TOURISM

CO-ORDINATION OF GOVERNMENT PLANNING URGED

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, once again, I would like to speak out about tourism and the importance of doing everything possible to bolster up this sagging industry. Over the last several years Canada has become less popular as a travel destination for both Canadians and foreigners. In contrast, Mr. Speaker, the percentage of Canadians travelling outside Canada has been growing by 5 per cent yearly.

There are a number of problems affecting our declining tourist industry, the most serious being that of cost. Canada has become over-priced as a tourist destination largely because of excessive taxation by all levels of government on accommodation, gasoline, and spirits.

In addition, government decisions are often made without regard to their detrimental implications on the tourist industry. There is a lack of co-ordination between the various government Departments regarding regulations which end up being detrimental to the tourist industry. More co-operation is needed between all levels of government to co-ordinate and carry out positive plans for the betterment of tourism.

Therefore, I call on the federal Government to take the initiative and the necessary action to raise the tourist industry in Canada to its full potential, which would drastically help to produce much needed additional employment in this time of economic stagnation.

POLITICAL PARTIES

COMPILATION OF PUBLIC SERVICE LIST ATTRIBUTED TO PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVE PARTY

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, as the Lord High Executioner sang in the Mikado, "As some day it may happen that a victim must be found, I have a little list; I have a little list." The Official Opposition has revealed that it, too, has a little list. Like the Queen of Hearts in "Alice in Wonderland", the Hon. Member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) and his cohorts scream, "Off with their heads", to more than 3,000 persons now serving the people of Canada in appointed positions within the government structure. Some of these people are even Tories, Mr. Speaker. They will all go, irrespective of the quality of their work or their dedication to the people of Canada.

One has to wonder what other "little lists" the Tories are compiling for the day they want victims to appease the blood lust of their membership. Are there lists of diplomats who must be eliminated? How about specific public servants? Instead of dynamic government from the Tories, the people of Canada may well be awaiting, as Gilbert and Sullivan put it, "... the sensation of a short, sharp shock, from a cheap and chippy chopper on a big black block."

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

IMPACT OF SALES TAX

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, the motor vehicle manufactured in Canada has a favourable major impact on the Canadian economy. Steel, rubber and plastic manufacturers, and a host of related workers, all rely heavily on the continued existence of a Canadian automobile industry. Even after a series of disastrous years for North American car sales, and when imports account for one-third of the Canadian market, the Government's sales tax system continues to discriminate in favour of offshore vehicles. This federal sales tax makes it up to $400 cheaper for a Canadian to buy a Japanese-made car, for instance, rather than one produced at home, supplying jobs to Canadians.

It is a simple matter—if the Government only had the will—to change. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) can accept this as a challenge to make this change in his forthcoming budget speech. As it is, the tax on domestic automobiles is levied on the retail value, while the tax on imports is on the smaller duty-paid value. Why discriminate against the North American built car? The Minister of Finance's own federal sales tax review committee reported as long ago as May, 1983, that this was an inequity. The task force set up by the former Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce refers to it as a blatant inequity.

In view of the size and importance of the Canadian automobile industry, and the lip service given to it by so many Cabinet Ministers, it is difficult to understand the Government's apparent reluctance to correct that which is recognized by all as an obvious inequity.

INDUSTRY

DEVELOPMENT OF HIGH-TECH INDUSTRY—MONTREAL REGION

Mr. Marcel Roy (Laval): Mr. Speaker, I have good news and bad news regarding the development of high-tech industries in the Montreal region. A study prepared by Fantus, a company in Chicago, for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, to assess the suitability of the Montreal region as a location for high-tech industries, confirmed and showed that Canadian Government subsidies provide a significant advantage over other North American centres such as Boston, Chicago, San Francisco, Los Angeles and New York. The federal Government has invested about $2 billion during the last six months in the high-tech industry for the Montreal area. However—and this is the bad news—the study pointed out in a note from the Vice-President that the advantages of lower installation and operating costs tended to be offset by Quebec legislation that provides for higher taxes for executives, and also by the political uncertainty, certain government regulations such as Bill 17 and compulsory licences.

Mr. Speaker, we hope that these constraints which have had a definite influence on the decision of businesses to invest will be given serious attention. Mr. Lévesque's announcement that the election will be run on Quebec's independence is certainly not going to promote investment, either in the Montreal area or anywhere in the province.

Mr. Speaker, this is a serious matter, because thousands of jobs are involved.

FISHERIES

PLIGHT OF BRITISH COLUMBIA INDUSTRY

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, in British Columbia, where our forest economy is in crisis, the response of the Social Credit Government has been to lay off 500 forestry workers. This is like laying off the fire brigade in the middle of a fire. The Tories now want to get into the act. In Friday's debate on the crisis in the fishing industry in British Columbia, the Tory Member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) suggested that the Fisheries Department had too many employees. He said: "Perhaps it is time to thin the operation out."

The Hon. Member for Capilano is not the fisheries critic for the Tories, but he is their Treasury Board critic. Last September he suggested that the entire Public Service should be cut back by 20 per cent.

● (1410)

The British Columbia economy is in a tail-spin and public sector lay offs have made matters worse. Some 15.2 per cent of our work force, over 200,000 people, are now officially unemployed. By laying off forestry workers we destroy not only present jobs but future jobs. Now the Hon. Member for Capilano says that is what we need in fisheries. Already such areas as enforcement of habitat regulations are short of personnel. Unless we begin to protect habitat, we will not have any fisheries left.

The Liberal approach to the fisheries crisis is to eliminate fishermen, and the Tories want to eliminate public sector jobs. The people of Canada should know that both Liberals—

Mr. Speaker: I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member but his time has expired.

FINANCE

FUNDING FOR JOB-CREATION PROGRAMS—PETERBOROUGH SITUATION

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, Liberal MPs received $500,000 each to create jobs in their ridings while Opposition MPs did not. This is a sleazy, porkbarrelling act, so crass in nature as to offend the most hardened citizen. In Peterborough, during 1983, the same period, I collected a list of $460,000 worth of work for two projects submitted by Trent University, six projects from Sir Sandford Fleming College, nine from the volunteer sector, including Planned Parenthood Resource Centre, Women Against Assault, a program for psychiatric patients at the Civic Hospital, the YMCA usage study, job creation for senior citizens, conservation programs, YWCA programs and skills, Native Alliance needs and assessment, to name but a few. This $460,000 in Peterborough would have created 84 permanent jobs, and 1,514 work weeks for some of the projects, and all this for federal funding of only $460,000. Why do Liberal Members of Parliament get $500,000 and Members in Conservative ridings receive zilch?

ALLEGED FINANCIAL SUPPORT FOR ANTI-CLARK CAMPAIGN

Mr. Gaston Gourde (Lévis): Thank you Mr. Speaker. The Leader of the Opposition forgot to answer four questions that were put to him last Monday during the period set aside for Members' statements.

I would therefore ask him again to clarify several facts of national interest. Was the Leader of the Opposition aware of the alleged payment of $25,000 or $250,000 by Mr. Wolf, a non-resident, to an anti-Clark coalition, when the Leader of the Opposition and his friend, Michel Cogger, gave their support to the ex-Leader, the Member for Yellowhead, at the end of 1982? Could he inform the House even if he was not aware of the fact, which I doubt, whether he supports such action by a non-resident?

The Leader of the Opposition ought to know that Section 76 of the Canada Elections Act prohibits anyone residing abroad from soliciting or in any way seeking to urge voters to vote for a candidate or to refrain from doing so—it is against the law. It hardly matters that no election had been called at the time these events took place, since the Progressive Conservative Party and its Leader have created a dangerous precedent that could lead to a general deterioration of our electoral practices. The Leader of the Opposition has a duty to state publicly whether he supports such indefensible behaviour. In addition to ignoring the principles generally adhered to when there is a leadership campaign within a party, he has failed to explain his attitude at the end of 1982 and whether Joe Clark received the Judas kiss at that time, just before the organized rebellion that materialized in Winnipeg in 1983.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

COPE LAND CLAIM AGREEMENT

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, the foolishness of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) and his strategy of conducting land claim negotiations under a veil of secrecy, without conferring with interested third parties, has been amply demonstrated by the recently initialed COPE agreement. Apparently no serious attempt was made to reconcile the overlap problem with neighbouring claimants, and the inclusion of a 10 per cent bid differential on both public and private tenders to be based upon the ethnic origin of the bidder has incensed the business community and has wide ranging implications right across Canada.

• (1415)

Despite the Minister's reluctance to listen to reasonable arguments in the past, he ought now to heed the advice of the northern business community and of the Dene-Métis land claimants so that the Inuvialuit settlement might be finalized in an equitable and fair manner without further undue delay.

NATIONAL REVENUE

TAX ON SPECIALLY EQUIPPED BUSES FOR THE HANDICAPPED

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, Revenue Canada is trying to collect $70,000 in sales tax and penalties in connection with Metro Toronto's purchase of specially equipped busses for the handicapped. The Government agency has decided that amputees and patients in wheelchairs cannot be defined as handicapped for the purposes of the Excise Tax Act if they are travelling to hospitals for treatment of unrelated illnesses. That ruling is totally contradictory to the position that the Government took as a result of the International Year of Disabled Persons. It is also contradictory to the recommendations that were made in the "Obstacles Report", which was the report of the Special Committee on the Disabled.

Inherent in this ruling, Mr. Speaker, is the erroneous assumption that disabled people are sick. Disabled people are anything but sick, and it is totally unfair for the Government to perpetuate that stereotyping, particularly through such a basic measure as taxation. The members of my Party insist that the Government reverse this ruling by Revenue Canada which is indirectly penalizing disabled people who do not need that further obstacle in their lives.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

NATIONAL REVENUE

CUSTOMS AND EXCISE AUDITORS—PROFITABILITY CONCEPT MENTIONED IN MEMORANDUM

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. Yesterday he assured the House that quotas on auditors were contrary to the policies of his Department. He also assured the House that at no time during his tenure had there been quotas on auditors in the Customs and Excise department. How does the Minister reconcile that statement which he made yesterday with a memorandum from the district manager of the Kitchener-Waterloo office of Customs and Excise dated May 2, 1983, entitled, "Profitability of Cell Audits and Tax Change Per Audit Day", which sets specific quotas for auditors, indicates that these quotas were being set as a result of pressure from headquarters, and says that the key concern will be profitability? It makes no mention of the question of equity and fairness in dealing with the people who are being audited.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I repeat what I said in the House yesterday, and I would invite the Hon. Member to enquire about procedures existing within the Excise Division for planning audit operations.

I may also point out to the Hon. Member that this practice has been in existence for about ten years, and that it is not a new method, although it may be new to him. I thought his short stay at Treasury Board would at least have taught him the basic principles of government management and its application to specific departments. I can also inform him that with this method we are able to set up procedures by which the person-years at our disposal are used in the best interests of holders of excise licenses and of the Government itself.

Mr. Speaker, there are two factors we must bear in mind: the tax changes made at the end of an audit and the "profitability" concept, to quote the expression used in the memorandum. The concept of changes in taxation or tax value is applied both in cases where the changes are in the taxpayer's favour, in other words, when the taxpayer has overestimated the amount payable, and in cases where the amount is later reassessed in the Government's favour. When the "profitability" concept is applied, both aspects are taken into account. After the audit, amounts going back to the taxpayer, because of overpayment, are considered as well as assessments that add funds to the Treasury. I think it is important to realize—

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the Hon. Minister to be brief, if possible.

• (1420)

PER DIEM MONETARY STIPULATION

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, the House will note that in that windy answer the Minister did not deal with the question. The question was how he squares the fact that quotas have been imposed, at the insistence of headquarters, on auditors in Customs and Excise, with the statement he made yesterday that they were contrary to government policy and second, that they had not existed in Customs and Excise. The Minister denies that quotas exist.

What is the difference between a quota and a requirement that auditors in the PM-2 category have a change of $330 per day? What is the difference between the two if that is not simply spelling out precisely what the quota is?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to point out to the Hon. Member that on the occasion of a review of Excise management practices, the Auditor General approved a practice that has been in existence for ten years and is still being used to set up audit mechanisms within the Department as the most productive approach in order to deal fairly with both licence holders and the Government, since the study is to cover cases where reimbursements are due to taxpayers as well as those where, if I may use that expression, the Government has the advantage.

The Hon. Member ought to realize that to establish and manage this practice and measure the effectiveness of audit procedures, we are acting on the basis of statistics on previous audits, and we are using those statistics to develop an audit method that is the most suitable and the most advantageous, both for the licence holder and the Government.

I may add, Mr. Speaker, that last year, for example, out of a total audit rate of $3, $2 was in the Government's favour and $1 was to the advantage of the licensee.

[English]

DEPARTMENT'S POLICY

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, what we have just heard is a defence of the quota system, not a denial that quotas exist.

I want to draw the Minister's attention to this statement in the document: "I draw to your attention that where an audit is not profitable or where it is determined that additional time would not be—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The practice of additional supplementaries has been well established in the House, but the question of reading documentation on a second supplementary question is a practice that gives the Chair concern. Would the Hon. Member put his question?

Mr. Beatty: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I want to ask the Minister—I hope I will get a straight answer from him for a change—if there has been a change in the Department's policy where profitability of audits, how much money can be brought in, is now the guiding criterion, rather than justice to make sure that everyone pays his fair share, no more and no less.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member was in the Government for a short time. However, instead of adding to his knowledge, it seems the experience has increased his ignorance.

I would refer him to the Auditor General's Report tabled in the House for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1979, on page 456, and as a Member of Parliament, he should already have read it. On that page, the Auditor General of Canada explains the concept of "profitability" as it applies to Excise audits. The Hon. Member will see that the Auditor General explains the concept in the same way this was done in the memorandum the Hon. Member failed to read properly. He will also see that the Auditor General of Canada confirms this is an effective concept for proper audits of taxpayers' accounts.

I may remind the Hon. Member that while for the year 1982-1983, $95 million went to the Government, after audit, $41 million was returned to taxpayers because they had declared excise taxes in excess.

• (1425)

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I might remind Hon. Members about the length of both questions and answers. Apparently minor debates are what are evolving instead of a Question Period. The Chair is in the hands of the House. Sometimes the nature of the question invites a longer response, and the Chair is trying to sharpen this procedure to make it more parliamentary if possible. The Hon. Member for Waterloo.

TAX ON BUSES FOR HANDICAPPED

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of National Revenue. He is aware, of course, of the report in The Globe and Mail this morning which has been alluded to already in a statement by the Hon. Member for Beaches. That story is about the harassment by the Minister's officials, in this case the harassment of Metro Toronto over its specially equipped buses for the handicapped, and an effort to collect some $70,000 in taxes. This is symptomatic of the situation I raised last week, what I am raising again, and what my colleagues have been raising, in regard to the actions of his Department. Mr. Ken Christie spells out the problem. The Minister will agree with me that the officials are obviously out of order. They have erred. Has the Minister already asked that this action been undone? Has he taken action to correct it?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): The ruling to which the Hon. Member is referring is related to the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto. The buses in question are used for the transportation of handicapped and sick people, and the taxable status is based on a previous decision of the Tariff Board. We have stopped any collection of the money and we have invited the company to appear before the Tariff Board again to obtain a decision on whether or not the our present ruling is in conformity with the previous decision by the Board or whether it should be changed.

Mr. Nielsen: You will be taxing seeing eye dogs next.

TREATMENT OF THE HANDICAPPED

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, no matter how the Minister may respond, it is harassment. The action of Revenue Canada is described as having changed in the last two years. The Minister indicated that there was to be some sympathy, some humanity, in the application of the Tax Act. Where is the humanity on the part of his officials in terms of the handicapped? Will he go after the blind next? Where is the compassion? The Act was intended to protect the very people it is now penalizing. Can the Minister tell me why his officials are so mean spirited in interpreting the Act?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I have made it quite clear that the decision of the Department was based on an earlier ruling of an agency called the Tariff Board, which the Hon. Member has undoubtedly heard of.

Given the nature of the transaction, we have decided not to levy the money collected from the Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto and to wait for a Tariff Board ruling after it has reviewed this case.

I would hope that the Hon. Member did not imply in his question that the Department should disregard the law and quasi-judicial agencies such as the Tariff Board. I think that the Department's position is quite clear. The situation stems from an earlier ruling of a quasi-judicial agency, the Tariff Board, which has ruled that it is taxable. However, we do acknowledge that there might be a grey zone and we say "We will not collect the money—Use the bus, keep the money". Should the Tariff Board—a quasi-judicial agency—confirm its ruling, we will take action, and should the Tariff Board rule in your favour, very well, no payment will be sought, and indeed no money has been collected so far. Therefore, no harm has been done to the organization involved or to the others.

• (1430)

REQUEST THAT MINISTER INSTRUCT TARIFF BOARD TO REVERSE DECISION

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same Minister. The Minister has indicated that he would ask the Tariff Board whether it would reconsider that decision. Would he go even further and instruct the Tariff Board, because there is a difference between the ruling made in Calgary and the one made in Toronto, to reverse the decision that was made, so there is no such discrimination against disabled individuals?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that the Hon. Member would be first to blame a Minister who would give such instructions to a quasi-judicial agency such as the Tariff Board.

[English]

Mr. Young: As the Minister knows, the Government makes policy, not public servants.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER CHANGE POLICY

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister change the policy, if that indeed is the policy, so that there is no more discrimination against disabled individuals? That is the simple question. The Minister is responsible for policy; change the policy.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I would urge the Hon. Member to consider the question more closely. To begin with, he should realize that laws are not arbitrarily administered. First, in this instance, the administration of the acts is based on tariff items which have been approved by Parliament. Second, when there is a case for interpreting the decisions taken by agencies concerning those tariff items—and again I am referring to the Tariff Board—I am sure the Hon. Member would not want the Minister to change the legislation or the rulings of the courts without first introducing in the House the appropriate motion which would have to be subsequently approved by Parliament before he could take any action whatsoever. I think that our position . . . If only his colleague would leave him alone, perhaps he would understand the situation! The Hon. Member should understand that the Tariff Board has already ruled and that we are not collecting any money because we know there is a possibility of disagreement, that in fact there is disagreement between both parties concerning the interpretation of the Tariff Board ruling. We have asked the transport company involved to appeal its case before the Tariff Board and we will not collect any money until the ruling is out.

FINANCE

SPECIAL EMPLOYMENT INITIATIVES PROGRAM—LIST OF APPROVED PROJECTS

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance I will direct my question to the Prime Minister. As he may know, on November 25 at a meeting of the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration, a commitment was made by officials of the Department of Employment and Immigration to make public a list regarding job-creation projects in the Special Employment Initiatives Program. Indeed, it was indicated at the committee that that information would be coming forward in a matter of days. That was in November. The fact of the matter is that the information did not come forward on those specific projects. That is why my colleague, the Hon. Member for St. John's East, in January asked again in the House in written form for a list and information on the projects. The information is still not available.

Why are the Prime Minister and his Government refusing to provide the specific information on those projects so that the list can be made available and the Government can live up to a commitment which it made 2.5 months ago?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member talks about a commitment made in November. I must confess that I was not a member of that committee. I do not know who made the commitment. If it was an official, as I understand from the questioner, then indeed the work should be well advanced on it.

I referred yesterday to a request on the Order Paper made less than three weeks ago, if my memory is correct, on which work is being done. The Minister, who is attending the OECD meetings in Paris this week, will be in the House on Monday, and I am sure he will be able to give a precise date on which the list of all job-creation projects, which have gone forward under the various programs put forward by the Minister in his Budget, can be produced.

Mr. Crombie: I hope the Prime Minister will bring it to the Minister's attention. I have been through this route once before in the previous 1982-83 allocation when I asked the Minister and the Government for a specific answer on projects in that program. It is now 15 months later, and I have not received the answer yet. That is why we have concern.

REQUEST THAT INFORMATION BE MADE PUBLIC

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, will the Prime Minister remind the Minister that we are talking about funds for unemployed people and that it is very important the information be made public. The public and those people have a right to know. Will he give the House an undertaking that the information which is now available to the officials in that Department will be given the political okay so that it could be made public? Will he give that undertaking?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the issue is not whether the moneys are being spent for unemployed people. They are. It was, in the Minister's own words, in his Budget. He was fast-tracking these funds.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Indeed, I understand that one of the complaints of the Opposition members has been that most of these funds have been spent before they had a chance to grab them. If that is the complaint—

Mr. Epp: Greasing the Liberal track.

Mr. Trudeau: Well, it is the complaint I have heard from across the aisle in recent days. Much of the money has been spent. Hon. Members want to know where it has been spent. I am telling them that the list is being compiled. The Minister will be in the House on Monday. He will be able to give a date when it can be produced. However, the issue is not whether the funds are going to the unemployed. They are. The Minister was giving examples of projects in the riding of the Hon. Member for Kingston and the Islands. I could give other examples.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Yukon.

Mr. Trudeau: The moneys are going to create jobs for the unemployed.

Mr. Epp: Somebody has the list. Try John next door.

Mr. Trudeau: Therefore, the issue is in what particular ridings, and is it with the right kind of justification. The Hon. Member can make his judgment when he has the list of total government spending of these funds.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): When will that be?

TRADE

ESTABLISHMENT OF PAPER MILL IN MALAYSIA—GOVERNMENT FINANCING

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of International Trade. Charges laid in 1980 against Stadler Hurter Ltd. officials are still pending, including charges against Peter Oberleitner. Stadler Hurter Ltd. is a company which was folded into Klockner-Stadler Hurter Ltd. which was a recipient of financing by the Government —and the Minister's press release indicated this—to the extent of $144 million U.S. with respect to a pulp and paper complex in Malaysia.

In view of the fact that Mr. Oberleitner is the senior vice-president in charge of international finance and continues on with the successor corporation, has the Minister satisfied himself with respect to the reliability of the corporation in terms of this very substantial funding by the federal Government?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I am really not sure what the Hon. Member is getting at. There was a corporation which had some difficulties. It is not a question of folding in, but rather of a new incorporation, and a very new presence by the Klockner people in the corporation that is presently seeking the sale of Canadian goods and services in various parts of the world.

This company, in competition with those of all other competing nations, was successful in achieving a contract for the construction, in South Sabah, Malaysia, of a fine paper mill which will result in the creation of jobs in Canada and the sale of $144 million worth of Canadian goods. It is a pretty darned good deal as far as I am concerned.

The money is not advanced to that company. The money is advanced as a loan to Malaysia which it pays back over the regular course of the loan, providing in the meantime jobs in Canada and the sale of goods over there. I do not know if the Hon. Member would suggest that it would have been better to have allowed Japan to win that contract, or France, or one of our other competitors, with the jobs going to those countries, or whether he feels that as part of an enlightened trade policy we should be prepared to sell machinery as well as raw materials when there are opportunities which otherwise would be lost to other countries.

NEGOTIATION OF FINANCING

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Mr. Speaker, the people at the Bowater mill in Newfoundland, and the 12,000 Canadians not now working in the forest industry in British Columbia, will be interested in the Minister's answer.

I will address my supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Did Senator Jack Austin, who was a director of Klockner-Stadler Hurter until he was appointed to the Cabinet, participate in the negotiation or approval of the financing to this corporation, Klockner-Stadler Hurter Ltd?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I first want to say that the negotiations were conducted through my Department and EDC, and that Senator Austin was not involved, to the best of my knowledge, in any manner, way or form, and I cannot see how he could have been without me knowing.

Second, the Hon. Member touched on an important point when he referred to the workers in Corner Brook in particular, and he mentioned others. There is a very important difference between enlightened trade policy and the position he seems to be taking. I am sure the Leader of the Opposition does not condone that position. The mill in South Sabah is making a product totally different from that of Corner Brook and in no way affects the future of that mill. May I say to the Hon. Member in that regard that if we do not sell the machinery and do not sell the ability to make that plant to Malaysia, then 15 other competitors would have done so. Are we going to deny Canadians the job of making and exporting machinery because of misguided thinking such as the Hon. Member has just shown?

FISHERIES

HIGH SEAS INTERCEPTION OF CHINOOK AND COHO SALMON

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, who, I appreciate, is meeting with fishermen at this time, I will direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The survivors' coalition of the fishermen from British Columbia pointed out in their brief two concerns that they have which involve us internationally.

Is the Minister aware of the high seas Japanese interception of Canadian salmon, in particular the 107,000 chinook salmon and the 1.2 million coho salmon that have been taken by the Japanese fishery on the high seas in large gillnet factory ships? What can he do immediately to stop that interception of Canadian fish so that we can preserve not only the salmon resources but also some jobs for Canadian fishermen who are in dire straits at the moment?

Mr. Brian Tobin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I say to the Hon. Member that he is correct, that the Minister is meeting with the entire delegation of fishermen from British Columbia at this very moment. The question he asks has been raised and acknowledged by the Minister. It is one we are going to look into. As he knows, we do not have jurisdiction as we might have within the 200-mile limit, on the high seas, but this will be raised and explored.

It needs to be said, and I know the Hon. Member appreciates that there is a whole variety of very complex issues and different user groups accessing salmon on the West Coast. It is in that spirit of trying to have co-operative discussion versus confrontation that a meeting is taking place at this moment between the Minister and those fishermen. I hope that the desire to consult and to find solutions being demonstrated in that room can be repeated in this House, rather than the example we had last Friday of the Opposition carping, with no real serious solutions or suggestions being offered.

CANADA-UNITED STATES NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to note that 117 fishemen had to come to Ottawa to meet with the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

I will direct my supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. We have been attempting to get an agreement with the United States on salmon interception on the West Coast since 1971, to no avail. The negotiations are often stalled by very powerful political figures from Alaska, Oregon, and Washington. We have had no leadership from the federal Government in trying to negotiate an agreement acceptable to the people of British Columbia, particularly to the fishermen. Will the Minister insert himself into those negotiations to see that we get an acceptable agreement with the United States to protect our resources and the jobs of Canadian fishermen?

Mr. Brian Tobin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I say to the Hon. Member that I find it more interesting that 117 fishermen had to come to Ottawa before the Opposition even realized there was a problem on the West Coast.

With respect to the problem of negotiations on the West Coast with the United States on a salmon treaty, it needs to be said and repeated in this House that Canada and the United States reached a treaty arrangement in 1983. It was signed. It was believed that, with good faith and good will, that treaty would be ratified. We have not been able to ratify that agreement.

Canada's position was quite simple. It was either to say to the fishermen of British Columbia, as I hear being suggested, that we backtrack on a treaty that we have already signed with the Americans, or we say the cost to Canada of backing up, of giving away more fish, of allowing an Alaskan lobby to dictate to the United States administration, is not acceptable, and walk away from the table until realistic discussions can occur and the rights of our fishermen can be protected. That is the issue.

INDUSTRY

DEVELOPMENT OF HIGH-TECH INDUSTRY—MONTREAL REGION

Mr. Marcel Roy (Laval): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Science and Technology.

A report drawn up by the FANTUS company of Chicago showed and confirmed that the Montreal area would have a marked advantage as a development site for high technology companies as compared with cities like Boston, New York, Los Angeles, and others. However, such benefits related to development and operation costs were lessened by some of the policies of the Quebec Government, such as its craving for independence and Bill 17, which both curtail whatever advantages there may be for these industries.

I therefore ask the Minister of State for Science and Technology whether he has contacted his Quebec counterpart to inform him of the contents of this report and of the dangers that separatism creates for the future of high technology in the Montreal area, which would jeopardize thousands of jobs in Quebec.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this report merely confirmed what was already a well known fact, namely that the Montreal area, in fact the whole Province of Quebec, is a most important and attractive location for industries. However, there is a need for political stability. I have not yet talked with my counterpart, but I plan to send him a copy of this report, because as I have already said, it does confirm without any doubt the statements we have made in the past following public studies carried out here and in Quebec.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

COPE LAND CLAIMS AGREEMENT—CONTRACT PREFERENCE FOR NATIVE GROUP

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. There have been a couple of agreements on land claims one, with the Council of Yukon Indians, and the agreement commonly referred to as COPE. Some excellent negotiations have gone on and the negotiators are to be congratulated. However, there are two major problems. One is the overlap problem which the Minister discussed last week in the House, and the one that is causing a great deal of concern to a number of groups, including the Council of Yukon Indians, the Old Crow band, the Dene, the Metis, and the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. That is the clause where a 10 per cent preferential treatment is given to one group within the signatories to the COPE Agreement. The Minister is aware of this. What does he plan to do regarding this clause?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, from a pragmatic point of view the clause may have little application because the CYI have indicated in their agreement that they are not prepared to give preference to the COPE constituents within the area of their agreement. The reciprocity is dead, because COPE then will not give it to the CYI. Therefore, the Yukon people do not have to worry about a proliferation of beneficiaries under the COPE Agreement coming into the Yukon.

As far as the 10 per cent itself is concerned, the first meeting was useful because the business community found out that the interpretation, as verified by Mr. Reisman and the COPE negotiator, was that it only applied to federal contracts, not the wider application that they first reacted toward rather violently.

As I undertook to the Yukon Government and others, I met this morning with Mr. Reisman and Mr. de Leury to see what could be done about examining further alleged detrimental defects as a result of the 10 per cent. We are working on that to see what can be done. I hope to meet with the coalition of businessmen who are concerned about this matter in the North some time within the next seven or eight days. It is too early to predict a solution, except to tell the Hon. Member that we are certainly working on it.

REQUEST THAT FINALIZING OF AGREEMENT BE POSTPONED

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister give a commitment today that that agreement will not go ahead until the particular matter regarding the 10 per cent preferential treatment, no matter where it goes to, is cleared up? It is not just businessmen in the North who are concerned, but native peoples, the Dene, the Metis, the Canadian Federation of Business, and the Canadian Construction Association are all very concerned about it.

The Minister's own policy which says, "in all fairness" all of a sudden does not become quite as fair in this particular instance. I think the Minister will agree that it would be damaging to the Inuit themselves if a preferential treatment were given and caused polarization in the North. That is the last thing we need in these agreements.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the last comment of the Hon. Member rather surprises me. After all the lectures I have received from the Opposition about adopting a rather patronizing, condescending attitude toward native groups, for the Hon. Member to stand up and say that the COPE negotiators did not know what was good for them when they negotiated this clause, is pretty offensive, I find, and I am sure they will too.

Let me tell the Hon. Member that there are other precedents for this type of preference that have been adopted by northern Governments themselves. It is not a new thing; there have been affirmative action programs and preferences under federal Government procurement policies. There are also possibilities for northern native businessmen through joint ventures to get the benefit of this 10 per cent.

I do not want to argue the merits or demerits of the 10 per cent of the floor of the House of Commons, because obviously the Hon. Member has made up his mind. Frankly, I am not making up my mind and I am not taking this particular issue to the Government until I have had the other meeting with the businessmen. Until we have had those final meetings which I undertook to have, I do not think it would be proper to come down definitely on one side or the other. I do not think that the Hon. Member should either. We should give both sides a chance to explain their points of view.

NATIONAL REVENUE

SAFEGUARDING OF DEPARTMENTAL PAPERS AND MEMORANDA

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of National Revenue. As the Minister will remember, in his cable on December 22 last year, with respect to the district offices terminating quotas, one item was as follows: "If any of the supervisors have used quotas which include income or recovery targets for the individual auditor, you are to advise the inquirer that the practice was contrary to departmental policy and has ceased and the director will issue a letter to all employees cancelling those targets".

May I have the unqualified assurance of the Minister that none of the yearly records of all the employees have in any way been altered since the appointment of Mr. Farlinger of Woods Gordon? May I also have the assurance that all memoranda indicating the existence of quotas as a matter of practice, are still in place?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, to offer this assurance, I would first have to check with all district offices and get in touch with all division directors in those offices. However, I would like to point out to the Hon. Member that Mr. Farlinger is already preparing his study and has been in touch with many senior officials in the Department. He is anxious to fulfil his mandate, and I am sure he will be able to count on the co-operation of all district office managers and all heads of the various sections in each district office, and that he will have access to all the documents he will need to evaluate existing or previous management practices, depending on what he decides to examine in our district offices and at headquarters in Ottawa.

[English]

EMPLOYEES' PERFORMANCE SHEETS

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister undertake to the House to make enquiries about whether any of the performance sheets of employees of Revenue Canada have in any way been altered, or in any way changed, since the appointment of Mr. Farlinger, or even before the appointment, so that they do not disclose the existence of quotas, which in fact did exist? Would he please undertake to the House to make those inquiries?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, as I just pointed out, Mr. Farlinger will be able to draw on the most relevant and most recent documents that describe certain management practices within the Department. I can inform the Hon. Member that I shall make enquiries to find out whether measures inconsistent with the facts were taken and whether such documents might have been withdrawn. However, considering the ease with which the Hon. Member has been able to obtain such documents, I am sure there are thousands more waiting for Mr. Farlinger, who will be able to examine them as he sees fit.

FINANCE

SASKATCHEWAN IMMEDIATE EMPLOYMENT STIMULATION FUND—ROLE OF SENATOR ARGUE

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister in the absence of the Minister of Finance and of the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Yesterday I raised the question of the Immediate Employment Stimulation Program in Saskatchewan, the fact that Senator Hazen Argue is sitting on a $4 million fund, and that he and his office are the sole access to that fund. Public servants are not involved in screening the cases or applications or in analysing the applications. Federal MPs in this Party and in the Conservative Party were not notified about the fund. The fund is for capital works.

In light of all that information, can the Prime Minister tell the House what right the Government has to give the Senator $4 million to spend in an unconditional way in the Province of Saskatchewan without the help of the Public Service, or without notifying Members of Parliament? If he disagrees with that, would he be prepared to table documents in the House proving that departmental officials were involved in all Saskatchewan decisions prior to a decision being made by Senator Hazen Argue?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have many reservations about the premises of the question. I will take careful notice of them, investigate them, and have the Minister advised of the concern of the Hon. Member.

[Translation]

Mr. Nystrom: Can the Hon. Minister confirm whether it was his officials who recommended a few weeks ago to the Minister of Employment and Immigration a $300,000 grant for converting a municipal garage into a judo club in Quebec City? The club is known as the Club de Judo de Giffard and is in the constituency of Montmorency-Orléans.

Mr. Speaker: Questions should better be placed on the Order Paper which relate to an individual situation.

Some Hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Yorkton-Melville.

Mr. Nystrom: I shall ask my question straightforwardly. Did the officials make a recommendation or was the recommendation made unilaterally by the Hon. Member for Montmorency-Orléans?

AIR SAFETY

EMPLOYEES SMOKING IN AIRCRAFT COCKPITS

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Restigouche): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport. In the last session I raised with the Minister of Transport and his predecessor the serious question of smoking on aircraft. You will recall the disaster that occurred with 23 lives lost in Cincinnati, and recently, if it is possible to accomplish, an employee—

Some Hon. Members: Order, order!

An Hon. Member: Order Paper.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair was temporarily distracted and did not hear the Hon. Member. Would the Hon. Member repeat what he said?

Mr. Harquail: Mr. Speaker, my question is a very serious question that is being interfered with by Members of the New Democratic Party who do not care about the safety of people flying on aircraft in Canada. They will pay for this attitude, Mr. Speaker.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: It is quite impossible for the Chair to hear the Hon. Member's question at this moment.

● (1500)

Mr. Harquail: Mr. Speaker, I have not had the opportunity to be heard because of the howling of the New Democratic Party. I have a serious—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Will the Hon. Member please ask his question? The Chair will pay careful attention.

Mr. Harquail: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My question has to do with whether or not the Minister is disposed to look at the matter of employees of airlines, at least, not smoking in the cabins of aircraft, if not at the broader question of the health and safety of the Canadian public travelling on the airlines. We should be protecting their safety, not putting them at risk because of a minority of people who wish to smoke during the duration of flights.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the Hon. Member finally had a chance to raise a very serious and important question relating—

Mr. Nowlan: He raised it with you yesterday.

Mr. Axworthy: —to the safety of the air travelling public. I am pleased to report to the Hon. Member that, due to his very effective representations—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: —we are now investigating that very important subject.

Mr. Hees: At least Lloyd has a sense of humour. At least he has that. That is all he has.

NATIONAL REVENUE

SAFEGUARDING OF DEPARTMENTAL DOCUMENTS—REQUEST THAT MINISTER ISSUE INSTRUCTIONS

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have one brief supplementary for the Minister of National Revenue with respect to the matter raised by the Hon. Member for Cambridge. We know that the Minister has it within his power to issue instructions very quickly to change quotas to targets, and targets to objectives. Will the Minister issue instructions immediately to all district taxation offices for which he is responsible, instructing his officers in no uncertain terms that all documents which are related to the matters raised by the Hon. Member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe and the Hon. Member for Cambridge will not be tampered with, are not to be tampered with, are not to be hidden, so that his Wood Gundy commission will be able to examine the original material and not something which may now sit in its place?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, if the House Leader of the Official Opposition had listened to my previous answer, he would have understood that I want Mr. Farlinger to have in his possession all the existing documents which describe our managerial practices in all sections and district offices of the Department.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: Will you issue the instructions? Will you issue the instructions?

Mr. Bussières: If the Hon. Member fails to understand what this means, he probably needs a bit more reassurance than common sense requires!

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I have the usual Thursday point of order, since the Minister of National Revenue will not issue those instructions—

Mr. Pinard: Wednesday.

Mr. Nielsen: The usual Wednesday question of privilege, sorry.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: In view of the nature of tomorrow's debate—and we have had discussions on it—so that all Hon. Members might be as well informed as those on this side of the House, would the Government House Leader outline the order of business for tomorrow, the nature of the debate, and the manner in which it is to be conducted?

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, there is nothing very special about the rules to be followed tomorrow except, as I indicated last week, the Prime Minister will be the first speaker tomorrow morning, speaking on the main motion.

Since I mentioned that last week, I believe that the Hon. Member is justified in asking if we have come to some kind of an understanding as to the order of debate for the last day of debate on the Speech from the Throne. We have an understanding that following the speech of the Prime Minister—which under the rules is of unlimited duration—the Leader of the Official Opposition, by consent, will be allowed to speak again on his own motion for an unlimited time, of course, under the rules. We welcome this opportunity for the Hon. Member's Leader to express some views and ideas.

The speech of the Leader of the Official Opposition will be followed, by consent, by the speech of the Leader of the New Democratic Party, who also by consent in this case I should say, will have unlimited time.

Following those three speeches, Mr. Speaker—and I understand we will be sitting the normal hours—the other speeches will be limited according to the existing rules. I understand that at the end of the day the question on the main motion will be put.

Essentially, that is the understanding we had at the meeting of House Leaders yesterday. Therefore, it is agreed that the first person to be recognized tomorrow at eleven o'clock, after prayers, will be the Prime Minister of Canada.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, with regard to the House order, I just want to make it clear that we are, of course, prepared to give the necessary consent to allow the Leader of the Official Opposition to speak tomorrow. The understanding, as set out by the President of the Privy Council with regard to the unlimited time available to the Leader of the New Democratic Party, is gratefully accepted. We look forward to hearing what the Prime Minister has to say.

THE LATE HON. JAMES SINCLAIR

TRIBUTES TO FORMER MINISTER OF THE CROWN

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your giving me the opportunity to express my own personal feelings of regret and sorrow over the loss to this country of a gentleman who was a tremendous and very effective Member of the House of Commons. I am referring to the Hon. James Sinclair who died yesterday in Vancouver.

May I say about him that our terms paralleled here for a long time. He was first elected in 1940. I was elected in 1942. Both of us lasted until 1958. It was on that occasion that the then Prime Minister, the Right Hon. Mr. Diefenbaker, was calling for an arrangement to avoid Parliament having an election. It happened that there were two Hon. Members who protested and the same words were said by James Sinclair and myself.

What I would most like to say about him is that those of us who knew him in those years, knew that he was a very able Member of Parliament, an able speaker, and was one who could get into debates and arguments and be fair back and forth, both ways. He became in due course a Cabinet Minister under the Right Hon. Mackenzie King and later under the Right Hon. St. Laurent, and his term, as I say, ended in 1958.

James Sinclair was a very effective person about the House of Commons. He also solved a number of problems regarding the rights of Members of Parliament. Hon. Members might be surprised to learn that he made the first arrangements for a certain amount of flying to be included in the travel arrangements of Members of Parliament. He did other things. The few of us who remember those 18 years when that gentleman was here, remember him as a person who was a very able and an effective and honest Member of Parliament.

We are sorry for this loss to the Prime Minister, who is his son-in-law, and also for the loss to his three grandsons. We express our sorrow to them. I believe all of us in Parliament appreciate what this gentleman did in this House of Commons and we join with the country today in paying tribute to James Sinclair and in expressing our sorrow at his loss to us.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, I would like to associate this Opposition Party entirely with the remarks made by the hon. gentleman who has been with us very many years himself. It is not difficult for us to associate ourselves entirely with those remarks. When I first entered this Chamber in early 1958, having been elected in late 1957, I was very familiar with the good work of the late James Sinclair. But I had the advantage, as did the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) for a while in his life, of watching the action from the galleries until I took my seat. I came to admire the late Mr. Sinclair very much from the very brief period of observation I had of him. Like the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), who has raised this matter, we, too, extend our sympathies to those he leaves behind and we mourn him.

● (1510)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think it was a good thought for the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to draw to our attention the passing of the Hon. Jimmy Sinclair, who served in the House for quite a long time and who, subsequent to his departure from the House in 1958, spent a very successful career in private business. I had the opportunity when I first entered the House to observe Mr. Sinclair as a Minister. He was, as the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre has stated, a brilliant and dynamic personality who participated in debate with a liveliness that is not frequently seen, today certainly, in the House of Commons. Of course, his great talent as a debater and as an analyst seemed to become even more outstanding in the short period he served in the Opposition during that short Parliament from 1957 to 1958, to which the Hon. Member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) has referred. I would like to recall those days, as the Hon. Member did, and note as both he and the Hon. Member for Yukon did, his service to Canada and his service to the House of Commons. I particularly join them in expressing the sympathy of this Party to his wife Kathleen, who was a strong support to him not only when he was in politics but later, to his five daughters, his five grandchildren and to his son-in-law.

PETITIONS

MR. SKELLY—NEED FOR CONSULTATIVE FISHERIES MANAGEMENT POLICY

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a number of petitions today. The first one is signed by a number of West Coast fishermen and it indicates that the majority of people involved in and dependent on the fishing industry on Canada's West Coast have lost confidence in the ability of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans to manage effectively and objectively the West Coast fishery resource. Be it therefore resolved that the Government of Canada implement the following consultative process. The Government must provide a consulting committee composed of elected representatives of various user groups. The Government must commit itself to developing a fisheries management policy based on consensus and consultation with user groups.

Your petitioners humbly pray that the House of Commons will urge the Government to implement an effective policy of consultation and consensus in the development of a fisheries policy rather than continuing its course of unilateral action.

MR. SKELLY—EFFECTS OF GOVERNMENT POLICY ON FISHERIES

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): The second petition is signed again by a number of fishermen from the West Coast who are vitally concerned about the nature of the industry at this time. Whereas the high cost of fuel, interest rates, mooring and other factors which have driven up the cost of fishing are a direct result of the Government's policy, and whereas fishermen contribute to the welfare of all Canadians by providing a vital food stuff through the harvesting of fish resources, therefore your petitioners humbly pray that the House of Commons will take immediate steps to relieve fishermen from these undue Government costs.

MR. SKELLY—FISH HABITAT PROTECTION

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): The third petition, Mr. Speaker, relates to one of the most important issues concerning the West Coast fishing industry, that is, habitat protection. Whereas the conflict between resource users in logging, mining land development and fishing are leading to extensive and permanent destruction of critical fish habitat on the West Coast, be it therefore resolved that the federal Government implement the following actions to protect fish habitat: Developing specific legislation to designate areas as inviolable fish habitat area throughout the—

Mr. Speaker: Will the Hon. Member get to the point of the petition, please.

Mr. Skelly: The point is that the fishermen involved wish to have some definite, positive action from the Government in protecting fish habitat rather then the weak approach it has followed. Your petitioners humbly pray that the Government act immediately to provide this support.

MR. SKELLY—EFFECTS ON FISHERMEN OF UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE REGULATIONS

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): The second to last petition deals with a very recent event. It is again signed by a number of fishermen. Whereas the Unemployment Insurance Commission's Board of Referees ruled that special regulations for fishermen were in violation of the Charter of Rights, and whereas such decisions throw into question the Government's authority to set unemployment insurance regulations in fisheries matters, and whereas the regulations at the present cause untold hardships for already financially disadvantaged fishermen, therefore, your petitioners humbly pray that the House of Commons will take steps to introduce and improve amendments to the unemployment insurance legislation to remove this discrimination against fishermen.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member could sign his petitions before bringing them in the House. Will the Hon. Member deal with his last petition?

Mr. Skelly: I would appreciate dealing with the last petition tomorrow, if that is convenient.

Mr. Speaker: Fine.

MR. FLIS—ASSISTANCE FOR POLISH REFUGEE PHYSICIANS

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and duty to present a petition of the undersigned residents of Ontario, who now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right thus to present a grievance common to your petitioners in the certain assurance that your honourable House will therefore provide a remedy, humbly sheweth that the undersigned strongly request that steps be taken by the federal and provincial Governments to help Polish refugee doctors obtain licences in as short a possible time by creating more internship positions and by establishing financial assistance for the members of this group during their period of training. And as in duty bound your petitioners will ever pray.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 40, 379 and 400.

Order Paper Questions

[Text]

COST OF GOVERNMENT TELEPHONE SERVICE

Question No. 40—Mr. Beatty:

In 1982, what was the total amount the Government paid for long distance telephone calls not placed through Government operators or on government long distance lines?

Hon. Francis Fox (Minister of Communications): In so far as the Department of Communications is concerned, the reply to the above question is as follows:

Based on information reported by departments on their 1982 information technology and systems plans and to the Government of Canada banking and accounting branch of Supply and Services Canada, it is estimated that, during the 1982/83 fiscal year, $33,500,000 was billed directly by the carriers to departments for long distance telephone calls not placed through government operators or on government long distance lines.

It is estimated that only 9.2 per cent of the calling represented by this $33,500,000 could have been placed on the government intercity network. The remaining 90.8 per cent represents commercial (DDD) calling either from or to locations not served by the network. Examples of this would be calls to the United States and abroad or to Canadian locations where it is not economical to have government circuits.

ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA

Question No. 379—Mr. Howie:

1. In the current fiscal year how many persons are employed in the office of the Economic Council of Canada and what is the total estimated cost of salaries?

2. For each of the two preceding fiscal years what amount was spent for salaries?

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1. As of January 17, 1984, there were 136 persons employed by the Economic Council of Canada for an estimated salary cost of $5,159,000.

2. Amount spent for salaries:

1981-82—$4,552,901

1982-83—$4,791,923

RIGHTS OF ABORIGINAL PEOPLE

Question No. 400—Mr. Howie:

Did the Department of Justice create a special unit to identify and to define the rights of aboriginal people which are to be included in the Constitution of Canada and, if so (a) how many units were created (b) what was the total cost of each unit (c) what was the purpose of the structure (d) on what date will the unit or units complete its/their work?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Minister of Justice): In so far as the Department of Justice is concerned: No. The Department of Justice did not create a special unit for this purpose. Rather, the work has been carried out through the Native Affairs Section, which has been in place since February, 1976, with intensive participation by the Deputy Minister, Associate Deputy Minister (Litigation), and the Public Law Section of the Department.

[English]

Mr. Evans: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: The questions enumerated by the Parliamentary Secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand.

PETROLEUM AND GAS REVENUE TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacLaren that Bill C-14, an Act to amend an Act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas, be read the second time and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to summarize the remarks I placed on the record yesterday concerning this proposed legislation. In our opinion it has some very offensive features. The Bill proposes to reduce the petroleum and gas revenue tax on oil companies. It will provide what appears, by and large, to be a unilateral reduction in that tax without conditions. The fact that the tax will be reduced without condition means that Canadian taxpayers will have to pick up an additional share of the costs of operation in this country. Reducing that tax on the oil companies will mean that there will be less revenue available for the disabled people. Many individuals on each side of the House indicated that there were many worthwhile projects for the disabled. The concern here is how you can reduce taxation of a group which, by and large, has done well throughout recent history and at the same time cut opportunities for disabled people. You just cannot do that. There are many pensioners and individuals along that line who will be affected. This unilateral, unconditional cut in the tax rate of oil companies is going to mean that there is even less revenue available for the disabled, job creation, pensioners and a host of worthwhile projects.

It would be instructive, Mr. Speaker, to note that we are going to give Imperial Oil a cut in taxes. Over the last three years Imperial Oil earned something in the order of $600 million. Throughout this recession period their earnings dropped to approximately $400 million. In the last year they earned $200 million and change. Many other businesses are experiencing severe problems and going bankrupt. The Seven Sisters, which have always done well in Canada, are continuing to do well. In this Party, Mr. Speaker, we find that offensive. Those companies are doing well off Canada, the Canadian people and their resources. It is our feeling that they do not carry their fair share and that the Government and the Conservative Party are quite prepared to see them do even better at the expenses of many others. We feel that the tax cut will not benefit the smaller Canadian companies. There should be direct programs to provide benefits to those smaller Canadian companies which we want to see active and growing. We are not impressed with a tax cut which provides the majority of its aid and relief to the seven sisters operating in this country. That is wrong and offensive.

The second thing is the absolute blindness in the Government's and the Official Opposition's position. They are prepared to give unconditional tax cuts. The Minister of State for Finance (Mr. MacLaren) said that he wants to improve and increase Imperial Oil's cash flow position. He wants to improve the cash flow position of the seven sisters. We are very concerned about that. We know from the Bertrand Commission that it is those same companies that ripped off $12 billion from the Canadian people between 1958 and 1973. The Bertrand Commission was put in place by the Government to expose an enormous rip-off of the Canadian people. That Commission produced numerous results and recommendations. To date we have not seen one of those recommendations implemented. That is tragic, stupid and offensive. We have got to become very specific in the way we deal with major corporations in this country, which are continuing to profit and whose cash flow picture is better than almost any other company's. We could insist, if we are going to give them a tax cut, that it be tied specifically to their investment in projects that would create employment. There should be no tax relief, benefit or break unless it is tied directly to a specific job-creation project which will improve employment and the viability of communities.

Yesterday the spokesperson for the Official Opposition stood up in the House and told us about the problems of a gas plant in Grande Prairie. There are many examples of areas where we could tie tax cuts to corporations to specific projects. We could make it a condition to get a cash flow improvement at the expense of the taxpayers that it must be tied to a project which will create employment.

The third critical point on this particular break, Mr. Speaker, is that this is a tax break for oil companies. I do not know why the Government continues to have an absolute fixation on protecting banks and oil companies. It certainly does. How Canadian people can tolerate that kind of a situation is beyond me. The present Government and the Official Opposition are interested in granting this tax relief only to oil companies. There is no attempt to see this tax break carried on down the line to the consumers. There is no effort by the Government to create a downstream tax relief program or to see any of these benefits passed on to the consumers.

It is extremely unfortunate, Mr. Speaker, that the Government has not developed a downstream policy. Every time we go to the gas pumps we see that the price of fuel is rising. Yet in the House we are going to authorize a tax cut to give major oil companies maximum benefits and improved cash flows without any guarantee that they will produce job-creation projects or that they will pass any of these benefits on to consumers, small businesses, fishermen or farmers. No one benefits except the oil companies. Mr. Speaker, that is wrong, stupid and offensive.

In our Party we would like to see the reverse happen. We would like to see the Government admit that its National Energy Program has created a tremendous hardship to Canadians and that it has not looked seriously at a downstream policy. There is no attempt to give some relief at the gas pumps.

Let us review what has happened. Whenever there has been agreement to increase the wellhead price, it would appear the oil companies have added a price increase as those costs were passed down the line. Currently there is no accurate method to determine what a justified price is for fuels such as gasoline, heating oil and others. The Government is not interested in what happens at the gas pump because it is more interested in bashing the provinces for it.

In reality it would appear that every time there is a price increase, the oil companies have not only taken a share to the producer off the wellhead price but have also added their own price increase that has gone to the gas pump.

The Government has also been absolutely negligent in its treatment of consumers by its failure to introduce a competition policy in the House. It has not introduced a policy that would protect the small independent gasoline dealers. We have seen the major oil companies attempt to drive them out of business, purchase them, cut off their supplies or launch price wars against them. It is very interesting to note what happens in a gas war. While we watch the major companies attack the independents here in Ottawa in a gas war they are simultaneously driving up their prices on Vancouver Island in order to pay for that gas war against the independents in Ottawa. They are making the people on Vancouver Island pay for these gas wars in other parts of the country. This means that the major companies never lose, no matter what they do.

The Government has failed to protect consumers by not insisting on a long-term pricing policy or a fair competition policy to protect the independent gas dealers. When will we see such a system that will permit a competitive force rather than the kind of tacit agreement with multinationals and major oil companies? Frankly, I am convinced that there will be no competition legislation in this Parliament. I am sure this session will end before consumers are given any break or we see any improvement to a national energy policy that has collapsed.

Our Party has called upon the Government and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Chrétien) to take a number of initiatives in energy. First, the Minister should stop paying so much attention to his own leadership aspirations and spend more time and pay more attention to his Department. We would also like to see the Minister take the initiative of providing a new approach to the national energy policy. Certainly we would like to see a revamped Petroleum Incentives Program. There are many instances in the country where the money that is invested is being pumped into the ocean or used to drill dry holes. Rather, this money could be used to produce immediate benefits for energy security in the country, reduce the costs of energy to Canadians and provide many energy alternatives in this country.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources could authorize a government inquiry into the nuclear fuel cycle immediately. Such an inquiry could look into the problems that have been caused by the dilemma at Key Lake. It could also look into the problem which has been raised repeatedly in the House and the Ontario legislature concerning the apparent failure of the nuclear program in this country and internationally. It seems that Canadians have paid a terrible price for that particular energy initiative.

The Government is proposing to give tax cuts to oil companies when that tax revenue perhaps could be used to fund an inquiry into the nuclear fuel cycle. The other day the Official Opposition complained that the Government was giving our complete nuclear technology to South Korea, which would allow South Korea to function as a competitor on a world-wide basis. It is absolutely insane that Canadian taxpayers would pay to develop a technology, be it positive or negative, and then find that the Government would turn around and sell that technology to a country like South Korea, which will undoubtedly become a competitor for the supply of those products to other nations. It just does not make sense.

The fact of the matter is that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources could authorize the expenditure of that tax revenue, which he proposes to return to the oil companies, on the establishment of an inquiry into the entire nuclear fuel cycle. This can be justified since the whole question of the nuclear industry being of any benefit to Canadians is unsettled, especially with respect to the long-term disposal of wastes. The possibility remains that thousands of years from now those wastes may pose a tremendous problem to future generations. It has been said, perhaps tongue in cheek, that one of the major growth industries in this country could be the closing down and mothballing of nuclear power plants.

I challenge anyone in the Government to tell me what harm there would be in gathering information and public opinion about the nuclear fuel cycle through an inquiry. I give credit to the Official Opposition when it was in government in 1979 for at least contemplating the creation of an inquiry into the nuclear industry in this country. However, I certainly have not seen any policy commitments from the new Leader of the Conservative Party who is attempting to come to power without any policies. I am sure a statement about this issue would be welcomed by the whole country. It might even give the tired Government across the way, which seems bereft of ideas, some incentive to begin that inquiry now. It could be a constructive effort made by the Official Opposition for a change.

Mr. Shields: Liberal Party West.

Mr. Fisher: Such dulcet tones!

Mr. Regan: Don't say such things.

Mr. Skelly: One cannot even promote that.

In any event, I will continue to discuss alternative energy opportunities and conservation. An amazing thing happened in the House approximately a month ago during a discussion with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources about the Petroleum Incentives Program. The Minister was asked why his Department was taking $50 million out of the Canadian Home Insulation Program so that it could be put into the Petroleum Incentives Program. The Minister stood in the House to say that he would be prepared to inquire into that matter, when in reality that shift of expenditure was already in the Estimates we were to deal with that evening. The Minister was not even sufficiently informed about proposals, which his Department was asking Parliament to authorize, to provide an answer in the House.

That $50 million in the Canadian Home Insulation Program would provide insulation improvements to thousands of Canadian homes. Furthermore, a proper initiative to get that program under way would represent enormous net savings to Canadians in terms of energy. Yet the Minister's Department—I do not believe the Minister was aware of it—was to take that $50 million and pour it down one dry hole. In fact, it probably would have cost more than $50 million. What was the logic behind such a proposal? When there could have been a certain continuing reduction of energy use under the Canadian Home Insulation Program, the Minister was quite prepared to take that $50 million of taxpayer's money from a sure thing and gamble in the offshore or pour it down one dry hole in the hope of producing something positive for Canadians in terms of energy security. That kind of logic is absolutely wrong because it is shortsighted, short-term and will cause Canadians no end of problems in the future.

The other extreme disappointment is the Government's lack of action on alternative energy uses. There is a great deal of interest in the country in trying to develop the soft paths or alternative approaches to energy use. Several months ago there was a great controversy when the Government was attempting to determine what allocation it would make for the development of alternative energy sources, such as solar energy, and the development of other types of energy alternatives. What the Government said is, "We do not have enough money to do it". Instead of doing that—a paltry sum which really means nothing—the Government proposes to take the money it has available and give it in the form of a tax grant to oil companies to improve their cash flow without the condition that they build an employment development project.

I see you are signalling me to come to the end of my remarks, Mr. Speaker. I have one final point. This money is unconditional to creating any worthwhile projects. It will mean improvement of multinational cash flows. Second, the Government does not intend to pass this along in any way to consumers. There are so many other worthwhile projects in the energy field on which this money could be spent. It could be spent in social fields. The proposal in this Bill is really a tragedy.

Mr. Scott Fennell (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a moment to congratulate you on your appointment and also to congratulate Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Corbin) and the Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault). I would like to mention that we hope the former Speaker regains her health quickly so she can take on her new responsibilities and that we miss her in the House.

It is a great pleasure to speak once again on energy. I have done this quite a number of times since I came to Ottawa in 1979. I listened to the rhetoric of the Hon. Member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly). He talked about the Seven Sisters and that they might be getting a deal that is a little better. If you go back in history you will find it was the Seven Sisters that came to Canada and found oil. Bay Street could not raise the risk capital to find oil in the western Provinces. We have something to thank the Seven Sisters for. I accept the fact that those companies are greedy. They jump in. They are opportunists. But thank God those companies came and brought their expertise to Canada. I think those companies have been ill treated by the National Energy Program. Prior to the National Energy Program those companies were spending in Canada in excess of 100 per cent of their cash flow. Today I understand they are spending less than 50 per cent of their cash flow. I believe they have been an asset to this country. They would have, if given a chance, proceeded with the heavy oil sands and probably in 1985 we would have been producing oil from known reserves, from heavy oil and the oil sands.

The NDP's old complaint is, "Let's nationalize everything." Let me say to the Hon. Member for Comox-Powell River, thank God for the multinationals. In his own Leader's riding is General Motors. I say, thank God for General Motors. General Motors has introduced new technology into Canada and created jobs at a time when many people in Canada have been unemployed.

I am not a multinational basher. We must build up Canadian ownership. But the multinationals have contributed a great deal to our economy.

The Hon. Member for Comox-Powell River and I agree on one thing, namely, changes to the Petroleum Incentives Program. I disagree with how he would change them, but I believe they should be changed. I will be dealing with that point later on in my remarks. It is interesting to note that the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. MacLaren) is the same individual wo at the time of the energy hearings was the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy. He is still backing the same loser. At that time, the present Minister of State for Finance gave the same rhetoric that he gave us yesterday. It is the same wonderful bonanza to the oil industry.

I want to correct the record, and I will be quoting some statements made two years ago when the National Energy Program was being discussed in committee. As you know, Mr. Speaker, there were eight weeks of intensive hearings. We tried to change something in the Act. The one important point we changed in the Act, I think, was Subsection 79(1), which in this Bill is Clause 1(1) and refers to the Federal Court. I would like to tell you the importance of that amendment that was brought in by the Conservative Party, Mr. Speaker. Prior to the time of its being introduced with the assistance of the Canadian Bar Association, it appeared that the final voice and decision would rest with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. This frightened us because there was no higher court to which the oil industry could go. We insisted on an appeal to the Federal Court. What this Government is doing is adjusting the Clause. It is a technical adjustment. However, the reason the Federal Court is mentioned is that members of the Conservative Party who sat on this committee fought for that amendment throughout the eight-week period. I think it is very important. The fact that it comes under the same court as income tax appeals, I am not too sure about that after listening to all the rhetoric in the House about the attitude of Revenue Canada.

I recall the original National Energy Program very clearly. There was one thing on which we agreed with the Liberals and that was fairness, self-sufficiency and Canadianization. But first, the NEP was not fair. It was not fair to the West nor to the industrial heartland of Canada, Ontario and Quebec. As far as self-sufficiency is concerned, at the present time we are importing 33 per cent of our oil needs. Prior to the National Energy Program we were importing 25 per cent of our oil needs.

Mr. MacLaren: Those are net figures.

Mr. Fennell: I took the figures out of official documentation which the former Minister of Energy told us was the documentation he used.

Mr. Fisher: How much are we selling?

Mr. Fennell: They can argue over there, but I am using the same documentation the Minister told me he was using.

What we have in this Bill are back-in changes. I want to tell you how they came about, Mr. Speaker. Shortly after the energy hearings we were called to a meeting in Room 229 North by the Assistant Deputy Minister of Energy. After he went through all the changes in what we called "baby NEP", I asked what it amounted to. He answered that it amounted to a gross error in the black box, in other words, the computer printout had to be changed. There was no dramatic change. It was a necessity. What the Government projected would happen to the price of oil did not happen. Further, the price of oil has gone in the reverse direction from that which the Government intended. What the Government has done by this change in this Bill is to try to say to Canadians, "We are giving some of it back". It is too little too late. As well, it is too late to save that Government. The Government has gone too far to recover.

I have an active interest in victims of violence. The gentleman with whom I have been working asked me to get a copy of the Bill introduced yesterday. I got a copy of it right after it was presented in the House while I was waiting to speak on this Bill. I noticed that the amendments to the Criminal Code are in another omnibus Bill. This reminded me of the days when we had the ringing of the bells. I thought the Government would learn from experience that it is not acceptable in the House of Commons to have an omnibus Bill.

Mr. Malone: An octopus Bill.

Mr. Fennell: We proved that in the energy Bill. The Government had to make major changes from the original Bill that was presented. The Government had to break it up. The Government had to put things in a proper format.

At that time I gave an extended speech. This was prior to the change in rules. My speech was an hour and fifteen minutes long. I will be quoting some statements I made at that time two years ago that are so accurate. I am not often that accurate. But what I said then has happened now. This Bill removed cash flow from the oil industry in western Canada. Now the Government is telling us that through the changes the Government is giving a $2 billion incentive for heavy oil.

I read a very interesting report written by a graduate student of the University of Alberta. This report was contained in the recent list of the Library of Parliament. It pointed out that over five years it will be less than $900 million. Also it anticipated that when it is all in, it will be less than $500 million. this is misleading the public. This is not telling the facts as they are. It indicates that it will give back much more than what will really be given back.

As I indicated in a previous statement, this year BP Resources is showing quite a fantastic growth in profit. I have talked with its officials. They are pleased to be rid of the marketing arm which was dragging it down into a loss position. This Government went out, created COR, collected money from every taxpayer to purchase BP, and it was purchased when the market was at its highest. We know for sure that the Government paid at least $200 million more than it was worth. To date I have found out—and I am having this proven—that it will probably turn out to be more like $500 million in excess of the asset value of BP.

On April 22, 1982, as reported in Hansard, I stated:

> This is not Canadianization. Canadianization means looking back to our roots to see how our country began. This country was started by private enterprise and entrepreneurs. This is not Canadianization. It is government intervention and nationalization. Nationalization has not worked in one country in the world and it will not work here. It is a disgrace. The Canadian ownership charge, which I will call a slush fund because that is how the government treats it, does not have a beginning or an end. It will just continue to be another tax grab by the Liberal government.

I knew it then. We knew it then. They have proven it now. We were told that it was to buy BP. We were then told that another half a billion dollars was required to bail out Dome. The Minister rose and said that that would be put into general revenue. That is a tax on every Canadian citizen, every day of the week. I maintain that it should be removed. We were right then. We stated the facts then. They laughed at us, they screamed at us and yelled at us here in the House. They said that it would not be that way. It is that way, and our point has been made.

The one thing to which I really object in the Petroleum Incentive Program is that the Government and the bureaucracy running it—it is the bureaucracy which runs the Government; the Government does not run the bureaucracy any more—have been incapable of picking out the winners and losers. I will not even quote the names of the companies. We all know them. I have said them enough times. They maintain that they are better qualified to decide where the money should be invested. This is taking it right out of the private sector. The Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development (Mr. Johnston) made a statement at the time that it was up to the private sector to make the profits and create the funds and that it was up to the Government to redistribute the wealth. What they have done is to eliminate the wealth. They have tried to pick where they will have winners. They have gone to the frontier on the East Coast. I think it is marvelous that that much development is going on there. They have gone to that part of the country. However, we still do not know how much it will cost to bring that product onshore. Yet we know that by spending funds on heavy oil upgrading and oil sands there is no question of our being self-sufficient by 1990. We do not have a hope in Hades of being self-sufficient between now and the year 2000, and from the year 2000 on we will be on a downward scale.

If the cash flow had been left in the oil companies, they could have built megaprojects without grants, without assistance from the Government, without the Government telling them where to do it. They could have done it on their own. This has been unsuccessful and is unacceptable to my Party. We have fought it. We have been against it and will continue to be against it.

They did some good things in the Bill, but again it is too little, too late. They gave a $250,000 corporate tax credit to small Canadian companies. The reason for that is that those companies could not have survived without it. I have talked with representatives of the oil industry. They could not have survived the period since the inception of the National Energy Program if they had not been given that incentive. It is not a great bonanza to them. It only permitted them to remain in the black as opposed to being in the red.

Another change in the Bill is the rate reduction for resource royalties. Back in 1982 we argued—and I will raise it again—that under the Constitution the resources rest with the provinces. However, for some unknown reason, the Government has decided that that is not a fact, that the resources rest with the Government of Canada. It has decided that they rest with the Government of Canada, not with the people of Canada. The people of Canada are paying the price, and the Government of Canada is collecting the money. It is allocating those funds as it sees fit. This is unacceptable to us.

They tell us what a bonanza it has been for Canada. I am afraid that out West it is a disaster. The Province of Alberta had no unemployment at the time the National Energy Program came in. Today, droves of people have left and returned to Ontario, Quebec and the Maritimes. Those people are so discouraged that they would never go out West again. They were hurt by the National Energy Program. Not only the West was hurt by the National Energy Program, but the Province of Ontario was hurt as well. There was a ripple effect about which I spoke on April 23, 1982. At that time I indicated the ripple effects which would result, and they have happened. I talked about the building of compressors in Quebec and the building of pipe in Ontario. That whole group of industries went down.

What would it have done to the steel industry if they had proceeded with two or three megaprojects? What would it have done to Ontario? I admit that in my riding at the present time things are pretty good. It has a very low unemployment ratio. The reason for it is that the Americans finally picked the right car to produce at the right time. General Motors is now building a big car which is in great demand in the United States. We are lucky, but not as a result of planning by the Government. It is as a result of the planning of General Motors.

I think it is very important to indicate that the petrochemical industry in Canada is suffering. It is really hurting. The report is out now that we must have a 15 per cent cut in the cost of gas. Instead of making a cut the federal Government, being big boys, decided to give $50 million to Petrosar. To Petrosar that was nothing more than a sop, a band-aid. It does not solve their problem. How many $50 million hand outs are they going to give as opposed to cutting the cost of that gas by 15 per cent?

I will wind this up, Mr. Speaker, but I would like to point out that in Saskatchewan there are billions of cubic metres of gas locked in, and western gas producers would love to be selling that at a much reduced cost. Because of this Government and its taxes, they cannot sell it at a reasonable level to allow the petrochemical industry to survive in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: I believe the rules provide for a ten minute question and answer period. Are there Hon. Members rising to ask questions or make short comments?

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, I wanted to comment on the suggestion of the Hon. Member for Ontario and his support in defence of the Seven Sisters and the multinationals generally. The definition of multinationals is that they are corporations that use your money to buy you. That is exactly what the oil companies have done in Canada. Over the years the industry has taken out of Canada $1.25 for every 25 cents it has put in. That does not include the money they have invested in Canada which they earned in Canada. It is the amount they brought in originally or brought in at various times. They have been using our money to buy us. They continue to do that.

This Bill is a good example of the multinationals, in this case the oil companies, being allowed to buy us out. Under this Bill we give them another one point something per cent which they can use to reinvest. In the process of reinvesting, they continue to increase their ownership of the oil industry in Canada. Will the Hon. Member for Ontario comment on that?

Mr. Fennell: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to comment on that because there are so many inaccuracies. That gentleman and his Party "represent labour" in eastern Canada. I believe that I do a better job of representing labour. It is the multinationals that have created jobs for Canadians, particularly union jobs.

With regard to the Hon. Member's comment that they take out $1.25 for every 25 cents they put in, that is nonsense. I will use Imperial Oil as an example. Part of Imperial Oil is held by every major pension fund in Canada. It is the future of people's needs in their retirement. Beyond that, they paid a fair return on money the borrowed in Canada. That has been a revenue cash base brought into Canada. It forms part of the tax receipts the Government takes in. The Hon. Member does not understand economics. He should study the Japanese model. They encourage foreign technology coming into their country. They know they must have it to keep their people working. We should be encouraging foreign technology to come in now because we are so far behind. It would create jobs. The critical problem in Canada today is that there are 1.5 million people unemployed. Until we can resolve that problem, we had better encourage every nickel and dime we can get from anywhere in the world to create jobs in Canada.

The Hon. Member had better go back and look at his statistics a little more carefully before talking about the amount that goes in and the amount that goes out. It is inaccurate, not factual and is misleading to the Canadian public.

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Hon. Member who just spoke would give us an indication based on the fact that approximately 54 per cent of last year's Canadian production was from old oil, pre-1974 oil and was produced at about 82 per cent of world price, on average. The other 46 per cent of our Canadian oil was produced at world price. How does the Hon. Member propose to deal with the problem of price? His remarks sounded as though he were prepared to go to world price for all oil. Is that what he means? Did he mean what he seemed to be saying? How does he propose to explain to Canadians the extra 9 per cent or 10 per cent that would be required to cover this extra cost so that all oil produced in Canada could be produced at a low price?

Mr. Fennell: Mr. Speaker, we are currently paying more than world price for gasoline and heating oil. What the Hon. Member is saying is inaccurate. It is tax that is going in. On every gallon of gasoline there is 66⅔ cents tax. It has nothing to do with money going back to the oil companies. It is tax. They say that goes into the PIP grants, and the PIP grants go to Nova Scotia and to the Beaufort Sea. It does not go back to the traditional area of oil discovery.

If we went to world price today, the price of gasoline and heating oil would go down. If that were the solution, I would endorse it because it would assist the consumers of this country whom that Party stands up and says it is defending. They are hurting. They are trying to build in more nationalization. They would like us to have more Canadairs and more Eldorado's, which needed $400 million to save it. They would like the taxpayers to keep paying these deficits of Crown corporations. As far as I am concerned, if we went to the world price today I believe the price of gasoline and heating oil would go down.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, it was fairly entertaining listening to such complete nonsense. I honestly wonder how the previous speaker could stand up with a straight face and present such malarkey to the House. Obviously he has not read The State of Competition in the Canadian Petroleum Industry. It simply is not possible to believe the line that the Hon. Member has put forward. Is he prepared to clarify one small point? He mentioned the Japanese were interested in obtaining foreign technology. Did they, like Canadians and like his Party, want foreign equity investment and control along with the technology?

The Hon. Member's Party appears to be interested in bringing in foreign ownership and control as a mechanism for getting our technology. We in Canada developed an enormous amount of technology that has not been held in this country. In fact, it has left. We pay for research and development which multinationals ship out of the country. Will the Hon. Member admit to the House that he was just joshing us, that in fact it is not good enough to have foreign equity investment and control in place of Canadianization—not nationalization, but Canadianization?

Mr. Fennell: Mr. Speaker, we support Canadianization. I did not talk about control. I would be delighted to have equity in foreign corporations that would bring new technology to this country. I agree that not only has multinational technology left the country but Canadian technology has left as well. That is because we have not given those companies the incentive to stay.

What I stated is fact and can be proven; what the Hon. Member stated is socialist rhetoric. We are on the opposite sides of the fence and will never agree on anything, except that PIP grants should be changed. The way the Hon. Member wants to change them and the way I want to change them is different, however.

I do not agree with his stand that we are totally in favour of foreign control; we are not. We are in favour of Canadianization and putting more money from Canadians into equity in this country and getting rid of foreign control.

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to participate in debate on Bill C-14, which tidies up some of the action taken by the Government over the last couple of years.

I should like to comment on the remarks made by the Hon. Member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly). He spoke about the great disservice that Imperial Oil Ltd, for example, has done to the country and chides it for its investment in places like Cold Lake and Grand Centre and says that it is looking for handouts. I have to remind him that when Imperial Oil was attempting to build a heavy oil plant in Cold Lake and Grand Centre, using brand new technology that had never been tried before on a commercial basis, it was faced with an investment of $12 billion or $13 billion. That investment equalled the total asset base of the company in Canada. The board of directors had to make a decision on whether to go ahead or to withdraw. Under the National Energy Program, the company could not see the prospect of a return on the original investment which would protect the pension funds that are invested in Imperial Oil or the individuals and trust companies that have invested in it.

I find it difficult to entertain for a moment the rhetoric coming from the left-hand corner of the House when it is obvious that Members there do not present the facts because they do not know them.

I should like to touch upon three measures outlined in the Bill because I think they are important. The Bill points out very dramatically the disastrous effect of the slowdown in the energy industry, particularly in western Canada. The Government was trying to take action without admitting it had made a mistake. Slowly, it has been introducing certain measures to try to get things rolling again. Action in the western sedimentary basin came to a stop. Drilling rigs left the area, small service companies lost everything, small entrepreneurs just starting business lost everything, and an incalculable number of jobs were lost in the process. The ripple effect was felt in communities like Grande Prairie, Fort McMurray, Bonnyville, Grand Centre, Cold Lake, Slave Lake and High Prairie—communities in the northern part of the provinces and many in the south.

The Bill will allow corporations an annual credit of up to $250,000 that may be deducted from its petroleum-gas revenue tax liability. That is a good measure, Mr. Speaker, as it gives a company a little more cash flow and will spur investment. There is a small reduction in royalties from 12 per cent to 11 per cent. The Bill also tidies up the enhanced oil recovery program that was introduced by the Government.

I am not going to talk too much about the Bill today, Mr. Speaker, but I want to use it to focus on some things that happened under the National Energy Program. I should like to present to the House some alternatives that I think should be included before the oil industry can get moving in the way it should to lead us out of recession.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Chrétien) took strong issue with statements made in Calgary by the Leader of this Party. At a Liberal meeting in Ottawa, the Minister took the opportunity to make some scathing comments about it. He also defended very eloquently, as only he can, the National Energy Program, saying what a good thing it was for Canada. Our Leader had said that oil production was declining by 30,000 barrels per year. The Minister quoted the forecast of Oilweek that production would increase by 3.4 per cent in 1983 over 1982. That is true, but I want to show how the Minister twists the figures that he is fed by his civil servants. Indeed, this is the way that the Government attacks every problem, instead of facing it squarely.

The Minister neglected to say that the conventional crude oil production in 1983 would be 16 per cent less than in 1979 and that much of the gain in 1983 reflects record output of the two oilsands plants which just about doubled their 1979 production. They are located north of Fort McMurray. The Minister failed to mention that the discovery that started the oil industry in Canada in 1947, the Leduc field, is now dry. He also failed to mention that there is a continual decline of conventional oil reserves in Canada because the emphasis for drilling and exploration has been shifted dramatically by government intervention from the western sedimentary basin to the offshore and the so-called Canada Lands. He quoted Oilweek estimates that expenditure in the industry for exploration and development in 1983 was $5.6 billion, and noted that costs would be more than 70 per cent higher than the $3.2 billion spent in 1979. That is also true, but the Minister failed to mention that of the estimated $3.7 billion which will be spent on exploration in 1983, more than $3 billion will be spent on Canada Lands and only $700 million in the established western sedimentary basin.

I speak now of duck hunters, Mr. Speaker. If you want to hunt ducks you do not go to the mountains, you go where the ducks are. We have a government which wants to find oil. We have an established western sedimentary basin. We have the oil sands in place. We have the production capabilities. What we are doing by government policy is to redirect this into the so-called Canada Lands where not one significant find has been made to date, and I am talking about the Beaufort Sea and the Mackenzie Delta.

An Hon. Member: What about the future?

Mr. Shields: An Hon. Member asks about the future. Obviously, he has not listened and will not listen. What I said was that if one is going duck hunting, one goes where the ducks are. There is oil in the western sedimentary basin. It needs to be explored and to be produced at reasonable cost, which will in turn produce jobs. We have two million unemployed in this country. That is the problem. Certainly we have a future. Certainly it does not mean that we do not search in Canada Lands for oil. However, you do not take 75 per cent or 80 per cent of the exploration dollar and move it—by government decree—from the western sedimentary basin and from the oil sands deposit to the Beaufort Sea and to the Canada Lands, where not one significant oil discovery has been made. That is the problem.

We in Canada have now switched to the few extremely high cost wells on Canada Lands away from a healthy industry in the conventional area. That is what we have done by government decree. That is what this Government has done.

On the plus side, there are some 1.5 billion barrels of oil in Hibernia. However, I have an estimate here that the first possible production from Hibernia will be in 1995, a good 11 years away. Canada is now moving out of recession to economic recovery, and it means that these past four years have been literally wasted, because we are going to be bringing in oil and spending Canadian dollars to buy oil offshore. This will amount to billions of dollars, if the recovery takes place in the way we all hope it does.

I would like to point out some of the things said by the Minister of Energy just for a moment, Mr. Speaker, which show that the Minister obviously does not know his own Department and does not understand the energy problem. In one example, he said, "The market for gas will not change unless Mulroney decides to give our gas away". Just moments before that in the same speech, in the same locality, he said, "Mulroney should tell Peter Lougheed to reduce the price he sets for gas. Such action would do more to promote and expand use of gas in Canada than all the rhetoric against the NEP". On the one hand he says the Conservatives want to give our gas away and, on the other hand, he says the Leader of our Party should go to the Premier of Alberta and tell him to sell his gas cheaper and that would solve everything for the gas industry and would do a lot more good than just to talk about the national energy policy. That is the kind of doubletalk we have been getting from this Government for too long. The people of Canada know it and are going to render their judgment come the next election day, mark my words.

The Petroleum Service Association of Canada, which represents service and supply companies and not drilling and service rig contractors, found that member companies had reduced employment in the last three years by 40 per cent—which translates into 20,000 to 30,000 jobs—because of the national energy policy. And that is a service industry which is 98 per cent owned by Canadians. It is not foreign owned. It is owned by Canadians who built up a service industry and it has become renowned the world over. I wonder if Hon. Members of this House of Commons realize that on the outskirts of Edmonton and Calgary there are manufacturing firms which manufacture drilling rigs which are acknowledged in the industry to be of the most superior quality and design in the world. These rigs were being shipped literally all over the world. Members of the New Democratic Party talk about technology. That is technology which we as Canadians developed and we as Canadians are shipping all over the world.

It takes the same number of people to drill a $100 million wildcat well in the frontiers as it does to drill a $500,000 wildcat well in the western sedimentary basin. Therefore, if we are talking about creating jobs and the amount of money we spend on creating jobs, we should consider that we create the same jobs when we wildcat at $500,000 for a well in the western sedimentary basin as we do with a $100 million well offshore, and we have fewer of them because they are so darn expensive.

I would like to point out, Mr. Speaker, what I believe must be done to turn the industry around and allow it to lead us out of the recession. I believe we have to go to market pricing. I heard the New Democratic Party a few moments ago question my colleague, the Hon. Member for Ontario (Mr. Fennell), saying, "How can you justify going to world price?" I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, how I would justify it. I only have to look south of the border to the United States where oil has been at market price for a long time now. It deregulated about 18 months to two years ago. I can now pull up to the pumps in the United States and fill my car with gasoline and I pay 30 cents a gallon less than I pay in Canada.

The problem in Canada today is that we are paying more than world prices, as the Hon. Member for Ontario indicated, and it is because of the ad valorem taxes. It is because of the federal taxes, the petroleum-gas revenue tax, and the Canadian-ownership charge—which was supposed to be a temporary tax. Look to the taxes. That is where the problem is. We have a bankrupt Government which spends money like a drunken sailor. That is the problem, not going to market pricing. Market pricing benefits the consumer because it increases the available supply. It encourages people to get out there and get it. They know they will get world price. They know that Government will not interfere with them. It provides competitive prices at the pump or the burner tip. Regulated pricing in Canada includes excessive taxes imposed by the federal Government, and by some of the consuming provinces, which has resulted in consumers paying higher than would be the case under a market pricing system.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Fishermen, too.

Mr. Shields: Of course, fishermen and farmers. It reflects all the way through. I believe we must look at investment opportunities for Canadians. We want to Canadianize the industry. I believe we have to encourage Canadians to invest in their own industries. How do we do that? We can do it with the tax system. We can do it with some type of energy registered retirement savings fund, using it in an energy investment way, giving the same kind of tax incentives which are attached to RRSPs which are locked up in insurance and trust companies. We can declare money earned from investment in the oil industry to be non-taxable. There are all sorts of ways to encourage people to invest in the industry.

We have to go to an equitable tax system. I like to think of the PGRT in this way. It is like opening up a hamburger stand, maybe a McDonald's or Dairy Queen. You have a franchise and you must pay the franchisor a percentage of your volume. It does not matter whether you make a profit or not, you have to pay that percentage off the top. That is what the PGRT is. It does not matter a damn whether the company is making any money, the producer must pay that tax at the wellhead. You cannot do that, Mr. Speaker. You have to make it equitable and you have to get rid of that production tax, because all it does is go after the ones who are trying to develop the resource. It hits the young Canadian companies.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): We now have a ten-minute period for questions and comments.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, although we agree with the Hon. Member that the tax problem is important, the fact that he can go across the line and fill up at gas pumps in the United States cheaper than he can in Canada is not exactly true. There are some areas in the U.S. where gas is more expensive than in Canada and other places where it is much cheaper.

Would the Hon. Member be prepared to admit that, while the situation in the U.S. is much different in terms of taxation, it is also different in terms of competition? The majors are much more competitive with each other and therefore the market share seems to be more evenly balanced and the price is right down, giving consumers a break. In this country the majors set and control prices. When the product leaves the wellhead, there is a tacked-on piggyback price that the majors manage to hold on to. Through price wars they have disciplined the independents, the majors have then bought them out and they have ghost companies working for them.

Would the Hon. Member get up and honestly state his Party's position on competition policy as it applies to keeping independent petroleum dealers in position so we get fair competition and consumers can get a price break through competition? Why is his Party against that?

Mr. Shields: Mr. Speaker, I do not mind a question but I do resent the Hon. Member attempting to put words in my mouth. My Party stands for competition. That is what we are talking about. When governments come in and start to regulate everything in the way they have done, of course you have a lack of competition. That is the kind of thing he is talking about. He said there is a tacked-on piggyback price. Of course. If he had listened to what I was saying, it does not matter whether the company is making money or not, whether it is a large company or small company, they must pay the petroleum gas revenue tax, the Canadian ownership charge and those ad valorem taxes right at the wellhead. What can they do? As I tried to point out, it is no different from my saying that I will let you use my name to start a business but you have to pay me 5 per cent whether you make money or not. That is what we are talking about. It is a production tax. They do not have a production tax in the U.S.

The Hon. Member said there are places in the U.S. where you can get gas cheaper than you can in Canada, and in other places it cost more. Certainly, I am sure if you go to Alaska you will pay a little bit more than you do in Canada. But the average price across the U.S. compared to the average price across Canada is lower by 30 cents a gallon. Some people tell me it is even more than that, but I worked that out myself. I got the statistics and I know it to be true. The Hon. Member indicates there is a lack of competition. You are going to have a lack of competition if you do not allow Canadians to invest in an equitable way in the oil industry so they can get out and compete. It is basically that.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, from my perusal of Conservative policy, as inappropriate as it is, and considering the source, I can understand why even the statistics are out of whack. It is difficult to draw conclusions on the price when you look at the eastern states with areas where the price is higher than in Canada. I am not trying to justify that. I am suggesting that the real problem we have here is that we could have better prices in Canada if the Conservative Party did not oppose the introduction of sound competition legislation to protect independent dealers who can compete with the majors who really have a monopoly position.

How can the Member deny the material in the Bertrand report? Did that commission lie to us, did it give us false information? Why is the Hon. Member against competition? Their former leader said that competition was a back burner issue, and that was quoted in a business magazine. What the Hon. Member is saying is different from what the leaders of his Party are saying. They are against competition until one of them stands up and puts on the record that they are in favour of competition legislation. Talk is cheap, Mr. Speaker. Let us get some policy down in front of the public in writing.

Mr. Shields: Mr. Speaker, it is hardly worth responding to that typical NDP doctrinaire rhetoric. They have aligned themselves so closely to the Liberal Party in western Canada that they are known throughout the western provinces as the Liberal Party West. I can remember the energy spokesman for the NDP saying, when the National Energy Program was introduced, that this Canadian ownership charge is a heck of an idea but do not go after just Petrofina, go after the big ones. Let us buy some of those big ones. They did not care how many people they put out of work, Mr. Speaker. The whole philosophy is that money falls from trees. No one is accountable to anyone. We just buy, take over, and we will tell you little people exactly what you should buy and what you should not buy.

The Conservative Party is for free enterprise. My God, that is one of the basic planks of our Party. Free enterprise and competition. All the National Energy Program did was stifle free enterprise and stifle competition. I think I could talk until I was blue in the face, Mr. Speaker, but the Hon. Member would still stand up with his socialist rhetoric that we are going to buy everything, we are going to control everything and tell the people exactly what they are going to do. I do not buy it and I am sure the electorate do not buy it either.

Mr. McKenzie: I have a few comments and a question for my colleague from Athabasca. I would like to get it on the record and get it straight that in the Thirtieth Parliament all Parties in the House agreed that there had to be a gradual movement toward world prices for oil. That is on the record and the NDP supported it.

I would also like to point out that the Hon. Member is saying we are against independent petroleum dealers. If he would re-read all our speeches during the debates on the NEP, he would see we pointed out time and time again what a disastrous effect it was going to have on the Canadian oil industry. We were not speaking for the multinationals. It was the Canadian oil industry and all the firms that supply equipment to it that were affected. The National Energy Program cost Canada something like 60,000 jobs, most of them in the Province of Ontario. With incentives under the free enterprise system in the Province of Saskatchewan today and with a Conservative Government, there is an oil boom there. We encourage the free enterprise system and competition.

Does the Hon. Member think that some more Petrofina deals and more nationalization will help employment in Canada?

Mr. Shields: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question. The Canadian ownership charge is in place and the people in this country and all Members of the House of Commons know that it costs the normal consumer across Canada about $60 a year. This money is accumulating in the federal coffers in Ottawa of the rate of $75 million to $85 million per month. This works out to close to $1 billion per year. At the present time there is $1 billion in that fund. It was designed to buy foreign oil companies.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order. The Hon. Member's time has expired.

Mr. Shields: I have not finished the answer.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): This put an end to the question period.

An Hon. Member: What happened to consent?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Is someone asking for unanimous consent? Do I have consent for the Hon. Member to continue his answer?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Shields: Mr. Speaker, market analysis by the leading brokerage firms in Canada and the United States clearly point out that Canada, through Petro-Canada, paid $300 million to $500 million more for the company than we would have paid had we bought it on a normal basis. We paid much too much. The people of Canada recognize this and some of the problems that this caused the Canadian economy. The dollars that were spent on Petrofina left Canada. This contributed to the high interest rates. People then said there was no way they wanted the Government to buy another oil company in this manner. It did not do anything for us. It did not create any jobs, find any more oil, or add to the production levels of oil in the country. All it did was to take over something that was in place. The Government has gotten that message clearly. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) indicated that the Government is going to use that Canadian ownership charge to help Canada reach oil self sufficiency. That could mean anything. We will have to wait and see.

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, in 1980 the federal Government introduced the Canadian ownership charge on gasoline at the pumps for the purpose of raising the money needed to pay for the takeover of Petrofina, which then became Petro-Canada. Nine months ago the takeover was completed. The four cents a gallon which had been added to the price of gasoline at the pumps to finance the takeover was no longer justified and should have been cancelled. The Government did not cancel the ownership charge. It continued to collect $65 million a month from Canadian car and truck owners, for a total of $600 million today. If this money had been left in the hands of the car and truck owners, it would have greatly increased retail sales in this country and many thousands of Canadian workers would have ceased to be unemployed. They would have had jobs producing the extra products which the additional $600 million would have financed.

If the money had been used to reduce the cost of gasoline at the pumps, it would have made Canada a far more attractive place for tourists to visit. Eighty-five per cent of our dollars from foreign tourists comes from Americans visiting Canada. Of these, 74 per cent travel by automobile. Tourism Canada has identified that the growth in Canada's travel trade deficit is directly attributed to the decline of automotive travel from the United States.

In a brief prepared for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) by the Canadian Automobile Association this month, figures supplied by Tourism Canada were documented which clearly should be given careful consideration. They report that had Canada maintained the share of the world tourism pie in 1981 which it had enjoyed 10 years previously, Canada would have enjoyed the following. First, an additional $2.2 billion Canadian in receipts; second, 154,000 new jobs created; third, the elimination of the $1.1 billion travel deficit; fourth, the realization of personal income of $3.9 billion; fifth, the collection of an additional $1 billion in taxes; and sixth, $350 billion more in potential reinvestment income would have been available.

It is essential, Mr. Speaker, that immediate action to increase automobile tourism be taken to ensure positive economic recovery for Canada. No matter what legislation is before the House in Bill C-14, the fact remains that in taxation the Government has received an amount of $600 million without a specified purpose.

I have a suggestion to make to the Government regarding where this $600 million should be spent. There is a very important group of people in this country who are in dire financial straits and to whom the Government has a very direct responsibility. These are the people who were born without benefit of maternity grants and grew up without child care allowances. They were fed, clothed and educated without benefit of government grants. They were doctored without health care.

These Canadians have probably contributed more to Canada through minor and two great wars, in peace, and in the 1929 Depression, than any other Canadians in the history of our country. They were not the cause of inflation, nor are they responsible for the national debt. They are the victims. They are no longer able to speak forcefully for themselves and few speak for them. Their below-the-poverty-line incomes are the most vulnerable and first in the line of attack in hard times.

Many of these people retired before 1966 when the Canada Pension Plan was introduced and therefore have no entitlement to either the Canada Pension now or death benefits later. I have written to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) repeatedly about the needs of elderly constituents, many of whom are existing on sums which are clearly inadequate for their needs. The Minister replied to me on October 6, 1983 and said:

> Since single guaranteed income supplement recipients are not yet guaranteed an income adequate to meet their basic needs, the Government intends to increase their benefits as soon as resources permit.

The Government promised to help this particular group of Canadians in the Throne Speech of December 7. In the speech it said:

> Legislation will be introduced to increase the supplement for single pensioners providing additional assistance to more than 700,000 Canadians.

It is now almost two months since the Throne Speech, Mr. Speaker. Other legislation has been brought forward but the Government obviously lacks the commitment to these elderly people to produce the required legislation on a priority basis.

● (1650)

What does the Minister mean when she says "when resources permit"? Sixty-five million dollars a month has been coming to the Government for the past nine months with no identified purpose, for a total of $600 million in the Government's cash box. This $600 million should be immediately used for the purpose of bringing the guaranteed income of these needy senior citizens up to and preferably above the poverty level as defined by the National Council on Welfare. The Minister should bring in legislation on a priority basis, as she has promised to do so often and which was again promised in the Throne Speech, so that increases can continue after the fund runs out.

This completely unauthorized tax should be discontinued immediately so that the four cents per gallon can remain in the pockets of car and truck drivers, where it so rightfully belongs. This $65 million in circulation each month will greatly increase retail sales and create the favourable setting for many thousands of new jobs. With the high unemployment in Canada today, a reduction in the price of gasoline will go a long way to help Canada get moving again.

Mr. Gimaïel: Mr. Speaker, what does the Hon. Member think about some provincial policies on sales tax on fuel, especially in Quebec and Ontario? In Quebec the sales tax at the pump is 30 per cent and I believe it is a 20 per cent sales tax at the pump in Ontario. I am interested in knowing the Hon. Member's opinion about those provincial taxes.

What is the effect of those taxes on the senior citizens of this country who, as the Hon. Member said, are the most affected by those taxes and the high price of some energy sources, especially when those taxes are not particularly meant to help the country become self-sufficient in oil and gas but are meant to bring more money to provincial government assets?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, as the Hon. Member knows, taxes have to be raised to pay for the many things that Canadians need in the various provinces of Canada. The provincial governments have used taxes on gasoline and oil to help raise the money that all of us very gladly use. In 1980 this four cents a gallon tax was passed by the House. The Opposition agreed to it. As long as it was being used for the purpose for which it was specified, to pay for the takeover of Petrofina, nobody objected.

The Hon. Member must realize that for the last nine months there has been no justification for the continuation of this tax. There has been $600 million taken from the pockets of Canadian car and truck owners that should have remained in their pockets, because the tax was not justified once the purpose for which it had been passed had been eliminated. That is the sum and substance of the argument. We have no objection to proper taxes being raised provincially or federally to pay for useful things. But when the purpose for which the tax was passed by Parliament has expired, there is no justification for that tax to be continued and it should be eliminated.

What I have said is that the $600 million that has been collected by the Government could have been used to increase the pensions which desperately need to be raised for pensioners. That would have been a good and justifiable cause at that time. That is why I have asked for this $600 million to be used in that way.

Mr. Gimaïel: If I understood the Hon. Member correctly, he is saying that this tax would disappear because it is no longer useful for the purpose for which it was passed because the Government has bought Petrofina. At the same time, I understand that provincial taxes—

Mr. Malone: That is their business.

Mr. Gimaïel: I am not speaking about royalties; I am saying that the sales tax that some provinces, Ontario for example, have on gasoline are not humane taxes. They are taxes which create inflation and increase the cost of everything that must be transported throughout the country. They increase the cost of production throughout the country. It is a tax that affects all senior citizens and their needs, especially transportation needs. When the Hon. Member says that the special federal tax would be lifted, it would be mean that those provincial taxes would disappear also.

I would be very happy if the Hon. Member would let the Premier of Ontario, for example, know that the Progressive Conservative Party is against energy taxes that are not imposed to help the Government develop energy needs for the country. We would then see those inhumane taxes, especially provincial sales taxes, disappear from the country because they are very inflationary and inhumane.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is being rather tiresome and obtuse. Taxes are raised by provincial and federal governments for certain specific purposes. Tax proposals come before legislatures and are debated. If they are passed by the majorities of those legislatures they become law and the taxes are levied.

I have no objection to that legislative process going on. It is up to the legislatures provincially and the Parliament of Canada federally to decide whether or not certain taxes are justified and should be levied. As I say, this tax was passed by the House. I do not claim for a moment that we in the Opposition were in favour of this tax. As I remember four years ago, we opposed it. I said that the Parliament of Canada voted in the majority to pass this tax and make it legal. When the majority of Parliament votes for something, that is the law.

That tax was justified for one specific purpose, to buy Petrofina. Once Petrofina was bought there was no more justification for that tax being levied and it should have been cancelled. It is as simple as that.

Mr. Gimaïel: I understand, then, that the Hon. Member and his Party agree with the fact that the provincial governments can impose provincial sales tax on gasoline. That is my question. Does his Party agree with provincial sales taxes on gasoline?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I am saying to this very obtuse Member that if a provincial legislature passes by a majority vote a law that a certain tax shall be raised in a certain way and spent in a certain way, that is exactly what is done.

Mr. Gimaïel: Do you agree?

Mr. Hees: I hope I have spoken clearly and simply. I have stated it as clearly and simply as I can. I hope the Hon. Member understands the process.

Mr. Fisher: You are evading the point.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, in light of the contribution made by the previous speaker, would he be in a position to elaborate somewhat on the price of fuel from the point of view of competition? It is very difficult to extract any constructive comments from other members of his Party. With the Hon. Member's long experience, and I would say the tremendous contribution he has made, would he venture into making some comments on his Party's position on competition as a mechanism for setting price in the petroleum industry, particularly on his Party's position on competition legislation that would be designed to protect the smaller players in the industry against predatory practices by the larger players?

• (1700)

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I am first, last and all the time a free enterpriser. I do not see any better way of setting prices on any commodity than by the free play of the marketplace. If the price of gasoline is set by competition, in my experience, as in my experience with the price of any commodity, if there is free, wide open, unhindered competition in the marketplace, the public gets the best break possible and gets the lowest price possible. All of those competing for the business bring down the price as low as they can to stay in business and enable them to keep supplying the consumer.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order, please. This puts an end to the question period. The Hon. Member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell).

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, if we had had more time to ask a question of the last Member, I might have asked him the following question, which I ask him rhetorically. The Hon. Member said that he is in favour of the free market for the price of gasoline. Does he consider the OPEC oil cartel a free market? The OPEC cartel were setting the prices. I am sorry the Hon. Member is leaving the House.

Mr. Hees: I have no alternative. I am more and more bored every minute.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order, please. May I ask Hon. Members to respect decorum. A Member just passed between the Chair and the Member who has the floor. That Member is outside the chamber now. This situation should not be tolerated.

Mr. Waddell: Perhaps the Hon. Member is relying on his senility and not his ability.

Some Hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fisher: That is pretty juvenile.

Mr. Malone: He just passed in front of the Member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell), that is all.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I just began to speak—

Mr. Evans: Withdraw.

Mr. Malone: To prove you are senile.

Mr. Waddell: The Hon. Member surely has not had a chance yet to hear anything I have said. I raised a question that pertained to the whole nature of politics in Canada in the last five years. The Conservative Government lost the 1980 election on the whole issue of oil pricing. It was precisely because of the rather ill-informed remark of the last Member who spoke, who I think should know better because he has been around this House for a long time, that Canadians were not prepared to accept the notion of a free market in oil.

If the House bears with me, I will tell you why, Mr. Speaker. The Clark Government fell over a budget that basically had as one of its central pieces the notion of very steep rises in the price of gasoline.

Mr. Malone: Eighteen cents.

Mr. Waddell: The acceptance of this by the Conservative Party was dictated at the time by an Alberta caucus which wanted—and the Alberta people were pushing their own interests which is exactly what they should do—world price for oil. The Canadian people had difficulty seeing that. The reason for that difficulty was that they saw the same oil which had been $3 a barrel in 1970 was suddenly $28 a barrel. To people it was the same oil and to them the resources were not the resources of the oil companies or even the resources of one province or one part of the country; they were resources belonging to all Canada. Thus the Canadian people could not see why the price should go up so steeply to world price which the Conservative Member who spoke before me just advocated; he said that there would be world price for oil.

In effect, that is what a lot of the politics in this country have hinged upon in the last five or six years. Canadians saw that was an artificial price, fixed basically by the Arab countries, the oil exporting countries. Our producers wanted to go along with that because they would get windfalls from it. Governments would get windfalls in their taxes. The federal Government, of course, wanted the windfall as well. This is where, if I might say so, the Clark Government was very weak and was unable to deal with the provincial Premiers, one in Alberta pulling one way and one in Ontario pulling the other. I think that is one reason, when history is written, why that Government fell.

Mr. Malone: Tell us about Laxer.

Mr. Waddell: The Hon. Member says "tell us about Laxer". I am going to deal with Laxer in a minute and, indeed, I will tell him about Laxer.

This Bill—and I want to tie in what I have said with this Bill—reduces the effective rate of tax at the wellhead from 12 per cent to 11 per cent. This is what the PGRT, the petroleum and gas revenue tax amendments, does. It is easy for all these people in the oil and energy industry to throw around these terms, but for the average Canadian it is helpful to think that what we have is basically a pie. That pie is our oil and our gas resources in this country, and we have to split up that pie. That is what all the fights between the provinces and the federal Government have been about. That is what the National Energy Program—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): I am just making a remark once again. I will make it in French this time.

[Translation]

An Hon. Member has just passed once again between the Chair and the Hon. Member who has the floor. If he does it once more, I shall call the name of his riding.

[English]

Mr. Malone: Ha, ha, just been named!

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, it is impossible to speak in this House. There is talk going on. There is no one interested. I want to make a contribution to this debate. I was energy critic for my party for years. I think I know a little bit about this area. I would ask Members to bear with me and to let me continue.

As I was saying, there is the question of a pie and how to split up that pie. That is what the National Energy Program is about, that and Canadianizing the industry. That is what the fights with Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia are all about. That is what the 1980 election was about. We have forgotten about that so soon, but that really is what we are dealing with.

This Bill is very interesting. It gives more money to the oil industry. The industry says that it wants to improve its cash flow at a time when its profits have gone up 38 per cent over the last year. The industry always says it wants to improve its cash flow. We would all like to improve our cash flow. It means getting more money in your pocket. The industry always uses that phrase.

Let us go back to 1970, Mr. Speaker, and I will tell you why we in the New Democratic Party look at this, hear the industry saying it wants to improve its cash flow and know what that really means. In the early 1970s the president of Imperial Oil and other oil companies said: "There is lots of oil in Canada; we need to export the oil to the United States to improve our cash flow.

Mr. Malone: They are right.

Mr. Waddell: They exported over half of our conventional petroleum reserves.

Mr. Malone: Hear, hear!

Mr. Waddell: The Hon. Member says hear, hear. They exported it at a price of about $3 a barrel. Then what happened? A Minister was misled. He got up in the House of Commons and said we have enough oil for 300 years and enough natural gas for 900.

Mr. Malone: We have and we still have.

• (1710)

Mr. Waddell: The fact was that we exported our cheap conventional oil until the oil companies stood up again, after the first OPEC oil price shock in 1973, and said: "We cannot export. We do not have any more resources. We are really running out. We will run out in eight years". The fact is that we are running out of conventional oil resources in Canada.

Mr. Malone: That is the point, not the first one.

Mr. Waddell: The Hon. Member will get his chance in a minute.

Mr. Malone: You bet.

Mr. Waddell: He should not use his open microphone to heckle my speech. It is not fair. He will get his chance. This is very important. What happened—

Mr. Malone: And false.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I do not do this to him when he is speaking. It is pretty easy to heckle into an open microphone.

Mr. Parent: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In all fairness to all Hon. Members who are present in the House, I think we should hear what the Hon. Member of the New Democratic Party has to say, although I do not agree with what he is saying. I suggest with all respect that if the microphone to his right is bothering him, Mr. Speaker, you should order it shut off so that I can hear what he has to say.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): I ask the operator to do so.

An Hon. Member: It cannot be done.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): I believe each Member who has the floor is entitled to speak and have calm so that he can be listened to, even if those who listen do not agree. I ask everyone to listen to the Hon. Member, if not religiously, at least politely.

Mr. Waddell: I thank the Hon. Member opposite. I will try to come to the point a little more quickly. The fact is that we had a tremendous oil price increase in the early 1970s. It began the round of inflation which we suffered. That, plus the further increase in 1978, killed the western economies. That is why there has been so much trouble. That is why there have been questions day after day about high unemployment rates, high inflation rates and so on. That was the beginning of our problems.

For our part in Canada, it was compounded because we were running out of cheap conventional oil.

Mr. Malone: Right.

Mr. Waddell: We had listened to the companies which had told us that we had lots.

Mr. Malone: No.

Mr. Waddell: Suddenly we were importing oil and it was costing Canadian taxpayers billions of dollars to import oil in the last few years. Now we are on a much more even keel, but we were importing oil. That has raised the deficit of the federal Government, which is another problem. When the oil companies say "Help our cash flow", we know what will happen. There is a pattern in Canada. The pattern is that they say we have to export—and this is what is happening with natural gas—and that they need to increase their cash flow. Then the Government allows them to export, they make money, and then they come back and say: "We do not have enough resources. We need more money to find resources". Then they are given more breaks, more cash flow, with which to find resources. They find the resources and they say: "Now we have the resources, we have to export them".

Mr. Malone: Tell us about the NEP.

Mr. Waddell: Tommy Douglas once said that Canadians were fools to get saddled with an energy shortage in oil and that we were double fools to have a gas shortage in the future.

I want to say what is wrong with the NEP, and I will mention John Laxer as well. My friend wishes me to do that. The problem with the NEP is that it was flawed in a number of ways, one of which we are dealing with in this Bill, The PGRT. It was a difficult task for small oil companies and so on. It was flawed because it shifted exploration with all the tax breaks from Alberta and in the western sedimentary basin in Saskatchewan, where it really should be, to the Beaufort Sea and offshore. It did that because it was a power struggle. It was the federal Government trying to get power in areas which it controlled—the north and offshore. It does not have power in Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia. Part of it was a power struggle.

I spoke out against the NEP and Jim Laxer said that I should have supported it. The NEP was flawed because a good energy policy should have focused on developing the resources of Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia. I believe even my friend to my right will agree with that. He understands that; he is from western Canada. It was flawed because it tried to Canadianize the industry in a very complicated and expensive way by these Petroleum Incentive Program grants. They were going to give away $8 billion from 1982 to 1986 in PIP grants, yet we have trouble obtaining money for post-secondary education and pensions. That was $8 billion to the oil companies to help their cash flow; from 80 cents to 93 cents in some cases, on every dollar.

I say to Jim Laxer and to the House—and I have already said it, as has the Leader of my Party—that we would have done it in a more simple way. We would have spent the money by nationalizing or taking over one of the major oil companies, such as Imperial Oil, and not giving PIP grants. We would have had 50 per cent Canadian ownership by 1990 by doing that alone, and we would have saved money in the process compared with these expensive PIP grants. That was our policy. It was a clear policy. We will stand by that policy anywhere in the country.

Mr. Malone: You're darned right, 50 per cent taxes.

Mr. Waddell: We are seeing a retreat from the NEP. That is what we see in this Bill. We predicted a retreat from the NEP after all the heat came on the Liberals from the industry. It is a powerful industry, aided by Americans who now have a new poodle in Canada. That poodle is called "Brian, Brian Mulroney".

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The Hon. Member has no right to use the man's name. We are always cautioned on that. Why does it not apply to everybody?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): It should apply to everybody.

Mr. Waddell: I agree. I will say, then, that the Americans have the Hon. Member for Central Nova (Mr. Mulroney) on a leash and they are taking him out for a walk almost daily, when we listen to his speeches on energy.

As I was saying, we are seeing a retreat from the National Energy Program. We see it in these amendments. Does the Government want higher prices for oil companies? I will tell the House how it can be done. It is simple. We have a regime in which there is a thing called old oil at a controlled price. There is also new oil, which is at world market price or even higher. What does a smart Minister of Energy who wants to acquiese with the oil companies do? All he has to do is call old oil new oil. That is what part of this Bill or part of the taxing statute does. He simply changes the definition of old oil and then it is new oil and it gets world price; or he extends the period, as this section does, for when old oil becomes new oil or when new oil starts to become new oil. It is very simple. That is all he has to do. What we are seeing here is a retreat from the National Energy Program.

Mr. Malone: Hear, hear!

Mr. Waddell: The thrust of the National Energy Program was dead right. The thrust is that we have to Canadianize our industry. The Conservatives were wrong there. They just want us to be a colony of the United States. The energy industry is a vital industry. It should be Canadian-owned. It does not have to be totally public-owned. As I said a minute ago, we would have taken Imperial Oil under public ownership. That is true and I gave reasons for it. It is going to be a mixed industry. We have a mixed economy in Canada, but let us not have it controlled by Gulf, Texaco, Imperial, which is Exxon, and the rest of the Seven Sisters. They will not act in the interests of Canada. That has been well documented and well proven. There are instances where they have not acted in the interests of Canada. Energy is a vital commodity. We have to have some control over it. We have to have a National Energy Program. I agree with that, even as a westerner. I agree that the federal Government has a role to play.

Mr. Malone: You are not a westerner.

Mr. Waddell: I disagree with the way in which the federal Government is playing the role. I want to say something positive about this Bill.

Mr. Malone: Good idea.

Mr. Waddell: It is with respect to the role the Government should be playing. I notice the taxes in the Bill exempt investments and enhanced oil recovery from the PGRT. In other words, there are some breaks in terms of enhanced recovery. Enhanced recovery does not simply mean conventional oil. Wells have to be dug deeper. There have to be different methods. They have to go into things which are not tar sands but are heavier oil and so on. As the Hon. Member to my right might point out if he were asked—

Mr. Malone: Your far right.

Mr. Waddell: —we have a Saudi Arabia of oil in Canada. It is not necessarily off the coast. It is in the heavier oil deposits along the border between Saskatchewan and Alberta. If we develop that area, as we will some day, we will find plenty of oil. However, it will be costly to develop. Unfortunately, we sold out most of our conventional sources at cheap prices. They are gone. We made that mistake. This other oil will be expensive to develop. That is what we should be doing. To the extent that the amendments to the tax helps the enhanced oil recovery, they are good amendments.

• (1720)

I have spoken on two aspects. I do not know whether I dealt with Mr. Laxer completely. Maybe I can summarize what I said. It would not have been right for the New Democrats to have supported the National Energy Program with those kinds of flaws. I do not believe I have said this before, but during the height of the pricing disagreement, the struggle between Premier Lougheed and the federal Government when Alberta was shutting off the tap and there was the problem of national unity, seeing that my Party represents both western and eastern areas I felt it incumbent upon me to try and work out a policy with respect to pricing.

I went to Edmonton and I also went to the Government of Saskatchewan, which was then an NDP Government. I met and worked with them as well as the NDP leader in Edmonton, Grant Notley. We sat down and negotiated an oil deal. It did not matter in the sense that we did not have power, but it mattered in that we started to understand all the difficulties. I say to Premier Lougheed and to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) that it was not easy. It was very difficult for them, having to do the real thing. We tried to negotiate a blended price. The Liberal price was a blended price. I agreed with that.

I will wind up with this, Mr. Speaker. We took this pie and we said that if the provinces want world price for their share, they get world price, and if the federal Government wants less than world price for its share, it gets less than world price. We worked out a price. Unfortunately we never had to apply that price. We tried to work out a deal. That was very important in the interest of national unity.

I say to Mr. Laxer and to others that the New Democratic Party, representing both the east and the west, was together on its energy program. That was politically important. I am pleased that we were when I was energy critic, and we still are.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order, please.

Mr. Waddell: May I conclude with one sentence?

An Hon. Member: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): There is not consent. I heard a "no".

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, I feel that the presentation by the Hon. Member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) was excellent.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Evans: Surprise, surprise!

Mr. Skelly: It was the one important and constructive contribution that has been made in the latter hours of this debate in Parliament.

Mr. Malone: Mirror, mirror on the wall.

Mr. Skelly: After delving in detail into the topics that he discussed, does the Hon. Member have any conclusions that he would like to draw from the presentations? Are there any conclusions that he has?

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, to be fair to other Members, I will try to conclude in one sentence.

Mr. Malone: Thanks for the fairness.

Mr. Waddell: The other day in my community office a student asked me about the PGRT and the National Energy Program. It goes out and out and out. There is so much to discuss that it is difficult to bring it into something that is understandable. I tried to deal with some of the good aspects of this Bill, some of the difficulties with the PGRT, what it means in the context of the National Energy Program, why we needed the National Energy Program, the flaws in the National Energy Program as I see them and the difficulty of getting an oil price deal. It was more difficult than what the Member thought. I should not have criticized the Hon. Member for Northumberland (Mr. Hees) in the way I did. Sometimes one's tongue runs away. The Hon. Member is a senior member of this House. However, neither should he have left before I had anything to say.

What I wanted to say to him in conclusion, and he can read it in Hansard, was that while you can say world price or let the free market fix it, you cannot say that about oil. It is very difficult. That is why we are dealing with a very difficult tax statute here.

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, had the Hon. Member not said what he did about the Hon. Member for Northumberland (Mr. Hees) at the start, he would have had a full speech without any comment from me. Bearing in mind that he spoke in favour of Canadianization, an objective that I believe is the goal of virtually every Party in this House—

Mr. Ferguson: You should tell your Leader that.

Mr. Malone: —as a result of the NEP, can he tell us how many foreign rigs left the Provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan?

Mr. Evans: And how many foreign rigs came back into Canada last year?

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, there have been numerous speeches given in this House with respect to rigs leaving Canada. I do not have the statistics on the number of foreign rigs, but I can answer in a general way about rigs leaving Canada. Yes, some rigs left and went to the United States. The fact is that some came back. There was a downturn in the industry as OPEC broke up. This bit about rigs going in and rigs going out is a false means of measurement.

I did acknowledge in my speech that I thought the taxes had hurt the Alberta industry and that there was a downturn in Alberta. I said that in Alberta, and that I thought it was wrong. There was heavy taxation at the beginning that really hurt.

I want to conclude by saying to the Hon. Member that I absolutely disagree with his statement that all Parties agree with Canadianization. He should read the speech of his Leader, the Leader of the Opposition. The Leader of the Opposition is not in favour of Canadianization. He is in favour of Americanization of the oil industry. He is going to open the doors to complete American investment. Once again this will mean up to 70 per cent or 80 per cent control of the industry. That is obvious to me. There is no consensus on Canadianization. The Conservatives do not believe in it. We in the NDP do and I have proposed measures where we could reach it very rapidly.

Mr. Regan: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Hon. Member if he is serious in the opposition that he has expressed to investments in the offshore, investments that have meant so much for the economy of the Provinces of Nova Scotia and Newfoundland. Does he really believe that a policy that merely encouraged continued investment in areas where the reserves had been reasonably defined is adequate, that there should not have been any encouragement for the more expensive search, a necessary search if we are to have reserves for the future in the offshore area? I know that the Conservative Party opposed the grants for the offshore in Nova Scotia. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mulroney) said in Halifax that he was against the grants and therefore in favour of a policy that would shut down oil exploration in the Halifax area. I am rather shocked to find that the NDP also say that it was an error to establish that program for the encouragement of our offshore exploration.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, that is a good question, but the fact is that I did not say that, I said we should develop first the oil in the western sedimentary basin. It is a cheaper oil to develop. We know it is there. It is not an easy matter. Then we have to ensure our energy security in the long run, which means going offshore.

Perhaps I can say this because I have the liberty. The Minister is very rarely smug, but he is a bit smug right now. The Members from Nova Scotia and the Premier of Nova Scotia have been giving a bit of a clap-trap to the people of that area. They promised them this pie in the sky development, these poor people who are dying for industrial growth because they have been so misgoverned for a long time. They promised them this great oil bonanza. They have the people hooked on that. They think it is the greatest. I dare tell a little bit about the truth. Maybe it is not as big a bonanza as that.

The fact is that we have to explore offshore. Let us be fair with the people. It is going to cost money to go to Hibernia. It is cheaper to buy oil in Libya and Nigeria but we cannot rely on those places. We have to develop the offshore but it is going to be expensive and long-term and dangerous. Let us be honest with the people of the Maritimes and not say that we are against the development. I say let us go with the more economic development first and then expand.

It seems to me that the Beaufort Sea is a welfare ripoff for Dome Petroleum. We have not seen one barrel of oil from the Beaufort after all these years. We should go to Hibernia. There is gas in Nova Scotia but I do not think there is oil. There is gas in Hibernia and in the western sedimentary basin and that is where we should go.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I want to take the strongest possible exception to the comment to the effect that the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Mulroney) wants to make an American colony. That remark is unworthy of any Hon. Member in the House. We will become a stronger Canada under our Leader. We will let the Americans come in and invest, but under our rules and our guidance, just as was done in Alberta. We would not have an oil supply today if we had taken that attitude and stopped the Americans from finding oil and gas. Two hundred dry holes were drilled before anything was found. Because it was done under our rules and regulations, Canada is a stronger country. That is what the Hon. Leader of the Opposition will do. He will not make this country an American colony by any means and I strongly object to that type of comment, which is completely untrue.

Mr. Waddell: May I reply briefly?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): No, that was not a question. The Hon. Member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone).

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like the Hon. Member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) to tell us what the price of oil is in Libya. In the spirit of Canadianization, would he also tell us how many service industries in the oil park that went bankrupt as a result of the NEP were foreign and how many were Canadian.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, I have a point of order. I am reluctant to intervene in a question but there is a point on which clarification by the Chair would be useful. For a Member to stand up and make a comment, especially one so provocative and outrageous as that made by the Hon. Member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor)—

Mr. Taylor: It was true, that is why.

