numbers, putting in new numbers and reclassifying the items. I think my hon. friend will be able to follow it more intelligently when we are going through the tariff.

Mr. CALDWELL: I think that the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) wishes to ask: Is this item numbered 446, in this circular to take the place of 446 which is being struck out?

Mr. ROBB: It strikes out the old number.

Mr. CALDWELL: And it will follow the corresponding number in here. I think that is the point.

Mr. FORKE: Yes, that is the point. Item 445a in the customs tariff reads:

Malleable iron castings when imported by manufacturers for use exclusively in their own factories in the manufacture of mowing machines, harvesters, binding attachments and reapers.

Mr. ROBB: That will be struck out and the new item will take its place.

Mr. HARRIS: Would the minister go one step further, and say to the House that the ingredients which go to make up the core compounds will be admitted to the country free of duty?

Mr. ROBB: The Customs department will determine that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: You do not think the customs tariff should be left, as to the making of a rate per se, a matter of customs regulation? If anything would be absolutely improper and objectionable, it would be that tariff rates should be a matter of administration to be dealt with by a man who is here to-day and gone to-morrow and not settled by the House. It should not be done.

Mr. ROBB: The rates are established under the tariff.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But there is a plain question: Are the ingredients which go to make up the core compounds covered by the reductions? My hon. friend says that would be administered by the Customs.

Mr. ROBB: If they can establish to the satisfaction of the Customs department that they enter into the cost, then the rate will apply.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister surely is not right in that statement. Take the case of a firm in the constituency of my hon. friend who asked the question, an importer or maker of core compounds which he sells to implement manufacturers, or to any other kind of manufacturer for general use; he cannot import his ingredients free. He pays 15 and 17½ or 25 per cent on the ingredients of this compound; but an implement manufacturer can import the finished article, the core compound under this item at 7½ or 5 per cent British preferential, while the manufacturer has not the advantage of bringing his material in free.

Mr. ROBB: I will admit the provision is that the implement manufacturer has the right solely to import; but you must admit that these compounds might be used for other purposes where the product enjoys a higher tariff. Would it be fair under those circumstances to make them free to all?

Mr. STEVENS: Here is a manufacturer who is making core compounds. We will say his output is 100 tons; it does not matter what figure you take. He sells half of that to the implement manufacturer. You are now virtually removing the duty upon it or reducing it to a very small amount The implement manufacturer brings his core compound from the United States or from Great Britain. The Canadian manufacturer of that core compound is deprived of half his market. and he has not the privilege of a corresponding reduction, to enable him to manufacture and meet the foreign competition.

Mr. ROBB: But I would remind my hon. friend that he has been fairly well protected.

Mr. STEVENS: But only for half of his output.

Mr. ROBB: That will have to be established.

Mr. STEVENS: We must take hypothetical figures, because we have not the exact figures. As a matter of fact some manufacturers sell a great deal more than half of their output to the implement manufacturers. The same thing applies to iron rods nuts and such like. You are giving to the implement manufacturer a reduction in his raw materials. In doing so you are depriving the other manufacturer in respect of something like 225 articles, if I recall it correctly, of a market which has been his for so long, and not giving to him the reduction you are giving to implement manufacturers who are importing the raw material.

Mr. ROBB: I will admit that there may be cases where there will have to be a readjustment along certain lines, but that happens in revisions of all tariffs. In all such revisions you must leave it to the government, and there is power under the act to make the readjustment. It is not the desire of the government to hurt or injure any person, but it is their desire to bring about such conditions as will enable the manufacturer of agricultural implements, or implements used in the development of the mines or the forests of this country, to sell at a lower cost, so as to develop those industries. That is what we started out to do and we propose to carry it out, but we do not propose to work an injury to any industry in this country if that can be avoided The Customs Act is flexible enough to empower the government, as questions are brought before them and established, to make adjustments, and these adjustments later on will be brought to another session of parliament for confirmation. I think my hon. friend understands that.

Mr. HARRIS: Will the minister be good enough to go a little further?

Mr. ROBB: Do not ask me to go too far.

Mr. HARRIS: Just keep going until we get you where we want you. There are many hundreds of tons of concentrate of core compounds in stock in Canada on which these duties have been paid. What disposition will be made of requests which have come for relief in connection with duties that have been paid on these particular stocks?

Mr. ROBB: I have observed, through an experience of some years in parliament, that when reductions in duties take place, there is always some person coming to dip into the government chest for rebates, but I have never known any person, when there was an increase of duty, to come forward and offer to pay the balance into the treasury.

Item agreed to.

On item 446:

Mr. ROBB: Might I suggest to my hon. friend that we would save time by passing this resolution striking these items out, and he will have ample time to debate the other items when we come to them?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But we are getting rid of them as we are going along. What are the present rates of duty?

Mr. ROBB: Ten per cent, 12½ per cent and 12½ per cent. It is proposed to make them free, 7½ per cent, 7½ per cent. The estimated reduction of revenue is $10,277. There was imported for consumption during the fiscal year ended 31st March, 1923, $205,000 worth.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How much under the British preference?

Mr. ROBB: Sixteen dollars' worth.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How much under the intermediate?

Mr. ROBB: None.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How much under the general?

Mr. ROBB: The total is $205,554. From that you deduct the amount imported under the British and the intermediate tariffs, which is a nominal amount. I will give the information as we come to the other items.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister knows pretty well what information. Perhaps he could have prepared during recess a list giving the schedule with that information.

Mr. ROBB: I would suggest that we pass resolution No. 3 down to the words "schedule A", and I will get the information for my hon. friend.

Mr. FORKE: I would suggest that before we rise the minister should try to get this straightened out a little. It has been a puzzle ever since we started.

Mr. ROBB: We will when we get to the resolutions.

Mr. CALDWELL: I submit that resolution No. 3 is not carried because that includes all the items of the new duties.

Mr. ROBB: It is carried just down to the words "schedule A".

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN: Clause 3 carried.

Mr. STEVENS: Clause 3 carried?

The CHAIRMAN: Yes; but not the schedules attached.

Mr. STEVENS: As a matter of fact, I did not see the minister in his seat and I did not know you were going on, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: I am going to report this to the Chair and leave it where it stood at six o'clock.

Mr. STEVENS: You are not declaring it carried?

The CHAIRMAN: No, I am leaving it where it stood at six o'clock.

Progress reported.

[Mr. Robb.]

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Speaker, I may be wholly wrong in my understanding, but I understood we were reporting progress on resolution No. 3.

Mr. SPEAKER: Two or three items were carried before 455, I think, striking out clause 2; those have been agreed to. Then we passed on to clause 3 at six o'clock, and Ways and Means stands just as it was when we took recess.

AGRICULTURE

The House in committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Health of animals (administration and enforcement of Animal Contagious Diseases Act and Meat and Canned Foods Act).. . $2,000,000

The CHAIRMAN: This item stood over from the last sitting of supply.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Chairman, I think the committee will recall that when this vote was under consideration last week the question of the retirement of Dr. Torrance was discussed. Some of the files I had not with me at the time, and I think it was the request of the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) and the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner) that when this matter was again before the committee I should bring the balance of my files. I have done so. Inasmuch as the letter written by Dr. Mohler of Washington has already been read to the committee by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), I do not purpose to place it on Hansard again unless requested so to do.

Mr. STEVENS: The Mohler letter that we asked for was another letter.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: In reply to a letter from Dr. Torrance.

Mr. STEVENS: No, another letter that the minister said he had, casting certain reflections upon Dr. Torrance. I read the official letter from Dr. Mohler.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is only one that I know of.

Mr. STEVENS: The hon. minister intimated there was another letter from Dr. Mohler reflecting upon the action of Dr. Torrance.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, there is just the one communication, which my hon. friend placed on Hansard.