Mr. Skelly: I wonder whether a person would be denied the opportunity to respond and set the record straight. Is it the intention of the Chair not to allow Members who have spoken to reply?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): I think that is not the question; the question is that the Chair recognizes people as they rise and at the discretion of the Chair. We are now back in debate.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I know there is a period of time allotted for asking questions and answering them, but I think that if there is a point of order on a procedural matter in that time, the time taken for it should be subtracted from the debating period. It seems to me that I still have the opportunity to answer in a brief way the question raised by the Hon. Member for Crowfoot and the other Member.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): No, the time for the question period had expired at the moment the Hon. Member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) rose on a point of order. The question period is definitely completed. It may be prolonged by unanimous consent if that is the wish of the House. Do I have unanimous consent to prolong the question period?

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): There is not unanimous consent so we are back in debate. The Hon. Member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone).

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It is my understanding that we rotate speakers and I thought we had just heard from the Hon. Member for Crowfoot.

Mr. Evans: We heard all we want to hear.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I heard from the other side of the House that they had heard all they want to hear. If they would like to go for their supper early, that is fine with me.

There is so much that I would like to talk about at the present time, Mr. Speaker, that I almost do not know where to begin.

Mr. Evans: Try the Bill.

Mr. Malone: Without defending multinationals of any kind, be it General Motors, General Foods or general oil companies, as an Albertan I should like to give some history of what happened in that province.

First of all, Alberta, along with Saskatchewan, felt that it suffered a tremendous injustice in the early part of the century. It was not a province like other provinces. When every other province became a part of Confederation, one fact was known, that the resources belonged to the provinces. As British Columbia, Manitoba and the Atlantic provinces became part of Confederation, they too knew that the resources belonged to them. That was not the case with Saskatchewan and Alberta. For the first 25 years in the history of those provinces, from 1905 to 1930, the bitter fight around the farm kitchen tables was about how they could be like the rest of Canada.

In those days those provinces took in, through taxes, only 30 per cent of what it cost to run the universities, schools and hospitals. The dominion government kept the right of royalty from all the resources. For the first 25 years in the history of those two prairie provinces, they struggled to become equal with the others. It was in the period following 1930 that cap in hand, time after time, they came to the federal Government of Canada, to James Street in Montreal, to Bay Street in Toronto, pleading for money.

The oil sands are not something new. In the late 1700s the trappers who moved through the Northwest Territories knew that oil was seeping into the tarsands. In their journals they wrote about the oil that was leaking through. Yet in the early history of the provinces when oil came to this country from elsewhere, they did not receive a penny from central Canada. They were the poorest of the "have-not" provinces—dirt poor, never able to be out of debt, until the 1940s. Before that they always ran a deficit. Then Imperial Oil came along and found Leduc No. I. That was the first bright day in the history of the Province of Alberta.

Today, the NDP talks about the multinational oil companies, spewing hydrogensulphide out of their mouths as they say it, reeking with what we think of as "H_2S" making us believe that these companies are so foul and so wrong. I dare any Member of Parliament or Canadian to go into a supermarket and buy any liquid as cheaply as gasoline. You cannot buy Coca-Cola as cheaply as gasoline, you cannot buy peroxide as cheaply as gasoline and you cannot even buy distilled water for your iron as cheaply as gasoline.

You do not have to drill 80 or 90 dry Coke holes before you get Coca-Cola. You do not have to find a dozen producing Coke holes before you can make Coca-Cola into a Coca-Cola field and you do not have to ship it off to some refinery to crack it, break it down and distribute it to the stations. I am not trying to say that Coca-Cola is just as important as gasoline; I recognize the nonsense of that part of my argument.

Mr. Hovdebo: It is also produced by multinationals.

Mr. Malone: Good morning! I woke up an NDPer so I am okay after all!

The truth of the matter is that there is efficiency in the oil industry. When my friends to my left say that these are foul multinational oil companies, I wonder why they never attack any other multinational industry—the Royal Bank of Canada or the multinational automobile industry. That is because the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) comes from the home of the multinational automobile industry. But he does not mind attacking the oil industry.

We live in a multinational world, Sir. The greatest exporter of oil supply materials in the world is based in Calgary. We have been exporting technology from the oil industry which is bought in Houston and Denver. There are millions of dollars of Canadian outflow of great technology. However, the New Democratic Party would not want to even live in that multinational world because it thinks that the multinationals only attack us. It is time that we, as Canadians, woke up and realized we had better get into the world of the multinational, because if we do not, they will cut us off and throw us away.

What is it the NDP cower from, that it so fears, that it does not want to get into the world at large? Does that Party think that if we open the doors, that we Canadians are so weak we cannot compete? The truth of the matter is, Sir, that we have some of the best educated people and the greatest volume of resource of any nation of the world. If we cannot compete with the doors open, without all of these protections of nationalizing, my goodness, what a slam that is against the people of Canada.

What is this great nationalization monument which the New Democratic Party would like to throw at us? That Party praises PetroCan. It thinks PetroCan is the greatest thing in the universe. In downtown Calgary the two tallest buildings, Sir, are PetroCan buildings. They are monuments, Sir, to nationalization. They are 500 acres of marble, cut in Finland and polished in Italy. It was shipped to the East Coast of Canada and then shipped by rail to Calgary. The tallest buildings in Canada are now in Calgary. They are tributes to nationalization. We cannot run away from Petro-Can. It does not matter which station we use, which independent, every time that attendant squeezes the pump we are paying tax to build those two buildings. That is a pretty good system.

I am a farmer. I could farm very well if all the Canadian people would just take four cents of the price of every litre of gas—or gallon of gas, I am sorry—and give it to me. It would be very simple to farm, but that is unaccountable and irresponsible. I say thank goodness that Bill C-14 is before the House now because at least it is a recognition that the Government has committed hara-kiri in what it calls the "new energy program".

I would like to say a few words about the advantage of having a strong western Canada because it implies an impact and spinoff to central Canada. There is an unfortunate myth that if we did not nationalize the oil industry, what would happen is that western Canada would become too strong.

I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, that one of the very important pieces of research was done by J. C. Underhill of the Alberta Chamber of Commerce—

Mr. Skelly: That is the Canadian intelligence service, is it?

Mr. Malone: The Hon. Member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) thinks the chamber of commerce, those small businessmen who produce jobs in the towns and villages in our constituencies, even in his own riding, is the Canadian intelligence service, that there is some underground movement. I can understand why the New Democratic Party would think that.

I would like to say a few words about what the production of oil and gas in western Canada would have meant to central Canada. In the 25-year lifetime of one plant—and I am talking about a tar sands plant—we could expect a cost of some $60 billion to $65 billion to sustaining investment, the majority replacement for wells running into some 20 billions of dollars. If you take the multiplier effect of CPA to that, you would come up with $290 billion working through the Canadian economy, if those tar sands plants which were on stream prior to the last election would have continued to stay on stream.

What that would have meant is an enormous impact on central Canada. First of all, the Canadian debt would not have been nearly so severe. If we take a look at today's situation in light of our tremendous unemployment, the estimated impact of the oil sands plant on the income of Ontario households would be $108 billion. It would do that in the following way: iron and steel production, $800 million; metal fabrication and machinery, $370 million; transportation equipment, $325 million; manufacturing and processing, $740 million; in financing, $370 million; and in trades and services, $750 million. In short, Sir, as the oil industry of western Canada is enhanced, the manufacturing base of Ontario and Quebec is also enhanced.

We have no steel in western Canada. We cannot make our own pipelines. We cannot do the manufacturing and fabrication of products. That is what central Canada does. But whether it is east, north or west, when the regions get richer, the centre gets richer, because we are a country which is interlocked and interdependent one on the other. The truth of the matter is that a great deal of unemployment today all over Canada is a result of the NEP which cut down the potential which was making this country work.

Before the National Energy Program the strongest industry in the whole country was the oil industry. It was the one industry which was the engine which was working. The present Government killed the engine and started the trend of following the NEP, heading over the cliff to the disaster of high unemployment.

The Hon. Member for Vancouver Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) talked about Canadianization. I will give some statistics of May 21, 1980, before the NEP. At that time, Sir, we had in this country operating 324 oil rigs. We had 37 rigs moving. We had 12 rigs rigging and 46 rigs down. The May 18, 1983 statistics show 51 rigs are drilling, 17 rigs are moving and 388 rigs are just sitting around. That is what the National Energy Program did.

We import today, Sir, something like 200 million barrels of oil per day. That is down considerably from the 500 million barrels of about four or five years ago. However, the fact is that when we buy that oil and bring it into Canada, we are a part of the Mexico works program. We are creating employment in other countries. We trade, and naturally we will trade with other countries, I can appreciate that. We have to. However, I do not understand for one moment why, in a country which has a resource, we know the potential is there and the volumes are there, we cannot put in place the infrastructure to feed Canada first from our own feedstocks. But not this Government. It prefers to go to some other country. It prefers to take tax money out of all of our people and send that money off to other countries. It prefers to help build up employment in other countries at the expense of its own because there is some unfortunate mythical east-west fight where the Government could not stand to see the oil industry thrive in western Canada. It could not stand success. It thought somehow if it killed the oil industry, if it nationalized it, somehow it was going to be good for central Canada. The fact is, Sir, that one oil company which used between 500 and 600 half-ton trucks every year bought zero a year ago. Does that not have an impact on Ontario, the automotive centre? Does that not have an impact on Sudbury which mines iron? All of a sudden industries basically collapse and fold. The oil industry was the only successful engine in the whole of the country at the time when this Government brought in the National Energy Program, and that hurt every province, not just western Canada.

I want to speak for a moment about those rigs which moved out of Canada, not only to make the claim that they were Canadian, which they were; not only to say the service industry was Canadian, which it was; but also because I think many people who read Hansard, listen to us on TV, and even Members on the other side, do not really know what we are talking about when we say a "rig". I think they conjure up in their mind this derrick standing there and a few people standing around it.

About 16 trucks are required to move a rig, Mr. Speaker. It is not just the rig; it is the compressors and a whole battery of equipment which go with it. To move a rig from Alberta to Texas costs some $500,000. What happened in Canada? In 1980 there were 324 rigs drilling. In 1983 there were 51. The Government killed the industry.

There was all this talk of self-sufficiency but what did the Government do? It created PetroCan. Do you know what Government Members cannot do, Mr. Speaker? They cannot hold up one quart, cup or even teaspoon of oil that that company ever found. It has not found any oil. All it managed to do was build twin office towers in Calgary, take over other companies to run them as they had been run previously, but it has not found a single drop of oil. The Government has not enhanced the oil industry in this country, it has not made us more self-sufficient. What it did was destroy our economic base. That program alone cannot be blamed for unemployment in this country, but it certainly can be blamed for a large measure of unemployment. It had a very significant impact.

Had the two tar sands projects gone ahead, Mr. Speaker, as originally intended prior to the re-election of this Government in 1980, the impact on Ontario alone was some $800 million for metal fabrication, $370 million for transportation equipment, $325 million for manufacturing and processing, $740 million for financing, and $370 million for trade and services. The numbers go on and on. The Government tried to destroy not just the oil industry but it tried to destroy western power. This Government believed that somehow there was just too much power out west.

The truth is that we were Canadianizing the oil industry faster before the NEP than we are after. The service industry was Canadian and it has been driven out. The rigs were Canadian and they have been largely driven away. We did not cause the multinationals to go into bankruptcy, just Canadian companies. I dare the Liberals to go into Nisku and give a speech on oil. I dare Liberals to go into Brooks, Alberta and try and defend the NEP. They would come out of the riding on a long pole because the people are bitter and angry. I dare them to go into Coronation, Alberta and defend the NEP. The Liberals hurt those people, put them out of work and made it so that they could not buy the manufactured products of central Canada.

I do not know why they are afraid of a regional person making money because every time that happens he does exactly what you do, Mr. Speaker; he spends it. If he buys a refrigerator and it is Canadian, it is made in central Canada. If he buys carpeting and it is Canadian, it is made in central Canada. If he buys an automobile and it is Canadian, it is made in central Canada. If he buys a toaster and it is Canadian, it is made in central Canada. If you make Prince Edward Island wealthy, you make central Canada that much more wealthy. If you make western Canada wealthy, you make central Canada that much more wealthy. Surely we must come to the point where we quit fighting one with the other and realize that this great country is interdependent; as one gets better, we all get better. We do not need to kill an industry somewhere in the name of preserving power elsewhere. The then Minister of Energy, now the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde), said that we needed the NEP because otherwise Alberta would get rich beyond your wildest imagination. He said that in a speech from the Chateau Lacombe in Edmonton. That should not be the fear because we are all Canadians and we ought to benefit together.

Mr. de Corneille: Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that the Hon. Member's message is to leave the impression that policies are created in order to pit one region against another. That is a most unfortunate suggestion. One of the things that concerns me about the specifics, although within the context I think it is most shameful to undertake to pit one region against another in that way, is that the Hon. Member has been very selective in his information and his memory. He has not brought to our attention the comparable problem faced by the oil and gas industry in the United States. His selectivity of statistics brings us information about the problems of oil rigs in Canada and that they moved to the States, but how much does he tell us about what happened to those rigs when they got to the U.S.? How many did not get into operation? The U.S. has had exactly the same problem with a gas bubble, problems with rigs and with an industry suffering very greatly.

Those are my comments, thank you.

Mr. Skelly: Could the Hon. Member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone) give us an indication of why his Party is opposed to enhancing Canadianization? He indicated almost total opposition to Canadianizing the industry. Why is his Party against establishing competition in the industry so that Canadian consumers would benefit? He knows that the Seven Sisters, the ones he claims built Canada, will ultimately drive the small entrepreneur out of business. Those people are in a position to make a better deal for consumers. They are really the backbone of the free enterprise system. Why did his Party cause such harm to the industry by supporting the high interest rate policy? I recall the Hon. Member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) saying that they could see no alternatives to high interest rates. We are prepared to admit that probably one of the worst governments this country has seen since Confederation is this Liberal Government. I am sure the Hon. Member agrees. The only thing that would be worse is the Conservative Government which is likely to follow.

Can the Hon. Member indicate why his Party is against competition, against free enterprise and for high interest rates?

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Comox-Powell River's imagination is made out of latex. There was so much false innuendo in his comments and questions that they do not deserve an answer from me or anyone else. The public knows very well the history of our two Parties and the Party opposite. We do not need him poking holes in the air with his finger or casting aspersions. I would not lend any credence to such statements because they simply do not deserve it, Sir.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed from Monday, February 6, consideration of the motion of Mr. Jack Burghardt for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when the first atomic bomb exploded in a New Mexico desert in 1945, life itself changed. Man gave himself the power of his own destruction. Never again would children be free from fear of the bomb. Never again would we parents be able to reassure them, nor to calm our own anxieties. A nuclear war would make no distinction between the sides of this House in which we sit, between right and wrong, between rich or poor, between east or west, north or south.

Nuclear weapons exist. They probably always will. And they work, with horrible efficiency. They threaten the very future of our species. We have no choice but to manage that risk. Never again can we put the task out of our minds; nor trivialize it; nor make it routine.

Nor dare we lose heart. Managing the threat of nuclear war is the primordial duty of both East and West. But Canadians are concerned that the superpowers may have become diverted from this elemental responsibility, that they may be too caught up in ideological competition, in endless measurements of parity, in trials of strength and will. Canadians also know it would be foolhardy to expect that animosity between East and West will somehow disappear this side of the point of no return. The experts would have us believe that the issues of nuclear war have become too complex for all but themselves. We are asked to entrust our fate to a handful of high priests of nuclear strategy and to the scientists who have taken us from atom bombs to thermonuclear warheads, from missiles with one warhead to missiles with ten or more, from weapons that deter to weapons that threaten the existence of us all.

Canadians, and people everywhere, believe their security has been diminished, not enhanced, by a generation of work spent on perfecting the theories and instruments of human annihilation. But technological push too often finds a sympathetic political pull. It is leaders who decide on defence budgets and research budgets. It is leaders who must direct. It is leaders who must assert their will for peace or science will devise ever more lethal weapons systems. Canadian security is at stake; and Canada has earned the right to be heard, in peacetime and in war.

Thousands of Canadians fought and died in World Wars I and II that Canada had no hand in starting. We helped to shape the post-war world—at Bretton Woods where the World Bank was launched; and at Dumbarton Oaks and San Francisco, where the United Nations organization was born. We advocated universal membership in the international community—when it was not always popular to do so, as Prime Minister Diefenbaker demonstrated with respect to Cuba; as Prime Ministers St. Laurent and Pearson demonstrated in helping newly independent states gain admission to the UN; and as our Government demonstrated in recognizing the People's Republic of China and its right to a seat on the UN Security Council.

Canada emerged from World War II as one of the very few nations with both technology and resources to build nuclear weapons. But we had seen the terrible nature of these weapons and their work. Successive governments, therefore, renounced this nuclear option, and applied Canadian skills to the peaceful uses of nuclear energy. In place of a national nuclear force, we joined with others in systems of collective security—in the UN, in NATO and in NORAD. Canada is a steadfast member of each of these three organizations. In the UN, we took the lead in peace-making and peace-keeping in the Middle East, Asia and Africa. In NATO, Canada is one of the few countries to maintain Alliance forces permanently outside its borders. In NORAD, we contribute an element of priceless value: the airspace above our vast land. The United States can design its own defences knowing that for 4,000 kilometres north of them, the land is occupied by a stable ally.

We take our commitments seriously. We have replaced our maritime patrol planes with the most advanced aircraft of their kind in the world. We have equipped our armoured units with the high-performance Leopard tank. We are phasing in sophisticated tactical and interceptor aircraft. We have launched a program to acquire new frigates. All of this is the most modern equipment available, all of it tasked to defensive purposes.

We decided in 1969 that it was no longer appropriate for the Canadian Armed Forces to be equipped with nuclear weapons. We announced our intention to phase these systems out in a manner fully consistent with our commitments to our allies and as quickly as equipment replacement permitted. By 1970 we had divested ourselves of the surface-to-surface Honest John rockets in Europe. By 1972 we had completed the conversion of Canadian aircraft in Europe from a nuclear strike to a conventional attack role. Also by 1972 the Bomarc ground-to-air missiles based in Canada had been returned to the United States. We subsequently decided to replace the nuclear-equipped Genie Canada-based CF-101s with state-of-the-art CF-18 interceptors. These CF-18s will carry out our air defence role more effectively with conventional armaments than the CF-101 could do with nuclear weaponry. This means that later this year we shall have rid ourselves of the last vestiges of nuclear weapons.

We have done more than look to our defences, Mr. Speaker. We have addressed the causes of insecurity and instability, particularly in the Third World. East-West and North-South are the four points of the political compass of our modern age. The problems of the South cannot be solved in the absence of progress on global security. Massive military expenditures are distorting economic policies and diverting resources away from global economic development. This in turn is worsening Third World instabilities that ensnare East and West and add to the insecurity of us all. Canadians, therefore, have earned the right to speak. They are telling us, the Members of this House, as people everywhere are telling their own leaders, that the danger is too near. They want their leaders to act, to accept their political responsibility, to work to reduce the nuclear threat.

Last fall I spoke of an ominous rhythm of crisis. I drew attention to the confluence of three potentially disastrous trends: the resort to force to settle disputes; the risk of the proliferation of nuclear weapons; and the worsening state of East-West relations. I decided to practise what all seven leaders of the industrialized democracies had proclaimed last summer at Williamsburg: "... to devote our full political resources to reducing the threat of war". I decided to use Canada's influence to call international attention to the danger, to try to inject high-level political energy into East-West relations, to turn the trend line of crisis, to work at the crossroads of common interest between the two sides.

I proposed that the megaphones be put away, that an armistice be declared in the war of ideology and recrimination, that an end be made to manichaeism on both sides, that we exercise leadership and apply statecraft in East-West relations wich is the most important strategic relationship that we have.

Since last fall I have taken that message to Paris, The Hague, Brussels and Rome; to the Vatican, to Bonn, to London and to Zurich. I presented it in Tokyo and Dacca and to the Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting in New Delhi; to Peking, to Washington and to the United Nations. I met with leaders in Prague, East Berlin and Bucharest, to ensure that our message was heard in the highest councils of the Warsaw Pact.

At each step along the way my message was straightforward. Canada was not looking for a seat at the superpower table. But our lives and our future were on that table, as were those of nine-tenths of the world's population living outside the United States and the Soviet Union. We all had a right and a responsibility to involve ourselves, to press those at the table to remember their own humanity.

We proposed giving political impetus to the Stockholm Conference on measures to build confidence and reduce the risk of war in Europe. As many other East-West contacts collapsed, that conference took on importance even beyond its status as the only forum serving the Helsinki process of detente.

We insisted that both sides invest political efforts to stimulate the talks in Vienna on mutual and balanced force reductions. These MBFR talks are the key to achieving parity of conventional forces in central Europe and to raising the nuclear threshold, thereby diminishing reliance on early first use of nuclear weapons.

If I may make an aside, I want to insist that the MBFR talks are concerned with force reductions. They are not seeking equilibrium at a higher level; they are seeking equilibrium at a lower level. I have explained it many times so I cannot understand for the life of me why raising the nuclear threshold by balancing conventional forces is always interpreted by my critics as balancing at a higher level. Surely the purpose of MBFR reductions is to seek a balance at a lower level and therefore to raise the nuclear threshold that way.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: We also proposed meetings as soon as possible of the five nuclear powers so that a forum might be established wherein to negotiate global limits and, eventually, reductions to their nuclear arsenals.

We urged action to reinforce the Non-Proliferation Treaty. Preventing the spread of nuclear weapons is in the interest of superpower, middle-power and micro-state alike. Yet as long as the five nuclear powers show little sign of initiating the reductions called for in the Non-Proliferation Treaty, we run the grave risk of seeing nuclear weapons spread to new regions and old rivalries.

Above all, at each step along the way I have urged political leaders to commit themselves personally; to put peace at the top of their agenda; to exercise the political leadership that the current dangerous situation demanded; to restart the dialogue between East and West. I told President Reagan that the signals he was sending of American strength were being received in the East but that a message of peace was not getting through. I told leaders of Eastern Europe that the harsh rhetoric of their declarations had guaranteed rejection of the Warsaw Pact's more positive proposals, and there were some. Misperception and mistrust on both sides run deep but I believe we are beginning to see the signs of progress.

In Goa in November, 42 Commonwealth leaders strongly endorsed our efforts to restore political East-West dialogue and to promote negotiations among the nuclear weapons states.

In Brussels in December, NATO foreign ministers reached a consensus on several points I had argued strenuously during the past few years, particularly in a few NATO summits that were held. They made a declaration which offered the East a balance and a constructive relationship. They made it clear that the West did not aspire to strategic superiority and the West respected the Soviet Union's legitimate security interests. These are statements out of Brussels in December, a meeting attended by the Canadian Secretary of State for External Affairs and Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen), a meeting where he played an important role getting these points accepted.

● (1120)

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: In accordance with our initiative, East and West have now agreed to resume the MBFR talks in Vienna on March 16, and they have agreed that foreign ministers should play a more active role in stimulating progress at those talks.

At our insistence, NATO foreign ministers participated early last month in the opening of the Stockholm Conference to underline the importance they attached to high-level political dialogue. The Warsaw Pact foreign ministers responded to this Western move and also went to Stockholm. Of special significance was the presence in Stockholm—and it would not have happened otherwise—of U.S. Secretary of State Shultz and Soviet Foreign Minister Gromyko, who met for over five hours. Both also met with my colleague the Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Broad political contact was thus re-established between the countries of East and West for the first time since the acrimonious conclusion of the Madrid Conference last September, in the shadow of the Korean airliner tragedy.

Even Prime Minister Thatcher has taken steps to improve contacts between East and West. Her visit to Budapest last week is a further signal of momentum in East-West dialogue—a determination to seek out areas of understanding between members of opposing alliances, and to promote a reassuring clarity about intentions.

In contrast to earlier statements, President Reagan twice last month signalled a constructive tone in American policy toward the U.S.S.R. The response from Moscow has been mixed—elements of tough rhetoric together with signs of a cautious readiness to reopen lines of communication.

I have, Mr. Speaker, just returned from consultations with the leaders of Czechoslovakia, the German Democratic Republic and Romania. Those countries represent a middle-European geography, and a middle-power psychology, with long experience of East-West tensions.

Obviously they are closely allied to the Soviet Union. But their leadership, their influence and their identity are, in present circumstances, significant. I found, for example, a very positive response to my suggestion that the middle powers of each alliance could play a constructive part in reviving habits of consultation at the highest levels of East-West politics.

I gave them our Western perspective on the decline of détente, and on the importance of its renewal, and I listened to their own. We talked about the mixture of signals between East and West, and about the need to go beyond an improvement in rhetoric toward acts and gestures to restore confidence and reduce tensions.

I return with several conclusions from my talks in Eastern Europe.

First, I was struck by the contrast between the cordial, reasonable, and non-ideological private talks, and the occasional blast of Warsaw Pact fundamentalism to which we were subjected in public. I believe this disparity underlines the importance of personal contact and private dialogue. To without that dialogue, both sides risk remaining prisoners of their own polemic.

● (1125)

Mr. Trudeau: Second, because we were able in our private talks to strip away much of the invective surrounding key issues, I believe we were able to begin a process of exposing areas of common interest. That process will take time, but I dare hope that a new level of maturity in East-West relations is within our grasp.

Third, if we are to reach that level of maturity, we shall have to grapple with difficult problems of misperception on both sides—blind spots and distortions, subjective errors of analysis or of judgment.

Few of my interlocutors, for example, seemed genuinely able to perceive, let alone concede, the gravity of the threat posed to western countries by the deployment of Soviet SS-20s. And for our part, I wondered whether we in the West had not significantly underestimated the full impact on the East of the combination of INF deployment with the harsh rhetoric of recent years.

It will be uphill work to gain a more accurate perception of each other and to gauge more accurately the consequences of our various words and deeds. From a confrontational deadlock, where INF deployment must continue and negotiations must be restored, only the "third rail" of political confidence and communication can ensure an early and constructive outcome.

In reflecting on these conclusions, and on the substance of my talks in Eastern and Western capitals alike, it is clear to me that areas of common interest are beginning to emerge. Let me suggest ten principles of a common bond between East and West:

(1) Both sides agree that a nuclear war cannot be won.

(2) Both sides agree that a nuclear war must never be fought.

(3) Both sides wish to be free of the risk of accidental war or of surprise attack.

(4) Both sides recognize the dangers inherent in destabilizing weapons.

(5) Both sides understand the need for improved techniques of crisis management.

(6) Both sides are conscious of the awesome consequences of being the first to use force against the other.

(7) Both sides have an interest in increasing security while reducing the cost.

(8) Both sides have an interest in avoiding the spread of nuclear weapons to other countries, so-called horizontal proliferation.

(9) Both sides have come to a guarded recognition of each other's legitimate security interests.

(10) Both sides realize that their security strategies cannot be based on the assumed political or economic collapse of the other side.

As decalogues go, this may seem modest. But I wonder, in this period when there are positive signs of emergence from a time of crisis, whether there is not sound purpose in going back to basics, beginning again with a commitment to principles which can be shared, finding a place to start—surveying a little common ground on which to stand. Therefore, we intend to draw on these ten principles to develop elements of a common purpose among the leaders of both East and West.

I shall be writing to President Reagan and to President Andropov, to leaders of both alliances, and to other statesmen, to propose that these are principles upon which both sides can and should build, because there are points of agreement as well as disagreement. There is a way around the impasse of recent months. There are signs of promise and I believe that the trend line of crisis has turned.

As we look back on our work over the past four months and look to the months ahead, I am encouraged that we are beginning to see results. We sought to catalyse a dialogue between East and West, and that is happening. We sought to persuade both sides to tone down their rhetoric, and that has begun to happen.

I sought to associate myself with like-minded leaders in several countries of the world. Many of them have begun, or continued, to make their own contribution to a reduction of tensions, to put forward their own proposals for arms control. My colleague the Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs and I have pursued the Canadian initiative in multilateral institutions, in bilateral relations, at special conferences and in dialogue with groups and individuals.

We have injected political energy into East-West relations; but political energy is not, by itself, enough. It must be nourished by imagination, fortified by persistence, and confirmed by action; by imagination to find new ideas, which break old deadlocks and address emerging dangers; by persistence to negotiate new agreements and to meet the challenge of technology; by action in the form even of small steps as evidence of good faith; by action on specific tasks, such as developing the means to verify arms control agreements, or in regularly scheduled consultations between East and West.

In the months ahead Canada will build on the progress so far achieved, to ensure that our ideas are further developed and implemented. We have no monopoly of proposals, nor do we expect them to gain acceptance overnight. What counts is that some, though by no means all, of the key East-West indicators show that their downward course has been arrested. My own personal contribution, though necessarily less intensive than in recent months, will definitely continue. After all, Mr. Speaker, sixteen countries plus the United Nations in three months is a pace that would be hard to sustain year-round, but I intend to go to Moscow, whenever circumstances permit. Our initiative will also be taken forward by my Cabinet colleagues, by our ambassadors abroad and by all Canadians who share our purposes.

Canada will play its part in the councils of the West, in bilateral talks, at multilateral meetings and conferences, in contacts with the Soviet Union and its allies.

We shall work vigorously for progress in the Stockholm Conference and the MBFR talks. If these talks bog down, Canada will endeavour to ensure that political leaders again take a personal hand in energizing them. Once the MBFR negotiations resume in March, it will be imperative that NATO respond to the proposal made last summer by the Warsaw Pact.

Following further consultations with our NATO allies, we shall in the course of the current session of the Geneva Conference on Disarmament, circulate three proposals to gear down the momentum of new technology. We will thus give additional substance to the strategy of suffocation which I put forward in 1978. These proposals are: a ban on high-altitude anti-satellite systems; restrictions on the mobility of ICBMs; and improvements in the verifiability of future strategic weapons.

In the months leading up to next year's review of the Non-Proliferation Treaty, we shall continue to press both sides to keep the NPT bargain, for security is indivisible. If countries which do not now have nuclear weapons acquire them, then everyone's security is diminished.

The basis of the NPT bargain was that the nuclear powers would reduce their armaments in return for the non-nuclear powers not building their own, and that both would co-operate in sharing the benefits of the peaceful uses of nuclear energy. Thus, the current nuclear weapons states bear an immense responsibility in preventing the spread of nuclear weapons.

Consequently, we must also continue to press our proposal for a conference of the five nuclear weapons states. It is a concept whose logic is compelling. Those five nuclear powers are at the same time the permanent members of the Security Council. They have responsibilities as well as vetoes. That is why I asked the UN Secretary General, Mr. Perez du Cuellar, to explore and to promote confidential meetings of their representatives in New York. In my talks with Premier Zhao in January, I found that the Chinese had, since my visit to Peking, begun to express a readiness to consider such contacts in New York without the pre-conditions they had raised before.

The idea will take hold slowly, to be sure, as new ideas do. But I believe that it will take hold. For example: accidents, miscalculation, crisis, systems failure—these are nuclear perils which all of the five powers must cope with, and which they have the responsibility to manage co-operatively. I suggest, therefore, that an early focus of five-power consultations should be crisis management, particularly the handling of nuclear weapons incidents, and the improvements of crisis communications. Among the five nuclear weapons states, the two super-powers have by far the largest arsenals. They bear a corresponding responsibility to apply the same genius to reducing their arms as they did to developing them. They must not let their views of each other's morality and legitimacy prevent an early resumption of arms control talks. It is vital that they resume negotiations on limiting and reducing intermediate range and strategic nuclear weapons.

This past decade the superpowers have not ratified a single significant arms control agreement. In the preceding decade they had ratified a dozen. Gestures are needed to lift the clouds of suspicion. A useful step would be for both sides to ratify an agreement which they observe already: the Threshold Test Ban Treaty.

Mr. Speaker, I have been giving considerable attention so far to five-power relationships, to the bilateral environment of the super-powers, to multilateral talks and conferences.

Much of our own contribution to this work is enhanced by the consultative process open to us in NATO. NATO is a significant forum for Canada, whether in terms of national policy, of collective security, or of basic approaches to East-West relations. When NATO was formed in 1949, Canada insisted that it be a political alliance, as well as a military one, and Canada continues on that basis loyally to maintain our long-standing commitment to NATO and to its policies. But all institutions tend, by their very nature, towards inertia unless their members give them energy and a renewed sense of direction.

Thus I was gratified that NATO ministers decided at their December meeting to commission a full review of the steps NATO can take to improve East-West relations. Canada had been urging such an approach at successive NATO summits.

● (1140)

The last such review, in 1967, took place at the initiative of Pierre Harmel, Foreign Minister of Belgium. Then, as now, there was a sense that things ought to change. There was a need for the Alliance to have a vision of the future, and a political strategy to achieve it. The document which resulted, known as "The Future Tasks of the Alliance", was a landmark in NATO thinking. It came to terms, as in this period we must come to terms, with the need for a broad policy which governs, and gives purpose to, our military security.

The Harmel Report's most profound conclusions were:

1. Military security and a policy of détente were not contradictory but complementary;

2. Work towards a balanced reduction of military forces should be intensified, as well as efforts to overcome instability and insecurity;

3. The world had changed since the formation of NATO in 1949, and that there was a need to look ahead—to gain sightlines on the future and to work along them; and

4. Each member of the Alliance had a contribution to make, not in subordination to, but in consultation with, the other members of the Alliance.

Mr. Speaker, despite frequent setbacks, the results of that policy are impressive, especially when viewed from today's perspective: the inter-German settlements of the late sixties; the bilateral promotion of ties with the USSR by many Western countries, including my own visit in 1971; elements of rapprochement in the superpower relationship—and the Helsinki Final Act of 1975.

We need to approach the coming period with the same spirit of enquiry, the same creative diplomacy, the same forward-looking vision.

The world has changed since 1967. We sense the shifts of power and psychology. East-West relations are far more complex than they were 17 years ago. There are competing trends of autarky, interaction, and interdependence, unforeseeable at that time.

It is essential that this new review chart a course for the Alliance to the end of this century. Canada will make its own contribution to the work, and abide by the results. I congratulate the current Belgian Foreign Minister, Leo Tindemans, for his part in launching the review. I welcome the incoming Secretary General, Lord Carrington—a man whose own ideas on East-West relations will inspire us with creativity and guide us with common-sense.

Mr. Speaker, NATO is an alliance of democracies. Open discussion and independent action are as important for us as they were for Harmel.

An alliance which fails to defend democracy in its councils will surely fail in its defence of democracy in the field. NATO summit meetings have a particular importance, and should be the senior level of responsible Alliance leadership and authentic debate. Prime Minister Thatcher and I discussed this point during her visit here last September. In my remarks after dinner in Toronto, I suggested that:

"—Canadians look upon NATO as the cornerstone of our defence policy. We do not wish to be silent partners, however. It is a political alliance, after all, and politicians like to discuss and even argue the issues. If we disagree from time to time, and expend great effort in trying to resolve our differences, that is not a sign of weakness in the Alliance, but a sign of the strength which pervades a free association of independent countries".

Just as NATO's last policy framework emerged from the intellectual ferment and military turbulence of the 1960s, so should the next review take into account, if only as background, the full range of ideas now current about international security and the effects of nuclear arms. Many of these ideas are uncomfortable, incompatible, and awkward to entertain, but they are there, Mr. Speaker, and no conspiracy of silence will make them go away. Neither the Alliance, nor its member democracies, are built on blind faith. National support for defence policies—and for defence expenditures—cannot be sustained by political or strategic liturgy alone. Bridging the gap between accepted wisdom and public anxiety surely means an open examination of the intellectual territory now occupied by many critics—critics of every persuasion, I might add—of contemporary concepts and doctrines. I believe the new NATO review should reflect what I have been calling the need to bring statecraft and high politics to every level of the East-West system, and I suggest that the review will also have to cope, as Harmel did, with differences of perception among Alliance members, with European and North American perspectives, inconsistencies and ambiguities, and with inchoate doubts and aspirations on each side of the Atlantic.

[English]

Canadians know the gravity of these issues. They know that Canada's power is limited and that we cannot force others to listen to us. But they also know that Canada has a role to play. That is why the Government is creating a defence and arms control institute: to help Canada and Canadians more fully contribute to advancing the debate on peace and security, and to shaping that debate.

Throughout my own personal efforts to subject the science of war to the art of politics, I have been sustained by the support of many Canadians and encouraged by their good wishes. I wish to thank them now, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

And in French, I also wish to thank the many people who wrote to me in French to give me words of encouragement and advice, and offer their prayers, and I wish to thank them very, very much for having wanted to take part in this action with us, with the Government and with Parliament.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

I wish to assure those Canadians, as well as this House, that the work we have started will continue. The Government of Canada is committed to these purposes and will carry them forward.

However, we can carry them only so far without the collaboration of those who own and control nuclear weapons, because it is the nuclear powers, and above all the superpowers, who bear the greatest responsibility. Let it be said of them in the future that this was the time when their political judgment controlled their technological genius, when their best interests served the common good. Let history survive that it may judge them generously.

Let it be said of other nations that they saw their own responsibility to work to reduce the threat of annihilation, to forgo nuclear weapons and to serve the purpose of durable peace.

And let it be said of Canada and of Canadians that we saw the crisis; that we did act; that we took risks; that we were loyal to our friends and open with our adversaries; that we lived up to our ideals; and that we have done what we could to lift the shadow of war.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brian Mulroney (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we meet to discuss the momentous issue of peace at a time when humanity is faced with the alternatives of seeking a process to reduce international tension or creeping to the brink of nuclear devastation. There is no doubt that the world today is subjected to strains and tensions perhaps without precedent in modern history. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, it is somewhat curious and saddening that, while men and women meet in the spirit of amity at the Winter Olympics, some of their own political leaders ignore the majestic example set by our youth and speak instead of the imperatives of conflict which can only decimate that same generation.

Perhaps there is a lesson for all of us in the page of history which shows how, in earlier generations, war became inevitable only because so many persisted in the view that it necessarily must bo so. We must never succumb to the easy temptation to believe that war cannot be avoided, because we are at that point in our history where we will not survive a nuclear confrontation. Nor can we afford a conventional war which might lead to the ultimate countdown. There should be no illusions in that regard. A nuclear countdown at any time in the future means a countdown for all humanity. There are no exceptions and there are no safe havens.

We are here, as Canadians, to rededicate ourselves to the wearying road of compromise and negotiation in the search for a durable peace. We are here because we want to be, and we are here because we must.

We all dream for the day when nuclear weapons are banished from the earth. But nuclear weapons cannot be disinvented. They are a terrifying reality which political leadership must seek to constrain. Yet a failure to incorporate a credible nuclear component within NATO's overall strategy would be an invitation to nuclear blackmail with consequences too terrible to contemplate, as the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) mentioned earlier.

So in this sense the real question before us is how can we best achieve policies which reduce the recourse to nuclear weapons in Europe and elsewhere.

Mr. Speaker, my party and I approach this most important question through three fundamental principles.

First, Canada's foreign policy should, in fact it should always, but especially on matters of grave importance internationally, rest on a bi-partisan search for consensus.

Second, the cornerstone of our security is NATO solidarity, and third, only through the strengthening of the non-nuclear deterrent can we reduce the present reliance on nuclear weapons.

[English]

If I may elaborate, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has spoken eloquently and well of the need for reducing East-West tension. We share this view. As I indicated last November 14 and many times since in the House, my Party and I have consistently wished him, as Prime Minister of Canada, well in all of his initiatives. The maintenance of peace is critical to every hope we have for Canada and to every dream we have for Canadians. We support the objectives of the Prime Minister's initiatives and welcome his report to Parliament on this important manner which has so preoccupied—and understandably so—his attention in recent months.

Until now—and I say this much more in sorrow than in anger—Parliament has had to glean its information from a political platform in Montreal where the Prime Minister elaborated on some proposals, and from the reception halls of Eastern Europe where some blanks were filled in. We regret this disregard for Parliament. We regret that the Prime Minister, embarking on an honourable initiative, failed to equip himself in a way which would have given his initiative enormous additional credibility.

The missing dimension, if I may, Mr. Speaker, in the Prime Minister's approach has been a formal endorsation of his proposals and the inclusion of, perhaps, yet others equally valuable by all Members of this House of Commons, who deserve to be consulted on a regular and ongoing basis about such matters.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: In my speech of December 4, I urged the Prime Minister to introduce such a resolution and I am sure that, had he done so, it would have gained the unanimous approval of every Member of this House of Commons. I assure him that if he chose to do so today, our endorsement of his proposals and initiatives would be no less enthusiastic. With such an endorsement—and I think it is important, Mr. Speaker—the Prime Minister could quite properly have dismissed as unworthy any suggestion about any partisan implication in such an approach. With such a mandate, the Prime Minister could have properly claimed the support of all Canadians from all Parties, in all regions of this country, for a worth while initiative.

I call upon the Prime Minister again. He indicated that it was his intention to undertake further trips. I wish him well in that, and I call upon the Prime Minister again to bring forward an appropriate resolution so that Members from all corners of this House may consider it and give him the kind of overwhelming endorsement which will help him along his way.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that such formal support of all Members for a peace initiative has other practical and positive consequences. As a reflection of the unanimous support of this House, all-Party, non-partisan delegations to disarmament conferences can and should, in the interests of Canada, provide dramatic and visual proof of the resolve of this House to sustain the Prime Minister in his initiatives.

Another practical extension of this formal, all-Party support should be a reference to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence to study existing areas of conflict which themselves may give rise to the utilization of nuclear weapons so feared by the Prime Minister, indeed by all thinking Canadians. While we may be preoccupied with nuclear catastrophe, as indeed we must, we should always remember that some four million soldiers are presently engaged in more than 35 armed conflicts. A quarter of the world's nations are currently caught up in such conflicts which have already claimed over five million lives.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, as the Right Hon. Member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark) warned in reply to the throne speech on April 15, 1980 this decade "seems certain to be a period of virtually continuous regional instability" while, at the same time "relations between the superpowers are deteriorating." The events in Lebanon, South-East Asia and Central America underline the urgency to focus parliamentary attention on ways in which Canada can be a positive influence for conflict resolution. A call for the resumption of the INF disarmament talks in Geneva would be stronger if endorsed by this House. So would be the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) call, which he repeated today, for meetings of the world's five nuclear powers.

Nuclear non-proliferation has preoccupied Canadians for many years. I cannot help but recall the initiative taken by the then Secretary of State for External Affairs, Howard Green, who was a member of the government of the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker, at the first session of the U.N. committee on disarmament in 1962 where he proposed the specific text of the draft declaration intended to ban nuclear weapons from outer space forever. With Parliament's encouragement, Canada could resume with renewed vigour this long-standing and leading role in promoting nuclear non-proliferation among those countries which now possess nuclear technology and those, Mr. Speaker, which have the potential of developing non-peaceful uses of such technology.

[English]

I have not been a Member long, Mr. Speaker, but I am convinced that we need to restore this Chamber as an instrument for seeking national consensus on the challenge we face in foreign affairs.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: Not everything need be defined in narrow partisan or adversarial politics. Indeed, in a very real sense, this Chamber and its instruments should be the centre for the promotion of arms control and disarmament programs here in Canada. New initiatives could be more ennobling and fewer still could bring more comfort to Canadians who regard this Chamber sometimes with bewilderment. This is an excellent occasion for the Prime Minister to initiate a process which will bring honour to this place and honour to those who serve it.

While I welcome with generosity the Prime Minister's support for a centre for disarmament, the same motive which caused him to introduce it in the first place, I would ask him to consider sending his proposals to a committee of this House. In that way interested groups and individuals throughout Canada may be heard. Indeed, the committee might recommend that such a disarmament centre report directly to Parliament, and that might be all to the good.

Canada has for many years taken pride in its ability to play the role of honest broker in world affairs. This is a valid and important role for Canada. The Prime Minister's initiative is, in my judgment, intended to be in this tradition, and for that reason I salute him today for this as I have had the occasion of doing elsewhere.

It is with some concern and absolutely no sense of partisanship, Mr. Speaker, that I note an apparent confusion, inadvertent or otherwise, in the Prime Minister's statements between, on the one hand, the role of an alliance member, and on the other some neutralist observer of international affairs. That confusion arises, I believe, from the Prime Minister's apparent willingness, without malice, to understate the value of some very important principles in the hope of making progress with his proposals for peace.

I tell you clearly, Mr. Speaker, we are a western nation, a member of NATO. We are committed to the ideals of individual and collective freedom. We are children of liberty and on these principles we cannot and shall not compromise.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that we as Canadians are prepared to accept neither the inexorable Finlandization of Europe, nor a neutralist Canada. We in the Western Alliance are prepared to defend ourselves against attempts to oppose alien and odious systems on us through the use of force or threats of force. There is nothing, Mr. Speaker, absolutely nothing, that is bellicose in a suggestion that we view Soviet intentions realistically. Soviet policy in Europe has been animated by two clear aims: the preservation of Soviet dominance in Eastern Europe, and the weakening of the Western Alliance, especially the links between the United States and Europe. Political leadership on all sides of the House—it involves all of us—must be ever vigilant to avoid becoming a pawn in this Soviet strategy. That is why NATO should quite properly be the forum for our initiatives.

In Toronto last December, prior to the departure of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) for Brussels, I asked him to urge further consideration of the existing non-first-strike policy within the private councils of NATO foreign ministers. I recognize the sensitive nature of my urgings and I want to return to the substance of that in a moment. The forum of private NATO ministerial meetings is equally important. That is the forum in which to discuss fundamental NATO policy or any proposed changes thereto.

The Prime Minister, commenting on my Toronto remarks in the House last December 9, chided me for going as far as I did, saying it would be better if I reserved this kind of discussion for the NATO forum, which, he went on to say, "we are doing". I was, therefore, disturbed by two aspects of the Prime Minister's recent tour of Warsaw Pact capitals.

First, while discussion within the councils of the Alliance is one thing, it is quite another matter to publicly—in the course of this tour of Warsaw pact countries—call into question the determination of NATO allies to carry out existing policies of the Alliance. There is a difference. As former French Prime Minister Barre pointed out, to do so is to undermine the foundation of security in Europe and the credibility on which collective security rests. Second, I was astonished to learn that the Prime Minister and Chairman Honecker of East Germany had agreed to establish a committee of officials and ministers "to work together to sort of identify the areas where we can agree."

Such consultation, without first communicating with this House, without prior communication, as far as I know, with our allies, outside the Alliance framework, can only lead to confusion and potential miscalculation.

The cornerstone of our security, Mr. Speaker, is NATO solidarity. But the Prime Minister's attitude as expressed last week in Davos and Eastern Europe is part of a pattern which, if I may say so, has characterized his Government's approach to defence and the Alliance.

[English]

In April, 1969 the Prime Minister unilaterally cut our NATO commitment very substantially saying that Canada had no foreign policy of any importance except that which flowed from NATO, and that this is a false perspective for any country. Under the Government defence spending as a percentage of GNP has been cut by 38 per cent. This is germane to the proposition. The policy of wilful neglect of our contribution to the collective security of the alliance has led to a situation in which Canada spends less per capita on defence than any other NATO ally, with the exception of Luxembourg. We daily send our courageous military personnel out in obsolete equipment and ask them to carry out dangerous assignments. Canadians everywhere value the dedication and devotion of our Armed Forces and do not expect them, nor shall we ask them, to risk their lives in this type of equipment.

I say with sadness that this pattern of neglect, over 15 years, of the conventional deterrent has damaged our reputation for reliability among our allies. It has commensurately diminished our influence in the same councils. Mr. Speaker, I take no pleasure in setting out these facts and Canadians take no pride in acknowledging their accuracy. Some things must be said and these are among them today.

Such neglect of the conventional deterrent has contributed to an over-reliance on nuclear weapons. This is the tragedy. There is the genesis of the problem set out here today. You cannot have it both ways. You cannot echo support for NATO and consistently neglect, over a decade and a half, support for our Armed Forces. Our alliance commitments in the conventional area can and must be honoured. We cannot continue to flail at the nuclear umbrella and not be prepared to enhance the conventional deterrent. A determined effort must be made to reduce our present dependence on a possible early use of nuclear weapons by substantially improving the conventional component of our defence.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, while we cannot—at least in the foreseeable future—hope to escape from using nuclear weapons to deter aggression, we must make an energetic attempt to reduce NATO's present dependence on the early use of nuclear weapons, even as a deterrent. Efforts to improve the non-nuclear deterrent—and my words are almost identical to those used by the Prime Minister—as any right-thinking person will realize, are most urgently required and should be a task of high political priority in Canada and all other NATO countries. If we are not to sell our most cherished values short, we must accept the requirement of effective conventional forces. General Bernard Rogers, the present Supreme Allied Commander in Europe, stated in the summer of 1982, that major improvements in NATO's conventional forces were feasible at a modest price. These improvements, he said, would permit a shift from the present strategy requiring the early use of nuclear weapons to a strategy of "no early use of nuclear weapons." General Rogers estimated the cost to be approximately 1 per cent greater than the 3 per cent annual real increase which NATO agreed to in 1978. Rogers further pointed out that this 1 per cent annual increase in real terms is slightly more than $10 (U.S.) per man, woman and child throughout NATO.

[English]

A further report analysing these possibilities for moving away from NATO's present nuclear reliance was conducted by the prestigious European security study. Their report concludes that NATO's conventional forces could be strengthened substantially at a total cost similar to that of the MX missile. Only after conventional defence improvements are in place could NATO ministers consider setting in motion a series of plans and programs which could ultimately reduce, as reduce they must, the recourse to nuclear weapons at any time or under any circumstances.

The enhanced Western conventional deterrent I have described should be designed to prevent the Warsaw Pact from achieving a rapid strategic success. As a result, arms control could be used as a means to introduce incentives which would help move nuclear forces away from provocative and destabilizing postures. We stand ready, Mr. Speaker, to accept this policy. We genuinely believe that the overwhelming majority of Canadians are prepared to accept this approach. A new Government will encourage this kind of action. Only by so doing can we help to eliminate, as we must, the threat of nuclear escalation.

It is my belief and that of my colleagues that minimizing the recourse to such weapons is a major step toward nuclear disarmament and security. But all of this is possible only through a consistent application of the three fundamental principles to which I referred; namely, that Canada's foreign policy should rest on a bipartisan search for consensus. This is a noble obligation of the Government and I again urge the Prime Minister never to forget that all Members of Parliament are interested in this process and ready at all times to contribute to the initiative. The second cornerstone of our security is the NATO framework; and finally, only through the strengthening of the non nuclear deterrent can we reduce the present reliance on nuclear weapons.

I urge the Government, I urge the Prime Minister and indeed all of us in the House to revitalize, among other things, public support for alliance security, because only through such support can the political cohesion of the alliance be maintained.

This does not in any way preclude initiatives by member nations that are consistent with the broad, general thrust of the political objectives of the alliance. It does not in any way preclude the kind of ongoing dialogue between governments that might, however modestly, make for a better day in the area of the search for a durable peace. But only through such support can the political cohesion and the integrity of this alliance be maintained, thereby leading, in my judgment, to the consideration, and hopefully the adoption, of those measures which lead to substantial reduction of nuclear weapons in Europe and throughout the world. We must walk the road to peace together.

I suppose I am like everyone in the Chamber and most people across Canada. I have three young children at home to whom I want to leave a world free of the threat of nuclear war. This would be the greatest gift that we could give to the children of mankind. But to succeed in this dream we must strive with greater resolve. We must negotiate with greater sensitivity. We must speak with a softer voice but one that carries a more substantial message.

The challenge is overwhelming. It is at times frightening in itself. But as Browning so eloquently said, "Ah, but a man's reach should exceed his grasp, or what's a heaven for?"

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, in discussing disarmament today and nuclear disarmament in particular, we are participating in some small way hopefully in the resolution of an issue that has engaged the fears and apprehensions and hopes of all of humanity for many of the most recent months.

Both the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mulroney) have made reference to the role that politicians have played or ought to be playing in the resolution of this profoundly important matter. I want to begin my comments today by saying that we in the House should be giving thanks to those to whom it belongs above all others. That is, we should be thanking the ordinary people of this country, men, women and children, who began not last fall or indeed last spring, but some two years ago outside of the House of Commons, to put the profoundly important question of nuclear disarmament on the political agenda of Canada.

I want to pay tribute to all those citizens who make up some 500 groups in our country, such as volunteer groups of medical practitioners, unskilled workers, veterans, both men and women, who took it upon themselves long ago, along with other groups in the world, to educate all politicians in order that we may exercise our responsibilities in dealing with the political policy-making role which must eventually be the means of resolving the problem.

In saying this, I want to pay particular tribute to members of my own caucus. I want to say to the Prime Minister that, like the Leader of the Opposition, I and my colleagues share completely in the stated goals that he established last fall before he embarked on his travels outside of our country. But I remind him and the people of our country that it was almost two years ago that the New Democratic Party put the same subject matter before the House of Commons, not simply for a debate but for a vote. Peace has been an issue of central concern to us not in recent days, weeks or months, but for years.

The Prime Minister, in travelling abroad, took with him four key proposals. There was the suggestion for a five-power nuclear conference. There was the suggestion that an effort be made to broaden the Non-Proliferation Treaty. Third, there was an attempt to get agreement on the notion that a balance of conventional forces in Europe be achieved at a lower level, not a higher level. Finally, there was the proposal that an agreement be reached on the banning of testing of anti-satellite weapons.

Although news reports would indicate that the Prime Minister failed to obtain substantial agreement on the specifics of these ideas, it would be a serious mistake for us to suggest, in light of this, that the initiative taken by the Prime Minister was in any sense a failure itself. In my view, it is an important initiative not only for Canadians but for others in the world who are looking for a way out of the impasse of nuclear disarmament. It will have only been a failure, from our point of view, if we do not follow up with the appropriate steps which I believe flow from the matters that were raised in that important trip outside our country.

It is obvious that one of the results of the Prime Minister's trip was to force into the open a debate about some of the basic assumptions behind nuclear escalation. Such a debate in Canada, if it is both honest and thorough, can lead to a change in policy if certain assumptions are seen to be clearly erroneous.

To refuse to do this would mean that the initiative taken by the Prime Minister was at best wasted and at worst mischievous. The Government must now assume that the political focus in Canada does continue to include major efforts to bring about disarmament, particularly nuclear disarmament. To this end the Government must ensure consistency in terms of its stated principles, on the one hand, and its actions here in Canada and abroad on the other.

I believe this can best be done by systematically pursuing for Canada an anti-nuclear weapons position in every conceivable aspect of our domestic, foreign and defence policies. I believe this can and should be done. I also believe that if we do this systematically here at home, we can influence other nations. Our motto, if I could suggest one, should be this. If we desire a non-nuclear world abroad, we must first achieve a completely non-nuclear Canada at home.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, Canada must make sure that the disarmament debate remains one of our main political concerns. We must do our utmost to foster disarmament, especially nuclear disarmament. To reach that goal, our principles must logically be translated into positive action. I firmly believe that we will be successful by standing up against nuclear weapons for Canada and for other countries. There can be no contradiction in our foreign and defence policies. Our example can influence others. The principle we have to endorse is simple: if we want a nuclear-free world, we in Canada must be prepared to respect that commitment.

[English]

I would like to spell out as clearly and as concisely as I can certain proposals on behalf of my Party that seem to us will move us in this direction. First, Canada should be among those nations supporting confidence-building measures that are both serious and balanced, and when we hear any of them, whatever their source, we ought not to hesitate to give our public support to them. One such example is Sweden's nuclear freeze resolution at the United Nations. This calls for a mutually verifiable freeze on the production, testing and deployment of nuclear weapons. Support for this resolution, I would argue, flows logically from everything the Prime Minister has said here today and, indeed, what he said before. Canada should indicate now that it will support that resolution at the United Nations.

Second, we should commit ourselves to spending on disarmament a much larger sum in terms of research and in terms of analysis than the Government has heretofore committed itself, and this should be a fixed and growing percentage of our defence budget.

Third, we should follow with concrete action the Prime Minister's stated objective of opposing the development of anti-satellite weapons. Specifically, because of our own involvement in the technology in this area this should entail the refusal by the Government of Canada to develop any satellite technology for any military purpose whatsoever. That, as the Prime Minister knows, would entail a real but specific change in policy. In addition, we should offer to join the international satellite monitoring agency proposed by the Government of France.

Fourth, and very important, we must openly declare our opposition to the first use of nuclear weapons.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: In my view, the Prime Minister was absolutely right to call into question the current NATO strategy which is grounded on the first-use principle. In so doing, I say he joins a growing number of people, including the Commander-in-Chief of the NATO forces himself who openly expressed skepticism and did not feel he was doing something inappropriate about the efficacy of such strategy. In addition, many Canadians, Americans and Europeans, including a group of Members of Parliament representing all Parties in the House of Commons, not long ago called this strategy openly into question.

I think it would be useful at sometime to talk about this in the House because although the Prime Minister made passing reference to it abroad, we have not had discussion here about why he personally had some doubts about it. I would like to hear the views of the Leader of the Opposition as well. I want to state as clearly as I can why I think this is an outmoded strategy.

At one time it could plausibly be argued that a first-use policy did serve as a military deterrent. However, this was true only for that period of time in history when the United States had overwhelming nuclear superiority. Now it would be simply ridiculous, if it were not so dangerous to all mankind, to maintain this strategy. I find it impossible to believe that the United States would launch its nuclear weapons in the face of a conventional attack in Europe. The Americans know full well that once the missiles are launched in Europe there will appear off the coast not far out of New York on one side of North America, and outside of San Francisco on the other side, Soviet submarines with nuclear weapons. They will be launched and if there is destruction in Europe or beyond Europe in the Soviet Union as a result of missiles launched by the United States, there will be equal destruction in the United States as a result of missiles coming from Soviet sources.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, this is the central reality that lies behind the open discussion, the open skepticism, the open debunking, of the first-use strategy currently maintained by NATO. Surely this strategy has one function only in the modern world now, and that is to serve as an excuse for spending even more money year after year on much more complex nuclear technology. Surely in the name of reason and the in the name of humanity it is time to call a halt to this kind of madness.

Since the Prime Minister began the debate abroad by making a few comments, I hope it is something that will be pursued, not only here in the House for the people of Canada, but also within the NATO councils themselves.

I come now to what I see as a logically related point for my final suggestion. This concerns Canada's decision on the Cruise missile test. Nothing better illustrates our potential for illogical folly, on the one hand, or confident consistency on the other, than does our approach to the Cruise.

● (1240)

In commencing my comments on the Cruise missile, I want to clear up a bit of history. No fewer than three Cabinet Ministers have said from time to time that the decision reached by the Government of Canada on the Cruise was related to a NATO commitment. This, Mr. Speaker, is false.

The decision to deploy missiles in Europe, the so-called two-track policy, was reached on December 12, 1979. This decision included the decision to deploy Pershing missiles and ground-launched Cruise missiles. Nothing was said about air-launched Cruise missiles. The decision reached by the Government of Canada concerned not missiles in Europe, not a ground-launched Cruise missile, but a missile to be developed in the northern part of our own land, to be used by Strategic Air Command bombers and launched from the air. They are two different kinds of missiles.

The purpose of the testing of these missiles, I repeat, is to provide a technically operational foundation for buttressing the United States strategic deterrent. This strategic deterrent strategy was described by the Prime Minister as being a form of scare tactic which is the logic of another age. The Prime Minister, who loves logical games, cannot have it both ways. He cannot, on the one hand, be openly calling into question an outmoded deterrent strategy which he says belongs to the logic of another age, and at the same time head a Government which makes a decision about the development of a missile that is part and parcel of that same outmoded strategy.

I ask the Prime Minister to get serious about an important, concrete decision which could lend credibility to all that he has been doing in recent months. In my view, unless the Government gets serious and follows the path of its own logic, it can be appropriately dismissed by others.

As the House knows, the Government is committed to test the Cruise probably some time next month. It also knows that the agreement signed by the Government of Canada and the Government of the United States permits Canada, after giving a year's notice, to cease the testing of any other missile.

I ask the Prime Minister to pay attention to his own arguments which he used while he was in Europe, to give heed to his own expressed concern which we heard today, to follow the desires of the majority of Canadians and, in short, to send as soon as possible a notice to the United States which says that after the test that is now coming there will be no more tests of the Cruise missile in Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I offer these suggestions on behalf of my Party. I urge the Government to take them up. Time is short. It is short for the Prime Minister's children. It is short for the children of the Leader of the Opposition. It is short for my boy and my girl. It is short for all the children of this planet. The time to act is now.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, perhaps, if it pleases the other Parties, we could call it one o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Is there agreement that we call it one o'clock?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

An Hon. Member: No.

Mr. Nielsen: Carry on.

Mr. Speaker: If there are no speakers, the Chair has no option but to place the motion.

Some Hon. Members: One o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: If no Hon. Members are seeking to be recognized, the Chair has no option.

Mr. Nielsen: The Parliamentary Secretary asked—

Mr. Speaker: The Chair cannot observe any Hon. Members rising.

An Hon. Member: Question.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, I think it was the anticipation of Hon. Members that the speeches of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mulroney) and the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) would continue until one o'clock. As a result speakers were arranged for the period between three o'clock and five o'clock. In that case, would it not be reasonable to call it one o'clock?

Mr. Speaker: I asked for unanimous consent and distinctly heard a "No" voice. Is there unanimous consent to call it one o'clock?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: There appears to be unanimous consent. This House accordingly stands adjourned until two o'clock this afternoon.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S.O. 21

[English]

NATIONAL REVENUE

CONDEMNATION OF MINISTER'S STATEMENTS

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, when is the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Bussières) going to solve some of the problems that have been presented by PC Members on behalf of their constituents? Long statements of rationalization and excuses, and comments about procedures and practices, solve nothing, and only salt the wounds of the Canadian people.

Yesterday the Minister said: "This practice has been in existence for ten years." Well, if it was in existence for 20 years, that does not make it right. Why did the Minister not deal with the merits of the case?

In answer to the Hon. Member for Waterloo (Mr. McLean), who was pleading for the handicapped and the sick, instead of dealing with the problems the Minister said that the taxes were based on a previous decision of the board and the board was going to review the decision. Is the board the Government of Canada? The decision is and was wrong. Why not change it now?

Again, there was the loss of a thousand dollars that was literally stolen from my constituents in Cochrane. The cheque, in payment of taxes, was cashed by Revenue Canada and then either lost, misplaced, or stolen. Revenue Canada then took the same amount out of their bank account. The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Gray) showed interest, but the Minister of National Revenue, instead of returning the money, talks about the file being destroyed, makes flimsy excuses that will not hold water, and lectures us on fairness and compassion. I say to this Minister and the Government, demonstrate some of that compassion, show some fairness, and return the money.

HEALTH

INCIDENCE OF BIRTH DEFECTS IN WEST TORONTO

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South-Weston): Mr. Speaker, this morning's Globe and Mail reports that a study commissioned by the City of Toronto in response to concerns which environmental groups had regarding health hazards to pregnant women living in the area of the junction triangle had indeed indicated a much higher incidence of incorrectible birth defects in the west end. The study does not indicate the cause of these defects, but speculates instead that they could be related to the mothers' national origins.

In view of the lack of consultation with the health department of the City of York, where the majority of these mothers live, and in view of the cavalier and even racist attitude shown to the mothers and to the unfortunate victims of this tragedy, I urge the federal Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) to initiate an immediate and in-depth inquiry into the abnormally high incidence of severe birth defects in West Toronto.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

ACCOUNTABILITY FOR EXPENDITURES

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, it is none of your business, and equally, I fear, it is none of mine. Last summer $25 million was missing from CNR. Some called for an investigation by the Auditor General. CN Chairman Mr. Horner said that was "none of our business". He would not stand for an open audit because he feared "a loss of independence from political interference".

Canadair, a Government-owned jet jungle, blows $1.4 billion in a single year. As it is a Crown corporation, that loss is none of our business. Canadair has 22 vice-presidents for 2,400 employees. Each one of them cost taxpayers $600,000 in a single year, yet it is none of our business.

Then we have Petro-Canada, the national company that fills our television screens with ducks, geese, beavers, and maple leaves, taxing Canadians directly on income and indirectly with a fuel tax. It spent $1.7 billion to buy a Belgian oil company that cannot find oil, and the cost is none of our business. Petro-Canada owns the two highest skyscrapers in Calgary. The walls are 500 acres of marble cut in Finland and polished in Italy. The cost is none of our business. These temples salute nationalization, our national disease.

Government has hidden its costs in nearly 400 Crown corporations. Auditor General Kenneth Dye is correct—Canadians ought to demand that the books of every Crown corporation be opened. We must abolish them, or make them accountable. They are ours, so let's make them our business.

OLYMPIC GAMES

SENDING OF YOUNG ATHLETES TO SARAJEVO

Mr. Pierre Deniger (La Prairie): Mr. Speaker, I want to draw the attention of the House to an altogether incredible situation.

Canadian Olympic Association President Roger Jackson is now in Sarajevo with his pals, while Paul Boivin of Saint-Lambert and Lynne Lacasse of Brossard are in Canada. Those two young people of my riding are members of our national ski team and yet, as a result of an unbelievable decision of the Canadian Olympic Association, which is the sole organization responsible for selecting the olympic team, they have been left behind in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, considering that Canada will host the 1988 Olympic Games, that it could be represented by 14 alpine skiers, and that it has invested a lot of money in our young skiers and athletes, it seems to me that the interests of Canada as a whole would be better served if, instead of Canadian Olympic Association officials, we were to send to Sarajevo as many athletes as possible.

FISHERIES

BRITISH COLUMBIA INDUSTRY—POLICY OF NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, economic and political circumstances have brought the B.C. commercial fishing industry to the brink of disaster. The Government must take full responsibility for this crisis because it is its mistaken policies that have brought the resource and the industry it supports to their knees. The policy of the New Democratic Party is totally different from that favoured by the Liberal-Conservative big business-oriented coalition. Our policy is based on the conviction that the B.C. fishing industry can grow, preserving the fish for future generations while generating jobs, food and exports for Canadians today.

Unlike the Liberals and Conservatives, we favour immediate relief for fishermen in the form of a fuel tax rebate and quick action to ensure the Canadian salmon now being taken by U.S. fishermen are harvested by our fleets. We want a halt to the high seas harvest of our fish by other Pacific nations. We are committed to at least a $200 million program of enhancement and rehabilitation of salmon streams. Above all, we are pledged to strong action to protect and expand productive fish habitat by the enforcement of existing legislation.

PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVE PARTY'S POLICIES

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, last week the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mulroney) named a panel of party faithful to advise him on policy. Obviously he is starting to question the wisdom of the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) who believes that the people of Canada should be kept in the dark about where that Party stands on important issues.

One of those named to the advisory panel was D'Arcy McKeough, once a key cog in the Ontario "big blue machine" and now President of Union Gas. Within hours of his appointment, Mr. McKeough started giving his advice on fiscal and taxation matters. He recommended that the federal Government increase sales taxes, increase income taxes, cut tax incentives for job creation, slash benefits and programs for the poor and needy, and reduce family allowances.

One can only marvel at the hypocrisy and philosophical dexterity of a Party whose members on one hand have been professing such sympathy for Canadian taxpayers, yet on the other are proposing that they be taxed even more heavily and indiscriminately, and who plead for greater efforts on job creation, and then call for the slashing of job-creation programs. When will the Official Opposition come clean and tell the people where they really stand?

EXPENDITURE OF JOB-CREATION FUNDS IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND CONSTITUENCIES

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, in the House on Tuesday the Prime Minister stated a falsehood regarding federal government job-creation programs. He said:

> There are some provinces, such as Prince Edward Island, where more money has been spent in the Conservative ridings than in the Liberal ridings.

The exact opposite is the case, demonstrating once again that the Government is more preoccupied with porkbarrelling than with the plight of Canada's 1.5 million unemployed. The truth is that initial allocations under the Canada Works and LEAD Programs favour the two Liberal-held ridings over the two Conservative-held ridings in P.E.I. by a factor of five to one, though the actual unemployment levels in the four ridings are roughly comparable. Specifically, the Liberal ridings of Egmont and Cardigan together received $4,734,000, while the two Progressive Conservative ridings of Malpeque and Hillsborough combined received only $866,00 under the two programs in question.

I urge the Government to cease using taxpayers' money for partisan and political purposes at the expense of the unemployed not only in P.E.I. but in every province and region of the country.

INDUSTRY

POSSIBLE ESTABLISHMENT OF AMERICAN COMPANY IN SAGUENAY-LAC-SAINT-JEAN AREA OF QUEBEC

Mr. Pierre Gimaïel (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I heard yesterday on television that the Kaiser Company, an American aliminium producer, is now considering opening a branch in Quebec. I would like to thank you, Mr. Speaker, for this opportunity to inform the people of the Lac-Saint-Jean constituency that this would seem to provide a very good opportunity for the Quebec Government during the negociations they will have with the Kaiser Company with a view to supplying the electricity which a new plant will require, to assess the chances of this company locating in the Lac-Saint-Jean constituency, which, like the rest of the Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean area, has suffered from job losses in the aluminium industry due to the fact that Alcan has to modernize its operations. The hundreds of jobs lost in this industry, which is of the utmost importance for our area which has been known as the aluminium capital of the world for over 50 years, have resulted in a serious social problem in the Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean area. I hope that after sending the Péchiney Company to Becancour, the Province will give due consideration to this project and try to negociate an agreement with the Kaiser Company to have them locate their plant in our area, where we have all the harbour facilities required, where natural gas is being brought to us by the Canadian Government, and where we have readily available a manpower that is extremely knowledgeable in the aluminium industry, so that we may have our share of these billions of dollars in economic fall-out from the aluminium industry in Quebec.

AGRICULTURE

LACK OF RESEARCH WORKERS IN WESTERN CANADA

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, a very serious problem is arising in the area of agricultural research funding. A slow leak is emptying western agriculture's research pail. It is now at the point where the new $2.7 million Lacombe Meat Laboratory in my riding will probably be without staff butchers until April, 1984, even though it was ready to begin operations on November 25, 1983.

In 1983 there were 3,545 full-time employees working in the area of agricultural research. Of this number over half are employed in Quebec and Ontario. Twenty-six agricultural research jobs in Alberta have been transferred out of the Prairies by Ottawa. These, combined with reductions over the last decade, bring the total to 78. With another two research stations opening in central Canada, this could mean many more research jobs and funding lost from the Prairies.

When 80 per cent of Canada's farmland is in the West and 60 per cent of agricultural foreign exchange is earned by exports from the West, it is only reasonable to ask that fairness and equity be put back into the system and these percentages be considered when making funding decisions. It is vitally important that significant funding and researchers be replaced in the western region. Otherwise we are left with new research facilities but no researchers to man the stations.

Mr. Speaker: I have to interrupt the Hon. Member.

GRANT PAID TO ALLIANCE COMMUNITY SERVICES, TORONTO

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my statement today deals with what appears to be another question of government use of public funds for patronage reasons. The Minister of Employment and Immigration awarded Alliance Community Services of Toronto $585,000. This public money was found in the Employment Development Branch of the Minister's Department.

On January 5 of this year the Alliance Community Services opened their doors in Toronto despite the objections of every major Italian-Canadian interest group.

The coalition against the grant included: the National Italian Congress; National Canadian Benevolent Corporation; Centre for Italian Culture and Education; the Italian Canadian Business and Professional Association, and the existing service groups such as Costi, which have been providing excellent services to the Italian-Canadian community for over 30 years.

Those in favour of giving the money were the Vice-President of the Eglinton-Lawrence Liberal Association and the Vice-President of the York West Liberal Assocation.

In addition to those outside groups who were opposed, it appears as though the Minister's own Department recommended against giving this $500,000 plus grant.

The question that arises in the minds of most of us is how the Minister reaches the conclusion that two or three Liberal hacks should take precedence over the majority view of those who are most concerned in the matter of providing services.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member's time has expired. Oral Questions.

FINANCE

SPECIAL RECOVERY CAPITAL PROJECTS PROGRAM— ALLOCATION OF FUNDS

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development, I will direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. I want to make it clear that no one in this Party is opposed to the legitimate use of federal job-creation moneys to create legitimate jobs. What we are concerned about is the slushing of millions of dollars of federal money into Liberal ridings across Canada.

Mr. Regan: Baloney!

Mr. Siddon: We call for an end to this kind of waste and favouritism.

Will the Acting Prime Minister confirm a CTV news report which alleges that Liberal ridings were favoured for funding under the Special Recovery Capital Projects Program in the same manner as they were under the Special Employment Initiatives Program? Also, will the Minister table today a riding by riding breakdown of the scrapped SRCPP funding that has been disbursed already?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister for External Relations): Mr. Speaker, I would think that Members have access to that information with respect to the special recovery program. I remember a long time ago, when I was Minister of Transport, that all these things were done very, very openly, and communiques were issued in each instance. I cannot see how this could be hidden in any way, shape or form.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Good old smiles and chuckles.

Mr. Pepin: I will be glad to ask my friend, the new Minister of Transport, to send copies of these announcements at the time they are made.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER FURNISH LIST OF APPROVED PROJECTS

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Mr. Speaker, the information contained in the January 26 leaked Cabinet document does not agree with the kind of limited information to which the Minister refers. In fact this information confirms that in the prairie provinces, with relatively the same population as Quebec, almost half as much funding has been made available through the Special Recovery Capital Projects Program than is the case in the Province of Quebec.

I also have a briefing note here that lays out the answers the Ministers are expected to give to us in order to divert the question. The question is simply this: recognizing that the Canadian Construction Association projects that less than 2,000 jobs would be created this year from these millions of dollars of spending, and recognizing that these funds are all being dumped into Liberal ridings, will the Minister undertake today to present in the House a list, on a riding by riding basis, of where these multi-millions of dollars are being spent on the capital recovery projects?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister for External Relations): Mr. Speaker, I think I have heard the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance say that there would be a list published of the different programs which are aimed at reducing the number of unemployed in Canada. My hon. friend falls into the trap which is often fallen into, which is to believe that all programs of the Government must apply similarly to all provinces of Canada. That is not possible. It happens, for example, that funds for support of the grain industry in the West cannot be given for the support of the grain industry in the East because there is not such a great industry in the East.

Mr. Crosbie: Right on.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Pepin: I said not of the same magnitude; I did not say there was not any grain in the East.

Mr. Crosbie: That is very learned.

Mr. Pepin: The only way to judge these matters is to look, as Mr. Clark would say, at the totality of the picture and see how, as a whole, the money supplied by the Government for the reduction of unemployment is balanced from coast to coast.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The Minister of bafflegab!

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker, the Minister refers to the grain stabilization payments and the Crow rate. He should be able to confirm that Cabinet is counting the Crow benefit as an offset to the money that ought legitimately to be coming to the western provinces in lieu of capital projects money. That is a well known fact in Cabinet.

CONTRACT FOR POST-BUDGET TELEVISION PRESENTATION

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Finally, Mr. Speaker, will the Minister confirm that, rather than putting money into real job creation, his counterpart, the Minister for Economic Development, has spent over $40,000 to produce one television footage for February 19—immediately following the Budget—in which he is going to present new initiatives, probably those to be revealed in the Budget? A company called Media Alternatives has the contract for this. And will he confirm that this is only a small part of the Government's total commitment to publicity in support of the Capital Projects Program, an orientation concerned more with publicity than creating real, permanent, and lasting jobs for Canadians?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister for External Relations): Mr. Speaker, I tried to follow the question as well as I could. My English is reasonably good, but in this particular instance I could not follow it. Perhaps the Prime Minister did. He is more bilingual than I am. I am going to read the "blues" after Question Period and I will bring the matter to the attention of whatever Minister is involved in whatever matter was raised by the hon. gentleman.

COST OF SIGNS ADVERTISING PROJECTS

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development. In his absence, I will address it to the Prime Minister or to the Acting Prime Minister, whomever is doing the acting over there. I have a document here which was freely given to me by the Minister's top officials, and I note that up until September 23, 1983, in excess of $300,000 has been spent on signs advertising various SRCPP projects across the country. As an example, 164 four by eight foot signs were purchased at a cost of $1,343 each. That was not the erected cost; that was just for the signs.

We contacted sign painters across Canada, and the most expensive sign we could get a price on, a super deluxe model, cost $600. Can the Prime Minister, or the Acting Prime Minister, explain why the Government has wasted thousands of dollars, paying $1,350 a piece for signs which should cost no more than $600?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as I try to follow the logic of the debate which has been put forward by the Hon. Members opposite for the past several days, I feel they are complaining that they do not know about the programs, that only Liberals know about them. We are publishing signs, expensive ones, so that the Opposition can catch up with what is going on.

Mr. Greenaway: Mr. Speaker, I will not bother the Prime Minister with a supplementary question. I will ask someone who might have an answer. I remind the Prime Minister that there is a lot of difference between a $600 sign and a $1,350 sign. You are wasting money, Mac.

STUDY OF ADVERTISING'S EFFECTIVENESS

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, can the Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development confirm that a firm called D. W. Hartford and Associates Ltd. was employed by the Government to study the effectiveness of the SRCPP advertising campaign? In other words, is the Minister using taxpayers' money to study his own propaganda?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, first of all let me apologize for not being here when the first series of questions was asked. I found it curious that the Hon. Member for Richmond-South Delta, who has one of the most significant projects in his own riding, at the Vancouver International Airport—

Mr. McDermid: Which should rightfully come under the Department of Transport Estimates.

Mr. Johnston: —has the extraordinary gall to stand up and criticize the program.

Mr. Speaker: Is the Hon. Minister replying to the question asked by the Hon. Member for Cariboo-Chilcotin?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Speaker, it has been very much a part of the program to ensure that Canadians appreciate the benefits of the recovery which was announced in the Budget of the Minister of Finance last year.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Johnston: The whole purpose of the program was to fill in that investment vacuum which, unfortunately, is still present in the private sector.

As we see construction sites springing up across this country from coast to coast—

Mr. Crosbie: A grab bag of pork.

Mr. Johnston: —and when we see institutes like the Maritime Forestry Research Institute in the riding of the Hon. Member for York-Sunbury, let us hope that the private sector will be encouraged and stimulated to make investments to take advantage of the recovery—

Mr. McDermid: Bribe it with its own money.

Mr. Johnston: —which the Government has done so much at this point to bring about through this program, and the other recovery aspects of the April Budget.

FISHERIES

STATE OF BRITISH COLUMBIA INDUSTRY

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. The Minister is aware that a year ago, under supreme pressure from his ministerial Advisory Committee, he indicated that the Pearse Report was behind the committee, and they would go on from there. Despite that confirmation, the Minister's Department is still coming up with proposals for vessel quotas, area licences, transferability of licences, and the privatization of the resource. In view of the total opposition to those concepts in the fishing industry, could the Minister indicate whom he is listening to in his consultations? Which fishermen are advocating a decimation of their industry in a situation where we could get into real estate transactions on the high seas and on British Columbia's watersheds?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I believe the Hon. Member is really out of touch because yesterday I did meet in Ottawa with over 100 fishermen from the Pacific Coast. They were unable to meet with Members of the provincial legislature in British Columbia and had to come to Ottawa to meet with their Members of Parliament. It was a very friendly and constructive meeting. They were so happy with that meeting that they proposed we have another meeting in Vancouver this weekend, and I have readily accepted that suggestion.

As I have told them, I am at this moment preparing a document for consideration by Cabinet. In order to be sure that I have not forgotten any option or issue, I have put before them a list of the whole spectrum of issues which are facing the Pacific fisheries, and I can report to Hon. Members that they agree I have not forgotten any of the different issues and options that will be considered in due course by Cabinet.

Mr. Miller: The Minister will be aware that his ministerial Advisory Committee has been meeting for a year, and the recommendations his Department has been putting forward to that committee have resulted in 125 fishermen coming from B.C. to reject the proposals which have been made by his Department.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER TABLE REPORTS AND DEPARTMENTAL PAPERS

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): A decision of the Fisheries and Forestry Committee was made this morning, after discussing issues with the same fishermen, to travel to British Columbia and again hear firsthand from British Columbia fishermen. As well as meeting with his ministerial Advisory Committee this coming week, and with the Fishermen's Survival Coalition, is the Minister now prepared to table in the House of Commons the last options paper which his Department has prepared, the Pearse report, the Cruickshank report, and any other documents which might help the Fisheries and Forestry Committee to deal in an honest and open way with that fisheries crisis, so that we can bring some recommendations back to the Minister as well?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, all those documents, of course, are public, and it is up to the committee, and its steering committee, to make whatever decision they want. I am not going to dictate the agenda of the parliamentary committee. I have too much respect for my fellow Members of Parliament.

Mr. Miller: The Minister knows that we have been attempting to have these documents tabled in the House for some time so that the committee can deal with them. They have to be tabled before we can officially deal with those documents.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER TABLE LEGISLATION

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): In view of the concern that the B.C. fishing industry has, including the communities dependent on that industry, and businessmen and service industries, rather than bringing about major changes in the fishing industry in British Columbia through a one-day debate, as he did in the East Coast fishery under Bill C-138, will the Minister be prepared to table legislation so that we can deal with major changes of policy, so that we can protect the livelihood of British Columbia fishermen and their communities, and reflect the views of those communities rather than of the Minister, his advisers, and his Department?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I would answer that by saying, not necessarily legislation, but if necessary. I do not want to commit myself to one option in preference to another.

THE BUDGET

PRE-PRESENTATION PRESS ARRANGEMENTS

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance my question is directed to the Minister of State for Finance. It concerns the arrangements for the presentation of the Budget Speech next week. The Minister of Finance wishes to lock up the press permanently, but in this case he suggested they be locked up before his speech in order to study the budget documents and that they be kept in the lockup for at least one hour thereafter, or until his speech to the House is concluded. The Press Gallery has rightly refused to accept this blatant attempt at censoreship and news management.

● (1430)

I ask the Minister if new proposals are going to be made to the Press Gallery by the Department of Finance which will permit them to study the Budget documents, properly and release them, just as they were released on December 19, 1979, to report to and interpret for the Canadian people, or is the press to be prevented from properly reporting the coming Budget of February 15?

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions with the Press Gallery about the arrangements which have been proposed. Full facilities will be made available for the Press Gallery to ensure that the Canadian people receive the maximum information about the Budget in the most expeditious and efficient way possible.

REQUEST THAT PRIME MINISTER INTERVENE

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the same Minister. It is hard to know whether the theme song of the Government is "Roll out the pork-barrel", or "I'm going to wash the press right out of my hair". There have been no arrangements made with the Press Gallery with respect to proper coverage of the budget speech which permits them to see the documents ahead of time. The Minister wants them to sign a document saying they will report nothing until he has transgressed upon the time of the Canadian people for one hour.

Perhaps I should ask this of the Prime Minister because he is well known for his warm relationship with the press. Will the Prime Minister intervene and direct his officials and the Minister to let the press out at eight o'clock, or whatever the hour is that the Minister starts his speech, so they can properly report the fantastic exploits of his Government as documented in the budget speech?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I take it the Opposition agrees with the idea of a lockup of the press, otherwise they would be complaining, as always, that there is a budget leak, and we obviously cannot give the budget documents to anyone before the budget hour.

Mr. Crosbie: There is one now.

Mr. Trudeau: Therefore, he agrees with the principle of the lockup, and I guess the rest of the matter is how long should it last. Therefore, his virtuous indignation about locking up and freedom of speech is just a matter of quantity, not quality.

Mr. Crosbie: There has already been a leak. Final supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Peterborough.

Mr. Domm: Mr. Speaker, I have a question—

Mr. Crosbie: Final supplementary, Mr. Speaker? I guess I have had the final question.

NATIONAL REVENUE

DEPARTMENT'S SEIZURE OF TAXPAYERS' ASSETS

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. We now have a system in Canada which allows Revenue Canada to consider a taxpayer guilty without a trial and then, with the Minister's blessing, proceed to garnishee salaries, seize bank accounts of children, seniors and the handicapped, and lock up businesses, without a trial. How does the Minister of Revenue justify the principle of guilty until proven innocent, which is against the most basic principles on which our whole Canadian system is founded?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is referring to the fact that a taxpayer who has received a notice of assessment from the Department must pay even though he may have filed a notice of objection or decided to bring the matter before the court.

I would urge the Hon. Member to re-examine the provisions of the act which stipulate that the Minister must collect the taxes once an assessment notice has been issued, notwithstanding any notice of objection or appeal. Still, the Hon. Member will be glad to know that the practice of the Department is to accept the guarantee of a third party, thus making it possible for a taxpayer not to pay anything, even after receiving a notice of assessment from the Department and deciding to appeal or file a notice of objection pursuant to the provisions of the act.

[English]

Mr. Domm: Mr. Speaker, that will be of little consolation to the many businesses across the country which have had their doors closed and employees laid off because they could not find such a third party. It is a lot easier for the Government to find the money than it is for the private sector today.

TAXPAYERS' COSTS IN APPEALING ASSESSMENTS

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the same Minister. There are in Toronto a couple of small independent dealers who have their backs to the wall because they were counting on getting $42,000 from the federal Government which a judge had awarded them for costs. The Government has the right to withhold the $42,000 pending many years of appeal. The Government can hold up payment of this money because it can afford lawyers and transcripts of trials, whereas the small independent, indeed the home-maker, cannot afford that expense because they do not have taxpayer dollars. What does the Minister say about this double standard we now have in Canada involving the Government versus the little guy?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I can only repeat to the Hon. Member that the Income Tax Act provisions are extremely strict, precisely to maintain the fairness of Canada's tax system. I should like to remind him as well that when we have special cases, for instance a company or an individual in a precarious financial situation, we review each case with a view to reaching an agreement to enable the company or the individual to get back on its or his feet and pay the taxes within a mutually acceptable period of time and thus preserve the fairness of the system under which income taxes are paid to Revenue Canada.

I think that the Hon. Member, perhaps on the basis of one or two isolated cases, grossly exaggerates the situation. Should he have specific cases to bring to my attention, I can give him every assurance that we will look into the particular circumstances he will explain to us and that the Department is quite prepared to give any company or individual an opportunity to pay the taxes owing within reasonable limits, while, at the same time, enabling the party concerned to remain financially solvent.

FINANCE

ALLOCATION OF JOB-CREATION GRANT TO JUDO CLUB

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister agree with me that allocation of job-creation funds by his Government appears to be a function of Liberal survival, not human need, and that neither opposition MPs nor civil servants are consulted in some programs? For example, would the Prime Minister look into the program in Giffard, a suburb of Quebec City, where $300,000 was given to a judo club without, we understand, the Civil Service even approving it?

Mr. Duclos: That's wrong!

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have been hearing a lot from across the aisle these past weeks about the Minister not involving himself and his Department. Now I hear that the civil servants are not involved enough. I do not make any sense out of that logic, Mr. Speaker.

METHOD OF DISTRIBUTING FUNDS

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, let me rephrase the question in a more personal way. Perhaps the Prime Minister could help me understand, as someone who favours job creation and Government involvement but who sees a job creation program, sections of it—not the Canada Works which is fair—where opposition MPs are not consulted and the bureaucracy is not consulted. We gave examples of Senator Argue's $4 million slush fund in Saskatchewan, an example from Toronto, and now an example from Quebec City. Is this really fair and equitable? Is this a decent way of having a real job-creation fund in our country?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is citing specific examples. He mentioned Saskatchewan yesterday and I said I would look into it and ask the Minister. Now he has mentioned one in Quebec City. These are specific cases and I do not know about them, Mr. Speaker. I do know that the last Budget put something like $4.8 billion into job creation of various kinds. Some of this was used to build infrastructure, some for direct job creation, and some for retraining.

As I said a few days ago, 15 Departments or so are involved in the spending of these funds. The Minister for External Relations quite correctly said earlier that one would have to look at the use of these very considerable funds and see if they were spent inequitably across the country or if they were indeed spent to create jobs by direct job creation, retraining, or by infrastructure projects. I do not have them all in my head. If the Hon. Member wants to put questions on the Order

Paper or give notice, I will take note of the particular cases he brings forward and see if they indeed appear justified or not.

Returning to my earlier answer, I fail to understand the idea that Senator Argue, who is a member of the Cabinet, would not have some authority in spending these funds. It is the Government's mandate to make sure that the moneys are spent. Most of the time we need the help of the Civil Service. If a case is so clear that it can be dealt with directly, I do not see anything obnoxious in that, providing it is done with the objective of the law and the Budget in mind, which is to create jobs in a fair way.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

ENFORCEMENT OF MAINTENANCE ORDERS

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. Many Canadian women and children are living in difficult situations because the courts are not enforcing maintenance orders against husbands. Can the Minister say whether any progress is being made in his consultations with the provinces on this matter?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend indicated in her question, there is a fair share of provincial responsibility in this matter. It would not be telling any secrets out of court to indicate that in recent years the provinces have not been very forthcoming with respect to proposals to end the problem. As far as the federal Government is concerned, it is prepared to accept in principle the notion of a national register of divorce orders and other ancillary orders, such as maintenance, custody, and other provincial orders. As a result of discussions between Deputy Attorneys General in the last two days, I believe considerable progress has been made in moving in this direction.

I would like to pay particular tribute to my colleague, the Minister responsible for the Status of Women, for helping to break the logjam. I think the logjam has been broken. Within some months we will perhaps be able to look forward to the establishment of such a program.

PENITENTIARIES

INCREASED VIOLENCE IN KINGSTON INSTITUTIONS

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. It concerns the fact that there have been as many killings and stabbings in the federal penitentiaries in the Kingston area during the first month of this year as there were in the whole of last year. Custodial officers, rehabilitative agencies, and the crown prosecutor of Frontenac County all claim the situation is out of control. What assurance is there to anyone in the system, or indeed in the community, that this increasing violence is going to be contained?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. lady that I am very concerned about the situation in the penitentiaries in the Kingston area. A short time ago I asked to have a special inquiry established within the Correctional Service of Canada, through the normal mechanisms. That special inquiry will, hopefully, begin within the next few days. I have just approved the terms of reference in the last week.

I am looking forward to a very intensive study being done of the causes of disorder in such institutions to try to get to the bottom of the situation and see if it is possible, in places where very dangerous people are incarcerated for very long periods of time, to reduce the number of violent incidents that have been occurring.

NATURE OF VIOLENCE

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, will the Solicitor General indicate whether this inquiry will have included in its terms of reference any assessment of the changing nature of violence within the penitentiary system? I am sure he is aware of that. Is that assessment included? If not, will he take a look at the terms of reference again to see that it is included?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I would like to know from the Hon. Member what she means by "changing nature of violence" within the institutions. That will be one of the matters that will be looked into. I would not want to put as a premise of the inquiry that there is a change in the nature of the violence in the institutions.

FISHERIES

RESTRUCTURING OF NOVA SCOTIA INDUSTRY—EFFECT ON RIVERPORT SCALLOP FLEET

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. Nova Scotia's fishing industry has now been restructured without the federal Government holding controlling interest as planned by the architect of the Kirby Commission, who was rewarded for his efforts with a seat in the Senate. What effect will the restructuring change in Nova Scotia have relative to the over-all Atlantic fisheries restructuring program, especially as the plan relates to the scallop fleet based at Riverport, Nova Scotia? At Riverport two ships have already been sold, and the balance of the fleet is now in doubt. Will the Minister inform us about that particular situation?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the Hon. Member that the decision of Cabinet has been to find new private investors. It was only when the private investors failed to come forward that the Government of Nova Scotia, the Government of Canada, and the Bank of Nova Scotia made the agreement in Port Hawkesbury last September. It was only in December that some minority shareholders decided to put forward an initiative. They knew for over a year of the problems of nationalization, but up until then they suspended making any gesture. The reason the private sector proposal succeeded is that the federal Government helped them improve their offer and convinced the bank to accept their proposal. We have played the most important role in having the private sector solution accepted by the banks.

As for the scallop fleet, the agreement which has been reached between all the different parties is that part of that fleet will belong to the Newfoundland company. The jobs will be based in Nova Scotia, as they have been in the past. Conversely, the Nova Scotia company will have several plants in Newfoundland and will be creating jobs in Newfoundland. Both companies will have assets in each province.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, I thank the Minister for his answer.

SALT FISH MARKETS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same Minister and is in regard to another area. Due to the decrease in Canada's share of the world salt fish markets, which are seriously depressed at present, fishermen have diverted their catches to the fresh fish market in New England, thereby creating a pricing problem for all fish. Is the Minister aware of this situation? If so, what steps, if any, is he planning to take to improve markets for Canada's salt fish in order to diversify our marketing opportunities and assist our fishing industry through this difficult economic period?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is asking what I am ready to do to improve the markets for salt cod. I am very proud to report to the Hon. Member that recently I led a delegation of businessmen to Portugal. Due to our representations, and my insistance, Portugal has decided, for the first time, to consider Canada as its major source for imports of salt cod. Fifty-five per cent of its domestic needs will be filled by Canada. This is really a breakthrough.

PENSIONS

PLIGHT OF ELDERLY SINGLE WOMEN PENSIONERS

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. As the Minister knows, the National Council on Welfare issued a report entitled "Sixty-Five and Older", which affirms what we have known for some period of time. It is that 60 per cent of all elderly women who live alone are living in poverty, in so much as they qualify on the GIS. While the report reminds us of that, the Minister has known for the last three or four years—as long as I have been here—that that condition exists. Will the Minister advise the House what she intends to do to alleviate that poverty of those single elderly women, both in the short term and the long term?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the best as possible, as soon as possible.

Mr. Young: That is not a satisfactory answer at all, and it will be of no comfort to those women who are looking for some help in this rather serious situation.

REQUEST FOR EXPANSION OF CANADA PENSION PLAN

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Pension Reform and the Minister have indicated in the past that what is really needed is an expansion of the Canada-Quebec Pension Plan so that those elderly Canadians can be assured a fair share of Canada's wealth. I will ask the Minister again when she will come to the House to give us a timetable that she intends to follow in order to bring an improvement to the public pension plan system, so that those elderly Canadians who need help the most will receive it.

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, if the Hon. Member is referring specifically to the report of the parliamentary task force, as he seems to be in his second question, I think he knows that this is being studied by the Government. We intend, as we have always said, to proceed as rapidly as possible.

HEALTH

INCIDENCE OF BIRTH DEFECTS IN WEST TORONTO

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South-Weston): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. She is aware of the report in today's Globe and Mail of a high incidence of incorrectible birth defects in West Toronto. Has her Department any data to substantiate the findings, and in view of the dangerously speculative nature of the conclusions will her Department conduct its own investigation into this very tragic phenomenon?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, a priori, when a study of a health nature concludes that there is a race basis for any of its findings, we are, if I may say, doubly careful. We have not received the data on that from the Ontario Ministry of Health. We requested it today. I will make a point of carefully studying the exact way the study was conducted, the size of the sampling and the exact geographic area, to see if the conclusions are valid or not.

Oral Questions

COMMUNICATIONS

SUBCOMMITTEE STUDY OF SEXUALLY ABUSIVE BROADCASTING

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Privy Council. In view of the fact that a special subcommittee on sexually abusive broadcasting went into limbo at the conclusion of the last session of Parliament on December 6, and since I can assure the President of the Privy Council that every member of the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture wants to see that subcommittee reactivated at once, would he give his commitment to the House to deal with whatever technicality is necessary to get that subcommittee, which is so very important to many Canadians, back into action?

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I take due note of the representations made by the Hon. Member. He understands that the committee is master of its own decisions.

EMERGENCY MEASURES

FALL-OUT SHELTERS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. In 1981, Emergency Planning Canada published a booklet entitled "Eleven Steps to Survival". In the booklet there is advice on how to avoid the effects of nuclear bomb explosions, including the advice which says "a fall-out shelter is the best way to protect you and your family". Is it government advice and policy that every Canadian should have a fall-out shelter and emergency supplies in the event of a nuclear catastrophe?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, that booklet was issued by Emergency Planning Canada. That comes under the responsibility of the President of the Privy Council.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Calgary West.

Mr. Gurbin: A supplementary.

Mr. Speaker: Will the Hon. Member bear in mind the numbers on his side who are seeking to be recognized?

PROTECTION AGAINST NUCLEAR CATASTROPHE

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the President of the Privy Council. I would like him to answer the first question I asked of the Minister of National Defence. Is it government advice and policy that every Canadian have a fall-out shelter to protect them against a nuclear catastrophe? If that is not his policy, how would he rationalize the provision of fall-out shelters and the expensive special measures that have been taken to protect a very elite and special group within Governments and the Civil Service in the event of a nuclear explosion?

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the policy of the Government of Canada is to provide Canadians with the best protection possible in all situations of major disasters in the country, obviously including a nuclear disaster.

I have said before that it is unlikely that many Canadians would survive a catastrophic nuclear disaster. That is why we believe it is even more important to support those like the Prime Minister of Canada who are trying their best to make sure that the great powers sit down together and talk about disarmament. That is the best defence possible. But that does not prevent us from trying to bring the best protection possible to the country for those, if any, who would survive a catastrophic nuclear disaster.

SPECIAL EMPLOYMENT INITIATIVES PROGRAM—TELEX REFERRING INQUIRIES TO MINISTER'S OFFICE

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. He will recall that a couple of days ago we were raising the issue of the special employment initiatives projects. My office has been phoning Manpower offices across the country during the last couple of days to find out information about it. No one returns our calls. In fact we have discovered that there was a telex sent after Question Period on Tuesday, telling people to refer matters to the Minister's office only. It smacks of a cover-up. Was the Prime Minister involved in the decision to send that telex, or were officials from the Prime Minister's office involved in the decision to send that telex?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is the first I hear of that alleged telex. Once again, I put to the Hon. Member my same sense of astonishment. They want the Ministers to be involved. When the Ministers are involved, they complain. They blame the Minister of National Revenue for not involving himself enough, and they blame other Ministers for involving themselves too much. I do not understand the track of mind that is being followed.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

DELIVERY TESTING SYSTEMS

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister responsible for Canada Post. He will be aware that we have raised the question of the phoney NEPS testing of mail certified delivery that has been used to give the impression to the public that mail in Canada is delivered on time. He may be aware that another testing system has now been instituted. Is he aware that that testing system is just as unrealistic, improper, as easily followed and easily distorted as the NEPS system?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, this is obviously a point of debate since the Canada Post Corporation officials consider that their mail quality control system was tested by independent firms from outside the corporation and that it was found valid, not only by these independent firms, but also by postal users who were asked to participate in the control process.

The Hon. Member is entitled not to believe in the effectiveness of the system, but that is a point of debate between the Canada Post Corporation and himself.

CANADA WORKS GRANTS—LETTER SENT TO LIBERAL ASSOCIATION PRESIDENT

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister has made much of the fact that Canada Works grants are not given on the basis of Liberal Party politics. The other day my office received an envelope addressed to me, containing a letter to Mr. Ken Jones, President of the Liberal Association, White Rock, B.C. It reads in part:

● (1500)

To keep you informed of the intent and progress of this program I am sending you a copy of the grant proposal and program brochure. I am also enclosing in this mailing a two page description of the Canada Works proposal we have submitted . . . If I can be of any help in providing further information on these programs, please feel free to call me—

If Liberal Party politics has nothing to do with Canada Works Programs, why is it necessary on the part of the applicants to lobby the President of the Liberal Association?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have to swallow twice in order to understand the sense of such a question.

Our business as Members of Parliament and as politicians is to get our constituents and the people of Canada to look for the programs in the Budget, in departmental agencies or in various policies put forward by the Government. That is why people on this side of the House, Members of Parliament, diligently write this kind of letter so that constituents know that there are funds available, that there are retraining programs available, that there are unemployment programs available, or that there is a medicare program. We do our job on this side. We even buy signs so that people know about things. We even take out advertising so the people can know about them.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I have heard ad nauseam allegations from that side of the House about cover-up, about the people having a right to know, about this Government keeping everything in hiding, and when we tell our constituents about the programs of the Government, about the benefits of the Budget, we find this kind of question. I am amazed.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Government House Leader what the business will be for tomorrow and for next Monday, Tuesday and Thursday, if he can take us that far?

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will commence debate on Bill C-9. The back-up Bill is Bill C-10. On Monday we will, if need be, resume debate on Bill C-9, the back-up Bill still being Bill C-10. Tuesday will be an Opposition day and I hereby designate next Tuesday as an Opposition day.

On Wednesday, depending upon the hour of the Budget, the time of the speech on the Budget, we will resume debate on either Bill C-9 or Bill C-10, in that order. Next Thursday will be the first day of debate on the Budget.

In so far as the hour of the Budget is concerned, I understand that the preference of the Opposition is to allow the Minister of Finance to deliver his speech in the evening, around eight o'clock, I suppose. I have mentioned that to the Minister of Finance. He is considering it and will be in a position to make his announcement tomorrow after Question Period.

Mr. Nielsen: I thank the House Leader for that information. He is aware, as all of us are, that the traditional hour for the delivery of the Budget is eight o'clock in the evening, but because of our provisional rules, when the last Budget was delivered it, of course, had to receive the consent of the House. I say to the Government House Leader now so it might assist his planning that we on this side are pleased to consent in advance to the Budget being delivered at eight o'clock next Wednesday evening.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I welcome this offer of co-operation. But we must also weigh the old traditions against the new spirit of parliamentary reform and the elimination of night sittings. On the other hand, I said earlier that we are very flexible. I want however, to hear from the Minister of Finance. If the Budget is not to be delivered at eight o'clock, we will not need consent to have the speech at three o'clock after Question Period. As I said previously, the Minister of Finance will make his decision between now and tomorrow and he will be informing this House of it at about noon tomorrow.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to give consent at the moment until I hear exactly what the Minister of Finance has in mind. In discussing the matter with my colleagues, we are not absolutely clear yet why we would want to have the Budget delivered at eight o'clock at night, although we did discuss it, I admit to that.

Mr. Nielsen: It has always been at eight o'clock at night.

Mr. Deans: Therefore, I would like to hear some reason that we ought to have the Budget delivered at 8 p.m. rather than during the normal sitting hours of the House.

Mr. Nielsen: It has always been at eight o'clock at night.

Mr. Speaker: Three Hon. Members have given me notice of matters. The Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre, the Hon. Member for Montmorency-Orleans, and the Minister of Labour, I believe, who wants to make a statement.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL-DESIGNATE

EXPRESSION OF GOOD WISHES TO HON. JEANNE SAUVÉ

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am very grateful to you for permitting me to express a concern which I am sure is shared by every Member of this House of Commons. We have been deeply concerned for a long time about the health of our former Speaker, Madam Jeanne Sauvé. We are sorry about the ill health she suffered here and the ill health she has suffered since being appointed Governor General-designate. We were very pleased to hear the report from the CBC last evening to the effect that good progress is being made and that there is now hope that very soon her health will be fully restored.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: We welcome the report of the CBC, we welcome the news here. We wish to do everything we can for her to help her achieve good health. We wish her the very best. God bless her.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: On behalf of the entire House of Commons, I will be pleased to transmit these good wishes to Madam Sauvé.

ALLOCATION OF JOB-CREATION GRANT TO JUDO CLUB

Mr. Louis Duclos (Montmorency-Orléans): Mr. Speaker, during Question Period yesterday and even today, the NPD Members for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) yesterday, and for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) today, have suggested that a grant given in my constituency to a recreational organization from the Giffard sector in the City of Beauport was awarded without the required authorizations from the Job Creation Branch of the Department of Employment and Immigration.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to deny as forcefully as possible such falsehoods as are being peddled by these Members.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member has made his statement. I must say that he did not have a genuine question of privilege, but rather a point of order. However, he has made his statement and I know that all of us have understood what he said.

PRIVILEGE

MR. COOPER—ALLEGED INTIMIDATION BY CANADA POST OFFICIAL

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to respond to the remarks made last Monday by the Hon. Member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper) concerning the alleged misconduct of a Canada Post officer which resulted in what the Hon. Member called "an attempt to inhibit my freedom of speech in this chamber". Those words can be found on page 1102 of Hansard.

The main thrust of the Hon. Member's intervention dealt with the allegation that he had been threatened by an official of Canada Post. I promised, if you recall, to look into this matter and report to the House at the earliest opportunity. I have done that, Mr. Speaker, and I am pleased to share my findings with you and Hon. Members today.

First, I have discovered that the Hon. Member for Peace River at no time had talked directly with the officer of Canada Post. The matter raised by the Hon. Member is based entirely on conversations between the Member's assistant and the officer at Canada Post. In other words, the allegations of the Hon. Member are based on the interpretation of his assistant of a conversation with an officer of Canada Post.

I have personally been in communication with this officer and have been assured that at no time during the conversation were any threats made which could have conceivably inhibited the Hon. Member from performing his role as a spokesman of the Official Opposition or which could deny co-operation from Canada Post.

I can testify that the officer in question has worked in the President's office for two years and deals with requests and inquiries from MPs on both sides of the House, Senators and the general public. Not once in those two years has this officer's professionalism been questioned in what is often a difficult and demanding position. To be described by the Hon. Member for Peace River as being abusive, threatening to a Member of Parliament, unco-operative to the point of being obstructive and showing contempt for Parliament—all of these accusations on hearsay because, I repeat, the Member never spoke directly with the officer in question—is in my view undeserved and unwarranted.

I honestly think, in light of the explanation I have received, that there is absolutely no ground to the allegation of the Hon. Member for Peace River that his privilege as a parliamentarian has been breached.

In closing, as Minister responsible for Canada Post I can assure the Hon. Member and all other Hon. Members opposite that they will continue to have the fullest co-operation from Canada Post, particularly the Hon. Member in his duty as critic for Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, and other Members as they make representations from time to time on behalf of their constituents.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): On this point, Mr. Speaker, you will recall when the matter was first raised by the Hon. Member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper) that I suggested to the Chair the prudent course to follow might well be for the Minister to make inquiries and report back to the House, which he has now done. I would suggest to the Chair that the prudent course we might now follow, in view of the Minister's explanation, is to allow the Hon. Member for Peace River an opportunity to study, when Hansard is printed tomorrow, the response of the Minister. If at all necessary after that study, we may or may not deal with the matter again.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), with his usal reasonableness, has made an eminently sensible suggestion. I am happy to accept it.

An Hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Sincerely, it is a reasonable suggestion.

FINANCE

ALLOCATION OF JOB-CREATION GRANT TO JUDO CLUB

Mr. Louis Duclos (Montmorency-Orléans): Mr. Speaker, I seek your guidance. A while ago I raised a point of order and you did not allow me to correct unfounded allegations made by a Member of the New Democratic Party. I would like to know why I was not given the opportunity to correct fully those false allegations.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member rose; it was not on a question of privilege, nor indeed did he suggest that it was a question of privilege. It was hardly a point of order. It is a matter of debate. The Hon. Member said that he categorically denied the accusations. The Chair very carefully did not interrupt until he had put some very clear statements on the record. He was entitled to set the facts straight.

I think the Hansard record will disclose that the Hon. Member categorically denied the accusations and said that they were false. I presume he would repeat that. In the circumstances, the Chair would hope that this obvious difference between Hon. Members, which is not unique, might now be left in abeyance. The Hon. Member for Montmorency-Orléans (Mr. Duclos) will have a chance to examine Hansard. He may well want to raise the matter in some other form or some other way before the House or before one of the committees.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): On the same point of order, I was accused of making an allegation, Mr. Speaker.

If you look at Hansard on page—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would ask the Hon. Member to please tell me whether he is rising on a question of privilege or raising a point of order. What does he want to do?

Mr. Nystrom: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, because the Hon. Member for Montmorency-Orléans has suggested that I said something.

MR. NYSTROM—TESTING OF CRUISE MISSILE—CALL FOR FREE VOTE

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition which was signed by 281 people from the federal riding of Yorkton-Melville. It concerns opposition to the testing of the Cruise missile. Perhaps it is appropriate that one should table this petition today after the excellent speeches we heard in the House this morning. Their concern arises out of the fact that we are doing this because we are meeting a request of the United States administration, not a request of NATO.

Wherefore the undersigned call upon the Government of Canada to permit a free vote in the House of Commons in order that Members of Parliament from all Parties may vote according to their beliefs on the Cruise missile testing issue and not in accordance with Party lines.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Jack Burghardt for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, first I wish to congratulate my two colleagues who moved and seconded the motion on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. Mr. Speaker, I also wish to offer our new Governor General Designate, Mrs. Sauvé, my best wishes for a speedy recovery, as my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said today, and I hope we shall see her again very soon.

● (1520)

Mr. Speaker, during this short speech I would like to touch on four subjects, namely, cartography, the Canadian Industrial Renewal Board, a regional economic summit in the Eastern Townships and the creation of a Ministry of Youth.

Mr. Speaker, the announcement about cartography made by the Hon. Jean Chrétien, on January 30 this year was received with great satisfaction in Sherbrooke and the Eastern Townships, especially since the people of Sherbrooke and the Eastern Townships have been waiting seven years for this project to materialize. I shall not go into the details of the matter which caused me many sleepless nights and kept me very busy, but I would like to thank my colleagues from the Eastern Townships—the local ministers who supervised this project—and I am referring to the Member for Drummond (Mr. Pinard) and the Secretary of State (Mr. Joyal), and especially the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, for their tireless dedication to this plan and for the understanding they showed for the wishes of the people of Sherbrooke and the Eastern Townships and the work they have done.

Mr. Speaker, although this announcement does not necessarily guarantee economic development over the next few decades, it will provide our region with an element that will be very important to its industrial restructuration. Cartography, as I imagine most people will know, is a high technology industry, and the Cartography Institute to be located in our area within the next few years will be one of the most advanced of its kind in the world. About 100 cartographers will relocate from the National Capital to the Eastern Townships, while more than 300 cartographers will be recruited in Sherbrooke which may provide some interesting openings for graduates of our local educational establishments. Investments of over $75 million, the purchase of ultra modern equipment and an annual wage bill of more than $15 million means that the Cartography Institute will become one of the major employers and industries in my riding.

In the months to come, we shall be informing people, through the various service clubs, about the Cartography Institute and what it will mean for Sherbrooke. An information centre will be opened shortly, and also a recruiting centre, where accommodation leased on a temporary basis will be available to train future cartographers. One of the most interesting aspects of the announcement made by Mr. Chrétien last week is the relationship that will be established between the new Institute and the University of Sherbrooke and Bishop's University, because of the proximity of these two institutions of higher learning. The new Cartography Institute will thus be able to establish useful contacts with various faculties, including the Faculty of Arts, through the Department of Geography, the Faculty of Applied Sciences and the Faculty of Natural Sciences. This co-operative relationship with our local institutions will benefit our universities, university students, professors, research scientists and future cartographers.

Mr. Speaker, this project has been the most important one I have worked for in the course of my political career. I am very pleased with the announcement and I appreciate the perseverance of the Government and the Ministers with whom I discussed the project, and the Government's firm resolve, from the outset, to pursue its excellent program for decentralizing federal services to the provinces. The transfer of cartography to Sherbrooke marks the end of the second and final phase of the Government's decentralization plan. Personally, I am convinced that I am echoing the wishes of the great majority of Sherbrooke and Eastern Townships residents when I say that the site of the future building of the mapping branch will be chosen at the earliest possible time and that construction of the new facilities will begin in the very near future.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words about the Canadian Industrial Renewal Board, the creation of which was announced by the Prime Minister of Canada on October 26, 1981. The CIRB's mandate was to help restructure, consolidate and modernize the textile and clothing industries, to renew the economic base of communities heavily dependent on those industries and most likely to be affected by the gradual liberalization of world trade. With that in mind, a regional industrial renewal program spread over two years at least was established to make it possible to reach those specific goals. None of the seven designated regions of Canada was able to benefit from the program during the first year because that is the time it took to recruit a competent work group to analyze the various files, carry out surveys in various sectors and, of course, complete expert studies in order to draw up industrial strategies for each of the seven Canadian regions selected.

In the case of the Sherbrooke-Magog region, that study was not made public until November 24, 1982, when the Gaucher Pringle consulting firm unveiled its economic analysis of the Sherbrooke-Magog region and recommended an industrial renewal strategy based on the development and promotion of high technology industries in the fields of microelectronics, metal and plastic processing, and medicine related undertakings. In other words, the designated regions did benefit from the program—although during barely one year rather than two—and in fact it has been only ten months or so since our regions have been in a position to avail themselves of this special program.

There are obvious advantages accruing from the CIRB program as compared with the new Industrial and Regional Development Program. These advantages are as follows: The groundwork done by the officials of ITC-DREE is concerned with all Canadian Provinces, while the studies made by CIRB officials is concerned only with the seven designated regions, namely Cornwall, Hawkesbury, Trois-Rivières, Shawinigan, Victoriaville and Plessisville, Valleyfield, Drummondville and Sherbrooke-Magog. Indeed, the Federal Government is making a more generous contribution under the CIRB program than under the IRDP, as the former allows for grants to be made for the purchase of industrial land and for the payment of pre-production costs and joint services, while the second provides assistance merely for capital expenditures and equipment costs when an investment project is being considered. The CIRB program also covers a more interesting field of intervention since grant offers may be made to business concerns, which would not be the case with IRDP.

The CIRB Board of Directors, which have full jurisdiction over offers for the implementation of projects, make their decisions very quickly, and this, of course, is much more convenient for the industries than the methods used under the IRDP. This was the case for the Tie Communications Company and Travenol, which set up plants in Sherbrooke recently.

Finally, a payment may be made by the CIRB with less than 25 per cent of the assets being required, while, under the new program developed by the Department, no payment may be made until 30 days after commercial operations have started. For certain projects, this means very high additional interest costs in cases where several months elapse between the acquisition of the equipment, its installation and the beginning of production.

Since the CIRB regional program was implemented on April 8, 1982, the Sherbrooke-Magog area has had about twenty industrial projects accepted, which could create nearly 700 jobs and generate over 55 million dollars in investment, a remarkale achievement in view of the present economic situation. These projects partially compensate for the 1,300 jobs lost in Sherbrooke and Magog during the last two years in the textile, clothing and shoe industries.

This is why, Mr. Speaker, the City of Sherbrooke and the City of Magog are asking the Canadian Government to maintain for at least another two years their designation as special CIRB zones so that the industrial renewal efforts can be kept up in areas so dependent upon the textile, clothing and shoe industries, which have suffered more than others from the permanent job losses in this sector during the last two years.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, on January 24, I stated the following in this House:

> Together with my colleagues from the Eastern Townships, we urge the Canadian Government to consider as soon as possible a request submitted by the City of Sherbrooke and the City of Magog to have this outstanding program, which has helped our region to make remarkable progress in a period of economic difficulty, extended for at least two years.

Mr. Speaker, I am happy to see that the Minister in charge is now in the House. I know that he is listening closely to what I say. To support my case even more, I point out that the editor of La Tribune recently published an article entitled "CIRB better than Lotto 6/49". He said, and I quote:

> If the CIRB program were extended for a few years, other major industries, such as Tie Communications, could locate in the region and give it an orientation which, by its very nature, would incite other electronics companies to settle here.

I recently received a letter which was sent to the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). It came from the Chairman of the Sherbrooke Chamber of Commerce, who said the following:

> The efforts of the various economic agents in the Sherbrooke and Magog areas in the last two years were beginning to pay big dividends with the implementation of the CIRB program. We fear that cancellation of this program could greatly reduce the impact and the results of these efforts. We hope that you will give special attention to our request and that the extension of the CIRB program will be announced shortly. With this in mind, Mr. Prime Minister, we shall be happy to welcome you in Sherbrooke to make this announcement.

● (1530)

Mr. Speaker, I hope that the Government will consider this legitimate request from our area to maintain an excellent program which, according to all local economic agents, is certainly the best program that has been developed by the Federal Government in recent years.

Mr. Speaker, I would now like to say a few words about the Regional Economic Summit to be held in Sherbrooke, probably next November. I should like first of all to refer to remarks which I made in this House on November 7, 1981 and in which I suggested a regional economic summit, and I quote:

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that a good way to co-ordinate the economic policies that I mentioned earlier, would be to hold an economic conference on the area in question. At the first stage, we could hold a meeting in Sherbrooke, and at the second stage extend it to the whole region and in this manner we could exercise a greater pressure on the different levels of governments.

Let us first agree on the priorities, the directions at the Sherbrooke level, let us examine the specifics of action. When this is done, we can invite the greater area of the Eastern Townships to join us in a common development effort, because the economic development of the Sherbrooke area is very closely linked to that of the Eastern Townships, and vice versa. That economic summit, in addition to enabling us to see what the situation is and determine the directions to follow, will also enable us to establish the major priorities for the area over the next few years. I submit that this is essential. In the last few years, we had economic summits in our area on the textile, footwear and furniture industries, therefore an economic summit would enable us to know the state of all industries in Sherbrooke and give us the opportunity to decide on the direction we want to follow for our area.

Mr. Speaker, on October 27, 1983, the Parti Québécois' Eastern Township Caucus in a press conference announced that an economic summit would be held towards the end of 1984. And after announcing that summit, the president of the Council of P.Q. MLAs for the Eastern Townships during that press conference recalled, among other things, the origins and the reason for the economic summits, the formula for which, she said, had been developed by the Quebec Government and successfully tried in a number of regions.

Mr. Speaker, in November 1983 I received a letter from the Minister responsible for the area, the Honourable Raynald Fréchette. In that letter, dated November 11, 1983, he said: "For your information, I would like to indicate that the members of that Committee", he was referring to the Steering Committee of that economic summit, "will be elective representatives, businessmen, people with decision power in their areas, people with recognized impact in their community."

He proposed in particular that the Steering Committee of that economic summit should include 28 persons from the region. In a letter I sent him in early January, I humbly submitted two proposals: First, that Members of Parliament for the area have two seats, and second, that members of the National Assembly also have two seats. But unfortunately, that was not accepted, and he recently wrote and I quote: "The 24 members at that meeting reviewed the proposals included in your letter, and after discussion unanimously decided to accept neither of the two proposals."

Mr. Speaker, I would like to state, concerning that Regional Economic Summit, that Members of Parliament for the Eastern Townships will be represented, because we are given one seat. My regret, however, is that as things now stand, the Regional PQ Caucus of MLA for the Eastern Townships would have two seats, and the four Liberal Members in the National Assembly have not been invited.

It seems to me that they could have copied what was done in other Quebec regions, for instance in the area of my colleague for Terrebonne (Mr. Comtois) who was co-chairman, with a Minister from the National Assembly, at the De Lanaudière Economic Summit. And all participating MPs and MLAs took part in the discussions at that Economic Summit. For instance, the Hon. Member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle), who is not a Liberal, and the Hon. Member for Terrebonne, as elected representatives of the area, took part in their Economic Summit. Currently, Liberal Members of the National Assembly for the Eastern Townships are not invited. It is my hope, since we are at the early organizing stage of that Economic Summit, that Members of the Steering Committee will look at that aspect and ensure that all elected representatives for the Eastern Townships, whatever the level of Government, either MLAs or MPs also are invited to take part at that year-end Summit. For my part, I want to assure the organizers of that summit that federal members from Eastern Quebec will be there, that they will participate actively and that we will co-operate as much as we can in order to make a true success of this crucial economic summit.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would like to touch very briefly on an issue which in my view is certainly the most serious in Canada right now, that is unemployment, especially among youth. I recognize at the outset that the youth unemployment problem in Canada is not any easier to cope with than in any other country, and that the situation in this regard is still more dramatic in other areas of Canada than in my region. Youth unemployment is a social tragedy in Canada. We cannot allow these great talents to be lost in forced inactivity and anxiety about the future. For our country, for the entrepreneurs of tomorrow, energies lost today could be very costly if we do not endeavour right now to do everything possible in order to alleviate the situation and help young people who are looking for jobs, who want to work but cannot do so because of the present situation of the economy and also in many cases because of the very structure of the labour force.

At this point, I would like to extend special thanks to the Cabinet for having created a Ministry of State for Youth. Obviously, the Department of Youth will not solve all problems related to unemployment among young Canadians; however, this department will certainly help young people organize themselves and make representations to the government about programs that should be extended or created for them. Every week we have a great number of young people coming to our riding offices to ask us to do everything that we can in order to solve the problem of unemployment which affects them more severely than other segment of the population.

I could go on and on, Mr. Speaker. I still have four pages of my speech left, but unfortunately, I—

Mr. Speaker: Order! I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member, but the time allocated to him has expired. Questions and comments.

[English]

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the Hon. Member for Sherbrooke express his concerns about unemployment. For the record, I wonder if he would indicate the extent of his concern. This week, in Ottawa, a large number of fishermen from the West Coast of British Columbia attempted to lobby him. Would he be prepared to state in the House whether he received that lobby and whether he made any commitment to contact the Minister or make any presentation in the House concerning the plight of the fishermen? An extremely large problem with respect to unemployment is going to develop as a result of the Government's approach to this matter. Would he be able to—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before allowing the Hon. Member for Sherbrooke to comment on that question, I must once again, as I have previously, draw to the Hon. Member's attention that questions and comments must relate to the specific matters raised in an Hon. Member's speech. I appreciate that the Hon. Member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) is touching generally on the question of unemployment, but he specifically raises an issue which was not touched upon in the speech of the Hon. Member for Sherbrooke. However, I will allow the question in this instance.

• (1540)

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Speaker, I believe I can tell the Hon. Member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) that I in fact met with a delegation of fishermen from British Columbia yesterday. They were in my office for about half an hour. We discussed the whole issue. I told them that I would talk with the Minister about the problem they raised. I have read the different pieces of information they sent to me previous to their visit. The meeting was very cordial. I told them, having worked with the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. De Bané) when he was the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, and as the Chairman of the Committee on Regional Economic Expansion, I feel that the Minister is surely one of the most openminded Ministers I know. I told them that the question of the B.C. fisheries was very much discussed in our caucus, and that their representations could not but help resolve the problem. I am not saying it will be resolved to the satisfaction of all, but one thing is sure, their message was heard by government Members and will definitely be passed on to the Minister.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, I have just a comment on that. I certainly wish to express my appreciation as a Member of Parliament from the West Coast for the Hon. Member's attention to this matter. There were some Hon. Members whose time schedule did not permit this to happen. However, certainly, I, as a Member from that area, appreciate the time and energy which the Hon. Member opposite spent on this matter and I respect his assurance that he will attempt to keep this matter foremost and will honour the commitments he made to this group.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I cannot help but make an additional comment to the one I made previously. This is obviously a case of the introduction of a totally new subject matter into the debate, having nothing at all to do with previous Hon. Member's speech. In the future, I will be more careful before allowing responses to that type of question. Debate.

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I would like to spend the few minutes I have at my disposal to talk about a subject which I believe is very important to the fabric of our country. Some months ago I was appointed by our Leader to take on the responsibility of spokesperson on multiculturalism for the Conservative Party. I found it to be a wonderful experience, Mr. Speaker, travelling across the country and meeting with various individuals and groups from all different ethnic and cultural communities. In doing so, I personally have made a lot of new friends I would not have known otherwise.

I would like to say to the House of Commons, Mr. Speaker, that one of the greatest strengths of this country is our diversity, the fact that most of us come from some place else. We bring this diversity not only to the House of Commons but, more important, to the country itself. It gives us the kind of quality and flavour which Canada is known for throughout most of the world. We come from many lands. We have different backgrounds, different languages, different customs, different colours, and while that makes us individual, it also makes us strong. When we have learned to work together, to respect each other, to truly understand each other, we become truly strong and in that context, Mr. Speaker, we become truly Canadians.

The Canadian people generally look to their Government for leadership. They view their Government in most cases as a reflection of themselves, and in some cases a reflection of their own particular communities. In this context, Mr. Speaker, I would like to discuss the whole question of multiculturalism and how far we have come in that area since 1971. As we all know, the Department of Multiculturalism was set up in 1971 by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). However, it surprised me as I travelled across the country and talked with people to find that there is still a remarkable lack of awareness within the general population as to the goals and objectives of the Department of Multiculturalism, even after some 13 years. What appears to have happened, Mr. Speaker, under successive Governments, mainly Liberal Governments, since 1971 is that the whole thrust of multiculturalism has been relegated to tokenism, mainly because it has not been a priority of Government, although it has been given lip service. More important, Mr. Speaker, it has not been given an adequate budget.

As most of us know, the Ministry of State for Multiculturalism is part of the Department of the Secretary of State. The budget of the Department of the Secretary of State, not including the funds and grants it gives, is between $200 million and $300 million. Multiculturalism, of course, is tucked into the Department of the Secretary of State. It started off with a budget of around $10 million, and the projected budget for the coming year will be in the neighbourhood of $18 million to $20 million. Because the budget of the Department of Multiculturalism is so small, and because that Department is included in the larger Department of the Secretary of State, it is a forgotten sector and has been a forgotten sector within the Government itself. As a result of that, people across the country—and I believe rightfully so—feel that the whole area of multiculturalism, and the eight million to ten million people other than English and French, have been relegated to the area of tokenism primarily for votes at election time.

In effect, what one hears as one crosses the country is that the ethnic cultural community in Canada is wooed a few months before election time—and we are seeing some of that at the present time—and it is largely, although not completely, forgotten a few months after the election is over. This viewpoint is repeated over and over again, Mr. Speaker, as one talks with various people across the country. The present Directorate of the Department of Multiculturalism is generally viewed as too political. The feeling is that what is needed is a department which deals with multicultural issues in a committed and meaningful way. The present directorate does not do that.

The Liberal Government, Mr. Speaker, must change its ways, and not only for demographic reasons. I mentioned the size of the multicultural community we are dealing with. From a demographic point of view, it is one-third of the total population of Canada. We must ensure that a comprehensive multicultural policy is accorded the national status it deserves. Canadians of every heritage have a right to expect no less from their federal Government. Canadians of various ethno-cultural backgrounds want to participate in a meaningful way at all levels of society. They do not at present and they feel they are blocked from moving into the senior levels of the private sector or of government, whether it be agencies, Departments or Crown corporations. They feel cheated of their rightful place in Canada. We in the Progressive Conservative Party believe that Canadians of every race, colour, religion and cultural heritage should have an equal opportunity to achieve their full potential in any area of endeavour they might choose. That has to be one of the basic points of a multicultural policy in this country. We must promote tolerance and respect for those who share various cultural heritages and values. That is not always done.

Multiculturalism is not a concept thought up by bureaucrats and sociologists. It is a central fact of Canadian life. One third of all Canadians have neither a French nor an English heritage, but recognition of this fact has been very grudging. Cultural communities are not adequately represented in the senior Public Service, on boards, commissions or Crown corporations. There is an almost complete absence of visible minority individuals at senior levels of all aspects of Canadian life. Government insensitivity to a new cultural reality in Canada has gone unnoticed for too long. This is not going to be allowed to continue.

The Present Government's lack of commitment is shown by the repeated denial of requests for a Ministry of Multiculturalism with an independent budget. We in the Progressive Conservative Party are going to change this when we form the next government. Canadians from all backgrounds are going to be asked to particpate more vigorously at all levels of government, because in many cases it is government which has to lead the way and show the rest of the country what is fair and equitable. If we as government, responsible for the taxpayers' money and responsible for managing the affairs of this country, cannot be fair and objective, then we certainly have no room to criticize anyone else for doing the same thing.

Some people have become cynical because of what they perceive to be political manipulation. The Liberal Government sees multiculturalism as a political tool and not a social reality. That must change. Multiculturalism has to be looked at as a social reality, not something through which to garner votes. A full Ministry of Multiculturalism must be implemented so the Minister can have the same input around the Cabinet table, so Government can be sensitized to the needs of this large community. Equal opportunity must become a way of life and a central tenet of government policy. Any and all barriers to full participation by members of any particular heritage group must be removed. All cultural communities must be made welcome in the political process. We must make all Canadians aware of their contribution to our country by members of the various cultural communities. We must make government agencies and policymakers aware of the particular needs and aspirations of the cultural communities.

Something which comes to mind, Mr. Speaker, is the Department of Employment and Immigration and its regulations which affect these communities across the country. Most important, the cultural communities must be brought into the decision-making process and given the opportunity to compete on an equal basis with all Canadians. All anyone can ask for is to be able to compete on an equal basis with all Canadians. We should tighten up the Criminal Code concerning racial discrimination. The visible minorities must be allowed a greater role in the media in the portrayal of their community on television. There is much evidence to indicate that the visible minorities in this country really have no part to play in the media, hence the feeling of alienation, discrimination and isolation. We could and should make it as easy as possible for new Canadians to integrate into Canadian society. The integration must take place and the facilities must be there and made available.

Coupled with all this, Mr. Speaker, is the unique problem many immigrant women have in not only learning the language but, if they are a single parent, in caring for a child while they go out to earn a living. These special problems and special needs must be addressed. Having conferences and paying lip-service to the problem is not enough. We must look to strengthening the Human Rights Act in the area of discrimination and dissemination of hate literature. We as parliamentarians can strengthen that Act. The Government should look to hiring and training counsellors in dealing with the special problems of the visible minority community, people with a sensitivity which is not always displayed by those who have to deal with the public. We could also use Governor in Council appointments to increase the number of visible minorities on federal boards and commissions if they are qualified. That is all anyone asks for. But it is not happening in a sufficient number of cases. We could work with the provincial Governments to help sensitize the public school system to demonstrate tolerance, something not always there at the present time. The federal bureaucracy, through a new ministry, could accomplish many of these things I have mentioned.

In summary, Mr. Speaker, Canada is viewed as a great, fair and open country. People of all backgrounds, languages, colour and religion want to come here because we are viewed as being as fair and open as a country possibly can be. We have that quality, Mr. Speaker, because we are made up of many parts. We are diversified but we are still Canadians. We want to retain the best of our own culture and language, but we also want to be Canadian. We have achieved that. We can do much more by starting not to pay only political lip-service to the question of multiculturalism, but rather by dealing with it in a way in which we would deal with most other aspects of life, that is, dealing with it on a rational, objective and fair basis and bringing people of various backgrounds with various ideas into the centre of the decision-making process. That would not only be good for our organizations, boards and Parliament, but it would be good for Canada and every community in this country.

Mr. Hudecki: Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a statement first and then ask a question. I know the Hon. Member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta) well enough to know that he would not want to leave the impression, which he is leaving, as to the contribution the policy of multiculturalism is making. In my own riding many of the suggestions he has put forward have materialized. In my riding there is a central office in which there is a very adequate library staffed by a person knowledgeable in a number of cultures. It focuses on people of various ethnic origins. There are satellite offices in which counselling is carried out to help people with income tax and immigration problems. There are a number of courses at the local schools which are subsidized under the multicultural plan which reinforce various language studies. Annually there is a festival in which various multicultural groups are able to manifest the products of their hard work and cultural achievements. Until recently there was a very adequate newspaper published which was quite widely distributed. It contained pertinent information concerning various groups. That included the Afro-Caribbean group, the various Eastern European groups and so on. One of the problems is that there is not necessarily great growth because so many of these people later become integrated into the society as a whole.

What areas did the Member cover in his investigation? If a riding is not adequately represented, multi-culturalism is not properly expressed and the policy not properly utilized, it is a reflection of a shortcoming in the Member representing that riding.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, I would like to respond to the Hon. Member, who is a very good personal friend of mine, by saying that many of the things to which he has alluded, of course, take place throughout various parts of the country. In Manitoba we have Folklorama, which is a large multicultural festival which takes place during the summer. In Manitoba we also have the International Centre, which is doing a fabulous job in terms of education and help for new immigrants to the country. We as Canadians have found that the question of multi-cultural functions, such as songs and dances, are really not now an issue at all. It happens every year and is good for Canada and the people who are involved.

As I speak with various ethno-cultural groups across the country I am finding that they want more than the songs and dances which we have traditionally been talking about. There is necessity for more than language training for new Canadians arriving in this country. The multicultural community in this country wants a greater say in the operations of Canada. In total they make up about 30 to 35 per cent of our total population. They are telling me that, provided they are qualified and have the ability and mobility, they want to assume a rightful place in the management of this country. In effect they are saying they have grown up, matured and want to be like everyone else. Mr. Speaker, on boards and agencies in this country, which the Government sets up, people of visible minorities are not present. It is the sensitization that we lack. My contention is that if a full ministry were introduced and funded properly it would be able to do that and would have a very positive impact in this country.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I have spoken in the House on many occasions about economic matters because I had some responsibility in the past in that area and also because it is an area of great interest to me. I have tried to make some contribution to my constituents and the people of Canada in that area. Today I would like to follow up on the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) speech. I have been very impressed with the initiatives which the Prime Minister has taken, as all Members of the House have been, as was expressed today by the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Mulroney) and the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent). It is a matter of non-partisan concern of the highest order that we look at the current world situation and, as a country, encourage our Leaders to do as much as possible.

I would like to address the question of what we as Canadians can do to prevent the increasing threat of nuclear war. I believe that the Prime Minister's peace initiative has demonstrated to citizens of this country, and indeed to world leaders abroad, the seriousness of the present situation and has put forward some concrete steps which must be taken to reduce the uncertainty of the present political climate. We must think in terms other than personal security and human survival. We must think in terms of the quality of life in the world and what it would mean to that quality of life if we could eliminate the arms race and reduce the threat of nuclear and other arms. It is clear that we could alleviate many of the world's economic and social problems if we could divert the vast wealth that is being spent annually on the arms race, and nuclear armaments in particular, to other more productive purposes.

The amount spent on nuclear and conventional arms this and last year is somewhere in the range of $700 billion. Obviously this money could be used more productively and certainly less destructively, both in the developed and undeveloped world. In nations like Canada, the money could be used for industrial restructuring that we all know is needed, job creation and training programs for which our young people are certainly in dire need, for housing and the war on poverty. All of this could be done in our country.

• (1610)

In underdeveloped countries, these funds could be used to raise the world's poor above the poverty level. In those terms alone we should be looking actively at ways of de-escalating the arms race. We can be speaking in terms other than the world threat that nuclear arms present to us.

Canada has been a prominent and a very active participant in many international efforts for arms control and I believe we must continue to build on our record. That is certainly what the Prime Minister's initiative is intended to do.

As the Prime Minister stated at the first United Nations Special Session on Disarmament in 1978, Canada was the first nation in the post-war period with the capacity to produce nuclear weapons that chose not to do so. The Prime Minister mentioned that in his speech today. We were the first nuclear armed country which chose to divest itself of nuclear weapons and we have maintained a non-nuclear role for our United Nations forces in Europe and our NATO forces as well.

Canada has been active in its support for a comprehensive test ban treaty, an extended non-proliferation treaty and steps to prevent the militarization of space. These are all matters which the Prime Minister mentioned in his speech this morning. Our participation in negotiations on arms control and disarmament in such international forums as the United Nations General Assembly, U.N. committees and NATO has demonstrated our commitment to peace and security in an interdependent world.

However, the past few years have witnessed a significant deterioration in the international political climate. The recent deployment of the Pershing II and Cruise missiles in Europe, as part of NATO's two track response to the deployment of the Soviet Union's SS-20s and more recently their more advanced missiles, has greatly exacerbated East-West tensions. We have since witnessed the suspension of high level political dialogue between the superpowers on issues of arms control and disarmament, as demonstrated by the breakdown of the INF and START negotiations, as well as the MBFR talks. The only sign of political discussion on these issues is the Conference on Confidence and Security Building Measures and Disarmament in Europe, which commenced in Stockholm at the end of January.

The Prime Minister, among others, has called for politicization of these talks, and righfully so. As a result, the conference provided an opportunity for foreign ministers of NATO and the Warsaw Pact and neutral and non-aligned countries to resume negotiations and rebuild international confidence. I know that we all have a great hope that these discussions will lead to a fruitful conclusion.

It is in this increasingly unstable international environment that the Prime Minister's peace initiative must be placed. In lauching his initiative, the Prime Minister has called for a "third rail of high level political energy to speed the course of agreement", and I have noted today that certain of the nuclear disarmament groups in Canada have swung on side and are now supporting the Prime Minister's third rail initiative.

At the Williamsburg Summit in 1983, the leaders of the Western industrialized nations stated:

> We commit ourselves to devote our full political resources to reducing the threat of war. We have a vision of a world in which the shadow of war has been lifted from all mankind, and we are determined to pursue that vision.

The Prime Minister, as one of the participants of the Summit, has indeed taken concrete political action to this end. The Canadian peace plan also demonstrates the need for the leaders of middle powers, not simply the two superpowers or the five nuclear armed powers, to become inolved in the search for peace.

Since 1945, the world has witnessed a terrifying proliferation of nuclear arms with increased capacity for destruction. After the first atomic bomb we have seen the development of thermo nuclear weapons, ICBM fleets, submarine-launched Cruise missiles, independently targeted multiple warheads, and if we do not stop this chain of destruction we will soon see anti-satellite systems in space.

While technical capabilities have increased, I do not think that there has been a concomitant development in the political purpose governing the development and use of these weapons. It seems that nuclear strategists have been able to divorce successfully nuclear military strategy from both political objectives and social reality to the point where they find it possible to discuss the concept of a winnable or protracted nuclear war.

There is no such thing as escalation dominance. Unless we succeed in de-escalating world tensions and stopping the momentum of the arms race, we will not see escalation dominance but rather, mutually assured destruction—apocalypse now.

As the Prime Minister has stated, "casting a fresh linkage of military strategy with, and subordinate to"—which is very important—"strong political purpose must become the highest priority of East and West alike".

Robert McNamara, the former U.S. Secretary of Defence, has written an article in which he expresses similar concerns. He asserts in fact that nuclear weapons can serve no military purpose at all except to deter one's opponents from using them. He questions whether there is any issue, any conflict which could possibly justify the use of nuclear weapons in a confrontation. I confess that I cannot conceive of any situation which would warrant such a response, and I believe that any military or defence strategies pursued must take these factors into account.

As a member of the NATO Alliance, Canada recognizes the legitimate security needs of our allies. We must ensure that steps are taken to safeguard our collective security but that these steps do not in fact end up endangering it.

Throughout history, it seems, war is not solely the response of nations reacting to a direct and present danger. Often, military preparedness itself leads to war. Given the lack of confidence, the mistrust that exists today, we must strive to ensure that the lower nuclear threshold and increased potential for destruction that exist today do not and never will result in the deployment of nuclear weapons in a super-power confrontation.

It was with great interest and perhaps with some degree of coincidence that last night on the PBS television system in the United States, on Bill Moyers' program A Walk Through the Twentieth Century, he discussed how weapons development has changed the face of the world and the concept and notion of war. He mentioned that, indeed, the man who has given us the Nobel Peace Prize was the man who invented dynamite, with the notion at that time that dynamite had such horrendous potential for destruction that it would never be used but would be a force to stop and end war.

Carrying on into the early 1900s, we saw the change that has taken place in the concept of war just in the last half century. Prior to the invention of the machine-gun, war was thought to be a chivalrous activity in which combatants alone were involved and killing took place between military forces of combatants in which civilians were not involved.

The invention and application of the machine-gun was the beginning of the depersonalization of war. He showed how the application of the machine-gun changed the notion of war from being a chivalrous act—which it never was—to one where an individual using a piece of mechanized equipment could literally kill thousands of people without seeing their faces, knowing their names or realizing what they stood for or were trying to achieve.

As the machine-gun depersonalized war, the next stage in the evolution of depersonalization during the First World War was the application of the second element of destruction, namely, the submarine and the use of that submarine in the sinking of civilian vessels, such as the Lusitania where over 1,000 men, women and children, all non-combatants, were killed by the use of a torpedo, with no other purpose in terms of the impact that it might have on the war. Civilians were killed indiscriminately by a piece of mechanized equipment. That piece of equipment was thought to be of such horrible destructive power that it would never be used and that it would bring an end to war.

The third phase to war was the invention and the application of the airplane. That really brought about the ultimate depersonalization of war in the last part of the First World War and certainly later in the Second World War. Literally millions and millions of human beings were destroyed, civilians, non-combatants, by the application of a high technology item.

When we think the First World War was called the war to end all wars and then think of what happened during the Second World War when millions of people died at the hands of machines manned by individual who had no concept, no notion, of the terrible force which they unleashed on human beings, they were simply using a piece of equipment, it seems to me that that program brought home even more forcefully the futility of looking for the ultimate weapon to end all war. There is no such weapon, Mr. Speaker. There is no weapon that will end the terrible destruction of war. It just makes it more terrible indeed. By depersonalizing war it removes, as the Prime Minister was trying to say in a much more deep historical sense, the element of politics from war, because we do not confront individuals in a battle situation any longer; we confront machines and the machines confront people. That depersonalization has made the risks of all-out war much, much higher than ever before.

It was pointed out that the Second World War was the first war in which more civilians were killed than combatants. In the First World War the numbers were about even. In the Second World War, 16 million combatants were killed and 34 million civilians were killed. The estimates of a third World War in the ludicrous context of a limited nuclear war would be somewhere in the range of 300 million or more killed, over 90 per cent of whom would be civilians. These would be people with no interest in the war, no desire for war, just innocent victims of a nonsensical approach of trying to solve the world's problems.

It is unacceptable. All of us in the House believe it is unacceptable. It seems to me we have to devote every effort we can to ensuring that that never comes about. It might be thought that each weapon advance—we are seeing it now and we are hearing about it and with it the testing of additional weapons, will take us to a high level of deterrence. But it does not. It does not take us to a higher level of deterrence. Contrary to the fervent belief of inventors and the fervent belief of those who would escalate the arms race, each advance has not put an end to war. It has only made war increasingly more terrible, to the point now that if we use just the limited number of weapons we have, we could virtually ensure the destruction of mankind, ensure the destruction of life on earth as we know it. The lunacy of this has gone far beyond the point to which we should have ever let it go in the first place.

The vertical and horizontal proliferation of nuclear weapons in the world, the growing hostility of the superpowers and a deep understanding of history have prompted the Prime Minister to put forth proposals designed to avert such a threat. In his visits with world leaders, East and West alike, he has received support for his efforts. He has called for the establishment of a global forum for negotiations which will include the five nuclear powers and an extension and strengthening of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty. The initiative has included suggestions for raising the nuclear threshold in Europe through a mutually acceptable balance of conventional forces at reduced levels. Other proposals include the suffocation of the development of new weapons systems, a ban on anti-satellite systems in space, and improved verification procedures, including mobility restrictions on ICBMs. Perhaps most important, the Prime Minister has emphasized the need for an injection of political will, to bring back once again political control over the system, because the essence of politics is human interaction. That, it seems to me, is the historical evolution that has occurred over the years since the early 1900s. We have increasingly not only depoliticized the whole military and industrial structure but we have depoliticized the notion, the concept, of war, and that has to be undone.

When Lester B. Pearson received the Nobel Peace Prize in 1957, he stated that in a nuclear age, nations must choose between peace and extinction. Never in the course of human history has the choice been as stark as it is today. It is only when we recognize that nuclear weapons are not like other weapons in any way, shape or form, that we can begin to act upon the choice which has to be made. Nuclear weapons cannot be used to achieve strategic political goals; their only role is to provide a secure and effective deterrent, and that can only be done as we reduce their use and their availability to zero, combined with an enhanced role for conventional forces. I believe the United States and the Soviet Union will have to realize that there is no alternative to peaceful coexistence on this planet.

In closing I would like to quote again from the United Nations First Special Session on Disarmament in 1978. The passage reads:

> Removing the threat of a world war—a nuclear war—is the most acute and urgent task of the present day. Mankind is confronted with a choice: we must halt the arms race and proceed to disarmament or face annihilation.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, that was a very important speech made by the Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans). In my comments I would like to endorse the efforts of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in any effort that can bring this globe closer to peace. However, I have some problems. Would the Hon. Member address the following three areas? It is very difficult for anyone to accept as serious and sincere a peace initiative when there is a hint of hypocrisy in it, when the Prime Minister of Canada, the Liberal Party and the Conservative Party in the House, approve testing of the Cruise missile in Canada in light of the fact that the Prime Minister at a special conference on disarmament advocated a suffocation mechanism that would prohibit the testing of such a weapon by any nation. It is difficult to comprehend that hypocrisy.

Second, the Liberals and Conservatives joined together to stop a vote on a motion to make Canada a nuclear free zone. The import of that motion would have been that we as a country would have stopped building components for nuclear weapons systems, which would in fact have given us greater credibility in an international context.

There has been an appeal by middle nations to have the Prime Minister and this country become involved in the Central American conflict in such a way that we could provide greater aid to those nations which need assistance, such as Nicaragua, and that we could use our influence in a stronger and more effective way to bring the combatants to the bargaining table in El Salvador. Yet the Prime Minister and the Government of Canada appear to want to provide material which can be used by the armed forces of nations that are creating or escalating the conflict in Central America.

Why are we testing the Cruise missile when we know that hypocrisy erodes our credibility in the world? Why are we continuing to make components for nuclear weapons? Why are Canadians not far more extensively involved in Central America to create some peace and stability there through negotiations and effective aid to nations which require it?

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, let me try to address myself to those three questions. First, with regard to Cruise missile testing, I think all of us would much prefer that there be no more development of nuclear weapons of any kind or nuclear weapons delivery systems, which is what this particular case is. However, I think we have to look at it from the perspective that if there is to be an ability for us and the Prime Minister to play a role in the negotiations and to have credibility with our NATO allies, as well as establishing credibility with those in the Eastern Bloc, we have to be considered as, and seen to be, a stable partner in the NATO alliance. It is in that context that the Cruise decision has to be seen. Without a decision of that nature, it would be very difficult for the Prime Minister to have made the gains he has made with our western allies, or if we were seen as less than a full partner in the Western Alliance.

At the same time the Prime Minister has made overtures toward the East, supported by people in the House, which make him a credible spokesman on that side of the Iron Curtain as well. It is a fine balancing act. I truly believe that the Cruise missile testing position was a critical element in maintaining or establishing that fine balance. It placed the Prime Minister in the position to undertake the kinds of initiatives he has undertaken up to this point and which, hopefully, he will undertake in the future with great success. That has more to say about the Cruise missile decision than anything else that has been said in the House in the past.

With regard to a nuclear free zone, that motion was a Private Member's motion. Indeed, we wanted to have that motion debated in the House of Commons. In fact, we had to give unanimous consent to allow it to be debated, and we gave it. However, at the time we gave unanimous consent there was no debate. No one stood up to debate the issues. It would seem to me that it would be rather foolish for Hon. Members of the House, with a piece of paper in front of them, to vote in favour of something when the mover of the motion did not rise to explain what the motion was all about or what he wanted to do. The mover of the motion sat on his hands in the corner and did not rise. It was an immediate vote without any debate or discussion. It was not unreasonable, when the mover would not even debate his own motion, simply to vote against it.

I might add that there is another motion—and I think it is in the form of a Bill—which says almost precisely the same thing, on the Order Paper. When that motion comes before us in Private Members' Hour, I hope we will have a chance to debate the issues and we will not have a situation where individual Members do not rise to debate it. Turning to Central America—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, if I heard the Hon. Member correctly, toward the end of his speech I either heard some brave new words or some arrant nonsense. I thought I heard the Member say that we should seek to depoliticize the concept of war. I wonder whether he has thought about what that means, or did he mean that we should depoliticize the concept of peace? I am not sure what he had in mind. It is really a strange collection of thoughts. I do not think wars are fought for anything but political reasons.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member has totally misinterpreted or misunderstood what I said. In fact it was just the opposite. I said that we had to repoliticize because, as I said in my speech, the advent of machines of war have removed the political element from war in the sense of politics being the resolution of problems between human beings. With the mechanization of war, the resolution of problems does not come down to a face to face issue of resolving the difficulties. It comes down simply to throwing massive elements of destruction back and forth between groups of people who know nothing about each other. That is what I meant, that it had been depoliticized by machine elements of war over the years to the ultimate extreme where we now have the capability of throwing one piece of equipment and destroying millions of people in a megasecond. That is total depoliticization of the concept of conflict resolution. We have to repoliticize it so that we start to resolve these conflicts by human interaction and by reason rather than through the application of mechanical means of destruction and death.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I appreciated the comments of the Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans). He almost dealt with my third question, which I think is vitally important. I wonder whether unanimous consent might be given to allow him one more minute in which to finish his answer on Central America.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Parliamentary Secretary has another minute and a half in which to respond, if he so pleases.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, I will be very honest and frank with the Hon. Member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly). I am not as fully apprised of the Government's activities and positions in various elements of Central America as perhaps I would like to be or as perhaps he is. It certainly seems to me, from my understanding of discussions I have had with the Minister for External Relations (Mr. Pepin) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen), that our position as a Government is to try to reduce the tensions, to not provide arms to combatants in those countries, and to put that position forward to the United States and others who are supplying weapons to those combatants. Certainly from my understanding that is the approach the Government has put forward. Perhaps we could be doing more. Certianly I would very much appreciate hearing debate, as I have in the past, on what we could do in Central America.

I know the Hon. Member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle) has a great deal of experience in that area. I have enjoyed and appreciated some of his comments about his travels. Also I know that an all-Party committee of three Members of the House went down there to look at the situation during our last recess. I admit that my education has to be greatly enhanced in that area, but my understanding of Government policy is that it is not as inconsistent with the Hon. Member's desires as perhaps his question would have led some Members of the House to believe.

Mr. Gerry St. Germain (Mission-Port Moody): Mr. Speaker, as this is my maiden speech, it is a great honour to rise in the House today and respond to the Speech from the Throne. Just over four months ago, I had the privilege of being led into the House by my colleague, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mulroney). That day is one I will never forget.

In representing Mission-Port Moody, I follow in the steps of a fine man, a conscientious, hard-working Member of Parliament. His efforts and his dedication to the people of Mission-Port Moody and Canada represent to me a great challenge and a real incentive to work hard. Mark Rose and I certainly do not share the same political philosophy, but we do share the same concerns, concern over the massive and devastating unemployment in Mission-Port Moody and the rest of Canada, and concern over the neglect our area has suffered in recent years.

I want to tell you about my riding of Mission-Port Moody, Mr. Speaker, so that all Members of the House can understand not only the plight of our area but the tremendous potential that it has as well.

My riding of Mission-Port Moody is a beautiful part of the British Columbia lower mainland on the north shore of the Fraser River. Most of the 120,000 people in my riding live in communities along the Fraser River running from Port Moddy, Coquitlam, Port Coquitlam, Pitt Meadows, Maple Ridge, Whonnock, Ruskin, Mission, Deroche, right out to Harrison Mills.

From the suburdan residential area of Port Coquitlam to the famed Sasquatch-inhabited forests of Harrison Valley, the people of Mission-Port Moody share the same patriotism for their nation and the same hopes and dreams for their families as the rest of Canadians. Our area is blessed with the natural beauty and bountiful resources that British Columbia is so well known for, but we are also plagued with unemployment and hardship that is gripping our nation. Unemployment is the single greatest issue concerning the people of Mission-Port Moody. It was that issue that dominated the by-election campaign following which I was elected. It is this issue that is in the mind of every citizen in my riding today.

Hopes have been dashed and dreams have been stifled because of unemployment. Discontent is growing and anger is in the feeling and in the hearts of my constituents. They are angry, not at me. They are angry at the Government opposite because they know that Government intervention, economic mismanagement and corrupt neglect have led to our current difficulties. However, their anger has fired their resolve to bring about change. They want to end the instability. They want to stop the corruption. They want to repair the damage and restore the confidence in our system of government.

That is why I am in this House. On August 29 the people of Mission-Port Moody demonstrated their desire for change. In fact, the momentum for change right across Canada started in Mission-Port Moody on August 29. Canadians are no longer willing to sacrifice opportunity. They realize the potential that is ours and they are going to rid our nation of the Government that has prevented us from realizing that potential.

The potential of Mission-Port Moody lies in the resource industries that have traditionally created the prosperity in Canada—forestry, fishing and farming. These are also industries which have been hardest hit over the last three years. The Government opposite has simply ignored these vital sectors. Instead of making important decisions to preserve our fish stocks, to replant our forests and to allow our farmers to continue farming, the Government has allowed neglect to drive these resource industries into difficulty. The Throne Speech perpetuates the Government's attitude of neglect toward the important resource-based industries. This speech, which is supposedly the Government's blueprint for the future, merely pays lip-service to the resource industries that built our country, generated our wealth and created our high standard of living.

About the dying Pacific fishery, this Government says that the problems of this industry require attention; nothing more specific. There is nothing to offer any hope to the fishermen of my riding, who met at a conference last month to plan a way to survive. Meanwhile, the Pearse Commission report, be it good or bad, gathers dust on a shelf as the Government refuses to make any decisions on Dr. Pearse's recommendations. Their only decision is the decision to continue ignoring the plight of West Coast fishermen.

The same is true of the forest industry, which is so vital to the riding of Mission-Port Moody and to all Canadians. Forestry is by far the most significant employer in my area. There are 45 sawmills. The lumber mills, shingle and shake mills, seedling nurseries and other private sector service industries create the jobs and generate the wealth in my riding, and they are spread right across the country.

Surely the Government knows that our forests must be farmed, and not mined. Forestry is our most important renewable resource, yet we have not been renewing our forests for future generations. Unplanted areas are swiftly overtaking our forests. New forests are not being planted because the Government opposite cannot reach agreement with the provinces to spend federal dollars on what is clearly a national as well as a provincial resource. If Canada's greatest farm, our natural forests, are not managed and harvested properly and replanted immediately, we will see our forest industry die.

There was mention in the Throne Speech of a conservation corps that will be involved in forestry renewal, but what about the $130 million promised to the provinces last year by the Minister responsible for the Canadian forestry service? Where has that money gone? Has it gone into a slush fund? It has disappeared. Only 4 per cent of forest revenues are required to do a proper job of forest renewal. Replanting the backlogged areas would create 100,000 jobs. This would enable the forest industry to prosper in future years and to continue providing the kind of wealth that allows Canada to maintain a high standard of living.

At the same time this Government should be making a real commitment to research and development in the wood products field. If we are to realize the full potential of our forests, we must find less expensive ways to produce more from a single log. There are signs that Canada's plywood industry is becoming an antiquated industry. The cost of producing veneer plywood is too high. The waste involved in milling a log is also an area of concern. This is a reality. The plywood industry will be gone, and we have no replacement for it. New technology can provide us with the ingenuity to utilize traditional wood wastes and produce chipboards, resin-based hardboards and other wood products that can replace plywood and other costly traditional products. If we do not adapt new technologies to our resource industries and if we do not apply new methods of production to the processing and upgrading of these resources, we will see these industries die a slow death. If our forest industry dies, the resulting number of unemployed will be in the hundreds of thousands. The effects will be felt from one coast to another. This is the reality the Government opposite refuses to recognize.

We must ask why this Government has ignored the resource-based industries of western Canada. Why has it attacked the oil and gas industry? Why has it neglected the forest industry? Why has it mismanaged the West Coast fisheries industry? The answer, Mr. Speaker, lies in the Government's attitude toward Canada. Canada is one nation where success is promoted through our freedom to realize our individual hopes and dreams. Unity is not something a government can impose; it is something we all must work to achieve. That is what Canada is all about. Canadians, in whatever part of the country they live, want to be treated fairly. They want to have the same opportunities and the same chances. They are united behind the common goal that our pioneering forefathers dreamed of—the goal of survival in a harsh land and success from hard work.

We united out of necessity. A confederation exists because each region of this nation has something to offer. Each region offers opportunities. Each region offers resources. That is Canada—a confederation of regions, not a coalition of special interest groups.

The Government looks at Canada as a nation of different special groups. Each region or special interest group is treated differently by the Government, according entirely to political expediency. Interests are manipulated. Some regions are catered to, others are ignored, all in the name of success at the polls. Nationally unity is an abstract concept that the Government attempts to impose when all else fails.

The Speech from the Throne provides further evidence of the Government's destructive attitude. The Government makes overtures to virtually every special interest group in the country. Small promises here and smaller promises there, all based on one objective—political expediency.

There are promises of studies, grants for studies and grants for studying grants for studies. This is the Government's answer to Canada's problems. Study the problem and maybe it will go away. And, if it does not, then identify a special group interested in the problem and fund it so it becomes dependent on you and then it can no longer make the problem public.

These are not answers, Mr. Speaker. These are tactics—tactics aimed at perpetuating the life of an arrogant, uncaring, incompetent, destructive government.

The Government talks in the Throne Speech about starting to build on our regional strengths. How can it be serious, Mr. Speaker? This is the same group of wreckers that destroyed federal-provincial relations. It was the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who declared that co-operative federalism was dead. Now, in a last ditch attempt to restore its political credibility, the Government opposite talks about resurrecting co-operative federalism. It promises in the Throne Speech to launch a new era of federal-provincial planning and consultation. This is just another one of its hollow promises—promises it does not keep, promises on which it backtracks.

The people of Mission-Port Moody do not want special treatment. They do not want to be catered to like some special interest group. They do not want Liberal Government handouts or giant bailouts. They just want to be treated with a degree of fairness and equity. They want to be represented in the House and in the other place by responsive individuals who are committed to fostering national unity, encouraging growth and development and promoting freedom and prosperity.

The people of Mission-Port Moody, like all the people of Canada, want a government to deliver a Speech from the Throne that makes commitments and not hollow promises. They want a commitment to restore confidence in our national economy. They want to see an incentive-based tax system that encourages investments and risk taking. They want the real engine of growth, the private sector, to be given half a chance. They want the bureaucratic barriers and blockades removed so that small businesses, the champions of job creation, can provide permanent full-time jobs.

Canadians want a government that will encourage research and development by offering tax incentives to businesses. They want to see new technologies adapted to our resource-based industries and our manufacturing industries to increase productivity and enhance quality. They want to see a government that rewards hard work and sacrifice, instead of taxing success and redistributing wealth. They want to see a government that will maintain our precious health care system, rather than a government that attempts to undermine the system by reneging on its commitments. They want to see a government that provides opportunities for our young people through quality education in the vocational and technical disciplines as well as the academic ones.

Canadians in every part of our country want a government that offers some hope, Mr. Speaker. How can the people of Mission-Port Moody or the people of any other area of Canada have hope if 1.5 million people do not have jobs? And how, Mr. Speaker, can people have jobs if the Government of the day is intent on controlling every aspect of our economy?

Our history has shown that if Canadians are given a free hand, they have the will and they have the way to achieve important goals. I talked earlier about our inherent desire to maintain our unity through a commitment to success and achievement. This success, this achievement, has been a national success achieved by the regions of our country, in the regions of our country, by the people of those regions. The regions are strong Mr. Speaker, but so is the desire to work together as Canadians.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to be a descendant of the two founding races of our great country, and I am particularly proud of my French Canadian origins. Although I have not spoken French for over 30 years, I venture to say a few words in this House in a language which means a lot to me. I have witnessed the strength of national unity in the community where I lived. Having lived in a French Canadian community outside Quebec, I have had many opportunities to realize that success transcends cultural and linguistic barriers. I have seen a nation put aside their regional interests and work together as Canadians to build and develop our country. As a Progressive Conservative member, I am pleased to have had the opportunity to work towards reaching an agreement with Quebec and Manitoba in order to protect the rights of linguistic minorities and our two official languages and thus build a truly bilingual country.

[English]

Canadians have an identity, and as individuals they have strong ideals and values. They do not want their lives controlled by government or their ideals established by one political philosophy. They do not want a group of pseudo-intellectuals to instruct them on how our nation should evolve. They know that these elitist intellectuals cannot tell them what to read or what to watch on the media.

I have faith, Mr. Speaker, in Canadians. I have faith in our nation as one united country from ocean to ocean. I know that Canadians will find a way to restore prosperity in Canada. I only hope that it happens soon, because people are suffering.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the Members opposite look at the words in the Speech from the Throne and ask themselves what hope these words offer, as the grips of winter take over our great land, to those millions of Canadians who have not had the opportunity to earn a living in months or whose families are suffering because a father, a brother, a sister or a mother, have exhausted their unemployment benefits?

Let those Members opposite and the Government, which is largely responsible for the plight of the jobless, reflect in silence during this very crucial time.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order! The speech of the Hon. Member will be followed by a 10-minute period for questions and comments.

[English]

Mr. Kristiansen: Mr. Speaker, to begin with I should like to congratulate the Hon. Member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. St. Germain) on a maiden speech, which, in spite of some differences in philosophy, proposals and analysis, was a pleasure to listen to. It was well delivered, apart from matters of political philosophy. I appreciate his kind remarks with respect to his predecessor, in this House, Mr. Mark Rose, and the acknowledgement that the area he serves, as did Mr. Rose, is in great need of solutions from the Government and other agencies across the country.

● (1700)

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I do have one question in particular. I agree with much of what the Hon. Member said, and with many of his criticisms and descriptions of the problems with which his community as well as my own is faced with respect to the forest products industry. However, I found it somewhat odd for one with a professed Conservative philosophy to almost suggest by his criticism that we need overt government action in order to have the private sector, which certainly dominates in the forest products industry, convert to manufacturing such products as waferboard, particleboard, chipboard, and so on. These technologies are in place in many parts of North America. They have been singularly absent from the forest products industry in British Columbia. Is the Hon. Member suggesting that it requires government intervention or particular government assistance in order to get the private sector to do what the marketplace, as well as our changing resource base which was brought about by years of mismanagement, has been demanding of it? Is the Hon. Member suggesting that it is up to the Government to solve this problem when the private sector which he glorifies, and which, certainly, has a role to play, has been so unable or unwilling to build the kind of manufacturing plants which both the market and the resource so badly need?

Mr. St. Germain: Mr. Speaker, when I speak of the progress which is being made in these particular areas, the knowledge which I gained was through the private sector, from visiting all the various industries within that particular area, the chemical plants, and so on. What I am saying is that, like most of my compatriots here in the Official Opposition, I do not advocate government intervention. However, what we do advocate is special incentives for research and development. That is happening in other parts of North America. That is why research is taking place there. All we are saying, Mr. Speaker, is that we want the incentives in place so that we can develop our own technologies and not have to rely on others.

We are working with the mills in my area, Mr. Speaker, the ones I had contact with, to make sure the research and development, as far as fire-retardant shingles, for example, are concerned is proceeding, but these are not necessarily all major mill operations. These are small operators, Mr. Speaker, who are struggling to survive, given the last two years of recession. All I am advocating is that we create incentives so that these people can defer some of their taxes, take some of their dollars and use them as a form of incentive to go into research and development. That is really what we are asking for. None of the business people in Mission-Port Moody, Mr. Speaker, want any handouts or bailouts. All we want is a chance to operate.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I was very impressed with the address of the Hon. Member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. St. Germain). I congratulate him on his address. I would like to make a comment and then have the Hon. Member comment on what I have to say. I believe there is a place for Government, and free enterprise believes that also. One place is research and development and another is to assist in the location of markets. If the Government would expend its energies in locating markets and in research and development, the industry would follow through, at least that has been my experience. I wonder if that fits in with the philosophy of the Hon. Member for Mission-Port Moody?

Mr. St. Germain: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank both Hon. Members for their compliments and for giving me the opportunity to reply to their questions. Logically, without research and development and without new technology we are going nowhere in this country. This is why our economy is where it is today. Definitely we must assist the small organizations in pursuing and acquiring other markets because, Mr. Speaker, if we do not, they will surely die. Given the recession which has taken place in the last two years in the lumber industry, it is amazing how they have maintained the life they have left in them. Government benefits greatly from the taxes which are generated from these industries when they are buoyant. However, when they are oppressed as they are now, and suffering from the recession which has just recently taken place, it is highly unlikely that, without some form of assistance which would benefit all Canadians, they would be able to survive.

[Translation]

Mr. Tousignant (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion: Mr. Speaker, before putting my two questions to the Hon. Member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. St. Germain) I would like to express my deep disappointment. I have kept an eye on the Hon. Member since he came into this House over four months ago and he seemed to me to be a rather likeable fellow. Now I have to realize that he has immediately acquired the conservative tendency to negative criticism. I am rather disappointed with his attitude throughout his speech. He waited four months before giving his maiden speech and from now on he will probably remain silent. Still, I am rather disappointed.

I would like to ask him, for example, when he refers to tax incentives, how he thinks he could convince some companies to undertake new projects through tax incentives. Indeed, I do not think that tax incentives can really help hard pressed companies.

When he refers to research and development, we agree with his option. However, he should tell us how this should be done. We are concerned because any increase in research and development will result in higher unemployment. Hon. Members opposite are the first to tell us that the unemployment rate is too high in Canada.

I would like him to deal with this problem, while we have to promote advanced technology and no one on this side of the House would deny it, we realize that this kind of development displaces people. Some machines used for forestry work, for example, take the place of 20 or 30 men; in logging camps where there used to be 200 men, they have been replaced by 25 equipment operators.

So, what does he intend to do to solve the problem of those people who will lose their jobs because of high tech? In conclusion, I would ask him to explain what he meant with regard to the forest industry, which was the main theme of his speech, when he condemned the federal government for doing nothing. First of all, is he aware that the forest industry comes under the jurisdiction—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order, please. I must interrupt the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary. The ten-minute period allowed for questions and comments has expired. We go back to the debate—

• (1710)

[English]

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the Hon. Member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. St. Germain) on his maiden speech here in the House of Commons and to share his kind words about his predecessor, to whom I often referred as a real rose and whose friendship I enjoyed in my short time here in the House. I also want to take this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, on the first occasion I have had to speak since you have been elevated to the position you now occupy, to congratulate you on your elevation and wish you well.

In reflecting upon the contents of the Speech from the Throne, I think it correctly addresses some of the concerns my constituents have for the securing of peace and, of course, prosperity. I will have some comments on the issue of world peace, Mr. Speaker, but suffice it to say that today we as Members of Parliament, indeed as Canadians, were treated to a debate, or better still a statement of policy, issued by the three political Parties that now occupy the House of Commons. We heard from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), from the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Mulroney) and from the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent). I thought all the speeches were eloquent, but in particular, perhaps because of my biases, the Prime Minister's speech and, more important, the initiatives he has taken in the last number of months to try to inject some political energy into this very important issue. We have seen his initiatives in visiting other countries and debating and discussing this issue with world leaders, both privately as well as at various conferences. There is the role that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) has played in initiating and organizing some of these events. We also have the Prime Minister's address to the United Nations. This demonstration of political will is extremely important and I think Canadians generally, regardless of political affiliation or historical political beliefs, are coming to understand that the securing of world peace is a goal shared by all Canadians. I think we wish our Prime Minister well in the many months ahead in trying to achieve a better dialogue between the East and the West.

Security of prosperity, Mr. Speaker, is also of real concern to the constituents I represent. The Speech from the Throne had a number of measures, only some of which I will refer to. In particular, Mr. Speaker, the one which I believe is of great importance to the people I represent is that of medicare. Much has been said and much will be said about medicare, but to me medicare is the real cornerstone of the Canadian fabric. It is nice to be able to go to any part of Canada and receive medical services, unlike other countries. My constituents, whether a steel worker, a miner, a nurse, a teacher, or a professional, have all come to understand and appreciate the money that Governments, both federal and provincial, have given for medicare. I think they share the goals and objectives contained in the new Canada Health Act. Yes, there will be debate concerning the changing of a sentence, indeed a paragraph, of the new Act, but I think overall the pith and substance is something that my constituents will approve overwhelmingly.

The Speech from the Throne talks about a partnership of business, government, labour and the Canadian people. That is very important if we are to obtain the goal of security of prosperity. Governments, whether federal, provincial or municipal, cannot create economic wealth in this country to provide the thousands of jobs so desperately needed. They must act in co-operation with all levels of government, as well as business and labour. We cannot afford the luxury of saying it is the provinces' fault. Labour cannot afford the luxury of saying, "Well, it is business". Likewise, business cannot afford the luxury of saying that the problems could be eradicated if only labour would be more co-operative. That easy way out, Mr. Speaker, is a luxury that Members of Parliament and the Canadian people will not allow to go on any longer. There must be the will by governments of all persuasion, in all regions, there must be the will by labour, organized and unorganized, there must be the will by business, both big and small, to address the issues affecting Canadians in every region of this country.

From a regional point of view, Mr. Speaker, you could argue that one region has benefited more than another. But the 1.5 million unemployed just want a job so that they can have the amenities many of us take for granted.

The Speech from the Throne also made reference to pensions for the elderly. I do not know if there is a Member in this House who would oppose allocating more money for the elderly. I do not think there would be a Member here who would oppose an increase in the GIS. The elderly are those Canadians who have suffered time and time again, some having gone through two world wars. I think it only appropriate that my Government, in the remaining months, if you will, or years of our mandate, should lend emphasis to expediting additional income for those Canadians in need. I welcome, as do my constituents, additional income for those Canadians.

The Speech from the Throne has several other aspects, Mr. Speaker. It made reference to the restructuring of the fisheries and to the energy policy in Canada. The restructuring of the fisheries in Atlantic Canada is important not only in Nova Scotia and Newfoundland, but indeed in all of Atlantic Canada. I think the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. De Bané) and the regional Minister from those Provinces have done well with their counterparts in the provincial Governments. In consultation with the fishermen and their organizations and with various groups of interested parties they have concluded agreements, which some Members may not fully appreciate or endorse, but it is a start, a renewal of an industry basic to developing and promoting the economy in Atlantic Canada. If the fisheries are not successful, the economy in Atlantic Canada will be wiped out completely.

Much has been said about the energy policy, some of it by the Leader of the Official Opposition in various speeches which I will not go into. In Calgary he makes one speech. He makes another speech when he is in Nova Scotia. When he is in Montreal he takes on another issue. The energy policies of this Governmeent, Mr. Speaker, have added substantially to the benefits of Atlantic Canadians and my constituents. If it were not for the agreement and understanding between the Government of Nova Scotia and the Government of Canada with regard to offshore, the economy of Nova Scotia would be completely depressed.

The Premier of that Province has no political affiliation with our Government. In fact, he is more blue than most Members on that side of the House. It is he and the present provincial Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources who have gone around the Province of Nova Scotia and alluded there to the benefits that the national energy policy has bestowed upon the people of Atlantic Canada. I believe it would be safe to say that in excess of $2 billion has gone into the economy of Atlantic Canada as a result of the national energy policy.

The Speech from the Throne goes on to make reference to the new Department of Regional Industrial Expansion. This Department, I trust, will be able to co-ordinate the efforts and to address industrial expansion in the various regions of Canada in a very comprehensive way. I have some concerns about that, Mr. Speaker, which have been voiced by other Members, both in committee and here in the House of Commons. I will be watching very carefully how the developments in the various regions take place. I will be watching with a careful eye to make sure that the goals and aspirations which were previously those of DRIE are re-established and put forward more vigorously in Atlantic Canada. If that is not forthcoming, I will not pontificate as do Members opposite. We will change that policy and that Department. Liberals are not like Tories. Tories talk a lot but do very little. They talk about social programs, defence and balancing the budget. In one part of the country, whatever the audience may be, they argue they are going to maintain social programs. In another part of the country they say that national defence ought to be a priority and therefore we must increase our expenditures. In still another part of the country they talk about balancing the budget. How does one maintain the social programs which this Government has put into place and made so effective and popular among the masses, increase substantially the budget of the Department of National Defence to God knows how many billions of dollars, and at the same time balance the budget?

Mr. Malone: By calling an election.

Mr. Dingwall: That is what I would call the Tory voodoo type of economics, Mr. Speaker. They are not well thought out but they are talked about a lot. The Conservative Party has a word for every constituency and region in the country. It is whatever they want to hear. Unlike the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party, they are there by themselves. In Calgary, the Leader of the Official Opposition talked about no back-in provisions in the national energy policy and no more PIP grants. He went to Halifax, Nova Scotia and had a different story to tell. He is probably only there for a few more months because we will get rid of him in the next general election, no doubt about that. He tells the press there that he does not want to make a comment on that right now. I suppose he says to the Conservatives in that part of Atlantic Canada that the PIP grants are great. It is a policy which goes back and forth.

There is a great deal more that I would like to say. I would like to make reference specifically to the new Ministry of Youth. I am happy that the Government has taken this initiative. I would think Members opposite would probably want to applaud the Government. However, in their usual state of flux and with their usual negative posturing, they do not want to believe for a moment that there are policies and ministries created to work toward the positive aspects of the youth of our country. It is very important that on February 6 the new Minister of State for Youth (Mrs. Hervieux-Payette) said the following in a speech:

> I shall certainly need the co-operation of one and all, as I entertain no illusions that the means at my disposal will alone have some magical power to solve all the problems of young Canadians. Yet I shall muster all the determination I am credited—or blamed—to possess, to carry out this mandate; I intend to promote any approach likely to improve the lot of young people, to facilitate their access to all the resources that are available now and, in general, to act as the catalyst for a brighter future increasingly within their reach.

I believe that statement by the new Minister of State for Youth is extremely important, not only for this generation but for generations to come. 1985 will be the International Year of Youth and Canadians from across the country, particularly young Canadians, will want to participate in that very important year. We, as politicians in Government and Opposition, have to address in debate and committee, on the political hustings, if you will, the issues that face the young people of this country.

Unemployment is at a cancerous rate, Mr. Speaker. Issues of education are also very important. The family unit too is extremely important. These are all issues affecting the young people of this country. I am confident that this new Ministry, particularly with the spirit and enthusiasm that the new Minister has shown in providing leadership in this portfolio, will address many of these issues and that action will take place shortly thereafter. I hope Members of the Opposition who are shouting across the way will be serious and will put forward their suggestions in a reasonable and sensible way so that we can have a real dialogue on some of those major issues. When it is the Party of doom and gloom, what else can one expect from Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition?

• (1730)

I have learned during my short term—

Mr. Malone: No, you haven't.

Mr. Dingwall: —as a Member of Parliament—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): I regret to interrupt the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary but his time has expired.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member had a great deal to say about fisheries and peace. With respect to West Coast fisheries, why can West Coast fishermen and communities not receive the same kind of consideration that was given on the East Coast, such as the agreements, consultation and the funding which he mentioned?

I would like to point out several areas where his Government could perhaps do something constructive. The first is the protection of the resource base. Second, the Government should provide an effective consultative process without the unilateral action mode it has used. Third, it could do something constructive about the fleet reduction and fleet restructuring program. The fourth point is that government administered costs, such as energy costs and interest rates, have been driving up the costs for fishermen. Fishermen are being driven out at every turn by rising government costs. The fifth point is that intergovernmental relations are so poor in that region that the federal Government does not operate effectively in enforcing the laws that exist. The sixth area of concern is the protection of the economic base of fishing-dependent coastal communities. The Department is ready to write off those communities. Finally, there is a reign of terror against fishermen on the West Coast by chartered banks, which are seizing their vessels and their homes and squeezing the guarantors. I recently called this to the attention of the Government, but as yet there has been no action.

If I provide the Hon. Member with correspondence showing that banks are in fact terrorizing fishermen, denying them civil rights and access to forms of remedy, would he be prepared to approach the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde), the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. De Bané), to determine if at least in this one area in which the banks are driving these people into the ground something could be done? Would he be prepared to join with me and other Members on this side to try to convince the Minister of Finance to take some action to limit the action being taken by the most powerful organization in this country against the fishermen?

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member stated that he would like to see some equal sharing, if you will, of the benefits. He talked about the restructuring in Atlantic Canada and his concern about the fishery on the West Coast. I want to say to him quite clearly that the Government has taken much action with regard to the fishermen on the West Coast. Need I remind him of the inflation rate, which has been brought down substantially as a result of our six and five program? Is he willing to stand in his place and say that it has had no effect on fishermen in his constituency or on the West Coast? Does he want to say that interest rates, which have been substantially reduced, in fact halved, have had no effect on the fishermen in Atlantic Canada as well as on the West Coast? The answer is very obvious yes, they have had a very positive effect on the fishermen on the West Coast.

The Hon. Member asks what I would do if he were to provide me with certain correspondence. I share similar concerns with him about banks or financial institutions terrorizing individuals, as he says. But I would like to see that documentation. I have also had some instances where this has happened with my constituents. But we found redress in a number of ways by bringing it to the attention of the various authorities within the various banking communities.

Yes, I would be prepared to look at the matter raised. I will take it under advisement to see what I can do subsequently, because I am not aware of all the details contained therein.

Finally, the Hon. Member asked if our Government will take certain specific actions with respect to the West Coast fishery. Just yesterday the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans provided an opportunity for the fishermen's coalition to meet with him and to present their views. I think he said very effectively in the House on a number of occasions that he will give serious consideration to their suggestions. Hopefully, action will take place shortly thereafter.

Mr. Chuck Cook (North Vancouver-Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, as this eighth day of debate on the Throne Speech comes to a close, I would like to say a few words about Throne Speeches in general and this one in particular. Speeches from the Throne are somewhat like the streets of Hades. They are filled with good intentions.

When I read a Throne Speech that is cynically written, with the view that none of its proposals will ever take place, I find it to be a despicable act by any government. There is no Member in the House, no one in the press gallery or anyone else, who would suggest that it is anything but a charade of eight days of speeches that have been made here. The Throne Speech was an attempt to fool all of the people all of the time, but it does not work.

It would have been more realistic if the Governor General, when introducing the Throne Speech, had said that since the Government can remain in power for a year at most, even though its mandate ends on February 18, 1984, by tradition, it is proposing these last few measures which it will attempt to achieve. But the Government did not do that. It brought in a Throne Speech which contained ten years of possible legislation. As one of the members of the press gallery stated, after hearing the Throne Speech, "If dogs and cats had a vote, there would have been something in there for the dogs and cats as well".

We all realize that a throne is basically nothing more than ministerial ventriloquism. If one were to read earlier Throne Speeches to see the promises, undertakings and philosophies contained therein and then review them a few years later, it would be found that very few of those goals were achieved.

A Throne Speech is essentially a futile exercise. In my view, spending eight days debating the Throne Speech in the House of Commons is a waste of the taxpayers' dollars and a waste of the time of the House of Commons, which could be used for better purposes in terms of accomplishing something for Canadians.

At present we have at least seven reports on parliamentary reform. I doubt that any of these reports addresses the concept of an eight day Throne Speech debate. The reason is that these eight days of debate provide an opportunity for many back-bench Members to make speeches and provide material for their householders. I suggest that the various speeches could be called "hyperbole for householders". That is the effect of these eight days of debate. I find that offensive as well.

I came here to work for the people of North Vancouver-Burnaby. I do the best I can. I did not come here to listen to self-serving, self-satisfying and self-deceiving members of the Government Party attempting to justify the unjustifiable. I came here to help do something for the country.

I suggest that anyone who watches the House of Commons debates regularly on television would find, by this time, such a Throne Speech debate quite unacceptable. In such a debate the rule of relevancy disappears entirely. There has been very little relevancy to the Throne Speech in most of the speeches from all sides during the eight-day period. I also find that rather unfortunate. A debate in the House should be relevant to the subject. The Throne Speech is not. Soon we will spend another six days doing exactly the same thing in the budget debate where the rule of relevancy will be totally ignored by practically every speaker on every side. Do not misunderstand me, Mr. Speaker. I do not criticize only the Government for this. I criticize all Members of the House of Commons, including myself. Surely to goodness, with the intelligence on all sides of the House something could be done where we do not waste half a month on this kind of useless exercise. Unfortunately, much as I would like Members on the Government side to hear what is said by the Opposition, I would also like them to consider it carefully. When things are presented to the Government that make sense, have the opposition be given credit for it and see that what it is is done for the benefit of the Canadian people. But that never takes place. I honestly have yet to find an occasion when any speech delivered in this House of Commons has had any effect on the Government side at all, or frankly has been listened to with any degree of respect or silence. A little heckling is in order. That merely adds to the sparkle, the salt and pepper of a speech. But not to listen, not to hear, not to consider because the speech did not come from the Government benches, is a terrible offence to the Canadian people who sent us here and whom all of us collectively represent.

I will take the last two minutes to point out a couple of things I totally deplore which are relevant to the discussion on the Throne Speech. The Throne Speech is one of the most cynical things I have ever seen, totally cynical.

We have 1.5 million Canadians out of work, a 50 per cent increase since the Government took office four years ago. There are over 500,000 Canadian youths unemployed and with no hope of employment. In British Columbia the unemployment rate today is over 14 per cent. Our national unemployment rate, which is perhaps the severest indictment of all against this particular Government, will remain at over 12 per cent this year. Over 600,000 Canadians, 65 years of age or older, are living in poverty. A Government that can stay in office and can go past its four-year mandate with those kinds of statistics facing it is not a Government that deserves to remain in office. It is not a Government that deserves to have the right to make laws and to operate this country. I only hope the Canadian people realize just how miserable, sad, bad and devoid of ideas this Government is, as those of us here who have to work opposite know.

Time is running out and I say only to the Canadian people who may have followed this debate that if this does not give them proof enough why these rascals should be thrown out, then perhaps people do deserve the Government they get, but nobody deserves this present Government.

May I call it 5.45 p.m., Mr. Speaker?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): It being 5.45 p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 42(5), to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith the question necessary to dispose of the main motion.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Is it carried?

Some Hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Forrestall: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Carried on division.

Motion (Mr. Burghardt) agreed to.

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council) moved:

That the Address be engrossed and presented to His Excellency the Governor General by Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am sorry but I was in the lobby. I heard the Chair say that the motion was carried on division. I heard the Chair say, "Carried on division". Am I confirmed in that?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Yes.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, we are happy the motion is carried, but quite frankly we thought it was carried, period. It was after you said "carried" that somebody shouted, "On division".

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Pinard: If the Opposition wants a recorded division, we are ready to have one, but we are happy the motion is carried. It is because I took it for granted that the motion was carried that I was able to move the motion I just moved.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): The Chair heard "on division", and I remember saying as occupant of the chair that the motion was carried on division. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion moved by the President of the Privy Council?

Mr. Nielsen: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Carried on division.

Motion (Mr. Pinard) agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): It being 5.50 p.m., this House stands ajourned until tomorrow at eleven o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 5.50 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

THE LATE HON. EARL ROWE AND THE LATE SENATOR ALLISTER GROSART

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the House has learned with sorrow of the death of the hon. Earl Rowe, who was the former Lieutenant Governor of Ontario, and a former Member of this House. With his death another link is severed with the political generation of George Drew and the late Right Hon. John Diefenbaker.

Earl Rowe was appointed Lieutenant Governor by Prime Minister Diefenbaker and had served loyally under both Mr. Diefenbaker and the Hon. George Drew. He was a Minister without Portfolio, in fact the youngest one of the Government of R. B. Bennett. Hon. Earl Rowe was a Member of this House for the riding of South Simcoe in 1932, and for Dufferin-Simcoe for 38 years, with a brief interruption when he took over the Ontario leadership.

Our sympathy goes out to his son, Bill, and to his daughter, Jean Casselman Wadds, a former Member of this House. In fact the late Hon. Earl Rowe and Jean Casselman Wadds were the first father-daughter team in the House of Commons. She, of course, is a former High Commissioner to London who is now serving on the Macdonald Royal Commission.

Although it is not usual, Mr. Speaker, I think we should mark as well the passing of Senator Allister Grosart, lover of literature, life, good talk, and good books. He was a student of Shakespeare, and a firm upholder of parliamentary democracy. He was the Speaker of the Senate in the Government of the Right Hon. Joe Clark. His awareness of the spirit of Parliament and his love of the parliamentary institution were instrumental in gaining the acclaim of members of the other place.

With his departure yet another link with the Diefenbaker era is severed. Canadians will mourn his loss. Parliament has lost a defender. His friends will mourn a loyal, urbane, and distinguished comrade. His widow, Thelma, and family of three daughters, have our heartfelt sympathy in their bereavement.

Hon. Herb Gray (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Government and the Members on the Government side of the House, I would like to express our sorrow at the passing of the Hon. Earl Rowe. Mr. Rowe had a very distinguished career in municipal, provincial, and federal politics. He served in this House for some 38 years, that period interrupted only briefly when he served as Leader of the Ontario Conservative Party. He had a distinguished record of service as well as Lieutenant Governor of Ontario. During his period of service in the House of Commons he was a Minister in the Cabinet of R. B. Bennett.

He had another very important aspect to his life which touched upon my own community of Windsor. He made a marvellous contribution to the harness racing industry. He and his son Bill founded the Windsor Raceway, which is a very important local industry in my own community.

• (1110)

On behalf of the Government and Members on this side of the House generally, I would like to express sincere sympathy to his son Bill, and his daughter Jean Casselman Wadds, a former colleague in the House of Commons, at this time of sorrow. Certainly Earl Rowe will be long remembered as part of the contemporary history of our country.

On behalf of the Government I would also like to associate ourselves with the words of sorrow expressed on the passing of the Honourable Allister Grosart.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to associate the New Democratic Party with the comments made on the passing of both Earl Rowe and Senator Grosart.

I served in the Ontario Legislature during the time Earl Rowe was Speaker of the Legislature. I remember him quite well. He had an infectious sense of humour which enlightened occasions over which he presided. On behalf of our Party we would want to convey our sympathy to the family, Mrs. Wadds and his son Bill.

With regard to Senator Grosart, I recall upon arriving in the House of Commons being summoned to Senator Grosart's office for a discussion about one of his pet projects. He was very interested in the whole question of science and technology, and asked that I join with him on a committee that he was perpetuating, if not forming, to try to encourage dialogue between Members of Parliament and those in the scientific and technical communities. I want to say on behalf of my colleagues, and on my own behalf, how sorry we are to hear of his passing.

Tributes

THE LATE YURI ANDROPOV, PRESIDENT OF THE UNION OF SOVIET SOCIALIST REPUBLICS

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I want to say that the Government was saddened to learn of the death of President Yuri Andropov, of the U.S.S.R.

Mr. Andropov devoted his life to his country. His term as President was short. But in that brief period, he made a significant contribution as a man of vision, a man who worked to improve the conditions of life for his people, a man of modesty and dedication.

The Government of Canada extends its sincere condolences to the Government and people of the Soviet Union, and to the family of the late President.

We also take this opportunity to reaffirm Canada's strong desire to work with the Soviet Union to strengthen the bonds of co-operation and friendship which are essential to the future of mankind. This is a time when leaders of all countries must renew their efforts to meet the challenges of peace. President Andropov understood the importance of that high duty, and we are confident his successors will carry his work further. I can assure the House that Canada will pursue its efforts in this essential task.

Mr. Brian Mulroney (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I join with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in expressing to the Government of the Soviet Union and to the family our condolences on the sad and particularly untimely passing of President Andropov. I had the opportunity earlier this morning to do so in a personal way.

I join with the Prime Minister in his fitting tribute to a most important figure. Particularly at a time of tension and instability, a loss of this dimension is to be profoundly regretted.

I share as well the Prime Minister's view and hope that his successor who emerges from the leadership of the Soviet Union will continue in genuine efforts to do that which we all must do as best we can, particularly from the leadership of such an influential nation, to commit ourselves to the reduction of tensions and to an honorable formula which will allow for the reduction and, hopefully, the elimination of nuclear arms. We convey to the family and his Government our deep condolences.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my colleagues I want to join in the expression of condolence made both by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Mulroney). I think that at the time Mr. Andropov took over office as head of the Government of the Soviet Union, many in the world hoped that this would signal the beginning of a new era, and that this would, in fact, result ultimately in a lessening of tensions. I also think, in looking back, his prolonged illness would not have allowed for the achieving of the goals which he himself had expressed were the goals he had set, or allowed, for the achieving of the wishes and desires of so many people around the world.

Therefore, on behalf of my colleagues I want to join with both the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition in expressing our regret at his passing, and I ask that our regrets be conveyed both to his family and to the Government of the Soviet Union.

Mr. Speaker: At this point in our proceedings, the House would normally proceed to Oral Questions without statements being made under the provisions of Standing Order 21. What is the disposition of the House?

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I think you will find that there is disposition to go to statements and the usual Question Period following.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, if that is the desire of the Opposition, we can live with it, but we would have preferred to go right away to Question Period.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, I think in the spirit of generosity, surely we would accept that if the Government can live with it and both opposition Parties desire that we go to statements, then we should do so.

Mr. Speaker: We will have statements under Standing Order 21 until 11.30 a.m., and then we will have 45 minutes of Question Period.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S.O. 21

WILD LIFE

BRITISH COLUMBIA WOLF POPULATION

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, for several weeks I have quietly watched the build up of publicity concerning the wolf population in British Columbia. There has been a campaign by some misguided individuals and groups to discredit B.C. Wildlife Officers and supporters in their efforts to control the wolf population in the Province.

The fact of the matter is that in parts of my constituency of Cariboo-Chilcotin and in that of my colleague, the Hon. Member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle), the wolf population is out of control. People who live in these areas and see firsthand the devastation caused by wolf packs have for some time been warning our provincial Government that effective control measures must be implemented. Provincial Wildlife Conservation Officers are now doing exactly that. It is not a pleasant task, but it is the only alternative to counter the present level of slaughter of valuable wildlife and domestic animals. Certainly predators take the weak and sick, but when wolves reach their present population levels, the kills are indiscriminate, unsustainable, and thus unacceptable.

We in B.C. are capable of managing our own affairs and do not need the assistance of the likes of Paul Watson, and paperback entrepreneur "Hardly Knowit". I would respectfully request that outsiders consider the deer, sheep, moose, and caribou. They, too, have a right to live.

INDUSTRY

BEEF GRADING REGULATIONS—EFFECT ON JEWISH DIETARY PRECEPTS

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Mr. Speaker, as a result of recent changes in beef grading regulations, the Canadian meat industry now separates front quarters from hind quarters by ribbing beef carcasses between the twelfth and thirteenth ribs. This new practice causes real difficulty for orthodox members of the Jewish community. As a result of their dietary laws they may not use any meat associated with the twelfth rib because of the internal lard involved. Consequently, they can use neither part at the moment. A small number of abattoirs specialize in and service 90 per cent of the kosher trade. An exemption to allow ribbing between the eleventh and twelfth ribs of carcasses intended for kosher use would solve the problem.

I recognize that a dual grading system may cause some administrative problems, but sensitivity to community needs should always be more important than administrative simplicity. In addition, there would appear to be significant export opportunities for the resulting front quarters. For either reason, sensitivity or trade, or both, the exemption is justified in my view, and it has been asked for. I believe the Government should move on this matter as quickly as possible.

CANADIAN UNIVERSITY SERVICE OVERSEAS

TRIBUTE TO EFFORTS AND ACHIEVEMENTS

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Mr. Speaker, the CUSO organization has been in existence in Canada since 1961. During that period of time about 9,000 young Canadians have gone to various countries around the world where they have assisted in the process of development.

Recently a book written by Branca Lapajne has been published criticizing CUSO and its work.

CUSO has worked in left-wing and in right-wing countries. It has had its successes and its failures but, more than anything else, it has built up a great world of experience. It has built up an experience about what is development.

Development is not a movement by entrepreneurs, whether they are individuals or multinational corporations which go into a country to make a fistful of dollars. Development is about people—a freeing of people from the constraints of poverty, hunger, and disease. Development is also political. When one goes to a country as a volunteer, one can accept the status quo, or one can accept the forces of change, or one can do nothing. All of these are political activities. For a people who have been slaves, oppressed, exploited and humiliated by groups within their own country or by economic, political or military forces from without, development also means liberation.

Liberation means a process by which a people have more control of their own affairs within their historic and cultural context and realities. Any action which prohibits this is not development.

I would simply like to say that I am supporting CUSO and everyone who has worked in it, so that the process of development will continue.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REMEMBRANCE OF POLISH TROOPS IN BATTLE FOR MONTE CASSINO

Mr. Stanley Hudecki (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as the ceremonies marking the fortieth anniversary of the Normandy invasion are gaining momentum, they must not blot out the courageous but bloody prelude which took place in the Italian campaign when Allied armies directed their attack at the underbelly of Europe, diverting the destroying enemy forces to pave the way for the crucial Normandy invasion.

It must be particularly remembered that one of the most heroic battles was that fought at Monte Cassino in which the Allies, including Canadian and Polish soldiers, made great sacrifices against the massive resistance of Nazi armaments amid the tortuous terrain.

It is a concern to me that the memory of that gallant and historic stand of the Poles on behalf of the Allies at Monte Cassino is fading from the memory of this generation, as Poland has been forced to assume the role of a Warsaw Pact country, a role which has been thrust upon this formerly democratic country by an unfortunate set of circumstances evolving out of decisions made in Yalta during World War II.

It was the privilege of the Polish Army to overcomme the mountainous fortress at Monte Cassino designed by the Nazis to protect Rome. The loss of life was costly, with 1,000 killed. A mountainside memorial stands there engraved: "We Polish soldiers, for our freedom and yours have given our souls to God, our bodies to the soil of Italy, and our hearts to Poland". Their contribution to the cause of freedom, which has been sadly denied them since World War II, must not be forgotten during this anniversary year of the Battle of Monte Cassino.

ALLOCATION OF JOB-CREATION FUNDS IN HAMILTON-WENTWORTH

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my riding of Hamilton-Wentworth and I, as its Progressive Conservative Member of Parliament, have been fingered on a Liberal list of Tory constituencies which have received federal Government job-creation moneys.

The Liberal strategy to counteract bad publicity about pork-barrelling goes further. Liberals are now attacking anyone on this side who complains about government grants to our ridings, as being against job creation. This attempt to smear Conservative MPs in order to put the lid on the pork-barrel is not only despicable; it is a sign of how corrupt this Liberal administration has become. It is tragicomical when it comes to the case of the expansion of the Hamilton Civic Airport.

Fact—the $45 million to $50 million airport expansion listed for my riding has been a federal government priority for more than a decade.

Fact—the construction start-up, expropriation of lands in the runway path, indeed the whole operation, was approved by all levels of government, and began at least two years ago.

Fact—the strongest proponents of this expansion have included the entire Hamilton City Council, and most of its members live in the three Liberal-held ridings—Hamilton East, Hamilton West, and Lincoln.

I find it almost impossible to believe that a desperate Liberal Government would reach back over the years to associate me with its current pork-barrelling operation. If the $45 million was such a generous grant to a Tory riding, how come I never heard about it until after the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) took all the credit?

THE LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, Canadians have heard an awful lot since June of last year about the "changing Face" of the Conservative Party. To my mind, one would be hard pressed to find a more apt description.

We awoke this morning to be confronted, or should I say affronted, with yet another example of two-faced Tory duplicity. It strikes me as somewhat perverse that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mulroney) can say in apparent clear conscience so many different things in such a short period of time. How are Canadians to trust a man who on May 9, 1983, said that public servants "never did a day's work in their lives" and, on February 9, 1984, that the Ottawa bureaucracy is "among the finest" in the world?

He himself must get dizzy when he promises on the one hand "to cut everywhere and under every circumstance", and on the other to ensure a "well-paid and well-looked after" public service. If the Leader of the Opposition were promoting a detergent or a breakfast cereal rather than a political philosophy, he would surely be charged with false advertising.

The Leader of the Opposition's self-serving comments at a gathering of Tories in the riding of Ottawa-Carleton last night provide further proof that he is simply the head reptile amongst a party of political chameleons.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member's language is hardly parliamentary. The Chair has to say that the language in the last sentence is not parliamentary, and would ask the Hon. Member to withdraw.

Some Hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: Referring to someone as a "head reptile" is hardly parliamentary.

Some Hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Speaker: Will the Hon. Member withdraw that word?

Mr. Evans: What word, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: The word "reptile", referring to an Hon. Member.

Mr. Evans: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw the word "reptile".

OLYMPIC GAMES

TRIBUTE TO CANADIAN HOCKEY TEAM

Mr. Gerry St. Germain (Mission-Port Moody): Mr. Speaker, all Canadians can take a great deal of pride in the performance of our Olympic hockey team. Despite much talk of the demise of our national game, the Canadian spirit of dedication, hard work and patriotism, that typifies so many young Canadians, is still there.

Certainly two games are a long way from winning a gold medal, and certainly there are some huge tests ahead, but let us enjoy their performance and wish them well. This was the team that was written off by so many in the world. Let us all learn from their initiative and dedication. They are a group of Canadians from all across Canada, of both official languages, working together and achieving success. Surely the effort and the sacrifice they make should inspire all Canadians, and most of all the Hon. Members of this House, to work together to represent all of Canada better.

I have seen the dedication and sacrifice that take place in the likes of Craig Redmond, a member of the team, whom I saw first-hand as he played in the same hockey association as my son. I also know that this dedication and sacrifice reflect all the youth of today as they strive for success in this rapidly changing world. Our greatest resource is our youth. They typify the Canadian spirit, win, lose, or draw, in the Olympics. They are the future of Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

NEED FOR MULTICULTURAL PROGRAMS

Mr. Laverne Lewycky (Dauphin-Swan River): Mr. Speaker, the Radio Quebec Planete Series on television is a model of multiculturalism programming by public mass media that should be emulated by the CBC. For several years Radio Quebec has been showing ethno-cultural programs in the language of the ethno-cultural group, with French sub-titles, at prime time on Saturday nights. This program is repeated the following week at a different time. I urge the Minister of State for Multiculturalism (Mr. Collenette) and the Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox) to impress upon the CBC the necessity of following suit, fostering a truly multiculturalism policy and incorporating similar multiculturalism programming for English-speaking Canadians.

French-speaking Canadians, thanks to Radio Quebec, have seen documentaries on the Ukrainian holocaust and the Ukrainian artist, William Kurelek. The English CBC network has failed to produce similar high quality programs. There was no reason, for example, why we could not have had a half-hour program on Chinese-Canadians, in Chinese, during their New Year, or a documentary on Asian-Canadians, with English sub-titles, on prime time CBC. The time has come for the CBC to incorporate a truly multiculturalism policy.

SPORTS POOL

PROPOSED FEDERAL SPORTS POOL

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, soon a sports fan may predict that the Edmonton Oilers will beat the Montreal Canadians 12-0 and, on the basis of his intellect and intuition, win a sum of money in a federal sports pool. Some may cheer the federal Government for putting more sport into sport through a new sports pool corporation, but I denounce their money-grabbing ambitions that causes them to break a signed agreement, ignore the law, and tax the poor. In 1979 the federal Government signed an agreement with the provinces that it would stay out of lotteries. The provinces in return paid the federal Government $34 million in 1983. Now the feds claim the sports pool is not a lottery.

The feds are the same people who seasonally adjust the unemployed, fabricate ghost letters about the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mulroney) which they cannot substantiate, and spend $200 million of public money entrusted to Parliament to save the political life of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde). If a sports pool isn't a lottery, then Jello isn't dessert, Alan Fotheringham isn't nasty, and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) is a professor of English.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Malone: The Grits want your money, so Revenue Canada does not have "quotas", it has "objectives", and, upon being discovered, "objectives" become "targets", and when "targets" were discovered they suddenly became "goals", all of which are quotas. We still have quotas; they just do not use their maiden name.

They have an agreement not to enter lotteries so they enter the lotteries but call the lotteries "sports pools". The "jobless" become the "disadvantaged", and blatant Liberal "patronage projects" become "fast-tracking". It's 1984 double-speak. The rhymelesser the timelesser, the worser the free verser.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member, but his time has expired.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

SPECIAL EMPLOYMENT INITIATIVES PROGRAM—ROLE OF PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister and it concerns the Special Employment Initiatives Program which is, in reality, a $150 million political slush fund under which the Government is handing out grants on a selective basis. We have documents, Sir, which show that this program is manipulated by the Prime Minister's Office, not carried out in the public domain as are other job-creation programs. Would the Prime Minister confirm that indeed his Office oversees this program, that it is his Office which is manipulating it, and that the hallmarks of this whole sleazy operation are secrecy and confidentiality, as these documents show?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

Miss MacDonald: It is interesting to see that the Prime Minister does not even acknowledge what is going on in his own Office.

MINISTER'S STATEMENT

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, last November the Minister of Employment and Immigration made this comment about the Special Employment Initiatives Program:

> I think there is only really one thing I can say to you: When you receive the criteria, if you believe there are some useful projects in your area which would meet the criteria, you send me the suggestions and I will consider them.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration said that on November 29. These documents show that all or most of the $150 million in this program, was committed months earlier. Will the Prime Minister say why the Minister of Employment and Immigration was saying something about a program when his Office, and his political Ministers, had already committed most of the money?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I fail to see the thrust of the question, Mr. Speaker. The Minister was telling members of his own Caucus to use programs which had—

Mr. Gray: Parliamentary committee.

Mr. Trudeau: That is even better—of a parliamentary committee to use programs which have been publicly announced in the Budget, and which are under way. We know that certain members of the Opposition have used these programs. They obviously were not hidden. We know the Hon. Member for Joliette has used these programs. I have seen where the Hon. Member for Kingston and the Islands suggested that the reason why her Party did not get on with these programs earlier was because during the Summer it was otherwise occupied and did not get around to it.

These programs are public. These programs are available, and Ministers are suggesting to members of a parliamentary committee that they should use the rights of access they have to these programs. What is so shocking?

TIMING OF DECISION ON APPROVED PROJECTS

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): What the Prime Minister continues to try to do is to hide the $150 million slush fund which he and his political Ministers are dispensing, and trying to confuse the job-creation programs which are in the public domain with it.

I would like to tell him that this document shows that the Prime Minister's Office circulated lists of projects for review, and that decisions on these projects were made as of last June. The Minister of Employment and Immigration asked Members to provide input after he gave them the criteria in February. How can the Prime Minister describe as anything but corrupt a method whereby he and his political Ministers make decisions on a program in June of one year, and then go through the façade of asking Members of Parliament to provide input some eight months later? What kind of a system is that?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am sorry, I have not noted the dates exactly. The Hon. Member is complaining because Ministers and Members are using a program over a period of months some many months later. What is wrong with that as long as there are funds still available? Why do the members of the Opposition not avail themselves of these funds if they are still available? Who will reproach them for availing themselves of funds which are still available? Perhaps their constituents will reproach them for their tardiness, but if the funds are available in order to be spent to create jobs for the jobless, what is the great magic in the calendar dates which the Hon. Member has put forward?

CONTROL OVER PROGRAM

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, we really have a problem here. The Prime Minister tells us that the program was public, but on November 17, 1982, Mr. Speaker, there were a series of questions on the Order Paper which were never answered.

The Prime Minister will know that we have in our possession a document which puts the control of this program clearly in his Office. Can he tell the House of Commons why, for this particular $150 million, it was felt necessary that the Prime Minister's Office control the dispensation of the funds in a non-public way, in a way that did not allow Members of Parliament to participate, and in a way that did not make it clear to Canadians where the funds were going? Why did the Prime Minister's Office choose to exercise control over this particular $150 million a year program?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I must begin by saying that I do not know what document the Hon. Members opposite are talking about. I am sure some piece of paper exists wherein people in my Office are encouraging Members of Parliament—preferably, I hope, Liberals—to use a program which has been announced in two Budgets. If my memory is correct, the first $150 million was announced in the Budget of June, 1982, and the second $150 million was announced in the Budget of April, 1983. Now we have the great scandal, Mr. Speaker, of the Prime Minister's Office—which is attached to a Liberal Prime Minister—telling these Members to hustle and use these programs which have been publicly announced. I would hope the Office of the Leader of the Opposition, which is paid for at public expense, and which costs—

Mr. Turner: Over $1 million a year.

Mr. Trudeau: —over $1 million a year—I would hope that he would see that his own officials—

Mr. Nielsen: What is your budget?

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andre: That is only 10 per cent of his vacation budget.

Mr. Hees: It was to pay for your last trip.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I was in front of a parliamentary committee a few months ago answering questions on the size of my Office. I indicated that it had reduced in size. Since the Right Hon. Member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark), as the then Prime Minister, ran the Prime Minister's Office, my Office has shrunk in size.

An Hon. Member: But increased in quality.

Mr. McDermid: Tell us about the PCO. Tell us where you moved them?

Mr. Trudeau: As one of my colleagues says, it has shrunk in size and increased in quality. That is certain, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Mulroney: Jim Coutts will never forget that.

Mr. Trudeau: And to prove that it has increased in quality—

An Hon. Member: It is of poorer quality than ever.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Well, I suggest to the Hon. Member who asked the question that his colleagues are not interested in an answer.

Mr. Dick: You forgot what he asked.

• (1140)

INVOLVEMENT OF PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): The basic question is why the Prime Minister will not come clean with the Canadian public and tell us why his Office wanted to control these projects. He indicated to the House that it is fairly normal. I should like to read a couple of quotes and ask the Prime Minister if this is normal. One indicates that it is presently unclear whether the cost of any resources required to implement the projects is to be taken from the $150 million or can be considered as additional to the $150 million, and that a representative of the Prime Minister's Office is to clarify the situation. There are many quotations similar to this, related to the confidentiality that must be maintained.

Mr. Speaker: Would the Hon. Member please ask the supplementary question?

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to ask whether the Prime Minister's office was playing politics with the lives of unemployed Canadians. Why was the Prime Minister's Office making first class unemployed Canadians in some regions and second class unemployed Canadians in other regions? Why is that a prime ministerial responsibility?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The Hon. Member quoted what I think are not very telling points. He alleges that the document says that we distinguish between the unemployed in some part of the country and other unemployed. Could he give that quotation please, or is he just making it up, as I suspect he is?

LISTING OF OPPOSITION MEMBERS' NAMES

Mr. Brian Mulroney (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am always ready to be of service to the Prime Minister. Two weeks ago he did not know how many unemployed there were in the country, and now he does not know how many people work in his office. The PMO in 1983-84, the PCO and the PFRO, whatever that is, and the rest of it, are going to spend $85.6 million, and they have 258,000 person years.

My question is the following. In light of the matter raised in a direct reference to the issue—

Just wait and see, they are next. We are going to get those guys from Quebec, every one.

[English]

In view of the questions raised by the Hon. Member for Kingston and the Islands, can the Prime Minister assure the House that within the last 72 hours no meetings were held by functionaries, political or otherwise, in his Office, who made lists of names of Members of the House who have been raising questions in regard to the special fund? Can he give us the assurance that no such lists were prepared on Members of the NDP and Members of the Opposition, and that he will return to his Office and terminate immediately any such activity and any individuals involved in it, because it has been going on?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I must tell the Leader of the Opposition that there is a distinction between the Prime Minister's Office, the Privy Council Office, and the Federal-Provincial Relations Office.

An Hon. Member: Not in your Government.

Mr. McLean: There used to be.

Mr. Trudeau: The Leader of the Opposition is making a very serious accusation. He is saying that the Privy Council Office is not an impartial office politically. He is saying it is the same as the Prime Minister's Office. I say he has made an unfounded statement and a shameful one that he should withdraw.

Some Hon. Members: Shame!

Some Hon. Members: Withdraw!

Mr. Speaker: I must point out to the Hon. Leader of the Opposition that this is the third questioner on his side, and until now the New Democratic Party has not had an opportunity. A supplementary question.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, it must be pretty shameful for the Prime Minister to be alarmed by it.

Some Hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Mulroney: He just had the temerity to stand there and say that he was speaking as a Liberal Prime Minister. What he has done is politicize the entire Public Service, and that is what is wrong with it.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: That is what he has been doing; he has been doing it all along.

Mr. Mulroney: The interests of the Liberal Party take precedence over the interests of ordinary Canadians, particularly the unemployed.

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE ON QUESTION OF LISTS

Mr. Brian Mulroney (Leader of the Opposition): I ask the Prime Minister to give Hon. Members of the House, members of the New Democratic Party and of this Party, his formal assurance that, in regard to questions raised by Hon. Members, no lists were compiled on Members with a view to abusing them and trying to intimidate them in the execution of their duties. I should like the Prime Minister to give us the assurance now, because such conduct is consistent with the kinds of activities we have been hearing about in the House.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: Come clean, Pierre!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I made a distinction between the Prime Minister's Office and I said I hoped that they are showing great concern for Liberals in this country. That is their job.

An Hon. Member: That is their job?

Mr. Mulroney: Their job is being fair. You are supposed to be the Prime Minister of this country.

Mr. Hees: You are supposed to be impartial.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Prime Minister has the floor.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I would hope that the Leader of the Opposition's Office is working for him and not for people on this side. If they are not I am sure he would fire them, because he has indicated a disposition to fire everybody in the Public Service who has been politicized. He says that we have politicized the entire Public Service. If that is his accusation, I suppose that he will fire the entire Public Service. He suspects them all of being servants of the Liberal Party, which is an absurd statement from the Leader of a responsible Party.

Mr. Nielsen: You have them all in the Crown corporations and the Senate.

Mr. Trudeau: We have an irresponsible Leader of maybe an irresponsible Opposition.

Mr. Hees: Tell us about the hit list, Pierre. Let us have the news about the hit list.

Mr. Trudeau: The Public Service of Canada serves the elected Government of this country.

Mr. Nielsen: I thought it served the people.

Mr. Trudeau: That happens to be Liberal now; it used to be Tory.

Mr. Hees: It is going to be Tory very soon.

Mr. Trudeau: It may be Tory again, but not the way the Leader of the Opposition is conducting his business.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deans: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The Right Hon. Prime Minister.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, it was pointed out that I did not answer the question. It is true. I am asked about lists—

Mr. Hees: Just give us the hit list, Pierre.

Mr. Trudeau: You have been hit in the head.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair has difficulty relating questions and answers. Hon. Members should reflect on what is happening to this Question Period which is becoming a series of minor debates, not questions and answers. The Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain has the floor.

Mr. Nystrom: With a sensible question.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, I guess this is what we get for $1 million. I do not want to be part of this. It sounds phoney to me.

Mr. McDermid: You never will be.

FINANCE

CORPORATE TAX CUTS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I want to put a question to the Minister of Finance. It has been widely reported from sources inside the Finance Department that the Government intends to give even larger tax breaks to the corporate sector next week, and in particular to increase the capital cost allowance and reduce the tax rates for lawyers and doctors. We already give something in the order of $10 billion per year to those same corporations. We have no evidence that it produces any single job anywhere in Canada. Will the Minister assure the House that he will take steps next week to stop this raid on the pockets of the average Canadian taxpayer and make sure that the corporations stop funding their operations out of tax giveaways that result in higher taxes for average Canadian taxpayers?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is a well known fact that before every Budget there are a number of stories in the press, most of them speculative.

Mr. Jarvis: Not the last time.

Mr. Lalonde: I would expect all of them are speculative, and generally most of them are wrong. I will take my friend's point of view as a representation in the preparation of the next Budget. He will have to reach his own conclusions when he has seen the Budget.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, I have already reached my conclusion.

CORPORATE AND PERSONAL TAXES

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): The Minister has frequently indicated that the reason he cannot provide the support he himself indicates is necessary for so many groups and individuals is because he does not know where to get money. I would point out to the Minister, indeed he knows it already, that as a percentage of total government revenues, corporation taxes have gone from 21.4 per cent to 6.4 per cent. If you compare what is paid by corporations in Canada in federal tax to what is paid by similar corporations in the U.S., you will find that corporations in Canada pay 33 per cent of profit, while in the U.S. the self same corporations pay 40 per cent of profit.

• (1150)

Will the Minister take steps to put an end to the growing practice of digging into the pockets of ordinary Canadians in order to fund the profit margins of major corporations, many of which spend their money outside this country? Will he rescind the $1 billion tax increase to take effect this year and which will affect every Canadian family, in an effort to try to show that the Government is beginning to come to grips with the lack of corporate responsibility, indeed the lack of government responsibility?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out to my friend that if the share of taxes paid by corporations has declined during the recession, there is nothing surprising about it, for the simple reason that profits have drastically declined during the recession. My friend knows, for instance, that a large number of corporations not only had no profits, but they had very substantial losses during that period. If corporations have losses, obviously they are not in a position to pay taxes. My friend also knows that even in 1983, with the recovery, the share of the Gross National Product taken by profits was smaller than it was before the recession. It is the other groups in society who have comparatively maintained or increased their share of the GNP.

As far as his recommendation at the end of his question is concerned, I remind him that there is no guarantee that the manufacturers' tax increase would necessarily be passed on to the consumer. It depends on the competition. Some corporations may absorb it in the form of smaller profits or smaller increases in prices, and others may pass it on. It will vary according to the competition and the circumstances. There is no guarantee or assurance that this is necessarily going to be paid by the consumer.

REQUEST FOR AID TO NEEDY

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, the Minister must live in a world quite different from the world lived in by most other people. Surely he does not expect anyone to believe that the corporations which are being asked to pay a higher tax will not, in this instance, pass it on, since it is a sales tax.

If the Minister is saying that we can afford to pay these corporate tax rates out of the pockets of ordinary Canadians, if he is saying that there is in fact more money in the pockets of Canadians which can be passed into the corporations' profit structure, then he must surely recognize that there is money available, given the figures I have shown him, to help those hundreds of thousands of people whose unemployment insurance benefits have run out, those tens of thousands of people who have been forced much against their will onto welfare, and the 40 per cent or more of senior citizens who are now living below the poverty line. If he believes the over-all financial situation of the country justifies raising taxes on the average individual in order to lower the tax rate for corporations and special individuals, then he must be able to say now that he can afford to provide a source of income for those individuals most in need.

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would invite my hon. friend to wait until the Budget is brought down next Wednesday. At that time I will be making a general statement on the economic situation in Canada and announcing my proposals in connection with the economy. The Hon. member will then be able to see what priorities have been set for the funding that will be available this year. When the Hon. Member has realized what the Government's priorities are and where the Government has directed this funding, he will be able to draw conclusions which, I hope will, prove satisfactory or at least lead him to support the measures I shall be proposing in this respect.

I would like to remind the Hon. Member that over the years, this Government has demonstrated its concern for the most vulnerable groups in our society, and I am thinking of the elderly, the unemployed and people who are in need. The Government's record compares favourably with that of any other industrialized country, and during the recession, we were one of the very few industrialized countries that, instead of reducing social benefits, maintained them to help the neediest groups in our society. This is a Liberal tradition, and I expect we shall be continuing that tradition in the next budget.

NATIONAL REVENUE

TAX COURT PRECEDENTS APPLICABLE TO THE HANDICAPPED

Mr. Scott Fennell (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. In answer to a question from the Hon. Member for Waterloo on February 8 regarding the $70,000 in taxes on buses used by the handicapped, he stated that the taxable status was based on a previous decision. When a question was asked of the Minister regarding a handicapped gentleman by the name of Mr. Bourne, he stated that Mr. Bourne could not use as a precedent the decision concerning a Mr. Mike Overdyk. The Minister knows Mr. Overdyk won his case against the Tax Appeal Board. It has been well publicized, and he knows what the man went through.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair again has a concern about individual cases being used, and it is not reasonable to expect a Minister to have that level of knowledge at his or her disposal.

Mr. McDermid: This case he knows.

Mr. Speaker: This is not the first time that the Chair has called this matter to the attention of Hon. Members. The principle involved in a case, yes, but the individual case should not be the subject of a question as such, unless to illustrate a principle.

Mr. Fennell: I apologize, Mr. Speaker, but I believe the Minister is aware of this case. Would the Minister agree to review the situation for the handicapped and take into consideration precedents established in the tax courts?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I think we must make a clear distinction between two things: first of all, we have a case which concerns income tax and the Tax Appeal Board's decision regarding the claims of one handicapped individual with respect to his tax return. Second, we have an excise tax case that is entirely different and not dealt with in the same manner. As I said previously to the Hon. Member about the decision of the Tax Appeal Board which made it possible to deduct expenses in very specific cases, the Department of National Revenue had decided, on the basis of one specific case mentioned by the Hon. Member, that the Court's decision would apply to similar cases. I think that is clear and that is what the Hon. Member was concerned about.

[English]

TRAVEL EXPENSES OF THE WORKING HANDICAPPED

Mr. Scott Fennell (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, if the Minister has any human decency, would he prevail upon the Minister of Finance to put something into the Budget so handicapped people can deduct the normal expenses incurred when they have to take their own private transportation to work, and the other expenses the handicapped incur?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I imagine the Minister of Finance heard the Hon. Member's representations, since he is here in the House.

HOUSING

RESIDENTIAL REHABILITATION ASSISTANCE PROGRAM— REQUEST FOR EXPANSION

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works. In contrast to many government programs which throw money at large corporations, the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program, RRAP, provides direct benefits to ordinary home owners. It improves the quality of housing and has an immediate impact on employment, as well as generating spinoffs in a local community. Recognizing that this is a good program, will the Minister expand it so that it no longer discriminates against Canadians who live in areas which have not yet been designated, and will the Government enlarge the funding so that it can help the economy now when it needs some stimulation?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Hon. Member for his support. The RRAP Program has been historically a very successful housing program. It has saved many many homes which would have had to be replaced with new ones had this not been done.

● (1200)

In reassessing our social housing program we are trying to find ways to stretch every dollar and house more and more people. We are considering whether we should move some of the money allocated for traditional social housing programs into home renovation and home restoration, especially in hostel type of accommodation, and to see whether we could use this avenue. I thank the Hon. Member for his support.

DISTRIBUTION OF FUNDING

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, just to underline the importance of this, three communities in my riding have never been designated as eligible for RRAP. CMHC officials have admitted that from one of the small communities they have over 100 requests annually for assistance under the program. I hope the Minister is able to get more funding, and not just from other housing projects. If the Minister is absolutely unable to get additional funding for the project, could he at least redistribute the present funding so that communities or neighbourhoods which have been discriminated against in the past will have an opportunity of access to that program in the future?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, if the Hon. Member would check the Supplementary Estimates over the past many months he would find that wherever possible, when funds became available which were not utilized in other programs, we have favoured RRAP. We have in fact reallocated money to this program. We are looking at the problem of expanding the coverage of the program. However, I have to say to the Hon. Member that, until such time as we can inject a considerable amount of new funds, it would be very unfair to those who have been on the waiting list for some time to spread the program right across the country.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

LEBANON—CANADIAN POSITION AT UNITED NATIONS

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Thunder Bay-Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for External Relations and deals with the extremely dangerous situation that has developed in Lebanon, particularly the firing of shells from the New Jersey on the Druze-Moslem positions which are supported by Syria, and in turn by the Soviet Union. I understand that the Secretary General of the U.N. has indicated that the U.N. would participate, under certain conditions, to try to solve some of these problems. Have we given instructions to our Ambassador at the U.N. to support the work of the U.N. in this connection? I think this is one way of trying to resolve a very, very dangerous situation.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister for External Relations): Mr. Speaker, the position of Canada with respect to peacekeeping forces is well known. It would apply in this particular instance of Lebanon. Our position is that we would participate in such a force if it were to be organized. Obviously there are a number of conditions attached to our participation. First, it would have to be a U.N. force. Second, it would have to be acceptable to the parties involved, obviously. Third, it would have to be accompanied by a ceasefire. The principle of peace-keeping operations is one that Canadian diplomacy has accepted. The practice necessitates the satisfactory realization of the conditions I have indicated.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

PROPOSAL TO ENACT YUKON LABOUR CODE

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. For some long time, but most particularly in the last three years, the Government of the Yukon has been considering and studying entry into labour legislation, and particularly the formation of a Yukon labour code. This would require the consent of the Minister.

In order to avoid a supplementary question, what is his reaction to the request from the appropriate Minister, who, I believe has been in correspondence with him? This requires an amendment to Part V of the Code. The Minister has been indicating quite openly that we might expect amendments to the Code in various other Parts. Would the Minister consider that particular amendment which would permit the Government of the Yukon to enact a Yukon labour code?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, my departmental officials are looking into the matter at the present time, and I expect the Hon. Member will have his answer when the amendments to the Canada Labour Code are tabled.

FISHERIES

IMPACT OF WEST COAST OFFSHORE DRILLING—ANNOUNCEMENT OF STUDY

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. Yesterday an agreement was signed providing $300,000 each between Victoria and Ottawa to study the environmental, social, and economic impacts of offshore drilling. Does the Minister think the amount of $70,000 in that fund for experts to look at the biological data that have been provided by Petro-Canada and Chevron is enough? Would he tell Members of this House and the people of British Columbia why there is no intervener funding? The Beaufort Sea hearing got $1 million in intervener funding. That process was given $3.5 million. Why was only $600,000 given for British Columbia? Why is there no intervener funding?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I will take the question of the Hon. Member as notice. I will answer him as quickly as possible.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: It is difficult to accept a supplementary question. The Minister says he would like to take notice and answer the question another time. If the Hon. Member has a supplementary question that is relevant, I will recognize him.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, it is very relevant.

Oral Questions

REQUEST FOR FURTHER FUNDING

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): In 1971 the Minister's Government placed an official legal moratorium on offshore drilling in British Columbia because of the danger that offshore drilling posed to the billion dollar plus commercial sport and native fishery. I am sure the Minister is aware of the hearings which are going on relating to the Ocean Ranger disaster. That is costing $13 million. Would the Minister not agree, in principle at the very least, that more money should be provided for this hearing process in British Columbia so that we can evaluate the dangers before the fact; before lives, industry, and fish stocks are lost? Rather than spending $13 million after the fact, let us spend more than $300,000 before the fact and evaluate the dangers of drilling in the Hecate Strait and Dixon Entrance before serious damage is done to British Columbia's environment.

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly study the suggestion of the Hon. Member. I would like to remind him that the policy of the Department is always a very cautious one which does not allow developments or actions which could hamper the fish habitat. I would remind him that in the case of the contaminated sediment from False Creek the Department issued two permits—

Mr. Fulton: No, no, offshore drilling. You signed the agreement yesterday.

Mr. De Bané: —but to dump uncontaminated sediments. That responsibility of the Department we intend to discharge very strictly.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

COMMITMENTS TO NATO

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. The Government's commitment to NATO, and to Canadians, to increase defence budgets by 3 per cent per year until the fiscal year 1986-87 has been dropped. The Government has decided to stop these increases as of the fiscal year 1984-85 and keep the budget flat thereafter. That will make it impossible for the Canadian Armed Forces to fulfil NATO obligations.

Is the Minister prepared to say the Government will reverse this short-sighted decision to stop increases in the fiscal year 1984-85? Will he at least have the honesty to say what NATO commitments we are going to drop? The Armed Forces cannot fulfil the NATO commitments we have if that decision of the Government to stop the increases in the budget goes ahead.

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I would like the hon. gentleman to review the Throne Speech. In the Throne Speech comments were made to the effect that we are maintaining our real growth of 3 per cent in terms of military expenditures. That is the Government's position. I would ask the hon. gentleman as well to review the Estimates when they are tabled in a short time to see that indeed the Government is carrying forward on its commitment.

The Opposition has the impression that we are reducing military expenditures. I would point out to him that since 1973-74 we have increased our military expenditures on an annual basis. At that time our total defence expenditures were $2.2 billion. This year our estimates are for expenditures of $8 billion. That is a substantial increase.

The only material reduction in defence expenditures was in 1979-80 when the Tories were in power.

Mr. Andre: According to this Cabinet document, the Armed Forces will be provided with about half of what they require to meet the minimum NATO requirements. I am talking about minimum requirements.

LEVEL OF FUNDING

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, what I want to know from the Minister is if the Armed Forces will have the necessary funds to meet our obligations, or will he have the honesty to say that we are dropping some of these commitments because we will simply not provide our troops with the equipment, the weapons necessary to fulfil these obligations? It has to be one or the other.

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I would call the attention of the Hon. Member to the fact that all of our major military capital expenditures in the recent past have been in order to meet that NATO commitment. Our frigates, our CF-18s, our Leopard tanks, and even our wheeled vehicles have been aimed at meeting the NATO commitment. We are meeting the NATO commitment and it is fully our intention to continue to meet our NATO commitment. The Hon. Member is making allegations that are unfounded.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Northumberland.

Mr. Hees: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, but as the Prime Minister got word that I was about to ask him a question he ducked out of the House. I would ask if I could be recognized on another day.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

FISHERIES

REHABILITATION OF BRITISH COLUMBIA STREAMS AND SPAWNING BEDS

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. This week we were visited by a delegation of West Coast fishermen. Their prime objective was to see the Government assist in rebuilding the stocks that are in serious jeopardy at the present time.

Would the Minister propose to Cabinet that, under the Special Capital Recovery Projects Program, instead of spending $42 million renovating an old government building in downtown Vancouver which has no long term employment creation potential, the $42 million be put into a pilot project that would permit members of the Fisheries Coalition and others to go out and rehabilitate streams, build incubation boxes and spawning beds, and use this money in a more constructive way than merely adding carpets to an old government building so that public servants can be comfortably ensconced?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that several initiatives can be taken to rehabilitate and reconstitute the stocks on the Pacific Coast. As you know, the Government has already committed over $150 million for the Salmonid Enhancement Program. This year and next year we will be injecting something like $75 million into that program.

Protection of the fish habitat, an initiative suggested by the Hon. Member, is certainly something very worth-while to pursue, but I think we must face the fact once and for all that the best, most efficient, and less costly way of increasing the stocks is by fishing less. That has to be understood.

I am sure most of the fishermen realize that we must reduce the fishing effort if we want to give the fish a chance to rebuild.

Mr. Speaker: A brief supplementary. The Chair would like to recognize one other member.

PROPOSAL THAT COMMITTEE VISIT WEST COAST

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Mr. Speaker, there are many other dimensions to this question that might be explored. However, I have a question for the Minister in light of the motion that was passed by all parties at yesterday's meeting of the standing committee, that the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry be empowered to travel immediately to the West Coast to visit fishing communities and learn more first hand from the fishermen and their families about how they wish to participate in the rehabilitation of our fishing industry. Will the Minister and the Government support the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry being given this reference and immediately empowered to travel to the West Coast and come back with recommendations for consideration by the whole House?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, my attitude has always been the same. It is not for me to become involved in the work of the parliamentary committee.

Mr. Siddon: Do you support it?

Mr. De Bané: It will have to be studied in due course, and I will ask the advice of my Government House Leader.

FORESTRY

NEGOTIATION OF FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL AGREEMENTS

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance, partly because the Minister responsible for the Canadian forestry service is not here today. The Minister of Finance will be aware that negotiations for a new federal-provincial forestry agreement in British Columbia have broken down. Consequently, possibly only $5 million instead of some $52 million will be expended by the federal Government in British Columbia for forestry in the coming year.

He should also be aware that there are no new agreements for the big three provinces of Ontario, Quebec, and British Columbia, in the areas of forestry. Since there is only $10 million out of some $130 million allocated for forestry renewal by the federal Government actually being spent, will he give us some assurance that the moneys not spent from this year's allocation this year, because of the failure of the provinces and the federal Government to reach agreements, will be added to whatever moneys might be planned for this coming fiscal year in order that we can save what little is left in many provinces of the most important industry in this country?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, indeed there are discussions taking place with the various provinces concerning the extension of agreements dealing with forestry. Some of these agreements, such as the one with the Government of Manitoba, have been signed. In other provinces, such as British Columbia, it seems to be more difficult to get an agreement. I know that my colleague is spending a lot of time and effort to try to arrive at a satisfactory agreement. We will pursue our efforts in that regard. As to the specific request of the Hon. Member, it will be given consideration.

Mr. Pinard: A point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Would the Hon. Member's supplementary question please be brief? The hour has expired.

Mr. Nielsen: On a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Could we have a brief supplementary question, and then the point of order?

Mr. Pinard: On a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: The Chair would like to allow a brief supplementary question and then go to the point of order.

The Budget

EXPENDITURE OF FUNDS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have a brief supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Forests in British Columbia says that he has the authority from his provincial Government to at least spend the $5 million as under the existing agreement. Apparently we do not have the assurance that the federal $5 million share under the existing agreement will be available for at least a one year extension of that federal-provincial agreement. Can we have the commitment now from the Minister of Finance that the $5 million out of the $130 million that had been allocated will in fact be available, so that we do not throw away even that minimal chance to renew a little of our forest resource in British Columbia?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will draw the Hon. Member's representations to the attention of the Minister responsible for forestry. However, I would emphasize that there is nothing preventing the Government of British Columbia from spending that money on its own resources. The forests and Crown land belong to the provincial Government. There is nothing preventing the provincial Government from spending the $5 million if it wants to do so. Let it go ahead. I will applaud that. Since it is its forests and its resources, why doesn't it go ahead and spend more?

TIME OF PRESENTATION

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Government House Leader said that perhaps by Question Period today he would be able to indicate the timing of the Budget next Wednesday. I indicated yesterday that we would be prepared to consent to extend the hours of sitting to the traditional time of eight o'clock to hear that Budget.

I have considered the matter very carefully and consulted with my colleagues since that time. We are prepared now, should the Government be disposed to accept the offer, to suggest four o'clock. By that time I think all of the exchanges would be closed. If that would suit the convenience of the Government more than eight o'clock, we are certainly prepared to consent to four o'clock.

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I had indicated to you earlier that I wanted to rise on a point of order, to deal exactly with this question. We would have saved a lot of time if I had been recognized first.

• (1220)

What I am saying—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would ask Members to be a little tolerant with the Chair. It has not been the best day for the Chair.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dick: It has not been the best day for the Government either.

Mr. Pinard: Yesterday I indicated that we would be in a better position today to be more specific as to the exact timing of the budget presentation. I have said that we received an indication from the Official Opposition that the Official Opposition preferred eight o'clock in the evening. In fact, the Official Opposition offered consent for eight o'clock yesterday. I want you to know, Mr. Speaker, that we preferred the afternoon. The Official Opposition had refused the Budget being presented at 4.30 p.m. We are very pleased that now the Official Opposition has reconsidered and accepts four o'clock.

We got in touch with the exchange market people, and most of those to whom we have spoken prefer an afternoon Budget. We very much welcome this co-operation. We are now experimenting with parliamentary reform, and having finally eliminated evening sittings, I think it is in the spirit of parliamentary reform that we have all major presentations, including Budget presentations, in the afternoon. Therefore, I welcome the consent offered by the Official Opposition that the Budget be presented at four o'clock in the afternoon next Wednesday.

There is, though, the requirement of a specific House order under Standing Order 64(2). Pursuant to Standing Order 64(2) I request, Mr. Speaker, that you designate the necessary Order of the Day to permit the Minister of Finance to propose a motion pursuant to Standing Order 64(3) and to make his Budget presentation on Wednesday next, February 15, 1984.

The understanding and the agreement after consultations with the House Leader of the NDP as well, who I also thank very much for his co-operation, is that the Budget presentation be made at 4 p.m., and that if we reach Orders of the Day before 4 p.m. on Wednesday afternoon, the agreement is that the sitting be suspended until 4 p.m.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to hear that the agreement which has been worked out along the lines I anticipated will be satisfactory. I had thought 4.08.36 p.m. myself, but I think four o'clock will be satisfactory!

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: That is what you get with Laxer.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, there is one remaining consent that should be on the record, and that is as laid out by the Government House Leader with respect to reaching Orders of the Day prior to four o'clock on Wednesday. We are agreeable that, should that happen, the sitting of the House be suspended. Of course, we will go through the normal Question Period hour and, if we reach Orders of the Day before four o'clock, of course we agree to suspend the sitting until 4 p.m. for the Budget.

Mr. Pinard: That was exactly the second part of the consent I was seeking. I said that if we reached Orders of the Day before four o'clock, the sitting be suspended. I welcome this consent as well, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed and so ordered?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed and so ordered.

NATIONAL REVENUE

TAX ON BUSES FOR HANDICAPPED

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): I would not want to tax your patience, Mr. Speaker, but in answer to the Hon. Members for Waterloo and Beaches earlier this week I said that we did not collect any taxes on the sale of buses for the handicapped. However, since the money had already been withheld, we paid it back yesterday. Technically speaking, we refunded rather than collected the money.

[English]

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I just want to thank the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Bussières) for correcting that statement. I hope that he will correct the basic injustice as well.

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I also want to recognize the point that the Minister is making, which is substantial. In fact, the matter—

Mr. Speaker: Order please. The Hon. Minister has risen to make a correction to the record or to give an explanation.

Mr. Ouellet: Which has been done.

Mr. Speaker: The Minister made a statement which perhaps clarified certain things. It is a privilege extended by the House but the Chair does not propose to enter or permit debate on this matter.

CANADA STUDENT LOANS PROGRAM

Question No. 340—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Given past patterns and current post-secondary enrolment, how many Canada Student Loans will be consolidated by students leaving full-time studies between August 1, 1982 and July 31, 1983?

2. In each of the past four years, what was the total number of loans consolidated?

3. What is the total dollar value of loans that it is forecast will be consolidated in the fiscal year 1982-83?

4. In each of the past four years, what was the average per capita value of loans consolidated and what is the forecast per capita value of loans which will be consolidated in the fiscal year 1982-83?

5. How many of the students who consolidated their loans in each of the past four years and for whom consolidation is forecast in the fiscal year 1982-83 have been in the loans program for (a) one year (b) two years (c) three years (d) four years (e) five or more years?

6. What was the rate of default on the loans in each of the past four years and what is the rate forecast to be in the fiscal year 1982-83?

7. In each of the past four years and forecast for the fiscal year 1982-83, what was the difference between the interest rate charged on Canada Student loans and the average prime rate on a quarterly basis?

Hon. Serge Joyal (Secretary of State): 1-4. Canada Student loans consolidated by full-time students leaving full-time studies.

Loan Year	No. of loans consolidated	Total value	Average per capita
1978-79	59,000	$129,000,000	$2,186
1979-80	57,000	133,000,000	2,333
1980-81	56,000	136,000,000	2,429
1981-82	63,000	156,000,000	2,476
1982-83 (est.)	65,000-70,000	$200,000,000	$2,857 to $3,077

Note: Current computer system does not maintain data on a historical basis. Therefore the above only represent estimates.

5. Computer records of loans are only maintained on a cumulative basis; therefore, it is not possible to determine the number of years for which the students who have consolidated their loans have been in the Canada Student loans Program.

6. The default rate is defined as the ratio of students who have become liable to repay their loans (i.e have consolidated) as compared to those who have had a claim paid to a lender because of default in payment under their consolidation agreement. The rates below are cumulative from inception of the program to the end of each loan year indicated.

1978/79	8.6 per cent
1980/81	9.7 per cent
1981/82	10.1 per cent
1982/83	10.7 per cent (projected)

CANADA MARKETING ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Question No. 362—Mr. St. Germain:

Since April 1, 1981 did any firms or individuals receive support under the Canada Marketing Assistance Program of the Canadian Government Office of Tourism and, if so, in each province how many (a) firms (b) individuals and at what total cost to date?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): Yes, a number of firms have received support under the Canada Marketing Assistance Program (CANMAP) since its inception, April 1, 1982:

(a)	Ontario	17
	British Columbia	16
	Quebec	7
	Alberta	5
	Saskatchewan	3
	Newfoundland	1
	Nova Scotia	1
	Manitoba	1
	Northwest Territories	1
	Yukon Territory	1

(b) None.