Mr. MANION: I distinctly remember the minister suggesting that Dr. Mohler had reflected upon Dr. Torrance. I should like to know what he based that suggestion on if there is no further letter from Dr. Mohler.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If the hon. member will wait—he asked me for my files—he shall have everything in consecutive order. The next letter I have that I think will be of interest deals with the question raised by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner). He took the ground that he did not think Dr. Torrance had been quite fairly dealt with in the matter of his annuity, in that he had been led to believe that he would get $1,500 based upon seventeen or eighteen years' service, whereas he was allowed only $900 based on eleven years' service. I think it is quite obvious that we could not make any such arrangement inasmuch as the amount of annuity is governed by statute, and I believe I can show that I made this quite plain to Dr. Torrance in my correspondence. Here is my letter in reply to Dr. Torrance, which I think clearly indicates the nature of his letter to me, and therefore in order to expedite matters I will not read his letter unless the committee so request. I have all the orders in council that were passed in connection with this matter, but I do not want to clutter up Hansard with all these documents. On August 29, 1923, I wrote to Dr. Torrance as follows:

Dear Doctor,—

On my return to the city this morning I find your favour of the 22nd instant awaiting my attention. Replying, I note what you say with respect to the decision of those having authority in such matters, that your retiring annuity under the terms of the Calder Act would be approximately $900 instead of $1,500 as anticipated.

When you decided to retire under the terms of the Calder Act you and I could not possibly come to any agreement as to the definite amount of the annuity, as that was, as I understood it, determined by the act itself which I had not then consulted.

What I did agree to was that I would recommend to my colleagues that, in addition to any annuity you might be entitled to, you would also receive six months' leave of absence (including the legal two months) with pay, and that I have done. This was subsequently authorized and is now being paid. But this recommendation was discretionary on my part, while the Calder Act, like most other legislation, was mandatory and therefore obviously beyond my power to change or depart from.

Regretting any misunderstanding you may have experienced respecting the amount of annuity connected with your retirement, I am,

Yours very truly.

Then later Dr. Grisdale had some correspondence with him. On January 8, Dr. Grisdale wrote to Dr. Torrance as follows:

Dear Dr. Torrance,—

I have your letter of the 5th instant, in regard to your retirement, and as you will note if you read the order in council, a copy of which was sent to you—the minister did recommend that your period of service should be counted from 1906, and his report to council along these lines was signed and submitted, but representations were made to the Treasury Board by the Auditor General, and it was upon these representations that the period of service, and, consequently the amount of the annuity was reduced. I can assure you that as far as the minister, the department and the Civil Service Commission were concerned, all possible steps were taken to have your annuity based on the seventeen years service, but in view of the criticisms of the Auditor General, the Treasury Board saw fit to modify the recommendation.

Yours very truly,

To that Dr. Torrance replied from Guelph on January 14, as follows:

Dear Dr. Grisdale,—

I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 8th inst. and am glad to know that both the minister and yourself did what you could to have my annuity based on seventeen years' service as I was led to expect.

I regret that your efforts and those of the minister were unsuccessful.

Yours sincerely,

Now, that is the end of the correspondence.

Mr. STEVENS: Is there a letter in the file dated January 5?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, from Dr. Torrance to Dr. Grisdale. Does my hon. friend wish me to read that?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is as follows:

Dear Dr. Grisdale,—

I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 2nd inst. enclosing cheque for a gratuity of two months' salary and a copy of the order in council respecting my retirement.

I regret that the government has not seen fit to carry out the terms of my retirement as stated to me by Hon. Mr. Motherwell as it appears to me to be a distinct breach of faith not to have done so. I was induced to retire on certain statements of his in regard to the matter and I had no doubt that they would be honourably carried out.

Yours sincerely,

I have already quoted the letter from Dr. Grisdale indicating to Dr. Torrance that my recommendation in the matter had corresponded with Dr. Torrance's expectations but that the Audit Board would not let it go through. Now what information had the Audit Board on which to base their decision? This is information, I may say, that I had not at the beginning, neither had I the Calder Act before me to make a computation, even had I known the number of years that Dr. Torrance claimed his retirement should have been based upon. Here is a letter written by Mr. Jarvis to the secretary of the Civil Service Commission, dated August 21, 1914, on the question of the length of time the Audit Board and the Auditor General thought should be counted as continuous service on the part of Dr. Torrance. The letter reads:

Dear Sir,—Replying to your letter of the 18th instant, re the retirement of Dr. F. Torrance, I have to advise you that Dr. Torrance was appointed a veterinary inspector under the Animal Contagious Diseases Act, by order in council of March 1st, 1906, appointment to be effective from January 1st, of the same year.

From the Auditor-General's reports, it would appear that payments made to Dr. Torrance during the period of 1906-12 were as follows:—

This was the period that was under dispute, the period which Dr. Torrance thought should count in working out his annuity. The rest of the letter indicates the length of time he was employed between 1906 and 1912, when he became Veterinary Director General and continued as such up to his retirement. The letter points out that in 1905-6 he received in payment of his services $339.29 as salary and expenses, period not available. In 1906-7 he received $150. In 1907-8 he was not employed, and in 1908-9 he was not employed. In 1909-10 he received $150 salary for ten days' work. I assume it is all based on a rate of $15 a day, so that it is easy to figure out the length of his employment on that basis. In 1906-7 at $15 a day he would have been employed ten days. There are three consecutive years in two of which he was not employed at all and in one of which he was employed for only ten days. .Then in 1910-11 he got $60 in salary, and that was apparently at a lower rate, for some reason, for it covered a period of six days. Then in 1911-12 his total salary and expenses amounted to $172.70, period not available. From August first, 1912, up to the time of his retirement was the period of continuous employment, and the Auditor General and the Audit Board took the ground that only that period could count, because during the previous years his service was of an intermittent nature. In view of the fact that in two of those previous years he had not been employed at all and in one of them for only ten days, I do not see how anybody could strain his generosity to the extent of calling that consecutive employment. That may be a matter of difference of opinion. But so far now as I understand justice and continuous employment I feel that the Auditor General was perfectly justified in taking the ground that the whole period could not be regarded as continuous employment.

Mr. TOLMIE: Was the intermittent nature of the employment not due to the lack of disease at that particular time? Was he not that class of veterinary who worked under fees rather than on general salary, being engaged only when there was work for him but still being in the employ of the department all this time, his name appearing on the files at Ottawa as a regular inspector?

[Mr. Motherwell.]

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We have no information of that nature. Such information as we have just came to us incidentally; it is not on file. He was busily employed at the Agricultural College at Winnipeg, but we have no information that there was no disease prevalent and that that was the reason he was not employed. He was paid on a per diem basis; we have one or two on that basis yet, but not very many and that is in cases where the amount of work to be performed is so small as not to justify an annual engagement. The veterinary is just employed on a per diem basis as some outbreak occurs, whether it is glanders, T.B., or whatever it is, and I presume Dr. Torrance was employed the same way. Of course, a man on a per diem basis must be employed before he is warranted in getting the pay. If Dr. Torrance had got an annuity based on seventeen years' service, as I first recommended, I think I would have had far more difficulty in defending that than I would have in defending what he has got based on the estimate of the Audit Board and the Auditor General. I scarcely think, Mr. Chairman, that the point that the hon. member for Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie) brings up would affect the case.

Mr. MANION: I asked the minister when he began to read his file what he based his statement upon that Dr. Mohler had condemned Dr. Torrance's action. That was the impression that he left with the committee, if he did not state it in so many words.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I would prefer not to be discussing Dr. Mohler. He is not a resident of Canada. We have his communication. I have already read one letter, and there is nothing to be gained by unnecessarily repeating it.