The total cost to date is in the amount of $444,276.57.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL LEGAL AID AGREEMENTS

Question No. 385—Mr. Howie:

Will the Government renegotiate the federal-provincial legal aid agreements and what is the estimated cost to Canada of this renegotiation?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Minister of Justice): In so far as the Department of Justice is concerned: the Federal-Provincial Criminal Legal Aid Agreements are currently under renegotiation with all ten provinces. Canada has made an offer to the provinces which for 1983-84 will increase Canada's total contribution to over $40M. This is an increase of $12M, or 43 per cent, over what was due in 1982-83 under the old agreement. In 1984-85, Canada's contribution will increase to $45M.

These amounts do not include additional financial assistance to be provided to the provinces for legal aid services to young offenders, required as a result of the proclamation of the Young Offenders Act on April 1, 1984. This additional cost sharing is currently under negotiation with the provinces.

STUDY OF ADMINISTRATIVE LAW TRIBUNALS

Question No. 389—Mr. Howie:

Did the Department of Justice undertake a study of administrative law tribunals and, if so, what was (a) the time frame of the study (b) the estimated cost (c) the purpose of the study?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Minister of Justice): In so far as the Department of Justice is concerned:

1. (a) Yes, the Department of Justice is studying federal administrative tribunals in the context of a three-year administrative law reform project that began in fiscal year 1983-84 and is expected to continue through fiscal year 1985-86.

(b) The estimated cost of the entire project is $850,000.

(c) Project staff and consultants are doing research and preparing recommendations on the following subjects:

1. the rationalization of social benefits appeals tribunals;

2. minimum uniform guidelines on administrative procedure for tribunals and the feasibility of establishing an advisory council on tribunals;

3. revisions to the Statutory Instruments Act;

4. law concerning the Crown, including Crown proceedings and immunities, prerogatives, privileges and liabilities.

CRIME STATISTICS

Question No. 136—Mr. Patterson:

1. Since 1975, by year, how many murders took place in Canada?

2. By year, how many murders involved children under the age of 16 years?

3. Since 1975, by year, how many rapes/sexual assaults on children took place?

4. In the case of child murders, by year, how many involved sexual assault on the victim?

5. (a) Since 1975, by year, in the case of child murders, how many individuals were charged with (i) first degree murder (ii) second degree murder (iii) manslaughter and, in each case, what was the conviction relating to the charge (b) how many individuals (i) charged (ii) convicted had previous criminal records relating to sexual assaults on children?

6. Since 1975, by year, how many crimes of (a) murder (b) rape/sexual assault were committed by individuals released from penitentiary under (i) mandatory supervision (ii) weekend/day passes under the temporary release program (iii) parole?

7. Since 1975, for those persons charged with rape/sexual assault, how many (a) were released on bail (b) committed crimes relating to sexual assault while on bail?

CANADIAN SECURITY INTELLIGENCE SERVICE ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General of Canada) moved that Bill C-9, an Act to establish the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, to enact an Act respecting enforcement in relation to certain security and related offences and to amend certain Acts in consequence thereof or in relation thereto, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the proposed legislation before us today represents a major turning point for Canada's security intelligence system. We are asking Parliament to provide, for the first time in Canada's history, a legal framework more comprehensive, and more detailed, than that of any other security system in the world. Every other country leaves a large part of their security system wholly within the prerogative of government. With Bill C-9 we have tried to reduce that element to an absolute minimum. This Government believes that such an approach is not only desirable, but essential if we are to maintain the necessary balance between effective national security and the civil liberties that are fundamental to our society.

[Translation]

Bill C-9 is the result of many years of research, discussion and debate on the way this balance should be achieved. Since the Second World War, there has been, both in Canada and in the rest of the world, an incredible increase in security intelligence activities, generally without legislative authorization or control. In Canada, the present RCMP Security Service has no legislative mandate and exercises powers that are neither defined by Parliament nor regulated by judicial control. As the issue of security becomes increasingly complex, the absence of a specific legal framework raises concerns about our individual rights and freedoms.

• (1230)

[English]

These concerns have been addressed by two commissions of inquiry in the last 15 years—the Mackenzie Commission in 1969 and the McDonald Commission in 1981. Both Commissions concluded that to address effectively threats to Canada's security while protecting Canadian civil liberties, our security service should be split out of the RCMP and become more civilian in nature with a legislated mandate and a new system of control and review of security operations.

Responding to these recommendations, the Government developed a detailed set of proposals to reorganize the RCMP security service as a civilian agency, operating under a new framework of mandate, powers and controls and, for the first time, independent review. These proposals were presented last year as Bill C-157 and submitted for examination to a special committee of the Senate. After hearing the representations of interested groups and individuals from across Canada, the Senators reaffirmed the central recommendations of the earlier commissions and endorsed the basic framework proposed in Bill C-157. At the same time they suggested many amendments which will help to achieve the essential balance between national security and individual liberty.

The Senate committee emphasized the urgent need for this legislation. They said that our present security intelligence arrangements are not acceptable and new legislation "should be enacted in the near future". I recognize this sense of urgency. I have tabled the amended legislation as early as possible to facilitate a full parliamentary debate on Bill C-9.

At this stage it is important to focus clearly on the fundamental principles of the Bill. No doubt a Bill dealing so directly with questions of national security in a free society raises many complex and disturbing issues. In an area where a calm and reasoned approach is vital, it is easy to give way to sensationalism or empty rhetoric and lose sight of what is really at stake in Bill C-9. What is not at question today is the need for an efficient security intelligence service. This need has been fully demonstrated by both the Mackenzie and the McDonald Commissions. There have been many occasions in recent years when our national security would have been irreparably damaged if we did not have the accurate intelligence supplied by our present security service.

As the Mackenzie Commission said in 1969:

—the duty of the State to protect its secrets from espionage, its information from unauthorized disclosure, its institutions from subversion and its policies from clandestine influence is indisputable; what are matters for dispute are the organizations and procedures established by the State to meet this responsibility in an area which can tough closely upon the fundamental freedoms of the individual.

At recent hearings before the Senate, where many people challenged the organization and methods we proposed, there was never any question about the need for some kind of security intelligence organization.

We want to restrict the mandate of our Security Service in order to define more clearly, and in greater detail, the scope of our security intelligence activities. We want to indicate the exact powers the Service will be authorized to use, and we want to specify the conditions and limits of use of those powers. We want these conditions to be defined within a detailed framework that will ensure full respect for the law, and we intend to establish a non-governmental and fully independent committee that will monitor the justification of security intelligence activities and report regularly to the Solicitor General of Canada and to Parliament.

The purpose of this Bill is therefore, to a large extent, to provide a new set of guarantees and controls that do not exist at the present time, in order to protect the rights of Canadians against undue interference. If we are at all concerned about the quality of our democracy and the freedom of dissent and political association that is fundamental to our society, I believe this legislation is necessary. The MacDonald Commission emphasized that, in Canada, the aim of a security and intelligence service is to protect the needs of a free and democratic society. That is the whole purpose of Bill C-9.

[English]

There are those who say that the new framework being proposed could be introduced within the present RCMP security service. In fact, some people interpret the separation of the security service from the RCMP as an implied criticism of the ability and integrity of our national police force. I want to make it very clear that this is a fundamental misunderstanding of the Government's position.

The RCMP is the finest police force in the world. It enjoys a well-deserved international reputation. I, for one, am extremely proud of the force that has displayed such integrity and dedication to the cause of law enforcement. However, the very system which makes the RCMP an effective police force makes it less suited as a security intelligence organization. The RCMP has had the job of providing policing for Canada for well over a century. It has had the responsibility for assuring national security developed as a special division within the RCMP since World War II. However, the way in which the debate on Bill C-157 developed shows that Canadians themselves appreciate the distinction between police work and security work.

It became clear early in the decade that interested Canadians want the Solicitor General to know exactly what the security intelligence service is doing at all times and to be responsible down to the detail of every warrant issued by the court for intrusive investigative action against a suspected threat to the security of Canada. The public and the Senate committee made it clear that only in this way is there adequate accountability for the service.

The Government agrees. This sensible demand requires a close link between the Government and the security service—an important relationship or link of overall government responsibility for what the service does. On the other hand, when one looks at police operations, the public expectation and the long-established tradition are the opposite. Parliament has given the police of Canada, including the RCMP, the Criminal Code; and the Government has given the RCMP policy guidelines for intrusive techniques. The law provides that they obtain warrants from judges.

Everyone surely knows that the Minister, the Solicitor General, does not tell the RCMP when to open and close criminal files. The Solicitor General does not tell the RCMP who to investigate or who not to investigate and where or when to seek a judicial warrant to engage in more intrusive investigation. The Canadian people want police investigations to be entirely free of government interference and direction. In other words, people want the RCMP security service to be accountable, but in police work they want the RCMP to be independent.

It has not been easy for the RCMP to contain at the same time these two conflicting responsibility models. Two royal commissions have shown the problems which can arise. It is time to recognize this incompatibility. It is time to permit the RCMP to continue its traditional and fundamental independence in policing. Indeed, as I will show in a few minutes, its policing role in relation to security is to be considerably enhanced by this Bill. At the same time the security service is to be spun out, its powers of arrest are to be removed, and it is to be given the degree of ministerial involvement and greater accountability which security work requires.

The Mackenzie Commission set out its reasons for separation in 1969 as follows:

Apart from a similarity in some investigative techniques, the differences between police and security duties seems to us to be wide. Police forces are concerned primarily with law enforcement, including post factor investigations, with the collection of evidence and with the prosecution of crimes. Security services are primarily engaged in preventative activities and the collection of intelligence . . . We feel, in short, that the professional security service officer is quite different from the professional policeman and that this difference should be reflected in recruiting methods, in training and career patterns and in organizational structure . . . On balance, the best solution seems to us to be the creation of a new non-police agency to perform the functions of a security service in Canada.

When the Commission's report was presented to this House, the Hon. Robert Stanfield acknowledged these differences and expressed "doubts" as to whether the "Mounted Police lends itself very readily to the sort of modifications" proposed in the report. The Hon. Tommy Douglas, the Leader of the New Democratic Party, also addressed this issue when he commented:

> First of all I refer to the recommendation of the royal commission that there be a civilian, non-police agency because, as they point out, there is a wide difference between police and security duties. Without any reflection whatsoever on the very excellent service the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have performed, there is a great difference between law enforcement and the carrying out of the duties of a security service. There is a difference in the type of training required, the form of recruitment and the structure of a police force, on the one hand, and a security agency on the other.
> I submit that it takes a certain degree of training and sophistication to recognize the difference between honest dissent and a desire to subvert our democratic form of society. Therefore, I think that the recommendation of the royal commission for the setting up of a civilian non-police agency has a great deal of merit, and I am extremely disappointed that the government has rejected this proposal out of hand.

This issue was examined again by the McDonald Commission in 1981; they concluded that the type of framework necessary for security operations would "work more effectively for a separate and civilian security intelligence agency than for a security service within the national police force".

The question of separation was reviewed once again by the Senate Committee last year, and once again the conclusion was the same. I think we have to agree with a comment the Hon. Member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) made in a press conference following the Senate Committee's report: separation can no longer be considered a major issue. After 15 years of discussing this matter and experimenting with alternatives, all the arguments are in: we need a separate and specialized agency to respond to the increasingly sophisticated threats to our national security.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I think that should be Saskatoon East. It wasn't Saskatoon West, I can tell you that. You had better get the security service on this one because I don't think you are right!

Mr. Kaplan: I will verify the attribution during the lunch hour.

As I have said, this is in no way a criticism of the RCMP. Members of the present security service have performed outstanding work under very difficult conditions. They have been asked to do a job when no suitable framework is in place to help them do that job properly. Yet they are able to command a high level of respect from the international community. They deserve a better system, and must welcome the prospect of a civilian agency and the improved direction and control such an agency will make possible.

I would like to stress that the RCMP is not, as some critics would have it, being removed from the security intelligence field. Indeed, as Hon. Members know, the legislation specifically provides in Part IV that the RCMP will have the primary jurisdiction to investigate security-related offences, offences which arise out of conduct constituting threats to the security of Canada.

Just as the Mackenzie and McDonald Commissions concluded that the police function is incompatible with the security intelligence function, so too it is necessary to keep a security intelligence agency out of police work. Bill C-9, in making the investigation of security-related crimes the legislative preserve of police authorities, accomplishes this end. In short, in the security field the RCMP role will remain consistent with its well recognized and world renowned primary function, namely enforcing the law.

[Translation]

The new organization must at least be told, in the form of clear and unambiguous legislation, what it is supposed to do. That is why the proposed mandate is such an important part of Bill C-9. This mandate will be a definition by Parliament of the scope and limits of security intelligence activities. For employees of the Security Intelligence Service, it will be the definitive guide to their duties and also constitute a clear point of reference for assessing the efficiency and accuracy of security intelligence activities. By exchanging the present mandate, established by a Cabinet directive, and thus subject to amendment by Parliament and by Cabinet, for a legislated mandate that can be changed only by Parliament, we are taking a giant step forward in protecting the rights of Canadians.

[English]

The primary purpose of the service will be to collect and analyze information and threats to Canada's security. The current RCMP security service is mandated—and here I am quoting from the 1975 Cabinet direction—"To maintain internal security by discerning, monitoring, investigating, deterring, preventing and countering individuals or groups"; and then follows a list of security threats. I would like to remind Hon. Members that, in keeping with the recommendations of the McDonald Commission, the words "deterring, preventing and countering" do not appear anywhere in Bill C-9. The new service will have no powers, using the McDonald Commission's phrase, to "take measures to enforce security". The primary purpose of the service will be restricted to the collection, analysis and reporting of security intelligence.

In Clause 2 of the Bill you will find carefully worded definitions of these threats: espionage and sabotage, foreign interference, terrorism and subversion. While each of these elements is important, the definition of subversion requires special attention. Other areas of the mandate are generally concerned with activities of foreign agents or activities directed by foreign agents; but subversion may involve Canadian citizens more directly. The definition of subversion draws the critical line dividing legitimate dissent from subversive activity, which may be put under surveillance.

There must be no doubt that Canadians are assured the basic right to engage in political dissent, and to advocate radical change in social practices, government policies or political institutions, without being subject to surveillance for so doing. The McDonald Commission describes the exercise of this right as "the lifeblood of a vibrant democracy", and we could not tolerate any system that threatened to interfere with this right.

Some people have suggested that, because subversion is so difficult to distinguish from legitimate dissent, we should exclude subversion from the mandate of a security service; but this is surely dangerous. Genuine subversion is a genuine threat to national security, and we must be in a position to deal with such a threat. As the Senate Committee observed:

—it was suggested by some witnesses that subversion should not be a concern of the CSIS at all, specifically because it is so hard to distinguish from legitimate activities. The Committee does not agree with this approach. Even though the limits of subversion are hard to define, it can represent a threat to the security of the state. A state should be in a position to protect itself from illegitimate attempts to weaken its institutions.

Therefore, I have tried to formulate a definition that focuses precisely on that aspect of subversion which can seriously endanger a democratic society. The McDonald Commission emphasized, and I quote:

The key element in the subversive activity which is the proper subject of security intelligence activity is the attempt to undermine or attack, through violence or unlawful means, the basis values, processes and structures of democratic government in Canada.

The definition I have proposed accurately reflects that key element, and just that element, of subversion.

[Translation]

I am convinced that the mandate described in the Bill amounts to the best possible protection of civil liberties in Canada. Never in any instance will it be possible to equate protest or non-violent and legitimate unrest with a threat to national security. Still, to avoid any possibility of misleading interpretation, no mater how remote, we have clearly indicated in the Bill that no one can be investigated by the Service only because he or she has taken part in activities related to lawful advocacy, protest or dissent.

[English]

I should also point out that the mandate, as reworded in the Bill before you, limits all security investigations to those that are "strictly necessary", in the interests of national security. This is a clear signal that the mandate is to be interpreted narrowly. Only if it is demonstrably necessary for national security will an investigation be supported by this mandate.

While the mandate defines the job the security service is expected to do, we must also tell the service how this job is to be performed. Bill C-9 sets out the specific powers of investigation available to the service, and it sets out the conditions which will govern the exercise of these powers. These powers are admittedly considerable, and many people are understandably uneasy about giving any agency this capacity for investigation. But such a capacity is necessary. The McDonald Commission, whose unquestioned concern for the basic rights and freedoms of Canadians permeates its report, was equally concerned that the security agency be given full investigative powers appropriate to its legitimate and mandated function. The Commissioners observed, and I quote:

Because of the secrecy maintained by those who pose the most serious threat to Canada's internal security, the security intelligence agency must be authorized to employ a variety of investigative techniques to enable it to collect information. The means available to it must range all the way from studying open sources of research material and obtaining information from citizens, police forces and government agencies . . . to using much more covert and intrusive methods that may involve the use of powers not available under law to the ordinary citizen.

The Senate Committee reached the same conclusion last year. It said:

While the utility of any given technique varies with the circumstances, to absolutely deny one or the other to the agency would be to unreasonably restrict its operations. The Committee is aware of the dangers inherent in allowing such powers to be given to anyone. But . . . the proper way to avoid abuse is to restrict (these powers) to specific and exigent circumstances . . . Thus mail-opening, for example, will be available but only in a proper case where the agency meets a strict set of conditions, and where the prescribed mandate and functions of the agency allow it.

In weighing the implications of these powers, Members should note that Bill C-9 sets out an exceptionally strict series of conditions for the use of these powers, and for the first time these powers will be subject to judicial control through the warrant process. I note that the imposition of judges as a safeguard on the use of these powers has no counterpart in present arrangements. It represents a great step forward in the protection of rights. The service will not be allowed to exercise any intrusive powers without a judicial warrant, and every application for a warrant must first be approved by the Solicitor General. A judge who issues a warrant must first be satisfied that its use falls within the mandate of the service, other investigative techniques have been tried, or that there are special reasons why the technique in question is uniquely necessary.

There are still more conditions which would help to ensure that these powers are not abused. For example, to prevent "judge-shopping" all warrant applications would have to include details of any previous applications, and all warrants would have a maximum time limit of one year. Taken together, these conditions represent a substantial set of safeguards against the potential for abuse in intelligence operations, and, I might add, these safeguards have no counterpart in our existing arrangements. They are a great step forward in the protection of rights.

Bill C-9 also introduces a new set of provisions for monitoring and reviewing security intelligence operations. The Solicitor General will be fully responsible and fully accountable for the security service, as in the present system. But the Bill would introduce two additional elements to ensure that the system as a whole is operating as intended. These are perhaps the most innovative features of our proposed legislation, and I believe they are vital as an effective and credible guarantee that intelligence operations remain within the rule of law. Compared to present arrangements, they are a further protection of the rights of Canadians.

First, there will be an Inspector General, who will monitor and review the operational activities of the service. He will have full access to information on intelligence operations, and his job will be to ensure that existing policies and procedures are being observed by the service. The Inspector General must advise the Minister of any activities he feels are unauthorized or unlawful, or which involve an unreasonable use of investigative powers, and any illegalities must be reported by the Minister to the Attorney General.

Second, there will be an external Security Intelligence Review Committee, made up of respected "outsiders" who have no vested interest in the service. At least three and up to five Privy Councillors who are not sitting in Parliament will be appointed by Order in Council, after the Prime Minister has consulted with the Leader of the Opposition and the leader of each Party in this House with at least 12 sitting Members.

The Review Committee will have full access to detailed information on the activities of the service. It will receive regular reports from the Director of the service and from the Inspector General. It will conduct an ongoing review of policies and procedures, making recommendations to the Minister as it sees fit. It will investigate complaints against the service and will review the security screening process affecting immigration and government employment, investigating specific cases, if necessary. This opportunity to seek review by citizens who are denied government employment, denied promotion within the Government, or denied various immigration possibilities, is something new, created for the first time by this legislation. It should also be considered a great step forward for civil liberties.

Finally, this Review Committee will report annually to Parliament and under present rules this report would be referred to a standing committee. Thus, an important role of the Review Committee will be to highlight any concern about abuse of powers within the service and to bring particular issues of policy into the field of public and parliamentary debate.

At the risk of appearing to be repetitious, I would like to emphasize the fact that all the provisions of the Bill, including the legislated terms of reference, the powers defined by Parliament, the judicial control and the review by an external organization, are new and are all necessary to maintain a proper balance between national security and the civil liberties of Canadians. None of these guarantees do exist at the present time. We are breaking new ground with this Bill, and as always, this is not easy to do.

Every Government in the world is reluctant to provide a detailed legislative framework for security intelligence activities. The reason for this is obvious. Whenever people are asked to think about the powers required to ensure the efficiency of security intelligence, they feel deeply concerned. It is thus easy for critics to keep stressing the dangers inherent to these powers and to avoid mentioning the provisions set up for their use.

Shall I call it one o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): The Hon. the Solicitor General.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, having almost completed my remarks, I should like to resume where I left off.

The Government is attempting to deal openly and frankly with the issue of national security. We believe that the best way to protect civil liberties is to establish publicly a legal framework which will enable us to define and control intelligence activities. We also believe that such a framework cannot be effective unless we have the support and understanding of the public.

• (1410)

Few people would deny the need for legislation in this area. With the Charter of Rights and Freedoms we have demonstrated and affirmed our commitment to individual liberty. We have acted on that commitment with initiatives such as the Freedom of Information Act, the Privacy Act, and the Young Offenders Act. In the context of these accomplishments, Bill C-9 responds to a significant gap, a gap that could seriously undermine the genuine achievements of this Parliament. That is why this legislation is vitally important.

Bill C-9 is the result of a long and difficult process which began 15 years ago. The Government has shown its good faith on the issue. We are not after Orwellian security service and we are not out to transform Canada into a police state. On the contrary, we have listened to public comment on our proposals and, while I may have felt that some criticisms were exaggerated, I recognize that the concerns were real. I have done my best to accommodate those concerns in Bill C-9 and I believe this Bill is a better piece of legislation as a result.

These are the proposals, Mr. Speaker. I would like to see these important safeguards put in place and as soon as possible; but that is up to Parliament. After 15 years of discussion and debate I think the real issue today is this: We can give the people of this country clear statutory assurance that their rights and freedoms will be respected, or we can leave our security intelligence system in a prolonged state of uncertainty, with no legislative framework, no public mandate, no judicial approval role, no independent or external review; in short, none of the safeguards we all believe are important to the rights and freedoms we enjoy in this society. Whatever we do during this parliamentary session, we will be forced to make one of these choices. I think, Mr. Speaker, the right choice is obvious.

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to finally—and I underline the word "finally"—have the opportunity to enter into debate on the floor of the House of Commons on this most important piece of legislation. There should be no mistaking the fact that this Bill under consideration today deserves full and carefull scrutiny. The Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) made reference in his remarks today to the fact there has been a long period of time under which the security service and the security capacity of our country has been under examination. I propose to deal at length later in my remarks with respect to this aspect of the matter, but the fact is that we finally have the opportunity of looking at this legislation on the floor of the House of Commons for the first time. This is the first occasion that the elected representatives of the people of Canada have had to enter into this particular debate over the 15 years referred to by the Solicitor General during which this matter has been under consideration.

This legislation seeks to establish a new civilian security force for Canada. That force, if formed, would differ from a standard police force in two critical respects: it would be granted powers to engage in intrusive surveillance far greater than those available at the present time to law enforcement agencies; secondly, it would use those powers as a means to achieve an objective which differs in kind and substance from the objective of police forces. Instead of investigating crimes and bringing criminals to justice, the new agency would be charged with the collection of information on Canadian groups and individuals as well as foreign nationals who have been targeted for surveillance. There can be no question about the fact that, even in a democratic society, knowledge is power. Governments and government agencies thrive on information and collect it assiduously. Once they have it, they are reluctant to divulge it except for their own purposes.

We have had a recent and clear example of how confidential information can be misused by this Government, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) saw fit to direct his minions to scour the departmental files in an attempt to find written materials which could be used in a political way, and other ways, against the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mulroney). Ultimately that attempt failed. In fact, the ruse that was used by the Minister of Finance backfired; he has been subjected to great criticism across this land for his actions in an attempt to sustain the life of a dying government in the dying days of a Parliament.

The fact that the Minister was unable to achieve his ends through the unauthorized use of confidential material is really not the point in this context, however. What is important is that there was an attempt made to use information submitted to the Government in confidence in order to achieve what I can only describe as crass political objectives. If the Minister of Finance or any Minister of Finance is prepared to stoop to such levels and hunt through Government files in order to find material which may be damaging with respect to any citizen of Canada, it is absolutely critical that information collected clandestinely by a security service not be subject to similar abuses.

That is why this Bill is so important. When we are dealing with legislation which proposes extraordinary powers for a branch of government that will operate of necessity in the shadows, we must be extremely vigilant to ensure that there is no chance that those powers might be abused.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, as I mentioned at the outset, we have waited far too long for specific government initiatives in this regard. On June 26, 1969 the report of the Royal Commission on Security, the Mackenzie Commission, was tabled in this House. After four hours of debate it apparently suffered the fate of a great many royal commission reports; it was shelved and its recommendations were ignored by the Government.

It is some 15 years since that report was received. During that time the security service branch of the RCMP has continued to operate in a form of limbo. It has seen, among other things, the appointment of a civilian director and the hiring of civilian personnel for non-operational positions. In 1977 another royal commission was appointed, that being the McDonald Commission, as the result of events which took place primarily during the 1970s and primarily related to the activities of the FLQ in the Province of Quebec. By virtue of questions that were raised on the floor of the House of Commons, the Government had no recourse but to establish a royal commission to look at the circumstances surrounding allegations of impropriety that occurred at that particular time. I will refer to this matter later on in my remarks with respect to this legislation.

However, I think it is important for us to remember, Mr. Speaker, that during the course of the debate in the House of Commons leading to the McDonald Commission, not once did a member of the government of the day led by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Solicitor General or any member of the executive branch of the government of our country, stand and accept any responsibility whatsoever with respect to any of the occurrences that took place in the security branch under the direction of the Government of Canada.

Part of the mandate of the McDonald Commission was to report and advise regarding the policies and procedures governing the activities of the RCMP in the discharge of its responsibility to the security of Canada. The McDonald Commission reported in 1981 and presented some specific recommendations with respect to security matters. Yet it was not until May of 1983 that the Government got around to presenting the first draft of any legislation whatsoever. This was a delay of some two years, during which time heaven knows what went through the mind of the Minister. The Commission had spoken. The Minister sat mute for two years cogitating, reflecting and considering a response with respect to recommendations made by that Commission. It is hard to believe that after two years the Minister had to give the most serious consideration worthy of that Minister sitting in the other place, a place of sober thought. He had sufficient opportunity and time to consider his response, but it took him two years. It is hard to believe that with two years to draft legislation a Bill as flawed as Bill C-157 was the best that could be produced by this Minister and the Government.

It is just as appalling, 15 years after the Mackenzie Commission and two and one half years after the McDonald report, that this is the first opportunity the elected representatives of the people of Canada have had to debate the most critical of issues. That is a dereliction of responsibility on the part of the Government. That is far too long for us to wait to come to grips with respect to this type of legislation.

There is no question in my mind that, as a result of the ineptitude and inefficiency of this Minister and the Government, the morale of individuals who have served on our security service has suffered. They have been scrutinized by royal commissions. The service has been scrutinized by a Senate committee. Instead of producing legislation which was appropriate and realistic, the Minister intoduced a Bill which was poorly conceived, planned and drafted. In the area of national security, which is critical to any country's continued existence, this Government has bungled badly. It has not lived up to its responsibility. I suggest that we are paying the price now.

On the first occasion that we have had to consider this important legislation the Minister has suggested, both inside and outside the House, that we should close our eyes and not consider the matter of the responsibility invested in us by the electorate of Canada. This is unworthy of any minister of any cabinet. We on this side of the House take our responsibilities seriously. We are going to give this matter careful and reasonable consideration. We are not going to close our eyes and let legislation pass which is not satisfactory, appropriate and precise. The Minister should understand this. It has taken him a very long period of time to come up with his own proposals. It is a matter of right that we should give fair and reasonable consideration to this legislation on the floor of the House of Commons and in the course of committee hearings. It is not only the Members of Parliament but also the people of Canada who are interested in having appropriate and affective legislation and they should be given the opportunity of making their views known, notwithstanding the fact that we have had royal commissions and a Senate report. What we have before us now is a so-called new proposal brought forward by the Solicitor General after much surgery has taken place with respect to his original proposal, Bill C-157.

I would have hoped that after the Minister had gone through this process and chosen to act when he brought in this legislation, he could have gotten it right. Perhaps this is being too kind. When the Minister introduced his original legislation, Bill C-157, he said it reflected a fair and reasonable approach. He now says that the criticism of that particular proposal is exaggerated. I can only say that Bill C-157, which was introduced on May 18, 1983, was totally, abysmally and terribly wrong.

I would like to deal with that legislation, Mr. Speaker, because I think it is relevant to what we have before us today. After the 15-year period of consideration by a variety of royal commissions, that legislation was met with universal disapproval and disfavour. It was roundly and soundly criticized by every conceivable force. Provincial attorneys general were united in their opposition to that Bill. Civil liberties groups condemned it. The Canadian Bar Association is adamant that the Bill either had to be withdrawn or amended in a very substantial way. If I tried, in the time I had allotted to me today, it would be impossible for me to list all the groups, individuals and agencies that have shown deep concern with respect to the thrust and import of the proposal brought forward by the Minister.

The unified response by Canadians did not occur by accident. It was not a result of knee-jerk reaction. That response took place because the Bill was the most poorly thought out and seriously flawed piece of legislation that I have had the misfortune of seeing introduced in this House. Bill C-157 bore little resemblance to the recommendations made in the report of the McDonald Commission. In section after section fundamental safeguards necessary to protect the rights and liberties of Canadians have been omitted. From any perspective the Bill was an unmitigated disaster.

It was at this point that Members on this side of the House approached the Minister and suggested the subject matter of the Bill be referred to the Commons Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs in order to obtain the full scrutiny of the elected representatives of the people of Canada. We would have liked to have an all-Party committee which would go forward and consider the subject matter of that initial proposal. It seemed logical that a committee of the House composed of elected representatives would be an appropriate place to study this legislation. That offer was rejected out of hand by the Minister.

Mr. Kaplan: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I would like the record to be corrected in the assertion that it was the Government that rejected the establishment of an all-Party committee. The NDP were willing. It was the Conservatives who prevented it from happening.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): That is certainly not a question of privilege. The Hon. Member for Saskatoon West.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, the air is strange in the House today. There are hallucinatory activities taking place here of which I have no knowledge. I would like to say to the Solicitor General that I was privy to some of the discussions which took place. My colleague from Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence), who was the critic at the time, put the proposition to the Solicitor General that we should indeed have a standing committee of the House of Commons consider this matter.

The question of privilege is preposterous, as you have pointed out, Mr. Speaker. It has no relevance and is in fact without substance. If the Minister cares to dispute it, that is fine. I say that that is the fact. The record will show that the Solicitor General did in fact refer the matter to another body of appointed people. That is, to the other place. A select committee of the Senate was then created for the purpose of looking at the provisions of the original legislation. During this period of 15 years we have had appointed bodies of every description looking at this legislation.

I am making a specific point of this because I think it is important for the people of Canada to understand that this is the first time that people who must seek election from the people of Canada, who reflect their point of view and are sensitive to the points of view of average Canadians, have had an opportunity to consider this legislation. If ever there was any evidence required to show this administration's disdain and contempt for the House, it is shown in the way we were treated with respect to this legislation.

I want to talk about the work of the Senate committee. I think it was immediately obvious to the honourable Senators from both sides as well as independents on that committee that the legislation they were to study was a complete catastrophe. When the committee finally reported, it was unanimous in its castigation of the Bill. In what amounted to a clause by clause analysis and denunciation, the report recommended changes to almost every aspect and area of the Bill.

While it would take far too long for me to discuss all the recommended changes, let me touch upon some of the major proposals for reform. There was no question in the Senators' minds that the mandate for the force was far too loose and ambiguous. How could a force with such extraordinary powers operate under a sense of direction that did not make clear when those powers could be used? Of course, that could not happen if we want to retain freedom and liberty in this country. The Senators responded by making and proposing certain changes to tighten the mandate. They wanted to make it clear just what was meant by "threats to the security of Canada". They wanted to ensure that the force would do what was strictly necessary and no more. I want to deal with that particular and important aspect of the response of the Minister in due course.

The Senators also tried to grapple with the powers that the new force was to have. According to the old Bill, once a warrant was obtained employees of the force were pretty much free to do what they pleased. They could have access to income tax returns, statistical reports, census reports, doctors' files and psychiatric files, just to name a few. It would have been able to eavesdrop and wiretap anybody, any place, anywhere and at any time.

Mr. Kaplan: With judicial approval.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: You may think that these are pretty broad powers, Mr. Speaker. Indeed, I think any reasoning Canadian would say they are broad powers.

Mr. Kaplan: With judicial approval.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: You might think that such powers should be handed out only with a great deal of care and only under exceptional circumstances.

The Solicitor General says "by judicial warrant". He has made so many amendments with respect to this provision, after the scrutiny of the Senate, that one can only wonder what was in his mind when he used the term "judicial warrant" in the original proposal.

I want to deal with that because I think it is absolutely fundamental and essential. As I estimated, over half of the Solicitor General's remarks today concerned an area with respect to the vehicle upon which this agency should operate and whether it should be civilian or attached to the RCMP. I suggest to the Solicitor General that he should direct his attention to the primary condiserations that we should be giving to the Bill, which are the implications of the powers, the accountability and the mandate of this new security service. I suggest to the Minister that these are the areas for which we, as legislators, have a very important responsibility.

In the original proposal the Solicitor General made provision to allow a judge to hand out a warrant authorizing such powers if he was convinced that it was necessary to allow the Force to perforn its duties. Therefore, of course, there is judicial involvement. But the guidelines were absolutely missing from that whole scenario. It was highly discretionary on the part of the judge who would be considering that application.

The Senate committee characterized that standard as unreasonably low. I would go further. I would call it unconscionably low. It is, perhaps, a good example of what I would call the indifference to basic principles of justice that characterized that entire Bill.

There was a response to that flaw. The report in fact recommended stiffer standards for obtaining warrants, fixed time limits on the life of warrants and provisions to eliminate the potential for judge-shopping. The Solicitor General referred to that this morning.

The committee did not make any suggestions, however, regarding the tremendous power the force was to be granted. The report of the Senate committee dealt with this particular issue in one or two paragraphs. I believe this is an area that we in the House of Commons should carefully scrutinize. Indeed, the chairman of that committee, Senator Pitfield, has said himself, notwithstanding the fact that he had completed his responsibility of chairman of that committee, that there are areas that still require serious consideration by the House of Commons. If the chairman of the Senate committee believes that we still must give serious consideration to these matters, I am not one to question that.

With respect to the question of mail opening and access to medical records, the fact is that I want to have an opportunity to look at these items as a member of the committee so we can consider the appropriateness of these legislative proposals.

The Hon. Member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen), who served on that committee, I know will share my concern even though he is on the government side. He has demonstrated very often his independence and consideration for the rights of civil liberties for Canadians.

There was a storm of public controversy over the clause of the Bill that would have provided security service agents with a carte blanche to break the law. In response, the Senate proposed that agents have no more protection in this regard than is granted peace officers under the Criminal Code. That carte blanche provision that I have referred to may have caused a great storm of public controversy, but I suggest that it was not the most dangerous clause in a Bill filled with potentially dangerous provisions. That distinction goes to Clause 6 of the Bill which, if enacted, would remove one of the linchpins from our parliamentary system. This deals with ministerial responsibility and the concept of ministerial responsibility. I want to deal with that in relation to the new Bill as well because I am not satisfied with that element in connection with this legislation. We must give serious consideration to the element of ministerial responsibility because ministerial responsibility is absolutely fundamental to our system of parliamentary government. It is one of the bedrocks of our democratic system in Canada.

A Minister must be responsible to the House for his actions and the actions of the Government. The original proposal was to remove that particular fundamental principle, which would have allowed an appointed official, the Director of the service, to prevail over the Minister. The Solicitor General would have then been at arm's length from any of the activities of this service. When one sees this legislation as it was proposed, one does not have to wonder too much about why it was received with such universal disdain. If this provision had been enacted, the Solicitor General would have ceased to be responsible for his actions to the elected representatives of the people in the House of Commons. There can be no justification for attempting to include such a provision in any piece of legislation, let alone one this important.

Mr. Kaplan: It has been removed.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The Senate committee recommended a 180-degree turn in this area. In the words of the report, the agency should be an open book to the Minister. There is absolutely no question that that is how it must be. The Minister must have full political responsibility. Accountability must be absolute.

I want to deal with one final item of the proposals that were brought forward by the Minister before I deal with the current revised legislation. According to the original Bill, the Inspector General would review the ongoing operations of the force. In effect, he would be the eyes and ears of the Ministry. As with every other section of the Bill, this provision too was fatally flawed. The individual charged with a review of the day to day operations would not have access to relevant Cabinet documents. The service might have control of such documents and they may well base their operational decisions on them, yet this review mechanism could not see them. It could be, for all intents and purposes, hamstrung. The Senate committee recommended full access to Cabinet documents.

The Solicitor General, in the current incarnation of the legislation, has chosen not to accept this most important of the Senate recommendations, in my estimation.

• (1440)

This, then, is the gist of the recommendations made by the Senate. The Senate considered them carefully and in some detail. In so doing, the depth of general opposition could be fathomed. Whenever I see the Deputy Leader of the Senate on the government side, Senator Royce Frith, arm in arm, shoulder to shoulder with opposition critics, and when I see Liberal Senators castigating the Solicitor General and the Prime Minister with respect to this legislation, I know we have a problem. You do not have to take it from me, Mr. Speaker, even if you regard me as being partisan; when I see Liberals concerned with respect to the thrusts and the initiatives that have been taken, I know there must be something rotten in the state of Denmark, Canada. Everyone from Senator Pitfield on down were opposed to the legislation. It is impossible to find anyone except the Solicitor General and the Prime Minister who will say anything good about it. As a matter of fact, it is becoming more and more obvious that this must be the personal project of these two individuals. There is no one else sitting on that side of the House who will come close to admitting that they support the Bill.

Mr. Pepin: I do.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The Minister promised then to deal with the matter in an urgent and expeditious manner as soon as he received the report. We had first heard it was going to be December 1, 1983; then it was moved over until just before Christmas, and subsequently we now have the Bill before us today. I said in response on behalf of my Party that there are a number of items that have caused us the most serious of concerns. We in this Party are not able to support the legislation in its present form.

I want to give you some ideas, Mr. Speaker, because it is a complex piece of legislation and a complex Bill. I want to deal with some of the general themes that run through the Bill and some of the principles that I think should be contained in this legislation. I have alluded to some of them already in the course of my remarks today.

I want to say to the Solicitor General that we regard this legislation as important. We take our responsibilities seriously. We want to give this matter proper and responsible attention. In at least three critical areas, that is mandate, powers and accountability, there remain serious deficiencies in this legislation.

Let me begin with the first of those areas, the problem of how the force's mandate should be defined. Surely this is a key area, one that should have been given the utmost consideration. If we grant such enormous powers to an agency that operates outside the normal channels of public scrutiny, we must be clear, precise and unambiguous in setting forth what they are to do. This Bill fails to do that. Instead of resolving the problems surrounding this issue, it falls short of the mark of giving the precision of law that is absolutely necessary in this type of legislation.

I want to give some examples of definition and of what constitute threats to the security of Canada. The word "espionage" is used; it is a key part of the definition. You can target someone who is engaging in espionage that is against Canada. But what does it mean?

Mr. Kaplan: It is in the Criminal Code.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: If you check the dictionary, Mr. Speaker, you will find it means spying. But if you look at the Official Secrets Act, you will find that spying means just about anything you want it to mean. This does not make any sense at all.

Mr. Kaplan: Move your amendment.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Why not say to the Minister: "We require precise and specific definition with respect to these activities in the mandate of the force?" The same section in another part of the Bill has the same problem. It leads to a preposterous conclusion. It says, in effect, a Canadian citizen who supports the aims and activities of, for example, the Afghan rebels is a threat to the security of Canada. If the Minister will look at the provisions in terms of threats to the security of Canada, subclause (c), and if he follows that definition through, he will find that any person in Canada who supports any group or agency in a foreign state that is opposed to a tyrannical regime becomes, by that definition, a threat to the security of Canada. Does that mean that if we in this House support the existence of "Solidarity" in Poland, the trade labour movement, that we are suddenly, by virtue of the fact that there are incidents of violence that have occurred with respect to martial law, which the Prime Minister of this country has endorsed in that country, becoming threats to the security of Canada?

Mr. Cullen: No.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Are groups which support the Sandanista rebels a threat? I say the wording is still too vague. That has still to be thought out and given the kind of consideration that we say is required.

This is a very serious issue. There has been criticism already with respect to each of the definitions of what constitutes a threat to the security of Canada by such groups as the provincial attorneys-general, who say it is vague and unspecific. What about the definition:

—(b) foreign influenced activities within or relating to Canada that are detrimental to the interests of Canada and are clandestine or deceptive or involve a threat to any person—

I think we have to look at these definitions to make sure what we are getting into as far as the powers of this particular agency are concerned. That subclause is unacceptable to me and my colleagues in this Party.

Mr. Kaplan: Did you bring your proposed amendments with you today? Let us have your proposed amendments.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I say it is unacceptable to the people of Canada. we are going to take our responsibilities seriously. We are going to help the Solicitor General because, God knows, he needs help, I can tell you that. Watching him operate over the course of the last few years, I do not often agree with the Prime Minister, but when the Prime Minister referred to the Solicitor General as politically naive, for once the Prime Minister knew what he was talking about.

This piece of legislation grants enormous powers to the agency once a warrant for inclusive surveillance is granted. In this respect it does not differ from its predecessor. If passed, there would be no limit on the portions of a person's life and history that could be delved into. Mail could be opened and copied. Access would be available to all sorts of confidential files, from psychiatric reports to income returns. There would be a right to eavesdrop and wiretap.

The question that has to be raised is: Are all these powers necessary in every instance? Is there a need for such a wide range of extraordinary powers? Representatives of the people of Canada are entitled to have unequivocally, information with respect to this matter in order to pass judgment on it and make sure that the legislation is precise and clear. These are questions that deserve serious and sober consideration. They should not be dealt wiht glibly and without proper reflection. Surely in deciding powers of this magnitude, we should take all the care that is necessary to ensure that we provide the force with the powers that are essential for it to fulfil its functions. At the same time, we should be diligent in making sure that those powers do not exceed what is necessary.

It is interesting to note that the new Bill differs in this area in one substantial way from its predecessor. It exempts information submitted under the Statistics Act from the scrutiny of the service. This is not recommended by the Senate committee, but all of a sudden information under the Statistics Act is exempted from the scrutiny of this new security agency. It leads one to wonder what is the basis for it. Why this one exception to the situation where the people of Canada are obliged by law, under penalty of fine or indeed imprisonment, to complete census reports? People also have to fill out income tax returns by law. They have to complete a number of returns by law. Is that the theme or the principle that is running through this legislation? These questions have to be answered. Why only the Statistics Act? The Minister, I think, will understand if Members of Parliament are curious as to what the theoretical or philosophical basis is of that particular provision.

As I mentioned earlier, the absence of full ministerial accountability in the earlier Bill was absolutely unacceptable. The Solicitor General has in his latest incarnation adopted some of the Senate recommendations in this regard. I submit he has given only part of the answer with respect to the whole question of ministerial responsibility.

The truth of the matter is that neither the Inspector General nor any review committee under this legislation will have access to Cabinet documents in the control of this service. This means that the Minister and the Government can effectively hide behind Cabinet documents and in that way escape full accountability for their actions. Until there is full access to such documents, there cannot be full review. Without full review, there cannot be complete accountability.

I remind the House that we are here today because of the fact that over the course of the last decade the Government refused to accept any semblance or scintilla of ministerial responsibility with respect to its activities. We are precluded by virtue of the exclusion under freedom of information or any other legislation to look at the documents and gain any assessment of the pressures put on the security service to produce the goods regardless of the tactics used.

It is inconceivable that a Cabinet could sit around and be oblivious to what was going on, with what was happening and the kind of information it demanded from the security service of the RCMP in the early 1970s. There is no question in my mind that the Government and the Prime Minister put the finger on the security service to get the goods on the FLQ. When we do not have access to Cabinet documents, accountability in this country is a very pale shadow of the standard one would expect in a free and democratic society.

I could speak continuously about specific provisions of the legislation. They are woolly; they are not precise. There are certain principles for which we in the Progressive Conservative Party stand. One is that government under the rule of law is absolutely fundamental and essential in a free and democratic society. We in the Progressive Conservative Party have been concerned about the activities that have taken place. In terms of this legislation we understand that we have an awesome responsibility as the Opposition, because the Minister has stated on the floor of the House that he is prepared to put through this Bill as perfection in its present form. I am not alone in terms of my apprehension and concern with respect to this legislation. This is why I said on behalf of my Party that there are a number of reasons, which we will be able to examine during the course of this debate and during the course of committee hearings, why this legislation in its present from is unacceptable to us.

We want to be reasonable and to take our responsibilities seriously, but different signals are coming from the Government side. In conclusion, the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, the Hon. Member for Rosemont (Mr. Lachance), had the following to say about Bill C-9:

> It's not the kind of topic six months or eight months before an election that is really very high on the priority; you just don't, I guess, win an election with the passage of that kind of a Bill.

> So I don't sense very much of a pressure on the part of the caucus, be it on the Quebec side or the rest of the Liberal caucus, to have this Bill passed expeditiously.

As a member of the Opposition, I have a responsibility in our parliamentary system, as do my colleagues, to give careful scrutiny to legislation which comes before us to ensure that the rights and liberties of individual Canadians are fully protected. We intend to carry out that responsibility and to become involved as Members of Parliament to ensure that the right balance between national security and the fundamental principles of a free and democratic society will be achieved. We in the Progressive Conservative Party can settle for nothing less.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to take part in the debate on what is undoubtedly one of the most important pieces of legislation to come before this Parliament. The Senate committee, in examining the predecessor Bill, Bill C-157, referred to a delicate balance between on the one hand the security interests of the nation and on the other hand the fundamental civil liberties and rights of all Canadians. In examining the provisions of Bill C-9 which is presently being debated in the House, I believe that we must carefully question whether or not that delicate balance has in fact been achieved. Having reviewed the provisions of the legislation, not using as a yardstick the previous Bill or even the Senate committee report, but using the recommendations of the McDonald Commission and the basic standard which must be applied out of respect for civil liberties, it would be my submission that this Bill falls short of the minimum standards in this essential area.

Previous speakers have given some background of how we arrive at this position today. Not many people would have expected, when Corporal Robert Samson blurted out in a Quebec courtroom in 1976 that he knew of a few activities by the security service in which perhaps the Canadian people might be interested, what kind of Pandora's box he in fact was opening. As a result of the events which flowed from that outburst in a Quebec court, Hon. Members will know that the government of the day appointed the McDonald Commission in July, 1977 to conduct a comprehensive review of all aspects of security legislation in Canada, in particular to examine those activities which were not authorized by law.

The McDonald Commission held extensive hearings, heard from a broad cross-section of the community and from many different witnesses, and issued its report to the Government. In August, 1981 the Government responded to the recommendations of the McDonald Commission by saying that it was prepared to accept the fundamental recommendation of a civilian security service, that is, separation of the security service from the RCMP. However, in what was at the time certainly viewed by many as a monumental act of arrogance, the Government rejected the central underpinnings of the McDonald Commission report. It went so far as to obtain a second legal opinion, an opinion written by former Supreme Court Justice Spence and Toronto lawyer, Robert Wright, which effectively discarded the reasoning of the McDonald Commission. Certainly that was an immediate cause for concern to those of us who recognized our responsibility to move forward with changes in this area but not at the price of civil liberties.

Despite the widespread evidence of institutionalized wrongdoing, which was clearly documented in the report of the McDonald Commission, despite the evidence of wilful blindness on the part not only of senior members of the RCMP security service but, more important, their political masters, it is important to look at the record of what has taken place as a result of those revelations.

According to the report of the McDonald Commission, it found a willingness on the part of members of the RCMP to deceive those outside the force who had some sort of constitutional authority or jurisdiction over them or their activities. The McDonald Commission documented a series of wrongdoings and criminal activity, whether it be arson, theft, breaking and entering, kidnapping, illegal opening of mail, illegal access to government records, and unfortunately the list went on and on. As the Commission noted as well, one of the most reprehensible kinds of wrongdoing carried out by the RCMP was the wide range of illegal and improper acts carried out by the security service to disrupt radical political groups in Canada suspected of being threats to national security. Most of these activities were carried out in the early 1970s, following at least the tacit urgings of the government of the day to crack down on this kind of activity even though it was entirely legal.

I think it is important in establishing a historic context to remind Canadians of what it was that led us to this particular legislation. The McDonald Commission said:

● (1500)

> These methods violated the rule of law, inflicted damage on Canadian citizens and involved secret attempts to manipulate political events and the news media. Such practices not only violate important precepts of Canadian democracy but they may also seriously damage the security agency itself.

It concluded by saying:

> Approval of such tactics will reduce the public support for any kind of secret security intelligence activities.

What was the response of those who are constitutionally obliged to uphold the law in this country, to ensure that the principle of the rule of law which is now entrenched in the preamble to our Constitution is upheld? To this date there has not been a single prosecution of any breach of federal statute by the Government of Canada. The Government has decided that despite clear and compelling evidence of breaches of a number of statutes, whether it be the Income Tax Act, the Post Office Act or the Unemployment Insurance Act, there was to be no prosecution whatsoever for the breaches of those federal statutes.

At the provincial level, in the four provinces in which there was evidence of criminal wrong-doing—British Columbia, Alberta, Ontario and Quebec—it was only in the Province of Quebec and only following the report of the Keable Commission that the Attorney General of Quebec laid charges for the very serious breaches of the Criminal Code in that province. To this date it remains, and I put it at its most charitable, unclear as to whether there has been any disciplinary action taken within the RCMP security service as a result of the very clear breaches of the standards which must be upheld by a security service in a democratic society.

In August, 1973 the then Minister of Justice stated clearly and unequivocally that there was to be no disciplinary action whatsoever against any member of the RCMP security service for the breaches of the law and the breaches of the standards of the force, which were so clearly documented by the McDonald Commission. Just last week we heard from the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) the suggestion that in fact there was disciplinary action taken, but he was not going to tell us the nature of the disciplinary action, who it was taken against, when it was taken or why. Effectively what he said was, "Disregard the statement of the Minister of Justice who said there was to be no disciplinary action and trust me when I tell you that we have disciplined those who should be disciplined, but I am not going to tell you how or when".

What does that do to the rule of law? What does it do in terms of a deterrent to other members of the force who may be tempted in similar circumstances to breach the high standard of ethics of the security service? As I said, there has been no disciplinary action and certainly no prosecution whatsoever. In fact, they have made a mockery of the rule of law in this country.

There are 800,000 Canadians who have had files opened on them. According to the report of the McDonald Commission, the vast majority of those Canadians had committed no illegality whatsoever, yet we still do not know how many of those files are being destroyed or even the extent to which Canadians are being informed of the existence of such files or how they were used against them.

For almost two years the Government pondered and studied the recommendations of the McDonald Commission and somewhat ironically set up a transition force, whose chief policy adviser was one of the senior members of the RCMP security service who had first called for the establishment of the McDonald Commission. These deliberations finally gave birth to Bill C-157, tabled in May, 1983. This legislation constitutes a massive and unprecedented assault on the civil liberties of all Canadians. The Hon. Member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) pointed out that it was denounced across Canada by a broad cross-section of the community, whether it be provincial attorneys general, academics, civil libertarians, trade unionists and many others. However, when the official spokesperson for the Conservative Party stated that Bill C-157 met with universal disapproval and when he said that it was recognized at the time as being totally wrong, there was one slight omission from his speech. There was one very important group in this country that remained totally silent on this affront to civil liberties. One group refused to speak out, one group which sat silently as provincial attorneys general, civil libertarians and a broad cross-section condemned this Bill. The group that remained silent and in derogation of its responsibility to the people of this country was none other than the Conservative Party.

I challenge the Hon. Member for Saskatoon West and his colleagues, the Hon. Member for Durham-Northumberland

(Mr. Lawrence) and others who are now saying what a terrible thing Bill C-157 was, and it was, and what an assault it was on civil liberties. I ask those great defenders of civil liberties, where were they in May, June, July, August, right on through until January? They kept their heads in the sand and refused to take a stand. When the Hon. Member for Saskatoon West piously stands up and suggests that—

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In answer to the Hon. Member's question, I was in Toronto speaking against the Bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Hon. Members should not interrupt the Hon. Member who has been recognized to make a speech.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, once again I am pleased to see the Hon. Member for Saskatoon West. I am sure he will want to clarify the record if indeed he has taken a stand on behalf of his Party, or if the Hon. Member for Durham-Northumberland, who I believe was the critic, took a stand. Certainly I would be delighted to see the House enlightened as to the position that they took.

That silence was broken on one occasion by Elmer MacKay, the former Member for Central Nova, a couple of days after the Bill was tabled. First, he strongly supported the establishment of a civilian security service. He went on to say that in his view, Bill C-157 probably contained too many civil liberty safeguards which would hamper the work of the new security service. I should not have suggested that the Tory caucus was totally silent. I should have made reference to the remarks of the former Hon. Member for Central Nova. However, at a time when the Conservative Party had an obligation to speak out forcefully on civil liberties it remained shamefully silent. I remind Members of this House that that Member is now the senior policy adviser to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mulroney).

There were serious flaws in Bill C-157. The Solicitor General who brought that Bill forward heralded it as a great new innovation, a profound contribution to the strengthening of civil liberties of all Canadians. Of course, we know better. I am not going to take the time of the House to analyse in detail the deficiencies of that legislation. That has been done on a number of occasions, not in this House, but in forums across this country. The provisions of that Bill would have allowed the new security service, for example, under Clause 21 effective carte blanche to break any law, federal or provincial in this land. There were provisions in Clause 12 of the Bill which imposed, effectively, a media gag, a gag on the reporting of anything relating to the security service, even illegalities. There were provisions in Clause 2 of Bill C-157 which suggested that my colleague and friend, the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), could have had his mail opened, because of the threat to the security of Canada, for suggesting that we abolish the Senate. What kind of Bill was it which had provisions, Mr. Speaker, which would have allowed the director of that security service to tell the Solicitor General to get lost if the Solicitor General felt it was inappropriate for a particular group to be targeted? That is the kind of legislation which the Solicitor General brought forward at the time, the Solicitor General who remains, by some miracle, within the Cabinet and continues to bring it forward.

Bill C-157 was sent off to a Senate committee, chaired by Senator Pitfield who, interestingly enough, was one of the key advisers to the Government in its response to the report of the McDonald Commission. That Senate committee thoroughly studied the provisions of Bill C-157 and made a number of recommendations for improving that legislation, although it adopted the essential principles of the Bill. I should note as well that although this legislation meets some criticisms of the Pitfield committee, there are a number of important criticisms which were made by that committee which have not in fact been addressed. I should note as well that despite the scathing criticisms—which I certainly share—from the Hon. Member for Saskatoon West with respect to a number of provisions of Bill C-9, once again there would appear to be a double standard because the recommendations of the Pitfield committee, which formed the basis for this Bill—with one or two glaring exceptions—were recommendations based upon a unanimous report of the Senate committee. In other words, what the Conservative Party unanimously supported in the other place, it attacks in the House. It is not easy to follow that kind of logic.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak about the provisions of Bill C-9 itself and point to what we in this Party consider to be a number of very serious inadequacies in this legislation.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I must say Bill C-9 is still entirely unacceptable to the NDP. I do not think the Bill provides for that essential balance between the protection of individual rights and national security. In fact, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Security Intelligence Service is going to be a Canadian version of the CIA in the United States, with all the powers of that Agency and the possibility of abusing those powers. For instance, the Service will be given extensive powers such as opening first class mail and access to confidential tax and medical files, for instance.

Despite the improvements in this new version of the Bill, we believe it still constitutes an affront to the civil liberties of all Canadians.

[English]

There are three or four fundamental areas in this legislation which I would like to deal with. I would like to point out some of our broader areas of concern without dealing in detail, of course, at this second reading stage with the provisions of the Bill. It is important to examine carefully the proposed scope of this legislation. Under the terms of Bill C-9 there are three primary activities of the new security service. First, the security service would have the ability to monitor effectively and provide intelligence on what are defined as "threats to the security of Canada". Second, the security service would have the power to provide security assessments for the work of the federal Government. Third, in one of the provisions, which has been largely overlooked by the media, the security service would in effect have the right to operate in an area which has nothing whatsoever to do with national security. This has been in fact acknowledged by the Solicitor General in his testimony before the Senate committee. I am speaking now, Mr. Speaker, of the area of providing knowledge and information which might assist Canada in the conduct of external affairs. That has nothing whatsoever to do with national security. I will come back in a moment to deal with some of the very serious threats which are posed by this Bill under that particular heading.

In dealing with the proposed mandate of the security service with respect to threats to the security of Canada, I note that the definition which is contained in Bill C-9 is still significantly broader in a number of ways than that which was recommended by the McDonald Commission. Certainly there has been an improvement of Bill C-157 in Bill C-9. However, it remains a fact that Canadians who have broken no law whatsoever, but fall within the very sweeping mandate of this Bill, are subject to the intrusive powers which are set out in the legislation. The mandate has been denounced by such people as Attorney General Roy McMurtry, as being dangerously vague. That comes from one who is not known in this country as being a particularly strong defender of civil liberties. It is still the case, Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of this Bill, that a church group, trade union movement or any other organization which chooses to send funds to the African National Congress in southern Africa to support that country's liberation group which is in opposition to a system which is inherently violent, or to a Central American liberation movement, or, for that matter, to Afghan rebels, could have its membership targeted and all the intrusive techniques in this Bill could be used against it. Cruise missile protesters could possibly be targeted under the provisions of subsection (b) in this proposed legislation, if some over-zealous director felt they came under the influence of some foreign power. We need only look south of the border to see there has been some suggestion of that.

In defining the potential targets of this proposed legislation, surely we should be as careful as possible to ensure that we are dealing with legitimate threats to national security, whether it be espionage or terrorism, as is carefully and properly defined because, Mr. Speaker, we have seen all too often that where there exists the possibility for abuse in the surveillance of innocent Canadians, unfortunately that possibility will be taken advantage of. The security service opened files on over 800,000 law abiding Canadians.

I believe that the potential scope of the legislation, in terms of its potential targets, remains far too broad. However, in many ways the heart and guts of this Bill and the most important element of the Bill are the powers which are accorded to the new security service. It is in this area of the powers, which we are being asked as a Parliament to grant to this body—which will not remain accountable to a parliamentary committee—that I believe the greatest danger lies. It is in this area, Mr. Speaker, that the new civilian security service is being given powers far beyond those which are possessed by the present security service within the RCMP. The new security service would have the power literally to break into any place, anywhere in Canada. That would apply whether it be MPs' offices, doctors' offices, government offices—in fact, they would not have to break into government offices under the Bill because they would have access to those records as a matter of right—or into one's home. No place is sacred under the legislation.

Mr. Kaplan: With a judicial warrant.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): The Government would have access to literally all government records—I am sorry, the security service would have access to all government records, whether they be family allowance records, unemployment insurance files, income tax records, you name it. There would be carte blanche access to government records under the provisions of the legislation. As well, it would have access to all private records, medical records, phychiatric records, records of a lawyer, records of a clergyman, upon application to a federal court judge and upon the issuance of a warrant. Nothing is sacred.

Mr. Kaplan: There is an important safeguard.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Statistics Canada managed to obtain an exemption of the census records but beyond that, all records are subject to the scrutiny of the new security service.

What did the McDonald Commission have to say about the availability of records to the security service? It said that the security service should not be able to use any intrusive technique against Canadians who are suspected of engaging in subversive activities. It suggested that in dealing with those who are suspected of espionage or those who are suspected of terrorism, some intrusive techniques may be appropriate. It said very clearly that no intrusive technique, be it mail opening, be it access to government records, be it wiretapping, must be used against Canadians who are suspected of subversive activity. The Bill rejects entirely that fundamental recommendation and makes everyone the subject of these intrusive techniques.

The Solicitor General asks about the availability of a warrant. He says that they have to get a warrant. Certainly they have to get a warrant, just as the police forces today have to obtain warrants for wiretapping. If one looks at the statistics of applications under the provisions of the Criminal Code, one will find that over the last four years, out of a total of 2,000 or 3,000 applications, perhaps 15 or 16 have been rejected. What kind of safeguard is it when dealing with intrusive techniques to suggest that a federal court judge is going to act as a vetting device?

Mr. Manly: Dial a judge.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Dial a judge, as my colleague suggests. Certainly that is totally inadequate as a safeguard.

The Pitfield committee recommended that before any warrant is issued for the use of intrusive powers, a federal court judge should be required to balance the invasion of privacy, on the one hand, against the information which might be obtained through the use of intrusive powers, on the other. That important recommendation was rejected out of hand by the Government in Bill C-9.

The requirement for some safeguards in the placement of informers, which is surely one of the most chilling and intrusive techniques, is absent from the legislation.

The final major area of the Bill is the question of oversight and review. The Bill falls far short of what the minimal standards must be for proper oversight and accountability. There is an Inspector General and a Security Intelligence Review Committee, but both bodies are denied access to cabinet documents already in the possession of the security service itself.

As Professor Peter Russell said, the sheer arrogance of this provision is simply numbing. We must bear in mind that the Cabinet documents, with which we are saying we are not going to trust the Inspector General and the Security Intelligence Review Committee, are already in the possession of the security service. The people who we are being told are not trustworthy to deal with them are Privy Councillors appointed by the Government of the day. That makes a mockery of effective oversight.

The recommendation of the McDonald Commission for a parliamentary committee is essential if Canadians are to have confidence in the operation of a civilian security service, or any security service for that matter. Such a body has been proven to be effective in the United States and in West Germany. I suggest that a similar body is absolutely essential here. The McDonald Commission made it very clear in its report that in granting the sweeping powers it proposed—and I emphasize that the Bill goes far beyond the McDonald Commission and the powers it would propose—all of these parliamentary committees in the examples it used indicate a democratic desire to subject secret state intelligence activities to review by persons associated with the democratic critics of the Party in power. It is this fundamental recommendation that the Bill would totally ignore.

Another area must be addressed, Mr. Speaker, and that is the potential for abuse through the sharing of information obtained by the new security service with agencies in other countries. At one point the Solicitor General indicated that the present security service exchanges information with agencies in other countries. How can we possibly grant to a new security service the power to obtain sweeping access to information on the privacy of Canadians when we know that this information may end up in the hands of security agencies in other countries which are subject to no scrutiny whatsoever?

I mentioned the provisions of the legislation which would permit intrusive powers to be used against individuals who may have information which would assist in the conduct of the external affairs of Canada with no threat to national security whatsoever. A student group, an ethnic group, a foreign professor who may have information that is of assistance to the Department of External Affairs could have their mail opened, their telephones bugged and all other intrusive techniques used against them. In a democratic society surely a provision of that nature is completely unacceptable.

In three essential areas this Bill is completely deficient, that is, with respect to the potential mandate of the new security service, with respect to the enormous powers which might be used by the service, and with respect to the very question of oversight and parliamentary accountability.

It is most appropriate that the Bill is being debated in 1984, Mr. Speaker; it is most appropriate because it would be ironic if, in seeking to achieve the objective of guarding in Canada against totalitarian influences, we should adopt the very tools of those totalitarian governments themselves. Surely that would be the ultimate irony.

I suggest that the Bill in its present form constitutes a very serious threat to the civil liberties of all Canadians. It constitutes, in effect, an unwarranted invasion into the privacy of Canadians. We in this Party will do everything in our power to prevent the legislation, which constitutes such an affront to civil liberties, from being enacted.

Mr. Alain Tardif (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I take part in the debate this afternoon. First, however, I would like to say that the Opposition has been making remarks, criticisms and comments which unfortunately, in my own humble opinion, are more specifically concerned with the former version of the Bill. I may remind the House, Mr. Speaker, that Bill C-9 is entirely different from the first version, known as Bill C-157. In fact, the objective of over forty amendments made to Bill C-157 was as follows: to restrict the mandate of the Security Service. We also wanted to strengthen ministerial control and ministerial responsibility for the actions of the Security Service. Conditions for the approval and use of investigation techniques were to be more stringent. Furthermore, the amendments confirmed clearly that Security Intelligence Service operations were to observe the law in every respect. Provisions concerning surveillance and the examination of third parties were to be clarified and reinforced. There was also to be a re-affirmation of the powers of provincial Attorneys General to prosecute security offenses, while leaving the federal authority sufficient powers to intervene in the interests of national security. Mr. Speaker, I would say that the new version we are discussing today in the House has achieved these objectives and, for all practical purposes, reflects all of the major criticisms which were reasonable, up to a point, since the Government took the trouble to table a new Bill, as Bill C-9.

As the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) pointed out in his speech this morning, this Bill represents a major turning point for the Canadian Security Intelligence Service. The Bill was drafted with two major objectives in mind, the first being to provide a legal framework for the Security Service and the second, as important as the first, to strike a just and pragmatic balance between the protection of our national security and of civil liberties. About fifteen years ago, Mr. Speaker, the members of the Royal Commission of Inquiry on Security, Maxwell McKenzie, Yves Pratt and the Hon. H. J. Caldwell, stated the following in the Commission's report: The need for security practices exists mainly because the State has a duty to protect its information, institutions and policies against espionage, indiscretion, subversion and clandestine interference. History has shown that there have always been attempts at espionage, subversion and clandestine interference. In fact, such activities are going on at the present time, successfully or unsuccessfully, and they will probably continue in some way or other as long as international relations are based on the existence of sovereign states.

Twelve years later, the McDonald Commission, at the very beginning of its report, mentioned the same dangers described by the McKenzie Commission. In referring to activities of foreign agents, the McDonald Commission stated the following: These activities have not diminished, even though our country has not been at war for years and despite the lessening of international tension as a result of what the more optimistic among us call East-West Detente. In fact, in recent years the number of foreign intelligence organizations has not only increased but more and more, attempts are being made to use them against Canada, both for obtaining information and influencing our policies.

Over the past fifteen years or so, the issue of Canada's requirements for intelligence services have led to numerous and detailed studies as well as public debates which have kept the Canadian people and the Government increasingly aware of the ever growing complexity of threats to our country's security. The reports of the two royal Commissions to which I referred a moment ago have highlighted the painful but undeniable reality of life within the contemporary international community.

Today, Mr. Speaker, I would like to deal specifically with two subjects: first, international terrorism and, second, the so-called transfers of technology. Those two subjects stand as evidence of the increasing complexity of threats against intelligence services, and of the need for security organizations to respond with much more sophisticated and especially much more effective means.

Quite obviously, the technological explosion of the last thirty years has had a tremendous impact on the standard of living of western nations. As all Hon. Members know, we can see that in our daily lives; our defence capabilities and those of our NATO allies are increasingly dependent upon our technological skills.

Despite the many restrictions imposed on the exportation of those skills, much of our know-how has been acquired by East Bloc countries where it is used almost exclusively for military purposes.

Indeed, a number of articles and books have been published recently on that subject. For instance, I might mention The Falcon and the Snowman which explains in detail the methods used to make those clearly illegal transfers of technology. We have heard about many cases of such activities in recent years and, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I will mention a few.

First of all, I would remind the House that a Soviet trade representative was expelled from Canada in 1982 because he had secretly offered to a Canadian businessman a huge amount of money to buy restricted technology data in the field of optic fibres, saying that he would have no problems with Canadian export regulations.

Here is a second example. Three Soviet intelligence officers used Canada as a safe meeting place to obtain from an American engineer top secret information on military facilities in the United States. To accomplish their mission, they resorted to every imaginable traditional spying procedures and devices. Those agents were also thrown out of Canada.

And finally, a third example. As recently as last September, two Soviet diplomats based in Montreal were declared personae non gratae for attempting to obtain top secret high technology.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, those three extremely telling examples prove beyond the shadow of a doubt to what extent our secret technology is vulnerable and must be protected. They also indicate just how urgent it is to take action.

The second issue I wish to address is that of international terrorism, and in the introduction to its discussion on this threat to Canadian security, this same McDonald Commission wrote that the internationalization of terrorist activities since the end of the sixties has considerably increased this threat to Canada's security. It is interesting to note that the Royal Commission on Security did not even mention this threat in its 1968 report. It would be most presumptuous to predict the possible disappearance of the terrorist threat, because political fanaticism, instead of being on the decrease, is gaining in strength, and, unfortunately, modern technology often provides small groups of individuals with the means to threaten whole populations. Protection against terrorism will remain for a long time to come and without any doubt one of the major objectives of security measures. Throughout the world, the incidence of terrorist activities has increased dramatically in recent years. Like many other countries, Canada has had its own experience. For instance, Armenian terrorists have claimed responsibility for four bomb attacks, two extortion attempts and two assassination attempts aimed at Turkish diplomats in Ottawa, one of which unfortunately did succeed, as everyone will recall.

According to Senator Arthur J. Golberg, former U.S. Supreme Court Justice, the threat of modern terrorism goes beyond national boundaries and the interests of sovereign states. He goes even further by stating the following:

> This outbreak of threats and sacrifices in human lives jeopardizes both the growth and the operation of our system of international law. Indeed, modern terrorism, which now has at its disposal highly sophisticated technological means and may one day have access to biological and nuclear weapons, is a positive and real threat to the very existence of civilization.

The McDonald Commission has underlined the fact that modern terrorist groups are continuously improving their methods and have become real experts in the illicit pursuit of political objectives through violent means. This is why the Commission has laid so much emphasis on the need to collect factual information long before the evidence required to lay charges can be obtained, in other words, before acts of violence are committed and the police forces concerned are called in. Bill C-9 takes this fact into account and provides for an effective mechanism to counter the terrorist threat which is on the rise, even in Canada.

Before closing, I would like to mention another aspect of the debate on security intelligence which is the urgency of passing legislation. The Bill introduced in the House provides for the tools which will allow us to fight effectively against the ever increasing threats against Canada's security, including the two provisions which I briefly explained earlier. We must act now. The world of espionage, terrorism and subversion is not a static one; it evolves and gets more proficient even now as we are discussing the problems it creates and the methods by which we could protect ourselves against its attacks. This is why, Mr. Speaker, the Special Senate Committee stresses in its report the extreme urgency of passing security legislation. In doing so, it has joined the increasing number of security intelligence experts and enlightened observers who are urging us to pass legislation and pressing us to safeguard the interests of our country in the area of security. Bill C-9 meets this very vital need. Furthermore, it does so in a way designed to ensure at the same time complete respect and protection under the law of the basic rights and freedoms of all Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, I will say that it is obvious and generally admitted by all those who critized former Bill C-157 that Bill C-9 is an extremely innovative measure, a very good piece of legislation and something which should not be critized or questioned on grounds which, in some cases, might have been valid under the old formula, but which no longer stand.

Hopefully, the Opposition will aim its critics at suggesting other improvements. However, I would remind the House that Bill C-9 as reworded meets all the major concerns.

[English]

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Member who just spoke a question with respect to his defence of this legislation as being a significant improvement over the previous Bill, and in particular a response to the recommendations of the Pitfield committee. The Pitfield committee strongly recommended that the security service oversight body, the Security Intelligence Review Committee, and the Inspector General, should have full access to all documents in the possession of the security service itself. Despite that strong recommendation, the Government, in Bill C-9, has refused to accept that recommendation. We are left with the incredible provision that even though the security service has access to certain broadly defined Cabinet documents, the body which is responsible in the legislation for their overview is denied access to those same documents. How can the Parliamentary Secretary defend that particular provision of the Bill and the decision of the Government to ignore that fundamental recommendation of the Pitfield committee?

[Translation]

Mr. Tardif: Mr. Speaker, as I mentioned earlier in my statement, Bill C-157 received a number of amendments, I even said earlier there were some 40 of them. Clearly, if we use the previous wording to focus on a specific situation, one may find ourself with an insatisfactory answer. However, I would suggest to the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) that looking at the new version, Bill C-9, we find a significant number of provisions through which all security measures are made much more flexible, open and consultative.

[English]

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Parliamentary Secretary might now wish to answer the question. The specific question was; why was the Pitfield committee's fundamental recommendation that the overview committee should have access to all documents in the possession of the security service, including Cabinet documents, rejected?

[Translation]

Mr. Tardif: The answer is quite simple, Mr. Speaker. The Government did not deem fit to act on that.

[English]

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I have another question in another area. Under the provisions of this legislation the new civilian security service would be entitled to exchange information which it obtained through the use of its intrusive techniques with secret security agencies of other countries. Given the fact that the new security agency will have sweeping access to a whole series of confidential information about Canadians, is the Government prepared to indicate precisely with which agencies of foreign countries it is going to be sharing this information?

[Translation]

Mr. Tardif: Mr. Speaker, clearly I cannot speak on behalf of the Government. But as far as I am concerned, this is a matter to be settled by the Consultative Committee which, on the basis of circumstances, will decide whether or not such information should be made public.

[English]

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Parliamentary Secretary might in fact answer the question. It is a very straightforward question. Is the Government going to be making public the names of those agencies of other countries with which the security service will be exchanging information?

[Translation]

Mr. Tardif: I don't believe so, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, he does not believe so. In other words, Canadians are going to have intrusive techniques used against them and information is going to be given to unnamed agencies in unnamed countries.

● (1550)

My final question concerns a very important issue. Following up on the recommendations of the McDonald Commission, the Minister of Justice (Mr. MacGuigan) indicated that no disciplinary action whatsoever had been taken against members of the security service for the wrongdoings and breaches of the law which were identified in the report of the McDonald Commission. The Solicitor General has said that disciplinary action had been taken. I want to ask the Parliamentary Secretary, which one is accurate?

[Translation]

Mr. Tardif: As far as I am concerned, may I indicate to the House that to my knowledge, there are some ten cases where proceedings were instituted in Quebec.

[English]

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I was not referring, of course, to criminal prosecution. I was referring specifically to disciplinary action taken within the RCMP security service.

Is the Parliamentary Secretary now indicating that in fact disciplinary action as opposed to criminal prosecution has been launched against any members of the security service?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Chair may not have listened as attentively as it normally does to the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary's speech, but under the provisional rules of the House which allow for this period of questions and comments, questions should relate strictly to the comments raised in the course of the Hon. Member's speech and should not introduce new elements. As I say, I give the benefit of the doubt to the Hon. Member and will allow the Parliamentary Secretary to respond if he so pleases.

[Translation]

Mr. Tardif: In response to the last question, Mr. Speaker, I believe the Solicitor General did indeed answer to that, namely that proper steps have been taken concerning disciplinary action.

[English]

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge-Foothills): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to rise as a second member of this Party to debate Bill C-9, an Act to establish the Canadian Security Intelligence Service.

Before I begin my remarks I have one or two comments to make respecting the speech made by the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson). It is always interesting to listen to him because he was trying to allude to the fact that this Party was somehow not defending the interests of Canadians. Yet I personally know that our Members were out across the country speaking against Bill C-157. But that Hon. Member was right out of the saddle immediately, so much so that he was kicked out of the justice portfolio by his Leader. He was actually denounced by his Leader and put on the back-benches. Of course, he was denounced by his Party.

With respect to the divorce legislation, he was up in a flash agreeing with another government Bill on divorce, only two weeks later to find that once again he was repudiated by his Party since they are actually opposed to the Bill, having followed the Conservative Party.

When he talks about those states which interfere with people's rights and how the NDP will protect people's rights, I ask him, who has violated people's rights more than the socialist countries in the world? Who is the vice-president of the Socialist International? His own grand, glorious Leader. What a shame it is.

I believe that we should never forget the history behind this legislation. I think there is no doubt that Canadians have been concerned about this issue for many years. Royal commissions, which began their work 15 years ago, said that we needed to have a civilian security service or one that was isolated from the RCMP.

This ultimately led, some 15 years later, to Bill C-157. That Bill was so defective, in spite of the fact that the Government had been addressing this issue for 15 years, that it did not even dare bring it up for debate on second reading. Following first reading of the Bill, broad segments of the country, after a cursory examination, raised such a ruckus that the Government had to defuse the situation. It did so by referring the matter to a Senate committee, which then made over 40 major changes to the Bill.

While this is a relatively small Bill consisting of some 46 pages only, its effect will change the entire nature of the country over a period of years. I have always been astounded by the thinness of the Bills and the major effect that we as parliamentarians have on the lives and future of our fellow citizens. This is true whether it is a constitutional Bill, the omnibus Criminal Code Bill we are considering or a short Bill such as Bill C-9.

I am anxious to hear other Members speak during second reading debate because I believe this is an issue about which we should be non-partisan. It is an occasion when we should be examining the subject matter of this Bill in an honest attempt to do what we believe is best for the country. I am anxious for the Bill to go to committee so that various groups in Canada, such as Alan Borovoy and the Canadian Civil Liberties Association, can be heard. When we hear from groups through out Canada we will know what they think about Bill C-9.

While Bill C-9 is substantially different from Bill C-157, it contains many clauses which should concern citizens. It is the fundamental nature of the citizens of our country to believe that we should operate under the rule of law. If I can critize the Government for anything, it would be for its breach of that principle of the rule of law by allowing people's rights to be attacked and thus allowing them to lose the presumption of innocence. We have members in the House who have suffered from that loss of the presumption of innocence by what is almost an innuendo. People are worried about the Bill because we have lost that sense of rule of law.

Another fundamental principle for which we all stand is responsible government. Once again, Canadians are worried because they sense that political partisanship is taking over, primarily because the Liberal Party has been in power so long, because of the nature of its federal Constitution, and because of the lack of autonomy at the riding level of its executive association. Canadians have the sense that Liberal backbenchers are not holding the Cabinet responsible for that tradition of a responsible government. That is why Canadians are worried about this Bill.

The primary concern of Canadians to whom I have talked is that the Liberal Government has been in power for so long that it has lost that sense of ministerial responsibility as it exists in the United Kingdom parliament. In Britain, Callaghan resigned as minister because of a report that came in days or almost weeks ahead of the Falkland Islands' issue. As a man of honour he said that although it was only a small memo, ministerial responsibility required him to step down because the integrity of the British way of life was affected. One has to admire him for resigning.

I can relate several cases where this example has not been followed by Cabinet Ministers in the present Liberal Government. If they had done so, they would not have been greatly hurt and it would have maintained that principle of Canadian law which is ministerial accountability. I believe that is why Canadians are worried about this Bill.

If this Bill had been proposed years ago by Prime Minister St. Laurent or Prime Minister Diefenbaker, I suggest that it would have been much better received because Canadians then had a central trust and belief that the Government would do what is right under the circumstances. They do not have that trust today. Hopefully after an election and a change of government there can be a whole new group of persons in the Cabinet who will lead to that restoration of trust so that the Bill could be brought back at that time.

We must face the question as to whether this Bill is needed at all. Those who are in favour of it support that view by referring to the growth of the intelligence service throughout the world. Since the Second World War there has been the Soviet school of thought and the American school of thought, with the fight between the two philosophies.

May I call it four o'clock?

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

REIMBURSEMENT OF LEGAL FEES

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of introducing legislation to allow the reimbursement, by the government, of all professional fees and other costs incurred by an individual for his defence against any action commenced by the Crown, including by way of indictment or summary conviction and including all appeals, and all other situations where the resources of the Crown caused an individual to incur expenses to defend himself against an action of the Crown:

1. where an individual is so required to take action under any Act of the Parliament of Canada and is subsequently found to be right; or

2. where, following the commencement of proceedings against an individual, the Crown has dropped the action.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak for a long time because the time for Private Members' debate is rather limited. I hope a few other Members of Parliament will speak to this issue and support it, and I hope that we might finish our debate today in time to move the subject matter to committee so we can commence action in this direction, which is what is indicated.

The thought pattern and the experience which lies behind my decision to bring this motion forward to the Parliament of Canada really arises out of my experience as an elected politician since 1979. As a private citizen, not charged with the responsibility of representing others, I was unaware of the difficulties which we have created in modern Canadian society through what I believe to be the attempt of legislators to do what is right. We pass in this House of Commons page after page of laws day after day. We have reached a point where the laws of Canada grow in number daily. One of the powers we give to the Cabinet of Canada when we pass a law, and we do it frequently, is the power to make Orders in Council and set regulations. Last year, over 4,000 different regulations of that kind were passed. Then we turn around and we have to hire people to interpret those regulations and in some cases to enforce those laws. People are only human. From time to time some are over-zealous in the interpretation of a regulation. When that happens, quite often there is an enormous stress put on the individual, an enormous psychological cost. Accompanying that there is always financial expense. In many cases that financial expense is massive, sufficient to bankrupt an individual, causing irreparable damage to members of his or her family.

I thought long and hard about what we could do about it. Certainly we cannot eliminate this situation. If we are going to have an orderly society with laws and regulations, then we need to have some system that holds individuals accountable for obeying those laws and regulations. We need in a modern society, given the proliferation of those laws and given the fact that there are well over one-quarter of a million people serving the Government of Canada in the enforcement of those laws, a system where the individual does not suffer what really amounts to a financial fine, not because he did wrong but simply because he was accused of doing wrong.

I did not attempt in this motion to provide taxpayers' dollars to those who have done wrong. I attempted to separate the difference between those who have done wrong and those who are accused of doing wrong. I looked at the recent debates in the House of Commons. We have had a lot of concentration on the tax man. We have talked a lot about reassessments and a lot about appeals. What is happening out there—and I think every Member of Parliament knows it—is that if the tax man comes along and says, "We are reassessing you for $200 more tax, $800 or $1,000 more tax," we encounter individuals who say that that is wrong. We hear people say that that is the wrong interpretation of the tax law. But the bureaucrats say, "If you believe that, appeal". The taxpayer looks at the cost of appealing. It may amount to $5,000 or $50,000, but it is more than the amount of reassessment. It is a pretty normal human reaction to say, "I am right. I would like to prove that I am right. I would like to prove that the tax man is wrong, but it will cost me so much money that I will be better off simply to accept the judgment of the civil servant"—the servant of the people.

I looked at environmental regulations and I looked at the election law itself. In those two areas action can be taken by civil servants against an individual. The individual can feel he or she is right, but that individual has to judge whether the cost of proving he or she is right outweighs the benefits to be gained by knuckling under. Far too often, I suggest, every Member of the House has encountered case after case after case where individuals knuckled under to a determination made by a single individual because the cost of proving themselves right far outweighed the benefits to be gained.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that is not the way we should be defining Canadian society. If we are going to have big government, if we are going to have rules and regulations, surely the cost to an individual should not commence at the moment of accusation. It can commence at the moment of conviction. If the taxpayer is proved to be wrong, if a person has broken the criminal law, then perhaps that is appropriate. We should not be the victims of an assertion by a single individual in the bureaucracy who says that we have done something wrong. Those rules and regulations run right across the Department of Justice, from licensing, to transportation, to the fisheries.

One of the first things that happened to me as a Member of Parliament concerned regulations and statutory instruments. I looked at a regulation where a fisheries officer could get on a citizen's band radio and say, "As of this moment, the following tackle is illegal to use". The penalties which flow to the individual at that moment in time are immediate confiscation of the equipment and a fine. That is instant law, Mr. Speaker. That is a difficult kind of law for individuals to protect themselves against.

I have seen Customs hold up shipments of such things as crab destined for restaurants on some kind of technicality which the taxpayer ultimately proves should not have happened. It might be a customs officer who got out of the bed that morning on the wrong side. The recipient of that cargo or the shipper pays. Somebody pays. It is not the civil servant, it is not the Crown; an individual pays. I suggest those kinds of things should not be allowed to continue. I suggest we should have a system whereby, when this big thing called the Crown with all of its resources, with all its civil servants, with all its lawyers and with all its financial clout, attacks an individual and the individual is subsequently proved right, we, the taxpayers of the country, collectively have at least the responsibility to reimburse that individual for the costs incurred to defend themselves from the action of the Crown. Today the Government and the individual are like David and Goliath. In most occurrences in Canadian society, David is fined the minute a bureaucrat takes an action, even when the bureaucrat is wrong.

If my motion were to be adopted and we had such a system, we would be able to spot over-zealous bureaucrats if their personal records indicated they had been frequently wrong. They would be costing taxpayers money time after time by making accusations or interpreting regulations in a manner which the lawmakers did not intend or in a manner which was unfair to the individual. Society would be better off with a system of accountability for the tiny minority of bureaucrats or public servants who are over-zealous from time to time and cause difficulties to individuals.

I know other Hon. Members of the House would like to speak to today's motion. As the debate continues this afternoon, I hope they speak positively about it. With their experience as elected representatives, I hope they understand the wisdom of it and the need for it in modern society. I sincerely hope that the debate concludes prior to five o'clock so that we can move a motion to have the subject matter referred to committee. We are not prejudging what the committee will decide, but if the subject matter were referred, an investigation could begin as to its principles, the costs in relation to it, and the need for it. Hopefully the committee would report back to Parliament in the not too distant future.

I commend the motion to the House. I sincerely hope it is referred to committee by five o'clock this afternoon so that we can get on with trying to correct something which really needs correcting in modern Canada.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to participate in this debate this afternoon. It is almost a case of déjà vu. However, I commend the Hon. Member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes) for bringing this particular subject matter to the attention of the House and those people who will follow it on television, read about it in the newspapers or listen to it on the radio. It is an area of concern to more and more Canadians. Certainly it is of concern to more and more of us serving as elected representatives.

In a previous motion not unlike that of the Hon. Member, it was suggested that costs should be charged as an expense against a Department in cases where the particular Department, be it the Department of the Environment, the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, the Department of National Revenue or whatever, moved into an area or went against a Canadian for a particular breach or action which it saw as inappropriate and in which the Canadian was proven to be correct in the final analysis. As the Hon. Member wound up his comments, it reminded me of the earlier debate concerning people who take an initiative but in effect do not suffer any consequence if they are wrong; in effect they have nothing to lose. Obviously I do not think that it should come out of their own pockets. They have a role to play, but I wonder whether they would give the situation a sober second thought when initiating an action, be it the seizure of goods at Customs such as fishery equipment about which the Hon. Member talked a suggesting that there has been a violation of an environmental regulation or law, if they knew that, in the event they were wrong in their interpretation or the action they took, it would be the responsibility of the particular Department for which they worked. In that way we might have a little more consideration for the ordinary Canadian in terms of this particular subject.

I am sorry the Hon. Member has not given his particular motion more focus. Frankly, it is too broad, it covers the entire waterfront. Seemingly he is trying to solve the situation by having the subject matter referred to a committee, but we must remember that a whole series of subject matters are covered by the Hon. Member. Whether it is that people prosecuted under the Criminal Code should have some basis for compensation if they are ultimately found innocent, whether it is a tax situation or a fisheries move, he should have focused his motion upon one particular area. Then we could have come to grips with how much it would cost, what would be the impact of sanctions on a particular Department or how many people would be involved.

When we embark upon a new idea such as this, obviously we meet a lot of obstruction from governments, whether they be federal, provincial or municipal. We have to start small with a pilot project to show that it is a good move, that it is in the best interests of the Canadian public or at least the people who find themselves subjected to such action.

The Hon. Member suggested that someone might discover that to fight a reassessment of $200 or $400 more in taxes would cost him quite a bit more. That is not unusual. At the provincial level I know of people who did not make an improper left-hand turn or were innocent of careless driving but were advised that if the matter were taken to court the legal fees, or the costs and fines if they lost, would be such that the old phrase used in grade B movies, "pay the $2" applied. The ordinary person would say that he was satisfied he was right but that it was not worth $200 to try to save $50, so he abandoned the initiative. Frankly that is too bad. With the legal aid system in most provinces now, there are probably more actions being taken by individuals, particularly those at the low end of the economic scale, who have counsel and are able to go to court at no great expense to themselves.

I do not think most Canadians who have been on the receiving end of an action by government or a government agency need to be convinced that some form of assistance should be available to individuals wrongly charged. It is not so much charged; this is where I lose my hon. friend in criminal proceedings. It would have to be the more heinous type of crime where in the prosecution of it the Crown attorney or whoever deals with the matter might have been a little more careful, but I am uncertain whether I could go along with the Hon. Member on the prosecution aspect. I am thinking more along the lines of civil matters where a better case could have been made. Often we are called upon as Canadians to accept interpretations because we do not have the wherewithal to proceed. I think that is the point of the Hon. Member's motion today. As I said, it should have been a bit more focused.

The Hon. Member talked about costs to the individual. I wonder what his motion would represent in the form of costs to taxpayers, in terms of clogging up the court system or administrative tribunals. Has he thought beyond the fact that in the final analysis the cost to the individual may be difficult to bear? Has he thought about what would be the cost to taxpayers? Would a clogging up of the courts system or administrative tribunals flow from the things suggested in the Hon. Member's motion? Frankly, I cannot see this motion or its subject matter going to a committee. I could see a motion with more focus in one particular area so that we could examine what it would cost and what would be its impact on tax tribunals or the courts of the land. In that way we could make a better case for the type of thing the Hon. Member is trying to bring about.

On the face of it I find it difficult to determine what the motion is endeavouring to include. It would appear that it contemplates the establishment of a general legislative scheme to cover criminal prosecutions in which the Crown does not proceed with a prosecution or in which the accused is not convicted. Certainly that is the focus of public concern in recent cases about which we have heard, particularly the one in the Atlantic provinces where an individual charged with murder was found some 10 years of 11 years later to be innocent of the crime. If ever we need an argument for capital punishment, I am sure that case would be used in future debate. Beyond that, the terms of the motion would appear to extend to civil matters, to interlocutory proceedings and so on.

In this context the question must be asked: In what circumstances an individual is considered to be required to take action, to use the term of the motion itself? One would wonder what the phrase "other costs', may mean in the context of these various situations. We could determine that if we were dealing only with income tax interpretations by the Department of National Revenue. In that area we could bring about a focus and determine what is meant by the Hon. Member when he uses words like "other costs".

Assuming that a clear understanding could be reached as to the precise scope of the scheme that is contemplated in the motion, I believe that the proposals still give rise to a number of substantive and complex considerations which merit further exploration. Let me first address the question of criminal prosecutions. As Hon. Members are aware, the Criminal Code is federal legislation and is therefore covered by the terms of the motion. Indeed, under the Constitution Act, 1867, it is the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada to make criminal law and procedure.

Consideration of whether the state should provide a scheme for the reimbursement of all those who are charged with a criminal offence and who are not convicted—either by reason of a stay of proceedings or withdrawal of charge, the finding on a preliminary inquiry that the matter should not be sent to trial, an acquittal or a later determination that a conviction has been entered in error—must begin with a recognition of the traditional stance adopted in a common law jursidiction such as ours.

Traditionally, the law has not provided compensation for accused persons who have either been discharged at a preliminary inquiry or acquitted at trial, because it was felt to be in the public interest that persons involved in the discovery and prosecution of crime should not be constrained unduly by the fear of civil proceedings, particularly in view of the unpredictable outcome of any criminal proceedings. However, it would be wrong that a citizen should have to bear the expense of a criminal proceeding where, at the outset, there were not reasonable and probable grounds to commence the proceedings and they were conducted with malice or for a purpose other than that of carrying the law into effect. The law has for these reasons permitted a private action for damages in cases of malicious prosecution.

In deciding whether to supplement or replace this private action with some form of public compensation measure, a number of factors have to be taken into account. One factor we simply cannot get around in the Canadian context is that of the division of responsibilities for criminal justice in Canada between the federal and provincial levels of government. While the legislative responsibility for criminal law and procedure lies clearly within the federal Parliament, the decision whether to prosecute in any given case under the Criminal Code generally rests with provincial authorities, in particular the provincial attorneys general.

I think any discussion at this point, and here I am restricting my comments to criminal prosecution, must also take into account the fact that many thousands of people accused of criminal offences do have their legal costs paid by legal aid schemes established by the provinces and cost-shared by the federal Government. I found an interesting statistic when preparing for this address. In 1981-82, the federal Government contributed almost $30 million toward the cost of providing criminal legal aid services in over 200,000 cases across the country. I believe this consideration is important to take into account in determining the scope of the problem in light of the extent of the actual need. This is without those things which the Hon. Member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes) is talking about. In one year we are looking at 200,000 cases and $30 million. What would be the scope of the recommendations contained in the Hon. Member's motion? I think it is worth repeating that there has to be more focus.

Quite apart from questions of constitutional responsibilities, there are questions of program design, which I believe is important to sort out in considering these issues. For example, should the legislative scheme suggested by the terms of the motion extend to all those individuals who are charged with a criminal offence and not convicted, or should assistance be provided on a more restricted basis? If the basis is to be restricted, according to what criteria should it be limited? Should it cover compensation for all costs incurred by an accused person in the case of his or her defence, or should there be a ceiling on such expenditures? The terms of the motion as it is stated do not make this entirely clear. Should ability to pay figure in the design of the scheme? Should there be separate provision made for those who are later found to have been wrongfully convicted, or should such cases be dealt with by a general scheme where primary emphasis would be on successful defendants at trial or on appeal?

One option in respect of this entire subject is, of course, to use executive discretion, for example in the case of ex gratia payments to deal with, thankfully, rare instances of serious miscarriages of justice. Such an approach, of course, allows for a flexible, specific, case by case examination of particular circumstances. Whether the flexibility afforded by this option outweighs the certainty provided by legislatively created schemes such as that contemplated in the motion is a matter that should be considered in light of the factors of relevance.

Having raised a number of these points, again restricted to the topic of criminal prosecutions rather than civil or any other actions, pursuant to federal statutes, I would draw to the attention of the House the fact that a number of examinations on this subject have already been undertaken in Canada. The Law Reform Commission examined the matter some years ago in its study paper on costs in criminal cases. I believe the Commission will be looking at the matter again in the context of its phase one consideration of issues relevant to the criminal law review. In addition, the Canadian Bar Association has been doing a considerable amount of work in this area and may shortly be making the results of the examination more widely available. The Government of Ontario has also considered the many complex issues involved and will, according to the media, be making the results of this examination public before too long.

In view of this activity and in view of the fact that the federal Department of Justice is continuing to monitor the issues involved, it may be advisable to defer any formal action with respect to the suggestion put forward in the motion until the results of these various studies and reports are known. There is always a criticism of the fact that we study things to death, that we have too many studies or that we have a committee. I believe it is better to have these studies and act from a base of intelligence and knowledge on the subject than it is to adopt a shoot-from-the-hip kind of approach where we do not know the costs involved and do not know the complexities because we have not given the subject proper study.

Because of the uncertainties which I believe are contained in the terms of the motion—and I have not touched on anything but the criminal side in my remarks this afternoon—I believe it would be the best course to seek clarification on the part of the mover of the precise scope of the scheme which he has in mind and to review the situation in light of various other studies that are being undertaken both by private bar and by provincial governments which, on the criminal side, carry the main burden of responsibility. I think it would be premature for the federal government to take generally applicable action in a field where a major, indeed perhaps the primary, impact would be felt by the provinces.

I do not want to take any more time of the House. I know other of my colleagues are interested in this subject. They feel there is some kind of assistance that might be made available to various Canadians. I believe some form of executive discretion is probably the best system at this stage. I would like to see it exercised on more occasions than it is at the present time. There are hardships which, with any kind of presentation or representation, should receive serious consideration. Where it is an area of mixed federal and provincial jurisdiction, surely the Minister of Justice and provincial attorneys general could get together and work out some kind of scheme so that funds could be made available in classic cases where there has been a miscarriage or truly an expense to an individual. As the Hon. Member for Calgary West said, it may very well affect the rest of their life. I again thank the Hon. Member for bringing this subject matter forward. I would be very interested—

Mr. Gilchrist: Let the committee decide it.

Mr. Cullen: The Hon. Member says, "Let the committee decide it". My point is that no committee could decide this because it is so vague and covers so many areas. The next time the Hon. Member brings the motion forward, he should focus on one area. Let us look at that, make a pilot project of it and see if we can make it work.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support Motion No. 58 presented by the Hon. Member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes). I fully endorse the intent of the motion. I will speak very briefly because it is important that this matter go to committee. I had the occasion of working on a case which I believe this House should be very concerned about. It is directly related to what this Hon. Member is trying to do. There is a young married woman with two children in my riding. Her husband passed away and she was not given the survivor's benefit from Canada Pension. It went to her husband's common-law wife. After almost a year of writing back and forth, she finally came to me with this problem, and I represented her at a board of referees' hearing held to decide whether she is entitled to this pension because of her marital status. There was representation there by myself, a representative of the Government of Canada and an independent judge on that panel. The unanimous decision of that review board was that this woman was to receive the survivor's benefit.

• (1630)

The Department of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) appealed that decision, which forced this young woman to seek legal advice. Almost a year later, after going through the agony of discussing these matters with legal people and contacting various people to back up her submission, the case was finally heard and she won through the judge's fair decision. She was reimbursed in full retroactively. However, Mr. Speaker, there were lawyer's fees of $1,600 which were incurred through no fault of her own. This expense was incurred through the process of appeal which was caused by the Department of National Health. I would like to read into the record a letter which I wrote to the Minister of Health on February 3, 1984. I will not use the woman's name because I think that would be wrong. It reads:

I am writing to you regarding—

A constituent—

—of Revelstoke, British Columbia.

Her case—

—went to a Review Committee which ruled unanimously in her favour, that she should receive Canada Pension Plan survivor's benefits payable on behalf of——her late husband.

Your Department appealed this decision to the Pension Appeals Board, which has also ruled in—

—her—

—favour, and I understand that she has received retroactive payments. Because of your Department's appeal to the Pension Appeals Board, it was necessary for—

—her—

—to hire a lawyer to protect her interests. This cost her over $1600, which I feel should be paid by your Department.

I am enclosing an itemized statement of her account and I trust that your Department will deal with it in the appropriate way.

There were many hardships created which this woman had to go through and it was only through my persuasion at the very end that she, very reluctantly, continued on with it. Therefore, I want to congratulate the Hon. Member for Calgary West for his motion. I urge this House at least to allow it to go to committee so that these kinds of things can be discussed and, hopefully, something will come out of it so that individuals such as my constituent will not have to go through this kind of procedure.

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): There is within Canadians, Mr. Speaker, something we might call "an innate sense of fairness". When we see something happening which works against an individual, which puts him at a grievous disadvantage, even though strict legality was adhered to, we feel that something has gone wrong and amends have to be made. Part of our job as Members of Parliament is to bring these things to light. Over certain years or certain months we hear countless horror stories. We have heard some this afternoon. I intend to give you other examples of where Canadian citizens have found themselves holding the short end of the stick when they have been up against the state, the Government.

I am pleased that the Hon. Member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes) introduced this motion this afternoon. I am pleased that the Hon. Member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen) went into the basic idea in some detail. It gives us an opportunity to address these issues so that perhaps in future we do not have to raise them day by day as we presently do. It seems there is a difference in what we might call the general criminal law—and I do not use the term in a technical way. Perhaps a better idea might be to call it the "traditional law"—cases of assault, break and enter, robbery and these type of criminal offences. We have in our legislation a great deal of protection for the individual, whether that individual be the victim or the accused. When it comes to victims, we have provisions for restitution. We have provisions at the provincial level by way of criminal injuries compensation. If someone is wrongfully accused, he can sue for wrongful arrest. Available to people who are accused of these types of offences is legal aid. This is something generally made available by the provinces or territories.

Over the generations there has come into being a system which respects the protection of the individual. However, when we are faced with what we might call administrative law—and much of the new law which is made is of this nature and deals with government rules and regulations—we have quite a different situation. Everything appears to be weighted in favour of the administrator, in favour of the state. When someone finds himself fighting the monolithic government, it puts him into a very difficult position and he can incur considerable expense. Justice in these cases is often much more expensive than justice under the criminal law or, as I have called it, the traditional system. If one is accused of breaking and entering, the process is fairly simple. One can act on one's own behalf in court and one is given every opportunity. When it comes to administrative law, very often it is up to the individual to initiate proceedings. That is much more difficult than just appearing in court and arguing your case. When it comes to the issue of wrongful denial of licences, for example—and these days you need a licence or permit to do almost anything—one needs a much greater level of expertise. Legal counsel has to be better informed. Very often there is a need for expert testimony from witnesses. These legal proceedings can be quite difficult and complex and frequently are very expensive.

Matters relating to taxation fall into this category even if a charge is laid under the Criminal Code. Not very long ago I spoke to someone who had been accused of tax evasion in the amount of $25,000—not a great amount of money in view of the nature of the business involved. That individual had spent approximately $250,000 in legal and accounting fees in an effort to clear his name and so that he would not have to pay the $25,000 that the Crown wrongfully alleges is owing. I do not know how this case will end, but in my opinion if the court finds the accused innocent, there should be some recourse against the Crown.

Another example occurred recently in my constituency concerning fisheries. We have heard about fisheries cases before—it seems the Department of Fisheries and Oceans is so determined to obey the letter of the law when it comes to rules and regulations that it is inclined to proceed first and ask questions afterwards. Approximately 1,000 fish were seized from a purchaser of fish in my constituency. I presume it was alleged they were caught illegally, but so far no charges have been laid and in all probability will not be laid. It may be that there has not been sufficient wrongdoing to make charges stick or it may be deemed that the public interest would best be served by not proceeding with the case. In the meantime, the person accused is unable to carry on his normal business. He does not know whether he will get the fish back or not. If the case is not proceeded with, what recourse does he have against the Crown?

Those are just a few examples, Mr. Speaker. I do not want to proceed at great length because we have already heard most of the arguments pro and some con this afternoon. I listened carefully to what the Hon. Member for Sarnia-Lambton said. I think he had some good ideas and perhaps some valid criticisms of the motion. Perhaps it should have been more focused and perhaps we should have started out with matters relating to taxation instead of trying to include everything in one motion. There is a question of how a scheme such as that envisaged in the motion could be implemented and what the implications of it would be in costs to the Crown and the public Treasury, for instance.

Because I think it is necessary to delve into the question in greater detail, I think the subject matter of the motion should be referred to a committee. I should therefore like to introduce the following motion. I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Leeds-Grenville (Mrs. Cossitt):

That the subject matter of the Private Member's motion No. 58 which stands in the name of the Hon. Member for Calgary West be referred to the Standing Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments for examination and for report back to Parliament at the earliest possible date.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair cannot accept the amendment moved by the Hon. Member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson) and I will give my reasons in a moment. The situation would be similar to that when the House discusses legislation on second reading where, in some case, the subject matter could in fact be referred to a standing committee for further consideration through this means. We are not dealing with a Bill at any of its stages, however; we are dealing with a motion. There are precedents, which I will quote if it is the desire of Hon. Members, but I do not wish to take any more time than is necessary.

May I draw the attention of Hon. Members to Beauchesne's Fifth Edition, Citation 435.1, which provides "It is not an amendment to a motion to move that the question—" or subject matter in this instance"—go to a committee.

There are other precedents which I may quote, one going back to 1926, where a similar situation arose and in the course of debate an Hon. Member moved, and it was seconded, that the subject matter of the question be referred to a standing committee. The Speaker at that time moved the motion out of order for the same reason that I have invoked under Beauchesne's. That is the precedent on which Beauchesne's jurisprudence rests.

Therefore, I must rule the amendment out of order in this instance.

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Thunder Bay-Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I commend the mover of the original motion. It seems to me there is a very strong case for what he is attempting to do. If we talk it out it is not because we do not appreciate it. On this side of the House I think we all appreciate it. I have witnessed two or three cases recently where friends of mine who are Members have had a tremendous amount of damage done to their reputations only to be proven completely innocent. The actions of the Government have cost them a tremendous amount of money, but there is very little they can do to recover. In some cases it will affect them financially and, in terms of their reputation, for the rest or their lives.

There is the case of the Sick Children's Hospital in Toronto where one nurse was charged, found not guilty and subsequently it has been shown very clearly that she had no involvement. The case did tremendous damage to her family, however, and had a good deal to do with the death of one of her parents. In every way that I can think of this woman has had a terrible two or three years. She is completely innocent, yet there is no recourse at this point to any kind of support or reimbursement for the hundreds of thousands of dollars she spent on the case.

I am not a lawyer but I gather that in some civil cases there are ways that one can recover court costs. There are other ways that the motion, if it were amended or adopted in its present form, could support people who are having difficulty. I can think of cases where subparagraph 1 of the motion would apply, where an individual is required to take action under an Act of Parliament and is subsequently found to be right. As the Hon. Member opposite indicated earlier, we have had many cases of individuals who had to get legal advice simply because they were not capable of presenting an appeal. There are many examples of people dealing with cases concerning taxes or bringing a claim for workman's compensation and very often the claim is proven and yet it has cost them a lot of money and they have had a great deal of anguish. In those cases it seems to me that we could provide some kind of advocacy system. This has worked very well in the Department of Veteran's Affairs in the matter of pensions. There are a number of ways of providing this help, as the Hon. Member suggests.

In criminal matters, Mr. Speaker, the Marshall case in Nova Scotia is one that has concerned me. This individual, who is not guilty of the crime he was convicted of, spent some 11 years in prison, and then we found that someone else is guilty. There are strong feelings that the Crown was remiss in this matter. I do not think there is any question that in this country we always try to be fair. We have tried to plug loopholes in our social services, we have tried to make sure that no one is actually without food or some kind of shelter even if it is temporary. But this is one area where we have done very little about the problem. The two cases I mentioned, the Nelles case and the Marshall case, have come before the public eye, and I know there are many other deserving cases we do not know about because they have not come to our attention. But it seems to me that a lot of people just seem to fall through the safety net in this area more than in any other. It is difficult to deal with because there are some people who fall through the net because they do not do anything to prevent it, they just let it happen. However, I think we should be moving ahead in this area fairly rapidly.

I welcome this particular motion, Mr. Speaker, and I think it behooves us to push the people who can come up with the answers. There are no simple answers, which is part of the difficulty. Perhaps the answer lies in having a better advocacy system. Certainly the whole question of criminal cases must be dealt with, perhaps separately from those of cases involving matters of regulations.

One of my other colleagues wants to say a few words on this subject, Mr. Speaker, so I will sit down and give him an opportunity to make a short statement.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, with friends like that, who needs enemies? I would like to congratulate the Hon. Member opposite. I think he has brought before the House a very important subject. It has now been drawn to the attention of the Minister responsible, and I am sure he will want to look at all the options available to him. Certainly it is a subject which has been commented on much more frequently in recent months and years. All of the individual cases raised here today certainly have caused a great deal of public attention and public concern. This has all been to the good because the Law Reform Commission has, I know, examined it; the Government of Ontario certainly has; the Law Reform Commission in British Columbia has looked at the whole issue of compensation in cases where individuals are wrongly accused, or they are accused and the court case does not proceed.

In the matter of certain actions taken by the Government Departments, whether they be Customs and Excise or Revenue Canada, certainly some errors have been made which would, under the regime suggested by the Hon. Member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes), certainly result in restitution. I may be diverging a bit, but I would like to say that there are a great many cases which have been brought before this House in the last little while regarding specifically Revenue Canada. I suggest that not all the facts have been brought forward and I would think that some of our comments in the House have done serious damage to the Public Service.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hour provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CANADIAN SECURITY INTELLIGENCE SERVICE ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

The House resumed from Friday, February 10, consideration of the motion of Mr. Kaplan that Bill C-9, an Act to establish the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, to enact an Act respecting enforcement in relation to certain security and related offences and to amend certain Acts in consequence thereof or in relation thereto, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge-Foothills): Mr. Speaker, when we adjourned on Friday, I had just nicely gotten into the substance of my speech. I had made the point that discussions with my constituents and other people had shown that the primary concern that Canadians have about this Bill relates to their total lack of trust in the present Government. I can understand why that mistrust exists.

There is no doubt that Canadians trust the RCMP and believe that the current Liberal Government let the RCMP down concerning all of the events that occurred in the early 1970s with the FLQ and separatism threat in Quebec. I was arguing that the Government has given much evidence that it cannot be trusted. People can remember the wage and price control promise and the gas taxes that were not going to rise but then rose enormously. People from the east and west remember that first constitutional proposal that would have forever in our constitutional history locked an absolute veto into two provinces, leaving out the other eight provinces and all other new provinces. That provision ultimately had to be removed from the Constitution because it violated that sense of fairness which Canadians possess. But this too has built up this perception of mistrust in the present Liberal Government.

I am sure you were as horrified as I, Mr. Speaker, when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stood in the House last week and said that he saw no problem at all with the Prime Minister's Office personally handling extreme patronage in cases where Liberal Members of Parliament were allocated $500,000 each but not members of the Opposition. We must have an enormous gap between what the Prime Minister believes his role should be and what I as a Member believe. I think the Prime Minister should stand up and defend the whole country and the interests of all the people, even though in some parts they have not elected members of his Party. You cannot get around the fact, Mr. Speaker, that when the Prime Minister came to power he had 27 members in the west. Now he has none. He did not lose those seats because people in the west are perverse, nor did he lose them because there was anything wrong with the Constitution. He lost those seats because of the policies of his Government.

Mr. Evans: How many do you have in Quebec?

Mr. Thacker: When the Conservative Party meets those regional perceptions and needs of the people of Quebec, we will get members there as the next election will show. By the same token, the Liberal Party has to meet the needs of the people of the west if it expects to get members elected there. That is why I am saying the Prime Minister, in occupying the highest office of the land, surely has a duty to go out of his way to make sure those people feel comfortable. He has not done that. That is why he lost those seats in the west and that is why he will lose the next election.

I suppose I should come back to the major question as to whether we need a security service at all. That question was answered many, many years ago in the affirmative after the Second World War. We have a major security service within the RCMP. We have some important equipment in the Department of National Defence. Security work is being done. The question is whether that security service should remain within the RCMP or moved and set up as a civilian agency.

We have been told, and we all know, that other countries have separate civilian agencies. I am thinking of the United States and the United Kingdom. The United Kindgom has a separate service despite its long historical attachment to Scotland Yard, just as our attachment is to the RCMP. The question is whether there is something unique or something that has changed within Canada that makes it imperative we move the service away from the RCMP and into a private civilian agency. The people who want this separation argue it is because of police barn burning and incidents where the police actually broke the law and therefore we should have a separate civilian agency with checks and balances.

That argument does not wash generally in the west. People believe the RCMP were betrayed by the Government. They believe that the highest ranking authority in the Liberal Cabinet told the RCMP to get the FLQ, to get behind it and find out all the evidence so they could get a handle on it. When the RCMP broke the law and were caught, was there ministerial responsibility? Was there any form of political acknowledgement that the politicians were at fault even to the slightest degree? Not one bit, Mr. Speaker. A commission was set up and millions and millions of taxpayers' dollars were spent all in the whitewash of political forces. We all know in our daily affairs and understanding of human beings that the RCMP would not have unilaterally and on its own committed that whole series of breaches if it did not have direction, authority and tacit approval from the government of the day. That is why Canadians believe the agency should remain with the force. People feel that the security service was betrayed and there was no such thing as ministerial responsibility.

Contrast our form of government, which is a responsible form of government where ministers are responsible—which we do not have—to that in the United Kingdom, the mother of Parliament. There ministers resign regularly because of errors and faults that occur within their departments. The rule of law and our form of government insists that the minister should resign. The Carrington affair, I suppose, is the classic one. A telegram arrived from the Falklands suggesting that there might be some activity in Argentina. No reasonable person would have acted differently from what the minister did. Yet when the Argentinians attacked, the minister was the first one to stand and say: "I know you would not blame me". Nevertheless ministerial responsibility insisted as a tradition that he step down, and he did so with great pride. That is what is lacking in this Government.

The second bottom line issue is that if there is a security agency, be it a civilian body or if it remains with the RCMP, what types of changes do we have to bring forth in order to balance the rights and fundamental freedoms won as a result of the battles fought and the lives sacrificed by our ancestors and be able as a state to collect information and get at security agents who we know are out there? We have an enormous Russian embassy and there are embassies of other governments as well which are looking into our internal affairs. Their goal is to undermine our very way of life. So we require the agency but we must have very careful discussions.

At some point this Bill has to go to committee. It cannot be decided upon quickly, as the Hon. Member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) pointed out. Today is the second day that elected Members have had to discuss this entire issue. The Government claims that people have been discussing it for 15 years. It went to a Senate committee where over 40 changes were made to the original proposal. Nonetheless, this is only the second time it has been discussed in the House. We know from past experience that it takes several weeks, once the debate has commenced here, for Canadians to think about the issue generally and to get their views back to us as their elected representatives so that we can come to some conclusion as to how we should go. This is why I think there has to be a reasonable debate in the House on second reading and why the Bill has to go to committee. We have to get the experts back and have their views on the new proposals in Bill C-9. The proposals are so different it is as if they have no relationship at all to the first proposal the Government brought forth.

As I looked through the Bill, I had some problems with the question of the mandate, whether it is actually clear enough. I would like to hear from the experts whether it is possible to have a definition of "espionage", for example, which is more precise than what is in the existing Bill, or what we really mean by "threats to the security of Canada". If it were ever taken to be an attack upon the possibility of a regional party being formed, such as the Parti Québécois, the Western Canada Concept or the Social Credit, I would be concerned because I believe it is wise for those regional alienations and those senses of frustration to be able to crystalize in a party which can then come to Parliament. Most often those parties are absorbed into the mainstream. I would cite the Progressives in the early part of this century and, more latterly, the Social Credit Party and the Creditistes. If they were somehow seen to be a threat to the security of Canada, I would be very concerned. I think we ought to look at that.

I honestly do not understand why only the Statistics Act has been exempted from the provisions of the Bill. I would like to ask many questions on that. Primarily, I want to be totally convinced that we are setting up, if the Government forces it through, an agency for which there will be ministerial responsibility. Just as the rule of law is fundamental, just as we have the right to responsible government, I want to have the right of ministerial responsibility. I will be looking at the Bill from that perspective.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the remarks of the Hon. Member for Lethbridge-Foothills (Mr. Thacker). At the conclusion of his speech, he indicated that he felt it was important that there be proper ministerial control and accountability over this important agency. Does the Hon. Member support the recommendation of the McDonald Commission which called for a parliamentary oversight committee similar to those in existence in West Germany and the United States to ensure parliamentary oversight of the activities of the new security agency?

• (1120)

Mr. Thacker: Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that as a matter of principle, starting from a blank sheet, that would be a position that I would argue strongly as well. I think it should come from a group of people who are responsible to the people at large. When I say ministerial responsibility, I mean responsible not only to the Cabinet but to this House; but if it were in a committee of us, we are responsible to the people. If we do something wrong and they feel that it is wrong, they can turf us out. We have accountability every four years, or five years in the case of the existing Government. As a matter of principle, I agree. If we are going to move from that principle, I would want to be able to understand the good reasons and argument as to why it should go to a review committee of retired Privy Councillors, for example.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask my colleague a question. The United States and Great Britain have separate security forces. One item that has been brought to my attention is that spies are able to get into those services and carry out fifth column activities. I would like to ask my legal friend whether he thinks there is a greater danger of fifth columnists getting into a separate security force than there is into the RCMP security force.

Mr. Thacker: Mr. Speaker, I suppose it should not be necessarily so, but I think in fact it would be. A new agency would not have those long decades and decades of tradition that the RCMP has. The RCMP has a quasi-military background. You have total military discipline and the RCMP has a quasi-discipline. If you set up a civilian agency, it will not have any of that. Some people cast aside traditions very easily. I do not believe that traditions are there lightly; they have been built up over many generations. There is a high standard to which the RCMP hold themselves accountable. The men are imbued with that from the first day they take their training, whether it is in Regina or in the east. As such, I do not think we should lightly overthrow that for some new civilian agency which will have none of that background and tradition.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I take it that if the Hon. Member for Lethbridge-Foothills were in fact drafting legislation in this area, he would not create a civilian security service but rather would maintain the security service within the present structure of the RCMP. Would that be a correct conclusion?

Mr. Thacker: Yes, Mr. Speaker. That would always be my starting point for sure. There is no need to change that tradition. They have been doing well. It is just those events in Quebec. As I say, most of the people I talk to, and my own reading on the subject, indicates that the RCMP were actually betrayed by the government of the day. They were led into getting that evidence, sometimes illegally. When they were caught at it, the politicians got themselves off and there was no ministerial or Cabinet accountability. My people believe that. I believe that. Therefore, why should we move it out?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I want to make a couple of comments. I notice that my Hon. friend from Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) has been participating in this debate as the sole participant of his Party with respect to these issues. I am curious with respect to whether the NDP have any position on this Bill. For example, I recall on a number of issues that there has been what I call a swallowing of themselves on the part of the NDP on justice and legal affairs issues. I think back to when my colleague from Burnaby spoke on behalf of his Party with respect to the prostitution issue. His position as then stated was that he wanted to set up red light districts across the country. As soon as he uttered those words on an open line show in Vancouver, the Jack Webster Show, of course there was horror and dismay in the office of his Leader. Not only that, there was a reversal of that position taken by the—

• (1125)

Mr. Manly: Mr. Speaker, I believe comments and questions are supposed to be directed towards the content of the speech just made.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): I was going to caution that this should not develop into questioning between other Members. Nevertheless, the Hon. Member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) is entitled to make comments. If as a result there is some response to the comments, this is within the purview of the question period.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I am glad the Hon. Member got up. I know there is great sensitivity, but I was simply saying that the Hon. Member for Burnaby spoke on behalf of his Party and said that this Government proposal was an absolutely ideal Bill and there were no difficulties at all as far as the NDP was concerned. Two weeks later, of course, the justice critic of that Party was reversing that position; they had various serious concerns with respect to the legislation. I am concerned about that because, as we have seen, as soon as the Hon. Member for Burnaby stands up and states a particular position, his Leader is usually there at the forefront in order to reverse that position.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, it is obviously entertaining to watch the spectacle of the Hon. Member for Saskatoon West, but I would draw the rules to the attention of the Chair. Clearly any questions or comments must relate to the speech made in the preceding 20-minute period. For the Chair to suggest otherwise, I say with respect, flies in the face of that particular rule. Otherwise, a Member would be entitled to wander at random to any subject that he or she chose. The clear intent of that particular provision is to follow up, with either comments or questions, the immediately preceding speech.

I am not going to comment with respect to the veracity of my learned colleague because, of course, there is no foundation whatsoever to his remarks.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): I understand full well the point of the Hon. Member for Burnaby. However, I might suggest that following the remarks of the Hon. Member for Lethbridge-Foothills (Mr. Thacker) the Hon. Member for Burnaby rose and himself put questions which probably led to the comments of another Member. In the sense that this is all part of the debate following other remarks of the Hon. Member for Lethbridge-Foothills, I do not see a point of order.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I do not understand the sensitivity. I will only attribute it to the fact that it is Monday morning, and after a weekend out in their ridings the members of the NDP would naturally be sensitive with respect to their electoral or other prospects.

Mr. de Jong: You are not going to be in the Cabinet either, Ray.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Order. Even if it is Monday morning, we had better bring the proceedings back to normal.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I wanted to explain, Mr. Speaker, if I may—

Mr. de Jong: You have a lot to explain.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: —that the Hon. Member for Lethbridge-Foothills made what I thought was a very constructive contribution to this debate. I wanted to find out whether or not we are going to get any participation from the NDP—

Mr. de Jong: Sit and watch. Take your seat and listen.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, these people are absolutely out of control today. I do not know what they have eaten on the weekend, but they simply cannot keep still. I am trying to be helpful to them. I have spent my whole political career trying to be helpful to the NDP, and have given them advice and assistance. What do they do? They reciprocate by yelling at me when I am trying to speak.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Order, please. I think under the circumstances it would be just as well if we continued with the debate.

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate having the opportunity the Conservative Party has given me to speak on this Bill. Usually three members of the Conservative Party speak in between each member of the New Democratic Party but the Conservatives do not seem to have as much interest in this Bill as they should. Perhaps that can be attributed, as you have said, to the fact that this is a Monday morning. However, I appreciate the opportunity to try to make a case to my fellow Members of Parliament and to the Canadian public about why the Bill should not pass.

As I read it, the underlying principle of the Bill is that a free and democratic society in Canada can best be protected by a security service with extraordinary powers to pry into the lives of ordinary citizens and that such a security service does not even need to be subject to parliamentary scrutiny. That is the underlying principle of the Bill as I interpret some of the clauses and the absence of certain clauses.

To understand why the Bill is so unacceptable to this Party, we must go back to 1976-77 when Canada was rocked by a series of revelations about illegal action on the part of the security service within the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The shock that Canadians felt at this illegality was matched only by their disgust as the Government's attempts to stonewall the issue. Not a single Cabinet Minister or Government backbencher had the gumption to speak out against this betrayal of trust by those charged with protecting our liberties and safeguarding our democratic society.

It was revealed that there had been cases of illegal barn burning, stealing dynamite, breaking into press agencies, breaking into democratic party offices and so on. When the heat became too intense for the Government, it finally appointed a royal commission, a tried and true method of diffusing public attention from a scandal. It was widely felt at the time that the commission would do nothing more than cover up. The McDonald Commission was the most expensive royal commission in Canadian history to that point, costing some $15 million. When it finally reported in January, 1981 the Government sat on the report until August 25, and then issued it along with two additional papers which disputed certain of the commission's findings.

To date there has been no government action against any of the law-breaking by members of the security service. We get conflicting testimony from two Ministers so we are not even sure whether any internal discipline has been taken against those members of the RCMP who violated internal regulations.

The report of the McDonald Commission was not by any stretch of the imagination a high water mark for civil liberties in Canada. The commission did mostly what it was instructed to do; or, rather, it did mostly what it was supposed to do for the Liberal Government but did look at a number of actions which it thought may have been illegal and in which prosecution may have been warranted.

Even this mild criticism of the security service and of the Government was too much for the Solicitor General of Canada (Mr. Kaplan). When the report was released to the public he issued a statement in which he said:

> Both the Department of Justice and independent outside legal counsel have considered very carefully the criticism of the RCMP's lack of respect for the law. On numerous occasions the Commission criticizes conduct that it describes as not specifically authorized by law. It is the opinion of the Department of Justice and independent counsel that unless conduct is prohibited either at common law or by legislation it is not unlawful, and in proper circumstances conduct not specifically authorized by law may be necessary and appropriate.

This is an important principle to keep in mind when you look at Bill C-9, because in a number of situations the Bill falls short of the recommendations of the McDonald Commission, which, as I say, was not in any way a high water mark for civil liberties in Canada.

For example, at page 1071 of the report, recommendation No. 17 advises administrative guidelines concerning the principles to be applied and the use of undercover operators by the Security Intelligence Agency. It says that these guidelines should be approved by the Solicitor General and publicly disclosed. I should like to draw attention particularly to the suggested guidelines 17(e), (f) and (g), which read as follows:

> (e) undercover operatives must not be used for the purpose of disrupting domestic groups unless there is reason to believe such a group is involved in espionage, sabotage or foreign interference;
> (f) undercover operatives should be instructed not to act as agents provocateurs and, in situations where they become aware of plans for violent activity, to do what they can to persuade the members of a group to adopt milder methods of protest;
> (g) interviews of persons for security screening purposes should not be used as occasions for recruiting such persons as sources—

I should like to suggest in view of the Minister's comments that whatever is not specifically prohibited can be allowed; that clauses such as these should be specifically written into the Bill before it is passed into law. At page 1078, the report has some suggestions regarding by-product information that is found as a result of investigations looking for other material, that it should be closely monitored to ensure that investigations are not being misdirected for a purpose irrelevant to the security of Canada and that the use of by-product information has to be closely watched to make sure that it is not used for other purposes.

Recommendation No. 33 reads as follows:

We recommend that the legislation governing the security intelligence agency include a clause which expressly denies the agency any authority to carry out measures to enforce security.

I did not find a clause such as that in Bill C-9, Mr. Speaker. Recommendation No. 37 reads as follows:

We recommend that the security intelligence agency not be permitted to disseminate information or misinformation in order to disrupt or otherwise inflict damage on Canadian citizens or domestic political organizations.

I do not find anything in the Bill to prohibit that kind of activity.

Recommendations Nos 49 and 50 suggest that there should be guidelines for relations with foreign security agencies which, as you know, are tied into this legislation so that information collected about Canadians can be passed on to foreign security agencies. The McDonald Commission at least suggested that guidelines should be developed in that area. But there is nothing to that effect in the legislation, and given the Minister's statement that anything not specifically prohibited can be permitted, I think it should be written in.

On Friday, the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) tried to get an answer to this question from the Parliamentary Secretary. He asked if the Government was going to be making public the names of those agencies of other countries with which the security service will exchange information. The Parliamentary Secretary answered "I don't believe so, Mr. Speaker". We are not even going to know the names of the other agencies let alone the kind of information that is being passed on to them.

We have the same situation with regard to accountability. On page 1100 the McDonald report recommends a three-member advisory council whose appointment would have to be approved by Parliament. In other words, the Government would have to come before the House and the Senate with the names of the appointees and there could be a debate and question raised if some of those appontees were not suitable.

Clause 35 of Bill C-9 refers to a Security Intelligence Review Committee. The Leaders of the Opposition Parties would be consulted about the members of that committee but it would not be referred to Parliament. We all know how little such consultation can be in some circumstances. I feel we should at least be looking at the recommendation of the McDonald Commission that the names must come before Parliament for approval.

With respect to the powers of the two committees, the report of the McDonald Commission suggests that there should be full access to all documents. As has been pointed out, this Bill restricts access to Cabinet documents so that members of the security service could in fact have access to some Cabinet documents; but the Security Intelligence Review Committee, which is to oversee them, would not have access to those documents.

Section (g) of Recommendation 180 of the McDonald Commission report suggests that the advisory council should report to a joint parliamentary committee on security and intelligence at least annually on the following:

(i) the extent and prevalence of improper and illegal activities by members of the security and intelligence agency—

(ii) any direction given by the Government of Canada, to the security intelligence agency or any other federal organization collecting intelligence by covert means, which the Council regards as improper;

(iii) any serious problems in interpreting or administering the statute governing the security intelligence agency.

This recommendation ties in parliamentary accountability to a much greater extent than Bill C-9, in which Clause 53 simply requires a report by the advisory council to the Minister, who then tables that report in Parliament; and we do not know if Parliament has any right to discuss it.

Section 184 at page 1102 of the McDonald Commission report calls for the appointment of a joint parliamentary committee which would have the power to consider the estimates of the proposed security service. We do not have any of those powers in the present Bill, Mr. Speaker. When the McDonald Commission introduced its report, it said that all the recommendations were tied together. On page 405 of that report it is stated:

To accept the recommendation as to the kinds of activities about which the agency should be empowered to collect intelligence, without implementing the recommendations as to scrutiny and control by the Minister, Parliament, and the independent review body would be dangerous. To accept the recommendations about relationships between the agency and the agencies of foreign countries without the same régime of scrutiny or oversight would be dangerous.

We have a royal commission which cost the Canadian public $15 million and which says that unless we have those built-in safeguards, we are getting into a dangerous situation. That is precisely what we have with Bill C-9.

The Tories say they are opposed to this Bill. I wonder how much they are opposed. In Brecht's play, Mother Courage and Her Children, one of the characters says: "It's unjust and I won't stand for it". Mother Courage replies: "How long won't you stand for it? An hour? A day? A week?" I would like to ask the Tories how long will they not stand for this Bill. How long will they oppose it? Will they put up one speaker to every New Democratic Party speaker or are they going to insist upon their full complement of three speakers to every New Democratic Party speaker? Let us see how strongly the Tories oppose it.

The Hon. Member for Lethbridge-Foothills (Mr. Thacker) spoke on the Bill on Friday. I was interested to read what he said, and I quote from page 1289 of Hansard, February 10, 1984:

> If this Bill had been proposed years ago by Prime Minister St. Laurent or Prime Minister Diefenbaker, I suggest that it would have been much better received because Canadians then had a central trust and belief that the Government would do what is right under the circumstances. They do not have that trust today. Hopefully after an election and a change of government there can be a whole new group of persons in the Cabinet who will lead to that restoration of trust so that the Bill could be brought back at that time.

In other words, the Tories are saying: "It would be wrong to buy this used car from the Liberals, but it is okay to buy it from us because you can trust us". The Canadian people know how far they can trust the Conservative Party. In the fall of 1982, the present Leader of that Party was swearing allegiance to the Hon. Member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark) and at the same time he was plotting to bushwhack him in Winnipeg. We know how far we can trust the Tories—about as far as the Liberals.

The McDonald Commission identifies three essential requirements of democracy on page 408 of its report: first, responsible Government; second, the rule of law; and third, freedom of legitimate political dissent. The report states:

> These, we would emphasize, are requirements of democracy. As requirements they are not to be compromised, whittled down, or balanced off to make effective security possible.

Bill C-9, Mr. Speaker, allows the Government not to be responsible. It allows it not to have to answer to Parliament for its security service. As far as the rule of law is concerned, we have seen the Government flagrantly turn a blind eye to what has happened in the past. There has been no prosecution of past lawbreakers and this has brought the whole of the law into contempt with the Canadian people because they see there is one law for one group of people and another law for another.

On page 409 of its report the commission states:

> The third requirement—democratic dissent—is perhaps the most difficult to maintain because its observance requires such careful judgment. Still, we believe that the distinction can be made between, on the one hand, those who wish to overthrow our democratic system or use violence or threats of violence to violate our democratic procedures, and on the other hand, those who seek radical change in our social, economic or political arrangements within our democratic system.

In the past, the security service did not make that distinction. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that there are elements in this Bill which do not make that distinction either.

The Minister spoke of a sense of urgency, a sense of needing to get this Bill passed in a hurry. This is phony. Where was the urgency in the 1970s when there was growing evidence of security service crimes? Where was the urgency of the Government to act then? It stonewalled, it obfuscated and, finally, it appointed a royal commission, hoping to bury the issue. Senator Pitfield urged quick passage of Bill C-9 when he was interviewed on January 24. He said: "We have to show people that our parliamentary system works".

I want to submit, Mr. Speaker, that we have to show the people of Canada that our parliamentary system works by defeating this Bill. The mandate it gives to the security service is too broad. It does not have the built-in kind of checks and balances and accountability to Parliament which are necessary. It is a dangerous intrusion into the lives of ordinary citizens and it undermines the foundation of our democracy. I urge all Hon. Members to join with my Party in opposing and defeating this Bill.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Hon. Member this. I understand his dissatisfaction with the present statute. However, when he calls for the Bill to be blocked and in effect urges a filibuster by inviting the Conservatives to go to the limit to keep this Bill from being passed, does he not realize that what he is doing is preserving present arrangements? He is providing for the continuation of the security service which we now have.

Mr. Blackburn: That is political blackmail. This is in the House of Commons.

Mr. Kaplan: The Hon. Member calls it political blackmail, but it happens to be the fact. We have a security service now. It has a mandate now. It does not report to Parliament now. It operates without judicial warrants now. It has very broad powers for which it does not account to Parliament.

• (1150)

The Government wants to change that situation. While the Hon. Member would like to see us go further, surely he should agree that the responsible thing to do is to take this legislation forward, not block it or defeat it, subject it to the normal parliamentary process, and see if their brains can make it a better Bill. I doubt it, but I am certainly willing to be convinced. How can they say that they are concerned about the privacy and civil liberties of Canadians and still want to prevent a Bill which is an improvement from moving forward?

Mr. Manly: Mr. Speaker, there is very serious question whether this Bill is an improvement in any sense. For the first time there is now authorization for mail opening, apart from narcotic issues. There is access to income tax records. I do not believe that this Bill does represent a real improvement over the present unsatisfactory status quo. We want to see things changed in the status quo as well, but I do not think it is an answer just to talk about bringing in this Bill and passing it. There are not adequate safeguards and parliamentary responsibility in it. The House would be most derelict if it passed this legislation in its present form. We simply cannot agree to going along with legislation which does not have built-in accountability to Parliament and which allows such wide and sweeping changes.

This is the first time in 15 years, Mr. Speaker, that there has even been a full debate on this subject. I hope that all Members in our Party, the Conservative Party, and perhaps some Liberals, might get interested in this subject and put their remarks on record.

Mr. Thacker: Mr. Speaker, it was not clear from the Hon. Member's speech whether he was arguing against the separation of the security services from the RCMP as a matter of principle, or whether he would find that under certain circumstances, with the proper checks and balances, that would be an appropriate move for the country at this time. Would he clarify that point?

Mr. Manly: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is quite correct. That was not the point of my argument. I was not arguing on one side or the other of that question. I was arguing that the present law is introducing a security service that has wide powers which are not subject to parliamentary scrutiny. That is the basis of our opposition of this Bill and what we want the House to focus upon.

Mr. Thacker: Mr. Speaker, I would appreciate it if the Hon. Member would give me his view. In my speech I said this type of Bill could have been brought forward by earlier Prime Ministers and the concept would have been accepted because there was a greater trust in government. I believe the lack of trust is unique to the Government in force today. A future government with new players could bring in the principle of separating the security service from the RCMP and placing it in a civilian agency, with proper checks and balances. If a civilian agency had the proper checks and balances, including parliamentary review, would the Hon. Member support that move?

Mr. Manly: Mr. Speaker, we would want to see the Bill and debate it on its merits. We are debating this Bill which does not have those proper checks and balances and which give powers we believe should not belong to any security service.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I would like to comment and ask a question of my colleague. Since the Hon. Member for Lethbridge-Foothills (Mr. Thacker) has brought it up, I cannot resist commenting that we certainly await with interest the comments of the distinguished official spokesperson for the Conservative Party on the question of whether the security service should in fact maintain its responsibility for security operations in Canada, or whether instead there should be a civilian security service established. I know that my colleague from Lethbridge-Foothills would be most interested in asking that question of his colleague, the Hon. Member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn), the former justice critic for the Conservative Party and former chairperson of the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee of the Conservative Party's Caucus Committee. I am sure that former justice critic and former chairperson would be most interested in enlightening the House on this important question.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Mr. Speaker, I was interested in the comments of the former justice critic for the New Democratic Party who is now the consumer affairs critic for that Party. Obviously he could not be trusted with that job. In fairness to the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) I want to comment on the closing comments of the Hon. Member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands (Mr. Manly).

An Hon. Member: I thought you were a Christian!

Mr. Friesen: I am. In his closing remarks the Hon. Member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands mentioned that the Minister wanted to end this debate quickly and get the Bill to committee. I have been reading the Minister's speech. While I enjoy criticizing the Minister myself, in all fairness that is not one of the things he said in his speech. He did say we need to debate it and pass it, but I do not think he made reference to passing it quickly. In his closing comments on page 1275 of Hansard, the Minister said:

> We can give the people of this country clear statutory assurance that their rights and freedoms will be respected, or we can leave our security intelligence system in a prolonged state of uncertainty, with no legislative framework, no public mandate, no judicial approval role, no independent or external review; in short, none of the safeguards we all believe are important to the rights and freedoms we enjoy in this society.

There are two things which I would like to mention at the outset. The Minister did not say he was in a hurry to pass this Bill, even though he may well be. I can imagine that as Minister he would like to see it go to committee quickly. The reason he did not say it may be that he may not have complete Caucus support for the legislation itself. I have a statement here by the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, the Hon. Member for Rosemont (Mr. Lachance), who, speaking on the program House on the Hill, on CJOH-TV on January 29, said:

> It's not the kind of topic six months or eight months before an election that is really very high on the priority; you just don't, I guess, win an election with the passage of that kind of a bill. It's very . . . it's controversial on the one hand; on the other hand it's lacklustre in terms of public appeal. So I don't sense very much of a pressure on the part of the caucus, be it on the Quebec side or the rest of the Liberal caucus, to have this bill passed expeditiously.

I think we are owed an explanation from the Minister as to where his Caucus stands on this legislation. Does he enjoy Caucus support? Are they going to co-operate with him to get it into committee? Once it is in committee, what kind of support and unanimity does the Liberal Caucus have? Could it be that the Chairman of the Justice Committee is speaking on behalf of a significant section of his Caucus when he says there is no urgency to this legislation? If that is the case, I hope there will be enough freedom in that Caucus to speak boldly about their concerns.

I hope there will not be an experience such as we had when we were dealing with the Time and Reader's Digest legislation when the former Member for Vancouver-Kingsway, Simma Holt, who had been a loyal member of that committee, was not allowed to serve on it. You, Mr. Speaker, were sitting on the Secretary of State Committee at that time and had been sitting on that committee for two years and were bumped from it because the Government knew you opposed the legislation it was presenting at that time.

When the committee sits to discuss this legislation, I hope that the Government will have a hands-off position in terms of the membership of the Justice Committee so that Government members sitting on the committee can debate and speak openly about this legislation.

I am also disturbed by the quotation I just read regarding the Minister's point of view. Since it is true that this issue has been debated for 15 years, the most obvious question is why.

If, as the Solicitor General points out, we can leave our security system in a prolonged state of uncertainty with no legislative framework, no public mandate, no judicial approval role, no independent or external review—in short, none of the safeguards we all believe are important to the rights and freedoms we enjoy in this society—the simple question is why has this been going on for 15 years? If the Government is concerned about civil and human rights, why has it waited 15 years to give legislative approval to the activities of a security service, be it part of the RCMP or a separate service? The security service itself is not even germane to the most residual question: Why have we waited 15 years to protect the rights of Canadian citizens? Why have there been barn burnings? Why have political offices been ransacked? Why have Canadians been vulnerable to those kinds of activities? Those are questions the Solicitor General must answer. The Government must be accountable.

As the Hon. Member for Lethbridge-Foothills (Mr. Thacker) said, if this legislation had been introduced verbatim by a previous Government, such as the St. Laurent Government, the Diefenbaker Government or the Pearson Government, it probably would have raised very few eyebrows because there was a sense of confidence in those Governments and the leadership at that time.

The problem we face today is a crisis of confidence in the leadership of the Government. It is not only incompetence that bothers us, though there are plenty of examples of rank incompetence by the Government. What really bothers the Canadian people is that the Government enjoys the use of power. Since it derives so much pleasure from power, there is no discipline, constraint or self-control in the use of power.

I suggest there are several very clear examples of that. The first is Bill C-157, the predecessor to Bill C-9. We must ask why Bill C-157 contained such expansive powers. Why did it have such loosely defined roles for the security service and why were the definitions so broad? I presume it is because the Government takes pleasure in having as much power as possible. That is the crux of the distrust that the people of Canada have in the Government.

The second reason is that legislation is debated outside of the Chamber in too many cases. We do not have to go back more than two years to recall our experience regarding the Crow legislation. In that case the Bill was contemplated, discussed and announced in major centres all over Canada but never presented in the House. It was never presented in the House until two days before the debate was scheduled. That seems to be the pattern of the Government.

I should commend the Minister for tabling Bill C-157. It was circulated and we were able to debate it outside the Chamber and the public was able to examine the intentions of the Government. Because of that public scrutiny, the former Bill finally had to go to the Senate committee for study and recommendations. That committee roundly condemned the Bill and gutted it. That let to the presentation of a new version of the Bill.

There is no confidence in the Government because it enjoys power. It takes pleasure in power and therefore has very little self-control in its use.

For my final example, I will return to a favourite theme of mine. I say that ironically. That is the Emergency Planning Order of 1981, No. 1305. While the Order in Council is divided into peacetime and wartime powers, the entire Order in Council is covered by a Crown prerogative provision, not statutory limitations.

The peacetime provisions are covered largely by federal-provincial agreements. Therefore, why is it necessary to cover peacetime arrangements with a Crown prerogative to let the Prime Minister do whatever he wishes? Since federal-provincial agreements cover most of the situations relating to peacetime emergency arrangements, why should Crown prerogative cover that particular provision? Again, the only conclusion I can draw is that the Government takes pleasure in having as much power as possible in the event it might be able to use it.

The more disturbing aspect concerns wartime provisions. In order to be accurate, let me refer to Part II of that schedule of powers in the Emergency Planning Order. Under the powers assigned to the Solicitor General of Canada are items 6 and 7. Item 6 is the power to "Establish, administer and operate civilian internment camps". Item 7 is to "Facilitate the selective reduction and transfer of prison populations to provide for the establishment of civilian internment camps".

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, where is the logic? The Minister stood in the House on Friday to say that we need to proscribe the activities of the civilian service and limit it by statute very carefully. But there is a provision whereby he can release from penitentiaries criminals who have been put in prison because they have violated the Criminal Code in order to make room for people who have never violated the Criminal Code. What is the logic behind making it possible for any government to release convicted prisoners in order to make room for people who have not been convicted? The only conclusion can be that the Government enjoys having a wide expanse of powers.

The reason there is so much distrust in the Government is that it has had a poor record. While incompetence and bungling is enough reason for Canadians to want to unload the Government, the greatest reason is distrust.

With respect to the issue of quick passage of legislation, I recall the Solicitor General coming to me just over a year ago to ask for quick passage of mandatory supervision provisions. He wanted a one-day debate because he could not get House time for any legislation other than economic legislation. That particular Bill was sent to the Senate which again shot it down in flames. When the Government wants quick passage of legislation which is rejected after close scrutiny by the Senate, why should there be a short debate on any legislation? I do not even have to talk about what the Government is doing in Revenue Canada and its pleasure and power there. All I have to do is remind Hon. Members that the legislative record of this Government is enough to create suspicion and, therefore, close examination and scrutiny of all legislation it tables is required.

I would like to look at some of the provisions of the Bill which raise questions for us. I want to note with particular attention the provisions in Bill C-157. Clause 14(2) of Bill C-157 stated that the security service is not restricted from "remaining informed" about the political, economic and social environment within Canada. The Senate committee pointed out very clearly that that was a provision which would open the door to mischief and therefore would heap scorn on that. Let me turn to Clause 12(2) of the present legislation, which provides:

Nothing in this Act restricts the Service from remaining informed, through public sources of information, about the political, economic and social environment within Canada and matters affecting that environment.

There you have it, Mr. Speaker; nothing is changed. The Senate says get rid of it. The Minister keeps it. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, will the security service, when looking through the public sources of information, be reading newspaper articles about all of the citizens of Canada? To what kind of clipping service will the security service subscribe? On whom will the security service keep files? Should it be that we have exactly the same provision in this legislation and powers sweeping enough rather than restrictive enough? For the security of the public we need provisions that are proscriptive enough, not sweeping enough.

I come to Clause 14 of the present Bill which reads:

The Service may advise any Minister of the Crown on matters relating to the security of Canada that are relevant to the exercise of any power or the performance of any duty or function by that Minister under the Citizenship Act or the Immigration Act, 1976.

Why should the security service report to "any" Minister of the Crown? I thought the buck stopped at the Solicitor General. Is the security service now going to report to the Minister of Employment and Immigration? Is the security service going to report to the Minister of National Revenue? I thought the Solicitor General was accountable. What goes on, Mr. Speaker?

I am concerned about certain provisions. Let us take a look at Clause 21. I have a simple question. There seems to be a provision whereby the Solicitor General would have final approval over whether search warrants would be issued. Since he became Solicitor General four years ago, how many times has the Solicitor General turned down a request for a search warrant? Has he turned down any of the hundreds of requests that I am sure he has had? How many has he turned down?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Order, please. May I draw to the attention of Hon. Members that Members are not supposed to walk between the line of vision of the Member speaking and the Chair.

Mr. Friesen: I did not particularly notice that, Mr. Speaker. I know the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) does not know the difference between a union hall and the House of Commons so I expect that kind of behaviour.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Friesen: I did want to close with three particular provisions mentioned in an article that I read and which was written ten years ago. It is entitled "The Relationship Between Secret Services and Government in a Modern State". It was written by a Briton and the Brits understand the secret service because they have bungled it often enough. Therefore, they ought to know something about it. This person makes eight points that are very clear. I want to introduce just the first three and then I will be through. I know you are getting nervous, Mr. Speaker. First, he says:

—the operational front of secret operations should be as narrow as possible.

My concern with this legislation is that it is as wide as possible. The second point reads:

—intelligence requirements and priorities, both overt and secret, must be laid down at the national and political level, and never at the departmental-ministerial level.

I am concerned about this level. It is not fulfilling this proscription. The third point reads:

—to keep the collation of intelligence separate from collection; and ensure that ultimate collation on major matters is undertaken at the national level.

It is all important that we separate collection and collation. Therefore, I think we need to examine this legislation very carefully.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Hon. Member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen) with respect to the powers he referred to, certainly the expansive powers under Bill C-157. In view of the severe criticism which the Hon. Member has levelled against the provisions of Bill C-157—I know he indicated that he personally gave a speech in Toronto criticizing some of the provisions in Bill C-157—could he enlighten the House why it was that both his Leader and the official spokesperson for his Party refused to take any position whatever on that legislation during the entire time it was tabled in the House?

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, I would think that I am just a burned out English professor. I would not think in such clinical terms as the experienced lawyer from Burnaby. He does not draw very clear distinctions. When I said last Friday that I spoke in Toronto, I spoke on Bill C-157, not on the present legislation. I would like the Hon. Member to understand the difference there.

With respect to our spokesman on the legislation and our Leader, I will let them speak for themselves.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, before asking my question, I would like to express my appreciation to the Hon. Member for stating accurately the position I took in my speech about wanting the Bill to be passed but not calling on Parliament to pass it in a speedy way or without the care such an important matter deserves.

In view of that, would his Party and the NDP be prepared to consider and be agreeable, because of the importance of the subject and also because of the realistic timetable we face in the remaining months of this Parliament, instead of referring the Bill to the Justice Committee, which the motion I placed before the House calls for, to a special committee, perhaps a committee of ten members? They might not be bogged down by the normal business of the Justice Committee—for instance, the estimates, the divorce Bill, the Criminal Code amending Bills which are very important and which may be referred to the Justice Committee. Would the Conservative Party and the NDP not see advantages in referring this matter to a special committee?

Mr. Friesen: First, Mr. Speaker, I do not carry high risk insurance so I will not speak on behalf of the NDP and what it is going to do. With respect to our position, I want to point out to the Minister—and our spokesman will carry our official position—that the debates in the House, because they are carried on national television, are very important to the people of Canada. Therefore, an open and wide debate is very important. To me it is very important that as many Canadians as possible hear and follow the debates daily and they ought to enjoy the privilege. I know there is a time lag between the currency of the debate and the time when the public responds to us as Members of Parliament. Therefore we owe it to them, without any talk of filibustering or short circuiting, to give them a chance to follow the debate. In terms of passing the Bill on to committee, I will let my spokesman speak to that.

• (1220)

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I heard the comments of the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) with respect to the way in which the Bill should be handled. He will know that we discussed in a general way some of the options available to us in terms of the progress of the Bill. As I said on Friday—and I repeat it today—the normal process is to have our respective House Leaders discuss the matter in terms of determining the appropriate committee which should deal with this legislation. Indeed, the Solicitor General put his finger on one of the problems which we face as parliamentarians with respect to this piece of legislation. I do not want to rehash this item. I raised it last Friday so that the people of Canada could understand precisely where we were in dealing with the legislation. This is the first time we have had a chance to debate a very sensitive and very important matter on the floor of the House of Commons. Accordingly, I am inclined to say that we should have a fair and reasonable debate.

Also in my remarks last Friday I said that we should have a fair and close scrutiny of the legislation. We should have an opportunity to examine it clause by clause and people should be able to respond to the new version of the security legislation. As the Solicitor General knows—and the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) raised it in his remarks—the Hon. Member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence) was the critic of the Solicitor General at the time Bill C-157 came in. He was clear and unequivocal with respect to the position which my Party took on the matter. It was a clear and serious assault on the civil liberties of Canadians.

Since I have assumed my important responsibilities as critic of the Solicitor General, I have not been at all reluctant to indicate clearly our concerns with respect to the new legislation. Of course, the Hon. Member for Burnaby spends more time now out in British Columbia for good and valid reasons in terms of the next election. Were he in the House of Commons dealing with the business at hand, he would have no illusions with respect to where my Party stands.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Order, please. The Hon. Member will be aware that there should not be reference to the attendance or non-attendance of any Member. The remarks are rather indirect, I caution him, and I ask him to wrap it up as he has been speaking for a rather long time.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I did not mean to cause any reflection upon the matter. I only assumed, because the Hon. Member for Burnaby did not know about what he was talking with respect to the position of my Party, that he was not here. That may have been a wrong assumption. Perhaps he was sitting in his place but was simply not paying attention to the position which my Leader and I have taken on this Bill.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased the Hon. Member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) suggested that we examine the record in the House of statements made with respect to Bill C-157. I challenge him to rise in his place and point to a single occasion in the House when his predecessor, the Hon. Member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence), now the justice critic for the Conservative Party, made any reference of a critical nature to Bill C-157.

Further I suggest that the Hon. Member might want to examine the record very carefully with respect to any alleged interventions by his Leader concerning Bill C-157. Again I challenge him to rise in his place during this ten-minute period to enlighten the House as to when it was that either his Leader or the Hon. Member for Durham-Northumberland, as official spokesperson of his Party, ever spoke on Bill C-157.

The Hon. Member for Saskatoon West is right. They were clear, they were unequivocal. They were clearly and unequivocally silent on that piece of legislation, and the record makes that very clear.

I would like to ask a question of the Hon. Member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Order, please. I am sorry but the challenge will have to remain on the record as the period for questions and answers has expired.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, it is noticeable that the Government is not taking part in this debate except to the extent of having the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General (Mr. Tardif) contribute. I do not know whether members of the Government are fog-bound somewhere or whether they are just fog-bound here. In any event, it is strange that on a matter of this importance the Government has managed to prevent criticism of the Bill by its own Members.

Before it is too evident that I am critical of the Bill, I would like to hand out a bouquet, which I think is about enough. I am referring to the presentation toward the end of the Bill of an index. The House will recall that I made quite a fuss about an index for the rules of the House. I am delighted to see the practice is beginning to grow in the development of Bills, particularly complicated ones like this, and that we have if not an index at least a table of contents in Bill C-9. An index is also helpful.

I notice in Bill C-19, the amendments to the Criminal Code, that there is a table of contents. It might be described as such although it is done alphabetically and this one is done on a clause by clause basis, beginning with the first clause and continuing through. It is called a "Table of Provisions". It is a healthy and commendable development in drafting complicated legislation. I am grateful to the Government for having done this. I wish to compliment the Government officers in the gallery for carrying it out. Whether they initiated it or whether it was done on orders. I am not sure, but it is a commendable practice which I would like to see followed.

Having delivered myself of the only bouquet I could find in this spring of the year with no daffodils, it is time to have a look at this Bill as well as at a number of other Bills which have been presented by the Solicitor General and the Minister of Justice (Mr. MacGuigan). Three Bills have now been given first reading. Presumably in the course of time they will be presented to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. Bill C-9 is one of the Bills to which I refer, the upgraded and somewhat purified version of Bill C-157 in the previous Parliament. There is also Bill C-10, the divorce Bill, and there is a third Bill which consists of 600 pages of amendments to the Criminal Code, covering everything from pornography to the jury system. These three Bills were presented within a week or ten days of one another.

The Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs will be looking at them, but I do not see how the committee will do it. There are two possibilities. Perhaps the Government has done it deliberately, having delayed the presentation of Bill C-9 for 15 years, just to show that it is earnest and determined to take action in certain fields so that it will be able to stand before the electorate in coming months. It will say it brought the legislation forward but the Opposition would not let the Government pass it, neglecting entirely the notion that no body of responsible people can pass three Bills of this importance and magnitude in the time between now and dissolution, which may be in three months, it may be in nine months. Even in nine months the divorce Bill and the amendments to the Criminal Code could barely be given the attention that each deserves.

Therefore I must question the sincerity of the Government in presenting this Bill when it had all the time in the world previously to bring it down. I am not questioning the public servants who drafted the Bill; they have no command over the time of presentation. That is a political decision. But I do question the political decision underlying the presentation of these three Bills so close to an election.

That is one criticism I have. There are a number of others. Unfortunately I was unable to be here on Thursday to hear all of the presentations. I did not have the text of Hansard when I left, so I could not study all the comments.

There is some rather unusual phraseology in the Bill which troubles me. I compare the text in Bill C-9 with the text in Bill C-157 particularly in so far as it relates to omissions. In Bill C-157 there was an admission that Canada had some friends. It included "Canada or any state, allied or associated with Canada"; "espionage or sabotage against Canada or any state allied or associated with Canada". The expression "any state, allied or associated with Canada" was deleted. Does that mean that, should we discover that there is in Canada a plot of some kind, espionage against one of our allies or associates, we would not be interested? Why was that phrase deleted?

It is my understanding that the Senate looked at that matter and said that it could easily be dropped. It was dropped in two places, in the definition of "threats to the security of Canada" under (a) and, if I remember correctly, under (b). I worry that we should be so neglectful of our friends that the Canadian Security Intelligence Service would not be empowered to carry out investigatory procedures against espionage or sabotage related to one of our allies or associates. We are isolating ourselves just a bit too much when we leave them out.

Canada of all countries needs friend, allies and associates. Here we are virtually saying "The hell with them. If they get into trouble, tough. We will look after our business through our Security Intelligence Service and not worry at all about friends and associates."That is one of the shortcomings of that deletion.

It has been my experience in this field and in many others that exchanges of information mean exchanges in two directions. If you have nothing to exchange or refuse to exchange, nothing is going to come in your direction. This is one reason I deplore the removal of those words from the original Bill and their deletion in the new version. It was thought in the Senate that the expression "is detrimental to the interests of Canada" would be broad enough to deal with that. I see no harm whatsoever in leaving in the expression about our allies and associates. We should be quite specific that that possibility is still there.

There is another aspect which has not yet been clarified. That is Clause (b) of the definition section which relates to activities "within or relating to Canada". If you pursue that notion "relating to Canada" and contrast it with "within", if there are foreign influence activities "relating to Canada" anywhere in the world, will the Canadian Security Intelligence Service be empowered to investigate and bring forward a report.

Is that really the intent of this Government, an intelligence service overseas? Do we intend to send spies abroad to see what activities are being generated "relating to Canada"? It has generally been understood that this Bill is of domestic dimensions, but that clause, which is still to be defined, suggests that it has broader implications as far as Canadian personnel and their investigative practices are concerned. If it relates to the exchange of information and if it relates to Canada although taking place in other parts of the world, my comment about the previous omission is even more valid.

We are not going to get information about activities affecting Canada from our allies and friends unless we are prepared to share with our allies and friends information relating to any activities that we run across in Canada which affects them. That stands to reason. Exchange of information is exchange of information. It is not a one-way street. Therefore, I am a little worried. I have checked the French version of the same definition and it comes out just about the same; c) les activités qui touchent le Canada ou s'y déroulent et visent à favoriser l'usage de la violence dans le but d'atteindre un objectif politique au Canada ou dans un État étranger. It says "in a foreign state", and it does not necessarily mean a friendly state; "achieving a political objective within Canada or a foreign state".

Were there to be, for example, a group of Cubans who happen to be in Canada plotting, if you like, or organizing some way of changing the regime in Cuba, would that be a legitimate activity for investigation by the Canadian Security Intelligence Service? While Bill C-157 was pretty sloppily drafted, Mr. Speaker, there is some questionable drafting in this new Bill despite the bouquets I was throwing around a little earlier. That worries me.

Another matter of considerable concern is the sponsor, if you like, of this particular Bill. It seems to me in looking back over the last 15 years or so that practically everything this Government touches, it soils. There are lots of things one can point to. I think particularly of the Department of External Affairs, where I was once a foreign service officer, which the Government has managed somehow or other to downgrade and soil. I do not know whether it has been deliberate, but it has. The most recent changes effected in that Department have caused complete confusion there and in other Government Departments. I have heard it said, for example, that when domestic industry get parts or patents or processes from abroad, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce has to send its employees abroad to discover these things.

The integration of Canada's outlook on the world, projecting its views of the world, and enlisting trade support or the development of markets abroad was very much in the hands of the Department of External Affairs in its overseas operations, through the embassy. What we have now is just one example of how this Government has distorted, soiled or twisted practically everything it touches. It worries me.

A Bill of this sort, Mr. Speaker, purporting to deal with an activity of this sort, security and intelligence, sponsored by this Government, is ipso facto suspect because this Government is not trusted. That has been said before and I am afraid it is high time the Government realized that in nearly all its activities it is not trusted. The Department of National Revenue is still going through a process of trying to re-establish itself, if it ever can. It is not the public servants who are doing it, Mr. Speaker; it is the Ministers who have this twisted view of how their activities should be developed.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I would like to comment and ask the Hon. Member a question. One of the provisions of this legislation which has drawn a good deal of fire is the provision contained in Clause 16, and I believe it was contained in Clause 18 of the predecessor Bill, which would permit the new security service to embark on activities totally unrelated to national security. Instead, the service would for the first time have responsibilities with respect to the conduct of international affairs and external affairs in Canada. I draw to the Hon. Member's attention Clause 16 which reads:

> —the Service may, in relation to the defence of Canada or the conduct of the international affairs of Canada, assist the Minister of National Defence or the Secretary of State for External Affairs, within Canada, in the collection of information or intelligence relating to the capabilities, intentions or activities of
> (a) any foreign state or group of foreign states; or
> (b) any person other than—

A Canadian citizen or landed immigrant, in effect. As the House will appreciate, this extends to the service the power to, in effect, use all of the intrusive techniques set out in this Bill against targets who pose no threat whatsoever to national security. It could be a source of information to the government of the day in its conduct of external affairs.

Given the sweeping nature of the powers proposed in this legislation, for example the power to open first-class mail, examine all government records including income tax records, family allowance, unemployment insurance files and all other files in the possession of the government, the power to break into any place and examine private records—

Mr. Kaplan: They can do it now.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): —including medical records and others—and the Solicitor General suggests they can break in anywhere they want now—

Mr. Kaplan: With a warrant.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): —whether doctors' offices, Members of Parliament or lawyers, journalists and so on.

Mr. Kaplan: You know they can do that now under the present law.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): One would have hoped that the Solicitor General would have given very clear instructions to the Service that such activities are inappropriate. I would welcome the intervention of the Solicitor General to that effect.

Given that the functions of the Service are supposed to be related, one would have thought, to national security, what are the Hon. Member for Esquimalt-Saanich's views with respect to this very important extension of the powers of the new security service into the realm of using intrusive techniques to collect information for the conduct of international affairs in Canada?

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have that question because I did not manage to get around to all the criticisms I have of this particular Bill. The Hon. Member has made some rather important criticisms of the Bill. If, as he says, the Bill provides the Government, particularly the two Ministers mentioned, with information gleaned from within Canada, this certainly goes beyond what it should. I wonder why they were so generous in excluding Canadian citizens who might be involved in some of these activities. Unfortunately, in the past we have known of Canadian citizens who have been involved in some of the activities which might be the object of interest of the security service. Had I had more time I might have gotten around to asking about why Canadian citizens are excluded. I do not really see that that is an appropriate exclusion.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, we appreciate the remarks of the Hon. Member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) who has taken a great interest in this legislation. I see that the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) has been listening attentively to the matters raised by my colleague. In light of the questions put to the Hon. Member by the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson), I would challenge him to stand in his place and tell us about one time when, on the floor of the House of Commons, his Leader has taken any position vis-à-vis this legislation. It seems to me that he has been silent on the issue. The Hon. Member for Burnaby will understand that when his Leader stands up it is usually to speak against a position taken by the Hon. Member for Burnaby, as in the case of the prostitution Bill, where his Leader was vociferous in his rejection of the Hon. Member's position. In the case of the divorce Bill, the position taken by the Hon. Member for Burnaby was reversed by his Leader.

With respect to the position of this Party, I must say that as this is the first time the matter has been addressed on the floor of the House of Commons, I have questioned the Solicitor General in my capacity as spokesperson on matters in his Department, after the Senate report, to see when we could have the early introduction of this legislation and at that time the Solicitor General said he was taking the report under advisement. In the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee I have raised the question of the position taken by the Solicitor General vis-à-vis the report of the Senate committee and I repeat that we have not had an opportunity in the House of Commons to deal with the matter.

I will not elaborate on that, Mr. Speaker, but simply say by way of comment on my colleague's remarks, which were very helpful, that we take our responsibilities regarding this legislation seriously. We want to give it serious consideration. The Solicitor General and the Government will have to demonstrate that they are prepared to be amenable to looking at some of the powers proposed to be vested in this agency. We want to make sure that there is full accountability, that the powers of the agency are under control and that we have a situation where there is a clear and precise definition of those powers and the ability of the agency to carry out its responsibility. As I mentioned in my remarks on Friday, the fundamental principle which we must all abide by in this country is government under the rule of law, and that includes any agency of government.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a brief question of the previous speaker. I have some concerns about the appeal and review procedures that would enable people who are investigated to have an adequate opportunity to clear their name. Would the Hon. Member like to comment on that aspect of the Bill?

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I had prepared notes on this for my comments and I am sorry that I did not have time to get around to them. This is a shortcoming of the Bill. I have not been able to discover the means whereby a person may re-establish his good name if he is unjustly wiretapped and it comes to the public attention that he is possibly a potential spy for a foreign power or someone engaged in sabotage activity, this is one of the areas we will have to examine carefully in order to make sure that an individual who is completely, utterly and entirely innocent will have every opportunity to re-establish his good name and that the Minister responsible for the agency that allowed the misdemeanour, the slander, to occur will be held responsible in the House for having done so.

The good name of Canadian citizens is important to Canada. We must not allow this particular agency to besmirch those names, and if it is done in error there must be a means whereby the good name can be restored. The Minister is going to be held responsible, personally, in the House for having allowed that to occur.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): The period for questions and responses has expired.

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, this is one of the most critical and crucial Bills to come before Parliament. It has been a long time aborning. It goes back to the history of the Mackenzie Commission of 1969, the McDonald Commission of 1981 and the very unfortunate Bill C-157, which raised the fears and concerns of Canadians from coast to coast. Now we have before us Bill C-9.

I look at this Bill in a particular way, Mr. Speaker. To me the most precious possession of each and every Canadian is his or her basic freedoms and liberties. They are so much more important than personal wealth, material goods or status in society. Basic freedoms and liberties have evolved over the centuries; they began with the Magna Carta and have become entrenched in our parliamentary tradition. The most important thing that each and every Member of Parliament can do in this House is to make sure that we strive unceasingly to protect those rights and freedoms and not in any way, shape or form to allow anything to constrain or restrict them. We must not leave this House having seen the rights and freedoms of Canadians diminished. For me, that is what the Bill is all about.

When the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) spoke on Friday, he said: "What is not in question today is the need for an efficient security intelligence service". I do not believe that anyone questions the need for a security intelligence service in this country, Mr. Speaker. The question is really about the framework and the manner in which that security and intelligence service would operate. It does have work to do; it has work to do in the field of threats to the security of our country but we must be absolutely certain that, in the pursuit of that objective, the rights and freedoms of individual Canadians are not tampered with and not violated in any way at all.

Our responsibility, first and foremost, must be to see that constraints are placed on the activities of the intelligence service, not on the activities of the men and women of Canada.

On Friday when the Minister spoke, as reported at page 1275 of Hansard, he said:

> With the Charter of Rights and Freedoms we have demonstrated and affirmed our commitment to individual liberty.

If that is right, why are people so concerned today about the activities being carried out by officials of Revenue Canada? If people in this country are given such a guarantee of their rights and freedoms under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, how is it that a case like that of Donald Marshall can continue to plague the country? Where are the rights and freedoms that an individual like that is supposed to be guaranteed? Where were the rights and freedoms of Peter Treu? We remember the agony that man went through. We have to make sure that this Bill guarantees those rights and freedoms.

I see it is one o'clock, Sir.

ROLE OF OFFICIALS IN PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, over one year ago the youth wing of the Liberal Party of Canada overwhelmingly condemned government by "polls, propaganda and patronage orchestrated by a small elite". That reform sentiment has instead produced a Finance Minister (Mr. Lalonde) who uses the Budget to provide $300 million of taxpayers' money for a secret slush fund to be spent by the backroom manipulators in the Prime Minister's own Office.

The cancer lies in the backrooms of the Prime Minister Office, and it is spreading. In Canada today more and more Canadians are embarrassed when forced to admit that they have ever been supporters of the Liberal Party. More and more Liberals are asking who gave the backroom manipulators in the Prime Minister's Office the power to decide who gets a job and who does not.

More and more Canadians are asking for a public inquiry into the role the backroom manipulators in the Prime Minister's Office have played in deciding where and how taxpayers' dollars are to be secretly spent. The choice for Canadians is backroom manipulators, or democracy. I urge Canadians to choose democracy the minute they have the chance.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS

HEART TRANSPLANT RECIPIENTS—DIFFICULTY IN SECURING RE-ENTRY TO WORK FORCE

Mr. Scott Fennell (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a representation on behalf of heart transplant recipients. The general public does not know much about this type of operation, largely because those who go through such an operation do not wish to receive publicity. This is understandable. However, Mr. Speaker, a new drug has greatly increased the frequency of success of these operations and this fact should be brought to the attention of the public.

I have in my riding a person who recently received a new heart and a new lease on life. His doctor has lifted all his restrictions, and still my constituent is in an extremely frustrating situation. Over his three-year absence from the field of computers he has lost his advantage to those who have kept up with the myriad of changes. Also, employers, largely unaware of the success of these operations, are wary of rehiring heart transplant recipients.

On top of this, my constituent's disability pension will soon expire. He is not eligible for unemployment insurance benefits because he has not worked the required number of weeks within the period specified by the Unemployment Insurance Commission regulations. This is a man who paid into unemployment insurance for 20 years before his condition dictated that he exit the work force.

New social programs are required immediately, Mr. Speaker, to facilitate this steadily growing segment of our society in resuming normal, productive lives after heart transplant operations.

EDUCATION

IMPENDING CLOSURE OF DAVID THOMPSON UNIVERSITY CENTRE, NELSON, B.C.

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, Conservative provincial Governments across Canada are playing fast and loose with federal education funds by continuing to divert vast sums of federal dollars away from post-secondary education while Ottawa stands idly by. This pattern of escalating abuse has reached its zenith in British Columbia as huge student fee increases, staff and program cutbacks, and even the outright closure of entire institutions, have become the order of the day, while our taxpayers' dollars are squandered on high profile, prestige projects and uneconomic resource give aways.

In my own riding of Kootenay West, in fact in my home town, the David Thompson University Centre, the only non-metropolitan campus in B.C., is being shut down on May 1, throwing 100 faculty and staff onto the jobless rolls, and denying some 500 students of their right to reasonable equality of access to education. But the tragedy is not simply local. Many David Thompson University Centre programs, in fine arts, in the school of writing, and in rural education, are unique and are simply not available elsewhere in our province. As a result, many students come from other areas, and over 60 per cent of our students are women.

I plead with the Government to respond soon to the earlier appeals of my colleague, the Hon. Member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Ms. Jewett), and myself, and urgently consider what action it might take by way of applying special emergency funds or by means of special sanctions to save jobs and programs now in B.C., and to ensure the rights and future careers of our young people in Nelson, throughout B.C., and across Canada.

THE LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

Mr. Jack Masters (Thunder Bay-Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the thousands of people in my riding of Finnish descent, and on behalf of the thousands of Finnish people who live in Canada, I wish to comment on the insensitive statement of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mulroney) concerning "Finlandization". Many people of Finnish ancestry have correctly pointed out that, while Finland lives in the shadow of the Russian bear, unlike other countries in this situation "Finlandization" means a policy which is one of independence, not domination. This is very difficult to achieve, as we can appreciate. Therefore, I felt it necessary to explain. The mistaken impression which was given by the Leader of the Opposition is an injustice to Finns everywhere.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

LEBANON—EFFECT OF CONFLICT

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, the continued fighting and bloodshed in Lebanon have saddened the hearts of those who are seeking a solution to this conflict and of all those who want peace in this world. Canadians have great sympathy for the Lebanese man on the street, who only wants to live in peace and go about his daily business in a normal way. We all realize that the situation is hardest on Lebanese citizens, who have nothing to gain from this conflict.

At home, Canadians of Lebanese origin are well known for their enterprising attitude without racial or ideological prejudice. They have a reputation for working hard to achieve their own and their family's goals. Every night, pictures on TV remind us of the tragedy that is taking place in the streets of Beirut and of the pressing need for all citizens of this world to find ways of ensuring that we can all live together in peace.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM—POSITION OF PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVE PARTY

Hon. Roger Simmons (Burin-St. George's): Mr. Speaker, last November the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Mulroney) told a meeting of Alberta Tories that he and his Party favoured scrapping the National Energy Program's so-called 25 per cent "back-in" provision. Just as he made this statement, the Tory Premier of Nova Scotia, John Buchanan, began frantically lobbying Liberals in Ottawa to enshrine that provision in legislation in order to protect it from being changed by a future Government.

A few days ago, in talking to the Nova Scotia Tory Party, the Leader of the Official Opposition appeared to repudiate his November 8 pledge in Calgary and assured the Premier he would not change the program to the detriment of the province. Even as he was making that statement, the Hon. Member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) was telling Maclean's magazine that a Tory Government would do away with the 25 per cent back-in provision.

When are the Tories going to get their energy act together, Mr. Speaker? When are they going to stop speaking out of both sides of their mouth on this issue, saying one thing in one part of the country and something else in another part of the country? When will their Leader and official spokesmen stop trying to hoodwink Canadians by coming down on every side of every issue?

S.O. 21

SEIZURE OF BEAUTY SALON'S BANK ACCOUNT

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, here is a case that speaks for itself. This Canadian woman operates a beauty salon. During the summer and late fall she was seriously ill with a degenerative problem. The pain was so severe that she was required to be on pain-killers 24 hours a day, and was unable to work. Surgery was eventually performed, with resultant relief and she returned to work.

The business had carried on in her absence and, upon her return, she felt there was an error in the amount of withholding that had been sent to Revenue Canada. In an attempt to find out what the true picture was, she called Revenue Canada and requested that they come and do an audit. An audit was performed by Revenue Canada, indicating that they had been underpaid by approximately $3,400.

An officer of Revenue Canada yelled and screamed at the woman until she was in tears. He refused to accept her offer to pay the amount outstanding by post-dated cheques. Another employee of the Department advised her not to worry, to send the post-dated cheques directly to the Taxation Centre in Winnipeg, and all would be well. She did this, and continued her business. Shortly after, without any further word, by either telephone or in writing, Revenue Canada scooped all of the company's funds from its bank account, seriously impairing its ability to survive.

What is happening to the concept of basic human decency in the Revenue Department? Is it the Government's aim to bankrupt businesses? This case was referred to the Minister and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member's time has expired.

POLITICAL PARTIES

BILINGUALISM—POSITION OF PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVE PARTY

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Mr. Speaker, last October, in a rare display of unanimity, this House passed a resolution supporting the restoration of certain French language rights in the Province of Manitoba as originally provided for in the Manitoba Act of 1870. That resolution supported the will of the Manitoba Government to provide a made-in-Manitoba political solution, rather than having to accept a court imposed solution. We all well remember the eloquence of the Opposition Leader who, in his fine maiden speech in this House, committed his own wholehearted support as well as that of his caucus.

It was with great consternation we read on Friday last that two Members of the PC caucus, the Member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie) and the Member for Simcoe South (Mr. Stewart), have broken this national consensus achieved only last fall. They are now going to provide funding for a group leading the opposition to the introduction of French language services in Manitoba. The Conservative position is now a mystery, Mr. Speaker. Do they support the organized bigotry of Grant Russel and his "Grassroots Group", or do they truly support the restoration of a basic right of Franco-Manitobans?

It is incumbent upon the Opposition Leader to provide some leadership on this fundamentally important issue to this country. I call upon him to do this before the end of this week. All Canadians who believe in the duality of this country will be watching.

IMMIGRATION

DIFFICULTIES RESULTING FROM CERTAIN PROCEDURES

Mr. Pierre Deniger (La Prairie): Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw the attention of the House to a real problem concerning immigration applications under the family class. I should explain that at the present time, there is considerable delay between the time immigration applications, especially those from India, Bangladesh and Pakistan, are made and finally accepted, so that for instance, a young applicant who is only nineteen may be twenty-one when his application has finally been processed, which automatically disqualifies him for consideration by Immigration Canada.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that to be fair to the people who want to come here as well as to their Canadian sponsors, the effective date for immigration applications should be the date on which the application was made, not the date on which it was approved.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

RESPONSIBILITY FOR ADMINISTRATION OF NORTHERN INLAND WATERS ACT

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, as a result of the finding last week by Federal Court Justice, Barbara Reed, that the federal Government does not have the authority to issue authorization to use water without a licence in the Northwest Territories, such practice having been in contravention of the Northern Inland Waters Act, users of water have found themselves in a very awkward regulatory vacuum. Unfortunately the root of this problem can be traced to the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Jealous of its previous colonial powers, it refused to act in the spirit of the Northern Inland Waters Act which transfers jurisdiction to the Northwest Territories Water Board.

It is important that this matter be cleared up in short order. The sollution is obvious to anyone with an eye to see it. The controller of water rights must cease being an employee of the Department of Indian Affairs and must become responsible, not to the Minister, but to the Northwest Territories Water Board. This will ensure legality and concurrence with the wishes of Parliament as expressed through the Northern Inland Waters Act.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT LEVELS IN 1980 AND 1984

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. I would like to remind him that the unemployment rate in March, 1980, was 7.5 per cent. At that time 967,000 Canadians were unemployed. Today, four years after the Liberal Government came into power, the rate is 11.2 per cent, and 1,473,000 Canadians are unemployed. Our industries operated at 80 per cent of capacity in 1980. In the last three quarters of last year they operated at 68 per cent of capacity. These are the facts and the results of the Minister's stewardship and policies on energy and investment of the last four years. How can the Government and this Minister possibly make up for the damage that they have caused Canadians over these last four years, through any Budget?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend the Hon. Member for having paid tribute to the 15 years of Liberal leadership preceding 1980 which produced such good results for the Canadian economy. I must also remind him that the whole world went through the most severe recession since the Great Depression of 1930. Over 30 million unemployed can still be counted in industrialized countries. Canada has suffered through that recession as well as other countries.

I would like to remind my friend that in 1983 Canada experienced a very strong recovery which compared favourably with that of any other country. I hope that when the Budget comes down later this week the Hon. Member will find that the steps we are proposing will ensure that this recovery is going to continue, and that we will take steps to ensure that the Canadian economy is going to grow and benefit all Canadians.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, misery loves company, and there is certainly lots of misery on the government side of the House. The Minister reminds me of a buzzard with a broken beak. The Canadian people are not going to swallow this song much longer.

PERSONAL DISPOSABLE INCOME LEVELS

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Real family income, which is an immediate problem in Canada, has dropped 6 per cent from 1980 to 1982. In the first three quarters of 1983 real personal disposal income has dropped 1.8 per cent. In the United States it has gone up.

In these circumstances, with the recovery now faltering, and with a deficit that is going to be several billion dollars less than the Minister indicated last April, would the Minister agree to aid the recovery by improving the guaranteed income supplement? Would he agree to eliminate the Canadian ownership charge of four and a half cents a gallon, which amounts to $965 million this year? Would he agree to eliminate the federal sales tax increase of 1 per cent next October which he has already imposed on the Canadian consumer? Does he agree that Canadian consumers must be helped if there is going to be a continuing recovery? Will he take these kinds of steps that we suggest to him he should take, immediately?

Mr. Speaker: The Chair has some difficulty treating this as a single supplementary question. However, the Chair recognizes the Minister of Finance.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Newfoundland has talked about Tories speaking from both sides of their mouths. I must tell my friend that he is suggesting a number of steps that would substantially reduce government revenues. At the same time, he should have a word with his Leader who says that we should reduce the deficit. I would suggest that he have a meeting with his Leader to find out if what they want is to reduce the deficit or increase the deficit, reduce the taxes or increase taxes, et cetera.

As far as his specific recommendations are concerned, obviously he will have to wait for the Budget next Wednesday to know the content of the measures that will be put forward—

Mr. Dick: Next Wednesday, or this Wednesday?

Mr. Lalonde: This Wednesday. As far as the specific taxes that he mentioned are concerned, particularly the Canadian ownership tax, I would remind him that on February 1 this year the Government abolished the natural gas and gas liquids tax which was generating $800 million a year. That step which we have taken means that, as of February 1, the federal Government is receiving $800 million less in taxes on natural gas and gas liquids than we were receiving the year before. That is a significant step.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder if the House could delay until the Budget a full-scale debate on what appears to be budget proposals.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I will be very good.

Oral Questions

1980 ELECTION PROMISES

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): The Hon. Minister will know that several thousand years ago the Chinese, knowing that he would be in government, decided that this would be the Year of the Rat.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: I suggest to the Minister that he can take the steps I have suggested and reduce the deficit too, because his deficit will be several billions of dollars less than he indicated last April. In these circumstances, will he begin to meet his 1980 election promises to make the big projects happen, and to fight and overcome the recession? He is four years late in starting to meet those promises.

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member must have . . . I must say that—

[English]

I will say it in English. I have not checked what the year was in 1980, when he was Minister of Finance, but it must have been the Year of the Snake.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: I can inform my hon. friend that the Budget will be brought down next Wednesday, and that he will have to wait at least two days to find out what kind of measures the Budget will contain. I can say that last year's Budget focussed on economic growth, economic recovery and increasing employment, and similarly, the Budget I am preparing now will respond to numerous representations I received in recent months which suggested that I pursue the basic direction of the policy contained in the Budget brought down last April.

[English]

EFFECT OF GOVERNMENT POLICIES

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Finance. Contrary to what the Minister told my colleague a few minutes ago, the economic performance in Canada during the life of the Government from 1980 is much worse than it was in the United States. I set that out very clearly on February 1, and the Minister did not contradict the statement that I made at that time.

The main difference is a conscious decision on the part of the Government to follow a set of misguided policies, partly his fault and partly the fault of the previous Minister, which were quite distinct from those in the United States. These included the National Energy Program, the way FIRA was being administered, the interest rate policy which resulted in rates significantly higher in Canada, a higher deficit, and higher increases in taxation. I could go on and on, but in order to increase—

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member should ask a question. It is difficult to anticipate a budget debate by mini debates at this point.

Mr. Wilson: I was just starting my question, Mr. Speaker. In order to increase the credibility that the Minister has lost recently, would be acknowledge that these policies which I have just set out are indeed the main difference between the economic performance here and in the United States and the reason why the unemployment rate in Canada has been so much worse than it has been in the United States?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member referred to a set of misguided policies. The best answer I can give him in that respect is to quote from the Member for St. John's West who asked the previous question. In an interview in The Globe and Mail, which was published about a month ago, he indicated quite clearly and specifically that if he were in my place he would follow fundamentally the same policies.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wilson: There is absolutely no question that the Member for St. John's West on no account would be following the policies that I just set out.

FORECASTS OF ECONOMIC GROWTH IN CANADA AND UNITED STATES

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, the strength of the recovery in Canada has come from automobile sales because of the high average life of cars in this country, and from the housing industry which has been the beneficiary of some government policies. Since these two influences are receding, and business in Canada this year will be flat compared to the 9 per cent increase in real terms in the United States, from where does the Minister expect the recovery to receive its impetus if in fact his claim for a strong recovery is not to become the same sort of bad joke as that of his predecessor in 1981, when he put forth that totally misguided and unfortunate Budget which hurt so many Canadians?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, first I will tell the Hon. Member that he will have to wait 48 hours. Second, I will refer him again to that excellent interview which was granted to The Globe and Mail by the Member for St. John's West. Third, I would remind him that all the main indicators performed better in 1983 than even I had forecast in my Budget. At that time the Hon. Member and his colleagues were saying that my forecasts were too optimistic and not realistic. In effect, the record on inflation, on employment, on interest rates, and on the growth of the economy, is better than I had anticipated even in my Budget in 1983.

FORESTRY

PROJECTED LOSS OF JOBS

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment who is responsible for forestry. As the Minister knows, the forest products sector is very important in at least five of our provinces, and crucially important in a few of those. Before the weekend his Department released a report which predicted that we will lose 30,000 jobs in the forest products sector, and another 30,000 in the related service products sector. Would he confirm to the House if these alarming figures are accurate and, if so, what does his Government plan to do about this fundamentally important part of the Canadian economy?

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, we have made a commitment to FORINTEK and this institute for some years. We have renewed this commitment, and the Hon. Member knows very well that we are very concerned with maintaining the viability of this sector of our economy.

In 1983-84 we have done everything possible to maintain jobs in this particular sector, particularly through unemployment insurance funding of jobs, despite lack of co-operation from one province.

Mr. Broadbent: The House and, more important, the people of Canada will note that the Minister did not confirm or deny the accuracy of these alarming figures. The loss of 60,000 jobs at this time in our history is something the country cannot afford.

REFORESTATION FUNDING

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, since the Minister said that he is doing much to preserve jobs, could he explain to the House why, since just 18 months ago the federal Liberal Government promised to spend $130 million on reforestation which does provide jobs, it recently cut that by millions of dollars? That $130 million a year for the next five years was recently cut by millions, which means in British Columbia a reduction from $52 milliom annually to $5 million, one tenth the amount. If the Minister is concerned about jobs, why does he not restore this money which is needed for reforestation?

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the figures in the study, I cannot deny or confirm their accuracy. These are forecasts and, of course, must be treated with a grain of salt. I hope these losses in the industry will not take place.

• (1430)

As to the specifics of the federal participation in agreements, I can confirm to you, Mr. Speaker, that up until now we have maintained the integrity of the forest renewal policy as announced in the past. We have done that, particularly with the very same concern in mind, namely, to maintain the jobs and the viability of that sector in our economy.

Presence in Gallery

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, only a Liberal cabinet Minister could believe that if you cut the funding by 10 per cent, or provide only one-tenth of the amount that you were originally planning to spend, somehow you are doing more for the unemployed. That is typical Liberal thinking.

REQUEST THAT DEPARTMENT OF FORESTRY BE ESTABLISHED

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, since it is acknowledged by everyone who is informed about that industry that there is a serious crisis, will the Minister call for a meeting between himself and the provincial Ministers responsible for forestry, to come up with some early recommendations to deal with this crisis? Specifically, would the Minister consider the creation of a federal Department of Forestry which would, among other things, have the purpose of going into the world to pursue more export markets for Canadian forest products?

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I will do anything that will facilitate and strengthen opportunities for forestry in this country. In that respect I would like to bring to the attention of the Hon. Member something that he seems to prefer to ignore, namely, that in the current fiscal year we have invested in forestry schools across the country some $3.5 million; in research and development $9.5 million, and in job-creation $100 million. In the expansion of existing forestry facilities we will be investing something like $33 million in the Maritimes, $11 million in the Laurentians; $13 million in the Great Lakes region, and $14 million in the Pacific region. To strengthen pulp and paper research facilities in the current fiscal year we have put in $17 million. In water bombers from the federal Government alone we will be investing some $157 million, and all this, Mr. Speaker, because we believe that we have a role to play and forestry is an important sector in our economy. The Hon. Member is only interested in doom and gloom.

NATIONAL REVENUE

PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVE PARTY TASK FORCE—APPEARANCE OF DEPARTMENTAL OFFICIALS

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue. In response to a question asked this weekend with respect to immunity and with respect to Revenue Canada officials, the Minister is quoted as follows:

—I have no objections that officials meet with them—

—meaning the task force, and to and give them any comments they're asked for as long as those parliamentary rules are accepted

The Minister knows that this is not a parliamentary task force. The Minister knows that there are no parliamentary rules.

I infer from the Minister's answer that there will be no immunity which will be given to Revenue Canada officials who testify and appear before this task force. Will the Minister give an undertaking today that all Revenue Canada officials who wish to testify before this task force will be able to do so without fear of punishment and without fear of retaliation? And exactly what did the Minister mean by saying "parliamentary rules", if they apply?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad the Hon. Member asked this question. I said in my reply that it was necessary to make a distinction between a Parliamentary Committee, which is the Standing Committee of the House, and a Caucus or a Caucus Committee. Now, if I understood correctly, the reference was to a Caucus Committee of Progressive Conservative Members, and I pointed out that there were also specific guidelines for this particular circumstance, namely, a practice Hon. Members are well acquainted with which concerns information given by officials to a Caucus or Caucus Committee, and which applies to all party caucuses. I also pointed out that the guidelines and common practice which apply in the case of caucuses or committees apply in this situation as well.

[English]

Mr. Speyer: Mr. Speaker, what the Minister has said in his circuitous way is that anybody from Revenue Canada who appears and testifies before this task force, not a parliamentary task force but a Conservative task force, will have absolutely no immunity from punishment or retaliation. That is what the Minister is saying.

GUIDELINES GOVERNING APPEARANCES BY OFFICIALS

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister please confirm the accuracy of that assertion, that anybody from Revenue Canada who appears before this task force is subjecting himself or herself to retaliation or punishment for giving MPs knowledge of policy that exists within Revenue Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I think the Hon. Member is indulging in sophistry. First of all, he would have to admit that it is a Caucus Committee of Progressive Conservative Members. The Hon. Member said that it was not a Committee of the Progressive Conservative Caucus. If it is a Committee of the Progressive Conservative Caucus, that Committee and that Caucus must agree to follow the guidelines and the rules of the game, which are well established, and parliamentary practice, which is also well established, when officials meet either the Caucus of the New Democratic Party, the Progressive Conservative Party or the Liberal Party. If the Hon. Member refuses to accept these rules and guidelines and this practice, he should come out and say so.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

THE DONALD MARSHALL CASE—COMPENSATION INQUIRY

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister who, I know as a Nova Scotian, will have particular interest in this question. Does the Acting Prime Minister share the shame I feel as a Nova Scotian over the miscarriage of justice in the Donald Marshall case, and the disgrace I feel as a Canadian parliamentarian that this Parliament, through the Minister of Justice, has not taken the lead to redress this travesty of justice in trying to work out some form of compensation for Donald Marshall?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I understand that matter is, in some important aspects, now before the courts in the Province of Nova Scotia.

Miss MacDonald: Shame!

Mr. Kaplan: I am interested in waiting for the result of that process.

Mr. Crosbie: He has been in jail for 11 years. Never mind the courts.

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT TAKE ACTION

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Mr. Speaker, I must say I am disappointed in the Acting Prime Minister, who has that title even though he will not discharge his responsibility. I was asking the Acting Prime Minister whether, as a matter of government policy, the Minister of Justice and the Government will take the lead, regardless of the case in Nova Scotia, which does not impinge on compensation to Mr. Marshall who spent 11 years behind bars, with the suppression of evidence. Everyone has been dancing between the constitutional chairs. Meanwhile no redress has taken place. The wrong can never be corrected, but surely the Government can right the wrong.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member has added nothing to a question which has been asked several times in this House before—

Mr. Nowlan: Nothing has been done.

Mr. Kaplan: —and answered by my colleague, the Minister of Justice, who is responsible for answering.

Mr. Crosbie: Act on it. Get the Acting Prime Minister. Who will act?

EMPLOYMENT

SASKATCHEWAN IMMEDIATE EMPLOYMENT STIMULATION PROGRAM—ROLE OF SENATOR ARGUE

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): My question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. It is about the Immediate Employment Stimulation Program in Saskatchewan. I understand Senator Hazen Argue has access to a $4 million fund, and the only access to that fund is through Senator Argue's office. My understanding is that public servants are not involved before a decision is made by the Senator's office and then approved by the Minister of Employment's office here in Ottawa. Only after that are the public servants involved. Why are public servants not involved beforehand? Why does the Senator have the $4 million slush fund in Saskatchewan that he can hand out to whomever he wants?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. gentleman's description of the program accurately characterizes it. The process is such that projects may very well be suggested by a Minister's office and then go to the allocation committee. At that stage the evaluation is made by officials. I think it would not be particularly valuable to have officials evaluate every project which was hypothetically available for consideration.

The nature of the program is to fund, in a fast-track way, projects which look as if they have appeal in terms of creating employment. I think the important point to note—and I think the Hon. Member's question recognized it—is that there is an assessment of officials before the projects are approved.

MINISTER'S POWERS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. The Minister has confirmed that the only access to the fund is through the Senator's office and that public servants are not involved in screening or analyzing applications. Such is not the case with Canada Works and other programs. What authority does the Minister have to give a Senator the kind of political power to have a slush fund like this when it is not done with other programs in his Department? Is that right?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I thought I made it clear to the hon. gentleman that I did not accept the assumptions which underlay his question. It is not, I think, anything that could be accurately described as a slush fund. It is an attempt to have a fast-track process to approve job-creation projects.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Roberts: There is no indication that it flows to organizations or areas which are particularly responsive to the Liberal Party. It is true that there is an involvement of regional Ministers in allocations under the program. The Hon. Member seems to find that shocking. I think it would be peculiar, given the commitments of cabinet solidarity and cabinet responsibility, that cabinet Ministers were not aware of projects which were suggested for their areas.

SPECIAL INITIATIVES EMPLOYMENT PROGRAM—DELAY IN FORWARDING CRITERIA

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The trouble with the Minister's fast-tracking is that the tracks only lead to the Liberal caucus.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: I would like to ask the Minister a very simple question. On November 29 in the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration, the Minister, in reply to a question which I put to him regarding the criteria for the Special Initiatives Employment Program, or the Special Employment Initiatives Program, or the Special Employment Stimulation Program—it has had three different names—said, "if that has not been sent out, it will be in the next day or two". That was November 29. At that time there was $12 million left in the fund. Can he explain to us why we did not get the criteria until February 2?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would point out first of all to the Hon. Member that it is not a track which leads only to Liberal ridings. If he would remember back in November when we discussed the question before the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration, I pointed out to him that I would very much welcome suggestions coming from him or other members of the Opposition for projects.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Roberts: It is with some regret that he has not bothered to send us any. As far as the allegation in terms of figures is concerned, I will have to look into it.

Mr. McGrath: We could hardly make submissions until we saw what the criteria were. We did not get the criteria until February 2, even though he promised them to us the next day.

CONSULTATION WITH MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Let me refer to the criteria, Mr. Speaker. In the House on February 7 the Prime Minister indicated that members of the Liberal caucus and Members of Parliament were consulted, specifically members of the Liberal caucus, and asked to submit projects. Yet the criteria indicate:

—Grants and Contributions were not allocated on a constituency basis and, thus, were not the subject of formal consultation with Members of Parliament.

Can the Minister explain to the House why it is that only Liberal Members of Parliament were consulted when, according to the criteria, no Members of Parliament were to be consulted?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Well, the Hon. Member forgets the use of the word "formal" there.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Roberts: I do not think that there were formal consultations with Members of Parliament on the Liberal side other than the general Communication of information which takes place between a Government and members, urging that they take advantage of government programs which are available.

The Hon. Member asked for the criteria for the program, before the committee in November. I indicated to him at that time that the criteria were deliberately very wide-ranging and flexible, because their purpose was to cut through bureaucratic red tape. I promised to make available to him as quickly as I could—

Mr. McGrath: Two and a half months later.

Mr. Roberts: —the criteria. The criteria were prepared, a description of them was prepared, a bit before Christmas. I was not entirely satisfied that that gave as clear a picture to the hon. gentleman as he would like and, upon return, provided it to him. He complains that he could not make proposals to us without knowing what the criteria were. I suggest to him that he might have talked to some of his colleagues who did not seem to have any problem making proposals to us.

TRADE

BAN ON CANADIAN FISH PRODUCTS ANNOUNCED BY UNITED KINGDOM FOOD CHAIN

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister in his capacity as Secretary of State for External Affairs. Just a few days ago Ian MacLaurin, chief executive officer of TESCO, a major food chain in the United Kingdom, announced that his company would, when present stocks were exhausted, no longer sell Canadian fish products, as a protest against the Canadian seal fishery.

Is the Minister aware of the fact that the entire Canadian fishing industry is facing a drastic loss of markets in the United Kingdom as a result of the malicious advertising campaign carried out by misguided sentimentalists for animal welfare and, if so, what action does he intend to take for the protection of the Canadian fishing industry?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the question the Hon. Member has asked is one of very considerable importance in relation to the fishing industry.

Mr. Crosbie: Has the cat got your tongue, Allan?

Mr. Regan: The Department has taken very careful notice of this statement in Britain. We believe that the Canadian fishing industry should be consulted, and is being consulted by the Department on the matter. The action, of course, is totally unjustified and is an isolated one. We are confident that it is best combatted with as little publicity as possible.

Mr. Nowlan: Sweep it under the rug.

Mr. Crouse: I thank the Minister for International Trade for his answer, but my question was directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT MOUNT PUBLIC INFORMATION CAMPAIGN

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell the House, from my own experience visiting the U.K. and some European capitals only a year ago with the Minister of Fisheries, that the attitude of the officials of the Secretary of State for External Affairs was, "We will bury our head in the sand and maybe this one will go away". But it did not go away. Therefore I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he would consider mounting a public information campaign in the United Kingdom, as well as in Europe, by broadcasting and using other items in the media, in the hope of counteracting this vicious propaganda. If he does not have money enough in his own budget, perhaps he would get the Minister of Fisheries to give him some of the $20 million which he plans to spend in Canada. Perhaps some of that money would be better spent where the markets are, in counteracting what I construe as something which could be seriously detrimental to the over-all, entire Canadian fishing industry and its export market.

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member will be aware of the fact that publicity campaigns were undertaken extensively to attempt to have European citizens understand the nature of the seal industry over the course of the past four years during the seal controversy. Unfortunately, because of the emotional nature of the matter and the amount of misinformation, that has proven to be a very difficult campaign to carry out successfully. We believe, however, that there should be continued publicity about the fact that the fishing industry is indeed quite separate from the sealing industry. As to the question of the quality of Canadian fish, it should be judged on its own merits as it is the best possible product available in British stores, or elsewhere. We are confident that the matter can be dealt with effectively, but I stress again that I do not believe that it can be dealt with in the best way possible by giving it publicity in this House.

SPECIAL EMPLOYMENT INITIATIVES PROGRAM—EXPENDITURE OF FUNDS—APPLICATION OF CRITERIA

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration who has admitted that, in November last year, under the Special Employment Initiatives Program $138 million had been spent in that fiscal year and $150 million for the previous fiscal year. He also admitted that, as of December last year, he was not sufficiently satisfied with the criteria to let them be known to Members of Parliament on this side of the House of Commons. Is the Minister telling us that he spent $288 million without criteria which he considered satisfactory?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker. What I meant to say, and what I think I did say, was that the exposition of the criteria I thought was not as clear as to enable Members of Parliament opposite to understand them.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, the Minister is being consistent. His seatmate, the Minister of Finance, spent $200 million by letting the cameras in on his exposition. This Minister spent $288 million with regard to criteria that he did not consider clear enough to trust to distribution to Members of the House of Commons.

NATURE OF INFORMAL CONSULTATIONS WITH MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pursue the question of informal consultations. We were told by the criteria that were circulated that there were to be no formal consultations with Members of Parliament. The Minister made a great deal about that. He suggested there were informal consultations. What was the nature of the informal consultations with Liberal Members of Parliament, setting up this massive multimillion dollar Liberal porkbarrel? When will the Minister present in this House a detailed list of all of the expenditures under this program in all of the constituencies in Canada that receive benefit from the program?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the Right Hon. Member has included several questions under one umbrella. Clearly he either does not bother to listen to what I say, or does not care to interpret correctly. If he cares to examine Hansard, he will see that I did not say what he alleges I said in the first part of his question.

In so far as when the lists will be produced, I have given instructions to my officials to compile as accurately and as wide ranging as possible an indication of all the projects which we have funded. I have told him that it will take several days before that work is completed. I expect it will be done in about a week's time, perhaps earlier if I can speed it up.

CRITERIA GOVERNING GRANT TO ALLIANCE COMMUNITY SERVICES, TORONTO

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. As Minister of his Department and as regional Minister from Toronto, is he aware of the document entitled "A discussion paper on the integration and the Italian community's relations with the Liberal Party", dated August 29, 1983, which states that it is necessary to fund loyal and valid agencies within our community? If the Minister is aware of this document, will he explain to the House what criteria he used to give a grant of $583,000 to a group that was formed as a result of what was recommended in this paper, a group of people called the Alliance Community Services, which in effect is a group of Liberal Members who are the same signatories to this paper? Is the Minister aware of this document? Under what criteria did he fund the grant of $583,000 to the Alliance Community Services of Toronto?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): The answer to the first part of the question, Mr. Speaker, is no, to the best of my knowledge I am not aware of the document from which he has quoted. I cannot say that some such document has not been received by my office, but I have not seen any such document that contains the phraseology he has described.

In terms of the acceptance of the particular project which he has mentioned, there was an assessment of that project by officials of my Department. Clearly the concerns and advice of the Member of Parliament from that area, because we believe on this side of the House that Members of Parliament know their areas well and their views on what should be done with them are worthy of respect—it is a project that was assessed both by the members of my Department, and also a project which was supported strongly by the Member of Parliament who knew very well the community for which he advocated the project.

DEPARTMENT'S APPROVAL OF GRANT

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, the Minister just said that the officials of his Department approved this grant. Will the Minister confirm that my understanding is correct that, in view of the fact that the United Way of Greater Toronto has opposed the grant, and the Social Planning Council of Metro Toronto has opposed the grant, the grant is clearly a Liberal front, if he looks at the people with connections in Jim Coutt's office, and the danger to his fellow Members of Parliament in the area taking over their ridings? Will the Minister again go on record that his Department has confirmed this grant, and is he prepared to table the contract and the approval of his departmental officials for this grant?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I can confirm that, subsequent to the letters which I received from the agencies which the Hon. Member mentioned, I did ask for a reassessment of the project to be made, and an officer from my Department visited the project and assessed it. It is being monitored. I can confirm to him that that is taking place.

I personally have no objection to the tabling of the contract. I do not know whether that requires the permission of the people with whom the contract has been made, so maybe I will have to hedge my response to the Hon. Member in that particular aspect of his question. However, I can assure him that, in approving a project and signing it, it was certainly not done on the basis of any connections that the sponsors might or might not have had with any political party.

It is, of course, clear that no one is precluded from applying for projects under the program on the basis of their political affiliation, nor do I try to assess or question the party affiliation of people who are proposing measures to us. I can clearly recollect approved funding for the Stanley Knowles Housing Co-op in Toronto. I do not know the political affiliation of the people who suggested that project, but I would be very surprised to find that they had a Liberal affiliation.

All I am saying is that having taken part in the political process does not preclude you from entering government programs. I can assure the hon. gentleman it was not political considerations on the basis of these people's alleged party affiliation which led to the receiving of that grant.

UNITED NATIONS EDUCATIONAL, SCIENTIFIC AND CULTURAL ORGANIZATION

REASONS FOR ANNOUNCED UNITED STATES WITHDRAWAL

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton South): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The Minister will know that the United States has stated its intention to withdraw from UNESCO at the end of 1984, on the grounds that that agency is overly politicized and badly managed. Has the Canadian Government examined the reasons that have been advanced by the United States? If these reasons are found to be valid, would the Government put pressure on UNESCO now to reform itself before any structural weakening in that very important agency takes place?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker. We have followed this particular action of the Government of the United States very closely. We had been alerted to that possibility before the action was taken. We expressed our view that it was a wrong action on the part of the United States, that it would be much better to remain in the organization and attempt to correct, along with other countries, some of the deficiencies which were observable in UNESCO.

However, it may be that in the year ahead the United States will reconsider. I do not hold out very much promise, but during that period it will be possible to try to join with other countries to see whether some progress can be made in order to induce the United States to remain within the organization. It is a very large contributor. If its resources were removed, it would have rather damaging effects on the performance of UNESCO. I have no doubt that some of the complaints about the organization were justified. I have in mind particularly the undue bringing in of political discussions which had a better place elsewhere.

CANADIAN POSITION

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton South): Mr. Speaker, what is the Canadian Government doing to protest to UNESCO directly to reform itself, so that it can substantially answer the criticisms that have been advanced by the United States?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to send to the Hon. Member the statement that was made by my colleague, the Minister of External Relations, at the UNESCO meeting in which he outlined steps that ought to be taken in order to improve the effectiveness of the organization. We have been working very closely with other countries in UNESCO in order to bring about these changes. The action of the United States was not the first time that we heard about the necessity of doing something to improve the situation at UNESCO.

PETITION

MR. BLAIKIE—DEATHS OF MILITIA MEMBERS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by over 2,400 residents of Canada who ask that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Blais) of the Government of Canada allow the release of the transcript of the military inquest into the deaths of two members of the Canadian Militia, Private Darren Michael Krosney and Private Rodney Laurendeau, killed on August 21, 1983, on their way home from Dundurn, Saskatchewan, to Winnipeg, Manitoba. The undersigned ask that the documents be made available to the parents for their own peace of mind, so they can find out what actually happened on that tragic day and clear up some of the inconsistencies surrounding the various descriptions of the event.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT TO LIMIT THERAPEUTIC ABORTION

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-216, an Act to amend the Criminal Code (Protection of Innocent Human Life).

Some Hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, this Bill will limit the right to have a therapeutic abortion to circumstances involving the actual physical health of the mother. Abortions are being misused; they were not intended to be used as a method of birth control. Over 70,000 infant Canadians were murdered last year through improper abortions and this Bill is designed to limit that activity.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT AND CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING FILLING OF VACANCIES

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-217, an Act to amend the House of Commons Act and the Canada Elections Act (by-elections).

Some Hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, this reintroduces a Bill from the previous session. It seems apropos in that there are two vacancies in the House at the present time and Canada has the most antiquated and outdated by-election laws of any democratic country in the world. This Bill is designed to try and hurry the filling of those vacancies.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

STANDING ORDERS

AMENDMENT RESPECTING JOINT COMMITTEE ON OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

On the order: Government Notices of Motions:

The President of the Privy Council:

That Standing Order 69(3) be amended by adding the following:

"(d) On Official Languages policy and programs to act as members on the part of this House on the Joint Committee of both Houses, to consist of 15 members;"

And that a message be sent to the Senate requesting that that House do unite with this House for the above purpose and to select, if the Senate deems it to be advisable, certain members to represent that House on the proposed Joint Committee.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Section (2) of Standing Order 25, this Government Notice of Motion stands transferred to and ordered for consideration under Government Orders at the next sitting of the House.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 370, 390 and 395.

[Text]

THE CONSTITUTION

Question No. 370—Mr. Stewart:

1. Did the Government commission the production of sets of books, including oak cabinets with brass plates, commemorating the patriation of Canada's Constitution and, if so (a) how many commemorative sets were commissioned (b) what was the total cost of production?

2. Is the selling price of the commemorative sets $1075 each and, if so, does this price reflect the actual cost of production?

3. Were volumes 1 to 10 allocated and, if so, to whom?

Hon. Serge Joyal (Secretary of State): 1. No.

2 and 3. Not applicable.

HABITUAL CRIMINALS

Question No. 390—Mr. Howie:

Did the Department of Justice carry out a study to inquire into and review the cases of persons categorized as habitual criminals and, if so (a) how many cases were studied (b) what was the estimated cost (c) during what time frame was the study accomplished (d) what was the purpose of the study?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Minister of Justice): In so far as the Department of Justice is concerned: Yes, the study is ongoing.

(a) 93, (b) $301,000, (c) July, 1983 to March, 1984, (d) To advise the Minister of Justice as to the status of individual habitual criminals, and to advise which, if any, should be relieved of that status because they no longer seem to pose a danger to society; and to recommend the future management by correctional authorities of each offender.

OFFICES OF INFORMATION AND PRIVACY COMMISSIONERS

Question No. 395—Mr. Howie:

What total number of persons were employed by the offices of the Information and Privacy Commissioners of Canada and what was the total cost in terms of (a) salaries (b) offices?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Minister of Justice): In so far as the Offices of the Information and Privacy Commissioners of Canada are concerned:

Persons employed by the offices of the Information and Privacy Commissioners of Canada at December 1, 1983: 33.

(a) Salary costs to December 31, 1983: $481,795.

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Kaplan that Bill C-9, an Act to establish the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, to enact an Act respecting enforcement in relation to certain security and related offences and to amend certain acts in consequence thereof or in relation thereto, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, in addressing my remarks to Bill C-9, when we adjourned at one o'clock I was stating that with any piece of legislation which deals with intelligence gathering and surveillance of individuals, first and foremost one must see that any necessary constraints and limitations are placed on the activities of the agency itself and not allow the powers of that agency to abuse or violate the basic rights and freedoms of Canadian. That should be basic to this Bill or any others of a similar nature.

Does this Bill meet that particular objective? Certainly it is an improvement over its predecessor, Bill C-157, but in my mind it still leaves a great deal to be desired. Let me illustrate what I mean. The Bill deals with the powers of investigation assigned to the new agency. Clause 21 states:

Where the Director or any employee designated by the Minister for the purpose believes, on reasonable grounds, that a warrant under this section is required to enable the Service to investigate a threat to the security of Canada or to perform its duties and functions under section 16, the Director or employee may, after having obtained the approval of the Minister, make an application in accordance with subsection (2) to a judge for a warrant under this section.

As a result, Federal Court justices would issue warrants for intrusive techniques such as electronic surveillance, mail opening and access to confidential information. Certain things would not be allowed, such as information under the Statistics Act. Nevertheless, the issuance of that warrant to carry out these particular techniques is, from my point of view, a dangerous provision for several reasons.

Nowhere in the Act, Mr. Speaker, is it clearly defined when a warrant might be granted. Words such as "espionage" and "sabotage" are used, but their meaning is not clearly outlined anywhere in the Bill. Therefore one has to ask how a judge would decide when to issue a warrant without a legal definition from which to proceed. It is the duty and responsibility of this House to pass laws which contain those definitions. Surely, Sir, it is Parliament, not the courts, which is the maker of laws.

Since such crucial words as "sabotage" and "espionage" are not defined, it is surely easy to see why so many people are concerned about this Bill. Groups, organizations and associations like the Civil Liberties Association are campaigning against this Bill. They are concerned about it. They rightly point out that almost any group in Canada would be investigated if the Government disagreed with their objectives and activities. That could extend to activities they might carry out on behalf of individuals in this country or in different parts of the world.

The Solicitor General has tried to argue that the Minister must have the right to judge when the gravity of this threat to security supersedes the need to violate the privacy of those affected when deciding to make an application for a warrant. He puts the one against the other and says he should have the right to decide when the gravity of the threat to security is the more important.

That is a very dangerous instrument in the hands of any individual. If I could be assured that every Minister opposite and any Minister at any time had the wisdom of Solomon, was totally honest and incapable of error, then perhaps that proposal could be given some consideration. I know and you know, Sir, that such is not the case. Nowhere has this been better illustrated than in the last few days with the bungling of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Bussières), or in the recent letter episode carried on by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde). Those examples painfully illustrate the abusive powers that this particular piece of legislation could be turned into.

Those two examples show that it is never the Ministers who have to bear the consequences of the act when government authority is abused; it is those who are the butt of their abuse who needlessly suffer.

One can also look at the negative effects the abusive tactics of Revenue Canada have had on the lives of hundreds of average Canadians. We can imagine the anguish, the anxiety and the despair to which many of them have been subjected. That is power in the hands of a Minister of the Crown. That is power in the hands of a Minister of the Crown when, as the Minister of Finance did recently, he used his office and information which he had in confidence to make statements against the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mulroney)—statements which he could not later substantiate, simply because we have a Minister of Finance more concerned with politics than with justice.

Furthermore, if one were to look at the potential for abuse, one need look no further than the infamous case of Peter Treu. Here was a Canadian on whom information was collected in secret; he was charged in secret and his trial was held in secret. In his case all the basic rules of justice were disregarded—the basic rules such as being innocent until guilt is proven and the right to face your accusers. Those things were disregarded. He was eventually cleared of all charges, nevertheless his reputation, his job, his savings and his personal life were all wrecked because of far-reaching powers which were beyond the rule of law.

Examples like these frighten me and frighten a lot of Canadians, Mr. Speaker. They show that a single Minister ought not to be given the sole responsibility of directing an agency which has such extensive powers as the one presently proposed will have.

It has been correctly said that information is power. I believe that no single Minister ought to have the power over people's lives that this Bill seeks to assign. There simply are not the checks and balances that we need. The Solicitor General has argued that case and has said that the abuse of power would be impossible as the agency would be subjected to civilian review by three different bodies. He thinks those are sufficient checks and balances.

The first of these bodies which would review the power of the agency is the Inspector General, who would review the operational activities of the service and monitor its compliance with operational policies. As such, we are told that the Inspector General is allowed access to all information that the service has, except for Cabinet documents. I ask you, Sir, how can the Inspector General monitor the activities of the service and ensure compliance when he will be unable to see the Cabinet document which may affect the service? This is particularly important since the Minister has direct control over the service and must authorize all applications for warrants.

If this implication were not so serious, one would almost have to laugh at such a provision. As far as I can see, the Inspector General would be a watchdog without teeth. He would never have all the necessary information at his disposal.

I would say that the same situation holds true for the second monitoring body, the Security Intelligence Review Committee. It would generally review the performance by the service of its duties and functions under the Act. That would be its responsibility. As well, it would investigate complaints, hold hearings dealing with security assessments and file reports with the Minister in Parliament. However, once again Cabinet documents are not included as part of the information to which the committee would have access. Thus, once again the effectiveness of the committee is limited as it will never have all the facts.

Finally, the Bill would provide for a third group. It would provide for a review of the substance and operation of the new service by a parliamentary committee five years after proclamation—five years after proclamation, Mr. Speaker. What this sounds like to me is very much like closing the barn door after the horses have escaped.

We have three steps which the Minister has set up which he says will eliminate the potential for any abuse under the Bill. Sir, I do not believe that they have the necessary power. As in cases like this, there is a very fine balance between the threat to security and the right to privacy of every individual. That is what we are talking about here. While Bill C-9 comes much closer to achieving that balance than did its predecessor, Bill C-157, nevertheless I feel it is far from satisfactory in this regard.

The language in the Bill is ill-defined. It leaves the door open to unnecessary and to potentially dangerous abuse. There is far too much in the way of discretionary powers given to the Minister and to the Cabinet. It assigns far-reaching powers to the agency but provides far from adequate provisions for the monitoring of the agency's activities.

The rule of law has always been one of the linchpins of our system of government. This Bill would create conditions which would violate those principles. For this reason, Members on this side of the House simply cannot with a clear conscience permit the Bill to pass in its present form.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I listened with care to the thoughtful remarks of the Hon. Member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald). I share many of the concerns she has expressed. I should like to ask a specific question about one element that the Hon. Member highlighted and that is the question of oversight and accountability.

The Hon. Member will know that the McDonald Commission strongly recommended the establishment of a small parliamentary oversight committee made up of members of the Opposition to ensure that ultimately the new security service would be accountable to Parliament and not just to a specific Minister and a hand appointed body by the Minister of the day. I should like to ask the Hon. Member whether she supports the establishment of a parliamentary committee to oversee the operations of the new security service as recommended by the McDonald Commission.

• (1520)

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I say to the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) that I am very sympathetic to that particular proposal. I would want to make sure, however, that it is truly an independent parliamentary committee and not one which has been co-opted by the Minister of the day to serve his or her purposes.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): I take it, then, that the Hon. Member would agree with the appointment of such a committee providing that these safeguards for independence were in fact met. Is that correct?

Miss MacDonald: Yes, certainly, and I would like to examine it. As I am sure the Hon. Member knows, there are certain other jurisdictions in other countries which have such a set-up. I would like us take a look at them and see what are the best aspects of this kind of operation in other countries which we could bring into our own system.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I was likewise very interested in the remarks of the Hon. Member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), in particular her comments with respect to the imprecision and inadequacies of the Bill. Will the Hon. Member tell us whether she and her Party will be preparing for the committee, when it meets, a series of amendments which will put into precise form the exact wording she would like to see in the Bill so that we can judge whether those proposed amendments in fact accomplish our ends more effectively than the words which are in the present Bill?

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I would say to the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East (Mr. Allmand) that we have a lot of difficulty with this Bill. We do think it should be much more precise. However, I do not feel at this point we should say "Here are the amendments we suggest". We feel there are a great many people in this country who have something to contribute to the definitions which should go into this Bill. They have not all been heard from as yet, by any means. After we hear what they have to say, I would invite the Hon. Member to come along to the committee and listen to the amendments which we will be presenting.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I also want to congratulate my colleague, the Hon. Member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), for another first-rate contribution in this particular debate. She is always germane and always speaking on behalf of the interests of the average citizen in our country. She did not disappoint us with respect to this important issue.

In connection with the matter which she raised with respect to the amendments in the committee—and the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East (Mr. Allmand) has alluded to this—Hon. Members and the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) I am sure will be happy to know that we are prepared to come forward with specific and precise recommendations by way of amendments to the existing legislation. I feel that there has been an enormous amount of time spent on drafting the predecessor Bill and this Bill, and, unfortunately, it still is not right.

I have tried to bring out some points with respect to the preposterous conclusions, as I see them, which one arrives at regarding the present definition of "threats to national security". The Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East, as a former Solicitor General, will understand that these are difficult and complex issues. However, the opportunity has now been given to us. After 15 years of a subject being considered by a variety of commissions and a Senate committee, we in the House of Commons, the elected representatives of the people of Canada, now have an opportunity for input. We take our responsibility seriously.

I ask rhetorically of the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East whether or not he wants to support legislation which gives a mandate to the security service to obtain information with respect to people who support Solidarity in Poland, who support the Afghan rebels, who support the Sandinista rebels in Central America? This is the conclusion one has to come to if one studies clearly a definition of the threat to the security of Canada. We have concerns and apprehensions with respect to these definitions. We will be up front. We will be there with our amendments and proposals at the appropriate time. However, these are the issues which have to be discussed on the floor of the House of Commons. We have had a lot of different proposals brought forward leading to the present Bill. There have been a number of changes. But it is too facile for a person to stand up and say "Let's shut our eyes and move ahead", without reasonable and adequate consideration and deliberation.

I simply want to assure Hon. Members of this House that, as far as amendments are concerned, we are considering them and we will in fact be doing our duty as loyal Members of Her Majesty's Opposition.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Order. I would first ask Hon. Members to relate their comments in some fashion to the speech of the Hon. Member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald).

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, while I appreciate the answers given by the Hon. Member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) and the Hon. Member for Kingston and the Islands, I would ask them both, especially the principal speaker, if she does not agree that we had better get on with the job of coming up with some definitions and some mandate, because at the present time the security service under the RCMP is operating with no legislative mandate. There is a mandate which was put out by the Cabinet in 1976. However, the security service is now operating with very imprecise guidelines and no legislative mandate. Does the Hon. Member not agree that it is urgent we deal with these matters and come up with some very precise and appropriate legislation with respect to these problems?

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the concern which the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East has with regard to the present situation. However, I do have to tell him that it was not the Conservative Party which brought in that abhorrent Bill C-157. It took months of hearings in order to knock it down and destroy it. That in fact set the whole process back by months—by light-years.

What I would like to be assured of in return is that when the Conservative Party brings in proper amendments, and when it presents to the committee those responsible amendments, the Members of the Liberal Party, who will be in the majority on that committee, will just not automatically vote them down because their Minister says "I don't want anything to change the way in which I presented this present Bill".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): The period for questions and comments has ended. Debate. The Hon. Member for Strathcona.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker Donald Smith, Lord Strathcona—

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): The Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) on a point of order.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Chair might check its speakers' list. I believe the turn has come in rotation for a member of this Party to speak, the Hon. Member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): I would be pleased to check that list. However, I saw only one Hon. Member rising and I recognized the Hon. Member who was rising. I will check my list to make sure that the usual rotation is followed. The Hon. Member for Strathcona.

Mr. Kilgour: Edmonton-Strathcona, Mr. Speaker, named after Donald Smith who came from your part of the world, Sir. He then was knighted and that is when the riding became "Strathcona".

Miss MacDonald: He came from Scotland.

Mr. Kilgour: I know he was from Scotland but somehow he went to Montreal after he left the West and a lot of people identify him with the Acting Speaker's part of the world.

I would like to start with the theme which was raised by my colleague, the Hon. Member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald). The problem that we on this side of the House have is that the predecessor Bill was so bad. I think most Hon. Members on this side would concede that this Bill is considerably better than the last one. Bill C-157 would qualify for an entry in Ripley's Believe It or Not or the Guiness World Book of Records for perhaps the most draconian piece of legislation ever introduced in the House of Commons. It was so bad that the Government did not have the courage to introduce it in the House. They took it through the Chamber down the hall. It was properly ripped to shreds by one and all who appeared before the Senate committee to deal with it.

My role here today is simply to indicate some of the matters which will be brought out by Members on this side as causing concern if the Bill gets to committee. Starting at the beginning, Section 12(2) in the Bill basically says that the security service is not restricted from "remaining informed through public sources" about the political, economic and social environment within Canada. On this side of the House we would ask why the Senate recommendation was not followed in this respect. If, as the Senate said, the words in the Bill of which I am speaking are unnecessary, why are they still in the Bill? Perhaps the Minister will be kind enough to clarify that at an early point.

A little farther on in the definition section of the Bill before us it says that threats to the security of Canada are to be defined as "espionage or sabotage against Canada or any state allied or associated with Canada". On this side of the House we ask why it is that espionage and sabotage were not defined in the Bill we have now. It is true that sabotage is defined in the Criminal Code. Is that the definition that is intended in this Bill? Hon. Members will be curious about that too. We wonder why the term "espionage" is not defined in this Bill. What does the word "espionage" mean? The dictionary definition is essentially spying. Yet spying, according to Section 3 of the Official Secrets Act, is very broadly defined. I ask the Minister why espionage is not defined in the Bill.

The third point I would raise is that the predecessor Bill defined unacceptable behaviour as constituting, among other things, the threat or use of acts of violence against persons or property, and so on. Does throwing a tomato at a politician constitute an act of violence? I am sure most of us in this Chamber have had something thrown at us, if not a tomato. We will take the position in committee that the definition is too broad. A term such as "strictly necessary" should be used in the Bill, as was recommended by the Senate committee. Many provincial attorneys general voiced concern about this part of the Bill, feeling that that definition was too broad. Several witnesses before the Senate Committee urged the Government to change the definition to deal only with threat or use of serious violence, such acts as would not involve the throwing of a tomato at a politician.

My fourth point deals again with the definition of subversive behaviour. The previous Bill defines this as activities directed toward the undermining by covert unlawful acts directed toward or intended ultimately to lead to the destruction or overthrow of the constitutionally established system of government in Canada. What does this say about legitimate dissent or protest? Witnesses before the Senate committee stated that subversion should not be a concern of the security service but rather should remain a matter for investigation under the Criminal Code.

The fifth matter I would like to deal with is the section dealing with international affairs and defence. In the old Bill it is Section 18. The new section is essentially the same but incorporates the Senate recommendations, except for the suggestion that the service have a monopoly on operational work respecting this type of intelligence gathering. That is Section 16. The question will be asked in committee as to whether the service should be engaged in this type of work which is not directly linked to the security of Canada. It will be asked what the parameters of this provision are. Testimony before the Senate committee said that this section will be used to gather economic, commercial, social and other data about other nations. It is important to note that warrants can be used to allow the service to use techniques for this section. We ask how the judge determines whether to issue a warrant. Does it consist of a security service agent walking into a judge's office and asking him if he would mind signing a warrant which has been approved by the Solicitor General? What a judge will consider and under what circumstances a judge will issue a warrant are serious questions.

The sixth point, Mr. Speaker, is the question of Section 21, which deals with warrants and states a number of things. For example, a provision is added to stipulate that an application for a warrant can only be made with the approval of a Minister. Safeguards or guidelines mentioned by the Senate are to be incorporated. We think that is a good thing. The maximum time limit for a warrant is one year. Confidential records kept pursuant to the Statistics Act, such as census forms, are not subject to warrants. Again it is a question of balancing the gravity of the threat to security and the right of the citizen to privacy.

The Government takes the position that if the Minister has to approve the application for a warrant, he or she will only do so if the circumstances justify such a step. With respect to the maximum period of a warrant, the McDonald Commission recommended a maximum period of 180 days. In this Bill the maximum period is a year. Questions will be asked as to why the McDonald Commission maximum has been so exceeded.

With respect to the Statistics Act, we ask why it is that Statistics Act material is now exempt under the Bill, whereas it was subject to warrant under the previous Bill. We ask whether there should be an annual report on warrant activities such as there is with respect to the Official Secrets Act.

The seventh subject matter I would like to deal with is the question of Section 20. I am talking about the protection of employees. Section 20 states that the Director and employees have the same protection under the law as peace officers. The McDonald Commission recommended that federal and provincial Governments give service employees various exemptions from specific laws. The question again comes up whether provincial attorneys general who administer the criminal law have the right to information of illegalities committed by the service, perhaps subject to the withholding of certain information if the federal Government believes it to be contrary to the security of Canada to release it. We have concerns in that area.

My eighth point revolves around the question of management control and responsibility. This is obviously an important area. The Bill deletes the provision which gave the director the final word on targets of the service and on information the service would disclose to the Government. If you have had a chance to look at it, you will recall that the present section says that the Minister may issue written instructions to the Director. What about oral directions? How would these come to the attention of the review committee? Should all directions be in writing? If oral directions are sufficient, would there be an incentive for the Minister not to reduce his directions to writing? I hope the Minister will have good answers to those questions when the Bill goes to the Justice Committee.

The ninth concern I would raise relates to Clause 30 which makes it clear that the Inspector General monitors compliance by the service with its operational policies as well as reviewing operational activities.

I am pleased that the Minister is in the House because I would like to ask him why the Senate recommendations were not followed in this area. How can the Inspector General monitor the activities of the service and ensure compliance when he will be unable to see Cabinet documents which may affect the service? I ask the Minister to explain that to us at an early date.

My tenth concern relates to Clause 34 which establishes a Security Intelligence Review Committee which would be composed of up to five and not less than three members. Again, the review committee is not allowed access to Cabinet documents in control of the service. How can the committee effectively oversee all the operations of the service when these documents are withheld? The expanded duties of the review committee are set out in line with the Senate report, but I remind the House that the McDonald Commission would have established a joint parliamentary committee to oversee the service.

My last point deals with the question of the Security Offences Act. The RCMP retains primary responsibility but the Solicitor General may enter into arrangements with other police forces respecting the investigation of security offences. The Senate recommendation for the role of the federal Attorney General was followed. In conclusion, I would simply ask if there should be a duty on the part of the RCMP to consult other forces, as the Senate committee suggested?

The concern which has been expressed by other Members is that this matter has dragged on for 15 years. In that time there have been several royal commissions. There have been problems with morale in the security service as well as problems with respect to the effectiveness of our security service. Finally, a Bill has been introduced after 15 years.

We on this side believe that we would be derelict in our duty, as the Party which expects to form the next Government when an election is called, if we did not give this Bill reasonably close scrutiny before it goes to the Justice Committee. We put the Government on notice again that we will be giving it very close scrutiny when it comes before the Justice Committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Order. Before we proceed to the 10-minute question period, I would like to draw to the attention of Hon. Members Citation 381 of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition, which reads as follows:

On the motion for the second reading, it is out of order to discuss the clauses of the Bill.

I think Hon. Members could phrase their speeches in such a way as not to make specific references to clauses in the Bill. There will be a 10-minute period for questions and comments.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member, in his very interesting remarks, made reference to two key elements of this legislation which he indicated were of considerable concern. One was with respect to some of the powers being accorded to this new agency, and the second concerned the element of oversight. We in this Party see those two elements, the unprecedented new powers which are accorded to this agency and the importance of parliamentary oversight, as being two of the most essential elements of any Bill that would establish a new security agency.

Certainly the Solicitor General should be aware that if in fact he wants this Bill to go to committee he should be prepared to consider amendments to those two key elements which the McDonald Commission itself singled out as being the heart of legislation in this area. Certainly this Bill must be carefully studied in committee because we want to examine its elements closely. Let me emphasize those two key elements again. The first is the question of parliamentary oversight and accountability which was seen by the McDonald Commission as being the cornerstone of accountability in a security agency in a democratic society. The second element concerns the use of powers, particularly intrusive powers, against Canadians who are suspected of subversion.

As the Solicitor General will know, it is in this particular area that the McDonald Commission strongly emphasized that intrusive techniques should not in fact be permitted.

Let me ask the Member a question with respect to one of these intrusive techniques. It concerns the matter of opening first class mail. The Member has been quoted on a number of occasions as being in support of giving law enforcement agencies the power to open first class mail. Undoubtedly he will know that the Member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) is strongly opposed to granting those powers and that his colleague, the Hon. Member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence), has indicated that he supports extending those powers.

In light of his own comments with respect to granting the power to law enforcement agencies to open first class mail, does he believe that the new security intelligence agency should have the power to open first class mail despite the clear recommendation of the McDonald Commission that it should not have such powers?

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, how the question relates to the preamble, which took approximately three quarters of the Member's comments, eludes me but I will speak to the last part of the question. It is true that I have personally expressed the opinion that I think that Members of the drug section of our RCMP should be permitted to open letters when they have a strong prima facie case that they contain heroin or cocaine. Nevertheless, I have always added to that view that they should obtain a court order before doing so. In other words, if someone in Bangkok ships a gram of heroin to someone in my riding and they have seventeen witnesses that that first class envelope contains heroin, I think somebody in Burnaby should be able to go to a judge and get a court order authorizing the opening of that letter.

I stand to be corrected, but to my knowledge there is no other country in the world where the mail could not be opened in such circumstances. I would remind the Hon. Member from British Columbia, where the hard drug problem is so severe, that a study done in Baltimore a few years ago showed that approximately 233 heroin addicts committed more than 500,000 crimes in the City of Baltimore over an 11 year period. I do not think I have to tell the Hon. Member, who knows this, that the general consensus is that people on heroin commit many of the break and enter offences, thefts and robberies that occur across Canada, particularly in British Columbia. It is on that basis that I have advocated opening the mail.

I will not answer my friend' question with respect to the security service because, as he knows, this matter is no longer within my responsibility. Therefore I do not have to answer the question.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, while it may no longer be within the responsibility of the Hon. Member, I certainly think Members of the House would be most interested to hear his views about whether or not the new security intelligence agency should have the power to open the first class mail of Canadians. Again, I ask the Member if he believes that that is a power which should be accorded to the security intelligence agency, despite the clear recommendation of the McDonald Commission that that should not in fact be the case?

Mr. Kilgour: The same answer, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I have a similar question that I would like to direct to the Member who just spoke. I think his constituents have a right to know first, from where he got those figures that he was quoting. Second, how would the evidence of 17 witnesses in Bangkok that a gram of heroin in an envelope arriving in Burnaby be relevant to this debate? I fail to see any relevance whatsoever to the question asked by my colleague. Perhaps he could give us the name of the report he quoted from regarding heroin addicts involved in that. I am sure many of his constituents would be interested in knowing what relevance that has.

I think his constituents would also like to know his views on opening first class mail, as he was asked by the Member for Burnaby. I also am interested in knowing them. The Member often writes letters to the editor in my constituency which contain scurrilous information. I think his constituents and other Canadians have a right to know whether he has a view. Perhaps he does not have a view, but I think Members of the House and other Canadians have a right to know what his views are on the opening of first class mail by a security service or the law enforcement agencies in this country.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, if the Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) will lean over and ask the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) what I said, I think he will discover that I said it would take 17 witnesses in Burnaby or in Skeena to say that a letter is coming from Bangkok to the Hon. Member's riding which contains a quantity of heroin. Otherwise, he would not get the warrant, and no one would ever advocate giving a judge authority to issue a warrant other than in such circumstances.

I do not have with me the source of the study done in Baltimore. I think it was done by the University of Maryland. If my friend is seriously interested in the answer, I would be happy if he would pursue that with me afterwards and I will try to get the source of the study for him. If the Hon. Member is disputing the accuracy of the study, if he is disputing that heroin addicts cause a lot of the crime in his riding or in the riding of the Hon. Member for Burnaby, I would put it to both of them that that is one of the reasons we expect to win both of their seats in the upcoming election.

Mr. Fulton: I will be very brief, Mr. Speaker. We recognize that the Hon. Member has serious problems dealing with fact rather than fancy, but the question is very simple. Does he think that the legislation before the House, Bill C-9, should go forward with the security service given the right to open first class mail of Canadians? The question is very simple. I am sure constituents in Edmonton would like to know whether the Hon. Member can answer the question in the House of Commons. Otherwise, I would advise them to get him out of the House of Commons.

Mr. Kilgour: I give the same answer as the one I gave to the previous question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, does the Hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour) support a requirement that, prior to the placement of an informer in a group in Canada, a group which may be suspected of activities contrary to the national security, broadly speaking, there should be a requirement to obtain some form of judicial warrant?

Mr. Kilgour: I feel as if I were on the witness stand, Mr. Speaker. I know how the Government must feel. The answer to the question as worded by the Hon. Member for Burnaby is, yes.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join my other colleagues and other Hon. Members in the House in participating in the debate on Bill C-9.

Mr. Fulton: "Canine". It is named after a dog.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. de Jong: First, I would like to reflect briefly on the type and the rate of social change occurring in our society and in the world at large. All those who are interested in the social sciences see the tremendous change in attitude, culture, economic and political forums that have been occurring in the last number of years. There has been a very rapid change in social thinking and customs. We talk about technological change, economic change, social change, cultural change and political change. We see a tremendous amount of human displacement. People who are given training in certain trades are, all of a sudden finding those trades no longer valid today. What about people who have been brought up holding beliefs in a certain cultural milieu and setting who find that many of those cultural beliefs are no longer practised by society as a whole? The coming generation, the first of many generations to come, through the revolution in communications and in television, have a high level of expectation in life and a high level of material expectation. Yet on the other side of the coin we see the ability to satisfy those expectations being decreased. We see the possibilities of massive unemployment in the years ahead. People will not be able to find meaningful work or find a meaningful niche in life.

This is a recipe for social disorder and a situation in which many human beings not being able to fulfil their basic expectations are displaced and will react with anger and, at times, with violence. There have been various surveys conducted. I think of a Decima survey done approximately a year ago that shows the degree to which Canadians have lost faith in the traditional institutions. They have lost faith in Parliament, in law enforcement agencies, in government and in the churches. People have lost faith in the traditional social institutions that used to provide the social glue for society. Those were the institutions that kept us together and formulated and helped bring forth shared basic beliefs and value structures.

I mention all of these because I think they are important when we discuss security legislation such as the legislation before us today. We should have some appreciation of the larger context in which society is moving. I can see how some Members, and obviously some government members, react to this in terms of fear and panic. They feel we must have in place greater police powers to attempt to control and even suppress those social changes. My contention is that you cannot in the end suppress social change. We are living in a world of very fast social change, and no amount of secret police and police activities can really suppress social change.

What you can do, of course, in a short period of time is to hold back social change. But, like water building up behind a dam, all this will do is to create a power and a force that at some stage will break through and smash down those forces opposed to an actual historic change occurring.

Not only do we see rapid social change within our own borders but we also see it throughout the world, and we also see rising expectations by most of humanity. Most of humanity will no longer put up with ignorance, starvation and political suppression. People will no longer accept the feudal system in which a few suppress the many. On an international scale, we see rising expectations forcing us to change, which very often ends up in revolution. Those who are in control of power do not allow those changes to occur. They use armies and secret police to suppress those changes. But in the end the will of people cannot be stopped. Through revolution many of these changes will come about so that people will begin to realize the hopes and expectations they have.

The security legislation we have in front of us today, I feel, is an attempt by the Government to try to control social change. It opens up the possibility for the Government to use the secret police to attempt to suppress and stop social change.

The way to help accommodate social change, Mr. Speaker, is to anticipate it and to realize that there will be many people without jobs and the ability to earn income in a meaningful way. The solution to that problem is not more police power but, rather, to be a little more creative and to have some political will to put programs into place so that displaced people will be able to find a meaningful role for themselves in their lives. That is really the solution to social change which Canadians are experiencing.

What we have, Mr. Speaker, I feel is an attempt at suppression. Bill C-9 has three essential elements. It proposes a mandate; it spells out powers; and as well it acts as a type of control over the secret service agency which the Government wishes to establish.

Let me first deal with its general mandate. We have seen that even a Conservative attorney general, like the Attorney General for the Province of Ontario, finds that the definitions in the Bill are still quite dangerous and vague, as he says. He further stated that the definition of national security remained "flabby". Also he was concerned about the reference to foreign-influenced activities, because he is afraid it could be applied to foreign multinational corporations doing business in Canada. I understand and sympathize with the Attorney General of the Province of Ontario. Many people involved in civil liberties associations and Hon. Members of the House, both in the Conservative Party and in the New Democratic Party, have expressed fear about the broad definitions. I would not be surprised if many government Members had the same fear in their hearts.

• (1600)

Under the definitions in this Bill, various illegal strikes or activities by Canadians in support of the African National Congress or organizations that may wish to combat the Soviet invasion in Afghanistan or organizations that are involved in raising money for resistance groups in El Salvador, could be classified as illegal activities. All the people involved in the support of such organizations could find themselves being snooped upon to the full extent of the power included in the Bill.

For example, the Canadian Farm Survival Association could be considered as having engaged in illegal activities when it saw that high interest rates were forcing farmers into bankruptcy and conducted auctions in farmyards where tractors were sold for $1 or so. In the broad definition, that group could be considered as subversive because there is no doubt its economic activities had political overtones.

Mr. Kaplan: That is absolutely false, and you know it.

Mr. de Jong: That Association, could be considered subversive.

Mr. Kaplan: That is an insult to the RCMP.