Mr. MANION: But the minister did not hesitate the other day to make that statement. He certainly left the impression with the committee—and I think the statement is here on Hansard—that Dr. Mohler had condemned Dr. Torrance's action, so I do not see why he should be so particular about it now.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend recalls the incident the other day. I had been asked by an hon. member, I forget whom at the moment, if I had any additional reasons. The question was, why did I wait six or seven months before Dr. Torrance was retired? Well, I was busy, the session was approaching, in fact, the session was on during part of that period, and I was willing to let matters run on and see if Dr. Torrance would get over his resentment, because I believe he was resentful over the fact that he was not sent overseas; in fact, I know he was; he told me so himself; I had a conversation with him. Then what were the supplementary reasons I had? Well, I had a memorandum here. It has nothing to do with the letter upon which I base my justification for asking for his retirement. The right hon. leader of the opposition was so vociferous in demanding that I should read the memorandum that I did read part of it, and then he was equally vociferous in condemning me because I did read from a memorandum that had no name to it, and that is where it stood. I think I have recited the incident correctly.

Mr. KNOX: I do not wish to change the trend of the discussion, but I want to draw to the attention of the committee a rather peculiar situation. The committee on Agriculture has been called for 8.15 this evening, and the Minister of Agriculture has now his estimates before the House. A good many members of this group are members of that committee, and I have no doubt that some of us who are here intend to go to that meeting. It is rather peculiar that these two committees dealing with agriculture should conflict.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: What is the suggestion?

Mr. KNOX: I was not suggesting anything. I think it is all right for the minister to go ahead with his estimates, but it is rather a peculiar situation that two committees should meet at the same time, dealing with agriculture.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think this is the way it happened. The estimates of the Minister of Customs were supposed to be taken up first, then Agriculture, then Trade and Commerce. In the absence of the Minister of Customs, I naturally followed with my estimates. I must confess that I entirely forgot about the meeting of the Agricultural committee. My duty now as I see it, is to carry on.

Mr. TOLMIE: I listened with a good deal of interest to the debate on Friday last concerning the dismissal of Dr. Torrance, the late Veterinary Director General. While I regret to criticise the action of the Minister of Agriculture, I think the whole House agreed that the dismissal was a very harsh one, that Dr. Torrance had not been given a reasonable chance. Time to resign was not afforded him. He was called into the minister's office and told that the minister was finished with his services, and his resignation was demanded on the spot. He was threatened that if he did not put in his resignation at once he would be dismissed and have no opportunity to receive any retiring allowance. These are the exact facts as they have been given to me.

I claim that if his offence was serious enough to get rid of him in that way, he should not have been given the opportunity to put in his resignation at all, but should have been discharged forthwith. But having been asked for his resignation, in view of the prominent position which he held at the head of a very important branch of the Department of Agriculture, a position that he had filled with great success for a period of ten years, he should have been given an opportunity to resign in a proper way. Here was a civil servant sixty-four years old, with only one year more to go, and without being given time to thing over his resignation, kicked out in this disgraceful manner. He requested the minister to give him until the following Tuesday to consider his resignation before putting it in, but he was compelled to sign it on the spot, the minister passing him paper and ink with which to do the work. Now when we consider the spirit of the Civil Service Act, an act that, while perhaps not working perfectly, has certainly been the greatest protection that the Civil Service of this country has had, it is obvious that such drastic action is not in keeping with what was intended to be the spirit of that act when it was put on the statute books.

Dr. Torrance was a man of particularly high qualifications, a university graduate before he took up the veterinary profession, a man who had worked for the Health of Animals branch intermittently before he took up the position of Veterinary Director General, a man who at that time was very highly recommended and was selected from a field of a number of other applicants for the position, and was considered the very best man then in sight. I perhaps have had a rather better opportunity to judge him than many others, for the reason that I worked for him for a number of years in the capacity of chief inspector of the Health of Animals branch for the province of British Columbia, Dr. Torrance being my chief during that period. Later on, when I became Minister of Agriculture, he still continued in the position of Veterinary Director General, and I think he has rendered very excellent service to this country. He certainly cannot be condemned on the score of inefficiency, because in Canada we have held for a long time the high record of maintaining the healthiest herds of live stock in the world, herds that are practically free from contagious disease. This was the condition when he left the department. During the time of the cattle embargo inquiry in London in 1921 there was no stronger argument that we could offer to the commission to induce them to give a verdict in our favour than the fact that we were maintaining our herds in a way that no other country in the world was able to do.