Mr. de Jong: Illegal strikes or walkouts, in the broad definition, could be considered subversive activities because they bring into question the accepted established methods of political and economic solutions in the country. The definitions are so broad that anyone who acts in a direct way against the political and economic power structure in Canada could be defined as being subversive and be snooped upon.

The second area of major concern is the type of powers the Bill allows. Canadian citizens could have their conversations bugged, their mail opened and even have the confidentiality of their confessions with their priests invaded. Their homes could be broken into and searched and their confidential records could be invaded, even though there is not the slightest suggestion that any lawbreaking has occurred. The powers of the Bill are so broad that a fair-minded, average Canadian person must be frightened when he or she looks at what Bill C-9 makes legal.

As I mentioned before, the Bill is not designed to gather information when a law has been broken or a particular law anticipates to be broken and there is some criminal activity involved. It is really an intelligence gathering process. It does not have as its end result the laying of charges against anyone. It is just the gathering of intelligence.

Certainly the United States is more threatened by the acts of terrorists both within its borders and from outside. Its citizens have greater protection than we in Canada, especially if this piece of legislation goes through. In the United States, for example, the FBI has to persuade the judge that there are probable grounds to believe that the suspect or group is engaged in a specified illegal activity. In Bill C-9, our standard for a warrant would be lower. It would be "reasonable grounds", and no particular crime would have to be specified. In the United States also, the judge has to be convinced that an electronic interception will produce evidence of a crime. The Canadian Bill will not tie the interception to the gathering of evidence of criminal activity. In our system a warrant could be issued that would enable the CSIS to investigate a threat. The definition of what is a threat is so wide open that it could include just about any group. We see awesome powers being given to a civilian authority, with very vague definitions as to what are its mandate and its overall purpose.

A third area begs the question—after we have given this tremendous and awesome power to this group of individuals, what type of check or oversight exists? In terms of the judiciary, not very much. Yes, they have to obtain a judicial warrant before they proceed with an investigation, before they open files, tap telephones or break into homes at any hour of the day or night, but the judge really has nothing to go on because the definitions are so broad that he has no choice but to become a rubber stamp. No reasonable grounds have to be offered to show that a crime is being committed or that in some definite period something illegal is occurring or will occur; nothing like that. It is just the interest of some agent of the Government to have a little more information about what a person does, with whom he corresponds, what are his health records or what are his bank records. There is no judicial check, but rather a judicial rubber stamp.

Then we come to the review committee, and we must ask the question as to how effective it will be. Our claim is that there is not enough control over the CSIS. The review committee has no access to Cabinet documents. A recommendation which was made over and over again, even by Senator Pitfield, was that it should at least have access to Government documents. He recognized that there were many ways for the Cabinet and the security agency to get around the review agency, and that to set up a review committee without allowing it full access to the documents would be hampering it from the start. It really becomes a farce. It becomes window dressing and gives the illusion that the review committee is an actual place, when in fact it does not have the ability to look at all documents pertinent to its review of the intelligence service.

What we have here is another piece of double-think, another piece out of George Orwell's novel Nineteen Eighty-Four where the show and the pretense are one thing and the actual reality is indeed something else. The major shortcoming in the Bill in terms of its overview is that Parliament is just a eunuch as far as the security service is concerned. Members of Parliament will not have access in a meaningful way to the deliberations and activities of this organization. The Government can claim that Members of Parliament cannot be trusted like the review agency cannot be trusted; even though it is composed of either former members of Cabinet or members of the Privy Council, it cannot be trusted with all the documents, and Members of Parliament can be trusted even less. So much for the Government's trust in the democratic system. The very reason it is setting up this so-called agency is to protect our democratic system. But it has no belief in the democratic system itself.

One must ask the basic question of why the Government is going ahead with this legislation now. Does the present Criminal Code not give tremendous powers to the RCMP to investigate and prosecute criminal cases? If the Government has any reason to believe that there is a national crisis, that our democratic system is in danger, that we need a special security force to investigate Canadians, to tap their telephones and to break into their homes, it should at least have the decency to tell Parliament what the need is. Instead, we get silence from the Government benches. Not one Government Member today during the debate has stood up and given any explanation as to why we should have this Bill.

Perhaps it is a hypothetical explanation. Perhaps something can occur that would require us to have these powers. I suggest that the Government's thinking in all of this has been hypothetical. When the Minister asks for a judicial warrant, it is not based on a fact but based on a hypothetical case. By the same reasoning, the Government is introducing this legislation based on hypothetical cases rather than on a real need.

The Government can say that that is the McDonald Commission recommended. That argument is a farce. It is 1984 double-think. Yes, McDonald recommended a civilian security agency, but McDonald also recommended a security agency with proper and decent checks to it. The Government has chosen to ignore that totally. McDonald found a serious shortcoming in our existing situation. The Government used that as an excuse to legalize illegal activities.

What the Bill does in the end is to create a legal framework for this and future governments to maintain themselves in power through undemocratic means. The very instrument designed to protect our democracy, free speech, judicial system and way of life becomes the very instrument to destroy our democracy, free speech, judicial system, customs and way of life. This is a bad Bill. It stinks. The Government has to be stopped.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member has argued that threats to the national security of Canada are hypothetical and, therefore, we do not require these powers, except to destroy democracy. He is very far out of touch with reality. I cannot imagine many Canadians being fooled, even by his eloquent rhetoric, into believing that this is a Bill which the Government wants to use to destroy the country and to destroy our democracy.

I want to ask the Hon. Memver a question. He talks about hypothetical threats. He should know that there are real threats to our security. I want to put to him a problem and ask how he would handle it. If we received information, as we sometimes do in Government, which we believed, that KGB members or known terrorists have come to Canada, and we assessed the basis of that belief and came to agree with it, does he think we should have no authority at all to engage in surveillance of them because they are not necessarily committing a crime or that we do not have evidence of that crime? Is he suggesting that there should not be authority, that there are not sensible reasons why their mail, under proper safeguards, should not be investigated? He may not like the safeguards in the Bill. I want to raise with him the proposition that surely even he, as fanatically anti-government as he is, might recognize that there are some circumstances in which KGB members or members of other hostile intelligence services may come to this country, and that we would get credible evidence of it, or that international terrorist groups may come here bearing in mind that the Olympics will take place in North America this year, that His Holiness the Pope will be visiting our country this year, that Her Majesty will be here in August, in all of these circumstances—

Mr. Blackburn: We have the police.

Mr. Kaplan: The Hon. Member reminds me that we have the police. I am not asking whether we should go after them with police methods. I know he would agree with that. What I am asking is, if we know about them, is there not justification for having access to their mail and justification for being able to put them under surveillance without knowing whether they intend to engage in particular crimes?

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat amazed at the question that has been put to me. First of all, it seems to suggest that the present law enforcement agencies are totally inadequate to handle—

Mr. Kaplan: That is not what I said.

Mr. de Jong: I agree there could be very illegitimate threats against Canadian society, against His Holiness the Pope when visiting Canada and the Olympics being held in North America. These could conceivably be targets for foreign terrorists. I quite agree. Is the Minister telling us that at present the RCMP does not have the ability to monitor and take precautions against these foreign threats?

The second point I wish to make is that when the Minister introduced the legislation, I wish had followed the American example more closely and had treated Canadian citizens and landed immigrants somewhat differently from foreign agents. Under this Bill Canadian citizens can be spied upon, their phones tapped, their homes broken into under some pretty, vague definition in this Act, even though there may be no hard evidence that these Canadian citizens are connected with an attempt to assassinate the Pope or carry out some terrorist activity, but are suspect in a vague way, and their basic freedoms denied. I wish the Minister would explain the reason for lumping Canadian citizens in with foreign terrorists, KGB, CIA or other agents.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member has indeed exposed himself as someone who is unwilling to deal with a very real example. He was asked a question. He is testing the hypothesis. Let me assert again that there are real threats to our national security. We do occasionally get evidence, which we believe, of foreign hostile intelligence officers and members of terrorists groups who come into and through this country. He asks why the police cannot go after them with the normal warrant under the Criminal Code. Under the Criminal Code, as was pointed out, we need to have a reasonable belief of a specific crime or of a criminal plan. In the example I am putting to him, the only evidence we have is that they are here, that they happen to be in our country and that they are terrorists. I am asking for his help. I am asking him and Parliament to agree that in circumstances like that, with the kinds of safeguards I am willing to talk about in committee, develop, or change, in that type of environment there should be justification for getting a wiretap without evidence of a specific crime being planned by the particular terrorist group or hostile intelligence officers, that we should be able to open their mail under all the safeguards that this Parliament imposes. Those are simple questions. The Hon. Member avoided them the first time, and I know he will avoid them again.

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the Minister heard my response correctly. First, I admit, and no one in the House would be so foolish as to deny it, that there are potential threats that could occur against Canada from foreign terrorists and foreign intelligence agencies. Given what we have in the world today that is a "given".

The Minister has not answered my question. Why does he include Canadian citizens in the same bunch as foreign terrorists and foreign intelligence agencies? It is one thing to be aware of a foreign terrorist coming into Canada, to intercept his mail and keep tab on his telephone calls. It is quite another thing for a Canadian citizen, who has not broken any law, one who maybe collects money for rebels in El Salvador or Afghanistan, to be considered potentially subversive because that citizen is involved directly in some way in overthrowing a legally constituted government somewhere else. This Bill has lumped all those people together, and I am afraid the Minister has not as yet realized the point we are trying to make.

● (1620)

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, I guess in the course of this debate I can answer the question, if that will assist the Hon. Member to answer mine. He is asking, why should one consider that Canadians might be capable of acts of terrorism or acts of espionage and subversion? I think that just to put that question is to answer it. One likes to have faith in one's countrymen, but we know, our history tells us, that there are Canadians capable of subversive activities, acts of terrorism and espionage. That is the reason the Bill addresses that possibility, and I think he is very naive to deny it. I do not think his constituents or others following this debate will fail to have noticed that he is refusing to address a question which I am asking Parliament to address in dealing with this Bill. I am asking Parliament to recognize circumstances where mail opening and surveillance might be justified without proof or evidence of a crime. He refuses to address that, and that is typical of the NDP.

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, I will try to be brief, but the Minister's comments require long answers. I thought I had given some of those answers in my remarks.

Mr. Kaplan: Come on, yes or no.

Mr. de Jong: We want to make the distinction, as it is made in the United States and most other jurisdictions, between domestic terrorists and subversives and foreign terrorists and subversives. Part of our criticism of this legislation is that it does not make that distinction. The point we want to make is that the Criminal Code already gives the police ample powers to open the mail of domestic terrorists—

Mr. Kaplan: It does not.

Mr. de Jong: —and to listen to their telephone conversations.

Mr. Kaplan: It does not.

Mr. de Jong: This Government has over 800,000 files on Canadians, and it tells me it wants more. Surely, Mr. Speaker, enough is enough.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 45, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the Hon. Member for South West Nova (Miss Campbell)—Fisheries—Future of independent fish companies in Nova Scotia; the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson)—Royal Canadian Mounted Police—McDonald Commission findings of law-breaking—Decision not to take disciplinary action. (b) Request for withdrawal of security service legislation; the Hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm)—National Revenue—Department's seizure of taxpayers' assets. (b) Taxpayers' costs in appealing assessments.

CANADIAN SECURITY INTELLIGENCE SERVICE ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

The House resumed consideration of the Motion of Mr. Kaplan that Bill C-9, an Act to establish the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, to enact an Act respecting enforcement in relation to certain security and related offences and to amend certain acts in consequence thereof or in relation thereto, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have an opportunity to say a few words in connection with Bill C-9. I think the proper procedure is to debate this Bill openly and get as much representations as we can from the people of Canada. I think I would be very safe in saying that the people of Canada generally are concerned about having a good intelligence service, one of the best. They are also concerned about whether it is done through the RCMP or by a new body called the Canadian Security Intelligence Service. Some great nations have had separate services. The United States and England have separate services, and that seems to work out very satisfactorily. I think there are some advantages to having a separate intelligence service, as well as some advantages in having it remain with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. If the people of Canada generally, and this House of Commons in particular, decide to separate the service from the RCMP, I do not think it will be a blot on the RCMP, not at all. We all admire the RCMP; they have done a tremendous job in policing, and they still have a tremendous job to do. But if the decision is made to separate the service, then I think we have to institute safeguards concerning accountability, in order to make sure the intelligence service is checking on spies and fifth column activities, not on the people who have as great a desire as we do to build a great country but who have different ideas on how it should be done.

We have to be very careful in that respect, Mr. Speaker. Canada is a young country compared to the European and Asiatic countries. We are still in the developing stage in many respects. My friend, the Hon. Member for Lethbridge-Foothills (Mr. Thacker), was speaking this morning about political groups which arise from time to time. Some of them have disappeared, some have made a contribution and then disappeared, and some never got off the ground. But I do not think we should ever stop any group of people in Canada from using the means they think is best to build a great country. All the wisdom is not wrapped up in the Liberal Party, the Conservative Party, the Socialist Party or the Communist Party. People have different ideas and different views. Sometimes they bring a fresh look to problems which arise.

In the early days of Alberta, after the Liberal administration ruled the Province for about ten or 11 years, the people decided not to go to the Conservatives and not to go back to the Liberals, who had made a tremendous dent in the credit of the Province and had had many scandals with the railways, and so on. They went to a brand new Party headed by a lawyer, the late John E. Brownlee, and the Party was known as the United Farmers of Alberta. It was in power until 1935 and it did a lot of good things. It moved the telephone lines so that rural people could have telephones. That is still remembered as one of the big things done by the UFA. It also went to the Canadian Government and begged, pleaded and demanded ownership of our natural resources the same as other provinces. Finally, in 1930 the federal Government gave the province ownership of its natural resources so that we were on a par with the other provinces in Canada. That one item stands out conspicuously in the UFA administration. But what if there had been an intelligence service when that Party was first started and we had said to them, "No, we cannot have this, you are talking a new language"? They were talking a new language, Mr. Speaker. They were going to do things that the old line Parties were not prepared to do at that time. Had they been stopped it would have been a pretty serious thing because they were just as loyal as any of us.

Then there was the Social Credit Government which was formed. That Party was led by the late William Aberhart, a powerful man, and to hear him speak about the banks you would never think he had been a Conservative. He talked about the power of the banks. He saw that the people were hungry but that goods were available, so he thought, why not get the money to distribute the goods to the people so that they would no longer be hungry in the midst of plenty? He had a new theory, but had the intelligence service been in existence it would have thought he was going to turn the country upside down. It would have been a sad thing if his group had not held power, because for the next 35 or 36 years they gave good government and good leadership to Alberta. I think of people like Premier Manning and Premier Aberhart who were strong men, loyal to Canada and who wanted all the people to have a share in the great wealth of the country.

● (1630)

More recently there was the separatist movement in western Canada. Most if not all of those people were loyal Canadians but they had a different idea. They thought that with the heavy populations of Quebec and Ontario, it will never be possible for the Maritimes or the West to get a fair deal. I argued the other way. I say that the salvation of the country can rest in the reform of the Senate where we can have a check and balance on what goes on when an arrogant government is in power. Had we had a check and balance when the National Energy Program was introduced, it would never have gone through, and it would not have ruined the industry in western Canada. Had we had a check and balance when the Crow Bill went through, we would not have had the present tremendous weight on the grain producers of western Canada, giving them a load that they cannot carry with incomes going down and expenses going up.

If we had reform, it would be the salvation of the country. Every region must be treated fairly. However, I would not want the intelligence service to be dealing with a group because its idea of the way to run the country is different from the orthodox view. That is one of the dangers I see in any intelligence service.

We want the intelligence service to do a tremendous job in seeking out fifth columnists, those who are out to destroy the country, who would sell us to another power so that they could gain everything they wanted from the wealth of this great land. That is the fifth column I am dealing with, not Canadians who want to better the country and who have a different idea of how to do it.

Whether we have the RCMP or an intelligence service, Mr. Speaker, there has to be accountability. I do not think we can give free rein to any intelligence service to do what it likes and not be responsible to anyone. That simply would not work. With its quasi military setup, the RCMP has responsibility, right from the Commissioner down. Each detachment has a leader to take the responsibility if a constable, a corporal or an officer gets out of line. That is one of the reasons why people in the West strongly favour the intelligence service continuing to rest with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. They know that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is a disciplined group and is accountable. Those in charge at the Royal Canadian Mounted Police should be accountable to the Government of Canada. In turn, the Government of Canada should take responsibility when it gives orders to the RCMP to do things that perhaps it would rather not do. There is no doubt in my mind that orders were given to the RCMP with respect to the fracas in Quebec. Not for one minute could I believe that the RCMP would burn down barns, steal records or break down doors of their own volition. I have too much respect for them to think that. But they do obey orders. If they get an order to do something, they will do it. That is part of their discipline, part of their training, part of their life. It is the same with a soldier, an airman or a sailor in wartime. You cannot have democracy in wartime. You cannot have democracy in the army. You have to be able to take orders and let somebody make the decision. Sometimes the rank and file think the decision is all haywire. Many times in the air force I thought the commanding officer was haywire, but eventually it turned out he knew what he was doing.

I remember taking all the shots preparatory to going to the Far East with the air force. The whole squadron was anxious to go, but suddenly we got word to come back to Canada. I thought the Canadian Government had gone wacky, getting us all prepared then sending us back to Canada. Much as we were glad to come back to Canada, we had volunteered for the Far East. A few days later we found that the bomb had landed and we realized that the Canadian Government knew what it was doing in ordering the troops back to Canada, because the war was practically over.

There must be someone accountable, someone to make the decisions, and we have that in the RCMP. It is one of its strong points. The point I raised with my colleague this morning is the possibility of infiltration by fifth columnists. That is difficult in the RCMP. You do not start at the top in that service, you start at the bottom and work up. If someone has subversive trends, surely that would be found out in five, 10, 15 or 20 years. Such people would not last in the RCMP, and that is one of its strong points. The fifth columnist would have a difficult job to get into the RCMP and influence its intelligence service.

We found that fifth columnists were able to get into the intelligence service in Great Britain and in the United States. They were very clever about it. Perhaps it is possible in the RCMP, but I doubt it. Certainly it would be possible in a separate service, because that has proved to be the case in the U.S.A. and in Great Britain. It is one of the advantages of the RCMP and one of the disadvantages of a separate service.

On the other hand, a separate service could attract highly trained, intelligent people skilled in this particular field. The RCMP are trained as well. I spoke to an officer in Alberta whom I had known when he was just a boy. He had been with the security service and had left it to return to the work of the detachment because he felt so much consideration was being given to separating the security service that he wanted to be sure he remained an RCMP officer. It had been his life's ambition to be in the RCMP, but he left the security service, although he said that the training he had received in the intelligence service was standing him in good stead.

Many people think that the training in separate universities and in other fields is going to be advantageous in the separate service. Perhaps it will, but time will tell. If we go that route we had better be sure that we take special steps to see to it that fifth columnists, particularly from other countries, do not infiltrate our intelligence service.

What I want to emphasize is accountability. I believe the Government has to be responsible. Whoever the director is, he surely must be responsible to a Minister, and the Minister must be responsible to the House of Commons, and in turn the Members of the House of Commons must be responsible to the people. This is democracy. We should not sidestep democracy in any of our services, whether it be intelligence, revenue or whatever. Democracy will work if there is that line of responsibility from the Minister, who is appointed to the Cabinet and responsible to the House of Commons or to the legislature, and the Members of the House of Commons or the legislature who are responsible to the people. That is the strength of democracy. That should be the paramount objective in developing this service. Are we going to have accountability? We must have accountability and the Minister must take the responsibility. I do not agree at all with former Solicitors General when they say, "I do not take the responsibility for what the RCMP did". The Minister must take the responsibility. I certainly want to emphasize the matter of accountability. When this Bill goes to committee, let us make sure that, whatever route the majority takes with regard to the intelligence service, the director is responsible to the Minister and the Minister is responsible to the House of Commons which, in turn, is responsible to the people. If we go that route, whether it is the RCMP or a separate service, I feel we will have an excellent intelligence service in this country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Questions, comments? Debate.

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to rise today and speak on Bill C-9. I do not believe I have seen in the four years I have been here a Bill placed before the House which is more complicated and difficult to understand and one which raises so many questions and which affects so many people all across Canada. On my reading through the Bill, through the Senate committee report and through Bill C-157, a number of questions arose which I feel need to be asked. When this Bill goes to committee, I hope that my colleagues will address those questions in a very reasonable way.

We in Canada live in and support the system in which we have the kind of Government we have, with all its imperfections. We feel free to talk about Senate reform and about changing the rules in the House of Commons. Indeed, we prize, I believe above all else, the freedom which individuals have, not only to move freely within the country but to go home and close our doors at night, and, understanding our laws, feel free to discuss Government in any way we wish. One is free to form a Party which is opposed to the present Government, opposed to the way we are doing things. I have always had a sense of pride that we in Canada allow a Communist Party openly to exist in the country. We allow it to espouse all sorts of things about Canada which it has done freely during elections when people can even run on a Communist ticket. That does not happen in all other countries, but our system is such that we allow this freedom because we know the system we have will not be undermined when things are brought out into the open.

I would like to speak about some of the questions I have about this Bill which, hopefully, the committee will address when the Bill goes for a clause by clause study. I refer first to Bill C-157, Clause 14(2). It states, and I quote:

> The Service is not restricted from "remaining informed" about the political, economic and social environment within Canada.

The Senate recommendation is not followed in this instance, and it raises the question as to why it was not. The Senate committee report stated, and I quote:

> There is nothing to prevent the service from "remaining informed", indeed this is a necessity. To include this section is to "court mischief" as the words are unnecessary.

The Senate says that to include this section is to court mischief. We have seen this type of mischief when we have looked to our neighbour to the south. We have seen the things which happened at Watergate. We have seen the mischief which happened in political campaigns. We have seen mischief in other areas. The Senate committee report is clearly saying to the House of Commons, "If you include the words in there, it could court mischief". If the Senate committee believes that those words in the Bill are unnecessary, why are they still in the Bill?

In Clause 2, "threats to the security of Canada" are defined as:

> —espionage or sabotage against Canada or "any state allied or associated with Canada" or activities directed toward or in support of such espionage or sabotage.

The Senate committee recommendation, which was not followed, stated that the words "espionage" and "sabotage" are not defined in the Bill. What constitutes espionage? What constitutes sabotage? Do we leave this definition with the Minister of the day? Do we leave this definition to the security service itself? I suggest that the security service, by nature of its business, can see "sabotage" and "espionage" in a variety of areas and in a variety of ways, unless we have a clear definition of what those terms mean. One could water the term down to mean an activity on the stock market which could sabotage the economy. It could mean someone attempting to deal in securities or in Canadian currency in such a way that he moves the price up or down. I believe some lawyers could very easily interpret those words to mean that espionage is heavy speculation in Canadian currency. I believe these words must be clearly defined. We are leaving too much out that I as a layman do not understand and, I am sure, that many people within the law societies and members of the Bar do not understand either. The terms should be defined so that we all know exactly what they mean. Sabotage is already an offence under the Criminal Code and it is defined. My question is, what does the word espionage really mean? The dictionary definition is that it is spying and section 3 of the Official Secrets Act defines it very broadly. I think espionage should be defined in the Bill and I would ask my colleagues to address this problem when it goes to committee.

Clause 2(c) of the previous Bill C-157 referred to activities within or relating to Canada directed toward or in support of the threat or use of acts of violence against persons or property for the purpose of achieving a political objective within Canada or a foreign state. The provincial attorneys general voiced their concern about this definition being far too broad. I agree with them. I do not know all that the Senate was referring to. There were several witnesses who appeared before the Senate committee who urged that a change be considered and that the definition be set up in such a way as to deal only with the threat or use of acts of serious violence. We see people across Canada demonstrating against the Cruise missile testing, for example. In their protest marches they may break through a first line of defence which the Armed Forces have put up around an air base or even around the House of Commons. We see fences put up when people are demonstrating. It seems to me that it is not serious violence if they break through the barriers, and indeed even come into the outer lobby of the House of Commons to voice their opinion. I do not think that would be viewed by any Member in the House as serious violence. It seems to me that we are putting a provision in this Act which could view that action as being against the Act. I think it would be a serious restraint on the freedom of individuals to express themselves in the way in which they have become accustomed. I am not speaking about a saboteur or undercover agent using serious violence by setting into motion a situation where explosives are used to derail a train or something like that. To me that is serious. There are other activities that do not meet this criterion. I ask that my colleagues consider that very carefully in the legislation.

Section 18 deals with international affairs and defence. This allows the service, in relation to Canada's defence or its conduct of international affairs, to assist in Canada with the collection of information or intelligence respecting a foreign state or foreign person. I am not sure whether the service should be engaged in this type of work, as it is not linked to the security of Canada. I think the way it is presently laid out is too broad and should be narrowed down and linked to the security of Canada. The conduct of international affairs, not linked with the security of the nation, should not be included here. That area has to be studied.

Where are the parameters of this provision? Testimony before the Senate committee specified that this section will be used to gather economic, commercial and social data about other nations. I can understand the need for economic and commercial data and indeed for social data of other nations, particularly nations with which we have entered into foreign aid agreements. We in Canada would be miffed if we found out that the security services of other nations were gathering information in a secretive manner regarding our economy, commerce and society. In most cases in a free society this information is available anyway. I do not understand the necessity for connecting these two together.

Warrants can be issued to allow the service to use intrusive techniques under this section. How does a judge determine whether to issue a warrant? In my mind the security service is there to protect the security of our country, yet we are arming it with the authority to use techniques clearly subversive in another country to gather commercial, economic and other kinds of data which are not related to the security of our country. I can envisage people from the new security agency or senior RCMP officers in the security service posted to our embassies in other countries and being expelled holus bolus because we are arming them with the authority to do subversive work in another country. I am not sure that is what we want to do. Since warrants are issued to enable the service to perform its functions and duties, will a judge always issue a warrant in Canada if the relevant Minister requests the service to act under this provision? He may not. More work has to be done on that section, Mr. Speaker.

I would like to comment on the powers afforded in this Bill. Section 22 gives the service extraordinary powers by warrant. I always worry about extraordinary powers. If a judge is satisfied that the service requires a warrant to perform its duties and functions under the Act, he may issue a warrant which allows the service to intercept any communication or obtain any information, record, document or thing. That is very broad indeed and clearly can be abused. After a great deal of study, the Senate committee suggested that a balance was called for between the gravity of the threat to security and the intrusion into the privacy of those affected by the warrant.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS—PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

INTEREST ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING MORTGAGE PAY-OUTS

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton) moved that Bill C-212, an Act to amend the Interest Act, be read a second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, once again it is my pleasure to rise and debate this very small Bill which I have introduced. This Bill was debated in the House on March 2, 1983, but it is still very much apropos that it should be debated again at this time.

I hope to draw the attention of the House and Canadians to the plight of hundreds of thousands among us who are trapped into paying excessively high interest rates on their mortgages. I am referring to the dilemma facing Canadian families who are forced to pay 17 per cent, 18 per cent or 21 per cent interest on mortgages which today might be refinanced in the range of 12 per cent.

When I introduced this Bill last year I checked with CMHC and found that there were 700,000 Canadians who had mortgages at 17 per cent or higher. I do not know what the updated figures are as the statistics taken in the 1981 census have not been compiled as yet, according to Statistics Canada. Surely the figure would be approximately 150,000 fewer, but there are still approximately 500,000 Canadians who are faced with these high interest rates.

Bill C-212 suggests a means by which these home-owners might take advantage of today's lower interest rates. Quite simply, it would provide them with a means of paying off their present mortgage with a three-month penalty, thereby allowing them to apply for a new mortgage at a lower rate.

This bill is intended to try to bring the Interest Act of today up to date in harmony with the present practices. Let me briefly explain what the present practice is. Since as far back as 1907, the Interest Act has contained the same Section 10. It may even go back to when the first Interest Act was introduced in what was then Upper Canada of 1859, but it has been around for as long as Canada has existed. That section provides that if a person has a mortgage for a term longer than five years, at the end of five years it could be paid off with a three-month penalty. Of course, it has been the norm in this country for a number of decades to have 25 year mortgages. This means that in one fifth of the term of a 25 year mortgage, people could decide to pay their mortgage off by paying a three-month penalty. That seemed to be fair and worked in this country for at least 60 years, until 1967 and 1968 when the mortgage lending institutions, the trust companies and banks, unilaterally changed that equilibrium that had survived over decades and reduced it to a 10-year mortgage. That is when inflation began to get out of hand. It was approximately 4 per cent then.

I want to suggest that these institutions have gone further. When interest rates began to get way out of line for the first time in our history, from 1979 to 1983, they further reduced that term to a maximum mortgage of five years, then three years and finally one year. At one point, one could only get a six-month mortgage. In the last year some companies have lengthened the term again to five years. However, as Hudac's John Sandusky stated in an article in the Financial Times of December 5, 1983, "Having access to long term money remains a higher priority for the housebuilders". It is not only a priority for the house builders but it is that also for the house lenders and the people who are borrowing money to buy the houses. The lending institutions changed that 60-year equation of a 25 year mortgage in which it could be paid off after five years. They unilaterally changed it to suit themvelves.

I am suggesting now that we should put this back into a fair equation so that if five years was one fifth of a 25 year mortgage, then after one fifth of the term of any mortgage the mortgagor would be able to pay off the mortgage with a three-month penalty. That is the essence of this Bill. It does not matter whether this Bill is passed or whether Members would sooner discharge it and have the subject matter sent to committee; I want it explored.

I know what the lending institutions will say. They will say that they have borrowed money at 16 per cent and lent it out at 18 per cent and five year GICs and so on. I want to say that if the Government wants to listen to the big lending institutions, with all of their profits and big bucks, and not listen to the little guy, then let it go ahead. But the Government is just giving in to the big banks. I believe it should listen to the little person in this country.

In that respect let me make a few comments about the banks. On October 18, research showed that the spread in the bank rate, between the inflation rate and the bank rate, was the highest it was in 10 years except for once in December, 1980. With respect to the real interest rate, the spread between the chartered rate and the bank rate was the highest in any year and any month in the last 10 years except for the month of December, 1980.

Last fall, the chartered bank prime spread was running at approximately 5.5 per cent to 6 per cent. In 1972 it was running at .90 per cent. In December, 1973, it was .20 per cent. In December, 1976, it was 3.75 per cent. In January, 1983, it was 3.70 per cent. The banks are not hurting right now. But let them come to the committee and give us their tale of woe. I would like to ask them a few questions.

I have here a few examples, of which there are many. The trust companies keep pleading that they are hurting so much. In a Globe and Mail article on December 8, 1983, it states that for the previous year, Financial Trust Company earned 56 cents but for the last nine months up to December, 1983, it has earned 98 cents a share. Victoria and Grey had gone from $1.15 a share in 1982 to $1.79 a share in the same period of time. They are not necessarily hurting either. Let us not listen to their story of woe without giving them a chance to explain all the details.

In a periodic news release of March, 1983, from Gardiner and Watson, a reputable brokerage firm in Canada, they talk about the net interest margins: mortgages versus GICs. In that article they state that as a rule of thumb the spread between mortgages and GICs has been roughly 1.50 per cent so that against current rates, trust companies will improve their spreads by 25 to 125 basis points, depending on the term the new business assumed. They are saying that they are making more money. They had a bigger spread in 1983, when this was written, than they had in previous years. What they are saying is that they are making more money. They have a bigger spread now in 1983 when this was written than they have had in previous years.

I do not want to speak for a very long time but I want to point out a couple of things which should be pertinent to the Government. For example, on June 24, 1974 at 5.45 p.m. EDT, the time for release, we had the following main points: Prime Minister's statement on consumer affairs, which reads in part:

> The Liberals will make it a legal right to prepay residential mortgages during the first five years of the mortgage agreement, if the person wishes to do so, without excessive penalties. The law in general permits prepayment after five years—

That was a promise made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and embellished a little bit in one of the news reports. I do not have the exact words of what he said. I just have the text released from his office that he was going to reduce the right to prepay with a three-month penalty. That is what was promised by the Liberals in 1974. Why have the Liberals not lived up to the promise? I say to the Liberals, "Do not listen to the banks and the trust companies. Bring in a Bill. Let us have the subject examined at length, especially in light of the record high interest rates and the penalties that some of the financial institutions want of $6,000, $7,000, $8,000, $9,000 and $12,000. What is the matter? Bring it in and let us take a look from the consumers' point of view.

I want to bring up a matter which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) mentioned on March 28, 1983 in the House of Commons in reply to a question. In 1983 after this Bill had been introduced, the Minister said:

> Indeed, Madam Speaker, the point raised by the Hon. Member seems very worthwhile to me, and a three-month penalty would seem reasonable to me under the circumstances. In addition, I would suggest that, if there are other cases such as those mentioned by the Hon. Member, they should be brought to my attention, and I undertake to have them submitted to the institutions involved, either by the Inspector General of Banks or any other appropriate agency, so that they will be closely scrutinized, in an effort to prevent financial institutions from being unfair to some citizens.

The Minister of Finance was on the side of the Prime Minister. Then, of course, on October 11, 1983 the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mrs. Erola) spoke to reporters. The CP report read:

> The act already gives buyers that option—but only after a mortgage has been in force at least five years. Both NDP and Progressive Conservative MPs have been pressing the Liberals for months to make the law less restrictive. The Government's main response so far has been to use moral suasion on banks and trust companies.

It has failed. The CP story continued with, "but certainly we feel we must take some kind of action, Erola said Tuesday". Home buyers by the thousands took out or renewed mortgages when rates were 18 per cent or higher. "In fact, in many cases prepayment penalties as high as ten months have been brought to my attention, Erola said". I can bring them to her attention for three years. The Minister refused to say when the Government will decide for sure whether to bring in a Bill on behalf of home owners. This is a Bill on behalf of home owners, not on behalf of the banks and trust companies. However, the banks did say that any changes in the law would not be retroactive. That is fine. At least bring in changes to make things a little fairer and balance out that equation which for 60 years was there until it was upset by the lending institutions.

There were a number of other discussions, and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs talked very positively and said that the Bill would be out very soon. But it never happened. We are still waiting and we are hoping that it is not too late. It is very timely that this discussion is going on before the Budget which will be delivered on Wednesday afternoon. Perhpas there could be last minute changes yet. We hope so.

Mrs. Erola: You betcha.

Mr. Dick: I noticed the Minister said "you betcha". I am hopeful. There has to be something to help consumers to balance that equation. That has to be done.

I noticed that on October 13, 1983 even the Hon. Member for Oshawa, the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent), finally got in on the act about discussing interest rates on mortgages.

On investigation in the United States we find it is very normal for people to get away with a three-month penalty. In one large pool of funds which is quasi government controlled with $149 billion in the pot people in 29 States can get away with paying off at any time what is a 30-year mortgage to start with at one year, three years, five years, by paying a three-month penalty. In other States, there is no penalty at all. The thrust of paying off a mortgage with a three-month penalty is the same as that which people have in the United Kingdom. It people in the U.K. and people in the U.S. can do that, why can we not do it in Canada?

I have spoken about Victoria and Grey, the trust company. I hope no one will say, "The poor trust company is not doing that well." Now I read in the papers that the Victoria and Grey is going to start a bank of its own. I worry about the Royal Trust. It has had the Royal Trust Bank in Florida for a number of years, which it is trying to sell off. It is not sold as yet, I understand. But through that facility the Royal Trust has been able to lend money under the terms necessary in the U.S.

If it is good enough in the United States, and all Canadians believe that we should be doing what is done in the U.S., where a person can get out of a 30-year mortgage in 39 States with a three month penalty and with no penalty in the others, why not here?

This matter should go to committee at least. We should have an inquiry. I would be quite happy to have this Bill discharged and have the subject matter referred to a committee, if anyone wants to suggest it. I think we should have the courage to stand up for the consumers, the people, and not the financial institutions. I am not saying financial institutions do not have a right to come and explain their position. Maybe they will persuade me and the rest of us differently. But let them come and explain in an open committee, not just in the back rooms of the Minister of Finance's suite. I am sure the Parliamentary Secretary will have a chance to expound on this in a few moments. I say, let us give the people a break. There are at least 500,000 who are trapped. Let us follow what the Minister of Finance asked in 1981 when he asked for the financial institutions to bleed a little. They have all had increased profits. They have never bled. There were more foreclosures in 1983 than in 1982. There will probably be more in 1984 than in 1983. People lasted for a period of time, but with the length of the recession they have run out of all their reserves and they will still lose their homes. I hope the Government will allow the subject matter, if not the Bill, to go to committee.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I must say it is a pleasure to be able to say a few words regarding Bill C-212, introduced by the Hon. Member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick). I believe he is on the right track in suggesting that perhaps we ought to amend the Interest Act and get on with doing something for the people of Canada as opposed to the financial institutions. I do not want to suggest for a moment that we ought to go out and bad mouth the banks, the trust and loan companies, the credit unions or the caisses. The banks of Canada have existed in an atmosphere or environment of privilege for many years. When we look at the return on equity of the major banks of Canada, year after year we notice that it averages in excess of 16 per cent. I do not believe there is another sector of our economy or another business in the country which would say that over the last number of decades its return on equity has been in the 16 per cent range on average. In plain English this means that the banks are doing better than virtually any other sector of the economy. One could make a case for a couple of areas where there have been some improvements or perhaps challenges to the banks. I am referring to those areas in which the Government regulates the prices, such as utilities, pipelines and the like. However, by and large I do not think there is a single Canadian, if he or she were to be honest, who would not say that the Canadian banking establishment operates in a privileged environment.

This Bill is asking why we should not have in Canada the same situation which exists in other lands where people, through their governments, have indicated, particularly during these difficult times, that they want to pay off their mortgages—and I suspect this is something every Canadian family would like to do if it were able—and are not penalized for making this very prudent decision. At the moment countless examples have been brought to the attention of Members of Parliament of people interested in paying off their home mortgages but because of the incredible penalties assessed these individuals, they found that it was not in their interests to do it or that they could not do it.

I remember very distinctly a few months ago when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) rose in his place day after day and told the people of Canada that they need not fear these penalties. He felt that a three-month penalty clause was adequate. He wanted to know about anyone who was charging more. He wanted the evidence on his desk because he was going to take action and bring it to the attention of the appropriate financial institution or of the Inspector General of Banks. I suspect that gave a signal to Canadians that the Minister meant that in his position of responsibility and authority he would do something about anything over a three-month penalty. I suspect I personally received 200 or 300 letters from people in my constituency who were caught in that situation. They indicated that they had heard the Minister of Finance on national television or had read in the newspaper and that they took him at his word. They wrote, "Here is my mortgage, here is what I am prepared to do, and here is what the mortgage company said it was not prepared to accept". He asked them to bring it to his attention, so they did that, only to find that in every instance nothing was done. In other words, the Minsiter of Finance inadvertently mislead many people when he suggested that a three-month penalty clause was appropriate.

Essentially, Bill C-12 takes the Minister at his word. It says to the Minister of Finance and to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), "You have said this is appropriate, so let us refer it to the Finance Committee for some discussion".

Mr. Evans: We did.

Mr. Riis: Let us take it to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs and let us examine specifically why no changes have been made.

Mr. Evans: It was in the Finance Committee from 1976 to 1978.

Mr. Riis: The Hon. Member opposite, who used to chair the Finance Committee, says that this has been discussed. It might have been discussed years ago, but the problem is now. Now is when we are in the depths of a recession; in some parts of the country we are in the depths of a depression. Now is when people need some relief.

Just a few months ago the Prime Minister said that the banks should be bleeding along with everyone else. There is no blood on the steps of the banking institutions of this country. The mortgage holders of Canada want a fair deal such as they would receive if they were residents of other countries. The Minister of Finance has promised them that.

We ask the Government to give us the opportunity to discuss this issue in the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. We are not asking it to make any commitments today, but certainly it is a topic which touches the lives of thousands of Canadians. Also we ask for representatives of the financial institutions to appear before the committee and make their case and for various consumer groups to appear before it and make their case. Then we can let the committee decide. I have faith that Hon. Members on the Finance Committee will weight the evidence carefully and, based upon that evidence, will make a recommendation to the Minister of Finance or not, depending on the case which could be made.

We are not asking for the Government to take a definitive position today. We are not asking for a final answer or a final decision. We are simply asking for a reference or a referral to the obvious committee so that we can deal effectively with an amendment to the Income Tax Act. I suspect that the importance of this particular Bill would ensure that it received a quick hearing and that it will be dealt with expeditiously by Hon. Members. I do not see any reason that we ought to be hesitant in referring this, rather than talking about and letting another good suggestion die in Parliament before it is referred and receives adequate consideration and study.

[Translation]

Mr. David Berger (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, when preparing for the debate this afternoon, I fully intended to congratulate the Hon. Member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick) on raising this issue in the House. However, after listening to the Hon. Member, I am afraid I had to change my mind, because what he said was really not on target, and not once but several times.

First of all, he would have us believe that only he and his Party are concerned about the problems of home owners. That is just not true, and I may refer the Hon. Member to a passage in the last Throne Speech where the Government announced it would be proposing legislation to further strengthen confidence in the housing market by giving greater protection to home owners and by broadening the choice of mortgage instruments. These measures should increase the accessibility and security of home ownership, provide a greater measure of confidence and stability to the homebuilding industry, and enhance the flexibility of the mortgage market.

[English]

Second, the simplistic solution of the Hon. Member is clearly not the answer. He has not really put forward any changes or any new ideas since the last time his Bill was debated in the House in the previous session of this Parliament. Indeed, many know that the current three-month penalty on a five-year mortgage is said to have caused disappearance of the long-term mortgage, that is those over five years. He had nothing to say about that particular problem.

As the Hon. Member should know, financial institutions operate on the basis of the difference between lending rates and savings rates. By introducing uncertainty on the lending side, everyone knows that the same would be done on the savings side. This could have negative consequences for depositors—consumers, widows and pensioners.

[Translation]

Third, Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member grossly oversimplified an issue that is very complex. He referred to a statement made by the Prime Minister in 1974, namely, that the Government intended to propose amendments or legislation that would enable mortgage holders to prepay their mortgages. The Hon. Member has been sitting in the House for ten years, and I wonder where he really was all this time. Was he wide awake when the subject was being debated in the House and in the Committees of the House? If he was, he should be aware that a Bill was tabled at the time by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

[English]

Indeed the Borrowers' and Depositors' Protection Act, which was introduced on October 27, 1976, in response to the promise of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), would have allowed a borrower to prepay the full amount of a mortgage loan after three years upon paying a penalty of three months' interest. These proposals received much criticism, probably from the Hon. Member and his Party—

Mr. Dick: Probably or factually?

Mr. Berger: I was not here in 1976. The Hon. Member was, so I will let him answer the question. These proposals received much criticism on the grounds that they would result in all borrowers paying higher interest rates to compensate lenders for losses incurred due to prepayment when rates decline. This is the problem I referred to in my earlier comments. They would make matching of funds more difficult. They would have reduced the volume of mortgage funds available and would have reduced the variety of mortgage vehicles available to borrowers.

With the demise of this piece of legislation and the end of attempts to implement comprehensive consumer credit legislation at the federal level, the thrust turned to join federal-provincial co-operation for reform. It was hoped to achieve uniform and adequate credit regulations through a series of changes to existing federal and provincial statutes, including at the federal level the Interest Act and the Bank Act.

The federal-provincial task force on consumer credit, which was created in 1977, was instructed to develop suitable reform measures. After lengthy discussions, the task force was able, in 1980, to agree upon a mortgage prepayment formula which would have allowed prepayment in full at any time and would have limited prepayment penalties to three months' interest. However, this scheme, when put to federal and provincial Ministers of Consumer Affairs at the conference of October, 1980 was not unanimously accepted, and the task force was instructed to examine the matter of mortgage prepayment further. I wonder if the Hon. Member has ever taken the trouble to refer to the deliberations of this task force and to the difficulties that have been encountered in coming up with answers to this problem.

The task force was unable to agree on any scheme for regulating mortgage prepayment at subsequent meetings. However, the task force did agree that full disclosure of the terms and conditions of mortgage contracts, including prepayment rights or the lack thereof, should be made to borrowers before they entered agreements. I would like the Hon. Member to know that this proposal has been adopted in the new regulations on cost of borrowing disclosure under the Bank Act, which was put forward by this Government in the last session of Parliament. It contains prescribed forms providing for the disclosure of prepayment terms and conditions. I regret to say that comparable provincial legislation, applicable to all provincially-regulated lenders, has not been forthcoming.

I would be remiss if I did not mention the assistance provided by this Government under the Canada Mortgage Renewal Plan. As we all know, during the period of high interest rates the federal Government and some provincial governments provided assistance to many individuals faced with mortgage renewal. Some provinces subsidized renewed mortgages so that borrowers in difficulty paid effective rates of 12 per cent. The federal Government created the Canada Mortgage Renewal Plan, but we did not hear any reference to this in the Hon. Member's comments.

This is a complex question. It not only relates to the matter of prepayment of mortgages, but to the question of full disclosure of information at the time the loans are made. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mrs. Erola) conducted a study in the past year of these alleged misrepresentations relating to mortgage negotiations. As we all know, allegations were made about representations by mortgage lenders regarding prepayment penalties. When we had the high interest rates in 1982, certain persons alleged that they were induced to take out a five-year mortgage rather than one of a shorter term. They were allegedly told that they could renegotiate at a lower rate should interest rates decline, provided that a three-month penalty was paid. A study has been conducted by the Marketing Practices Branch of the Bureau of Competition Policy, and the Minister, who has had the benefit of this study, will be making proposals for legislative changes dealing with all aspects of this problem.

In conclusion I refer again to the commitment that was made by this Government in the Speech from the Throne. I assure the Hon. Member and all Canadians that the Government will be bringing forward comprehensive proposals within a short period of time.

Mr. Douglas Fisher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this is a serious matter that has been raised by the Hon. Member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick). Before beginning my remarks, I want to thank the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Berger). He has done his usual outstanding job in his presentation. I am happy to tell the House that he has done such a good job that there is an unusual precedent here. The people in my riding are starting a draft to nominate him in my riding so that he will come and run in Mississauga. He is such a great guy that they want him to run there. I understand he would be happy if I would run in his riding, but we will let him come to Mississauga first.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I invite the Parliamentary Secretary to be relevant to the Bill now under study.

Mr. Fisher: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I needed that reminder. If I had not had a little check from you, I would have gone on for hours on the fine qualities of the Hon. Member. I would not want to do that.

The Hon. Member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton offers a surprising sense of populism in his Bill. In fact, the Hon. Member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) must have felt tempted to invite the Hon. Member to join the NDP caucus. It was terrific rhetoric. I am glad there is at least one Progressive Conservative who is prepared to stand up in the House and defend the rights of ordinary people. Many others have been prepared to defend the rights of the boardroom and the fat cats, but this individual is obviously prepared to show some conscience. The Hon. Member has done well on that.

This is the second time he has raised this issue. In each case we have seen the strong sense of populism. I suspect, and I am sure other Hon. Members do, that this will lead to his getting kicked out of this Party. I do not know why they would listen to somebody who wants to represent the ordinary man. I warn him that the Tory Party has been throwing out some members and has been stabbing them in the back. That happened in my city with the Hon. Member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn). He was almost attacked on his nomination. I hope a good, populist, sensitive, conscientious Hon. Member like this one has his nomination all ready, because his Party will come after him for presenting an issue of this sensitivity, particularly one with such a common-sense basis.

• (1740)

In his Bill the Hon. Member has not addressed some important economic facts, which I just want to remind him of. I know the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Evans) will recount in a few minutes some of the history of the efforts made by the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs along this line, but I just want to take a look at the mortgage market as it is today because I think there are some really interesting things happening. In my opinion, the short-term mortgage market—and I am going to come back to this—is a really exciting thing for home owners today. We have one year mortgages down around 10 per cent, and that is pretty good for most home owners. In fact, when you contrast it, as the Hon. Member rightly has, with mortgage rates of a couple of years ago, this is a lot of relief from the 20 per cent level people were once experiencing.

Interest rates, Mr. Speaker, clearly reflect the state of the economy. Today's lower interest rates reflect the great health that we are starting to experience once again in our economy.

Interest rates are a symptom. They are not the actual cause of much of our economic disorder; they are a symptom of a deeper disorder. Today's low interest rates are a symptom of underlying health. That is what is important for us to recognize. We have an economy on the road to recovery, an economy that once again is feeling strength, and that is reflected in lower interest rates right across the board. All of us would like to see them lower, and as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) has said repeatedly in the House, that is his ambition as well. But we cannot get them lower at the moment because of American interest rates and the influence of that enormous economy south of the border. When their interest rates are as high as they are today, we too must keep ours a little bit higher than we would like. We cannot afford to go too much below the level of their rates or we would have an enormous run on our dollar and we would be once again inviting some weaknesses into our economy. We know, because we are practical people, that our economy cannot get so far out of line with the U.S. While American money markets and interest rates are high, ours must remain at a higher than desirable level as well.

Having said that, I say that 10 per cent is better than 20 per cent and it is good to see it back in the area of 10 per cent again. In fact, I think there are mortgages now which are as good as those offered in 1972. We have to go back all that way before we find some in the same range as they are today. I would like to check that but I know we have a kind of health in our economy that we have not seen in a long time. We have the promise of stability in our economy and those things have helped to lower interest rates.

I said at the beginning that I am a person who likes short-term interest rates. I believe that many people last year and two years ago were frightened by the economy and searched for some kind of personal security for their families. They felt that although 18 per cent was not good, it was better than 25 per cent, and they were worried that they were going to be facing 25 per cent mortgages. Consequently, they took five-year mortgages. They thought stability was preferable. They went the long course. They chose the option of predictable interest rates at 18 per cent. That certainly happened in my riding. I have street after street where people have taken out five-year mortgages at very high levels and they look around now at the 10 per cent range and they feel the pain. The Hon. Member's comments on that are very appropriate indeed.

When looking at current rates, Mr. Speaker, some people feel they have been cheated. But we must remember when people draw that comparison, that they signed the papers themselves. In my riding the people who signed those contracts knew what they were doing. They did it for a purpose, a reason. They sought stability. They were frightened by what they saw in the economy and did not want to get into a situation that would be even worse a year down the road. Therefore they gambled and went for five years. I think they knew what they were doing.

Mr. Dick: You think!

Mr. Fisher: People from Kamloops-Shuswap contacted their Member of Parliament. Well, people from Mississauga North contacted me and told me over and over again that they knew what they were doing when they got into those mortgages. They did not like it but they knew what they were doing and they did it for predictability and security. They took out five-year mortgages at 18 per cent because they thought it would be better than taking out a one-year mortgage at 18 per cent and then one year later looking at another mortgage for 25 per cent. They were frightened of that. They did not want that kind of situation. That is what clearly came across to me. People in my riding said they had a reason for doing what they did and they knew what they were doing. They know that they deliberately entered into a contract. They did not do this with the wool pulled over their eyes.

Now, the Hon. Member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling), who is another great populist—and I want to tell the NDP that it is getting threatening when there are two populists in the Tory Party—has raised this issue as well, but from a business perspective. He has asked whether there have been cases of fraud, cases of misleading consumers. He asked whether the companies deliberately set out to confuse the situation and mislead the home owner. He raised some specific cases, and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is investigating those cases. I think we should be clear that we are talking here about a limited number of cases, a small number, and the Hon. Member for Burlington said that in this very House. That does not excuse what happened. When one person suffers, that is too many, and we all agree with that. So it is worth investigating to see if there has been a case of a bank, a trust company or some other institution misleading a home owner. We have to make sure that has not happened. It is a serious charge, we have to investigate it, and I congratulate the Hon. Member for Burlington for raising that charge. However, we also have to know that the vast majority of people knew what they were doing. They entered into a contract deliberately for a specific reason. They knew what the cost would be per month and they were willing to pay it. At least in my riding the vast majority of people knew of some options that were shorter-term, and they were frightening and so they would not go into it. However, I think we all look forward to the report from the Minister on a very important investigation.

The charge has also been made that sometimes verbal promises were made which were not kept. Sometimes the mortgage holder was given new documents to sign or documents that purposely omitted the mortgage holder's rights. That is not good enough. I think we should clearly give a message to the financial institutions that such a thing is not good enough. The Hon. Member for Burlington said that to the trust companies when they appeared in front of the committee last fall, and I joined him in that discussion. The financial institutions said they were concerned about such a thing. We have heard this from The Toronto Sun; it has raised concerns. I might say that Garth Turner, in The Toronto Sun, likes to kick Liberals around a lot, but I always like reading his column because he gives good advice. I think his politics are wrong but his financial advice is very good. I think he has some interesting things to say about mortgages in particular. He raised the question of trust companies and their behaviour on mortgages. Gradually, as this debate progressed over a period of some months, it became clear to us that we were talking about a limited number of cases. We are not talking about hundreds of thousands of individuals, as the Hon. Member implies. I applaud his conscience but I must question his mathematics. He has the numbers right in terms of mortgages outstanding, but I do not think all those mortgages were fraudulently obtained. We would have to say again that most of those mortgages were given to people who understood exactly what they were getting and were happy to get it.

The Hon. Member for Burlington raised the question, however, and in committee the trust companies answered those concerns and expressed concerns of their own. We also heard from the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mrs. Erola).

As I said at the beginning, interest rates are not in themselves signs of problems in our economy but rather are symptoms of problems. Today they are a symptom of health, because they are coming down.

I should like to quote some of the interest rates that are in place today. As of January 30, a Canada savings bond would yield 9.5 per cent for one year and 7 per cent for six years after that. That is a long way from the 19 per cent we had to pay a couple of years ago in order to be competitive. The Bank of Canada rate was at 9.98 on January 30, the prime rate at the tanks was 11 per cent, one year variable mortgages were 10.25 per cent, and five-year fixed mortgages were 12.50 per cent. Those figures indicate health and strength in the economy and show that the banking system is not trying to clean everybody's clock or to skin the country.

Let us remember the good work done by the Finance Committee when it examined bank profits. If there are problems with the mortgage system, let us address the manageable parts of the problems and not throw out the baby with the bath water. Let us not destroy the whole financial system or mortgage system in order to get to smaller problems.

If we paid attention to the findings of the Finance Committee, we would see that many of the charges made about improper profits are not true at all. There was a minority report from the NDP, and I am sure the Hon. Member for Lanark would be happy to sign it but the other Tories did not sign it. They agreed with the majority and did not find that bank profits were unconscionably high. I think the Hon. Member should know that his Party does not think the banks are ripping off the Canadian people. I do not think the Canadian people want to see a cure for specific problems that would destroy the banks. I do not think the Canadian people want to see the Bank of Nova Scotia sent down the tube because a customer has a problem with his mortgage. That would be too much of a response to a specific problem. We must bear in mind that any cure we introduce for a problem has to be relatively balanced. We have a delicate system where the banks incur an obligation with a depositor and use the depositor's funds to loan out the mortgage money. Are we going to throw away those mortgages and all those—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Is the Hon. Member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick) rising on a point of order?

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Hon. Member would permit a short question.

Mr. Fisher: I will if there is any time left at the end of my comments, Mr. Speaker. The Hon. Member had his 20 minutes and I should like to have mine. I think some of the things he said need to be answered.

We might find that the kind of cure he is seeking could come from a slightly different direction. There is the Canada Mortgage Renewal Program, for example, which addresses the problems that people have in extreme circumstances. When their mortgage payments amount to more than 30 per cent of the gross family income, we help them out with a grant to bring it down to a manageable rate. We have not gone to the banking system and turned it topsy-turvy because of one problem. Instead, we have gone to the home owner who has the real problem and given him help directly. That is a more balanced approach. We have not made a sweeping proposal that would disrupt the normal system. We have given help to the individual home owner, and in my riding that plan has been well received because it has gone to the people who need the help. When the crisis has passed then our help is no longer needed.

I see that the Hon. Member for St. Boniface (Mr. Bockstael) wants to enter the debate, Mr. Speaker, and I know he agrees with what I say. We have offered special rate considerations of the same type in a variety of other circumstances. There is the Farm Credit Corporation and there is the Small Business Loan Program which addresses special circumstances and give grants to people when the system cannot accommodate them. That is more balanced than simply throwing everything out. We must follow that kind of approach in many circumstances and realize that we should aim our help where it is needed, and not throw out the whole system.

We do not need a general attack on banks at this point. Instead, we need to investigate and determine the extreme circumstances and find answers for them. The system is a good one for home owners and for the banks and it works well.

I remember the day when mortgage money ran out. Every year you had to get in line to prove you were eligible for money. We fixed that problem, and now the vast majority of Canadians can have secure mortgages in a secure financial system, without things thrown topsy-turvy. When we perceive a problem, as was done by the conscientious Hon. Member, then let us get a specific and directed cure.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member but his time has run out.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Hon. Member a very short question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That can only be done with the unanimous consent of the House. Is it agreed?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Dick: Is the Hon. Member aware that Bill C-212 was quite specific? It changed one word in an entire statute—it changed the word "five" to the word "one". It did not cover the whole waterfront, but just one word was changed.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, with your indulgence I would have to ask for some clarification on that. Does the Hon. Member mean to tell me that changing that one word is just a little tinkering? Does he not recognize that changing that one word is a massive change?

Mr. Dick: It certainly is not as broad as the Hon. Member tried to make out.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I reject that as an irresponsible statement. The Hon. Member would have to admit that it is an enormous change and not the small tinkering that he would have it. Otherwise, why do we hear so much concern expressed by the lender? Maybe the Hon. Member could tell us that.

Mr. Dick: You are the one who is expressing the concern.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Hon. Members are not in committee at this time.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, all I have time to deal with is the fact that it should be known that this motion was brought forward by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on statements in 1974. In 1976, the Government introduced legislation when I was part of the Public Service and worked on it with the Minister and provincial Governments to try to come up with a solution. The Tories blocked the legislation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before reading the adjournment motion, I should inform the House at this time that there has been agreement between the Hon. Members who have the first two items, to switch them around.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE—McDONALD COMMISSION FINDINGS OF LAWBREAKING—DECISION NOT TO TAKE DISCIPLINARY ACTION. (B) REQUEST FOR WITHDRAWAL OF SECURITY SERVICE LEGISLATION

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this point to follow up on a question I asked of the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) in this House on January 31. It concerns the findings of the McDonald Commission with respect to wrongdoing and illegalities on the part of some members of the RCMP security service. At that time I asked the Solicitor General what action he intended to recommend to the Commissioner of the RCMP in so far as disciplinary action is concerned in order to ensure that the rule of law is upheld in this country.

As background to the question I would like to note that the McDonald Commission, following an extensive series of hearings, found a common thread, if you will, running through the actions of the security service, particularly at the senior level. What was found, and I quote from their report; was:

> —a willingness on the part of members of the RCMP to deceive those outside the force who have some sort of constitutional authority or jurisdiction over them or their activities.

I should note, Mr. Speaker, that had responsible Ministers, that is, the Solicitors General of the day, been more vigilant and more diligent in pursuing their responsibilities for oversight of the activities of the security service, then certainly it would not have been able to operate in the policy vacuum in which it so obviously operated. I should note, as well, that in a number of cases it was clearly the situation that members of the security service were urged on, at best, wilfully blind to the legality of its operation, by a Cabinet and by Solicitors General who were anxious that they be a little more effective than perhaps they had proven to be during the October 1970 crisis.

It is important in looking at the question of the rule of law and discipline to examine the kinds of activities which were carried out by some members of the security service, the so-called "disruptive measures" and countering measures. For example, a number of measures involved criminal conduct; burning a barn, attempting to render a vehicle inoperative, filing false income tax returns, theft, threats by phone and kidnapping, as well as a number of other activities which, as the McDonald Commission indicated, while not perhaps unlawful, certainly were highly improper and unacceptable. For example, the issuing of false communiqués with the intention that the news media and the FLQ sympathizers would regard it as a legitimate call to arms, actually persuading an employer to fire a person suspected of belonging to a subversive group, spreading false information and attempting to disrupt meetings of radical labour organizations by conspicuous surveillance. As the McDonald Commission noted:

> These methods violated the rule of law, inflicted damage on Canadian citizens and involved secret attempts to manipulate political events and the news media.

One would have thought, Mr. Speaker, given a history of very serious wrongdoing and criminal illegalities such as that reported by the McDonald Commission, that the Commissioner of the RCMP would have taken at least some disciplinary action, and most importantly, the Solicitor General, ultimately responsible to Parliament for the activities of the RCMP, would have ensured that any disciplinary action which was taken was in fact reported to the public.

In August of last year the Minister of Justice (Mr. MacGuigan) stated that the Government did not in fact intend to take any disciplinary action. He said, "... I recognize it as a responsibility of the Commissioner to proceed in this area", although obviously the Minister cannot wash his hands of his own responsibility. The Minister of Justice said that the Commissioner had decided that it would not be appropriate to institute disciplinary proceedings in any of the instances referred to by the Commission while it remains possible that disciplinary action might result from the findings of Quebec courts.

Subsequent to that statement, it has been suggested by the Solicitor General that, yes, in fact there was disciplinary action but he is not going to tell us when that disciplinary action took place or against whom it took place, or the nature of the disciplinary action. We just have to trust him that somehow in fact this was the case. That is an astonishing statement, surely, for the Solicitor General to make. It is an astonishing statement that we in Parliament, and members of the public, are not entitled to know clearly what disciplinary action, if any, has been taken against those members of the security service who were found to have either broken the law or breached the high standards of ethics which they were obliged to uphold.

I would welcome a clarification from the Solicitor General at this point as to exactly which members of the security service have in fact been disciplined and, if he indicates there has been discipline, what the nature of that discipline was and when that discipline took place. Failing that, Mr. Speaker, surely the rule of law itself is being cast into very serious doubt in this country. How can it be suggested that when discipline does take place it is not in the interest of the Canadian public to know precisely what in fact has been meted out in that regard? This is equally important in terms of other members of the security service who must be put on notice that should similar conduct be repeated in the future we are prepared to take this kind of disciplinary action in these circumstances.

Anything other than a full accounting to the Canadian public in these circumstances amounts to a dereliction of the duty of the Solicitor General in terms of his reporting responsibilities to the people of this country, and also in terms of his responsibility to ultimately oversee the activities of the security service and ensure that it obeys the law and adheres to the high standards which any security service in a democratic societyy must adhere to.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) takes great delight in reminding and re-reminding the Canadian people of what is perhaps the most regrettable chapter in the history of the RCMP. It is certainly the most regrettable in the history of the security service of the RCMP. It is a chapter which the force, the security service and the Government are working very hard to close and put satisfactorily behind us.

He indicates that disciplinary action would be a proper way of showing respect for the rule of law. I would like to remind Hon. Members that the incidents to which the McDonald Commission referred which dealt with rule of law issues, that is with possible law breaking, were not matters to be looked at by the Commissioner in terms of discipline. They were matters which were to be referred outside of this Ministry and beyond the responsibility of the Commissioner, to federal and provincial attorneys general to make decisions to satisfy the Canadian people with respect to the honouring of the rule of law. I am not the proper Minister and this is not the only Government that should be addressing that question. That is a matter he should address to other Ministers and other Governments if he is not satisfied with the requirements of the rule of law on matters found by the McDonald Commission.

As far as the matter of discipline is concerned, I refer him to the RCMP statute which provides clearly that discipline is a matter within the responsibility and purview of the Commissioner. I informed the House that the Commissioner had addressed that, taken action and reported to me that discipline had been imposed in some cases. If the Commissioner had wanted publicity to be part of the penalty imposed that would have been part of his decision. Our tradition, which I intend to continue to respect, calls for those actions to be within the responsibility in all ways of the Commissioner.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): So much for accountability.

Mr. Kaplan: I would like to remind the Hon. Member that we have an opportunity to take a real step to do something to provide for greater accountability and responsibility. That is to take the security service as has been recommended now by two royal commissions and the Senate Committee and re-establish it within a proper system of safeguards and controls where there is independent outside scrutiny and review. I am not asking the Hon. Member to trust me, as he incorrectly quoted me as saying. I am asking him to work with me to help develop our national security on a proper basis in a legislated framework with proper control and review which we can be proud of, which the security service will be much better served by having, and which will better serve the national security of our country. We have had two days of debate now. I look forward soon, with his support, to seeing the matter referred to a parliamentary committee.

FISHERIES—FUTURE OF INDEPENDENT FISH COMPANIES IN NOVA SCOTIA

Miss Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I am sure you are well aware of my concerns about the fishery on the East Coast. I rise tonight to reinforce the reason for the question I asked the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans on February 7, and also to show my disappointment at his response. He said that he would take note of my representations. This sometimes means that that is exactly where it ends.

My question related to the fact that the Government had guaranteed to pay the Bank of Nova Scotia approximately $70 million over the next five to ten years, and that not all of the money allocated under Bill C-170 for the restructuring of the East Coast fisheries was spent. I estimate that to be approximately $45 million. In light of those facts, I asked the Minister to reconsider the small independents on the East Coast who are suffering.

I was not one of those who supported the restructuring Bill, because I have always believed that while restructuring is necessary, the banks should have put the companies on the East Coast that were in difficulty into bankruptcy, rather than the federal Government guaranteeing the bank its loans for the restructured company debts over the next number of years.

There has been no guarantee for the small independents at the federal level. In Nova Scotia, there has been no guarantee for the small independents. In Newfoundland, at least we saw the provincial Government bring in a $12 million loan guarantee to the small independents that might be suffering in order to adopt the restructuring plan. Large companies were also squeezing those independents.

Those small independents are the backbone of every small community, not only in South West Nova but throughout the maritime provinces. Those companies have not come looking for assistance, as the big companies have done, yet they have been hurting. The banks have been squeezing their financing in order to make it difficult for them.

I am asking that the $45 million that was not spent but allocated for restructuring on the East Coast now be directed toward loan guarantees to the many small independents across the province. The federal Government and both provinces have not only gone ahead to help refinance the off-shore sector, they have also guaranteed off-shore resources for the next five years for this off-shore operation. They have added to their quotas. They have given them red fish in the gulf and access to more northern cod. At the same time, in areas such as south western Nova Scotia where the industry has been able to sell the fish and keep inventories low, the banks have put the squeeze on because of other financial restraints in the off-shore sector. For instance, instead of increasing the allocation in cod, it has been decreased. This was done without even studying the cod stocks that were there. There was a limit set in 1981 and that limit has been maintained. The Minister has promised to do a study but has not done so. During all this time, we have seen this need in the off-shore fishery. I do not believe that they will not be back for more next year.

What I am specifically asking is that assistance be given to the small independents, the inshore fishery in the Maritime Provinces. The Minister has that money now, the $45 million. He does not have to wait for the new fiscal year on April 1 to act on the call for an additional $100 million guarantee. The Minister could be helping those companies immediately.

The fishing season is starting. Our plants are not working. Their finances are spread out. They are looking both to provincial Governments and the federal Government for some financial guarantees, similar to what was given in the offshore; perhaps not to the extent of the financial commitment the federal Government has made to the offshore sector. The federal Government and the Provinces have made those commitments, asking for guarantees of resources, paying off their debts, without asking them to slim down their operations. Those companies will have more fish to put into inventories next year than they had last year.

There has been no consideration given to the dependency throughout the East Coast on the small independent processors. Unless something is done many plants will not be able to reopen because they cannot get the financing from the lending institutions which they have dealt with in the past. Perhaps pressure has to be put on the banks. Perhaps the banks have not been asked by the Provinces or the federal Government what they are doing to the small independents. If the future on the East Coast is in the fishery, a natural resource, surely Governments at all levels, have to take into account the plight of the many small independents and the inshore fishermen in areas such as those I represent.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity today to expand in more detail than was possible by the Minister during Question Period last week in response to a question raised by the Hon. Member for South West Nova (Miss Campbell).

Let me say at the outset that the cause taken up by the Hon. Member for South West Nova, that is the plight, and the future stability of the small independent processors, is in my view most legitimate, and one which the Department of Fisheries and Oceans shares with her. We too are very concerned about the small independent processors on Canada's East Coast and across this country. We note and we congratulate those who have survived with no government assistance over the last two or three years. We found it necessary—not as a desirable act, not as something we want to do because there is a list of 100 things in which we would like to be involved, in order to maintain the social and economic base of eastern Canada—to step in and to restructure those large companies.

Having said that, I would like to reiterate at the outset that the primary purpose of the Atlantic Fisheries Restructuring Act, Bill C-170, to which the Hon. Member referred, has been to rejuvenate those major offshore companies which have been or are in the process of being restructured. I would remind the Hon. Member, and all Hon. Members, that there are programs within the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion which are available to all industries, including small fish processing industries, for such things as modernization, expansion and restructuring. All Members are aware that these programs have been used in the past by small independent processors.

Perhaps I would be wise to say that some $45 million remains in a fund and is available. All we have to do is spend it. I recall, Mr. Speaker, as I know you do, just last week seeing a delegation of 114 fishermen from western Canada, and know that as a result of that visit many questions were asked in this House of the Minister about the problems confronting fishermen on the West Coast. I think we have a responsibility as well to address those concerns.

I can say to this House and to all Members that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. De Bané) and his colleagues in cabinet are concerned about the problems confronting small independent processors. A number of possible solutions are currently being examined. I do not know whether having Governments take an equity share position, as was the case in the offshore, is the right solution for what is often a small independent family-owned operation. I can tell you that we recognize that these people have survived when larger companies have not. We recognize that they are still in operation because of their resilience and their entrepreneurial spirit. We recognize as well that that kind of success deserves the attention of the people of Canada and deserves the reward when the need is there. The people of Canada cannot—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

NATIONAL REVENUE—DEPARTMENT'S SEIZURE OF TAXPAYERS' ASSETS. (B) TAXPAYERS' COSTS IN APPEALING ASSESSMENTS

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, it has become increasingly obvious that individual Canadians are currently experiencing two systems of justice. First, there is justice for the ordinary citizen and, second, justice for the Government. In fact, what we are witnessing is the enactment of a discriminatory double standard in taxation and the means of collecting the money from prosecutions. This will come as no surprise to anyone who has had the misfortune of opposing government rules and regulations in the courts. The struggle against this monolithic state generally leads to a very lengthy legal battle accompanied by considerable costs. Justice in this case, it is very evident, is far more expensive for the private citizen relying on his or her own finances than it is for the Government whose case is fully supported by taxpayers' dollars.

For instance, an appeal launched against the Government can result in excessive costs with virtually no guarantee of success. A crucial decision must be made by a private citizen to appeal a case, whereas the Government with its vast sources of revenue automatically chooses this course of action. I am personally aware of an individual who to date has spent $5,000 on legal fees and estimates the cost of an appeal to be approximately $18,500.

On February 9, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Bussières) referring to myself stated:

> Should he have specific cases to bring to my attention, I can give him every assurance that we will look into the particular circumstances—

Well, there is the Ernest Herbst Food Company of Downsview, Ontario. It was found guilty of selling candy bars with a declared weight by ounces only. I was informed by Mr. Herbst that his legal fees thus far have amounted to approximately $5,000 and that he can expect to spend an additional $18,500 for an appeal. His choice, therefore, is to risk an expensive appeal or resign himself to paying the $4,000 fine.

It is appropriate to compare this example with the case of Mr. Jack Halpert and Mr. Ray Christiansen, two independent gasoline retailers who were found innocent by an Ontario Provincial Court judge. Following this decision, the federal Government had no hesitation whatsoever in launching an immediate appeal, using taxpayers' dollars. Not only did it launch the appeal, but it withheld compliance with the court decision to pay both Mr. Halpert and Mr. Christiansen $42,000 in costs. This means that these two small independent dealers are out their costs until the appeals are finalized.

I maintain that Ernest Herbst Food Company in Downsview should be afforded the same opportunity as the Government in its right to appeal. If the Government can use taxpayers' money in court while it appeals its own lost cases, why cannot a private individual who wins a case which the Government has brought to court be entitled to the same opportunity?

What is happening in the tax Department today is that a man is proven or found to be guilty by tax assessors without any day in court. What is happening in reality—and I think every Member of Parliament knows it—is that the taxman comes along and says that a person is being reassessed $200, $800 or even $1,000 more in tax. Individuals say that the new assessments are wrong. We hear people say that a wrong interpretation of the tax law is being made. The bureaucrats say that if the individual believes that then as a taxpayer he has the right of appeal. Then the taxpayer looks at the cost of appealing which could amount to $5,000 or even $50,000—and in the specific case to which I referred, it would be $18,500—and it is more than the amount of the reassessment.

It is a normal human reaction to say "I know I am right as a taxpayer. I would like to prove that I am right. I would like to prove that the taxman is wrong, but it will cost me so much money that I will be better off simply to accept the judgment of the civil servant, the servant of the people." The Minister responded to me on February 9, by saying there is an option open to that individual. That individual can appoint a third party who will guarantee the amounts of the moneys owed to the Government in tax and then we will go ahead and hear the appeal.

I say with all due respect to the Minister that it is one thing for him to say that that person who has been assessed has the right of appointing a third party. It is an entirely different thing to assume that that individual who has been assessed and taxed on business and then driven out of business because of his inability to pay is able to find such a third party to guarantee all the costs, all the fines and the ensuing costs that go with going into receivership, which is very often the case. Often the efforts of the tax people force independent businessmen right out of business today.

If the Minister was fair with the people of Canada he would recognize the need today for some form of financial assistance so that the Halperts and the Christiansen's of Toronto, who have won the cases brought against them by the Government, would be afforded those dollars awarded to them by the court rather than having to wait for perhaps three appeals. Halpert and Christiansen will now have to go to the Ontario County Court, then to the Ontario Court of Appeal and then to the Supreme Court of Canada. In the meantime, the Government is forcing people out of business by its unwillingness to see the other side, and through its heavy-handed approach in the matter of collecting debts to government, without the same opportunities of recourse being available to the independent businessman or the private individual.

Mr. Garnet M. Bloomfield (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the Hon. Member regarding question he asked on February 9, 1984 dealing with tax problems, one has to ask if it is a responsible act for a member to stand in this House and make charges filled with loaded words and phrases against the department and the Government in general without citing any proof and in disregard of the facts. Take for instance the words and phrases in his question when he originally raised it. First, he claimed that Revenue Canada considers a person guilty without trial; second, locks up businesses without trial and, third, that the Minister justifies the principle of guilty until proven innocent.

The Hon. Member then went on to talk about seizing the bank accounts of children, senior citizens and the handicapped. He knows, I am sure, that the seizure of a child's bank account was in fact as a result of a mistaken indentity by a bank, not by the Department of National Revenue.

Who are these seniors and handicapped whose accounts have been seized. Has the Hon. Member identified any cases of injustice and has he taken the trouble to inform the Minister about them? Any seizure of bank accounts or garnishee of salaries takes place after a number of other collection steps have failed and after the taxpayer has failed to avail himself or herself of the standing offer to negotiate suitable terms for payment.

The Hon. Member then referred, as I understand him, to some award of costs against the federal Government and in favour of some independent dealers. It would seem that this is not a tax matter. It is just another example of members having before them a few evasive facts of a case and then drawing conclusions which are often erroneous. I invite all Hon. Members, in situations where they deem that their constituents have been unfairly treated by the Department, to bring the matter to the Minister's attention with all the details—and I stress all the details—pertaining to the case.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 62—NON-CONFIDENCE MOTION—
JOB-CREATION POLICY

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap) moved:

That this House condemns the government for:

1. employing corporate tax handouts to produce business profits without any guarantees that such tax benefits would result in new investment or job creation;

2. increasing the tax burden on Canadians at the very time when more stimulus is needed in the economy; and

3. allocating job-creation funds in a partisan fashion not based upon local employment levels.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I think last Friday we witnessed in this House perhaps the most arrogant kind of gesture that we have seen in many, many years. First, the Hon. Member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) rose in his place and pointed out what is happening in Canada. We have people lining up at food banks because their funds at the end of the month have simply been exhausted. There are thousands and thousands of students unable to obtain access to the courses and classes they need. There are single mothers who are unable to afford to take their children to dentists. War vets are calling Members of Parliament, people who fought in battles such as Dieppe, who at the end of the month have to go to the Legions and beg to open up the poppy funds in order to put food on their tables.

The Hon. Member for Vancouver-Kingsway told us that these things are happening while at the same time in a suburb of Quebec City the Liberal Government had just allocated the sum of $300,000 to a judo club. If this is not indicative of a Government that has virtually gone mad, a Government of snakes and a Government that has become so arrogant, so uncaring and so lacking compassion for Canadians, then I do not know what is.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on many occasions has stood in his place and has said that the Canadian economy is performing relatively well. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) stands up almost daily and suggests yes, there are signs all over the country that the recovery is strong. There are people like Michael Walker, that infamous economist working for the Conservative think-tank in Vancouver, the Fraser Institute, who said the other day that, despite an unemployment rate of about 11 per cent, the Canadian economy is going full tilt. Full tilt in what direction, or who is going full tilt? Perhaps he is going full tilt.

Are single parents raising children going full tilt ahead these days? Are the hundreds of thousands of pensioners still living below the poverty level progressing full tilt with this recovery? Are the 1.5 million jobless Canadians progressing full tilt? Are the one million people who are participating in part-time jobs in an effort to put food on the table for their families participating in this recovery? Are the hundreds of thousands of small-businessmen who are struggling through mounds of red tape to survive these days part of the recovery? What about the fishermen who were here last week from the West Coast and are literally struggling to survive in that particular industry? What about the one out of every five young people in the country who find themselves jobless today and about to be entering into a period of competition with hundreds of thousands of other young people leaving high schools, colleges, technical schools, vocational schools and universities, about to be entering the job market for the first time in full-time and part-time work?

Some people talk about a recovery. Some people talk about the economy moving ahead full tilt. But let us face it, when they use these terms they are talking about a recovery in corporate profits only. In 1983 after-tax profits for corporations in Canada were up 69.4 per cent. That is the recovery about which they are talking; let there be no mistake about it.

In the last Budget the Government said that the answer to our economic problems was to give grants and tax concessions to corporations so that they could take that money and reinvest it in the Canadian economy, that economic development would begin to occur and jobs would be developed in those corporate structures. That was the theory, that was the myth. That was the explanation the Government gave the people of Canada for the massive hand-outs to corporations in the last federal Budget. It is simply a continuation of a policy we have seen for many years. What I have heard from Progressive Conservatives in terms of their answer to stimulating the economy is that additional tax concessions should be provided to the corporate sector. If that is not the case, I hope those Hon. Members will rise in their seats later and clarify that particular point. That is what I understood the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mulroney) to be saying.

What we anticipated was about to happen did not happen. Indeed the corporations took the corporate hand-outs or accepted tax concessions, and we cannot blame them for that.

However, did they invest in new plant and equipment? No, they did not. As a matter of fact, when we look at investments in the country, in 1982 they were down 12 per cent from 1981. In 1983 they were off another few percentage points, and all the projections I have seen indicate that investment in Canada will be down in 1984 and in 1985.

In other words, the investment, and therefore economic expansion and job creation, did not occur, so only half the equation was fulfilled—the tax concessions went out. They went out as part of the Reaganomics application here in Canada, or what is more commonly called the trickle-down theory. That theory is to help those at the top of the pyramid and large corporations, to give tax concessions to the wealthy of Canada, and eventually the benefits will trickle down to the average Canadian citizen. We are seeing absolutely no evidence of that happening in this country.

Corporations love these Government tax concessions and grants. In fact, they demand them. The other day the Canadian Manufacturers' Association called upon the Minister of Finance to add another billion dollars in tax concessions in his upcoming Budget. The last Budget gave $2.7 billion in new corporate tax breaks over the next four years to the corporate sector on top of the $8 billion already given to the major oil companies in PIP grants between the years 1982 and 1986.

In the last year we have seen about $10 billion in corporate tax breaks given to a very select set of corporations. There is the myth that these are available and are used by all corporations. If you look closely at the corporations receiving the tax breaks, you are talking about a very elite section of the corporate community which actually makes use of and obtains these tax breaks, using one or more of the 200 loopholes provided in the tax system.

There is even a great deal to say, particularly from members of the Government, about the corporate tax rate in this country being 50 per cent. That is a laugh. We have seen countless reports and all sorts of evidence indicating that the average corporation paid 23 per cent on their taxes in 1980. When you start looking at what corporations are doing with the tax system, you can list dozens and dozens of corporations in this country that last year made significant profits and paid no income tax to the federal Government, not a single nickel. I will list a handful of them. The Hudson's Bay Company made profits in the millions of dollars, but did not pay a single cent in income tax. Steinberg Incorporated had $34 million in profits and paid not a single penny in income tax. Simpsons-Sears had $27 million in profits and did not pay a single cent in income tax. Total Petroleum, $12 million in profits, not a single cent in income tax. Domtar Incorporated paid not a single cent in income tax.

One could go on and on listing all the major corporations in this country that were very profitable last year, extremely profitable, but did not pay one single red cent in federal income tax as a result of the over 200 loopholes provided by the federal Government for its corporate friends.

The corporate highrollers of them all are the banks. Look at what the banks have been able to do with our Liberal and Conservative Governments over the years. They have fine-tuned that corporate loophole section into a fine art. In 1982 the banks made hundreds of millions of dollars in profits. In some cases their after-tax profits were as high as 130 per cent. What was their average rate which they paid across this sector? The average rate was 8.1 per cent income tax.

Mr. Nickerson: Too much.

Mr. Riis: The Conservatives yell "too much"; 8.1 per cent is too much for the banks. They perhaps betray their true feelings by some of these side comments. We have an 8.1 per cent average tax rate for the major fives in 1982, a time when the average Canadian with an income of $18,000 was paying in the 20 per cent range, let alone the two major players that did not pay a single penny in income tax.

I offer a challenge to Hon. Members on the Government benches to stand in their places and suggest a single economist who is credible who would suggest that corporate tax concessions is the way to stimulate the economy during these recessionary times. Members of Parliament have had provided to them over the past few weeks countless studies and reports by well-known and reputable economists who suggest that tax concessions to corporations add little if any stimulus to the economy, both long and short-term. In fact, there were four major Canadian studies done in the early 1970s, all of which showed the amount of increased investment generated by incentives was actually less than the amount of money lost in Government revenue. A study done recently at Memorial University found that for every 21 cents of investment generated by tax breaks for manufacturers, the Canadian treasury lost a dollar of revenue. We are losing money, Mr. Speaker.

I would like to ask Government Members opposite what they have done with the tax expenditure account which was introduced in 1979. The tax expenditure account clearly showed the amount of money the corporations and certain Canadians in the upper income brackets received in tax concessions. This was intended to give us some idea of how we measure the benefits to Canadians. The Liberals have abandoned that particular tax expenditure account now. There is no way of accounting for what the corporations are doing. It is time we totally revamp our corporate structure to tie the grants and tax concessions given to corporations to such things as research and development, skill training, purchasing Canadian equipment and services, job creation and the like. Let us expect something from the corporations if we are going to be giving them taxpayers' money.

When we look at what is happening to the average taxpayer in the country as a result of corporate tax concessions, we have almost had it. This year the average Canadian has had his taxes increased significantly. The average Canadian is paying more taxes in 1983-84. In 1984-85 personal income taxes will go up by $1.9 billion. Over the next four years we are expecting the taxes of the average Canadian to increase by nearly $9 billion. That means $9 billion is being taken out of the pockets of average Canadians at a time when disposable incomes for the manufacturing sector have never been more in need. We have manufacturing plants operating at 20 to 30 per cent below capacity. They need Canadians to be purchasing homes, appliances and vehicles.

Disposable income in the country is decreasing, and one of the reasons it is decreasing is that the Government is taking more money out of the hands of average Canadians. Personal income tax is going up. Federal sales tax is going up. We still have that special charge on gasoline that should not be in place today. Over $9 billion will be taken out of the pockets of average working Canadians over the next four years as a result of the Government trying to find ways to grab more money to offset the money being given to the corporate tax sector.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I think the most disgraceful performance we have seen in the House for many months was the recognition that the Government had set out a special initiatives fund, presumably an opportunity for all Members of Parliament to take to the bureaucracy suggestions for job creation in their own constituencies. They were looking for projects that were needed, such as bridges to be built, railroad crossings to be established and community infrastructures to be developed. The Government forgot one important aspect. It told only Liberal Members of Parliament about this particular fund. By the time Parliament even recognized that such a fund was in place, $138 million out of $150 million had already been spent in Liberal constituencies only. The fact that the Province of Quebec has received about 50 per cent of this money, although it only has 30 per cent of the country's unemployed, indicates very clearly the bias in favour of Liberal ridings. Members of Parliament were told last November that there was a fund and that we would be receiving guidelines on how to access this particular money for job creation. It was not until weeks and weeks later that Members of Parliament found out the terms of reference. By that time $138 million out of the $150 million had already been allocated to the Liberal caucus members.

That is the kind of hypocrisy, the arrogant, cynical behaviour, that Canadians have come to accept as the norm for the Liberal Government of Canada. We cannot expect anything more than this sleazy, snake-in-the-grass kind of approach to economic development in this country. The Canadian people do not expect anything more. They know that in their dying days as their nails scrape down the walls of the House of Commons, as they slip out of this place, members of the Government are prepared to do anything.

It is an embarrassment to have a government in place that is prepared to be so uncaring about the recovery program. It knew full well when it introduced its monetary policy of high interest rates and high unemployment what the social cost would be. That was done consciously and it was clearly outlined where it had been applied in other countries. It knew the social costs, the human suffering and the pain that Canadians were going to experience. It was prepared to gamble.

What we see is a government that is prepared to salvage its electoral fortunes in the country, through the Special Initiatives Program, on the backs of the unemployed of the country, on the backs of the poor of the country, on the backs of the single parents of the country, on the backs of the war veterans in the country—one could go on and on. It is an uncaring government that is prepared to do anything to regain its electoral successes in selected ridings in the country.

We in the New Democratic Party want to make two points, Mr. Speaker. First, that the recovery program in place today is a recovery program that is unfair, that is biased, that discriminates against Canadians who can least afford it these days.

Second, the last indication we have seen in the House of how concerned the Liberal Government is with a fair recovery program was the Special Initiatives Program designed specifically and only for Liberal members.

Nearly half the people in this country, half the unemployed in this country, half the poor in the country, half of the young people, did not have an opportunity to take advantage of this job-creation initiative. That is an example of a government that has become arrogant in its approach, a government that has become uncaring in its approach. If that is the kind of government we have in place, then I suspect, when we see the Budget in a few hours from now, it will be a Budget, as the Minister of Finance indicated, of the status quo—more of the same. That means more unfairness, more suffering, and in turn that means years and years without prosperity for an increasing number of Canadians. It is a recovery of profits only, not a recovery for people.

We in the New Democratic Party hope and pray that the Minister of Finance will recognize that he has erred in his judgment, that the monetary position that he and the Governor of the Bank of Canada have continued with is not working. With a sense of fairness, fair play and compassion, we hope and pray that the Government of Canada and the Minister of Finance will introduce a Budget that will put people in Canada first as opposed to profits first.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member who spoke for the New Democratic Party will recall a nine-month period when there were a lot of commonsense principles in public policy. There was an acknowledgment that poor people were important and that most of the jobs in the country were available in the private sector. In fact, that nine-month period produced a net gain of close to 300,000 jobs in the economy. We have had a four-year period in which we have lost over half a million jobs because of a difference in philosophy.

Does the Hon. Member and his Party believe that it is critically important that employers be left with sufficient money to modernize, to conduct research and development, to develop new products? Are these not the really critical ingredients in preparing jobs for the future, or is the NDP suggesting that the more money that comes into government hands, the better it would do as managers in conducting that research and producing those products? Is the Hon. Member really arguing that people in the private sector should lose their jobs so more jobs can be created in the public sector? Is that the basic thrust of his argument?

• (1130)

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I respond to the question raised by the Hon. Member. Before I respond, however, I would like to remind the Hon. Member that when the Progressive Conservative Party formed the Government for that short period back in 1979, it seems to me that it took all of the job-creation programs across the country and scrapped every single one. In my constituency, I remember, there were very progressive ideas. It was felt we needed certain infrastructure development in our community. The people went to their Member of Parliament, who at that time happened to be of the Conservative Party, saying: "We know the Government has these programs in place; we desperately need some funds". The answer was: "Go home; we have scrapped the development of the safety net". That is the kind of caring, compassion and concern which the Conservatives had when they were in power for that brief time. They simply cut out all of the job-creation programs.

To answer the nonsensical question raised by the Hon. Member, if he had listened to my speech carefully—and even if he did not, I made the point very clearly on a number of occasions—he would know that we do not want these across-the-board, broad-axe concessions to corporations because they have not resulted in the development of new product lines, new plants and investment in new equipment. They have resulted in mergers and takeovers which, in turn, resulted in a net decline of jobs and a net decline in investment in the kind of things he mentioned.

What I suggested, and what we have proposed, is that if we give tax concessions to corporations—and there is a place for it, make no mistake about that—if we are going to give them taxpayers' money as grants, tax concessions, loopholes, or whatever, we should expect something in return, such as investment in new product lines, research and development, new marketing techniques, new production techniques, job creation and job training. They should not get the money unless they do that. That is the expectation we have.

If these companies are going to perform as good corporate citizens and add to the Canadian economy directly or indirectly, tax concessions can make a great deal of sense. But to give away billions and billions of taxpayers' dollars and see in return a skyrocketing increase of mergers in this country's industry, I ask any Hon. Member how this benefits the Canadian economy or Canadians directly or indirectly. It is just taxpayers' dollars being spent on investment in mergers or in overseas investments.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the Hon. Member's speech and I do not feel any of us in this House could disagree with the passion and concern of the Hon. Member for individual Canadians. We have concern for those who are in greatest need in our society and agree that we must do something about it. Where I disagree violently with the Hon. Member and his Party is in the prescription they have for changes, for rectifying the situation.

The Hon. Member said that corporations were not paying their fair share of taxes. Two weeks ago in this House, the Hon. Member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) spoke and I asked him a very straightforward and simple question: Was he aware that over the period of the 1970s, after inflation, in real terms, personal disposable income doubled, wages and salaries doubled?

An Hon. Member: What about 1980 to 1984?

Mr. Evans: Corporate profits during that period had gone down by 5 per cent in real terms.

Mr. Broadbent: Talk about the last four years.

Mr. Evans: A doubling versus a decline of 5 per cent. That has to say something to the Hon. Member about the incentive to reinvest—which is what he wants—in more research and development, more investment, more job creation. However, if the facts are that over that period of time corporate profits have declined, it says something about the incentive to reinvest. Do you not really think that instead of standing up and railing at corporations, saying they are not doing their share, we should look below the surface and ask what are the fundamental problems? We are not going to get to a solution of those problems by condemnation, by railing in the House of Commons, or by looking at superficialities. We must look at the fundamental problem of why jobs are not being created in the private sector. That is the question. What does it have to do with profitability of business in the private sector and how can we resolve that problem?

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, there are many questions raised by the Hon. Member and I will respond to them as best I can. First of all, I want to challenge a point made by the Hon. Member when he raised the question two weeks ago in the House. I distinctly recall him doing so. I asked our parliamentary research department to analyse his statement. I must say it was found to be incorrect. When one looks at corporate profits from 1960 to 1980—

Mr. Evans: 1970 to 1973. You changed the time period and changed the whole thing.

Mr. Riis: Using 1982, profits came down, but the Hon. Member is using statistics in a very limited way. In response to the Hon. Member's question as to what can be done, I would like to quote from The Globe and Mail of two weeks ago wherein the chief executive officer of the Bank of Montreal was quoted as saying that the corporate sector in Canada is awash in tax concessions. They cannot deal with them. They do not know what to do with them. The problem in this country, Mr. Speaker, is that this country lacks an industrial strategy. This country has no concept of where it is going in terms of corporate or public growth and development.

Mr. Pepin: Name one country which has one.

Mr. Riis: The question was asked which country has one.

Mr. Pepin: They are changing all the time.

Mr. Riis: Japan has a very clear idea of what it is doing with the major sectors of its economy. Canada has not. One of the reasons it has not is that this Government has not taken upon itself to develop industrial sectoral strategies. How can the corporate sector evolve in any realistic way? Does it know where to invest? How does it invest and in what does it invest? In what direction are we going? The result is we have one part of the corporate sector going one way and another going another way. This is because the federal Government has failed to develop the economic leadership it should. It failed to take the responsibility of developing, in co-operation with the provincial governments, the private sector and labour, sectoral strategies for our economy. That is the fundamental reason, Mr. Speaker, why we do not have the appropriate investment in our economic infrastructure, why we do not have the appropriate investment in job creation and why we cannot have the appropriate investment in education and post-secondary training of one kind or another. We do not know where we are going, Mr. Speaker. Therefore, how can we prepare ourselves for that mission?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): This puts an end to the question period. Debate.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member opposite, not surprisingly, began his speech, as he frequently does, with a doom and gloom picture of the Canadian economy today. He offered us a bleak outlook for the economy which, certainly in his view, leaves no hope at all.

That, of course, is at complete variance with the record, the evidence and any statistics which the Hon. Member may want to cite. Every statistic would indicate quite an opposite direction in our economy. In fact, we are experiencing a major recovery of our economy. The stage is now set for growth at a rate which we have not experienced in this country and, indeed, in the industrialized world generally, for some time.

The Hon. Member opposite cited some graphic examples of hardship. Those are, of course, of concern to us all. But equally, he should recognize that our Gross National Product has increased substantially. Real economic growth was running at a 7 per cent to 8 per cent rate through much of 1983, bringing with it an increase in housing starts, retail sales and industrial production. All those factors improved substantially in the course of the past year.

In addition we have seen a major growth in trade, reaching record levels of exports over imports. Restraint of inflation, one of the key factors to economic recovery, was achieved beyond any forecast of a year or more ago. In May, 1982 inflation was at 11.9 per cent; today it is 4.5 per cent. We have seen interest rates fall substantially, another major factor in setting the stage for our future economic growth and an essential element of the economic recovery we experienced during the past 12 to 14 months.

The picture, then, Mr. Speaker, is one of great promise, indeed of great realization. There is a consensus in this House that unemployment is a continuing and deep seated problem for Canada. We have created many more jobs in the economy during the past 12 months than had been foreseen, but equally, large numbers of new workers joined the labour force. The rate of unemployment, while down significantly from 1982 and 1983, is still at levels that none of us welcomes. We want to see a faster rate of decline in the rate of unemployment and I want to touch upon that again as one of the real reasons behind the tax incentive initiatives this Government has undertaken in recent years. The recovery is there, it is happening; it is good news and not the gloomy news that the representative of the New Democratic Party always deals in.

The motion before us, Mr. Speaker, addresses several areas of Government fiscal policy. I want to deal first with the question of tax incentives. The Hon. Member opposite appears to favour the more pejorative words "tax hand-outs" and "tax loopholes", as if there were something wrong or, even on a theological plane, something evil about tax incentives. They are, of course, present in personal income tax, but in the case of corporate taxes they are there for very real purposes and bring very real benefits to the Canadian economy, hence to the Canadian people.

Given the limited time available this morning, I want to touch on three areas: research and development; capital investment; and small business. I take it that the Hon. Member of the NDP is opposed to tax incentives for research and development. I find that a surprising admission on his part when he must recognize that, as never before in our economy, we need the application of high technology and the ability to develop new research and technology which can bring further prosperity.

The reason we put in place tax incentives for research and development in Canada more generous than in most industrialized countries is that we have an economy with a large degree of foreign investment. Typically a foreign-owned multinational corporation centres its research and development at its corporate headquarters or at the point of international excellence in that particular field. For us in Canada to develop a greater research and development capacity, especially among Canadian-controlled businesses and smaller businesses, we put in place a series of tax incentives which are proving to be of great benefit to the development of Canadian technology. I am surprised that the NDP sets itself against such a policy, but I am afraid it is typical of the attitude of that Party in recent years, a subject which I will return to in a few moments.

Regarding capital investment, surely the Hon. Member recognizes that the accumulation of capital is an essential element to further growth in our economy. The incentives in the April, 1983 Budget, for example the tax carryforwards and the tax carrybacks or the other forms of tax credit, are intended to channel and encourage investment during the medium term. The Hon. Member says he does not see the immediate impact. Indeed, no one suggests that he would. I will return for a moment to that point as well.

Regarding small business, evidently the Hon. Member opposite does not regard small business as the principal generator of jobs in our economy. It is not only the principal generator of jobs in our economy, it is also the sector of our economy with the highest degree of Canadian control and it often generates in a most innovative way the high technology we need here in Canada. Yet the tax incentives, for example, a lower tax rate for small business, is evidently anathema to the Hon. Member. He rejects the idea there should be a tax incentive for investment for small business here in Canada.

On any of those three grounds, Mr. Speaker, whether research and development, capital investment or tax incentives for small business, I think the Hon. Member fails utterly to make his case against what he in a pejorative way calls tax hand-outs. There is underneath his statement, however, a rather more fundamental issue which he has never been able to quite reconcile in his own mind: the role of profits in our society. After all, corporate profits, along with personal savings, are a crucial source of funding for investment in our economy. The accumulation of capital through profits plays an essential role in the further expansion and growth of our economy. Yet the Hon. Member speaks of profits as if they were something that top-hatted capitalists put in their pockets and somehow the benefits are never seen throughout the economy but merely relate to the individual entrepreneur or businessman whom the Member seems to suspect of all sorts of nefarious dealings.

The point is that our economy cannot function without the accumulation of capital, and the principal way of accumulating capital is through corporate profits. On the one hand, the Hon. Member apparently wants lower personal income tax rates, while at the same time, with the removal of what he regards as bad tax incentives, he would raise the corporate tax rate. He cannot have it both ways.

If we want more investment in our economy, if we want more growth in our economy, if we want to create jobs in our economy, which I am sure all Members in the House believe, then it must follow that corporations must have the opportunity to reinvest their profits and, indeed, in some instances, be offered incentives to reinvest those profits.

If I might digress for one moment, once again the Hon. Member opposite, as is his wont, attacked bank profits. That is one of his favourite chestnuts and I must say that I get a little weary of it. The Member should understand that, according to the Bank Act and under the regulations of the Inspector General of Banks, the system of reporting bank profits is substantially different from that of reporting any other form of business profits in Canada. The Member should know that the accounting practices followed by banks in Canada are different from those of other businesses, the most critical difference being the accounting treatment which applies to a bank's loan losses. Those losses in the case of banks are spread over a much longer period and are required to be spread over a much longer period than in any other form of business. Therefore, of course, it appears in certain circumstances that bank profits are at a substantially higher rate than in other forms of business, which is simply a matter of different accounting practices and not a matter of banks somehow making exorbitant profits on the backs of the poor worker.

Mr. Orlikow: Tell us why they do not pay taxes.

Mr. Riis: No taxes. Absolutely none. They made $300 million in profits.

Mr. MacLaren: Our friends opposite ask about the companies that do not pay taxes.

Mr. Orlikow: The banks.

Mr. MacLaren: I dealt with that the other day. The fact is that there are large numbers of companies that make a loss in one year or another, as individuals may suffer a loss of income in one year or another. In our tax system, in the name of equity, there is an evening out of losses and profits over certain specified periods.

As I suggested earlier, there are incentives for companies and for investment in the form of tax carried forward and tax carried back. Thus, there are also incentives in the form of various tax credits. The conjunction of a tax carried loss and a tax credit can mean that in any given year a bank or a business may not pay a profit.

Is the Member opposite suggesting that in any given year a corporation or an individual should pay exactly what he or she earned or lost in that year and the tax rate should be applied without any reference to an earlier year or a future year? If he suggests that, the rate of bankruptcy among corporations and hardship for individuals would increase substantially. I would be surprised if that is what he has in mind.

I think the essential problem with the Hon. Member's motion and indeed with is speech is one that faces his Party as a whole. I do not know whether Professor Laxer is still a member of the New Democratic Party but he certainly has been for a number of years. He summed up very well the difficulty that faces the Member opposite when he attempts to deal with the question of tax incentives and corporate profits.

Professor Laxer, in his interesting report on the present state of the NDP, said that the NDP wants to leave the bulk of productive enterprise in the private sector. Favouring tax incentives to business, even with very precise performance guarantees included, reminds New Democrats too much of give-aways to business. Professor Laxer continued to say that in practice the NDP does not believe that there are problems on the productive side of the economy but believes that the chief problem is the absence of sufficient consumer demand. He believes that the NDP rejects the idea that there should be tax incentives, yet does not know what else to put in its place. It has no policies. It has no suggestions to make. Professor Laxer says that the chief problem is to work out ways to direct the savings of Canadians into the sectors of the economy that have the most promise for growth. Yet the NDP has no idea of or no proposals for how that might best be done. They speak only about redistribution of income and do not offer one constructive suggestion about how we should encourage investment in Canada.

Professor Laxer, himself an NDP member presumably, said that if Canadian-owned manufacturing companies were offered a choice between a high corporate tax if profits are not usefully reinvested and a lower one if useful investments are made—that is to say, tax incentives, or tax loopholes, or tax hand-outs, as the Hon. Member opposite says—they will make the second choice.

Professor Laxer proceeded to give his advice to the NDP and I would join him in offering this advice—

Mr. Sargeant: Liberal advice.

Mr. MacLaren: —to that Party which seems to be in such a state of mental sterility these days. Professor Laxer urges that companies should be given corporate tax points off, that is to say, tax incentives, if they purschase Canadian machinery, carry out research and development, deploy new and more productive techniques, train workers for skilled jobs and encourage advancement for women.

Mr. Kristiansen: The word is "if".

Mr. MacLaren: Those are all things our present system of tax incentives provide in this country.

Mr. Kristiansen: They are awash with tax give-aways.

Mr. MacLaren: For the Hon. Member opposite to say that tax incentives are somehow a dreadful and evil practice overlooks this whole issue. It is typical of the state of his Party today. As Professor Laxer says, it stands on the sidelines as far as this great debate about the future is concerned. He said it is time for the Party to face the future and enter the debate.

Since the Hon. Member has a contribution to make, I would urge him to address the real questions in our economy. Instead of being preoccupied, as he always seems to be, with the question of distribution rather than production, let him tell us if he has some answers for what he thinks should be done about the adaptation of the resource industry in Canada, our forest industry and our mineral industry, to new technologies, to new markets and to new competition.

Mr. Riis: You take the money and put it into Liberal ridings.

Mr. MacLaren: Why does his Party not address the central question in our economy and in our society, which is the adaptation of our work force to high technology?

Mr. Fulton: You are in government. You do not have a policy.

Mr. MacLaren: Why does the Member opposite not speak about training? Does he have anything to say about training of people in our economy?

Mr. Fulton: Let us hear your policies.

Mr. MacLaren: Most of all, we are doing all those things—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order. May I suggest to Members on my far left that they will have the opportunity for questions or comments in a few minutes. They might try to maintain some order while the Minister is speaking.

Mr. MacLaren: We, in the Government, on this side of the House, are doing something else. We are recognizing the fact that the future growth in the Canadian economy depends directly on our international competitiveness. Our ability to produce goods and services more efficiently is a real answer to our future prosperity. For that reason we have put in place methods to consult and co-operate with business, labour and government in novel and exciting ways which we think are the real answers to the questions that the Member attempted to raise this morning but utterly failed to address.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister about precisely the point on which he attempted to criticize our Party. We have never said that unemployment can be greatly alleviated simply by increasing consumption. What we said about tax incentives and how corporations are taxed is that blunderbuss give-aways do not actually improve productivity.

People of Canada are told every day by government and industry that we must improve productivity to get jobs. Let me give the Minister some specific examples of what happens. Bell Canada recently spent hundreds of millions of dollars to take control of TransCanada PipeLines. Edper in recent years has taken over Brascan, Noranda, some trust companies and some insurance companies. That was done because of the capital it was able to accumulate as a result of the kind of tax policies and loopholes we have.

I would like the Minister to tell us how any of these takeovers have produced one new job or caused an improvement in productivity. It was great for the people who control these companies. It increased the financial worth of the companies. But how did these takeovers improve the economy? How did these takeovers improve productivity and how did these takeovers create one new job?

Mr. MacLaren: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member seems to have a bias against large corporations. He is welcome to that bias. That is his own concern. We on this side of the House, however, see benefit both in large corporations and in small business to the total society. Some of the mergers and acquisitions that took place over past years may, on analysis, seem to the critics to be of limited benefit publicly. Others may seem to be equally of very real benefit. Synergism can come from mergers, corporate rationalization and new sources of capital can be accumulated for further investment. The ability to compete abroad with large corporations from other countries can be enhanced through merger and acquisition policies. The question was addressed extensively some years ago in the Bryce Royal Commission on mergers and acquisitions in the Canadian economy.

I see the Hon. Member opposite decrying all such mergers and acquisitions as if they were to be somehow prevented and deplored. I do not share that view. As I have said, they can bring very real benefit to our society as a whole if we have some large corporations capable of competing internally and marshalling the resources necessary to exploit our various talents and natural resources.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I have a brief question. The motion implies that the New Democratic Party would like employment creation funds distributed on the basis of local employment levels. We have heard the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Roberts) on numerous occasions tell us that Canada Works funds are distributed to constituencies on the basis of an objective formula, one based on employment rates and unemployment rates in different ridings.

I have a difficulty, and I would like some comment from the Minister on it. I have certain knowledge that once every 10 years in a census we collect data. It tells us how many people are employed and how many people are unemployed in every riding and community in the country. However, in between those 10-year periods, nobody, no agency of government,—including Stats Canada, and Employment and Immigration—collects unemployment data or employment data on the basis of local communities or on the basis of ridings. The dilemma is how can we distribute funds on the basis of an objective formula when we do not have data anywhere in Canadian society which would enable us to do that, except once every 10 years? How can the Government think it is doing an objective job when the data base is simply not available?

Mr. MacLaren: Mr. Speaker, I believe one of my colleagues will be speaking to the broad question which the Hon. Member raised a moment ago. On the specific question of compilation of data, it had been my understanding that the Unemployment Insurance Commission as well as Statistics Canada does compile interim statistics between decennial censes. If I can assist the Hon. Member in that regard, I would be pleased to provide him with some information. I will seek it and obtain it for him.

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, it will probably come as a bit of a surprise to our friends in the New Democratic Party if I tell them at the outset that, although we have some slight difficulty with the wording of the motion put by the NDP and although we feel it requires a little fine tuning, we intend to support it.

In an effort to provide that fine tuning and in an effort to make the motion more precise, to eliminate some of the obfuscation, ambiguity and uncertainty of the motion, we intend, and I do so now before the clock overtakes me, to move an amendment. I hope this amendment will lend itself to the NDP because I think it strengthens and substantially improves the motion as well as addresses some of the concerns raised during the course of the debate.

I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes):

That the motion be amended by deleting the period after the words "levels" and adding the following thereafter: "instead of focusing on job creation programs open to all eligible Canadians, such as career access and refundable employment tax credits".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): If the Hon. Member will continue debate, the Chair will consider the amendment and reserve a decision on it.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to make sure, given the limited amount of time we have in these debates, that I would not be overtaken by the clock before I had an opportunity to move my amendment. I am sure you will find it in order.

It is rather interesting that the very substance of my amendment was addressed in an intervention by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Evans), who in a previous incarnation suffered under the terrible strain of being Parliamentary Secretary to the former Minister of Finance. Although we did not always agree with the Member, we had great admiration for the way he went across the country trying to defend the indefensible.

He put forward this question in his intervention. Why are jobs not being created in the private sector? That is precisely the nature of the amendment that we have put forward. We believe that, through the mechanism of a refundable employment tax credit, we can focus on the specific problems within the work force.

For example, a refundable employment tax credit has the ability of being able to focus on youth unemployment, which is a serious problem. We have over 500,000 young people unemployed in Canada today. That rate of unemployment among young people is static. It has remained so for the past 15 or 16 months, representing as it does some 20 per cent of the work force. A refundable tax credit would have the advantage of being able to focus on youth unemployment in a direct way and provide permanent—and I underline the word permament—meaningful, jobs within the private sector.

There is one area on which I agree with the Minister. It is this. He said in reply to a member of the New Democratic Party that small business is the biggest generator of jobs in our economy. We in the Conservative Party support that thesis and are prepared to back it up. That is why we have put forward this policy.

It is important to understand why it is necessary to bring in a refundable employment tax credit. I was rather surprised to hear the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. MacLaren) talk about economic recovery. I suppose we will hear more about that in the Budget tomorrow when we hear the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) talk about economic recovery. But the Minister of State for Finance seemed to get carried away. In the euphoria he has created around this area of economic recovery, he talked about an improvement in the unemployment situation.

There has not been an improvement. If you take the average unemployment rate for 1982, the depth of the recession, it was 11.1 per cent in that calendar year. In 1983 that rate rose to 11.9 per cent. These are Statistics Canada figures which were released in January of this year. We see for the last quarter of 1983 the unemployment rate remaining static at 11.1 per cent and actually rising in January, 1984 to 11.2 per cent. All this was happening at a time when unemployment in the United States, year over year, month over month, was actually declining. In 1983 over 1982, unemployment in the United States actually fell by 2 percentage points. In every month of the last quarter when unemployment in Canada was locked in at 11.1 per cent, unemployment in the U.S. kept coming down one or two points to the stage where it is now at 8 per cent, and it will probably break the 8 per cent rate in the figures to be released next month.

I am afraid, indeed we are afraid, that the Minister of Finance will rise tomorrow and talk about economic recovery. He will talk about how the economy is growing. He will boast about how successful his policies have been in bringing down the rate of inflation. In the process he will forget the fact that the seasonally adjusted 11.2 per cent of the work force unemployed at the present time represents 1,400,000 Canadians without jobs. Included in that figure are two groups of particular concern, the two groups that have been hardest hit by the recession and indeed are being hardest hit by the structural change which is taking place in the economy as a result of the technological revolution brought on by the microchip. These are young people wo seem to be permanently unemployed, because the figure has stabilized at around 18 per cent to 20 per cent over the last 15 months. We are told by the OECD that that will continue in the next two years. The other group is the older, middle-aged worker who faces the problem of having to undergo retraining in order to cope with technological change and at the same time has to face the prospect of moving elsewhere in the country, if indeed there is any hope of finding a job.

These are the two groups that are being left behind. It is morally irresponsible to talk about economic recovery when we have these unemployed people in Canada, when we have a lost generation of over a half a million young people without jobs for the past two years, and when we have this middle-aged group of males, heads of families, who are the hardest hit and represent some of the most chronic, long-term unemployed without job prospects. This is why we believe there should be a refundable tax credit in the Budget tomorrow. It is not a new idea. It has been tried before, and it has been tried successfully.

I would like to refer to the 1982 publication of the Economic Council of Canada entitled: "In Short Supply—Jobs and Skills in the 1980s". In terms of the employment tax credit, its recommendation 11 reads:

> We recommend that the federal Government institute a short-run direct employment creation program in the private sector, based on the employment tax credit system and targeted at those groups who bear a disproportionate burden of unemployment.

Then it went on to back that up by referring to our brief experience in the past with the refundable tax credit. At page 107 we see:

> As for the scale of the program, we note simply that in its last year the ETCP provided roughly 50,000 jobs at a cost of about $100 million.

We are talking about permanent jobs. We are talking about revenue-creating jobs, because these people will be returning money to the exchequer in the form of taxes.

Let us compare that with the Government's NEED Program for the same year. The NEED Program is rather interesting because it was designed to help probably the most pathetic of the unemployed, the so-called exhaustee or the person whose unemployment insurance benefits have expired. It was built around providing a short-term job just long enough in duration to enable the person so employed to qualify for unemployment insurance. The NEED Program created 40,000 jobs from 1982 to 1984 at a cost of $500 million. Here we have the refundable employment tax credit scheme producing 50,000 jobs at a cost of $100 million. That is taken from a report of the Canada Employment and Insurance Commission of June, 1983.

If we take a look at the total direct job-creation programs of the federal Government for fiscal year 1982-83, we see 215,000 jobs created at a cost of $609 million. The point which has to be emphasized is that these are short-term jobs with a duration of anywhere from 12 weeks to 16 weeks. What we want are permanent jobs. Our people who are unemployed want permanent jobs. That is the substance of our amendment.

It is interesting that the Economic Council of Canada came back to it again in its 1983 report, the Twentieth Annual Review entitled "On the Mend". It talked about recovery and about the problem of unemployment as well as the danger of the unemployed being left behind. Essentially it repeated what it said in its recommendation. Page 104 reads:

> Such a program would not be new; it has already been tried in many forms, both in Canada and elsewhere. The principal target population of the program would be those who bear a disproportionate share of the unemployment burden, particularly the long-term unemployed.

Again it recommended to the Government that it bring in a refundable job-creation tax credit. We are in fact committed to the proposition—and we agree with the Minister of State for Finance—that the private sector and that part of the private sector known as the small business sector have the greatest potential to produce jobs, not only to produce jobs but to produce permanent jobs.

Another area of the NDP motion deals with what I believe to be one of the most scandalous, sleazy, reprehensible, partisan abuses which the country has seen in this Parliament for a long time. I am talking about the slush fund or the porkbarrel which has been the subject of questions in the House for the last week or so. Let us take a look at the genesis of that program. It first emerged in the June 28, 1982 Budget of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen). At that time it was known as the Immediate Employment Stimulation Grants Program.

On November 16, 1982 the Hon. Member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie), as reported on page 20694 of Hansard, asked for details of the program. The Minister of Employment and Immigration at that time replied by indicating that it "is not a program" so much as "an allocation of funds that were set aside in the June Budget" and "allocated to a number of different Departments to fund projects which were on the shelf or which could be funded directly through them". He went on to suggest Order Paper questions, and I am not sure whether questions were placed on the Order Paper—I see my colleague nodding his head. But the questions were never answered.

On November 30, 1982 and again on January 21, 1983 the Hon. Member for Rosedale raised further questions. Then we had the April Budget of the present Minister of Finance. A full year has gone by and we know nothing about the program. We know nothing about the criteria of the program. Information has been denied to the Official Opposition through oral and written questions by our official critic, the Hon. Member for Rosedale. A whole year has gone by and $150 million in public funds have been spent without any accountability whatsoever to the House.

It emerged again in the long Budget of April, 1983 wherein it reads:

● (1220)

A further $150 million will be provided for increased spending on local employment intensive projects.

The program now appears in the Budget papers under a new name. The name has been changed. It is now called the Special Employment Initiatives Program.

I am not going to bore the House with any other details in terms of the genesis of the scandal, which is what it is, except to bring the House up to November 29, 1983 when we asked questions in committee to find out more details about this program. Press releases were coming out and they were very interesting. I have a whole handful of them but I will just refer to a couple of them. I quote:

Swift Current: Senator Hazen Argue, Saskatchewan's representative in the national Cabinet, announced Monday a $100,000 federal grant toward the completion of the community arena in Cabri.

Congratulations, Cabri, I hope you got your arena. Where was the Member of Parliament for that constituency? Not only was he not given the courtesy of advance notice, he was not even consulted, as is the case in all other existing programs.

I go on to Senator Olson, the Cabinet representative for Alberta. I quote from a release of October 8, 1982:

Senator Bud Olson, Leader of the Government in the Senate, announced today a federal government grant in the amount of $1 million to the Canadian Hostelling Association (Alberta Association).

Again there is no reference whatsoever to the Albertan Members of Parliament who sit in this House. It goes on and on and on. In a committee of this House, we were denied information on this program. We were denied criteria as to how this program applies. The Deputy Minister of Employment and Immigration, in reply to my colleague from Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), said: "I believe the criteria will be provided in the next day or so". In reply to a question I asked, the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Roberts) said in the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration on November 29:

I think there is only really one thing I can say to you: When you receive the criteria, if you believe there are some useful projects in your area which would meet the criteria, you send me the suggestions and I will consider them.

I thought that was a generous offer at the time, although I was concerned that there may be no money left in the kitty because at that time $138 million of the $150 million in the Lalonde budget had already been spent on 844 programs, some of which I just quoted announced by Liberal Senators.

I took the Minister at his word. In my province the unemployment rate is 20 per cent and 42 per cent of the work force is on unemployment insurance. I was grasping. I wanted to take the Minister at his word. I waited and I waited and I waited. I asked the Minister a question in the House on January 17. Again he said it was a fast-track program and that he would supply me with the criteria in a few days.

When did we get the criteria? We got the criteria on February 2. Yesterday we were told in the House by the Minister of Finance that we did not get it until February 2 because he was not satisfied with it, it was rather obscure, it was not clear. He was not quite satisfied with it, yet it was good enough to provide funding for Liberal Members of Parliament and Liberal constituencies. It was good enough to allocate $288 million on unclear, unrefined criteria. Now, before he can give the criteria to us so that we can take advantage of the program, the Minister finds it has to have some fine tuning. We finally get it on February 2. The program is probably dead because there is no money left in it.

I will make you a wager, Mr. Speaker. I am prepared to bet any amount that we will see that porkbarrel emerge again in tomorrow's Budget under another name. You watch for it, Mr. Speaker, because it will be there.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): The Chair has considered the amendment submitted by the Hon. Member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) and finds it in order. There is now a ten-minute period for questions, answers and comments.