Then, too, Dr. Torrance during his period of office has made history in the veterinary line in Canada. In the first place we had mange for twenty-five years in a district in southern Alberta and in southwestern Saskatchewan covering an area larger than Scotland. This whole area was under quarantine. You could not move a hoof out of that district without inspection. Dipping was carried on from time to time, and the whole thing was a great nuisance to the farmers and also a source of great expense. In 1919 the eradication of this disease was undertaken. Plans were carefully laid during the fall and winter months and in the summer of 1920 I think some 220,000 head of cattle were subjected to a lime and sulphur bath twice, a very big job indeed, and the work was so perfectly done that at the end of that year we were able to cancel the quarantine in that area for the first time in a quarter of a century, all this being done at the time Dr. Torrance was Veterinary Director General. I am not going to say that he did not receive excellent assistance from his very efficient staff during that period —he certainly did.

Just at this particular point I might refer to one of the charges against Dr. Torrance which was brought in a letter presented by the minister. It was not a charge on which the dismissal of Dr. Torrance was based but it was one of the charges mentioned—about his taking his golf sticks out to Calgary when he went out there to attend the cattlemen's meeting at that time. This is surely a joke. I do not see that there is anything in the regulations to prohibit an official from carrying his golf sticks with him as long as he attends to his business. Surely there was no harm in carrying golf sticks both ways, more particularly when the railway company does not charge anything extra for doing so. Dr. Torrance also handled very skilfully the outbreak of dourine in southern Alberta. This disease appeared among horses and threatened to become very serious indeed. During one year it cost this country about $46,000 in compensation alone. The work of eradicating it was undertaken during the period that Dr. Torrance was Veterinary Director General and, with the co-operation of his able assistants, it was entirely wiped out.

In the United States in 1914-15 there was a very serious outbreak of foot and mouth disease which manifested itself in some twenty-two states, a number of which are contiguous to Canada's southern border. Although this outbreak cost the Americans some $10,000,000 our veterinary service along that boundary line was so efficient that not one single case of foot and mouth disease appeared in Canada. I am only mentioning this to show that Dr. Torrance could not be blamed on the score of inefficiency. He maintained the cleanest herds in the world, showed himself to be a gentleman in every way and a man of ability. He could be sent anywhere and win appreciation. He was frequently invited to speak in the United States at large gatherings, and was well known all over this continent for his ability. Under those conditions I do not think his dismissal was fair. Here was a man holding a high and important position discharged as though he was a mere nobody. I do not care how lowly a man's position in the Civil Service may be he is at least entitled to fair play and decent treatment from his superior officers, and more particularly from his minister.

The minister says that Dr. Torrance was a little disappointed at not having been included in the commission which went over to Great Britain to fix the regulations with the British government for the entrance of store cattle into Great Britain. Why should he not be? Was he not one of the proper officers to have gone? It was quite right to have taken the Deputy Minister of Agriculture, a man of ability, a man whose ability is recognized all over this country; but when on earth did Duncan Marshall graduate as a veterinary surgeon? When it comes down to a matter of regulation every veterinary who has had experience in administering the regulations of the Health of Animals Branch must appreciate the difficulties that are continually arising in connection with those regulations. I know when appearing before the Embargo Commission on several occasions cases came up and questions were raised which only a veterinary surgeon could intelligently answer; and in that particular connection I claim that Dr. Torrance should have been included in the body that went over to Great Britain at that time. Why should he not have been? Seeing that he was at the head of the Health of Animals branch in this country, and that he felt his responsibilities very keenly why should he not have been included immediately it was suggested to lower the quarantine period on cattle entering this country from Great Britain.