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the Hon. Member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) for moving this motion today. In view of the comments of the previous speaker from the Conservative Party, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton):

That this House continue to sit through the lunch hour for the purpose of continuing consideration of Supply Motion No. 5.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): The Chair has considered the proposition of the Hon. Member and finds it to be in accordance with Standing Order 8(4)(a). Those opposed to the motion will please rise.

And less than 25 members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Less than 25 members having risen, the motion is considered adopted. There is now a ten-minute period for questions or comments. Debate.

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, having regard to the amendment made by my colleague for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), I thought I might spend my time on this matter today dealing with the question of the refundable employment tax credit. The essence of the amendment made by my friend is to ensconce in our job-creation program in the private and public sector the idea of the refundable employment tax credit. There are a number of features to that idea which need to be brought to the attention of the House.

As the Hon. Member for St. John's East pointed out, and it is worth underlining, it is important to understand that with the refundable tax credit we will have an opportunity, simply stated, to create more jobs for the amount of money expended. That is not simply our idea: it is the understanding of the Economic Council of Canada which is why, on two separate occasions in two different reports, they made it clear that we have to move away from direct job creation and toward a refundable tax credit idea. They recommended it irrespective of party politics or consideration of any politics. They recommended it as an efficient way in which we could create more jobs for less money expended.

There are some other advantages to the refundable employment tax credit, Mr. Speaker. It can allow us to target specific groups who are being hurt more than others as a consequence of the recession and economic change over time. As my hon. friend from St. John's East mentioned, we could aid the over one-half million unemployed young people and older workers who find themselves without an opportunity. I could also mention disabled people. The great flexibility of the refundable employment tax credit is that it allows us to deal with specific groups which are being hurt more than others. It also creates permament jobs. Time and again we have heard ministers of employment, as well as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde), talk about the incredible amount of money being spent and the tremendous number of jobs going to be created as a consequence. They have acronyms for these job programs. People wonder why, after all the money being spent and all the promises for jobs, we have fewer and fewer jobs as more and more programs are put in place by the Government. In the long run people are not looking for short-term jobs. Anyone who has responsibility will take any job if he does not have one. However, people are looking for permanent jobs. That is a feature of the refundable employment tax credit.

Perhaps even more importantly, the refundable tax credit is related to on-the-job training. It can be related to specific sectors of our economy and allow us to combine the Refundable Tax Credit with specific job training. It also allows us to participate in private sector economic growth and development rather than one-shot, short-term, summer-winter jobs. It allows us to deal with the question of technological change as economic sectors develop.

That is why our Party has always supported the refundable employment tax credit, Mr. Speaker. It allows us to create more jobs for less money. It allows us to target certain groups which are hurt more than others. It allows us to combine it with on-the-job training so that people can see permanent jobs in the future in a dynamic and expanding economy. It allows us to deal in specific sectors with the growth and development of those. That is very important at this time in the history of this country because we are living in a time when technological change, particularly in the communications field, is overwhelming us. Less and less people find the opportunity for training programs which will give them real jobs. That is why the motion put forward by my friend, the Hon. Member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), as a amendment to the main motion should commend itself to all Members of the House, irrespective of party. It is an idea that is espoused by the Economic Council of Canada and by anyone who has any objective understanding of what is before us in making sure that we bring some growth back to the Canadian economy and expand it to create jobs in the country.

There is another reason we support the refundable employment tax credit as the best method of job creation. Any objective observer would look at the track record of job-creation programs put out by successive Ministers of Employment in the Government for the past three and one half years and see that they have been terribly mismanaged. As the Government constantly extols the programs and talks about the amount of money it is putting into the employment creation fund, at the end of it we have fewer jobs now than we did last year and an unemployment rate of 11.2 per cent. All of those programs, words, and self-puffery which have come from Ministers of the Crown for the past three and one half years have given us a record of job creation in both the public and private sector which is one of the lowest in the western world.

Outside of the other matters contained in the motion, I hope that this amendment by the Member for St. John's East will be agreed to by Members of the House. Mr. Speaker, a refundable employment tax credit is an idea that should be supported by all Parties. You are going to find it in place very soon because the logic and importance of it to so many people who are unemployed is undeniable.

Outside of the virtues of the refundable employment tax credit, it allows us to get around the problem which we have had for the past three years with the Government. The Government has mismanaged job-creation funding in terms of the increasing unemployment rate and loss of jobs. It has also converted job-creation funds to its own political purposes. For the past three years we have had questions raised by my friend, the Hon. Member for St. John's East, and myself when I was the employment critic for our Party. In November of 1982 I asked for the criteria for the program which was being used for Liberal patronage at that time. Fifteen months ago, in November, 1982 I asked the Government by written question in the House to table the criteria and details of the slush fund of that time. Fifteen months later the public has yet to receive that information. The Government has denied that information to me, our Party, the House and the public.

That information is important. It will show that the Government has for the past three years been consistently using job-creation funds for its own political purposes. That is why it is unwilling to provide the information fifteen months later. That is why in the past few weeks we have again been trying to get information on the new Liberal patronage job-creation fund.

I would like to use one case in point, Mr. Speaker. On December 8, 1983 a press release was issued. It said: "Mrs. Ursula Appolloni announces $230,000 grant for Covenant House". In that press release Ursula Appolloni, the Member for York-South Western, announced that she had secured $230,000 for Covenant House in Toronto. Mr. Speaker, Covenant House is in the riding of Rosedale, which riding I represent. The grant was made to the Toronto Archdiocese of the Roman Catholic Church. I know the people there very well and I phoned them the other day. I asked when it was that Mrs. Appolloni, the Member for York South-Weston—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order. This is the second time the Hon. Member has referred to another Member of the House by name. Will he refer to the Member by her riding?

• (1240)

Mr. Crombie: Mr. Speaker, I was using the press release put out by the Hon. Member and it refers to "Mrs. Ursula Appolloni".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): If I may say so, that is no explanation. Beauchesne is very clear that quoting a document that is unparliamentary does not make the quote more parliamentary. It must be adapted to the procedures of the House.

Mr. Crombie: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The importance of this is that yesterday in the House the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Roberts) indicated quite clearly that the criteria were prepared "a bit before Christmas". The Hon. Member for York South-Weston (Mrs. Appolloni) had been negotiating with the Toronto Archdiocese since late October in order to give them funding of $230,000. Throughout that time I was with the Minister's officials in Toronto on three occasions, October 14, November 4 and December 3, negotiating for some 32 projects under Canada Works and Section 38. Throughout all that time the Minister's officials did not mention at all that any funding was available through some other fund in the Minister's care. This morning I telephoned the Minister's officials and asked them if at any time during the time I had been negotiating for funding for 32 projects in my riding they had any knowledge of the Minister's fund. The answer was no. I then asked when they found out about the Minister's fund. They said not until late January. These are the Minister's officials.

What I and the people of my riding want to know is, while I am negotiating on their behalf with the Minister's officials, who have no knowledge of any other job-creation fund and no criteria for any other fund, how is it that the Hon. Member for York South-Weston can go into my riding, and presumably any other riding, and negotiate a project with a particular group? What does that mean to representative government?

The Hon. Member for York South-Weston is not the Member for Rosedale. During the time I am negotiating 32 projects on behalf of my constituents, the Hon. Member for York South-Weston walks in and spends $230,000 on one project.

The projects I am talking about are not small items, Mr. Speaker. I am talking about the North Jarvis Community Newspaper, the Open Door Centre Self Help projects, project Outreach, and I have a proposal for job creation in Regent Park.

Is it any wonder that people are becoming cynical? They smell corruption. That is the shortest word I know and that is what it is. It is a shame that the Minister of Employment and Immigration will not understand what he is doing.

Mr. McGrath: He is not even in the House.

Mr. Crombie: It is one thing to talk about Liberal members getting money early for projects in their own ridings, which is bad enough; it is not fair, it is not right and it is not honest, but they have been doing it for so long that people have come to expect it. What is different about this is that they are not just loading up patronage in their own ridings but in ridings held by others. A Liberal did not get elected in the riding of Rosedale; I was elected in the riding of Rosedale. I work very hard for those people and when I am negotiating with the Minister's officials, they are ignorant, as I am, of the fact that the Minister allows the Hon. Member for York South-Weston to negotiate a project in my riding.

I do not know what the Government intends to do about this. I do not know what the Minister of Employment and Immigration, who comes from Metropolitan Toronto, intends to do with it. But I can tell you that there is a smell that the people in Metropolitan Toronto recognize. It is even worse than the ancient smell of Liberal patronage and Liberal corruption. The Liberals now think that they do not even have to get elected in order to run the Government—they just have to know the Minister. They do not even have to go through the criteria like everyone else, apply like everybody else or go through some public process of the normal democratic system; all they have to do is know the Minister. When we come to the stage we have now, Mr. Speaker, the people in the country know that it is time for the Government to go.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration should resign, Mr. Speaker. There is no longer a shred of credibility in anything he has to say. We have a minister of the Crown who says that the criteria for his program were not developed until a bit before Christmas, yet he has a member of the Liberal caucus negotiating with someone in my riding in October. People in my riding are not going to stand for that any longer, Mr. Speaker.

The reason we need the employment tax credit is not only that it provides more jobs for less money, not only that it allows us to target on groups hurt by unemployment, not only allows us to have on-the-job training combined with the tax credit but, far more important, it allows the people of Canada to have some sense that the Government is honest. It keeps Liberal hands off the money and that is what people want.

Mr. Anguish: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Hon. Member a question about a topic brought up by a member of the Conservative Party from Calgary. He talked about the way in which the rate of unemployment is set across the country. I feel that the system is faulty. For example, in the last year that we had community development projects my constituents received about $980,000; this year it was changed to Canada Works projects and the constituency allocation was $100,000. We were told this was because the base rate of unemployment for the area was below the average and therefore we received only the basic $100,000. In the northern part of my riding, however, there are many native communities with unemployment in excess of 90 per cent; 10 per cent is not the unemployment rate but the unemployment rate in many of those communities.

To determine the unemployment rate, Statistics Canada conducts a telephone survey across the country but very few calls are made to some of the remote, northern areas and native areas where few people have telephones. I think this is a fault in the method of determining the real rate of unemployment.

I wonder if the Hon. Member who just spoke has some ideas on how the Conservative Party, if it were the Government of Canada, would determine the actual unemployment rate for all areas.

Mr. Crombie: Mr. Speaker, in terms of the first part of the Hon. Member's question, I believe I made clear my own view that the Government's course of action with respect to job creation is both incompetent in terms of its management and corrupt in terms of its practice. It seems to me the most important thing is to make sure we have a mechanism which allows us to deal with some certainty in terms of employment needs.

• (1250)

I feel one mechanism which has just had birth, and which could be dealt with more effectively, is the Labour Market Institute. The Labour Market Institute has at least the beginnings of a capability for identification of specific areas in a far greater way than the mechanism used by the Government.

I may say as well that as it stands now, when we are dealing with the number of people I have in my own riding—and I, along with the Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap), have the largest number of people in the country—what we do now is look at both the Canada Works program and Section 38. Section 38 funding in my riding was $70,000, almost as much as the original $100,000. The process right now is inappropriate, mismanaged and corrupt. I believe what we need to do is look at an extension of the opportunities provided by the Labour Market Institute.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak in this debate today with perhaps a little more enthusiasm than I have had at other times because I have an opportunity, Mr. Speaker, for 20 minutes, to put on the public record, to put into Hansard and to put out through the television medium, some of the facts of the backroom manipulation of the Prime Minister's Office in relation to a particular $300 million secret slush fund. I mentioned in the House last Friday, supported by the Hon. Member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), that on Thursday there came into our possession some documentation which helped us begin to understand the secret nature of the use of these funds for partisan political purposes, the secret nature of the use of these funds in a manner which makes a mockery of the attempts by the Government to assert that it cares one whit about the unemployed in this country.

I am going to provide to Hansard and will read into the record some significant portions of the material which became available to my office last Thursday. The first quotation I will read into the record refers back to the early days of this program in 1982, when it had a different title. Today it is called the Special Employment Initiatives Program. I will read just one short paragraph out of the minutes of the meeting of the group which was charged with the responsibility of putting this program in operation:

> The projects have been generally selected for their local impact. Speedy implementation is critical as the emphasis is on immediate employment. It was also emphasized that, at this stage, confidentiality is required.

"Confidentiality is required", Mr. Speaker. Anyone listening to me today can phone a Canada Manpower Centre anywhere in the country—close to two years later—and ask for information on this program and, Mr. Speaker, it is not available. It has not been available to all Members of Parliament since the day it was announced in the Budget. It has been available to Liberal Members of Parliament. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) admitted, yes; other Members of Parliament, no; Canadian citizens, no. It was available simply to Liberal Members of Parliament. We have asked, Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order. May I ask the Hon. Member to clarify and describe the source of the document from which he is quoting?

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I will provide the documents to Hansard. As to the source of the document, they came into my hands through people inside the Conservative Party whom I trust.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): The Hon. Member knows that the rules require that documents quoted in the House be described. The description which the Hon. Member has given is absolutely not acceptable.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, they are internal documents to the secretariat, the civil servants and political staff of different Ministers. It is an internal document which was circulated to people who attended a meeting. It is in the form of minutes, Mr. Speaker. Okay?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order. No, I cannot accept "okay". The rules are very clear on this. If the Hon. Member is to quote any more documents, he has to describe these documents in a recognizable fashion, not calling them "committees" or "groups" or "confidential". Is that clear?

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, that presents certain difficulties to a Member of Parliament. I will describe them as five pages which I have in my possession, which I will table, and from which I intend to quote. Is that adequate, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Waddell: What is the title?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): The Hon. Member will be allowed to quote from a document if he describes the document. This is a long-standing tradition of this House. I am not coming up with a new item which is unknown to Hon. Members. If the Hon. Member is not able to describe the source of the document, he will kindly refrain from quoting from it.

Mr. Waddell: If you are going to table it, describe it.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, may I have the unanimous consent of the House to table this document and let Hon. Members decide?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Is there unanimous consent to table the document?

[Translation]

Mr. Laniel: Mr. Speaker, under the Standing Orders the Hon. Member has no right to table documents. Only Ministers are entitled to do so. Otherwise, the Table would disappear under on avalanche of paper. The Standing Orders do not give Members the right to table documents, and the Hon. Member seems to be ashamed of this one since he is even afraid of identifying it!

[English]

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I believe that my colleague, the Hon. Member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes), is in the process of addressing a particular motion we now have before us, and in the course of his remarks is in fact reading into the record extracts from a document, which I feel is quite appropriate, with the greatest of deference. As the Hon. Member from the Government side has pointed out, there is only provision for the tabling of documents by Ministers of the Crown unless unanimous consent is obtained. We must interpret the rules to make sure that freedom of speech and freedom of a point of view, especially as it relates to Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, is not hindered. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that to restrict my colleague with respect to the presentation of his case by limiting his ability to quote from a document would be a serious infringement on the right of speech of any Member of Parliament.

I understand that the point is that the rules must not be abused and we are not to read speeches. However, if these are documents in the Hon. Member's possession and he is prepared to stand behind these documents, there should be no reason at all why he is not able to quote from those documents, and quote extensively, as long as they are germane to this particular debate. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to exercise your discretion with respect to this matter and allow freedom of speech and not constrain Hon. Members in terms of a serious debate relating to the practices of this Government, which are under serious attack not only by Members of the House of Commons but by Canadians across this land.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. To assist the Chair, I believe the rules are clear that the Hon. Member has to have a name to the document. Was it Shakespeare who said "What's in a name?" Sometimes there is a lot in a name and perhaps the Hon. Member has a name for his document; for example, an internal memo dealing with employment practices, or an internal memo dealing with grants, or a memo from a particular Department. Surely the Hon. Member has to identify the document in some sort of way before he quotes from it. The Hon. Member should be able to do that if he is prepared to table the document.

• (1300)

Mr. Crombie: Mr. Speaker, when the Chair makes its decision it should have in mind that the Hon. Member is not trying to hide anything. He has offered to table the document. It seems to me that ought to be sufficient. If that is going to be denied by the Government side, then it places the Hon. Member in a very awkward situation. He needs unanimous consent in order to table the document, and that may be denied by the Hon. Member across the way. The Hon. Member indicated that he is willing to have the document made public by offering to table it, and I hope the Speaker will take that into consideration when he makes his decision.

[Translation]

Mr. Laniel: Mr. Speaker, to take up the point raised by the Hon. Member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie)—

[English]

—I want to bring to his attention the problem of how I can accept the tabling of a document when I have a Member in front of me who does not have the courage, or enough belief in the document to identify it. I am not ready to give my consent to tabling the document unless I know the identity of the document. If tabling is going to permit him to read a speech from that document because he has nothing to say in the debate, well, he is supposed to be here to make speeches in his own words, not by reading documents or quoting from unknown documents.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order. There are two points to be considered. First, the Hon. Member is asking for a document to be tabled. We can deal with that; it is very simple and straightforward. Not being a Minister of the Crown, the Member should not normally be allowed to table a document, but he may do so if we have unanimous consent. The tabling of a document comes under a different Standing Order from that of quoting from it. Therefore, is there unanimous consent for the Hon. Member to table his document?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Laniel: An unknown document, no.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): So we do not have unanimous consent. The second point concerning quoting from a document is also very straightforward. I enjoin the Hon. Member to read Beauchesne's Fifth Edition, Citation 329(4), which says:

When quoting a letter in the House, a Member must be willing either to give the name of the author or to take full responsibility for the contents himself.

That means that if the Hon. Member is not willing to give the name of the author of the document, he has to say what is in the document as if he said it himself. He cannot refer to it as a document which originates from a nebulous committee. This being agreed, I ask the Hon. Member to resume his speech and abide by the rules.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I guess the way out of the dilemma is perhaps to put my imagination to work. If I had been at the meeting of the people responsible for these programs, if I had been charged with the task of taking minutes at that meeting, I think the following kinds of things would be what I might have written in those minutes which have reflected—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order. The Hon. Member cannot take lightly the ruling that I just made. He has to quote the document or refrain from referring to it as originating from a meeting or being the minutes of a group. He can say straight to the House what he has to say, but if he wants to quote the document he will have to identify it. Let us not try and circumvent the Standing Order; the Hon. Member does not quote the document or, if he does, he quotes the source.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I hope this point of order does not eat into my time.

Some Hon. Members: Yes!

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, let me go back to where I started. There is a sense of confidentiality about these programs which is clear to everyone in the nation. For two years now we have not been able to find out from the Canada Manpower Centre how these funds are allocated. We have not been able to find out through committee hearings or through questions on the Order Paper. Therefore, there is absolutely no question that this is a secret fund of money which comes out of the budget and is allocated in some mysterious way.

I suggest the specific mechanism involved in the allocation of these funds, Mr. Speaker, puts the Prime Minister's Office, the backroom manipulators of the Liberal Party of Canada, at the very centre of the allocation process. I suggest to Members of this House that I personally have certain knowledge that in the original allocation of this money preceding the June, 1982 Budget, in planning for the spending of this money, the Prime Minister's Office, the backroom manipulators in the Prime Minister's office, were directly involved in screening projects into two streams. The projects were coming directly to the Prime Minister's Office and they were divided into two streams, and we ended up with two major programs. We had fast tracking for smaller local programs and the larger one for special capital construction. That decision was made by the backroom manipulators in the Prime Minister's Office on the basis of projects which came forward to them.

Point number two: Where did the projects come from? Did they come from Canadians generally? No, Mr. Speaker, they came from Ministers. Is that appropriate? In a general sense yes, it is. But these particular projects came forward to the backroom people in the Prime Minister's Office, primarily from the political Minister, the designated Ministers responsible for patronage in each of the ten provinces of Canada. That is where the essence of these projects came from.

The knowledge available to me tells me that when it came to a dilemma or a disagreement between a line Minister responsible for a budget, for example, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Axworthy), the Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox), or the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Roberts), when it came to a difference of opinion between the political Minister in a province and the line Minister responsible for the budgetary funds voted to that line Minister by Parliament, it was the opinion of the political Minister which would prevail in the expenditure of these funds. Does that or does that not constitute a serious violation of some of the basic principles which enable a democracy to work?

Information available to me, Mr. Speaker, talks about hard and soft projects. That information indicates that the civil servants gathered details on projects for funding once they are considered to be hard. What was a hard project? That was a project agreed to by the political Minister. At that point the civil servants were to gather information to enable them to defend that funding or spending decision after the decision was made. On soft projects, those which had not been approved by a political Minister, only headquarters was to gather information on those projects. All members of the committee, the normal civil service network, was not free to gather information on those projects until they had moved from the soft category to the hard category.

That whole system, Mr. Speaker, makes puppets out of line Ministers. We in this House of Commons go through the process of approving the Main Estimates. We put a line Minister up in front of the committee and examine his budgetary expenditure plan. We, as Members of Parliament accountable to the taxpayers of this country, do not see the political Ministers. We do not have a chance to ask them questions about their expenditure plans for public funds. We do not see the backroom manipulators in the Prime Minister's Office before standing committees. We do not have a chance to ask them about their expenditure plans. There are line Ministers who come before the committee. We vote funds that are to be spent by those line Ministers for the purpose of their budgets. It is quite disappointing and shocking to discover that the expenditure of line departmental budgets is being determined by political Ministers.

I remind Members that in Canada today three of those political Ministers come from the Senate rather than the House of Commons. They do not have the authority that is vested in people who go through an electoral process. Is it right that people with that kind of mandate should be telling line Ministers how to spend a portion of their budget? It is similar to their being puppets. It is like turning line Ministers in the Government into eunuchs or puppets that do what they are told by political Ministers from the Senate in terms of their budgets which they were given through the democratic process in the House of Commons. It is a violation of basic principles and a plot worthy of the backroom manipulators in the Prime Minister's Office.

When dealing with communication about these projects, the first principle is to maintain secrecy until all decisions are made. At that time the signs are displayed and announcements from political Ministers about the funding are made. This is so they can take the credit. That is part of the communication plan. While it is kept secret from Members of Parliament and other Canadians, perhaps it can be shared with the presidents of riding associations of particular political persuasions. However, do not share it with all Members of Parliament. Who devised that plan? It came from a representative of the Prime Minister's Office meeting with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde).

Do Members in this Chamber feel that the Minister of Finance is the key player in the development of a communications strategy for the expenditure of $150 million that involves 15 Departments and is the administrative responsibility of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration? What on earth is the Minister of Finance doing developing a communication plan with a representative of the Prime Minister's Office? What facts are there to show Canadians and Members of Parliament that the process is one in which the Minister of Finance is in charge of asserting a communications strategy for the expenditure of $150 million of public funds? It is very unusual. I suggest that this allocation of $150 million a year is very peculiar. It is a secret slush fund. The employment it creates is a by-product of its basic purpose, which is the use of taxpayers' money for the political manipulation of the Canadian population.

This has always been the danger in the Government's approach to employment creation funds. If the Government is in the direct job-creation business, it should have advisory committees comprised of local people who decide who will and who will not get a job. Any other system would simply put temptation into the hands of political Ministers. This secret $300 million slush fund is the clearest demonstration in my parliamentary career of the lack of wisdom in the present allocation process.

In 1981 I wrote to the Auditor General of Canada to suggest that a special audit on the methods of job fund allocation be undertaken at that time. That need is even more evident today. The Auditor General, as the servant of the House, is the only appropriate and unbiased source who has the legal and statutory authority to look into the question of whether funds voted by the House have been legally and properly spent with due regard to economy and efficiency. I hope that representatives of the Auditor General's office are listening to the debate today or perhaps reading the newspaper as this issue unfolds. I suggest that it is time for at least that inquiry.

If the Government believes that this is not a secret slush fund, that it is not susceptible to backroom manipulation from the Prime Minister's Office and if the Government believes it is appropriate for political Ministers to tell line Ministers how to spend their budgets, then why does the Government House Leader not stand this afternoon and make a recommendation for a public inquiry into the methods of deciding the expenditure of funds in the Special Employment Incentives Program and its immediate predecessor? If there is nothing to hide, then one would think that the Government would be anxious to clear its reputation by establishing such an all-parliamentary group and giving it the power to conduct a full and impartial inquiry.

It is time that we as Members of Parliament took our responsibilities seriously. It is time for the Government to permit us to fulfil those responsibilities. It is time for a public inquiry into the methods employed by the Liberal Party in the allocation of these particular employment creation funds.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Questions, comments and answers? Debate.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take up the challenge issued by the previous speaker and be very specific about job-creation programs. I will identify and quote from specific material and I think the House will realize that there is something quite wrong with the allocation of these grants.

I conducted my own inquiry into the methods of allocation with respect to one particular grant. It pertains to this debate because our finance critic, the Hon. Member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis), has included in his motion a condemnation of the Government for "allocating job-creation funds in a partisan fashion not based upon local employment levels".

I want to refer to a grant of $583,000 that was given to a group in Toronto allegedly to conduct social services. However, as I go through this material it will become evident what it is really for. The group is called the Canadian Alliance for Italian Integration and Culture. They call themselves the Alliance Community Services. I believe they are located at a storefront office at 3271 Dufferin Street in Toronto, Ontario.

First, I want to refer to a document from the Ministry of Consumer and Commercial Relations of the Province of Ontario. These are letters patent for the incorporation of the Canadian Alliance for Italian Integration and Culture. The number of the letter of incorporation is 540,758. It appears that this organization was incorporated on February 18, 1983. The group is a charitable organization with an address at 295 College Street, Suite 300, in Toronto. The group is to do charitable work, and so on, for ethnic communities with particular reference to the Italian community. The document is available and I will seek leave later to table it.

● (1320)

The document makes reference to the board of directors. I want Hon. Members to notice specifically three names; Giacomo Capitanio; Giuseppe Volpe or Joe Volpe, an educator, and Albina Maria Guarnieri, who is listed as a director of communications. They are all from Toronto. There are another six people listed. I want the House to be particularly interested in the three names I have mentioned. I will come back to them and they will appear again in my documents. That society is set up to undertake work on behalf of the Italian Canadian Community in February.

My second paper, which I made reference to in the House yesterday, is a discussion paper on integration and the Italian community's relations with the Liberal Party. I will not read the whole document but I will make reference to one of the main parts. I quote:

Reach out into the community through an office established in an area where Italians are most numerous so as to identify needs and to minister to them.

In other words, a community office to minister to those needs. On page 4 of this document we find that "it is necessary to fund loyal and valid agencies within our community in order to satisfy the needs of", and it goes on to talk about the needs of seniors, women, youth, small business and so on. It is very important to see that one of the recommendations of a group of Italian Canadians in the Liberal Party was to set up a storefront office to minister to the needs of the community. There is nothing the matter with that. The Italian Liberals are quite entitled, as are Italians of Conservative persuasion or Italians of New Democratic Party persuasion, to form their own group. But look who is on the list. Mr. Giacomo Capitanio. Here he is listed as the vice-president of the York West Federal Liberal Association. Miss Albina Guarnieri is listed as a director of CAFIIC. I assume, though I am not completely sure that that is her directorship in the Canadian Alliance for Integration and Culture. Also listed is Mr. Joe Volpe. Mr. Volpe is listed as a candidate in the Downsview provincial riding. Other people are listed who are aldermen candidates, former legislative assistants, and one MPP, Mr. Michael Spencieri. These people are entitled to make recommendations to the Liberal Party.

My third document is a proposal for a job-creation program in the social services field to meet the needs of the community in northwest Toronto. Who is this submitted by? It is submitted by the Canadian Alliance for Integration and Culture. They seem to have dropped the word Italian, but they do cite the non-profit registration number as No. 540,758, which is the same number in the incorporation document for the Canadian Alliance for Italian Integration and Culture. Indeed, basically they are the same people. The chairman, who is submitting this, is Mr. Joe Volpe, again a director of the original Alliance who appears on the Liberal Party documents and who wants a storefront office. What does this group want? They want funding for a storefront office to help the Italian community. Their first objective is:

1. To open a store-front "office meeting place," conveniently located in "Eglinton-Lawrence" and open to all who require assistance in accessing services.

But convenient to whom, Mr. Speaker? Convenient to the Liberal Party in Metropolitan Toronto. Convenient to a group in the Italian community. Convenient to a group controlled by certain people in the Italian community which I said in the House the other day is a threat to some of the Members of Parliament here. In fact, what is being set up is a group who will work ultimately to get control and knock off Liberal Members in Etobicoke-Lakeshore, in York West and perhaps in other ridings, including the Minister sitting over there and his colleague from Trinity.

I will come back to that in a moment. This is a job-creation proposal submitted. Let me come to the normal procedure of the job-creation program. This is what the last Member was talking about. Members of Parliament know about this.

What is the normal procedure for a job-creation program? Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker. The normal procedure, which I have confirmed this morning by checking with the department in metropolitan Toronto, is first that a project officer gets regulations from the Government and advertises what the regulations are. The project officer goes out into the community and solicits applications. The applications then come in. They are looked at by the office. Consultants look at them. A minimum, I am told, of three consultants sometimes are 10, see if the application is serious and if the project is valuable for the community. The next stage is that the project officer makes a recommendation to the regional office. Then it goes to the Minister for approval.

For some programs—the Canada Works program and the Summer Canada program, Members of Parliament get involved. I have been involved. I have got grants for my riding. I have been to see the process and I have taken part in the process in Vancouver. The Member of Parliament comes in to approve the grants on the level just before the recommendation goes to the regional office.

What happens then with this new program, the program that the Hon. Member from Calgary, who last spoke, referred to? He talked about the Special Employments Initiatives Program in which $300 million was available. He called it a slush fund for Liberal members. He pointed out that confidentiality is required. It is more than that. I will tell you how the grant works, Mr. Speaker. I have checked this out with civil servants who work in the area. In this program an application comes in. I asked civil servants from where the application comes. They tell me they do not know. No one goes out to the community. I asked how they get the application. I was told that it just comes in to the office. They do an assessment and go through the recommendation phase. They do not do an assessment the way the other programs are assessed. There is one person for these programs for one-half of the constituencies of Metropolitan Toronto. They have 11 people to assess the other programs. The assessment is perfunctory. In fact, it is just sent on to the Minister. From where does the application really come? We know that it comes from the Member of Parliament. In the riding of Eglinton-Lawrence, the present Member sitting in the House makes a recommendation. How convenient.

You see the picture, Mr. Speaker. You have a group of Italian Canadian Liberals forming a society who meet and say they need a storefront office. They put it down on paper. The same group asks for a grant. Then we have the local MP giving them a grant of $583,000. To do what? There is the nub of the situation.

I have here a letter from the United Way addressed to the Hon. John Roberts. It is dated January 17, 1984 and says that there was no consultation with the community about this "large expenditure of federal dollars". There was little or no consultation with any of the Departments involved.

● (1330)

There is a group called COSTI-IIAS Immigrant Services which has been working 30 years in the Italian community. I believe—I may be wrong—that the present Minister of the Environment (Mr. Caccia) who is sitting in the House at one point in his career was a director of this group. It has a professional board of directors from all across the community. It has a good reputation. It is providing the same social services as that Liberal group is providing. It issued a press release in which it said that this was a duplication of social services. In other words, $583,000 has been spent to duplicate social services. The Social Planning Council of Metropolitan Toronto on January 17 wrote to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Gray): "Re: Alliance for Italian Integration and Culture". It expressed its objection to the lack of consultation and wrote:

> It is a slap in the face to the social planning organization as well as many other direct service agencies to have this action occur at such a fragile moment in the life of the non-government sector.

I asked the Minister a question about this in the House yesterday. He is quoted in The Toronto Star of February 14, in a column by Joe O'Donnell, as saying:

> In approving a project or signing it, it was certainly not done on the basis of any connections that the sponsors might or might not have had with any political party.

My question to you, Mr. Speaker, to the people of Canada and to the Liberal Party is: Why was the grant approved? It flies in the face of existing agencies. It is against the present plan for social planning in Toronto. It politicizes the agency. Why was it approved? Here is a concrete example. Who found out about this? Opposition MPs did not know about these grants. Even the Public Service did not know; it just mysteriously got the applications when they came in. This goes beyond politics. This is corruption; this is a direct example of corruption. The people of Canada should know that this is how their money is being spent.

As the United Way pointed out, it has $248,000 for new programs in Metropolitan Toronto each year and it gets 71 applications from organizations. Here, out of the blue, is $583,000 being given to an organization which has no professional expertise in it. I say to the Minister of the Environment, shame! How can you be part of the Metropolitan Toronto caucus? I ask the other Minister across the way, the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. MacLaren), how he can be a part of this. These are two honourable Ministers. How can they take part in this? I do not believe that these two hon. gentlemen are that corrupt.

I have written a letter today to the Minister of Employment and Immigration and I want to read it. It reads:

> Dear Mr. Roberts,
> I am writing to you concerning the $583,000 grant to the Alliance Community Services in the constituency of Eglinton-Lawrence in Toronto.

May I just pause to give the unemployment rate in Eglinton-Lawrence. I think it is about 4.4 per cent. In any event, the letter continues:

> I am enclosing documentation including:
> 1. my question to you yesterday in the House of Commons;
> 2. the Letter Patent of the Canadian Alliance for Italian Integration and Culture;
> 3. a "Discussion Paper on Integration and the Italian Community's Relations with the Liberal Party";
> 4. proposal for a job creation program in the social services field etc., submitted by the Canadian Alliance;
> 5. the Alliance's pamphlet from their storefront office;
> 6. letters from the United Way of Greater Toronto and from the Social Planning Council of Metropolitan Toronto objecting to the grant; and
> 7. a statement by COSTI-IIAS Immigrant Services (an organization doing this work professionally for 30 years) objecting to the duplication of services.
> I think you will see the clear Liberal connection with this project. As the so-called 'political Minister for Toronto' you would be incompetent if you did not know about this.
>
> As the Minister of Employment for Canada you have approved a grant that—in fact of opposition from the existing organization in Metro's Italian Community—paves the way for former and potential Liberal candidates to organize door-to-door using public money to boot.
> Civil service assessment of these grants is perfunctory at best. Existing services are duplicated. Compared to COSTI, the Alliance has an inexperienced Board of Directors.
> You have politicized social work in Toronto, which will have long term ramifications.
> In short, this grant smells.
> I suggest you show some leadership here, reassess the situation and terminate the grant.

In conclusion, I would like to add a couple of further matters so that Canadians will understand why am I objecting to former present and future Liberal candidates going door to door in an organization which is paid for by public funds. The reason is the nature of modern politics. This organization has the ability to identify all potential voters in that community and to sign them up for the Liberal Party, for elections or for takeover bids. Say they wanted to knock off the Hon. Member for York West (Mr. Fleming) at a nomination meeting. This is the way it goes. They could put it into their new personal computers and keep lists of people's names and so on. There is nothing the matter with that; we do that in all Parties now. But what is the matter with this and why this is corrupt is that it is paid for by the Government of Canada under job creation.

I have just returned from Edmonton. There is 14 per cent unemployment there. I talked with some young people who are unemployed. They are disillusioned and distressed about what is happening. If I had told them about this grant, can we imagine what they would feel about the rottenness of this kind of approach to government and to job creation?

Not only does the present Minister of Employment and Immigration have no chance of running for the leadership of the Liberal Party, as I have heard talked about, but he should consider resigning from the House of Commons because this is an example of corruption.

I close by seeking the unanimous consent of the House—and I do not expect to obtain it because I think the Liberal Party will try to bury this stinking fish—to file for all Hon. Members to see or to table in the House the letters patent of the Canadian Alliance for Italian Integration and Culture; a discussion paper on the integration and the Italian community's relations with the Liberal Party; a proposal for a job-creation program in the social services field to meet the needs of the community in northwest Toronto; and finally the pamphlet—they are now set up—from the Alliance Community Services, sponsored by CAFIIC, Mr. J. Volpe, chairman, and funded by Employment and Immigration Canada, Employment Development Branch. I seek unanimous consent to table these four documents.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Chair should inform Hon. Members at this time that only Ministers are allowed under our procedure to table documents.

Mr. McGrath: It could be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: As the Hon. Member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) says, that could be done by unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent to allow the Hon. Member to table certain documents?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. On debate, the Hon. Member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn).

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Do we not have a question period following these discussions, these scurrilous presentations?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair apologizes. It should have allowed for the question and comment period. I thank the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary for reminding the Chair of its duties. We will now proceed with it.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I am the chairman of an informal group known as the Toronto area Liberal parliamentary caucus, so I took some interest in the instructions the Hon. Member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) gave us about the way in which we should conduct our affairs. I wonder whether he could give some evidence that the people involved in this agency have been improperly using Government funding? By that I mean, conducting political activities when they are being paid by the Government during the Government's time, using the storefront for political activities, using the list for political activities, or using any of the equipment and facilities in this agency for political activities.

• (1340)

The Hon. Member has raised a serious charge. He has named names. He has left those people with no defence because he has raised the charge in the House of Commons. I ask him to go beyond the guilt by association that he is using and to provide some evidence that these people are acting improperly and being financed by Government money.

Mr. Laniel: That is an NDP tactic.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member says that my presentation was scurrilous.

Mr. Fisher: It was.

Mr. Waddell: I take offence at that. I tried to lay it out by documents which I proposed to table in the House, but the Liberal Party would not allow me to because they would not give unanimous consent. I set it out in detail. With reference to conducting political activity, the Hon. Member knows that that is a thing that is almost impossible to prove; you have to shape up a picture and the picture tells the story.

The evidence here, it seems to me, leads to only one possible conclusion and one possible opportunity. The point that I was making was that it was an opportunity to use this organization for the very purposes that were set out by the Liberal Party document, saying that they wanted a storefront office to get into the community for Party purposes.

Basically the same people then go to the Government and get a grant that has a strange way of being approved, different from all the other grants we have ever seen in job creation, and suddenly they are set up in their storefront office. I say that leads to the overwhelming conclusion that indeed they got their office for precisely the purposes that they set out in their job-creation program.

I tried to check this more specifically. The Hon. Member says I put some of these people in jeopardy. I tried to phone some of those people. I had difficulty getting them. I phoned Albina Maria Guarnieri. I phoned Lowther Consultants in Toronto; the number was out of service. They put me on to the other number. It was Jim Coutts' office. I phoned Jim Coutts' office and asked for Mrs. Guarnieri. When I asked to talk to her, I was told she was in a meeting. I phoned a couple of times but she was always in meetings. Therefore, I made some attempts to talk to these people.

I talked also to civil servants. I asked a question of the Minister yesterday on this matter. It seems to me that I have taken all reasonable steps to show a case. When you put all the evidence together in the face of community support, in face of the connections and in the face of what they were trying to do, it shows that they are now set up to do precisely what they wanted to do as set out in their paper.

I have to tell the Hon. Member that you have to look at the way modern politics operate. When you have all that information, you can use it, and that is precisely what the Liberal Party wants to do. The Hon. Member can disagree with that. I say to the Hon. Member, show me the civil servant's recommendation in detail. Show me the monitoring report. Show me the cost of approving this service. There are two criticisms of the grant. One, it is overlapping, duplicitous and does not make any sense. The second implication beyond all reasonable doubt, it seems to me, is that the evidence leads to it being a political set-up.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member digs himself further in all the time. He says that he tried to talk to people but he admits he has not. He says he does not have any direct contact with any of the principals. He admits that he does not have any concrete evidence, yet he is willing to stand in the House and say two or three things. He is going to give people's names, he is going to say they are engaged in corrupt activity and he is going to say that it is a massive conspiracy, not only on the part of these people but on the part of Members over here.

Let us see if the Member wants to step outside the House and accuse the individuals whose names he has mentioned. Does he have the courage to go outside where he does not have the protection of our rules and blame these people so they can answer him where this belongs, in a court of law? He knows full well that he does not have enough evidence for that. He has a lot of cockamanie theory. Yes, indeed, there is some controversy. COSTI-IIAS raised these concerns. Let us answer that on that level. To go one step further and to take people who are involved in legitimate social work and legitimate political activity and to say that that is wrong or corrupt is great—that's a really good theory! That is what Joseph McCarthy did in the 1950s. If the Hon. Member does not want his name associated with McCarthyism, then step outside and accuse people so that they can answer.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I seek the co-operation of Hon. Members to make questions and comments as brief as possible.

Mr. Waddell: I will reply briefly. I ask Hon. Members to look at the letters patent and try and find if there is one social worker on it. These are rank amateurs. I said it was the Government that was corrupt, not these people.

Mr. Fisher: Are you willing to go outside?

Mr. Waddell: It was the Minister who did this. It was the Minister who was incompetent through his political job in Toronto and it was the Government that was corrupt in the way that it was giving out these grants.

Mr. Fisher: No, sir, you made specific charges. Go outside.

Mr. Waddell: I said it was the Government that was corrupt.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Laniel: Mr. Speaker, in his comments, the Hon. Member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) mentioned that he found nothing to criticize in the way the former Local Initiatives Program, now called Canada Works, was implemented because the system made it possible for him, as an Opposition Member, to have the same say as a Government Member in the final choice of projects.

Personally, I do not have a specific axe to grind, but does the Hon. Member mean he would have no objection to the program if he had been able to do his job in his own riding and make recommendations for suitable projects there?

He is accusing the Government or Government Members of exercising patronage or encouraging more or less worthwhile organizations. I may remind the Hon. Member that a few years ago when we set up the Local Initiatives Program, I know of one instance in Vancouver, maybe in his own riding, where a project had been approved at the recommendation of a Member of Parliament, probably from his own party, for setting up a small farm, where subsequently marijuana was grown. So all Members are not necessarily to blame for choices that turn out to have unfortunate consequences. I think the Hon. Member will have to admit that according to his reasoning, if he had been able to make his own recommendations in his own riding, exercising his own NDP patronage, he would have had no objection to the Program.

[English]

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, the whole point is that these other programs are fine. I am a supporter of the other programs. I went to the office of the Canada Works woman who was going out and finding the projects in my riding. That was fine; no one objects to that. The problem with this program, I tell the Hon. Member, is that it was a selective program. Only Liberal members were informed of this program. They were told to go out and get the grants and submit them correctly. It has the wrong kind of process. It ends up with grants like this, which are opposed by the existing community, some of the older services which have been in service for 30 years, the present existing services. It leads to charges of political interference. Indeed, in this particular program I submit there was a political thing happening. It opens up the Government. With a grant like that in the British system, I have no doubt but that the Minister would have to resign; but not in our system.

• (1350)

To sum up, Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the grants or to the legitimate process using civil servants and having the MPs' input where it should be. However, this was a special program and we were not informed about it properly. It was secret and it was the Liberal MPs who benefited. I think it is going to rebound on them. It is going to hurt the programs and the Government.

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Mr. Speaker, I have approximately ten minutes before two o'clock to introduce this topic. I would like to conclude after Question Period.

At the outset I would like to say that I enter this debate more in sorrow than in any sense of anger. There is an underlying current of anger that does exist across the country. Since this issue has arisen of job creation and the political manipulation in which the Government has been involved, particularly the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and Members of the Cabinet, I have had the opportunity of travelling back to my constituency and across a good part of the country. Having been involved in a small way with respect to raising some of these issues on the floor of the House of Commons, I can tell Hon. Members that I have been absolutely astounded at the sense of indignation that has been expressed to me as a Member of Parliament in coffee shops, airports, airplanes and in my riding with respect to the callous, cynical and manipulative tactics that are being adopted by the Government with respect to so-called fast-track capital projects and job-creation projects. To put it in the most complimentary way that I can, they have been put together in a slap-dash, haphazard and political way.

The New Democratic Party has been preoccupied for some months now with an attack on our Party in particular. It has spent its energy and time in an attack on my Leader and the policies of my Party.

An Hon. Member: What policies?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I must compliment the members of the New Democratic Party today. I am prepared to compliment them once in a while when there is a germ of perception. Finally, after many months, they have tried to train their guns on the Liberal Government of the country. I compliment them for bringing forward this resolution. Although we have some difficulty with it, we will in fact support the proposition being put forth because there are elements in here which are compelling. Unfortunately, rather than being able to spend our time debating in the best way possible in order to create jobs, there has been an element in terms of the Government's activity on job creation that has given a nasty turn to this debate. That is with respect to the manipulation, patronage and porkbarrel slush fund that is being operated to the detriment of peole who want to work but are unable to obtain employment.

I understand that the New Democratic Party has a philosophical problem with respect to the patronage issue. They are very much in favour of government intervention. As the Member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) has said, they would do exactly the same as the Government. They would hand out dollars where they, in their own wisdom, think these dollars would do the most good. They do not specify whether it is the most good politically or with respect to employment. One of the difficulties in terms of the policies of the Liberal and New Democratic Parties is that the funds are not allocated on an equitable and fair basis and directed toward the people they are intended to help, the unemployed of our country. My colleague from St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) brought forward policies and positions that we as a Progressive Conservative Government would take with respect to directing the assistance to areas where there is more possibility for job creation, such as the small business sector. Canadians understand that.

I would like to address myself to the element of the motion with which I am particularly concerned and with which literally thousands of Canadians have expressed concern. That is with respect to the last part of the New Democratic Party's motion that the allocation of job-creation funds has been done in a partisan fashion and not based upon local employment levels.

One of the things I have noticed with respect to this debate is a very simple fact of life. The Liberal Government is so terribly sensitive about allowing any of its back-benchers to get up to address this issue so that we can question them that it has prohibited members of its Party from standing in their place and participating in this debate. The Government has had one Minister involved in the course of this two-hour debate. Not one back-bencher has the courage of his convictions to stand up and participate in this debate and be subject to criticism and questioning on the part of the Opposition. That is an indication of precisely what is wrong with our job-creation programs and our Government today.

In the partisan and political forum of the House of Commons I am not going to rely on quoting my colleagues with respect to what has happened in the Liberal Party. I am going to go directly to the fount. I am going to refer to the executive of the Liberal Party of Canada. It had a commission established under the president, Iona Campagnolo. The commission's mandate was to examine some of the problems the Liberal Party has been experiencing in the country and its lack of support across the country. That commission was established under Gordon Gibson, a British Columbia Liberal. It was established as a result of resolutions passed at the 1982 Liberal convention.

I do not know if the name Alfred Apps strikes a responsive chord. Alfred Apps is the president of the Young Liberal Association. He is the man who brought forward a resolution at the national Liberal convention which, in effect, slammed the Liberal Party. This resolution was given overwhelming support by the rank and file of the Liberal Party. The resolution condemned powerful backroom, non-accountable, non-legitimate, non-elected members of the Liberal Party for manipulative electoral sham and for the polls, propaganda and patronage orchestrated by a small elite. According to journalist Terrance Wills of the Gazette, this attack was aimed at the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), Senator Keith Davey, his guru of strategy, Jim Coutts, the Prime Minister's principal secretary and others with informal roles in advising the Government, which totally bypassed the democratically accountable executive of the Party.

This commission came down with some very interesting conclusions and suggestions. Among other things it said:

> Some believe the price the party has paid for being so long in power has been the loss of its idealism.

It also said:

> Answers have not yet been found to our serious weakness in western Canada.

I am going to deal with that. The commission went on to say:

> The national party is out of touch with Parliamentary caucus. Given the quality of advice from the national party, an MP has to be a saint, or an aspiring leadership candidate to pay much attention to the national party.

These are not the words of political opponents of the Liberal Government of the country. These are the words of a commission established by the president of the Liberal Party. These are words of resolutions passed overwhelmingly by the rank and file of the Liberal Party. People across this country, including Liberals, have had it up to their teeth with the attitude with respect to job creation and the operation of the public affairs of our country. This attitude has reduced the significance of Parliament and the parliamentary caucus to a group of mere yesmen, and centered all the activity in the Prime Minister's Office on the non-elected, non-accountable officials whom I have mentioned. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that is precisely what is at the bottom of the problem at a time when we face unprecedented unemployment of 11.2 per cent in our country.

• (1400)

Mr. Speaker: It being two o'clock p.m. the House will now proceed to statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 21.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

AUTOMOBILE EMISSION STANDARDS

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Michael Perley of the Canadian Coalition on Acid Rain has mentioned in discussions that Michael Walsh, who was with the Environmental Protection Agency in the United States under the Carter administration, was instrumental in having stricter automobile emission legislation put through.

Though there have been announcements in this respect, I wonder whether the Minister of the Environment or the Minister of Transport are planning an announcement that there will be no change in the automobile emission standards in Canada until the 1990 models come out.

Considering that the cars assembled here in Canada are shipped to the U.S. with emission reduction gear, why is the Government reluctant to do the same here, and why not the 1986 model year? I wonder whether the Ministers responsible have had any consultations with the automobile manufacturers on the basis that leaded gasoline will be reduced and that this will suffice.

OLYMPIC GAMES

A GOLD MEDAL FOR CANADA

Mr. Dennis Dawson (Louis-Hébert): Mr. Speaker, as you probably know, this morning Gaétan Boucher won a gold medal for Canada for speed skating, his second medal in two days.

Mr. Speaker, I am aware that Standing Order 21 does not provide for extending congratulations, and it is not my intention to go against the Standing Order.

Nevertheless, I would like to point out that the gold and silver medals were won despite the fact that Canada offers this sport only marginal support. In fact, the Canadian speed skating team has to go abroad to train on artificial ice, since there are no facilities in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to bring the following to the attention of Canadians and this House. As you know, the next Olympic Games will be held in Calgary, here in Canada, and western Canada will therefore have the facilities required to train speed skaters on an artificial rink. I think it is high time eastern Canada was provided with a speed skating rink, considering the fact that Canada's speed skating team at the Olympic Games in Sarajevo consists of seven skaters, all from the Province of Quebec.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that Gaétan Boucher and all the athletes representing us at the Games in Sarajevo are an inspiration for young Canadians who also hope one day to make their country proud of their achievements.

VIA RAIL

PASSENGER SERVICE DELAYS

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, since I had so little time in committee last week, and since the situation is so serious, I intend, over the next few days or weeks, to set out by way of statements under this Standing Order some of my concerns over the operation of VIA Rail.

Despite advertisements to the contrary, there is no longer any fun in travelling by train in Canada. Of some 36 trains I checked on Boxing Day, not one was on time. Granted, 10 of them averaged only 30 minutes late, but the balance of them ranged from one and a half hours late to four and a half hours late, and one did not leave at all. It was replaced by buses.

Four trains were fully loaded long before they reached their destinations, and the treatment accorded passengers was less than satisfactory. Hundreds were turned away.

Another holiday period, January 2 this year, was almost as bad. Although one train was actually on time, the balance ranged as late as three hours.

I realize this was a holiday period, but in the past there was always an effort to serve. That effort no longer exists. VIA Rail and its management are not serving Canadians as they should.

BILINGUALISM

RECOGNITION OF FRENCH IN MANITOBA

Mr. Jean-Guy Dubois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I read in Friday's Quorum an article that appeared in The Gazette on February 10, 1984. The title was in English, and I quote:

[English]

Two MPs start legal fund to fight French rights Bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I am going to quote from the Canadian Press text I have here in French, which reads as follows:

A Progressive Conservative Member for Manitoba declared Thursday that the Manitoba Bill on French rights which received the support of federal Progressive Conservatives was a socialist attempt to irreversibly destroy the provincial fabric of peace and harmony.

The Member in question was, of course, the Member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie).

Mr. Speaker, I wish to protest against the attitude taken by two Progressive Conservative Members after the House adopted a resolution on this matter. The other Member mentioned in the article in The Gazette is the Member for Simcoe-South (Mr. Stewart) who is here in the House this afternoon, and speaking of French rights, I remember that during the debate on the Constitution, the Member for Simcoe-South said that the only official language we should have in this country was English. When I see these two Members completely ignoring Canadian realities and the status of Francophones in this country, I find this so shameful, Mr. Speaker, that I cannot do otherwise but rise and ask the Leader of the Progressive Conservative Party to expel these two Members, and so when the Leader of the Progressive Conservative Party tells us that his Party has paid its debt to Francophones in Manitoba since the Riel affair, I find this situation absolutely shameful, Mr. Speaker, and I find it outrageous that the Leader of the Progressive Conservative Party says in Quebec that he wants to defend the rights of Francophones, when two of his own Party Members are not even capable of following his lead on French rights in Manitoba and this is going to lead to a blood feud between Manitobans, especially against Francophones.

Mr. Speaker, I think that is shameful, and I would ask the Leader of the Progressive Conservative Party to take disciplinary measures against those two Members.

NUCLEAR ARMAMENTS

TESTING OF CRUISE MISSILES PRIOR TO SUPREME COURT DECISION

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Mr. Speaker, I am appalled at the contempt the Government has shown for Parliament and for the courts in its haste to begin Cruise missile testing in Canada.

The Supreme Court of Canada today is hearing the challenge to the Cruise missile testing decision under Section 7 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. But even before the Court had an opportunity to hear the case, the Minister of National Defence told the press that the Cruise missile tests would begin in the next few weeks even if the Supreme Court had not finished dealing with the legal challenge.

That is not the first time the Government has shown its arrogance and contempt on this issue. In December, 1981, the Cabinet agreed in principle to allow Cruise missiles to be tested here. But even after these plans became public knowledge, the Government refused to launch a debate on the issue. On a number of occasions it refused the requests from Members of this House for a free vote. Then, Mr. Speaker, even though the Government had not exempted the Cruise testing from a legal challenge under the Charter of Rights, when the legal challenge was launched the Government tried to have it thrown out of court by arguing that the courts had no right to deal with Cabinet decisions on matters of defence and national security.

All we can say, Mr. Speaker, is that the Members opposite should hang their heads in shame for the contempt the Government has shown for Parliament and the courts in this matter.

BILINGUALISM

ATTITUDE OF LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

Mr. Gaston Gourde (Lévis): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This morning, the newspaper La Presse showed quite clearly, I believe, that the Leader of the Opposition was over-optimistic in supporting the French fact in Manitoba. Last fall, he declared he had paid off the Progressive Conservative century-old debt to bilingualism. He has done nothing at all except confuse the issue even more, in an incredible situation where we have a spineless Leader and Members who thumb their noses at his gesture, stating that his token support for bilingualism is a pious wish and nothing more.

But where is the Leader of the Opposition who stated in an article in the newspaper Le Droit on June 13 of last year that he was the one who would determine the Party's main policy and that he would not tolerate any dissent? The House will recall that Robert Stanfield, a former leader of the Progressive Conservative Party, refused to ratify the nomination of Leonard Jones, ex-mayor of Moncton, as a candidate in the general election because of the position he took against bilingualism.

Where is the Leader of the Opposition when the Members for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie) and Simcoe-South (Mr. Stewart) contradict his views on bilingualism? Could he today at least try to follow Mr. Stanfield's example and immediately order these two dissidents to leave the Party or to resign their seat, on such a fundamental issue? Francophones throughout Canada are waiting for the Progressive Conservative Leader to take action.

THE PAPACY

IMPENDING PAPAL VISIT TO CANADIAN MARTYRS SHRINE AT MIDLAND, ONT.

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, Simcoe North and the Midland-Penetanguishene area in particular are extremely pleased and honoured that His Holiness Pope John Paul II will be visiting the Martyrs Shrine and Sainte-Marie among the Hurons during his visit to Canada. Six of North America's eight martyred saints were missionaries at Sainte-Marie. The Martyrs Shrine is of significant religious and historical importance because it is dedicated to those first canonized saints.

Under the capable direction of Father James Farrell a large, dedicated group of local volunteers is working very hard to ensure that the Pope's visit to the area is a success. They are faced with the difficult task of preparing for the attendance in the area of hundreds of thousands of people who want to see the Pope. It is therefore obvious, Mr. Speaker, that the Pope's visit to the Midland-Penetanguishene area carries its own significance and importance separate from his visit to Toronto.

Today I was quite distressed to note that some of the national media are treating the Pope's visit to Midland as merely a small part of his Toronto visit. On behalf of the residents of Simcoe North, and especially the thousands of people who will work many hours to make the Midland trip a success, I encourage the media to treat this visit as an entity separate from the Toronto visit.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW AGENCY

CALL FOR ABOLITION OR CHANGE IN FUNCTION

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, it was a privilege for me recently to attend the Davos, Switzerland, Conference on World Economic Recovery and Security. Many issues were discussed. It became obvious that all nations were seeking international capital investment, both the equity and debt type, and were removing deterrents to such investments.

In Canada FIRA was, and is, a deterrent to foreign capital investment. Although it has been significantly restructured, it still remains as a massive psychological deterrent to foreign capital investment in Canada. The Agency should have its name changed, and it should be directing all of its efforts to encouraging foreign investment in selected key sectors of the Canadian economy. It should be made an asset rather than a liability to economic recovery in Canada. It was established in 1973, and has accomplished its task reducing foreign control of the private sector from 33 per cent to 26 per cent in 10 years. Today it is approving 95 per cent of the applications before it, and rejecting only 5 per cent, but psychologically it is still a major deterrent and nuisance. Let us get rid of it, or change its function and its name. Canada needs foreign investment—

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member's time has expired.

OLYMPIC GAMES

TRIBUTE TO CANADIAN ATHLETE, GAÉTAN BOUCHER

Mr. Raymond Dupont (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a statement under the provisions of Standing Order 21 and call the attention of the Members of this House to an important event which has just occurred at the Olympic Games in Sarajevo.

Mr. Gaétan Boucher, who represents Canada in the sport speedskating competitions, has won a first gold medal in the 1,000 metre race. He also won a bronze medal a few days ago in the 500-metre event.

This honour which is reflected on all of us is very typical of Gaétan Boucher, who is the first Canadian to win a gold medal in this form of sport. Needless to say, as Canadians we are all very proud of Gaétan Boucher's performance especially the people of Saint-Hubert where he resides. Quite recently, just a few months ago, the Gaétan Boucher Arena was built in Saint-Hubert to underline the sportsmanship of this athlete and the great things he is doing for amateur sports.

I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that I am personally very happy about this young athlete's achievement and I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate him.

TOURISM

EFFECT OF TAXATION

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, on February 3 a Canadian, now residing in Florida, had his letter to The Toronto Star published. It, in great detail, described one of the key reasons the tourism industry in Canada continues to struggle. Due to government taxation, a gallon of gasoline sells for $2.30 in Windsor, Ontario, and just across the border it sells for $1.40 Canadian. This is a 65 per cent difference. Motel accommodation in Canada is almost double the cost just across the border. Alcoholic beverages in the United States are allowed to be sold competitively and are not taxed at an 80 per cent level, as they are here. Anyone who has ever been across the border also knows that restaurant meals and groceries sell for about half of what they do in Canada.

It is of vital importance that the Government realize that advertising campaigns and promotions, and even a bonus on the U.S. dollar, cannot undo the damage done by the Government's taxation policies. They are driving away both U.S. and Canadian tourists and ruining the tourism industry in Canada.

VIA RAIL

CALL FOR REOPENING OF EDMONTON-VANCOUVER SERVICE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, recently the Minister of Transport (Mr. Axworthy) recognized that an important link in the Via Rail network across Canada was that between Winnipeg and Edmonton, and announced the reopening of that particular portion. What is yet to be reopened, of course, is the link between Edmonton, Jasper, the North Thompson Valley, and the City of Vancouver, linking together one of the most important scenic potentials in western Canada. Unquestionably, Mr. Speaker, this has great tourist potential. It provides the ability to travel through one of the most spectacular parts of the world when it comes to natural beauty and pristine natural environments.

Considering Expo 86 is in the offing, and that 12 to 18 months of pre-planning are required in order to organize overseas tour packages, on behalf of the New Democratic Party I would urge the Minister of Transport to reopen the part of the Via western network linking the City of Edmonton with the City of Vancouver in order to allow the proper development, not only of the tourist potential of the western cordillera, but also to provide much needed services for the North Thompson Valley by the Via Rail system.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

EMPLOYMENT

SPECIAL EMPLOYMENT INITIATIVES PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR LIST OF APPROVED PROJECTS

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the fast tracking Minister of Employment and Immigration who, I suspect, was suffering from a little jet lag yesterday, which is the only way to explain some of the incredible statements he made in this House. Given the fact that on January 21, 1983, in reply to a question by my colleague, the Hon. Member for Rosedale, the then Minister of Economic Development indicated that 400 projects had been approved under the Special Employment Initiatives Program, and given the fact that in November of last year, in the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration, we were told that 844 programs had been approved under this Special Employment Initiatives Program for a cost of $138 million, can the Minister tell the House why he is not able to make that list available to the House? Could it be that it has been laundered in the back rooms of the Prime Minister's Office?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the second part of the Hon. Member's question is no. The answer to the first part of his question is that the request was put to us in terms of a list on a constituency by constituency basis. That was not the basis on which projects were approved and it, therefore, takes a considerable amount of time to compile. As I told the Hon. Members in the House yesterday, I will endeavour to have that list before the House as quickly as possible—I expect by next Monday, perhaps a little earlier, if I am able.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, would the Minister make available to the House the unexpurgated list which was referred to last November? We will figure out the constituencies.

REGIONAL MINISTERIAL INPUT

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I would like to ask the Minister, Mr. Speaker, why is it that this program only has input from regional Ministers, whereas the other four streams have input not only from Ministers and Members of Parliament, but from the public? Can the Minister tell us what the difference is between the Special Employment Initiatives Program, which is supposed to be fast tracking, which has no public input, which has only input from regional Ministers, and the other four streams of his employment initiatives?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there are several questions posed. The answer to the first one is that the list will not be an expurgated list. The list will not only be the one he asked for but one which is brought up as close to date as possible.

The answer to the second part of the Hon. Member's question is that the projects are suggested not only by regional Ministers, but are suggested by Departments, by Members of Parliament, by municipalities, and by a variety of agencies. No one is precluded from making suggestions as to projects which should be funded.

LISTING OF PROJECTS

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, it is important that the Minister come clean with this House because his credibility is at stake. The whole concept of accountability is at stake here. We are talking about $300 million of public money which this Government has not accounted for to this House. I ask the Minister, whose credibility is on the line—he has already told us that $288 million of this $300 million has been spent—he has told us that there have been 844 projects approved—why is it that he will not release to this House, and to the public of Canada, the projects which have been approved. What is he trying to hide?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am not trying to hide anything. As I indicated to the House yesterday, I am going to provide the list of projects—

An Hon. Member: When?

Mr. Roberts: If the Hon. Member who asks when had been in the House yesterday he would have remembered that I said I would try to provide it by Monday next, and perhaps even earlier than that, if I am able to do so. I remind the hon. gentleman who has posed the question that it is not only my credibility at stake. He reminds me a little of Queen Marie of Austria of whom it was said, "She cried and cried, and took and took." On one hand, the Hon. Member is now decrying this program to me in the House. On the other hand, he sent me a letter yesterday asking me to fund projects in his riding under that program.

GRANT TO COVENANT HOUSE, IN TORONTO

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. As the Minister may know, on December 8, 1983, the Liberal Member for York South-Weston announced in a press release that there was a grant of $230,000 to go to Covenant House in downtown Toronto, in the riding of Rosedale. Apparently she had, on behalf of the Minister, negotiated that grant during the months of October and November. At the same time I was negotiating with the Minister's own officials for 32 projects in my riding. I can assure the Minister that during all of that time neither I nor his officials—I checked this morning—knew of the fund the Minister is now talking about.

• (1420)

In short, behind my back, while I was negotiating for 32 projects in my own riding, the Liberal Member for York South-Weston, on behalf of the Minister, was able to negotiate a $230,000 grant. Does the Minister think that is an honest, fair process? Is that what he thinks this democracy is about?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is no. I had not remembered that announcement. I think that I probably would be glad it was made. Is the Hon. Member suggesting he would prefer not to have that project take place in his constituency? If the Hon. Member is suggesting that because he has projects which he wishes to pursue, and which he is properly discussing with civil servants, then every other Member of Parliament is precluded from talking about projects which will take place in Toronto, then I think he is demanding for himself a role of veto inappropriate to his position as a Member of Parliament.

ROLE OF OFFICIALS

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, if the Minister wants to call his own officials in Toronto, as I did this morning, he will find out it was not only me and other Members of this House but his own officials in Toronto, all three of them, who deal with all job creation projects, were unaware of the fund the Minister and his Liberal friends in caucus were able to get. In short, what the Minister has done is totally circumvent any public accountability or process. There were 32 projects which were very important in my riding, and the same applies to other ridings. You do not have to know—you should not have to know—a Minister of the Crown in order to get a job grant.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member who posed the question is, I believe, a very serious and responsible Member of Parliament; therefore I take his allegation seriously. I would say that I would be very surprised if I found on verification the facts which he has given to the House are not that entirely accurate, but I will pay him the respect of trying to ensure whether his version is indeed entirely accurate.

SPECIAL RECOVERY CAPITAL PROJECTS PROGRAM—AMOUNT OF EXPENDITURES

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I want to shift attention to the Special Recovery Capital Projects. In his Budget last year the Minister of Finance indicated that the recovery program was going to be led by these projects. Yesterday he indicated the Government's priority was to fast track these projects to make sure they provide maximum benefits to Canadians. Can the Minister explain to the House, given the intent to fast track these projects, why a confidential report from his Department indicates that, of the $625 million set aside for those projects, only $396 million has been spent to date? Why has it taken so long to get these projects under way when so many Canadians are hard pressed?

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the projects have in fact gone forward at an accelerated pace. Some 232 projects with a total cost of $1.96 billion, some 81 per cent of the total $2.4 billion program, will have been started by February 28 of this year. There have, of course, been variations from region to region and from project to project, but I would be glad to provide the Hon. Member opposite with full information about the current status of the projects.

USE OF UNEXPENDED FUNDS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, considering that only $396 million of the $625 million allocated for the fast tracking of Special Recovery Capital Projects has been spent, a little over half, would the Minister of Employment confirm to this House that this money not spent will not appear in tomorrow's Budget as new additional job creation funds?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member addresses his question to me, but the Special Recovery Capital Projects are under the direction of my colleague, the Minister of State for Economic Development. In so far as his reference to what may or may not be in the Budget tomorrow is concerned, he will simply have to wait and see what takes place tomorrow.

NUMBER OF JOBS CREATED

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the same Minister a very serious question. We are seeing a lot of money moving, so called, into the constituencies of Canada, it seems a great deal more into Liberal constituencies, but a lot of constituents are asking how much are we getting for this investment. How much are we getting for the $500,000 going into that Toronto riding? Has the Minister put into place something to ensure that the moneys spent on job creation are accountable? In other words, has there been some indication of the number of jobs created as a result of these investments?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is making an assumption, and I would like to try to clarify the first part of his question. The only programs based on a constituency allocation are one component of the Canada Works Program and also a component of the Summer Canada Program. As I think we have tried to make clear repeatedly, the special employment funds on which Members have been commenting in the last few days are not allocated on a constituency by constituency basis.

Mr. Nielsen: Grit by Grit.

Mr. Roberts: As to the evaluation of the programs, it is true that in a general way we do try to analyse what the job impacts are. That can be more or less easy or harder to do depending upon the spin-off effects and the nature of the projects.

BUDGET EXPENDITURE TARGET

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the same Minister, and has to do with the Special Recovery Capital Projects Program announced by the Minister of Finance in last year's Budget. In that budget statement the Minister said "earth will be moved, steel will be rigged, and concrete will be poured". It is reported today that the 121 projects were divided into 283 subprojects and work had begun on only 13 by September. Only $388 million is going to be spent this year out of $725 million allocated.

In view of these facts would the Minister tell the House how anyone can be expected to believe anything in a Budget any longer when the last Budget said $725 million would be spent and only $388 million is spent? It is not steel that is going to be rigged, it is the truth that is going to be rigged. Will the Minister explain how he rigged the truth, and what will be the truth tomorrow? Can we believe a word in that Budget tomorrow about employment related projects?

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the last question is yes, the Member can believe what is in tomorrow's Budget. The answer to the first question I gave earlier. I cited the 232 projects with a total cost of approximately $1.96 billion which will have been started by February 28. The projects are under way, the concrete is being poured, the steel is being erected, and the capital projects are going forward in the way foreseen in the April Budget.

PREPARATION OF ESTIMATES

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary will not be to the Minister in charge of rigging; I will send it to the Minister of State for Finance. The official in charge of communications for this project, Robert Irvine, is quoted today as saying that federal spending projections were very rough at budget time last year. He goes on to say that $100 million was added to this fund as a result of the leaking of the Minister of Finance last year when he brought down the Budget. He says the Government has not yet figured how to spend that money.

Will the Minister tell this House how we can believe one word in the Budget tomorrow? How can we believe the Government when it says it is going to spend more on employment projects? How can we not believe the money that was not spent this year is being recycled? Can the Minister tell the House how he and his Government have any credibility left at all? Their reputation for honesty and competence is completely gone.

• (1430)

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the information is readily available to the Member opposite if he would take the trouble to inform himself. There is a document issued by the Special Recovery Capital Projects Board. It is a periodic status report up-date. The last one was issued on February 2. The Member opposite will find all the information that he requires in that document.

If that is not sufficient, the Special Recovery Capital Projects master list which is up-dated every so often, the last one being issued in November, sets forth in great detail the current status and the spending on each of the accelerated projects.

SPECIAL EMPLOYMENT INITIATIVES PROGRAM—PRODUCTION OF PROJECTS LIST

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I want to pursue the cover-up that the Minister of Employment and Immigration has been having with regard to the Special Employment Initiatives Program. I want to ask him why it was—

Mr. Dingwall: Sit down.

Miss MacDonald: There are Liberal Members who are shouting "sit down".

Mr. Dingwall: You do not make sense.

Miss MacDonald: The reason is that they do not want to hear what it is that is coming out of their program.

On November 24 last, in committee, the Minister's officials said that they were able to provide the list of projects by province and give it to members of the committee. It was confirmed by the chairman of the committee that that information would be available. Why were the officials able to provide that list the day after, and the Minister has muzzled them for three months since that time? Why has he held up that information?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it really does seem bizarre for the Hon. Member to be accusing me of a cover-up. Last week in the House, as I have seen from reading Hansard, and if I remember correctly, she and her colleague, the Hon. Member for Rosedale, were asking for me to table the list and give them this information. That is exactly what I have agreed to do. I do not know how I can be accused of covering up when I have decided to do exactly what it is that they have asked me to do in the House.

The information for which she has asked will be provided to her in as updated fashion as possible, and as clearly as possible. I gave my commitment to the House, which I take very seriously, that I will do that by early next week.

Miss MacDonald: The procrastination of the Government in everything that it undertakes is evident in the way it has refused to produce this list. It has taken three months to do, or even to face up to something that could have been done in three days.

NOTIFICATION OF PROGRAM CRITERIA

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have one further question for the Minister concerning this program. On November 29 the Minister said to Members of the House in committee:

> There is really only one thing I can say to you: When you receive the criteria, if you believe there are some useful projects in your area which would meet the criteria, you send me the suggestions and I will consider them.

"When we receive the criteria". Why did he hold the criteria up for three months?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I explained to Members in the House yesterday, and I say it with some regret since I wish the criteria had been provided more quickly to Hon. Members, that when I asked for the criteria to be prepared I did not feel that it was put forward in a fashion which would make it easy for Members opposite to understand what the criteria were. I emphasized in the committee that the criteria were supple, flexible, and wide-ranging. All of that was presented in the committee.

The revised exposition of the criteria was available for me when we returned from our Christmas break, and fairly soon after that it was presented to Members of the House. I regret the delay, and if one wants to accuse me of being fallible from that point of view, I accept that criticism. It was not with any intention of depriving Members of the Opposition, and certainly not muzzling my civil servants.

Indeed, since we have received some suggestions and proposals from Members opposite, I think there is some evidence that they do not feel they were deprived of an ability to make suggestions for projects to be funded under the scheme because they did not have as precise details as they would have wished.

NATIONAL REVENUE

REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO VANCOUVER OFFICE PRACTICES

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. Last week I revealed that in the Vancouver Regional Office of Taxation Canada quotas have been in existence for some time, and senior staff in the Regional Office of Taxation in Vancouver literally attempted to cover up the evidence of such quotas by using typewriter white-out fluid on all internal memoranda which referred to these quotas.

In view of the fact that the Regional Director of Taxation has obviously misled the public in the Vancouver area with respect to the existence of quotas, and the circumstances of this cover-up, by using white-out typewriter fluid, will the Minister explain to the House the sequence of events in this incredible situation? Would he order an independent inquiry into the circumstances which led to this? In view of the actions of the Regional Director in misleading the public, will he suspend the Regional Director pending the outcome of that internal inquiry?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I must say that I was astonished at the comments the Hon. Member made to the press after that incident. I thought he was quite concerned and I maintain that he is probably one of the most concerned Members when it comes to individual rights. Yet I was surprised to hear him accuse, judge and condemn—as he has just done—the Director of the Vancouver Regional Office who, I believe, has offered an explanation concerning that situation.

I should like to remind the Hon. Member that the matter of quotas has been explained in the House on several occasions, particularly as it relates to auditing within the Department. I did indicate that instructions had been given to our auditors not to apply such quotas and that the policy had been implemented in regional offices. As to other forms of performance or production objectives for other staff in district offices, I said as well that those performance objectives had to be followed and indeed were being followed, while taking into consideration the nature of various duties and well-known management practices.

[English]

JOB DESCRIPTION REFERENCE TO WORK QUOTAS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, once again the Minister denies the existence of quotas and refers to performance objectives. How can the Minister explain the content of a confidential international memorandum which was in fact issued by his own Department's senior staff and is in effect right across Canada? It is a job description for a collections unit head, and states that one of the functions is to "establish work quotas for each function". How can the Minister continue to deny the existence of quotas when his own Department issues a job description which states that one of the functions of unit heads is to make sure that these very quotas are in fact met?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I would rather not get into an argument with the Hon. Member, but I wish he would keep in mind that it is not the policy of the Department to expect its senior auditors to fill quotas. The Hon. Member is referring to a document dealing with something which has nothing to do with auditing. I am talking about auditing which, by its very nature, leaves no room for such quotas, and the production or performance objectives must be set on the basis of other factors. As to the other sectors, the practices concerning the setting of performance objectives are so designed as to comply with the very nature of the operations carried out by the various sections.

EMPLOYMENT

EXPENDITURE OF JOB-CREATION FUNDS

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. It relates to this corrupt perversion by the Government and the Cabinet of moneys that should be used for job creation in our country. I want to say to the Minister that it is a matter of morality in Government, and is being perceived as such by the people of Canada. Do not take my word for it; look at the resolution passed by the Liberal Party in full conference, which talked about the manipulative tactics of a small elite of the Liberal Cabinet in Government.

• (1440)

How can the Minister justify this slap-dash, haphazard kind of expenditure of an enormous amount of money with respect to these projects, when in fact a very substantial part of Canada has been ignored concerning the expenditure of moneys under the various programs? How can the Minister justify that in a free and democratic society?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would say to the hon. gentleman, first and most sincerely, that no one on this side of the House has to take lessons in morality from that Hon. Member.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roberts: The second thing I would say to the Hon. Member is that if he were in the House and were listening, he would understand the explanation for the structure which we have established, which is to cut through red tape in bureaucracy and to try to create jobs as quickly as possible through this supplementary program. That is its purpose, and I believe that has been effective.

Oral Questions

UNSPENT BALANCE OF FUNDS

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Mr. Speaker, to get some idea of the enormity of the amount of money these fellows are giving away to their friends, I want to point out that the $300 million is equal to the Career Access Program to be used for employment opportunities for the young people of our country.

What money is the Minister now going to direct that has not now been spent? What amount does he now have that is available for the rest of the country and the rest of the Members of Parliament? Can the Minister be specific as to how much remains? What crumbs are there left for the rest of the people of Canada after he has dealt with his Liberal friends?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the funds that have been expended under this program have gone to a whole variety of groups, including municipalities, environmental organizations, church groups, and ethnic communities. I do not consider it an insult to have these people characterized as friends.

Mr. Nielsen: Grits.

Mr. Roberts: If the hon. gentleman is inferring that somehow these are political affiliates in some partisan sense, then he is insulting a whole variety of important and credible communities all across this country. He will regret those words.

The second part of the question, if he has asked how much more funding is available—

Mr. Epp: Are you suggesting an election?

An Hon. Member: The Opposition does not want an answer.

Mr. Roberts: The answer to the second part of the Hon. Member's question about how much funding is still available under this program is that there is somewhere roughly around $90 million, I believe, that has yet to be allocated.

COVENANT HOUSE—NEGOTIATION OF GRANT

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the person who negotiated on behalf of the Government the grant to Covenant House. I would therefore like to ask the Member for York South-Weston who authorized that Member to negotiate on behalf of the Government?

Mr. Speaker: With all due respect to the Right Hon. Member, a question can be directed to a Minister, a Parliamentary Secretary, or a chairman of a committee. Individual Members cannot answer. I regret to tell the Right Hon. Member that.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, we, therefore, have a situation where an individual Liberal Member of Parliament can go out and negotiate on behalf of the Government but cannot be held accountable in this House of Commons to answer as to the program.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: They destroy the system, and they applaud it. They are sick.

AUTHORIZATION FOR NEGOTIATION OF PROJECT

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, let me ask the Minister of Employment and Immigration my question. Who authorized the Hon. Member for York South-Weston—who gave her authority to negotiate a project in a constituency other than her own? Was it the Minister himself? Was it Senator Keith Davey? Was it an integral part of the Liberals' campaign for re-election? Do you need to know the Minister's private telephone number? Do you need to carry a card in the Liberal Party of Canada if you are going to be eligible for grants that are expenditures of public money designed to help all of the people of this country?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is really good to see the former Leader of the Opposition in such fine fettle and to see him so applauded by his backbenchers.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roberts: Many of them must wish he were back in his old place.

The question of the Right Hon. Member is really claptrap. To suggest that no Member of Parliament should discuss with any group what possibilities there are of receiving funding under an existing government program is extraordinary.

Mr. McGrath: In somebody else's riding?

Mr. Roberts: Of course Members of Parliament on this side and Members of Parliament on that side discuss, time in and time out, time immemorial, various possibilities that groups might have of taking advantage, quite properly, of government programs. The right hon. gentleman is concerned about not having sufficient access. I will send him my telephone number. I will be happy to talk to him anytime he wants.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, what is at issue here is accountability, which is the core of this parliamentary system.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): I have already had the Member for Niagara Falls, my twin, out in my constituency trying to find clients for a program which the Member of Parliament for Yellowhead was not told about.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Let me come back—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Right Hon. Member for Yellowhead has the floor.

AUTHORIZATION OF ACTION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. It is the question I asked him before. Who authorized the Member for York South-Weston to negotiate on behalf of the Government of Canada the distribution of funds designed to bring credit to the Liberal Party in a constituency that was not her own? It is a simple question. Did the Minister authorize it? Did Senator Davey authorize it? Did Jim Coutts, who has had $1 million spent in his riding without, I would judge, agreement or consultation with the Member for Spadina—

Mr. Andre: It is the porkbarrel. It gets so greasy it is slimey.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Who authorized the Member to negotiate that spending?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, just because the right hon. gentleman is having difficulty bringing forward clients to take advantage of government programs is no reason to preclude any other Member of Parliament, including the Member for Niagara Falls, from trying to fill in that vacuum. The short answer to the right hon. gentleman is, as he should know—

Miss MacDonald: Why are so many turned down?

Mr. Roberts: —that any Member of Parliament, indeed any citizen, can discuss with a variety of groups, any range of groups, how they might take advantage of government programs.

The negotiation, if you like, the signature of the contracts with the various groups that are concerned—a negotiation in that sense—is in the hands of my officials. There is no restraint on any Member of Parliament in talking about the possible advantages of programs and how they might be used. I invite members of the Opposition to do the same. It would be interesting to get some valuable projects suggested from them as to what we should do.

Mr. Crombie: Thirty-two projects, John.

Oral Questions

HAZARDOUS PRODUCTS

BABY BOTTLE NIPPLES

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South-Weston): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I refer to an article in the December 26 edition of The Toronto Star concerning a United States report of carcinogenous substances in baby bottle nipples.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Appolloni: It is not funny, Mr. Speaker.

In view of recent United States regulations on nitrosamine levels in baby bottle nipples and pacifiers, does the Minister intend to take action in Canada with respect to these products?

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, yes, as a precautionary measure I will be introducing regulations as soon as possible to spell out the maximum levels of nitrosamine levels in baby bottle nipples and pacifiers. It is a matter of some urgency. I would ask Members of this House to take this matter rather seriously. There is proof that it is a carcinogenic material as a result of tests with animals. The measures I am introducing include two levels of reductions. We will, for the period remaining of this year ask that these products contain 30 parts per billion of nitrosamines which will be reduced to 10 parts per billion by January 1, 1985.

• (1450)

I would hasten to reassure all parents in Canada that the products tested by my Department at this stage show that 75 per cent of them have levels of no detection or of lower than the 30 parts per billion. I want to reassure the parents of the country that most of the products they are using are indeed safe. We are releasing a list of the products which have been tested, and the levels indicated. In parting I would like to add—

Some Hon. Members: Order.

Mrs. Erola: —that this is obviously a case once again of the fact that there is really no substitute for the real thing.

NATIONAL REVENUE

REQUEST FOR MORATORIUM ON PROSECUTIONS

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. He will be aware of the Paul Graham case wherein Mr. Graham won his case under Section 31, in the Federal Court last fall, only to have the Minister then proceed to the Supreme Court of Canada with an appeal.

It has come to my attention recently that a judge in the tax court in Saskatchewan has thrown out a case in which Mr.

Neil Nikolaisen was appealing a reassessment under Section 31, and used the Graham case as a precedent. Because the whole matter concerning Section 31 is in such a mess as far as the courts are concerned, why will the Minister not call a moratorium on all Section 31 cases until the matter is at least cleared up in the courts?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I was not aware of the second court judgment mentioned by the Hon. Member. However, I wish to emphasize that I am concerned about the application of Section 31 with respect to those cases which it does not cover, because, as the Hon. Member knows, generally speaking, Section 31 covers only two categories and the problem lies with the third category, for which there are no specific instructions. I shall examine this second case he has brought to my attention.

On the other hand, I wish to remind him that we have decided actually to appeal the ruling in the Graham case because of the implication it could have in interpreting the Income Tax Act. However, I should underline to the Hon. Member and all the Members of this House that I am concerned about the interpretation of this Section and the audit practices, especially when losses are disallowed where a farming operation does not meet the test of a possible or probable profit.

[English]

Mr. Greenaway: I hope this issue will be addressed in the Budget, because it will not go away. We on this side of the House will continue to raise it until some relief is brought to many farmers across the country who are suffering under the heavy and hard hand of the Minister's Department.

SEIZURE OF TAX APPELLANTS' BANK ACCOUNTS

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same Minister. Is it legal under the laws of Canda to garnishee bank accounts and to use third party demands to collect funds from taxpayers who are appealing their reassessments?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I have already answered the Hon. Member many times. I do not recall which Section of the Income Tax Act deals with this matter, but it is clearly stated therein that, even if there is an appeal or an objection to an assessment notice, the Minister must collect the amounts which have been assessed.

[English]

EMPLOYMENT

GRANT TO ALLIANCE COMMUNITY SERVICES, TORONTO

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I have before me the letters patent of last February of the Canadian Alliance for Italian Integration and Culture, the discussion paper of the Liberal Party of last summer asking for a storefront operation for the Liberal party, the application of this society for a storefront office, and finally the grant of $583,000 to this group of prominent Liberals.

As the Minister of his Department, as the political Minister for Metropolitan Toronto, and as one who hopes perhaps to serve in a leadership capacity some day, when did he first find out about the Liberal connection with this particular grant and the opposition from the social services community in Metropolitan Toronto?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. gentleman for having sent me some of this information before Question Period. Unfortunately the background documents which were to have been attached to his letter were not there.

Mr. Crosbie: They have been shredded.

Mr. Roberts: I have asked my office to get them from his office, so I have not had a chance to look at all the material which he sent to me.

In relation to the two specific questions which I think he asked, the first being when was I aware of the representations made by the social service agencies, I became aware of those representations when they were made to me, which was after the contract for the grant had been signed. As to the question about the political connections, or the document outlining the political manifesto, or whatever it was, the answer is that I think I received it yesterday after the Hon. Member raised it in the House. It was a document which had been sent to me last week when I was not in the country. I believe my staff requested it when there were some newspaper references to it. But that was the first time I was aware of that document and therefore the alleged political affiliation of all these people in terms of the document which he has mentioned.

Mr. Waddell: The Minister might be interested in knowing that I checked with the Public Service in Toronto and was informed that this grant had the most perfunctory recommendation and that it had opposition to it; there are clearly Liberal connections behind the grant.

REASONS FOR AWARDING GRANT

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, the Minister gave an interview yesterday after my question, to the Toronto Star. He was quoted as saying "that in approving a project and signing it, it was certainly not done on the basis of any connections that the sponsors might or might not have had with any political party".

In view of the opposition by United Way, the opposition of the Social Planning Council of Metropolitan Toronto, and the fact that an organization called COSTI-IIAS has been in the business successfully for 30 years, why did the Minister approve such a duplicitous approach, which is a sell-out of the legitimate unemployed in Canada who have real needs?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, again there are several questions. I thought I made it clear in my first answer that the approval of the project took place before the representations from the various social agencies were received, as he just touched upon in his second question.

There are two other points I would like to make clear. First, groups or people are not precluded from applying for government programs because they have had in the past, or have in the present, some political affiliation. I am sure there are many people of New Democratic persuasion who apply for grants or for contributions. I can assure him that there is not a political determination in the decision making process when I approve or reject a proposal or project, because I do not inquire as to what is the political affiliation of the individuals applying for grants. I think it would be very wrong for me to do so.

I think it would be very wrong for me, for instance, to ask whether a group making a proposal from Toronto is or is not a group of NDP supporters, or whether that group is or is not a group of Conservative supporters. I do not think that is the appropriate question for me to ask in coming to a decision as to whether or not a project should be approved.

Mr. Waddell: What is the appropriate question?

FORESTRY

STATE OF INDUSTRY—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment, with spare-time responsibilities for forestry. Last week the Government published a report once again reaffirming our worst fears, namely, that 15 years of deliberate policy of neglect have produced a situation where the forest industry is now in a state where we see major shutdowns, the lay-off of 60,000 direct employees in that industry, and shutdowns of large centres, regions, and communities, for which there is no other economic base.

What can the Minister tell us today in terms of any contemplation of new policies which would correct this situation, new policies which would put the spending of the Government under his control so that it is channeled into clear national objectives in terms of restoring our depleted forest base and renewing and protecting our forests from future ravages?

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, without wanting to discourage the Hon. Member about my commitments to forestry matters, which are as intense as his, I draw his attention to the fact that the study, as I understand it, is based upon an assumption, namely, that there would be job losses if the renewal of forests does not take place in his province. Therefore the question is: will this take place?

• (1500)

I would like to bring to the attention of the Hon. Member that in the past three years in the Province of British Columbia, and I am quoting now from memory, there has been an investment on the part of the federal Government of $12 million, $42 million and $35 million respectively. We are committed to this renewal policy, but I must remind the Hon. Member that his province as well has to play a major role because it owns most of the lands.

NEGOTIATION OF AGREEMENT WITH PROVINCE OF BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, in September, 1982, the Government announced an expenditure of $130 million. It is realized that the federal Government must assert its responsibility through a federal-provincial agreement. Last week it became apparent that there would not be a renewal of the agreement with British Columbia this year, meaning that there would not be any spending in British Columbia this year of any federal dollars in the area of forest renewal and forest protection. Incidentally, how many other provinces will be deprived of this federal-provincial arrangement? The federal Minister has had a full year to renegotiate this agreement. Why is it he cannot come to terms with his responsibility and assert himself in the manner which is clearly his mandate?

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I encourage the Hon. Member to check with his friends in Victoria, and not to arrive at hasty conclusions before the negotiations have been concluded.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 259, 353 and 365.

NORTHERN TRANSPORTATION COMPANY LIMITED

Question No. 259—Mr. Schellenberger:

1. Does the Northern Transportation Company Limited designate barges for fuel service only and, if so (a) how many are in service (b) what types of fuel do they carry?

2. Do the barges carry deck cargo when not carrying fuel and, if so, are (a) they stripped of their fuel retains (b) the tanks purged prior to use of the deck area for vehicular traffic and storage of deck cargo?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Transport): The Northern Transportation Company Limited advises as follows:

1. The barges in Northern Transportation's operating fleet are all dual purpose, capable of use for dry cargo and petroleum products. They are used for either or both types of cargo depending on the mix of goods to be transported.

The petroleum products carried include various grades of oil including bunker, diesel, leaded motor alkalite, aviation and motor gasoline, leaded and unleaded, and jet fuels.

2. It is current policy and practice that barges which have been in fuel service for highly volatile products and which are subsequently designated for dry cargo, are stripped and gas-freed prior to cargo operations.

DESIGN CANADA

Question No. 353—Mr. St. Germain:

1. For the fiscal year 1982-83 what was the total budget for Design Canada and what was its mandate?

2. In the same year, how many persons were directly employed by the Agency?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister or Regional Industrial Expansion): 1. For the fiscal year 1982-83, the total budget for Design Canada was $1,099,221, including salaries. Its mandate was to promote and expedite improvement of design in products of the Canadian industry.

2. In the same year, 20 persons were directly employed by the Agency.

"BUILDING FOR THE FUTURE: TOWARDS A DISTINCTIVE CBC"

Question No. 365—Mr. St. Germain:

1. With reference to the Department of Communications document entitled "Building for the Future: Towards a Distinctive CBC", what was the total cost of (a) concept and design (b) production and printing (c) distribution?

2. Was a private firm involved in any aspect of the preparation of this document and, if so, what (a) was the name of the firm (b) work was done and at what total cost?

Hon. Francis Fox (Minister of Communications): In so far as the Department of Communications is concerned, the answer to the above question is as follows:

			Cost	Supplier
1.	(a)	Concept, design and finished art ready for printer*	$ 5,924.90*	Wendesigns Ltd.*
	(b)	Typesetting production	$ 4,271.56	Canadian Government Printing Bureau—Jackson Plant
		Printing	$ 45,508.37	Canadian Government Printing Bureau
		French adaption and revision*	$ 4,200.65*	Alphascript Ltd.*
	(c)	Distribution	$ 2,517.19	Canadian Government Publishing Centre
Total			$ 62,422.67

2. Asterisks above denote two private firms, their involvement and their costs.

PRIVILEGE

MR. COOPER—ALLEGED INTIMIDATION BY CANADA POST OFFICIAL

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I rise to make my final remarks regarding the question of privilege I raised in this House on February 6, 1984. I first want to say that I am, of course, not at all surprised that the Minister disputed my facts. However, as the Minister well knows, that has absolutely no bearing on my question of privilege and is absolutely irrelevant to the case. The Minister's opinion is very important and it will be vital during the committee's consideration of this matter, but not until then. The fact is that a phone call was made—and I think we have agreement on that much—a telephone call in which my office was threatened that it should behave or act in a certain way or it would be treated in a certain fashion.

Second, the Minister would say that because I did not take the call to my office personally, what I say is just hearsay. If that is the case, the same must, of course, apply to the Minister's argument that I have no question of privilege. Clearly only a committee, after hearing all of the evidence, can decide what is fact and what is hearsay.

Beauchesne's Fifth Edition, page 114, Citation 322, reads:

It has been formally ruled by Speakers that a statement by a Member respecting himself and particularly within his own knowledge must be accepted—

Therefore, the question of privilege remains valid. Erskine May, Twentieth Edition, page 158, makes the indirect attempt to influence a Member as much a breach of privilege as the direct attempt when it says under the headline "Acts tending indirectly to obstruct Members in the discharge of their duty," and I quote:

Conduct not amounting to a direct attempt to influence a Member in the discharge of his duties, but having a tendency to impair his independence in the future performance of his duty, will also be treated as a breach of privilege.

The definition of "prima facie" as stated in Black's Law Dictionary, Revised Fourth Edition, page 1,353 is as follows:

Prima Facie. Latin. At first sight; on the first appearance; on the face of it; so far as can be judged from the first disclosure;

It is that element of possibility that I believe adds up to a prima facie case of privilege. For clarity, I refer to Erskine May, Nineteenth Edition, page 347:

It has often been laid down that the Speaker's function in ruling on a claim of breach of privilege is limited to deciding the formal question whether the case conforms with conditions which alone entitle it to take precedence of the notices of motions and orders of the day standing on the order paper of public business; and does not extend to deciding the question of substance, whether a breach of privilege has in fact been committed—a question which can only be decided by the House itself.

Clearly it is only the House that can ultimately decide on privilege. Jerome Decisions, page 30, rules when there is a doubt, in other words a possibility, the question should be put to the House. In Hansard for March 27, 1969, page 7182, the Speaker's decision noted:

At first blush I would incline to the view that it is the Hon. Member's rights as a former civil servant which are at issue. He has, perhaps, a grievance against the government in that capacity rather than in his capacity as a Member of Parliament. On the other hand, Hon. Members know that the House has always exercised a great care in attempting to protect the rights and privileges of all its members. Since there is some doubt about the interpretation of the precedents in this situation, I would be inclined to resolve that doubt in favour of the Hon. Member.

When the project officer to the President of Canada Post called my office, clearly she intended to influence my actions, violating Beauchesne's Fifth Edition, Page 22, Citation 67:

It is generally accepted that any threat to a Member, attempting to influence his vote or his actions as a Member, is a breach of privilege.

When she expressed her anger at my office for not clearing my question, she was attempting to hamper my freedom of speech; Beauchesne's Fifth Edition, page 20, Citation 55:

The privilege of freedom of speech is both the least questioned and the most fundamental right of the Member of Parliament on the floor of the House and in committee.

Finally, Beauchesne's Fifth Edition, page 23, Citation 72, reads:

Since 1867, the House has had a rule specifically forbidding the offer of money, or any other advantage to a Member.

I was offered an advantage to behave in a certain fashion or threatened with a disadvantage if I did not react in a certain way, a way that may well affect my ability to represent constituents. I cite Erskine May, Twentieth Edition, page 143:

It may be stated generally that any act or omission which obstructs or impedes either House of Parliament in the performance of its functions, or which obstructs or impedes any Member or officer of such House in the discharge of his duty, or which has a tendency, directly or indirectly, to produce such results may be treated as a contempt even though there is no precedent of the offence.

I believe this action from the office of the President of Canada Post was indeed an attempt to insult, threaten and influence my actions in this House.

The question here is not one of personalities but one of principles. It must, of course, be clearly understood by all Canadians that the independence of Parliament is paramount; freedom of speech in this House by a Member cannot be curtailed. I am prepared, if you find, Mr. Speaker, that there is in my case a breach of privilege, to move the appropriate motion to have this matter referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

• (1510)

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I wish very briefly to add one additional dimension to the principle of when or when not to find a prima facie case, which is all the Chair is required to decide at this point.

Given the circumstances and the confliction between the statement made by the Hon. Member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper), who raised the question of privilege, and that of the Minister who responded, I suggested that this is the position the Chair is in. In order for the Chair to come to the decision that there is no question of privilege, the Chair must make a judgment upon the acceptability of one or other of the positions taken. In my respectful submission, that is not the business of the Chair. If the Chair decides that there is a question of privilege to be dealt with, the Chair is not making that value judgment but is coming to the conclusion that the conflict between the two statements that have been made is a matter that must be put to the House. Quite frankly, I believe that is the position which the Chair is in and which the Chair should take.

The question that the Hon. Member for Peace River raises is the closest to the privilege bone that we have come, certainly in your tenure in the Chair, Mr. Speaker. Indeed, when comparing it with a good many previous questions of privilege raised in this Parliament, it is one of the most substantial and serious that has been raised thus far. No other Members have participated in the conflict that exists between the Minister and the Member, both of whom are entitled to be believed on the basis of their status as Members of the House of Commons. Clearly the conflict should not be resolved by the Chair. That is what urges me to submit to you that this is a very proper question to be put to the House, and it should be.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I heard only the concluding remarks of the House Leader of the Opposition. One thing strikes me in his remarks, he seems to be talking about a conflict between the Hon. Member and the Minister. There is no conflict between the Member and myself. The Hon. Member alleged in the House that his privileges had been breached as a result of a telephone conversation with an employee of the Canada Post Corporation. I enquired and it would seem that he did not speak directly to that Canada Post employee. Consequently, his whole question of privilege is based on the remarks of a third party which were conveyed to him. In other words, his so-called question of privilege is based on hearsay and that is why I do not see it as a matter of privilege. It is more a question of disagreement between parties, as happens regularly in the House when Members on either side do not see eye to eye. I would submit, Mr. Speaker, that is a matter of disagreement rather than a question of privilege.

[English]

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I want to intervene only very briefly in this matter. Because this matter arose and it did appear to be the closest I have seen to real privilege, I did some reading.

You cannot, of course, be asked to make a decision of fact in this matter. We have been hearing hearsay. If you think there is a prima facie case, that is the very reason it should be sent to the committee for it to decide. It strikes me it is very much like a preliminary hearing. It is not for the judge at a preliminary hearing to decide the facts. From the evidence which he hears he has to decide whether there is sufficient concern to send the matter on for a proper trial. This is the same as the historical reasoning for having grand juries. Only one side ever presented its facts in front of a grand jury. A grand jury never tried the facts.

It seems to me that you have been given some information which is hearsay. You cannot decide on the basis of hearsay. I do not believe you can decide that there is a dispute between the Members because there is not really a dispute between the Members. The matter arises before that. I believe the allegation in existence is one which would derogate from the privilege of a Member of Parliament. I do not feel it can be decided in this Chamber.

If there is a sufficient basis, from all the reading I have done I think the proper way to handle it is to get it out of the Chamber and into a committee where a decision can be made based on the facts by calling the various people themselves. The committee will have evidence from the people who are directly involved rather than hearsay. I hope you will find so.

Mr. Speaker: It is the intention of the Chair to review the record carefully and reserve decision for the moment.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 62—NON-CONFIDENCE MOTION—
JOB-CREATION POLICY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Riis:

That this House condemns the government for:

1. employing corporate tax handouts to produce business profits without any guarantees that such tax benefits would result in new investment or job creation;

2. increasing the tax burden on Canadians at the very time when more stimulus is needed in the economy; and

3. allocating job-creation funds in a partisan fashion not based upon local employment levels.

And the amendment of Mr. McGrath:

That the motion be amended by deleting the period after the words "levels" and adding the following thereafter:

"instead of focusing on job-creation programs open to all eligible Canadians, such as career access and refundable employment tax credits".

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Mr. Speaker, as I was saying before two o'clock, we are debating a New Democratic Party motion today on our so-called allotted Opposition Day on which it is the function of the Opposition Parties to raise grievances with respect to Government policies. The New Democratic Party has finally decided to train its weapons on the Government for a change.

We are supportive of this resolution with respect to the confidence of the Government for a number of reasons. If there were any doubt with respect to the cynicism with which the Government benchers have dealt on this particular issue, there can be no doubt now. Government Members are equally as guilty as the Liberal Cabinet. During the course of Question Period every Liberal back-bencher was smirking, hooting and hollering approval of the cynical misuse of public funds. The people of Canada will not forgive this approbation they have given to the activities of a dying Government in its dying days.

It is not often that I join with the New Democratic Party, Mr. Speaker. I try to help them when they are right. There are three things which are certain in life. One is death, the second is taxes, and the third is that the NPD will be 15 per cent in the Gallup poll. These are the three certainties of life. Notwithstanding, I am going to stand by my colleagues to the left, carry on and try to support this particular motion, which is a serious one.

It occurred to me in Question Period today that the responses of the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Roberts) were absolutely untenable—

Mr. McGrath: Unbelievable.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: —unbelievable—

Mr. McGrath: Incredible.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: —incredible. My colleague from St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) has every adjective which would be appropriate to list. If he would provide me with a list at the end of my speech I will table it with the unanimous consent of the House.

It reminded me very much of the Christmas ditty. Here is the Liberal version of how moneys are going to be expended for job creation. I am not going to sing it, but as I recite it you will understand what I am saying.

• (1520)

In Question Period today the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Roberts) said he was making a list, checking it twice, and was going to find out who was naughty or nice. Santa Claus is coming to town!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: That is exactly what is happening with this group. The Minister was asked a direct question today with respect to the misuse of public funds which is occurring. I tried to bring out the magnitude of the amount of the slush fund. Do people realize how much money is dedicated for political patronage purposes in the country? It is $300 million, with no criteria applied with respect to employment levels in any part of the country but, rather, whether some Liberal somewhere says that there might be political advantage with respect to the expenditure of the moneys in one part of the country or the other.

This is an unacceptable fast track and it is the difficulty with the "grants by government" approach to job creation. The imperfections are clear. The program is subject to abuse, subject to the kind of political influence which bears no relationship to the efficient and proper expenditure of money.

I am glad that the New Democratic Party has raised this issue on the floor of the House of Commons. The Minister of Employment and Immigration refused to bring forward the criteria although a request was made some months ago. The real problem with the Minister is that he was afraid that if he let the criteria out, it would be understood by all Canadians. He was worried that all the money had not been given away at that time. That is a simple fact. By the Minister's own admission there is $19 million left which is available for Members of Parliament on an equal basis. The criteria were only released by a memo of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) on February 1. That is not an irrelevant amount of money but it is crumbs in comparison with the $300 million or $150 million per year.

As the Hon. Member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail) points out, and I could not agree more, the money is needed. I know the Hon. Member for Restigouche and the Hon. Minister of Public Works, (Mr. LeBlanc), both from the Maritimes and for whom I have great respect, are not the type of people I would associate with seedy, corrupt and unpalatable patronage practices. They take their responsibility seriously so I know they will understand that many people in the country are suffering as a result of unemployment. We can argue back and forth about whether Government policies or lack of policies have much influence on the rate of unemployment. I am simply saying that the facts are that the official rate of unemployment is 11.2 per cent while it is 24 per cent for youth unemployment. Then there are the hidden unemployed who are not even trying to get jobs, which would raise the total unemployment figure even higher.

Why are we raising this issue with respect to the exercise of patronage by the Government, Mr. Speaker? We are doing it because on this side of the House we believe that the moneys available should be spent in a fair, equitable and effective way on behalf of the people of Canada who are unemployed. If it is necessary in order to get appropriate spending for Saskatchewan, I will be glad to work with the Cabinet Minister from Saskatchewan in the other place, Senator Argue. He was our version of Santa Claus. When he came into Cabinet he had a beard. He shaved it off so he is no longer Santa Claus, but simply a Liberal Minister going out, without consultation, and spending money in Saskatchewan. As the Hon. Member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) has pointed out on a number of occasions in the House, he is spending it without any reference to employment levels or unemployment levels in the province.

In 1983-84, $30 million was spent on the job corps and in 1984-85 it will be $40 million. How does that compare with $300 million that the Liberal Cabinet has in its slush fund? A group of unelected, unaccountable advisers to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is manipulating, to use the words of the grass roots of the Liberal Party who in open convention by resolution condemned the Government and leadership of the Party. They accused the Government of patronage and manipulation. They accused it of disregarding the parliamentary wing. They said that the parliamentary supporters were nobodies. They are somebodies now for they each have $500,000. That is a very cynical way in which to garner support for the leadership of the Party.

When we see that kind of public expenditure, Mr. Speaker, I can only quote Oliver Cromwell in 1653 in the Rump Parliament when he said:

> You have sat too long here for any good you have been doing. Depart, I say, and let us have done with you. In the name of God, go!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Questions, comments? Debate.

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to participate in this debate. I will deal particularly with the first part of the motion which condemns the Government for employing corporate tax hand-outs to produce business profits without any guarantees that such tax benefits would result in new investment or job creation. For some time I have been concerned with the manner in which the Government is handing out moneys under both Summer Canada and the 1983-84 Canada Works program. I have made these views known to the Minister and I feel it is worth bringing them to the attention of the House.

The first part of my remarks will refer directly to the number of occasions when I, as a Member of Parliament, have intervened on behalf of individuals who have been trying to get either a loan from the Federal Business Development Bank or a mortgage from the Farm Credit Corporation. When we intervene on behalf of individuals in our ridings and deal with institutions such as the Federal Business Development Bank, we are told that the loan which a constituent wants does not fall under the terms of its mandate. When we go to the Farm Credit Corporation on behalf of farmers who, under the Liberals' high interest rate policy, have suffered severely, we find that it is out of funds.

Under the circumstances I find that I cannot agree with a program designed to give money on a donation-grant basis to profit-making enterprises on the basis that the events described in a Canada Works program application will produce jobs. That is my first objection to the method by which the Government hands out money under these programs.

My second objection is to the method by which the Government makes these programs available to the people in the riding. As far as I am concerned the advertising and information programs which tell a business firm in Simcoe North that it can or should apply under either the Canada Works or the Summer Canada Program is woefully inadequate. In my opinion, only the most extensive advertising campaign and effort to contact businesses in the riding would result in every business in my riding being in a position to apply for the programs. I am just not convinced that has been done. I have not seen enough in the way of advertisements. I do not believe there have been enough mailings to ensure that every business in my riding is on an equal footing. Therefore, I have two problems so far. First, I cannot get the loans under given programs, under a given institutional setup and, second, under the Canada Works and Summer Canada Programs, the advertising and information process is woefully inadequate.

My third point is that the employees of Canada Manpower are the civil servants who determine which applications should be accepted and sent forward to the Minister for approval. I have interviewed the people in Canada Manpower in my riding of Simcoe North who make these decisions and I believe that in my particular case, although they mean well, Mr. Speaker, meaning well and being able to do well are two different things. In my opinion, the employees of Canada Manpower do not have the training and are not in a position to make value business judgments which I, after 25 years as both a chartered accountant and a lawyer, would hesitate to make. I do not doubt their sincerity, but I doubt their qualifications to make those value judgments. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the Government is at odds with itself. In the former Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce the Government had qualified and trained civil servants in the field who were in a position to make these decisions. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, as a result of the programs the Government has available to it, it has the qualified people from the former Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce to make these decisions. Unfortunately, those are not the employees or civil servants who are making the decisions. Instead, we have the Canada Manpower people who are not trained or qualified to make decisions whether any application will in fact produce jobs.

I would like to focus on that particular point for a moment. Will those applications under the Canada Works Program or under the Summer Canada Program in fact produce the number of jobs they say they will? I refer to an article published in The Globe and Mail between Christmas and New Year's wherein a report produced for the Ontario Development Corporation indicated that until 1979 the number of jobs created by loans was 39 per cent fewer than the number of jobs which the applications said would be created. In other words, Mr. Speaker, there is a very definite gap between the number of jobs which applications say will be produced and the number of jobs actually produced, according to the Ontario Development Corporation. They key difference between those Ontario Development Corporation applications and the applications we are dealing with here is that the Ontario Development Corporation lent money, whereas in fact under the Summer Canada and Canada Works Programs we are granting money. We are giving it away. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, and to Hon. Members of the House, that we are making a mistake when we simply grant money holus-bolus and depend upon that alone to create jobs. Those jobs will more likely be created, I suggest, if the moneys are given by way of a loan.

Something else which bothers me about the programs we have, Mr. Speaker, is that they do not appear to carry with them sufficient penalties to police a program effectively and return the money to the Government if the applicant fails to live up to the qualifications of the program. In fact, there are no penalties in the programs other than simply discontinuing the grant. Therefore, we have a situation where the Government is giving away money by way of grants with no penalties available to it under the process if in fact those jobs are not being created.

Let me deal for a moment with my position as a Member of Parliament. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, because of what I have said, that we—and I include all Hon. Members of the House of Commons—are placed in a difficult position, no matter what our political background. If a Member of Parliament approves one application over that of an applicant's competitor, we are placed in an untenable position. If an applicant in a certain field of business hears about a program and makes an application, and another applicant, or other applicants, do not hear about it, how can they be considered to be on an equal footing with the successful applicant? What is our position when we as Members of Parliament, dealing with, as I suggest, relatively untrained civil servants, put the final seal of approval on those applications? I suggest to you that where we have applicants competing in the same field of endeavour, such as the tourist business or the manufacturing of certain types of sports and athletic equipment—and in a riding such as mine one can determine who they are—we as Members of Parliament, are placed in an untenable position. If we endorse the application of an applicant, and that application is successful, and we find out that that particular applicant and his employees support our Party politically, are we then subject to the charge that we have engaged in pork barrel politics? Since we are now putting a personal stamp of approval on these applications, if we turn an application down, are we to be subjected to doubts about our judgment because of the very close contact which the Government wants Members of Parliament to have with the applications?

Beyond that, Mr. Speaker, I want to address the question of helping businesses with a proven track record with these grants. I would not have as much difficulty with this question if we were lending them money. But we are granting them money, we are taking the taxpayers' money and giving it away under the Summer Canada Program and the Canada Works Program. I believe we would be doing a better job with the taxpayers' money if we were lending it. I would even be happy if we had a system of forgiveable loans, whereby if a company said it was going to create 50 jobs and it received $100,000, and at the end of the year 50 jobs were created and in place, the $10,000 could be forgiven. At the end of the second year, another $10,000 could be forgiven if the jobs were still in place. But I have very serious doubts that we do justice to the taxpayers when we give their money away.

To go one step further, what about the applicants who receive funding under these grants, who put this funding into fixed assets and then sell out? They build their buildings, which were going to house the employees for these new jobs, and once they have them built, they sell the buildings and they are on their way. There are no penalties, Mr. Speaker. These people have made a windfall profit on the backs of the Canadian taxpayers. There is no provision in these grants for second mortgages going back to the Government, nothing to hinder this from happening, and that is what I object to. Even if we are going to grant money—and I suggested earlier we should lend it—surely to goodness we should put a hold on the fixed and movable assets. In Ontario we would do it by a mortgage and personal property security lien. Surely we owe it to the Canadian taxpayers to protect them from people getting money under these grants, building the fixed asset, selling out, and then, first thing you know, moving to Florida. We have not done that, and that is what I object to.

I zeroed in on my particular area in my comments, Mr. Speaker, but I believe they apply to ridings all across the country. I want to say specifically that I am in no way reflecting on the civil servants I have dealt with in the Barrie office of Canada Manpower. I have had nothing but excellent relationships with them when we came to discuss funding for non-profit organizations. My concerns are strictly with the entry of the Government holus-bolus into the granting process to profit-making organizations.

Beyond that, Mr. Speaker, I want to touch upon what I think this method of funding has done to the volunteer sector of our society. I think it is important to get this on the record. The policy of the Government has been to fund volunteer organizations for one or perhaps two years but no further. It does not want to get into long-term funding of volunteer organizations. However, over the past four or five years what has happened is that volunteer organizations have looked at the source of funding and said, "We have a program which will fit in; we want that funding and we are going to use it". They get the funding, use it for one or two years and then find that it disappears under the criteria. I suggest that this has worn out the welcome of a lot of these programs with the volunteer sector of our society. They have found they cannot continue without the funding. It takes a year or two to get the kinks out of a program and get it rolling, then the funding goes and they cannot continue. I suggest that if we are not at the point, we are very close to the point where the volunteer sector is going to be suspicious of these programs. I raise that flag of warning that we are doing a disservice to the voluntary sector.

I want to close, Mr. Speaker, by saying that I support wholeheartedly and have addressed my remarks to the first part of the NDP motion. I feel very strongly about the dangers we are facing with this type of program. I am on record with the Minister as saying I will not touch, look at, sign or have anything to do with grants to the corporate sector of my riding because of the danger I have outlined here. I continue to be very interested in making funding available to the volunteer sector, especially in my riding. I worked very hard to get funding for the Huronia Tourist Association, which has a program to house people connected with the Papal visit. I have done that, and I am fully in support of whatever we can do on a one-shot basis for these types of programs. However, I raised this question with the Auditor General. I suggested to him, in my capacity as Member of Parliament and in my capacity as Chairman of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, and I suggest to you, that one or two years down the road the Auditor General will look at how many jobs were actually created compared with the number which the application said would be created by way of a grant or hand-out. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, the jobs are just not there for the reasons I have outlined.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Questions, comments, debate. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Mr. Jean-Guy Dubois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, concerning the motion before the House today, we on the Government side should not be surprised at the fact that all kinds of allegations are being made regarding the Government's job creation programs. They are so popular it is almost inevitable. The Member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis), who moved today's motion, knows how strongly Canadians support the Government's efforts to sustain our economic recovery. The Hon. Member is also aware that one of the most reliable ways of sustaining economic recovery is direct job creation.

Mr. Speaker, this country's greatest resource is its people. We must remember this when, owing to circumstances, the State has to play a greater role in supporting the economy. The federal Government has a responsibility to keep the impact of economic upheaval on the Canadian people to a minimum, and we have seen that such economic disturbances are often worldwide, as in the last recession.

We firmly believe that it is up to the private sector to provide jobs that will enhance the lives of Canadians. However, the Government has a duty to take measures to create an economic environment that will promote job creation. Sometimes, Mr. Speaker, the Government must play a life-saving role as we have seen in recent years when certain large corporations had to be helped. We spared no efforts at a time when, as I just pointed out, the world economic situation was going through a deep recession which had a very severe impact on the labour market. At that time we promoted the concept of work sharing, to keep the number of Canadians being laid off to a minimum.

During that same period, recognizing the fact that short-term solutions were not enough, the Government established a new National Training Program to help workers adjust to changing labour market conditions. Looking back, we have to admit that this country was able to pull through in better shape than other countries thanks to a more enlightened use of economic "cushions" such as our job creation programs and Section 38 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, which was used in a novel way to create thousands of jobs in the mining, forestry and fishing industries. Mr. Speaker, the Government has a duty to help the neediest groups of our society, and that is why a number of job creation programs focus especially on those groups that are most severely affected by unemployment. Similarly, we must ensure that regions particularly affected by factory or business shutdowns leading to massive layoffs are clearly identified, before proceeding with a fair distribution of grants. This is one of the reasons why, for instance, a number of ridings will receive more than the basic grant provided under the Canada Works Program.

Mr. Speaker, job creation is a subject that will continue to be discussed in the House, because thanks to additional funding announced in the Speech from the Throne, the Canadian Government's Job Creation Program for 1984-1985, including Canada Works, will have a budget of over $1.1 million, not counting expenditures for the present fiscal year, during which 260,000 people will have benefited, through these programs, from a total investment of $805,700,000. There is hardly a Member in this House, Mr. Speaker, who has not seen some very successful undertakings among his constituents, thanks to these job creation programs. As a result, many organizations, have been able to help Canadians earn a minimum wage while helping the community. Mr. Speaker, what about the active role played by the private sector which, among other things, sponsored over 22 per cent of Quebec projects under the NEED Program? What about the sustained efforts on the part of municipalities which are anxious to promote employment development? We have to admit that, both in job creation and vocational training, the Canadian Government has made a tremendous effort to support the private sector so as to ensure a sound economic recovery.

I would suggest that more often than not people have a tendency to discredit programs which foreign countries try to emulate or fit into their policies and which make it possible for workers to regain the satisfaction of having a job while doing something useful for the community, not to mention the fact that a good many of those jobs turn out to be permanent. For any youth who lands his first job ever, it is like money in the bank when he eventually seeks permanent employment, because he can indeed say that he has experience which he would not have gained otherwise.

Since I have this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, I would like to review the four new job creation progams sponsored by the Canadian Government which resulted from streamlining twelve employment programs. I would be remiss if I failed to point out that those new programs were structured in close co-operation with private industry, other Government levels, labour leaders and spokesmen for the education sector.

Two programs—Career-Access and Job Corps—are designed to get the best out of our human resources. In other words, they are designed to help people get ready to occupy a full-time job and to join the labour force. Another progam, Canada Works, is aimed at the employment problems caused by the economic recession or by any other unforeseen disturbance on the labour market, for instance, the closing of a plant or a business, massive lay-offs, and so on. The fourth program, known as LEAD, or Local Employment Assistance and Development Program, is aimed at the community. Its purpose is to stimulate and support the development and growth of employment locally.

Let us look first at the Career Access Program. If we exclude operational expenditures, some $294 million were allocated to this program for the year 1984-85 to create opportunities for those who find it very hard to get permanent jobs. Its main thrust is to tackle one problem which has become more serious these last few years, namely making the transition from classroom to workplace. Through the Career Access Program, we can bring practical solutions to two problems which have concerned many people for too long, namely, how to obtain a job without the skills and the experience required, and also, how to acquire the experience and the skills required if you cannot get a job. The Career Access Program offers a wage subsidy to employers who hire young people and give them on-the-job training. The subsidy, applicable for up to six months, can reach 50 per cent of the gross wages paid to the participants. The jobs created under this program consist essentially in training workshops designed to help participants acquire the skills they need to become eligible to full-time employment. The Career-Access Program provides also for the payment of financial assistance to handicapped and otherwise disadvantaged people, as well as to those who are returning to the market place after being away for a long time. The initial grant which is paid to these people may amount to 85 per cent of their gross salary. This grant may be paid for up to 12 months on a decreasing basis. In some cases, a contribution of up to $10,000 may be paid toward the cost of providing facilities and equipment for the handicapped. Some 92,000 new participants are expected to avail themselves of the benefits of Career-Access Program during the fiscal year 1984-85.

The Job Corps Program, which has a similar objective, has been designed especially for those who are disadvantaged in some way or another in the area of employment. They may be physically or mentally handicapped or they may suffer from a severe social problem, such as former alcoholics or drug-addicts or offenders who need help to become productive members of society again, as well as other disadvantaged people. The Job Corps Program, which provides also for salary subsidy payments to businesses, organizations, community groups and individuals, offers disadvantaged people the opportunity of acquiring the skills, motivation, work habits and experience they need to become full share members of the work force. The program provides also for counselling services and training. For the fiscal year 1984-85, the Job Corps Program has available some $37 million, exclusive of operational costs, but including $19 million earmarked for the creation of jobs for young unemployed people. Some 4,700 new participants are expected to avail themselves of this program within the next two years.

Mr. Speaker, let us now have a look at the LEAD Program which, as I have indicated, is aimed at providing funds to encourage local development and create jobs in regions which are constantly suffering from acute unemployment. To achieve this, the program uses certain processes, including some which are somewhat complex; but no matter how complex they are, their common objective is to increase the number of jobs within the community by favouring the setting up of new businesses and the expansion of old ones. The LEAD projects must reflect the community's priorities and be consistent with a local development strategy. These projects will benefit not only to the unemployed who will find jobs, but also to the local businesses and organizations, as well as to the community as a whole. The program provides also financial assistance to help communities identify their needs and plan their own expansion strategies.

For the fiscal year 1984-85, the monies allocated to the LEAD program amount to some $100 million, which should allow for the creation of some 17,700 jobs on a national scale. As is the case with other programs, the salary paid to the various participants under the LEAD Program should not exceed the salary paid for a similar job in the same area. Moreover, the approved projects should not be a source of unfair competition for already established businesses or organizations.

And now we come to the Canada Works Program which has a total budget of $488.4 million for the fiscal year 1984-85. Its purpose is to compensate for the loss of jobs in a recession period and to alleviate the impact of any unexpected turmoil on the labour market, as I have already said.

The Canada Works Program offers financial assistance through contributions to a wide variety of projects which nevertheless must meet certain criteria. As a rule, these projects must create at least three full-time jobs and last between six and 52 weeks, except in the case of summer jobs for students which have an 18-week maximum duration.

The proposed projects must match the skills of the participants with the job requirements. At the time of review their impact on the local economic development and their advantages for the community are assessed. The participants selected from among those unemployed for at least 8 weeks, are introduced to prospective employers whose projects have been accepted through the nearest Canada Employment Center. Priority is given to job seekers who are no longer eligible for unemployment insurance benefits, to welfare recipients or to the laid-off workers receiving unemployment insurance benefits. Under the Canada Works Program, a contribution of up to $325 per work-week may be paid as well as up to $125 for non-salary costs. The Federal government has therefore allocated over a billion dollar to these four job-creation programs in 1984-85. You will surely agree that this is an extremely cost-efficient investment, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Earlier in this debate today I was chastised by the Speaker for reading from a document which I was unwilling to identify for what I believe were good and sufficient reasons. It is obvious that the Parliamentary Secretary is reading from a document. I wonder if the same standard would not apply and if the Parliamentary Secretary could identify for us whether it is simply a departmental brochure, or exactly what document it is that he is reading?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In a sense, I suppose the point is well taken. The present occupant of the chair feels that while no one should literally be chastised for reading from documents, there are ample precedents. Beauchesne deals with the matter.

Members may find inspiration in notes to quite some degree. My interpretation of the practice is that one should not, for example, read a speech that has already been given in the House. That is one obvious purpose of avoiding the reading of texts. Beauchesne also says that Hon. Members may, in questions of a technical nature, for reasons of precision to ensure that the House has the best information possible, quote extensively from notes. However, the Chair feels it is up to each Member to determine, in his own best judgment, to what extent he has to quote or inspire himself extensively from notes. The Chair is not in a position to judge effectively from this distance to what degree an Hon. Member is in fact reading his speech. It is a matter of judgment which the Chair prefers to leave to Hon. Members to decide for themselves. There are instances where a Member may literally pick up a text, it could be a magazine, it could be Hansard, and proceed to read from it. That is not a speech in the true sense of the word. However, I have made my comments. I will listen to the Hon. Member again if he wishes to comment further.

• (1600)

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your comments. This morning I had a document authored by someone. I was not prepared to put the author's name on record because there could be difficulties for the civil servant who gave me the document. In this case, if the Hon. Member were simply to indicate he is the author of the document, that would end the matter. If it is someone else's document, or another person's document from which he is reading, perhaps he could follow the procedure and let us know who the author of the document is as he continues to read it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. As the Hon. Member appreciates, I was not here this morning. I cannot and I would not want to pass judgment on the words uttered by the occupant of the chair at that time. I am led to understand the Hon. Member was quoting from a document this morning. Beauchesne addresses himself to that matter. It is incumbent upon Members who quote from documents to indicate the author or the source of the quotation. I understand that is standard practice. That could well be the point to which the occupant of the chair wanted the Hon. Member to address himself. There is strictly no prohibition from quoting from documents. Beauchesne requires the source or the author of the document to be identified. I think that was the conundrum of the House this morning. Otherwise I see nothing wrong with the Hon. Member continuing with his speech at this stage. I understand he is not quoting but making a speech.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I would inform the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary that he has one minute left to conclude.

Mr. Dubois: Mr. Speaker, I have the feeling that the Hon. Member's comments have been included in my time, because I started my speech at 3:45 p.m. Do I understand that the inappropriate comments of the Hon. Member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes) were made on my time? I must say this is my own speech, and if it is too specific for the Hon. Member, I am sorry. If he learns about government programs the same way he listens to speeches, I am not surprised he finds it difficult to understand them.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, when I referred to the various job creation programs, I wanted to answer specifically the motion now before us, pointing out our effort in the area of job creation.

To conclude, all the concerted efforts made across Canada and involving as they do all regions, needless to say, are aimed at ensuring that all Canadians have an opportunity to contribute to the economic recovery that is now well under way and to fully benefit from it. It is my hope that this goal will be furthered by tomorrow's Budget.

[English]

Mr. Hawkes: I ask the Parliamentary Secretary, who is a representative of the Government, whether his Minister approves each and every project funded under the Special Employment Initiatives projects.

[Translation]

Mr. Dubois: Concerning the special initiative projects, a number of questions have been raised in this House. The Minister answered them yesterday and again today. According to yesterday's Hansard, and his answers will also be recorded in tomorrow's Hansard, the Minister stated that as soon as possible he will make the projects known, perhaps Monday or possibly earlier.

[English]

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, could the Parliamentary Secretary tell the House how many people are employed in the Department of Employment and Immigration for the express purpose of dealing with project allocation under these funds?

[Translation]

Mr. Dubois: Mr. Speaker, I take note of the question. Many officials in the Department of Employment and Immigration are involved in all job creation projects. I did not make an exhaustive survey of the entire staff of the Department of Employment and Immigration. At the same time, this can easily be checked with the estimates that have been tabled and also the supplementary estimates. To my knowledge, all the information he is requesting is there. Moreover, the estimates for the next fiscal year will have to be tabled. All the information he wants will be available. I must say that in my concern to represent my constituents and help create jobs, I have no sudden impulse to start counting heads to know whether there are one, 200 or 300 officials in the Department. What I can say is that there are enough to create jobs in Canada.

[English]

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, could the Parliamentary Secretary explain to us the difference between some of the other programs he mentions, such as NEED and Canada Works? It is possible to go to a Canada Manpower centre, get an application form and apply for employment creation money under the programs he mentions. It does not seem possible to do that same thing under the Special Employment Initiatives Program. Can the Parliamentary Secretary tell the House why the difference? Can he tell us how one applies for the Special Employment Initiatives Program?

[Translation]

Mr. Dubois: Mr. Speaker, when the criteria for this program were discussed in this House and before the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration, it was said that this was a job creation program designed to have much faster results, to have flexible criteria and not to entail any bureaucratic problems.

Since November, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, when he appeared before the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration, has invited all the Members of this House to send him their projects and said that he could meet their needs adequately. I am therefore very surprised at this question about applications under this program. I know that one of the colleagues of the Hon. Member for Calgary—I forget whether it is Calgary West or Calgary East—who has been sitting in this House since 1968 has submitted some projects. I mean the Hon. Member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle). How very strange! Of course, he did his job. If certain other Members had also looked at the budgets of June 1982 and April 1983, they would have learned how to submit an application. However, instead of discussing program criteria and levels, they may have been more interested in squabbling over leadership issues and looking for 14-and 15-year old delegates and people in bars.

Mr. Laniel: I have a question for the Parliamentary Secretary which also concerns the Hon. Member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle), who was Minister of Supply and Patronage, I believe, in the Clark Cabinet. Since the Hon. Member for Joliette has admitted in this House that projects in the amount of $400,000 had been approved for his constituency and has even stated publicly that he did his job, as the Hon. Member has just pointed out, I would like to ask the Parliamentary Secretary whether the Hon. Member for Joliette is still doing his job. Has he submitted other projects to the Minister for approval?

Mr. Dubois: Mr. Speaker, I could not say exactly what projects the Hon. Member has submitted directly to the Minister for job creation assistance under the Canada Works and NEED programs. The Hon. Member for Joliette has submitted his applications and has received the grants as provided for in the announcement made by the Minister of Employment and Immigration last September and also in the Speech from the Throne. As for as the programs to promote immediate job creation are concerned, I am only referring to the comments made by the Hon. Member for Joliette which I have seen in the newspapers saying that he wanted still more money for his constituency, that he had been granted $400,000 and that he was working to get still more.

In one simple word, in view of what the Hon. Member for Joliette himself has said, the answer would be yes, Mr. Speaker.

• (1610)

[English]

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, the Parliamentary Secretary may recall that the Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) gave some interviews last week in which he indicated that one criterion for Special Employment Initiatives projects was that they had to be the kind of project which made the Government look good. How important was that particular criterion?

[Translation]

Mr. Dubois: Mr. Speaker, how can we be doing this simply to make the Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) look good? Am I to understand that we are not such generous people even though, in the case of Quebec and constituencies elsewhere, but mainly in Quebec, to use the same terms as the Hon. Member, we are also being fair to the Hon. Member for Joliette, who has benefited from these projects? I do not see how this can be said to affect Government Members. As far as I know, the Hon. Member for Joliette is not a member of the Government party, but of the Progressive Conservative Party, the very same party as the Member who is asking me these questions. Members of his party should perhaps stop their internal bickering and begin discussing the budgets of June and April 1983, even if they date back several months. If they do so, they would notice the existence of all these job creation programs.

[English]

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether we could call upon the Hon. Member, on his word as a Member of the House, to tell us with absolute clarity that the criteria used to allocate these funds were in fact identical to the criteria we received on February 2. I wonder whether we could call upon him to indicate that there were not special criteria, as the Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre indicated, but that the real criteria used to allocate that $288 million to $300 million were in fact the written criteria which every Member of the House received on February 2. Could we have the Hon. Member's word that the written criteria were the real criteria?

[Translation]

Mr. Dubois: As far as the document of February 2, 1984, which was sent to all the Members of this House, is concerned, I can certainly assure the Hon. Member that the criteria for this program are exactly as stated in the February 2 document published by the Department of Employment and Immigration. This document was sent by someone who acts as assistant in that Department.

I have no hesitation in admitting this because this is a public document. All 282 Members of Parliament received it, or rather, as there are two vacant seats, all 280 Members of Parliament have indeed received these criteria and all the Members, whether they are from Alberta, Prince Edward Island, Saskatchewan, Quebec or Ontario, are in possession of the same document dated February 2, 1984.

[English]

Mr. Hawkes: Do I understand correctly that there were no additional criteria, that the ones written down were the only criteria used in the allocation?

Mr. Dubois: Mr. Speaker, I am very positive concerning that. The answer is yes. Maybe it would be better if I spoke in English. The answer to this question and to the previous one is yes.

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, it is always a pleasure to participate in a debate on a motion of the New Democratic Party—these great social planners, these great central planners, these great planners of an industrial strategy designed to guarantee and deliver social justice, equity, fairness and equality to everyone! It is almost as if the NDP has not yet discovered that for the last 15 years we have suffered misery from the results and consequences of that kind of planning. The motion is designed to point out certain inequities which may exist in the treatment of earned income of large corporations and in terms of the concessions and loopholes that might exist which permit large corporations to be in a privileged tax position.

That is all very interesting, but while it may be true that we have an over-concentrated large corporate sector, it is nothing else, in my opinion at least, than a result of and a reaction to central planning and concentration of power in a central place by Government. Companies have been made instruments of national policy. In order to carry out the social role assigned to large corporate entities, they have to grow in size.

Of course it is true that our large corporate sector derived its strength and size from the fact that we are an exporting nation, that we are rich in resources and that our prime resource industries require large corporate entities to harvest and produce the products resource industries are capable of producing and to ship them world-wide in an effective way. It is our history and our nature to have large corporations. However, in recent years, as a result of the central planning of the present Government, there has been the emergence of certain corporate entities which no longer bear any resemblance to free enterprise. That is not by their choice, it is by the choice of this Government which has made them instruments of social policy.

Let me explain what I mean when I say that we have assigned to our corporations and our businesses an inordinate amount of social responsibility. I see the Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) in the House. He will remember the story about a mine in his riding which took 15 years to plan and when it was finished the capital involved in bringing the mine into production was massive; 35 per cent of it had absolutely nothing to do with the mine itself but concerned the building of a town, a swimming pool, a school and all social amenities which go along with a town. The Government assigned that responsibility to the company. At the same time it made it very difficult for that particular company—or any other company, resource venture or business—to raise the necessary capital to bring the venture onstream. Through FIRA and policies of economic nationalism, which are supported by the NDP, it was and is exceedingly difficult for companies to raise the necessary capital to bring such ventures onstream, particularly since it takes 15 years, 20 years or even longer from the inception of the scheme until it comes to fruition. Again that is because of the over-extended regulatory process and the unco-ordinated regulatory process, not only in terms of the different Departments of the federal Government but in terms of the other legitimate players in the scheme—the provincial governments, municipal governments and so on.

Canada is no longer a very hospitable or good place in which to plan or to invest. This is why our mining industry, for instance, operates at 50 per cent capacity and our forest industry—the goose which lays the golden egg—operates at something like 60 per cent capacity. That is why, in an attempt to compete with new players in international marketplaces, we have seen over the last 50 years a total change in the nature of our market economy. It is no longer a free market economy. Companies which are not already nationalized or taken over by government are nothing but instruments of social policy. For instance, when a mine shuts down in the Yukon and people are laid off, it might be given a $30 million grant to keep operating. We are totally unconcerned or ignorant of the fact that that might create distortions in the marketplace. Here is one company that now has $30 million to produce its product, $30 million on which it does not have to pay interest or even repay. Naturally that creates certain distortions in terms of the balance sheets. It creates problems in terms of the investment decisions that other companies or investors may make.

How did this come about? What is it that got us into this serious situation, and it is serious? I commend the New Democratic Party for bringing to the attention of the House the fact that we have massive unemployment and the fact that businesses and corporations have not had the means to respond to the challenge by expanding their productive capacity. We are no longer competitive. Our companies are now suffering from having become partners in a centrally planned economy, permitting government to insert itself and stand between them and the pressures of the market, taking risk out of enterprise. We are now suffering the consequences.

Some of that has to do with the fact that our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has had an obssession to proceed in this fashion. We have pretended to be partners, major players in the industrial scheme of the western world, the OECD countries. We are totally ignorant of the fact that we are not like other industrial countries in the western world. We are not like Japan, Germany, France or Britain. Our industrial strength rests on the pillars of our major primary resource industries such as agriculture, fishing, forestry and mining. These are resources of which our industrial partners in the western world are deprived. They have to buy them from us. We compete with them on an equal basis. I want to touch on this for a moment.

On the question of foreign aid and closing the gap between the developed and underdeveloped world, there is an obvious need to create an economy in the Third World rather than just give foreign aid. The NDP members understand that. They at least pretend to have compassion for people in the Third World, although when they suggest we build barriers around our countries, increase tariffs and deprive poorer countries from trading with us, that is not the way to go. What we have done, in competition and in collusion with our industrial partners, is to say that rather than giving the Third World outright cash grants to buy food or whatever, we should permit them to develop their own industrial base. If I were a Japanese planner, I would ask, what could be better than to develop a copper mine in Chile? That would increase the supply of copper, create keener price competition and be good for Japanese industry.

Is it good for industry in Canada? I say not. We give a loan or a grant of $200 million to start a copper mine in Mexico or Chile, and we have been active in both countries in this area, we are not just giving away $200 million. Nobody decries that. We are giving away $2 billion of the copper production in our country. We are also giving away 200,000 jobs. That is what we are doing.

We recently built a pulp mill in Malaysia. They will have absolutely no problem selling their product in a newly emerging, very powerful trading bloc in the Pacific Rim. The Minister says that if we had not built that pulp-mill, somebody else would have. That is true. However, it also means that if we do not tie a noose around our neck, somebody will tie it around our neck for us. It is absolutely ridiculous for us to compete with other industrial nations for enterprises designed to develop the economy in the Third World.

Mr. Blais: You don't believe that.

Mr. Oberle: I do. The ignorance shows through. What should we be doing in the Third World? Maybe we should tell our industrial partners that we should develop manufacturing plants in Chile and Mexico instead of copper mines. If they want to develop copper mines in Chile or Mexico, let us develop something else. Let us spend our $200 million differently from our industrial partners. That is an example of how our industries have become instruments of public, domestic and international policy. It is clear that we have no industrial plan. We are competing with players in the international scheme whose economies are structured entirely differently from our own. I have given the reasons for that.

The NDP Members would have us believe that when you build a pulp mill in Malaysia, they will require our motors, machines and engineers during construction and the jobs will accrue to the golden triangle. They believe that $200 million, or a good part of it, will be spent in Canada. That is all that will be spent in Canada. As I demonstrated, it will cost us $2 billion in the long run because we will be exporting our jobs and giving away our industrial strength.

We have rotted the pillars of our industrial strength. We cannot now turn around and decry the trend that has developed in the post-war period, particularly in the last eight or ten years. Our mining industry is operating today at 50 per cent capacity. Fifteen years ago we satisfied 95 per cent of the world demand for nickel. Today it is approximately 35 per cent. We now decry the fact that we have this competition in the Third World.

At the Macdonald Commission hearings, a former deputy minister of finance questioned the Canadian mining association. He asked whether they would agree that mining in Canada should be looked at as a sunset industry. The mining industry supports 150 small and not so small towns throughout northern Canada, directly employs 300,000 Canadians and indirectly another 400,000. Imagine that industry in the next five years being looked at as a sunset industry! I say it should not.

What is left for us? The NDP members say we simply have to compete with these emerging Third World producers on their terms. Their terms are not profit. They have different criteria. My friend from Skeena should speak to his constituents, those who create jobs in his riding, not those who run to the Minister and ask for another $30,000 grant to build a ski trail from Smithers to wherever, and they will tell him the same thing. We cannot compete with these new players on their terms. Their motivation is not profit. These are Government owned enterprises and the criteria are jobs and foreign exchange earnings. The copper mine in Chile will operate long after all the copper mines in Canada are shut down. It does not matter how much it loses. As long as there are jobs and a cash flow from foreign exchange, that copper mine will operate. It is operating because we have paid for it and are going to continue to pay for it at the expense of our own workers.

My friend from Skeena can no longer use the excuse that socialists normally use, that if you have not been a socialist by the time you are 25 you have not got a heart, and if you are a socialist after you are 30, you have not got a head. My friend from Skeena does not fit in this grey area any longer. He either has not got a heart or not got a head.

The fact is that our industrial strength lies in the great entrepreneurial spirit which has rendered Canada an industrial giant in the world. Canadians have had that great spirit and ingenuity to build a better mouse trap, to get out there and deliver a product in a shorter time and in the proper mix required by our customers throughout the world. To rekindle that spirit is our only salvation. We must get out and deliver the proper blend of copper, mineral or forest products to the people in the world who need these products at the right time and in the right mix. We are capable of doing that, but only if we permit some leeway, give some inducements and give some incentives to our great industrial giants. We must step back and permit the market to work.

Government must get out of the marketplace. You cannot just interfere a little bit. Whenever you step in and bail out one company, you are creating distortions in the marketplace, and all the other companies find that to be unfair competition. You then have to bail out all the industries. We are going down a very slippery slope from which there is no longer any return, at least as long as the Government is in power supported by this little red rump over here. Obviously, they think all you have to do is to concentrate all the power in a central place, whether government, regulatory or corporate power of these great corporate entities, which buy, sell, switch and flip and have managed to insulate themselves totally from any of the market forces.

Whenever they get in trouble, and particularly if the banks tell them they are in trouble, they come running to government. They tell the government it has to bail them out. When they say that, they mean bail out the banks. They do not really mean bail out the workers or the company. Maislin trucking was an example of that. The bailout was not that of the workers or small contractors who were working for Maislin trucking. The bank was bailed out and then it pulled the plug and let everybody go down the chute. Nobody had any compassion for the small businessman or the worker. The compassion was for the bank. The bank had told Maislin to go to the Government and tell it to bail it out because if it did not, it would be an incredible political liability because all those people would be unemployed. The same is true for Dome Petroleum and all these other great bailouts we have been involved in.

The fact is that you cannot bail out a little bit, just as you cannot be pregnant a little bit. Once it starts, it keeps growing. It is like a cancer and it desroys our system. It is time to stop this cancerous growth. It is time that we started rebuilding the foundation of our system, get government out of the marketplace, and assign a lesser social burden.

I touched on taxes a little when I spoke about the mine in the riding of my friend from Skeena. Thirty-five per cent of the capital requirements to get that mine onstream had to do with the social structure. When you talk about taxes, think about the non-profit taxes that companies have to pay; fuel, municipal, regional and provincial taxes. All of these have escalated out of all proportion. The operating costs of many resource centres throughout Canada are now in the range of 25 to 30 per cent a year in terms of non-profit taxes. That is incredible. We have to turn that around. Instead of imposing more taxes on our corporations we must lessen the load, relieve them of this incredible social burden, and relieve them of the Government and that little red rump over there.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I have a very short question for the Member for Prince George-Peace River, (Mr. Oberle). I will not reflect too long on the twisted distortions of fact the Hon. Member presented. I suppose some people in his constituency believe it. From time to time I pass his speeches around in my constituency because everybody gets a good laugh. The Hon. Member obviously does not know what he is talking about, although sometimes outside of the House one would think he does.

While the Hon. Member was in Government his Government decided to cut off all job creation funds. That is one of the things we are talking about today. Would he comment on how effective that is as a policy in terms of the kind of projects we are talking about today? He talks about the Government across the way giving money to Malaysia to set up a pulp mill and gives money to Chile to set up a copper mine. I have taken the time to write to External Affairs. I have all the figures. I know the figures were higher in 1979 under the Government of which that Member was a part than they have been from 1980 to 1984 with the Government sitting across the floor. The Tory Government put more money than the Liberals into opening mines in other areas of the world, in direct competition with Canadian Mines. In terms of forestry projects it gave money to South American dictatorships and to Indonesian dictatorships for forestry projects that do not occur in Canada. The Member claims to know a great deal about forestry; nevertheless that is what occurred.

Is the Minister telling the Canadian public that the Scheffville experience is really the way things should be handled? Is he saying that when mines close there is no responsibility of government and no responsibility of the companies? Is Scheffville really the motto of the Tory Party?

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, talk about humour. You cannot call this Member a bare faced liar because he wears a beard. He is certainly a stranger to the truth when he talks about the policies of the Clark Government in 1979. I talked about the fact that we really have given up our options. There are no options left. The industries have no money to expand. We have destroyed their markets. We have two million people unemployed, half of them under the age of 24. What else can you do but rely on short-term job creation programs such as the Government has done for the last five or six years?

In a few months the Hon. Member may be able to call me Mr. Minister. When he does, I will probably tell him that for some time to come, to bridge this gap and to restore the entrepreneurial spirit and the foundation on which our industry and economy rest, we will probably have to continue to have some job-creation programs and some innovative programs that small business, the real job creators, could respond to. They will not create a two-month job that can be counted on to end up with 400,000 jobs four times a year in one year, all of them recycled four times. The Government has created more jobs in the last five years than we have population. It recycles these jobs three or four times a year.

The New Democratic Party supported the Members over there in February of 1980 in defeating the Progressive Conservative Budget. That Budget had very real incentives to save the farmers and fishermen in the Hon. Member's constituency. Members opposite have decided to live with the evil over there by defeating the Progressive Conservative Party. We will probably have to continue some of these programs. However, it will not be for very long, only as long as it takes to rebuild the Canadian economy and restore a free enterprise system in this country in which the small businessman is a player and has the necessary inducements and incentives to create new permanent jobs. All these policies have been tried for the last 15 years. When I travel to the Hon. Member's constituency I find that people are starved to talk to somebody who does not distort the truth as he sometimes does. We have to restore a free enterprise economy because we will not be able to compete in the world by nationalizing all our prime industries, using the criteria that government-owned enterprises use as instruments of social policy.

An Hon. Member: You are going to wreck Canada.

Mr. Oberle: You see what we will do. The quickest way for you fellows to find out what the Progressive Conservative industrial policy will be is to entice those fellows over there to call an election. You will then find out very quickly.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Order, please. During the question and answer period may I request, first of all, that Hon. Members stand to make interjections and also that Members address their remarks to the Chair.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I have a brief supplementary question. I am sure that Hon. Members noticed that the Hon. Member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) did not answer the question about Schefferville or questions about international forestry or international mining funding by the Conservative Party. He did not touch on the fact that the Tories cut almost all job creation projects in Canada while they were in government.

When the Hon. Member was in my constituency not too long ago, he raised one particular matter and I received a flood of letters from public servants about it. He said that at least 60,000 public servants should be fired immediately after the next election. Mathematics demonstrate that that would mean that about 9,000 or 10,000 people in British Columbia would be fired. Some of the RCMP and most of the military in British Columbia would be fired.

I wonder if the Member would tell us whether he intends to get rid of all the federal public servants related to federal health and welfare in British Columbia. Knowing that he has already promised to fire 9,000 people in British Columbia, would the Hon. Member tell us if he knows how many federal public servants there are in the province before he gets the hatchet out?

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, I thought I told the Hon. Member in my first answer that he was not correct when he said that we phased out all job-creation programs in 1979. That is not what happened. With regard to firing 60,000 civil servants, the Hon. Member's memory is very good. That happened in 1979, but in that short period we discovered that, without any fuss or bother, through attrition and the reorganization of some departments, we were half way there without a single person being fired.

I can tell the Hon. Member that I am not very much enamoured with Mr. Bennett's program in British Columbia. He did not discover the recession until the day after the election. We have known about it for some time. He could have done what the Progressive Conservative Government in Ontario has done over a period of years. Through attrition, intelligent planning, retraining and adult education programs, it has rearranged the structure to permit the Government to reduce its bloated Public Service. That can be done intelligently without creating the kind of pain and misery that the Hon. Member wishes to attribute to me. It was done back in 1979.

The Hon. Member referred to Schefferville. The reason the plant had to be shut down—and unfortunately if we keep these fellows in power very much longer there may be some other Schefferville—was that we are just no longer competitive. Five years ago Brazil was number five in the world in iron ore production, but today it produces more than Canada and the United States together.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member but the time for questions has expired. The Hon. Member for Burin-St. George's (Mr. Simmons).

Hon. Roger Simmons (Burin-St. George's): Mr. Speaker, my good friend from Skeena (Mr. Fulton) should not be too hard on the gentleman from Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle). He should keep in mind that he is one of the moderates in that Party; one of our friends, philosophically. He is really a soul-mate. Besides, he has already indicated to the House that he has been promised a position in Cabinet—like about 85 others over there.

Miss MacDonald: You had better not speak from experience.

Mr. Simmons: The Hon. Member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) talks about experience. I admit that she and I have something in common; we both went through Cabinet on a conveyor belt.

Miss MacDonald: I did something.

Mr. Simmons: We know you did. We know that the lady from Kingston and the Islands did something. We have spent the last four years trying to undo it. One need only talk to the Minister of Justice (Mr. MacGuigan), formerly the Secretary of State for External Affairs, to find out what kind of things the lady did.

I want to talk about what I thought was the outstanding performance of the Hon. Member for Prince George-Peace River, Mr. Speaker. Today he confirmed what my good friend, the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), has been telling the country for a number of months, and that is, that if you want to know what the Tories stand for, you have to elect them. You have to buy a pig in a poke. That is what members of that Party are saying to the people of Canada. If you want to know what our policies are, he says, you have to elect us first. I say to him—dream on.

I ask the hon. gentleman from Skeena not to be too hard on the gentleman from Prince George-Peace River because if we keep him on his feet long enough he will tell us other secrets about where the Tories do not stand on various issues.

The Tories are pretty steamed up these days about the Government's job-creation programs. I wonder why that is? They say that they did not have any input in some of the projects. What is wrong with that? Why should they have any say in the implementation of those projects? The people of Canada, four years ago in their wisdom, elected a Liberal Government. When will the Tories get it through their heads that they are not the Government? Of course, as Members of Parliament they can and must have their say in the House about public expenditures and programs, but they have absolutely no right to have any say in the implementation of those programs.

If the Tories want to have a say, they can do one of two things: they can get themselves elected as a government, or they can cross the floor and support the Government. Those are the only two ways they are going to have any say in the implementation of government programs. That is the way the democratic system works.

Mr. Dick: It is the way the porkbarrel system works.

Mr. Simmons: Do I have more to say in job creation programs than Tory MPs, Mr. Speaker? You bet your life I do; you had better believe it. I would be out of my skull to support a government that would not allow me to have any more say than if I were in the Opposition. Of course I have a say. Anyone who would suggest otherwise is misled, naive or both. Why, then, is there all this fuss about the Government's job creation program and the initiative we have been taking to create jobs across the country? Why all this contrived concern, this organized anger, this fake frothing of the mouth by the Tories? To find the answer to that question, Mr. Speaker, we must go back to 1979, to the days of the mercifully short-lived Tory Government. That Government wiped out job-creation programs which had been begun by the former Liberal Government. That is where that Party stands on job creation. It wiped out every fisheries project in Atlantic Canada with the Hon. Member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) as the Minister of Fisheries. I hear the Tories saying that is not true. They want to rewrite history on this one, like the gentleman from Prince George-Peace River has been taught to rewrite history on Schefferville. However, no one who lived in Schefferville will believe it. No one who lives in Labrador West believes his line. No one who lives in Newfoundland believes his line.

• (1650)

As I travel around Newfoundland, the political question I am asked most often by the average person who does not follow politics too closely is: The fellow who is the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mulroney), is he the same fellow who was the President of the Iron Ore Company of Canada? They ask me if that is the fellow who was involved in Schefferville. So I say to the gentleman from Prince George-Peace River that he would be politically smart to stay a thousand miles from that subject because there is no defence at all for what was done there, and the only excuse is that the Hon. Member for Central Nova (Mr. Mulroney), as he now is, was then taking his instructions from Cleveland.

Mr. Ellis: What kind of bafflegab is that?

Mr. Simmons: The Hon. Member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis) may not understand. That is understandable. If the Hon. Member for Central Nova had at heart the interests of the people of Schefferville that day, he would not have been so quick to kowtow to the multinational interests in Cleveland. That is what it means.

Mr. Ellis: Nonsense.

Mr. Simmons: There they go again, Mr. Speaker. That Party wants to rewrite some more history. These job-creation programs are meeting very real economic and social needs in this country.

Mr. Oberle: Dig a hole and fill it back in.

Mr. Simmons: These job-creation programs are providing jobs. They are improving facilities in communities across this country. The Hon. Member for Prince George-Peace River talks about digging holes and filling them back in. That shows just how much he knows about what these programs are doing across the country. Is a meat cutting facility in Robinson's, Newfoundland, digging a hole and filling it in again? No, it is a way of helping some farmers get their produce to market. Is the Hon. Member against that? What about a retaining wall at Crabbe's River in Newfoundland to assist some fishermen? How about a flood control structure in Rushoon, Newfoundland, to protect the property of the local residents? How about a fire hall at Morrisville, an improved water system at Red Harbour, a community centre at St. Theresa's, improvements to a hockey arena at Port aux Basques?

Mr. Oberle: Now we are getting to lists.

Mr. Simmons: That is hardly digging holes and filling them in again. That is addressing some very real concerns in communities across this country. Is it sinister, Mr. Speaker, is it sleazy, to help people across this land to protect their homes from flooding, to help farmers prepare their produce for market, to give fishermen's boats some protection against the sea? That is what the job-creation money, in which I have had a say, is going to do. The Tories call that sleazy, sinister, porkbarrelling. I say, Mr. Speaker, it is a very sensible use of public money. In the process we provide some job opportunities to people who have had a very rough year or so, especially in Newfoundland. The deep sea fishery has all but collapsed. The inshore fishery has had a most disastrous year.

Mr. Oberle: Whose fault is that?

Mr. Simmons: Seasonal construction activity is at an all-time low.

Mr. Oberle: Whose fault is that?

Mr. Simmons: The hon. gentleman asks whose fault that is. I can tell the Hon. Member. The unemployment rate in Newfoundland right now is 20 per cent, twice the national average, because we have in power in Newfoundland a Tory Government which would rather rail and rant, go to the super bowl games, and blame the federal Government, than to get on with the job it was elected to do, that is, to govern. Newfoundland has not had a day, an hour, or five minutes of provincial Government in the last four years or five years. It has had lots of speechifying, lots of oratory and lots of pointing the finger elsewhere. While it fiddles, Rome burns. While it engages in a continuing distraction, people are unemployed. That is whose fault it is, if the Hon. Member wants to know. We could not stand by and just point a finger and blame it all on some other people. We could not stand by and allow people in those communities to just go on welfare, so we provided what the Tories call some "porkbarrelling", what the Tories call "something sinister and sleazy", and what I call a very sensible use of public money, that is, providing slipway and wharf facilities for fishermen, providing improved facilities for farmers, and providing improved infrastructure in terms of water systems and community halls and arenas. That is what we have been doing with the money and what we will continue to do.

I believe it was the Hon. Member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) who earlier in the debate talked about this $300 million slush fund, as he called it. What are we doing with this slush fund, Mr. Speaker? I have just told you the kinds of things which are being done in my riding of Burin-St. George's. How about elsewhere across the country? How about in Kingston and the Islands where we have a good project which the hon. lady herself lobbied for and supported? How about Rosedale in Toronto? I am sure that people watching Question Period this afternoon saw the contradiction in the Tory questioning. In one mouthful they were charging that all the money had been spent in Liberal ridings, and in the next mouthful, the Hon. Member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) was on his feet complaining that some money was spent in his riding without his knowledge. We cannot take responsibility for the fact that the Tories sometimes do not do their homework. We cannot take the responsibility if they are not in touch with groups in their own ridings. If groups in their ridings have to come to Liberal Members of Parliament to get action, we cannot exactly be blamed for that. Should the Hon. Member for York South-Weston (Mrs. Appolloni) have washed her hands of it and said no to these people? Or should she have done what I believe is her duty to do as an Hon. Member of this House, that is, see to it that people, whether in her riding or elsewhere across this country, have access to information about government programs. Her sin is that she did her job. The sin of the Hon. Member for Rosedale is that instead of doing his homework and keeping in touch with community groups in his riding, he comes into this House and tries to smear someone else for doing what he should have done in the first place.

Where else are we spending this money? I know that some of the ridings in Quebec are Liberal. I am told that is the case. However, I hear talk of one riding called Joliette and I am told that Joliette, at the moment at least, does not have a Liberal Member of Parliament. Yet, I hear, Mr. Speaker, that one project in that riding of Joliette, represented by a good Tory in this House, received $400,000 out of this so-called slush fund. I must admit that in the case of Joliette we do have a motive. We do have a hidden agenda, a broadly based political motive, in seeing to it that some money flows into that riding. We want to see the Hon. Member for Joliette (Mr. LaSalle) back here. We cannot bear the thought of having a House with no Tories from Quebec. Since their leadership convention, eight full months, the Tories have been trying to find a riding in Quebec safe enough for the temporary Hon. Member for Central Nova. That has been their preoccupation for eight months. They do a poll, they do not like it, so they do a poll on the poll. One of these days, Mr. Speaker, they will find one they think is safe enough.

• (1700)

Mr. Oberle: Have you tried one in B.C. lately, or Alberta?

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, there is no slush fund. There is no slush fund!

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Oberle: Louder.

Mr. Simmons: There is no slush fund. By George, I think they have got it. There is no slush fund. This is just one of our latest efforts to help some people who are unemployed. Some of the people we are helping moved from Schefferville. They are down in my riding now and they have jobs, thanks to those programs. That is what we are doing with this so-called slush fund. What, then, Mr. Speaker, are the criteria for this fund? One—

Mr. Oberle: You have to be Liberal.

Mr. Simmons: One, the need for some jobs. Two, the availability of projects. These are two criteria. He says there is a third one: you have to be a Liberal. It so happens there are a lot of Liberals out there and a lot of them are administering those projects. There are a lot of Tories administering some of those projects as well as some NDP, and working on them too. The criteria are a need for jobs and the availability of some sensible projects.

The gentleman from Prince George-Peace River calls for rekindling the entrepreneurial spirit. I have news for him: we got there before him. We are rekindling that spirit. There is growth in the economy. You can ignore all the economic indicators you want to, but that will not make them go away. They clearly show that we have bottomed out. Despite all the gloom and doom from the Tories who wish everything would go wrong, such is not the case. We are providing these job creation programs in the short term as a bridge to the point where we have other jobs flowing from a revitalized private sector, thanks to the policies of this particular Government. That is why I am delighted to be able to vote against this motion.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I have a comment. It is not often that I would say I feel slandered in the House, but I want it to appear on the record that I do not consider my time as a Cabinet Minister to be comparable or compared in any way with the period of time of the Hon. Member who has just spoken when he was a member of Cabinet. I make a very real distinction between the two and I want the record to show that.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, I am glad the lady from Kingston and the Islands made that point. The only point I was making in reference to my brief period in Cabinet, which discussion she initiated, not I, was that when I was there I did no damage at all.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Oberle: That will make the quote of the week.

Mr. Nystrom: He did not have any time; he was only there for two weeks.

My question deals with the so-called slush fund, Mr. Speaker. In Saskatchewan we do not have any Liberal ridings to spend it on, so the money is spent differently. The program I want to ask about is the Immediate Employment Stimulation Program looked after by Senator Hazen Argue. It involves $4 million, and the only access to it is through Senator Hazen Argue. I approached officials in the Department of Employment and Immigration for capital funds and they told me that there is no such funding available. They say that under Canada Works and so on we can fund the labour component of some project but we have no money for capital expenses. We get quite a few projects like that, Mr. Speaker, and we keep on being told there is no such program. We find out later on, through contacts which have to remain confidential, that indeed Senator Argue is administering a $4 million fund. They do give out moneys for capital costs. Does the Hon. Member think it is proper that that kind of thing be kept from Members of Parliament and from municipalities?

The other question deals with the fact that public servants are not involved in screening these applications. Project officers are not involved in looking at and analysing the applications. Departmental officials do not make any recommendations. A decision is made in Senator Hazen Argue's office, and that is it. It goes to Ottawa where it is rubber stamped, and after that the Public Service become involved. Is this proper? Do we not have public servants who are supposed to do a job such as they do for Canada Works and all the other programs? Why in this case is a Minister of the Crown making these unilateral decisions rather than going through the Public Service, which is the right, proper and decent way?

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, first of all, the Senator from Saskatchewan has another responsibility. He is a Member of Government. In that capacity he has some decision-making authority. I do not know beyond that what the system is in Saskatchewan. However, I can tell the Hon. Member that in so far as any job creation projects I have been involved in are concerned, all have been subject to very close scrutiny, screening and examination by Manpower officials. I can only assume that the same process happens elsewhere.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I would urge the Hon. Member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) to look at the "blues", because he may have a question of privilege to raise arising out of comments made by the previous speaker. I would also like to point out that the Schefferville settlement from Iron Ore Company of Canada has been judged by impartial observers as the largest, fairest, most generous settlement in Canadian corporate history.

Mr. Gimaïel: Come on!

Mr. Hawkes: That tells us about the attitude of the Leader of this Party toward working people in this country. If that had been paralleled by Members opposite, we would have expected major government initiatives, but none of us in the House have ever seen that. But we have seen a response from a corporation president who is now our Leader, and it speaks well for the future of working people in this country under what we hope will soon be a new Government.

The question I have for the Member is the following. In the last 19 years his Party has been, with the exception of nine months, the Government of this country. Throughout most of that period, and certainly today, the Province of Newfoundland which he represents has had an extremely high unemployment rate. Can the Member tell us what he thinks is so marvellous about the policies of the Party he supports when, in a period of 19 years, nothing but unemployed people have been created in the Province of Newfoundland? Why have these marvellous policies not solved the unemployment problem in Newfoundland in 19 years?

• (1710)

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman for Calgary West is completely right when he says that the Schefferville settlement was a good one. It was not the settlement that I was criticizing. It is the set of circumstances that triggered the need for a settlement.

The settlement was good because my colleague from Manicouagan (Mr. Maltais) made representations. The then President of Iron Ore was publicly on record at that time as paying tribute to the gentleman who did what we on this side are good at doing, that is, getting after the Government to address some of the real problems in the country.

Yes, the Government addressed the problem but no, the Government did not create the problem. The Hon. Member who is now the temporary Member for Central Nova created the problem passively by taking his cues from Cleveland instead of from the people he was representing in that particular community.

Let me answer the other part of the question. This Government has created literally thousands of jobs in Newfoundland but government in this country must be a partnership of both levels of government. While we have taken many initiatives to create jobs all over Newfoundland, the provincial Government in Newfoundland itself has done absolutely nothing. If the two Governments had been working together, the Hon. Member is right that the unemployment rate would be much lower. The reason it is twice as high as the national average is that there has been a Government in Newfoundland at St. John's that has absolutely refused to govern. It is too busy making speeches.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the Hon. Member when he was talking about the constituency of Joliette. First he said that the Liberals had poured vast sums of money into Joliette, and then he had the gall to say that it was for the purpose of re-electing the present Tory Member. Everyone knows that this was done without concern for the present Member for Joliette (Mr. LaSalle) but to try to defeat him and buy a Liberal a seat.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Taylor: They start hollering when you tell the truth. Does the Hon. Member think that the Quebec people are that naive?

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, it is not the people of Quebec who I think are naive. Every last person in Quebec understood the tongue-in-cheek nature of the comment I made about keeping the Member for Joliette here. I only regret that my good friend from Bow River (Mr. Taylor) does not understand tongue-in-cheek because of another problem called foot-in-mouth.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): The period for questions and comments has expired.

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate. Before commencing my remarks let me read the motion which is before the House. It is:

> That this House condemns the government for:
> 1. employing corporate tax handouts to produce business profits without any guarantees that such tax benefits would result in new investment or job creation;
>
> 2. increasing the tax burden on Canadians at the very time when more stimulus is needed in the economy; and
> 3. allocating job-creation funds in a partisan fashion not based upon local employment levels.

We are also debating an amendment moved by the Conservative Opposition that the motion be followed by:

> Instead of focusing on job-creation programs open to all eligible Canadians, such as Career Access and refundable Employment Tax Credits.

In commencing my remarks I would like first to focus on the amendment. In that respect, I want to draw the attention of the House to a message I just received over the phone during the last period of questions and comments. My constituency is now faced with a new problem as a result of the blood brothers and blood sisters of this Conservative outfit to our right in the government of the Province of British Columbia.

In May of 1983 the new Valhalla Alpine Provincial Park was created in my constituency by the provincial Government in response to pressure from a very broad cross section of opinion. The President of the society which launched that successful drive will receive the Governor General's medal for conservation in Canada later this month as a result of his discussions with the Canadian tourist industry.

The industry properly feels that this new park has the possibility of providing our area with some flexibility in our local economy to compensate for some of the losses that we have suffered due to the deterioration of our forest industry, which in turn is a result of mismanagement by both the federal Government and the provincial Government under which we suffer.

The news I received a few moments ago concerns the federal Government's highly touted new employment program Environment 2000. The local Parks Branch personnel in my area who are familiar with our needs and characteristics were supporting an application under Environment 2000 to build some trails and facilities in that park in order to develop it. This, in turn, would provide some alternative employment based on the tourist industry and the service industry in that area. The provincial Ministry of Parks in Victoria has vetoed that proposal.

I will raise the point more than once that it is strange to have a Conservative Opposition in the House which talks about focusing on job creation programs that are open to all eligible Canadians while their blood brothers and blood sisters in that gang that masquerades as a provincial Government in British Columbia kills every opportunity that we have to begin to grow, diversify and create some long-term employment in our area. It is an area that has one of the highest rates of unemployment in British Columbia and is coming close to being one of the highest unemployment areas in Canada.

The figures that I received today from Employment Canada officers in my area show that the Nelson area now has an unemployment rate of some 24.6 per cent. The unemployment rate in the major community of Nelson itself is now hovering close to 27 per cent or 28 per cent. With announced further cutbacks, further lay-offs and more closures of institutions, in my home town in that riding we will be doing very well if we are much under 40 per cent in the next couple of months. We are facing a disaster.

I am sure most politicians who try to work on behalf of their constituents will cut cards with the devil if necessary in order to get results for their people. I am thankful that during the last four years I have been able to play some part in co-operation with many federal officials in achieving more in terms of grants and programs to assist us in rebuilding an agricultural base in some parts of our area and rebuilding some of the cottage industry which used to thrive there. But this attempt to diversify is of little value when it is in the form of a multitude of mini-programs—welcome and as useful as they are—while at the same time the macroeconomic policy of the Government in Ottawa and the Conservative Government in Victoria is eliminating any chance we have for establishing a healthy economy in the long run.

The forest industry in British Columbia is absolutely vital to the economic welfare of every resident of that province. This includes the people of my constituency. However, because of government mismanagement here and government mismanagement in Victoria, we are left with a residue of over-mature forests and little effective reforestation. We are left with seedlings, because of budget cuts, tht are dying before they get to the planting areas. Due to the under-funding of forestry programs by the federal government and the provincial governments, and the industry has neglected this as well, there has been long-term neglect of reforestation, regeneration policies and silviculture. As a result, we see whole communities that are beginning to wither and die. With all of the incentive programs—and I relate more particularly here to the subject matter before us—even with all the acceleration of tax incentive programs over the years, the industry has not seen fit to retool its basic plant, even though the research is available. The industry has known the plywood industry was dying, that the resource was not there to supply the West Coast and the B.C. interior plywood industry, because the nature of the resource has changed as a result of long-term mismanagement.

• (1720)

The technology is there. It is being used in other parts of Canada and in the United States. They are converting plants from plywood to waferboard, to chipboard, to finger-jointing and to a number of product areas where one can utilize the stock that we have remaining in order to produce a viable and economic product that can be marketed. The markets are there. Operations in place in other areas have shown that is the case. Yet with all the incentives and write-offs available to industry, and increasingly available because of the policies of this Government, the industry still has not got off its rear end. It is amazing to listen to the Conservatives to my right suggesting that the answer is to remove Government. "Let us have faith in the private sector . . . Hallelujah!", they say, "The private sector will do the whole darn thing." But the private sector has not done so. It has failed miserably, even with all the tools the Government has laid open to them. It is not in this case a matter of more research. The private sector has simply failed to do its job.

I listened to the Hon. Member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) a few minutes ago talking about some NDP policy that he must have invented in the far depths of his imagination, that somehow it was our policy to give taxpayers' dollars as grants or incentives to companies to move new mining operations to the South Seas or build huge pulp mills in other parts of the world. I do not know what he has been smoking but I have never heard anyone from this Party suggest that those were appropriate types of policies to be followed. In fact, we have been in the forefront many times of criticizing the Government across the way for exactly such policies. We continue to do so for its continuing grants and incentives that have allowed both corporate mergers and take-overs on a vastly increasing scale and for subsidizing with Canadian dollars our own competition in other parts of the world.

MacMillan Bloedel, for instance, required no special grants in order to use millions and millions of Canadian-earned dollars to build up competition to its Canadian operations in South America. MacMillan Bloedel did this on its own. Why? Because it is not the prime prerogative of any large corporation to have a national loyalty. They are not bad guys for doing that. MacMillan Bloedel behaved in the way we should expect it to behave. One of the purposes surely of any government is to impose a certain value system on industry operating in this country, that one of its duties aside from serving its shareholders is to be certain that a reasonable share—and certainly it would not be going too far astray to suggest that that should be the major share of the money earned here from our resources and our labour—be reinvested here. We have not only failed to do that but the Conservatives want to encourage that failure even more—to just shovel incentives out. Then the Conservatives will demand at some time that we have more tax incentives to allow all kinds of new fancy research to replace those basic industry jobs that, due to the Conservatives policies, its friends' policies and the corporate sector's policies, we have shipped out of this country by the thousands and thousands over past decades. I cannot understand where they are coming from.

We have shared in the criticism and we have initiated some of that criticism. About mid-1982 I recall asking questions in this House specifically about a special employment incentives program to be administered through the Prime Minister's Office and with all the decisions to be made by key Liberal Senators—I named certain ones in Saskatchewan and British Columbia—which would obviously result in a patronage-ridden system to disburse taxpayers' largesse administered by the Government. We do not like that kind of thing. Nor do we like the type of allocations that are made without any appropriate consultation at the local level so that people in all walks of life can have some share in what makes sense in terms of investment, grant programs and developmental procedures.

It is interesting to look at the record of the Conservative Government, that short blip in 1979, when it wiped out local advisory boards. Then the Liberal Government reinstituted them and then it scrapped them again. The PCs will listen to them now. Now Members of Parliament must pay for them out of their own pockets. I do not mind doing that. I would rather pay money out of my own pocket to ensure we have good local input into that kind of decision making than, for the sake of saving a few days' time, relegate all authority to people in the bureaucracy who do not have a clear understanding of what the local needs and priorities are.

What is the Conservative attitude to job creation? We have it as reported in the Montreal Gazette for May 18, 1983. That is from their new Leader:

"Oh, there'll be jobs for Liberals and NDPers too," Mulroney said in New Brunswick recently, "but only after I've been prime minister for 15 years and I can't find a single living, breathing Tory to appoint."

There is the Tory job-creation policy. The Tories talk about patronage. But they will say their Leader was only appealing for votes then, and trying to get elected as leader. I suppose that is the explanation for that. Since we have not heard anything more about the Tory job-creation policy, this is all that stands. I would not call the Tories hypocrites. Of course we do not do that here. But there is something wrong when people at one time can stand in this House and complain about patronage while having on the record at the same time that their job-creation programs will only be for Members of their own Party for a 15 years period. Hopefully we will never get the chance to suffer 15 years of Tory rule. If the Tories do in 15 years what their blood brothers and sisters have done in British Columbia for 29 out of the last 32 years, then this country will be even lower than it is today. It will be well below ground.

I want now to give an idea of just how serious the employment picture is. While we appreciate those programs which have allowed for the creation of some jobs in my area, albeit short-term ones, I want to refer to a few figures to show how serious the situation has been in my constituency. In the area of logging, in the period from 1980 to March 1983 we lost 310 jobs; in manufacturing and processing, 1,019 jobs; in mining, 407 jobs; in construction, 320 jobs; and in the retail and service sector, 350 jobs. None of these figures include staff reductions of businesses still in operation. These are just closures in a constituency which has the smallest population of any constituency in the Province of British Columbia and, as I said, with a 27 per cent unemployment rate today.

There have also been cutbacks by the provincial Government in Victoria in forestry, of all areas, which led to a higher percentage of terminations than in any other area in the province. We are a major forestry region, For some reason the Federal Government, in the same way as it hands out tax incentives and allowances without seeking any guarantees or without any supervision, also handed out funds for education and health to the provincial Government and allowed that gang in Victoria to eliminate an entire educational institution, getting rid of another 100 full-time jobs and the income generated by over 500 students. All these things are happening at once.

Is the Government surprised that we do not sound overly grateful because we have been successful in working with its officials to bring in a relatively large number of short-term job-creation projects?

I have not loaded my speech with statistics. There are many people to do that. The statistics are available. The Government has seem them. It saw them in the Carter report and in numerous reports which it commissioned publicly and privately over a number of years. I would like to quote the Chairman of the Bank of Montreal who said:

All industry is awash in tax incentive now. There is so much unused capacity . . . the last thing they are going to want is more capacity.

With a policy like that, surely it is time for members of the Government to realize that by handing out money by the barrel, without insisting upon results and insisting upon receiving value for the money expended, is not accomplishing anything. We must work to ensure that industry builds upon our strengths, not see it wiped out and then spend piddly amounts all over the place, trying to come up with research for new grand visions which we never know will work or not.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Are there any questions or comments? As no one wants to put any questions or make any comments, the Chair recognizes the Hon. Member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Bujold) on debate.

[Translation]

Order, please. The Hon. Member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Bujold).

Mr. Rémi Bujold (Benaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to take part in this debate. First, I should like to answer my colleague for Kootenay West (Mr. Kristiansen) who was complaining a moment ago that the Government had abolished advisory committees for the selection of job creation programs. The explanation is very simple, Mr. Speaker: we on this side of the House would sooner allocate those funds to create permanent jobs rather than hire people or give money to some people who in all likelihood would emphasize regional input; our priority was job creation programs.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to deal specifically with the third paragraph of the motion introduced today which has to do with the allocation of job creation funds. We have been accused of partisanship. Well, Mr. Speaker, I want to go back a few years and mention briefly the economic problems experienced by all industrialized nations throughout the world, particularly those we had here in Canada. That is one of the factors which make it interesting to follow the gradual increase in the unemployment rate over the past five years. In 1979-80, for example, the Government of Canada set aside some $330 million for its various job creation programs. We allocated about $300 million in 1980-81 and about $340 million in 1981-82 when the economic situation took a turn for the worse throughout the world, particularly so in Canada. Our response in 1982-83 was to earmark close to $550 million for the many job creation programs all over Canada.

The year 1983-84 was bleaker still with respect to new jobs, lay-offs and severe unemployment throughout the country, so the Canadian Government—the Liberal Government—assumed its responsibilities by appropriating an unprecedented amount of about $1.5 billion to create jobs for Canadians.

For the past fifteen days or so, it has come as quite a surprise to hear our colleagues across the floor complain that the Government has allocated its job creation funds in a partisan fashion. It seems to me that they are afraid or quite simply naive to the point that they do not want to face reality and see for themselves just what has been happening.

A moment ago I referred to the amounts of money spent to create jobs. Well, that money was spent on the basis of unemployment figures. It stands to reason that the bulk of the money went to those regions of Canada where the unemployment rate was highest. As it happened, some of the funds went to many ridings represented by our Liberal colleagues, Mr. Speaker, precisely because those ridings had the highest number of job seekers in the country. I might give my region as an example—eastern Quebec and my riding of Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine—where at certain times of the year, we had as much as 60 per cent of the labour force out of work.

No wonder therefore that we should get a lot of money to create jobs. Still, Mr. Speaker, I must point out that the then Minister of Employment and Immigration was very anxious to open up our job creation programs to as many people and organizations as possible, so he managed to streamline the twelve programs we had then into four new ones. We thought at the time that those programs should be made readily available to all and that the various local groups should find it easier to apply for those programs.

It has been realized over the last two weeks or so that most, if not all Canadians understand and endorse the amendments we made to our job creation programs, and especially that many groups could apply, except our friends opposite, our friends from both Opposition parties. To listen to them in this House for the past two weeks, one would think they alone in Canada have not understood the amendments we have made to these programs in order, as I said, to make them more readily available to the people, and easier to understand. No wonder, Mr. Speaker, that the Canadian people know exactly what the Opposition parties are up to, and that is why they were not elected in 1980. For that same reason, the people will not dare elect them at the next election, simply because they find so hard to understand the various job creation programs we are putting forward and want to make available to all.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, to put it briefly, these projects that we have streamlined into four are extremely simple and readily available. And they are extremely easy to administer. Whether it is Career-Access or Job Corps or again the NEED or the LEAP Program, these are all programs which ensure that people in high unemployment areas can apply and benefit from those funds.

Another important point has been raised this week and the week before to the effect that Hon. Members had not been made aware of the various existing programs. I have before me, Mr. Speaker, letters sent to me as an elected representative, as a Member of Parliament, by the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Those letters were sent to all Members of this House. In January 1982, the 282 Members of this House received a letter from the Minister informing them about the Summer Canada Program. That information was made available to all Hon. Members opposite. In February 1983, Mr. Speaker, once more, the then Minister sent a letter to all Members of Parliament giving them all kinds of information on the Summer Canada Program.

In December 1983, once again, a letter was sent to all Members to inform them about the funds allocated to each constituency under the Canada Works projects.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, on December 30, 1983, the Minister of Employment and Immigration sent everyone of us various information on the Summer Canada Program for the whole country and for each constituency. How can we accept that those Members now complain they have not been informed of the various job creation programs? More questions should be raised, Mr. Speaker, and we should try to find out the true reasons why we are called to task today for having failed to provide the House with adequate information about our job-creation programs. While Members on this side of the House were protecting the interests of their constituents and fighting unemployment throughout the country, those people, especially the members of the Official Opposition, were fighting over their party leadership. That episode lasted for two or three months if not four. Therefore, it is not surprising that they did not have enough time to read letters from the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Afterwards, they organized a four-month leadership convention. Once again, it is not surprising that those people did not have time to read their mail. They travelled throughout the country, as it was pointed out earlier this year, to try and enroll young people as delegates to their convention. They went on arguing throughout the country to see what candidate they would support. How could they get around to read letters from the Minister of Employment and Immigration?

They would come late or at the last minute to sittings of committees and ask just a few questions to be able to show their constituents that they were dealing with unemployment. But that was not their main concern. They had more vital issues on their mind, that is their convention. After the convention, we thought that they would be at least in a position to look after their constituents and get acquainted with the various job-creation programs available.

I should point out, Mr. Speaker, that the Hon. Member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) is probably the only Opposition member who has been able to understand and benefit from these projects, probably because he has somewhat withdrawn from this leadership squabble. He stayed on the sidelines and has had the opportunity to study the proposals that were passed on to him and to benefit from these programs.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest one must face the facts and not try to deceive the Canadian people by implying that the government and the Liberal Party have tried to hide certain things from this House and from the people. Our job creation programs have been based on clear cut figures that cannot be misinterpreted throughout the country since they are published by Statistics Canada. Those figures show that unemployment is particularly high in some areas of this country, which have a greater need for job creation programs. And today, some Hon. Members would have us believe that we deliberately deceived the Canadian people because we have tried to alleviate the plight of people and to create jobs for the unemployed! Canadians will have to pass judgment during this coming year on the behaviour of these Hon. Members. They will be asked to decide who is right in this debate, this government who tries to alleviate the sufferings of some Canadians or Opposition Members who merely try to make political gains by making unfounded accusations.

In conclusion, I believe it is most important for us to realize that this government stands for the interests of the poor in this country. That has always made and will always make the reputation of the Liberal Party, Mr. Speaker. That is why we are the government and that is why we will stay in power in the future.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Order, please. It being 5:45 p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 62(9), to interrupt the proceedings and to put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of supply proceedings.

[English]

The question is on the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): All those opposed to the amendment will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): In my opinion, the nays have it.

And more than five Members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Call in the Members.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. McGrath) which was negatived on the following division:

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S.O. 21

[English]

PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE

CONDEMNATION OF OFFICIALS' ACTIONS

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, it is a sad day for Canada when taxpayers' funds are used by the Office of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) for a personal witch hunt.

The Liberal Party and its hired hacks have shown the country that there is no limit to the private correspondence they are prepared to reveal, no limit to the dirty tricks they are prepared to use, no limit to the cover-up, no limit to their personal attacks, no limit to their slush-fund approach to politics, no limit to the conspiracy, and no limit to the depths to which they are prepared to sink.

Desperate men and women adopt desperate tactics. The corruption in the Liberal Party reached the point where even its own party members rebelled at the last convention, and that was before the infamous "sidepocket" affair. The Prime Minister's Office makes the Watergate group look like angels, with its sleazy tricks. What is more, every Liberal MP stands condemned because they condone these tactics and are powerless to do anything about them. They will leave a sad legacy. They are a blot on democracy.

EMPLOYMENT

GRANT TO COVENANT HOUSE, TORONTO—CONFESSION OF ASSISTANCE

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South-Weston): Mr. Speaker, according to yesterday's Hansard, the Hon. Member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) spoke of matters of morality. We on this side of the House believe that the grossest immorality occurs if Members, once alerted to serious problems, do nothing to find solutions.

I was alerted to the serious problem of street kids in an article entitled "Social Time Bomb Ticks on Yonge Street Strip" in the Sunday Star, dated October 16, 1983, and I sought a solution. But for that I now stand accused by Tory Members.

Therefore, for having helped, either directly or indirectly, to provide accommodation and sustenance for derelict young people from all across Canada—mea culpa; for having thereby dared to tread on the slumbering fiefdom of Rosedale—mea culpa; for having, either directly or indirectly, created jobs sponsored by the entire Roman Catholic Archdiocese of Toronto—mea maxima culpa.

ACTIONS OF OFFICIALS—CALL FOR GENERAL ELECTION

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, it is now clear that the backroom manipulators in the Office of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) reach into our pockets, take our wallets, and use their slush funds to create secret service jobs in the Prime Minister's Office. That is not democracy. That is not representative government. That is not the Canada I know and love.

The backroom spenders in the Prime Minister's Office have been inventing ways to attack Members of Parliament. Last week the Prime Minister himself tried to slur me in the eyes of my family, friends and voters, by suggesting that I was a second-class Member of Parliament and that I made up quotations. If I am on the Prime Minister's hit list, then let those backroom spenders and secret service agents in the Prime Minister's Office try. It is our duty in this Chamber to defend democracy. Let the people judge. Canada's people need an election. They need it now. The four years are up.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MALAWI—APPEAL FOR COMMUTATION OF DEATH SENTENCES IMPOSED ON FORMER JUSTICE MINISTER AND WIFE

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask Hon. Members of the House to join me in requesting the Life-President of Malawi to commute the death sentences imposed on Orton Chirwa, former Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Malawi, and his wife, Vera.

The Chirwas were convicted in July, 1982, of treason by the Regional Traditional Court. They insisted that they were innocent. They appealed to the National Traditional Court, which upheld the sentence of the lower court. Amnesty International has stated that procedures of these courts did not conform to internationally-recognized legal norms. The matter is being raised at the current session of the United Nations Human Rights Commission. However, the only remaining means of appeal in Malawi at the present time is to its Life-President, Dr. Banda. Therefore I urge Members to request that Dr. Banda exercise his presidential powers of clemency to spare the lives of Mr. and Mrs. Chirwa on humanitarian and compassionate grounds.

PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE

ALLEGED GATHERING OF BUSINESS INFORMATION RELATING TO LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I must say that I also heard the news this morning that the Prime Minister's Office allegedly turned its employees into secret agents to try and justify the slurs on the reputation of a man who has made it clear that he intends to direct all his energies towards pursuing the interests of his country. In the circumstances, I appeal to the sense of honour of all the Members of this House, to severely censure these absolutely odious attempts, stemming from attitudes that are entirely unacceptable to this Parliament, to examine someone's past for the purpose of preventing him from serving his country properly. In the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I severely censure and I demand and urge the Prime Minister, as soon as he is back, to explain the reasons for an investigation into matters that are totally irrelevant as far as we are concerned.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

NEW ERA IN PREDICTING WEATHER

Mr. Denis Ethier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, now that one of North America's most advanced computers has been put into service at the Canadian Meteorological Centre in Dorval, Canada is entering a new era of more reliable long-term weather forecasting. This computer will also play a major role in agriculture and the environment. It will produce seasonal forecasts and better assessments of climatic changes. It will facilitate national and international research on transboundary air pollution. The computer will also make it possible to develop better strategies against acid rain and for intervening faster and more effectively in the case of environmental emergencies.

Mr. Speaker, the Liberal Government does not hesitate to intervene in these high technology sectors, since providing meteorological information puts more than $1 billion each year into the economy.

[English]

EMPLOYMENT

GRANT TO ALLIANCE COMMUNITY SERVICES, TORONTO—RECONSIDERATION REQUESTED

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I was in Edmonton last weekend. I talked to a lot of unemployed people, especially young people. These people need hope. They need job-creation programs. They are very important programs. That is why I raised in the House this week the grant of $583,000 to the Community Alliance Group in Toronto.

Considering that there are existing agencies there already doing the job, considering that there is opposition from the Italian community, considering that even the Member of Parliament for York West (Mr. Fleming) is quoted in today's Toronto Star as saying there were outsiders involved in this grant and the social agency is raiding his own riding, and considering that it is becoming increasingly obvious that this grant was a result of political influence, I ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Roberts), as a political Minister and as a Minister of the Government, to rise above this and to reconsider the grant, to do what he said he would do when he met with the groups, that he would reallocate moneys, because to do otherwise is very unfair to the Italian community in Toronto, and very unfair to the unemployed in Canada.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES ACT

POSITION OF LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION AND OF PARTY MEMBERS

Mr. Pierre Gimaïel (Lac-Saint-Jean): Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Politics certainly make strange bedfellows, Mr. Speaker. I heard the Member for Joliette speak earlier in defense of the man he called "the golden calf" during his Party's leadership campaign more than a year ago. At the time he spoke with considerable eloquence about that gentleman's past. Mr. Speaker, I would now like to say a few words about the future of the Member for Central Nova (Mr. Mulroney).

The Hon. Member for Central Nova (Mr. Mulroney) would have Quebecers today believe that his Party has wiped out the blot made on its record by that same Party in the Riel affair. I would like to point out to the Hon. Member that there are still Members in his own Party who are against the Official Languages Act have said so in no uncertain terms. I am referring, for instance, to the Member for Simcoe-South (Mr. Stewart) and the Member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie), to name only two.

Mr. Speaker, I remember during the debate on the Constitution that I asked the Hon. Member's predecessor, the Member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark), to call the Member for Simcoe-South to order, following a speech he had made, and I challenged him to do what the former Progressive Conservative Leader, Robert Stanfield, did with the Member for Moncton at the time.

I may point out to the Member for Central Nova (Mr. Mulroney) what happened to the Member for Yellowhead afterwards. He failed to do what he should have done to clarify his Party's position, and it was his own Party that removed him from his position as Leader of the Opposition at the time. I therefore urge the Member for Central Nova to do his duty to Canada and to all French-speaking Canadians and keep a tight rein on Members of his Party who are not in agreement with that Party's philosophy, if indeed it has one, Mr. Speaker.

INVESTIGATION OF LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION—CALL FOR GOVERNMENT'S RESIGNATION

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, the committee set up by the President of the Liberal party concluded that the Liberal Party was in a "state of disarray", that it was "tired, arrogant, self-serving, self-satisfied and irrelevant", and its aim was to build a better Liberal Party. Well, any improvement would make the Party better. In fact it could not sink any lower, or become any more corrupt.

In today's Globe and Mail there is a story of the Prime Minister's Office using taxpayers' money to snoop into the private life, before he was elected, of the Leader of the Progressive Conservative Party. They have no policies of their own to combat the debt-ridden unemployed society they have created, and they fear the honest approach of our Leader, so they try to find dirt to throw at him. They used the taxpayers' money to finance their misdemeanor. They could not find anything but good, and so the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) made up a story that, when he was in private life, our Leader was begging for the rich and for himself, when in fact his letters were pleading for a fair deal for the workers. The Minister's apology was hollow.

How many other Canadians are being snooped and investigated? Is any Canadian safe? No wonder the Liberal committee says this Government is self-serving. Canadians want their Government to show honesty and have integrity. The Liberals have betrayed Canadians. They should resign and let a man of the stature of our PC Leader take over and restore honesty and integrity to the Government of this country.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

TRANSPORTATION OF TOXIC WASTES THROUGH CANADIAN WATERS

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, last week a bargeload of toxic waste was shipped from Alaska to Seattle through Canadian waters. The 261 metric tonnes of waste from American military bases was contaminated with cancer causing polychlorinated biphenyls, or PCBs. Although this barge travelled through the inland passage of British Columbia, our provincial Government was not notified. According to the B.C. Environment Minister, our federal Government does not require pre-notification for such shipments in spite of the hazard they pose to our coastline.

The threat to marine life, and ultimately to human life, is taken seriously by the people of British Columbia even if the Ottawa Liberals choose to ignore it. This careless attitude on the part of the federal Government is the same that was shown to the uranium mine at Key Lake before the massive spill of radioactive material there a few weeks ago. It is a situation similar to the unwanted seepage of toxic waste coming from the United States across the Niagara River into Canada.

I call on the Minister of the Environment, (Mr. Caccia), the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. De Bané), the Minister of Transport (Mr. Axworthy), and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) to get together and draft regulations forbidding the transportation of toxic waste through Canadian waters.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE

OFFICIALS' INVESTIGATION OF LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister who will know of the admission by officials of the Prime Minister's Office that that office was using public funds, and publicly funded employees, to conduct a vain witch hunt into the background of the Leader of the Opposition before he was in public life, and may well have been involved in activities which will prove to be illegal.

I am sure that the Acting Prime Minister is as alarmed as I am by this evidence of the spread of a Watergate mentality into the Prime Minister's Office.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): We know that there was a covert operation mounted by officials of the Prime Minister's Office. I ask the Acting Prime Minister who authorized it?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if one were to take at face value the description given by the Right Hon. Member for Yellowhead, or indeed presumably the newspaper article upon which his descriptions have been based, then there might be cause for concern because the newspaper story alleges a covert intelligence operation. That is quite untrue, and quite false. There was no such covert intelligence operation conducted by the Prime Minister's Office into the conduct of the Leader of the Opposition and into his background before he entered public life. There was no such covert operation, and I deny it completely.

I would ask the Right Hon. Member for Yellowhead to take a rather more responsible attitude to a very important matter.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): The Acting Prime Minister's denial, and his disinterest in the fundamental principles of decency and morality and the practice of the House of Commons are denied by the words of the officials in the Prime Minister's Office.

RESPONSIBILITY FOR AUTHORIZING INVESTIGATION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, I notice that the Acting Prime Minister has admitted that there was an operation. I notice that he has declined to answer my question as to who authorized it. I repeat that question. Who authorized that operation which we believe broke the law, and which we know broke the traditions of this Parliament? To whom did Mr. Crenna report when he came back from his vain witch hunt in Washington?

• (1420)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, let us take the case of Mr. Crenna and explain exactly what happened.

Mr. Crenna is a full-time employee of the Prime Minister's Office. He was in Washington on a variety of questions as a member of that office. They were important public questions which he was examining in Washington, in the course of which he went to the Securities and Exchange Commission to seek the annual report of the Iron Ore Company, and to seek some other information that is part of the public record. He went into a public office, signed a paper, secured authority to receive those documents which are available to any citizen in the United States and in Canada. It took a very short time, and this is the basis upon which the former Leader of the Opposition uses the words "a witch hunt", and the basis upon which the writer in The Globe and Mail says that two employees, two people from the Prime Minister's Office, were engaged in covert intelligence gathering.

What Mr. Crenna did in Washington is something that was done publicly, that was done openly, and that is on the public record. There is nothing covert about it. It can be done by any citizen, by paying the required fee to the public authority.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REASON FOR OBTAINING INFORMATION FROM U.S. SECURITIES AND EXCHANGE COMMISSION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, again the Acting Prime Minister refuses to answer the question. He has admitted the operation.

Let me ask him why Mr. Crenna was down there getting information from the Securities and Exchange Commission? Who authorized his venture? To whom did he report when he came back? Will the Acting Prime Minister tell us whether the Prime Minister of Canada knew about this venture directly, or whether he knew about the operation only indirectly through his principal secretary who was part of the group that laid the plan?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think we have to bear in mind that what Mr. Crenna sought was public information on the operation of a wholly owned multinational corporation. It is a matter of public record that when the Leader of the Opposition sought the leadership of his Party, he built a very important part of his appeal to the Canadian public on his superior management abilities in the Iron Ore Company of Canada and how he handled labour adjustment problems. It seemed to me to be—

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): To you?

Mr. MacEachen: —a very important part of the research activities of any professional organization to find out all about this masterful operation, in the words of the now Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Crenna was examining an issue that had been brought into the public domain by the Leader of the Opposition as he sought the leadership of the Conservative Party, and which he incorporated into his party manifesto. What is wrong with that? I do not see anything wrong with it—

Mr. Andre: That is what Alfred Apps has been saying.

Mr. MacEachen: —to find out about the public operations of a multinational corporation with operations in Canada.

The former Leader of the Opposition asks who authorized this. The project was under the direction of the principal secretary who employs all the staff. I do not know whether the Prime Minister knew about it or not. I certainly did not know anything about it. I find it quite a normal operation to keep informed about what is going on.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, the Acting Prime Minister is now admitting that public funds were used to examine SEC files in Washington with the sole purpose of destroying the reputation of the Leader of the Opposition.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An Hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. McGrath: I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that if hon. gentlemen on the treasury benches were to stand up to the same scrutiny, they would fail.

• (1425)

REQUEST FOR INDEPENDENT INQUIRY

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Acting Prime MInister, who stands in this House and puts his credibility on the line by denying there is anything improper about this, if he is prepared to have an independent inquiry into this—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): That is how they reacted to the Erwin inquiry.

Mr. McGrath: The people of Canada do not think this is any laughing matter. Is the Acting Prime Minister prepared—since he stretched his credibility here by denying there was anything wrong with this—to authorize an independent investigation into this sleazy, covert operation which had one objective, and that was, by the improper use of public funds, to destroy the reputation of the Leader of the Opposition, the Hon. Member for Central Nova?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member really should try to fasten his attention on the facts which I have put before the House. In the case of Mr. Crenna, he sought information which is publicly available, having to do with a corporation which operates, or used to operate, in Canada. That is all he did. There was no investigation into the personal conduct, nor would I condone if it were ever brought to my attention any such investigation into the conduct of the Leader of the Opposition.

An Hon. Member: What are you afraid of?

Mr. MacEachen: I wonder why we should have an independent inquiry about dropping into a public office to get public records in Washington. Does the Hon. Member want an inquiry on that?

ROLE OF RESEARCH ASSISTANT

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, the Acting Prime Minister might want to tell the House what the role was of Mr. Pierre Cadieux who, apparently, was operating as "a secret agent" in this covert operation?

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McGrath: Why was he operating clandestinely if there was nothing to hide, if this was an operation which was legitimate, proper, and above board?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have dealt with Mr. Crenna who is accused of being a secret agent. Let us turn to the other person. Who is this secret agent to whom the Hon. Member refers?

Mr. McGrath: I did not call him a secret agent.

Mr. MacEachen: Who is this covert operator as mentioned in The Globe and Mail, and what was his scene of operations? Well, the person in question is currently enrolled as a student at the University of Ottawa. He was taking a summer job and doing this research work for a couple of months prior to going to university. So that is the covert agent. What was the scene of his covert operations? The library, Mr. Speaker, at the University of Ottawa.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: More.

CONTENTS OF DOSSIER

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister on the same subject. The Acting Prime Minister has said, and I listened with care to his answers, that what was obtained here was public information which was publicly available. However, I want to say to him that the ordinary citizen of Canada does not work in the Prime Minister's Office, and does not have access to the funds and to the power of the state. That is an important difference.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Cadieux said, with reference to the Minister of Finance's complete abuse of privacy recently in terms of revealing correspondence of a then private citizen who happens to be now the Leader of the Opposition, that the use of those letters was "a complete ignorance of the dossier". My question to the Acting Prime Minister is this: if that was a complete ignorance of the dossier, what else, what other material is in the dossier?

• (1430)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member talks about the use of funds. The Prime Minister has an office budget, and so does the Leader of the New Democratic Party. He has $500,000 in his office budget. Those are public funds to run his office, and if he wants to do research with it, he is entitled to do so. He has a research operation which is publicly funded. So let us not talk about public funds, because they are available to him to conduct research as he wishes and at his own discretion.

The Hon. Member has asked about what is in the file. Well, the file is in the Prime Minister's Office, the press are invited to go and look at it and see what is there. If the Leader of the NDP wants to go, he will find a chronology of events and a lot of press clippings, and I think it will be a very boring afternoon for him.

TAX FILES AND PRIVATE LIVES OF MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, it is one thing for a political Party, whether on that side or on this side of the House, to conduct a public inquiry into the public activities of any political opponent. It is quite another to conduct an investigation into the private lives and matters that ought to remain private, of political opponents. There is a crucial distinction.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: We already have on record the abuse of that principle by the Minister of Finance just a few weeks ago. The Government and the whole country know about that, hence my question about what is in the dossier.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister assure the House unequivocally that no official in the PMO has authorized an investigation into the tax files of Members of Parliament, for example, or has in any way been responsible for conducting an investigation into the private lives of Members of Parliament? Surely this is an important and basic democratic question, and if the Government was at all sensitive to propriety, it would be able to give us a categorical no to those questions.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on the first point I want to assure the Leader of the NDP that this particular research exercise had nothing to do with the private life of the Leader of the Opposition. If he will recall, when the Leader of the Opposition became a candidate for the Conservative leadership he issued a very large glossy promotion in which was included, as part of his claim to the leadership, how he handled the Schefferville case. In fact he included with his announcement a very large series of comments on Schefferville.

Mr. Broadbent: I did not ask about that.

Mr. Axworthy: That is the issue.

Mr. MacEachen: In his book Where I Stand, in case the Leader of the NDP—

Mr. Broadbent: Answer the question!

Mr. MacEachen: —has not read it, he will find a very important segment dedicated to Schefferville and how the Leader of the Opposition operated there. We were interested in following up this issue which he brought into the public domain. That is all; nothing to do with his private life. In answer to the Hon. Member's other questions, I give a categorical no.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, it is interesting that the Deputy Prime Minister, who said he has not discussed the matter with the Prime Minister, is in a position to give such a categorical no. I hope what he says is the case and that the Prime Minister, when he returns, will confirm it.

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE OF NON INVESTIGATION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, to be perfectly clear, is the Deputy Prime Minister assuring the House that none of the political offices of the Government with access to funds which can be used for public inquiry into publicly available information, no question about that, whether it is Schefferville or any other publicly available item—but is he telling us for sure that tax matters or the private lives of Members of Parliament, or of candidates for the Conservative Party, the New Democratic Party, indeed the Liberal Party, under no circumstances are being investigated by this Government?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Leader of the NDP asked me whether the Prime Minister's Office was investigating the private lives of Members of the Opposition, including tax files. I think in a sense the question is very offensive.

Mr. Broadbent: That is what the Minister of Finance did.

Mr. MacEachen: I deny any allegation that arises from it. I said no to his question, and I say no to his second question which he has now applied to the whole Government. Are we investigating the personal lives or personal tax files of Members of Parliament? That is also an insulting question, and the answer is no.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

INVOLVEMENT OF OFFICIALS AND MINISTERS

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Acting Prime Minister. What was alleged in The Globe and Mail this morning is a very, very grave matter. It is alleged there has been abuse of public office in the Prime Minister's Office. So far the Acting Prime Minister has indicated there are two people, to his knowledge, involved in that matter, Mr. Crenna and Mr. Cadieux. It has also been alleged that Mr. Gillan and Mr. Tom Axworthy, the Prime Minister's principal secretary, have been involved. My question to the Acting Prime Minister is: how wide does that go? It is clear from his remarks that he does not know, and he does not know whether the Prime Minister knows.

It is also clear from other people's remarks that the Minister of Finance, some weeks ago, knew of it and had access to it. Who else is involved in this matter of abuse in the Prime Minister's office? How many more? Are the political Ministers involved? Has the Prime Minister knowledge of it?

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Have you stopped beating your wife yet, David?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we are talking about two persons who were accused in The Globe and Mail this morning of conducting a covert intelligence operation. We know what those words mean. I have explained the circumstances in each case as truthfully as I could find out in the limited time available this morning. I know of no other facts that I should give to the Hon. Member. If another fact comes to my attention, I will bring it to his attention and that of the House. But I am giving the facts as I know them, both in the case of Mr. Crenna and in the case of Mr. Cadieux.

It seems to me that when we have said "look at the file" put together by Mr. Cadieux, we have told the press to look at it, that is a pretty clear indication there is not very much covert about it, that one wanted to conceal, and nothing about the personal life of the Leader of the Opposition. I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I would condemn as being totally without justification any such investigation by the Government into the private life of any Member of Parliament. That is for the police if they want to do it, but not for us.

Mr. Crombie: Mr. Speaker, I think the Acting Prime Minister, indeed all Canadians, would understand that when we read the paper this morning we clearly had in mind the abuse demonstrated in this House by the Minister of Finance. That is why we attach far more importance to it than the Acting Prime Minister.

REQUEST THAT PRIME MINISTER CONDUCT INQUIRY

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I ask the Minister to consider this. We understand there was a limited time to investigate, and we understand that the Acting Prime Minister can confirm for us only two of the four persons named in the paper. However, Tom Axworthy, the principal secretary to the Prime Minister, is alleged to have been involved, as well as others. What we want to know, I think what everyone wants to know, is who else is involved, how long will it go on, and who else is going to be touched?

Will the Acting Prime Minister undertake to this House today to meet with the Prime Minister on his return and ask him to carry out a full-scale inquiry, so that the matter can be dealt with openly and cleanly? At stake are not only the Acting Prime Minister and this Government, but the sanctity and importance of this House.

• (1440)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if the conduct in itself were reprehensible, it would be important to find out whether there were other persons involved. I do not find anything reprehensible about seeking information on public issues and about the stand of public figures on public questions. That is all that has happened here. It has arisen from a very important industrial relations case, a very important shutdown in which the Leader of the Opposition was involved and to which he drew attention himself. It seems to me it was our responsibility to be fully informed on that event. That is all. Why ask who else is involved? If there were three or six others, would it add anything to an act which in itself is innocent and fully justified?

POSITION OF DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. The Deputy Prime Minister would like to dispose of this issue by saying it is not reprehensible. A few days ago, after the Minister of Finance could not produce a specific letter, he tried to back it up by saying he had heard of a conversation with the Deputy Minister of Finance. We have had a plethora of examples in the House whereby the Government is using various means to hang on to power and to bring others in the House down to its level.

Does the Deputy Prime Minister not feel that this action, in connection with the other actions that have been exposed in the House, in fact degrades the Government, the House, and the very institutions we are to uphold in the eyes of Canadians?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we are speaking about a particular case which has been brought up in the press this morning and has now been raised quite legitimately by members of the Opposition. I have explained what has happened in each case, to the best of my knowledge. I do not find anything degrading about going into a public office to seek information, nor do I find anything degrading about doing research, principally in the library of the University of Ottawa, to get information on a public event. I do not see anything degrading about that. Maybe the Hon. Member does, but I do not.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, since the Deputy Prime Minister feels that it is so minor, it is interesting to note that it was the principal secretary in the Prime Minister's Office who thought it was important enough to develop this kind of activity.

INSTRUCTIONS GIVEN TO RESEARCH ASSISTANT

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, if this was so minor, inconsequential, and of such little importance, why was Mr. Cadieux told to operate in private, not to be associated with the Prime Minister, not to have any linkages with the phones, not to have any office space in the Prime Minister's office, but to get the information?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have not used the word "minor" at all. The Hon. Member has built his case around the use of the word "minor", as if I had used it. I have not said this event which was being researched, and to which the Leader of the Opposition paid so much attention, was a minor event. It was an important event in the public and industrial life of Canada. However, it was not degrading to look into it, as I have explained. I have no way to answer the question which the Hon. Member bases upon a premise which I have never employed.

EMPLOYMENT

APPROVAL OF FUNDS FOR PROJECTS ON INDIAN RESERVES

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The question arises from some of the accusations of porkbarreling and Liberal patronage made against that Minister in the past week or so. My question is in regard to Canada Works projects in my riding. Programs similar to last year's were cut back. We now have about one-tenth of what we had the previous year. There were special allocations set up for non status, Métis people, and treaty Indians. Not one non status or Métis project was funded in my constituency. Many of the treaty Indian projects which have been around for some six months are not approved.

From the research I have done I understand there is an argument between the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Some of the reserves in the northern areas have in excess of 90 per cent unemployment, as opposed to the rate of 8 per cent which was assigned to my constituency. When will those funds finally be approved for the reserves in The Battlefords-Meadow Lake constituency and other constituencies across Canada which have to wait while this Minister and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development squabble over how the money should be disbursed.

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman refers to some dispute, squabble, or disagreement between myself and my colleague, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I can tell the House quite honestly that I cannot think of any dispute or divergence of view between us on anything at the moment. We have had some in the past but they have all been resolved, as far as I know. If the Hon. Member is alleging that there has been some delay in the Canada Works grants in his constituency because of a difference of view between my colleague and myself, that is simply not true.

In regard to the situation in his constituency in terms of Canada Works, I do not know offhand what the details are of the projects which have been applied for there, or what recommendations he has made. I will be happy to look into the situation and look at his representations.

FORMULA FOR ALLOCATING GRANTS

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, there is a six month delay in terms of having the funds approved. Considering there is in excess of 90 per cent unemployment, I think there is some kind of a problem there. The Minister should be answerable for it.

Instead of diverting these funds into patronage programs over which the Liberals have control, will the Minister look at the formula which determines the rate of unemployment? I know that within my constituency the rate of unemployment is not the 8 per cent upon which grants are based. The rate of unemployment is much higher than that. The Canada Employment Centres can substantiate that. Will the Minister look at the formula for allocating those grants rather than the formula of political patronage for their own people. Will he change it so it is more realistic and allows unemployed people to take jobs under this program albeit short term?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am very impressed by the fervour with which the Hon. Member deals with his question. I would have been far more impressed if he had expressed that fervour earlier rather than waiting until members of his constituency were in the gallery to watch him. At any time over the past several months he could have made representations to me personally or in the House on this matter. I regret that he has not done so until now.

CHARTER OF RIGHTS

LINGUISTIC RIGHTS OF FRANCO-ONTARIANS

Mr. Louis Duclos (Montmorency-Orléans): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

Throughout the debate which led to the adoption of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, senior Government Members kept repeating that the main purpose of section 23 of the Charter was to ensure that French-speaking minorities in Canada would have the same education rights as those of the English-speaking minority in Quebec.

In view of that, could the Minister tell the House if, from a legal standpoint, Franco-Ontarians can indeed seek for themselves the status given to Quebec's English-speaking minority when they claim the right to manage their own school system, and could he say whether, in the opinion of the Government, section 23 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms does grant such a right to the Franco-Ontarian minority, "where numbers warrant"?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the Government advocates a very broad-minded interpretation of section 23 of the Constitution. The operative words are "minority language educational facilities" and our position in that respect is that all means to establish facilities for the linguistic minority must be taken in keeping with the interpretation of that section of our Constitution.

PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE

ADVICE GIVEN TO MINISTER OF NATIONAL REVENUE BY OFFICIALS

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. The Deputy Prime Minister will know as a result of the furore concerning criticisms of the Tax Department that the Prime Minister's Office has established a small group of individuals designed to advise the Minister of National Revenue with respect to the criticism that has been levied at his Department.

Mr. Tom Axworthy, the principal secretary, says that the Prime Minister's Office is designed for partisan purposes. In light of the tactics of investigation, and in light of the attempted smear and the muck raking with respect to the Leader of the Opposition, how can any Members of this House repose confidence in the fact that we will be immune from criticism with respect to criticism of the Revenue Department when the Prime Minister's Office is constantly investigating the Leader of the Opposition and other Members of this House?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the question is purely rhetorical. The Hon. Member does not ask anything. He makes a number of charges with which I have dealt already. There is no investigation whatsoever into the personal lives of Members of Parliament. The Hon. Member repeats the claim again. Why? There is no such effort. Is the Hon. Member surprised that the Prime Minister's Office is interested in the politics of Canada?

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: It is, and will continue to be. I am sure if that never-never land happens and we have a Tory Government again, the Prime Minister of that Government would be interested in the politics of Canada and would be very interested in what the Leader of the Opposition would be doing in that very, very distant time.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speyer: Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister represents the Party of St. Laurent and Laurier. I am sure they would be disgusted at the tactics that are being utilized.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE DEPARTMENT NOT MONITORING TAX RETURNS OF MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. Will he confirm the accuracy of my statement that he is being advised by a group of individuals with respect to the Revenue Canada crisis, the Revenue Canada furore, from the Prime Minister's Office? In addition to that, can he give assurances to every Member of this House that the Leader of the Opposition's tax returns have not been monitored, or any other Members' tax returns? Will he give us that ironclad assurance?

Mr. MacEachen: That has been asked and answered already.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): In answer to the first part of the question of the Hon. Member, Mr. Speaker, I would like to indicate that, with the assistance of the Privy Council, where can be found the most senior officials who assume responsibility for the Public Service within the Government, we have appointed a working group to look after and improve Revenue Canada communications with the public. I hope the Hon. Member will understand that they belong to the Privy Council and are all senior Government officials. I should like to assure him as well that, whatever the political partisanship criteria may be, they are never a determining factor as to whether a taxpayer return will be audited or not.

JOB DESCRIPTION OF RESEARCH ASSISTANT

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, bearing in mind the statutory responsibility of the Minister of Justice is to ensure that the laws of Canada are enforced, has the Minister assured himself, or will he, that no offence has been committed by Mr. Tom Axworthy, the principal secretary to the Prime Minister, or anyone else connected with the Prime Minister's Office, in dishonestly or fraudulently committing a deception in the falsification of documents under Section 355 of the Criminal Code, or for that matter under Section 356 relating to the falsification of employment records, in that Mr. Pierre Cadieux was allegedly employed by the Prime Minister's Office and apparently Mr. Axworthy by utilizing a false job description and classification?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member's question is full of allegations and insinuations. It seems to me that if he wants to make that kind of allegation, he should do so plainly and directly.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CONSPIRACY INQUIRY

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Justice. Would the Minister in this regard when he is giving the consideration, which under his statutory responsibility he must do, look at the matter of criminal conspiracy under Section 423 of the Criminal Code as it relates to the involvement of the employment of people in the Prime Minister's Office in connection with the falsification of employment record in the public service of this country?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I will give the Hon. Member's questions the attention they merit.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An Hon. Member: You had better look at them.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUEST INTO DEATHS OF MILITIA MEMBERS—REQUEST FOR TRANSCRIPT

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. On Monday I had the opportunity to present a petition to this House, a copy of which I supplied to the Minister, requesting him to release the transcript of the military inquest into the accident which took the lives of two young men of the Canadian Militia on August 21, 1983. The Minister previously indicated to me that he thought this information should be sought through the Access to Information Act. He has been asked to use his ministerial powers to make that transcript available to the families so they can find out what actually happened that day. I know the Minister has had the opportunity to consider the matter. Will he tell us now whether he is prepared to release that transcript?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Hon. Member for his question and for his continuing interest in this matter. As I indicated to him initially, the matter should be pursued through the Access to Information Act. As I understand it, an application has already been made and I have directed my officials to give that application their undivided attention in order to expedite the release of the information.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, I feel the Minister could have used his powers in this case. The families have already waited since August of last year, trying to find out. I regret that he has not decided to make the transcript available now.

DRIVER'S LICENCE

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Defence. May I ask him whether he would be prepared, because this is a matter separate from the inquest, to instruct the Militia to make available to the parents a copy, or the original, of the driver's licence of Private Krosney, so the parents can know whether or not their son was trained by the military to drive the vehicle he was driving that day when he was killed?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I will take those comments as a representation, and I will see to it that every effort is made to accede on a positive note.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

EXTENSION OF DEADLINE FOR PRESENTATION OF PROJECTS

Mrs. Éva Côté (Rimouski-Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Environment.

Some time ago, he announced a most interesting program known as Environment 2000. However, the time limit for submitting projects under this program is very short and representations have been made to the Minister in this regard. I would like the Minister to tell us today if possible whether the final date for submitting projects under the Environment 2000 Program has been put off so that a greater number of interesting projects may be submitted?

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, as mentioned by the Hon. Member, several Members have shown their interest in the Environment 2000 Program and have raised the question of the date limit. I have examined this issue, and to give more time to all Canadians who live in the faraway areas of the country and who are interested in this program, I have decided to push the final date back five days.

PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE

DISTRIBUTION OF INFORMATION PERTAINING TO LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister with respect to the covert operations carried on by the Prime Minister's Office—

Mr. Ouellet: That is not true.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: —with respect to the background of the Leader of the Opposition. The Prime Minister and the Deputy Prime Minister obviously confuse the public funds and the use of public facilities with their own money for political purposes. At least the Watergate plumbers got their money from the Republican Party.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister a couple of specific questions. Were the Minister of Finance's recent accusations on the floor of the House with respect to the Leader of the Opposition as a result of a strategic distribution of material obtained by the crew that is working out of the Prime Minister's Office?

• (1500)

I also want to ask him—and he should know it—whether or not any official in the embassy in Washington facilitated or assisted in the obtaining of this information by Mr. Crenna?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, to my knowledge it would not be necessary to secure the help of an embassy official to drop into a public office, make out an application and pay a fee to obtain documents which are generally available. It would be quite unnecessary to call upon the services of the embassy to conduct a purely information gathering activity, not a covert activity as the Hon. Member wants to continue to say against all the facts.

SECURITY SERVICE INQUIRY

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister did not answer the question with respect to the recent reprehensible actions of the Minister of Finance when he had scoured the files on the Leader of the Opposition in various government Departments, including his own. I want the Deputy Prime Minister to answer the question as to whether this was connected in any way with this particular endeavour. Also I want to ask him whether or not he can give an iron clad assurance, in terms of the law enforcement powers of the Government, through the Solicitor General or otherwise, or through any security service, that there is no use of these facilities with respect to obtaining information about the Leader of the Opposition or any other Member of Parliament.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have already answered similar questions by the Leader of the New Democratic Party. It is obvious that the Opposition will not stop at anything in order to make unfounded allegations. Now he is suggesting that the Government is using the Security Service. That is a pretty baseless, unjustified, and cheap allegation.

PRIVILEGE

MR. NIELSEN—REPORTED INVESTIGATION OF LEADER OF OPPOSITION

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I raise a question of privilege arising out of the exchanges in today's Question Period. It is a very grave and probably the most serious matter to have come before the House, certainly in my experience.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: I know the Government—

An Hon. Member: In 30 years?

Mr. Nielsen: I know government Members do not take it seriously, but I take very seriously any attempt by the Government to intimidate Members of the House of Commons in the execution of their duties through the threat of the release of confidential or private information about Members of the House, because that is what we are dealing with here.

We are dealing with public servants and hired agents used to dredge up material against the Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition (Mr. Mulroney), a despicable action, unworthy of a Prime Minister's Office.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: We have been given a glimpse, Sir, into the inner workings of the office of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), and what has come out is not such as to encourage or reassure Canadians who continue to believe that a Prime Minister represents all the people, that the Public Service, paid out of the public Treasury, is outside of politics, and that Canadians can rely on impartiality in the organs of government. The Prime Minister's Office, particularly that part of it within the parameters of the Public Service, is just such a government organism. It should be prepared to treat all Canadians with that measure of even-handed justice to which the Prime Minister is so fond of referring. Instead, we have evidence of a perversion of the organs of government in a way which has never been experienced in this country.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: The action of taking out files on one's political opponents, of setting out to investigate the private, not the public, activities of an Opposition is common in secondary military governments, petty dictatorships and totalitarian societies. It has no place in a parliamentary democracy, and this is not the first time that this kind of conduct has occurred under a Liberal government.

There was an occasion when a Liberal Prime Minister used the RCMP to go through the files for a decade to find material discreditable to the Opposition. An inquiry was set up which a former Prime Minister of the country, then Leader of the Opposition, the late Right Hon. John Diefenbaker, refused to attend. Since then the politicization of our institutions has advanced by leaps and bounds. We have a Prime Minister who likes to take shortcuts. The Prime Minister is so busy settling the world's problems, he has no time for what is going on in his own Office.

Within weeks of the new Leader of the Conservative Party being chosen, emissaries were on their way to Washington to dig up information. They were not looking for biographical information. We could have supplied that; we would have been pleased to do so. They were looking for material which would cast the Leader of this Party in a derogatory light, and they were doing it with public officials at public expense. The fact that they found nothing does not detract one iota from the underhanded, unparliamentary nature of their desperate action, for that is the only way that it can be described.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: We have had Members of Parliament threatened in the performance of their duties. Members who engaged in the House in criticism of tax collection methods of the Department of National Revenue were faced with a scarcely-veiled hint about publication of their tax positions. We had a threat in the House by a Minister, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde), who suggested that he would pull out letters which would cast a derogatory light on the Leader of the Opposition. This House, Sir, has been most jealous of its privileges, as has the British House before it. Threatening a Member in the performance of his or her duty is so serious that if forms the subject of a statutory prohibition. Now we have hanging over us on this side of the aisle the threat that the vast resources of government, as was pointed out by the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent), are being used to dredge up material against the Opposition including its Leader.

It is not a large step from dredging to fabricating. Those who are capable of hiring investigators to look into the activities of the Leader of the Opposition are equally capable of creating material. Would it not have been more appropriate for the Prime Minister to investigate the background of his own proposed Cabinet Ministers before their appointment, rather than to conduct the resources of government in this direction?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: We have already had a case where correspondence contradicting specifically the impression which the Minister of Finance sought to leave was not produced. That, Sir, is known as suppression, and I speak specifically of the letter he failed to produce dated November 30. This latest infringement on the privileges of a Member is one of the most serious which has ever been brought before the House.

The Leader of the Opposition is an officer of the House. He fulfils a function recognized constitutionally in Canadian and British parliamentary law and precedent in the same way as the position of the Prime Minister is recognized. It is his constitutional duty to attack and to criticize government. The present Leader of the Opposition has carried out that function in a reasonable, honest and fair-minded way.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: No one can accuse him for being overly partisan or carrying partisanship to the extremes. In my personal viewpoint, he has been moderate to a fault.

What is the reward for this restraint that he has practised? Threats, production of documents, secret and clandestine investigations. Surely this is one of the most serious revelations ever to come before a House of Commons in any parliamentary democracy.

The investigators have been hired with public funds, public servants suborned, secret trips authorized in order to dredge up anything, inside the country or out, which might reflect upon the conduct of the Leader of the Opposition while he was the head of a company in private industry. Coming on top of the publication by the Minister of Finance of private communications, the message is clear to Canadians in business and industry or to those of us who attempt to serve our constituents in Parliament. We are all subject to being looked into, we are all subject to being harassed, we are all subject to being investigated or spied upon by a Government which feels free to use the apparatus of the Public Service for partisan purposes.

• (1510)

We know what happened to the Special Recovery Fund: $300, million of public moneys turned over to Grit members as a patronage dispensary controlled by the Prime Minister's Office. How far has that politicization gone? Now the subversion of the Prime Minister's Office, the highest office in the land, which ought to be at the service of all Canadians without distinction as to the political conviction, is being used as a kind of command post for espionage against members of the Opposition. Is it any wonder that Canadians throughout this country have serious qualms about entrusting a new security apparatus to the kind of people capable of carrying out the kind of operations Mr. Axworthy has been masterminding in the Prime Minister's Office?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: It was from the Prime Minister's Office that the slush goodies were being dispensed. It was under Mr. Axworthy's direction that the funds were made available for a project here and a project there. Curiously, all of these projects which came fluttering out of Mr. Axworthy's office—and there was some doubt whether it was his or the Prime Minister's—all came fluttering down like manna from heaven, to land where? In Gritland. Mr. Axworthy makes no bones of the politicization of the Prime Minister's Office. It has become an anteroom for the National Liberal Federation. The only criterion of qualification is the degree of Gritism inherent in the person seeking favours. We have seen this politicization—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: They laugh over there. That displays the head space that they are in.

The Globe and Mail article today, written by Lawrence Martin, confirms that Government employees have been used to investigate details about at least one Member of Parliament with the objective of using that information in the House of Commons to deter Opposition questions about the Government's handling of its administrative responsibilities.

You have recently been asked, Mr. Speaker, to consider a parallel instance where a civil servant threatened to withhold the services of a Government agency if a given Member of this House did not pre-screen questions to be raised in Question Period. That matter is now under your advisement. I submit there can be no doubt that if such a threat occurred, it was a contempt of Parliament. Similarly, if the threat is made, implicitly or explicitly, that private information about a Member will be released if that Member rises in the House to ask a question of a Minister for the purpose of obtaining information about the Minister's Department of his responsibilities or policies in respect of that Department, the threat is made for the purpose of restricting the Member's freedom of speech in the House, and that, fundamentally, is a contempt of Parliament. Such a threat has been made. Citation 55 of Beauchesne's Fifth Edition says this:

> The privilege of freedom of speech is both the least questioned and the most fundamental right of the Member of Parliament on the floor of the House and in committee.

This fundamental privilege is under attack in the House. Members of the House can no longer rise in the House to ask questions of the Ministry without fear of reprisal for their action. Members sitting on this side of the House can no longer ask questions about matters pertaining to the official duties of Ministers—their public duties—without expecting that the Minister will respond by releasing information about the Member of Parliament in his or her capacity as a citizen of Canada either before or after that individual was elected to public office. That is what is at the core here.

Furthermore, the Government has engaged in this practice with the full knowledge of the fact that any such allegations as to facts made by Ministers must be accepted by the House and are privileged, and thus not subject to legal action outside of the House.

This concerted attack on Opposition Members seems to have been orchestrated through the Prime Minister's Office and therefore falls under his direct responsibility as a Minister of the Crown. If public employees working for the Prime Minister are engaged in activities designed to intimidate Members, obstruct them in their duties or malign them or impute motives to their conduct in the House of Commons, it is the Prime Minister and no one else who must take responsibility for that kind of sordid conduct.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: The Globe and Mail article established the fact that at least two employees in the Prime Minister's Office—indeed it was admitted today by the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen)—were engaged in researching, as he calls it, details about the conduct and behaviour of the Leader of the Opposition in his capacity as a private citizen prior to his election to the House. Furthermore, the article states that one of those individuals was hired specifically for the purpose of conducting this investigation, and that the job description under which he was hired was written by the principal secretary to the Prime Minister. In the interview conducted by The Globe and Mail reporter, it is clear that the principal secretary to the Prime Minister was entirely aware of the activities in which the PMO employees were engaged and that he sanctioned those activities.

Clearly there can be no doubt that this investigation into the activities of the Leader of the Opposition was conducted at high level within the Prime Minister's Office and that the Prime Minister was aware, or should have been aware, of the fact that this investigation was under way.

Admittedly, an investigation into the private life of a Member of Parliament by the political appointees of the Prime Minister, while distasteful and unconscionable, is not by itself sufficient to amount to a question of privilege. What must be demonstrated is that this resulted from actions undertaken or statements made by the Leader of the Opposition in the conduct of his duties in this place and that the objective of the Prime Minister's actions was to obstruct or intimidate the Leader of the Opposition in the carrying out of his duties. Such a connection, I submit, is established in that Globe and Mail article, which also appeared on the front page of The Citizen. The Prime Minister's principal secretary is described in The Globe and Mail article as having said that "the more intense research on Mr. Mulroney was in response to the Opposition Leader's use of the Iron Ore lay-offs as an issue".

Although the PMO employee who led the investigation into the actions of the Leader of the Opposition in the Iron Ore case had been hired before the Leader of the Opposition had taken his seat in the House of Commons, the article notes that it was only last fall that the operation moved into high gear. According to The Globe and Mail, that same official said that "gathering information on Mr. Mulroney has become a cottage industry in the Liberal hierarchy, with several groups involved". Should there be any question that this information was being gathered for use during the Question Period, that doubt is surely resolved by the closing paragraph of that article, which reads as follows:

> Mr. Axworthy said that the public should not confuse the Prime Minister's Office with the Privy Council Office, which it often does. He called the PMO "a partisan office." Information gathering is "to prepare for Question Period . . . We have to know what the stands of the various players are."

What information on file with the Security Exchange Commission in the United States may have to do with the stands on issues of Members of Parliament during Question Period is a moot point. However, it is clear that the Prime Minister's hit squad was engaged in this investigation for the purpose of using the information during Question Period. Thus, two elements of the case for a question of privilege have been established. First, the investigation resulted from or related to issues raised by the Leader of the Opposition. Second, the investigation was undertaken so that some form of retaliation could be exercised in the House during Question Period.

● (1520)

For a breach of privilege to be established, it must be established that the Government attempted to intimidate or obstruct the Leader of the Opposition by threatening to release information about his conduct in his role as a private citizen.

Ample demonstration of just such an attempt at intimidation was provided by the Minister of Finance on Tuesday, January 24 last. As you will recall, Mr. Speaker, when the Leader of the Opposition rose and asked the Minister of Finance a question on the effect of the Minister's policies on the unemployed, the Minister did not reply to the question but stated, as reported at page 693 of Hansard, that the Leader of the Opposition's question:

> —would have a little more validity and credibility if, when we prepared the last Budget, the Hon. Member had made representations other than the one I obtained from him when he was in private business at the time, to deal with an advantage for the rich and a deal which would have benefited him rather than the unemployed.

As we now know, those allegations were unfounded and the Minister was forced to swallow his words. The important aspect of this attack upon the integrity of the Leader of the Opposition and the attempt thereby to undermine his credibility when asking questions in the House is that there appears to be a connection between the investigation undertaken by the Prime Minister's Office and the Minister of Finance's charge that was made in the House.

The official in the PMO who was in charge of the investigation is quoted in The Globe and Mail as saying:

> Mr. Lalonde is a prime example of this.
> I don't know who would have briefed him on the fact that a letter might have contained demands for the rich. It's a complete ignorance of the dossier.

This comment suggests, at first glance, that there was no direct link between the Minister of Finance and the information collection which was undertaken by the PMO. However, the fact that the PMO official quoted notes that the dossier contained detailed and accurate information about the letter in question indicates that the letter must have been obtained by the PMO from the Department of Finance or that officials in the Department of Finance made the PMO aware of the details of the correspondence between the Leader of the Opposition and the Minister and his officials.

The Minister of Finance cannot disclaim responsibility for the actions of his officials, nor can he deny his intent to use the information in Question Period to intimidate and obstruct the Leader of the Opposition. Can he then justify the communication of private correspondence with the Department of Finance to the political arm of the Prime Minister's Office? I think not.

The ominous overtone of this whole issue is clearly underlined in the following remarks attributed in The Globe and Mail to the PMO official in charge of the investigation:

> The steps that were taken to obtain the information were well done. But it's in the interpretation of the final information. That's what's hot.

Clearly the Prime Minister's Office undertook an exhaustive search for information, causing officials of the Office to go as far afield as Washington to peer into files, and presumably scouring the files of Government Departments, as implied in the case of the Department of Finance, in order to develop a dossier of detailed information which could then be "interpreted" by Cabinet Ministers and the Prime Minister to, as the Prime Minister's principal secretary put it, "prepare for Question Period".

Intimidation was the Government's intention. The Government proposed to "interpret" information contained in the dossier whenever the Leader of the Opposition raised a question in the House that the Government found too hard to handle or too politically embarrassing. This is Newspeak. Whenever the Government says that it is interpreting information, we can now assume that it means bending it out of shape for the purpose of causing damage to the reputations of those who oppose the Government. Interpretation in reality means intimidation and obstruction. Much as it must upset the Government to have come up dry in its quest for compromising information about the Leader of the Opposition, the fundamental question of privilege remains. The Government used its access to information to construct a dossier about the Leader of the Opposition, and was prepared to hide behind the privileges of the House while putting its interpretation of that information on the public record in the House of Commons.

This action raises two fundamental issues of privilege. First, is the Government committing a contempt by attempting to intimidate a Member of the House into silence? Second, can the Government be permitted to place allegations on the record of the House without being prepared to attest to the accuracy of those allegations and to be held responsible for them?

On the first issue, there can be no doubt that intimidation offends the rules of the House. At page 157 of Erskine May the following words which speak to the issue of intimidation are found under the heading "Attempted Intimidation of Members":

> To attempt to influence Members in their conduct by threats is also a breach of privilege.

There follow several examples as authority for that.

The observations made in Erskine May are further underlined in Beauchesne's Fifth Edition, Citation 67, where it states:

> It is generally accepted that any threat to a Member, attempting to influence his vote or his actions as a Member, is a breach of privilege.

The threat, implied or stated, to release private information about a Member of Parliament should he or she ask questions in the House that are embarrassing to the Government falls squarely into the definition of intimidation. Because such intimidation limits the Member's freedom of speech, it is a contempt of Parliament of the highest order.

The further difficulty posed by Ministers standing in the House and tabling documents, or referring to private information about a Member of the House in deflecting a question about ministerial responsibilities is that under the rules of this place, those Ministers are protected from similar actions undertaken by private Members. A Member cannot, for example, stand in the House and pose a question to a Minister about matters not falling within his administrative responsibilities in a portfolio currently held by that Minister. All other questions are out of order and they would be ruled out of order by you, Sir.

Ministers of the Crown cannot be allowed to use their privileged access to information, the resources of the Government paid for at the taxpayers' expense, and the immunities that they enjoy in this place in an unfair or unjust manner. It is fundamental to the rules of Parliament that the rules exist to protect the minority from the tyranny of the majority. Individual Members of the House should not be subject to attacks on their personal integrity and invasion of privacy simply because the Government finds it expedient to engage in such practices.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: Furthermore, politicized Government employees operating out of the PMO should not be given the authority to scour Government files and create dossiers for the purpose of arming Ministers to enter into character assassination in the House. The very fact that such an action was contemplated by Government officials is a breach of the privileges of the House and of Members of this place. That Ministers have the intention of proceeding to use this information is a far graver offence against Parliament.

To support my contention that the threat against Members could be made either explicitly or implicitly, I would like to draw your attention to the following observation drawn from page 162 of the Twentieth Edition of Erskine May:

> Both Houses will treat as breaches of their privileges, not only acts directly tending to obstruct their officers in the execution of their duty, but also any conduct which may tend to deter them from doing their duty in the future.

● (1530)

There can be no doubt that the intended effect of the campaign against the Leader of the Opposition was to counter the questions that he was raising in Question Period. By revealing private information when the Leader of the Opposition asked them a question to which they did not wish to reply it was the hope of the Ministers of the Government that the Leader of the Opposition would be deterred from asking further questions. Unfortunately for the Government, it was unable to find the damaging information that it had hoped for, and the Leader of the Opposition is not easily deterred from doing his duty in the House and holding Ministers to account for the actions of their Departments. Nonetheless, the very attempt to restrict the Leader of the Opposition's freedom of speech in this place is a contempt of the House.

My contention as to the seriousness of this contempt is further supported by the following observations found at pages 158 and 159 of Erskine May's Twentieth Edition and which speak to this issue of reprisal against Members' actions in the House and acts which reflect upon or obstruct Members in the conduct of their duties in the House. The heading and text read as follows:

> Acts tending indirectly to obstruct Members in the discharge of their duty.
> Conduct not amounting to a direct attempt to influence a Member in the discharge of his duties, but having a tendency to impair his independence in the future performance of his duty, will also be treated as a breach of privilege.

On the same page appears the following:

> Molestation of Members on account of their conduct in Parliament. It is a breach of privilege to molest any Member of either House on account of his conduct in Parliament.

In the middle of page 158 is the heading "Reflections upon Members", which is also regarded by that authority as a breach of privilege. The actions undertaken by the Prime Minister's Office and thus on his behalf, are a gross breach of parliamentary privilege, Mr. Speaker.

This question of privilege relates not solely to the rights of the Leader of the Opposition. If the Government is allowed to get away with this practice in the case of the Leader of the Oppposition, then no Member of Parliament is safe from this form of public trial with no charge laid against him. Every Member rises in the House to ask a question knowing that a Minister may leak information about the Member in retaliation for his or her question. Mr. Speaker, we cannot, under the rules, require Ministers to answer questions, but it seems that by asking questions we open ourselves to a personal attack upon our freedom of speech by the Government. If ever there were a question of privilege, this is it.

The heart of the issue rests in the age old principle that the publishing of statements impugning Members and threatening them with further exposure if they take part in the debate of the House, is a breach of privilege. This principle was set out in the famous Plimsoll's case in 1873, found in May's Twentieth Edition, at page 157, and continues to be valid today.

What is of great concern is the fact that this has become, as The Globe and Mail reports, a cottage industry. It would seem that the assault on Members' freedom is widespread among government Departments and the responsibility is thus shared by the Prime Minister with other of his Cabinet colleagues.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, if you find that I have a prima facie question of privilege — that I have raised a matter of sufficient substance that the House should be permitted to examine and decide the issue — I would be prepared to move the appropriate motion that the subject matter of the article and the circumstances surrounding it be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

I know that you regard this matter as serious, Mr. Speaker. I know that brief as your tenure in the Chair has been, you have been a Member of Parliament long enough to realize —

The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) treats the matter with such frivolity that he plays an imaginary violin.

Mr. Pinard: You are wasting the time of the House.

Mr. Nielsen: We take it as serious, Mr. Speaker. The Minister accuses me of wasting the time of the House. It was his own House order we are living with, that if we come to Orders of the Day before four o'clock, we would rise and re-convene. I am not wasting any time in a technical way and I am certainly not raising any passing matter of frivolity. We have the makings of a threat against all Opposition Members of Parliament that cannot be glossed over lightly.

I know, Sir, that you will look upon this seriously enough to take the matter under advisement and consider very carefully what the decision will be. I submit to you in all sincerity that the matter is a valid question. There is a serious question of privilege that should be referred to the House for a decision.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, lacking the prophetic talents of the Member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), I do not have before me a pile of some thirty-odd pages prepared in advance, all nicely ordered so that I can make a speech on a matter that, according to the Member for Yukon, arose from an article published this morning. I was looking at the elaborate document he prepared. I wonder whether he drafted it this morning or whether it has been in his files for some time. In any case, I merely intend to look at the facts that could possibly form the basis for a question of privilege.

Judging from the facts before the House, which are the only facts that should be considered by the Chair in deciding whether there is a question of privilege, there is not much there. We have here a mass of high-sounding principles, sometimes a bit exaggerated and a bit drawn-out, that have been enumerated or mentioned by the Member for Yukon, but as a general rule, he was quoting principles, in some cases with, and other cases without, their context but in any case, principles that should be considered and applied only when the facts so justify.

What is lacking in his arguments is that there are no facts or elements that could lead us to believe that there had been an investigation into the private life of one or several Members. There is nothing before the House that justifies the conclusion or even the suspicion that the private life of a Member had been the subject of a "secret investigation", to use the Opposition's words.

Mr. Speaker, I suppose you heard the brief, concise and brilliant answers given by the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) during Oral Question Period. One by one, he disarmed the Members on the front bench of the Progressive Conservative Party, who visibly wanted to build up a momentum that would justify their indulging in a form of obstruction, as a footnote to a happy anniversary. Unfortunately for the Members opposite, however, because the Deputy Prime Minister had the facts and the truth on his side, he was able, simply and literally to disarm them, and as a result, the cut-and-dried document prepared in advance by the Member for Yukon became totally insignificant. It has absolutely no basis in fact.

Mr. Speaker, the facts are quite simple. During the Progressive Conservative Party's leadership campaign, one of the candidates, now the Member for Central Nova (Mr. Mulroney), said that he wanted to lead the country more or less as though it were a large corporation, because he had experience in managing a multinational, the Iron Ore Company, and had shown that he was very good at it. Upon starting his career in public life, the Hon. Member used that experience in becoming a candidate and running for the leadership. Subsequently, he used the same arguments during his election campaign in Central Nova, and later, here in the House, he also referred to his experience in managing the Iron Ore Company, especially in Schefferville.

That is the basic issue of the debate today. Following those allegations made public and used publicly by the Leader of the Opposition to win his election, we now have one of two individuals who is accused of being a secret spy by the Opposition. I am referring to Mr. Crenna of the political office of the Prime Minister, which is not the same thing as the Privy Council. The Leader of the Opposition also has an office and public funds in excess of $1 million to hire people whose sole occupation is nothing other than political activities. Even the Leader of the New Democratic Party has a budget of $570,000 to hire similar staff, as the Deputy Prime Minister has indicated. The Prime Minister is entitled to a slightly larger budget for his political office. Mr. Crenna is from the political office of the Prime Minister and, after the Member for Central Nova talked about his experience in the management of major companies, we want to know exactly what happened at the Iron Ore and at Schefferville. What is so remarkable about the management of a company which has to close its doors and practically ruin the economy of the north shore? What is so remarkable? That is why we want to set the record straight, since the Leader of the Opposition himself raised the issue.

As it happened, Mr. Crenna—the so-called secret spy—was performing his duty in Washington to seek information about various other sectors. As the Hon. Member and the Deputy Prime Minister pointed out, he went to a public commission, the American Securities and Exchange Commission. It is open to the public for those who seek public documents concerning a public report on a public company. Those are the facts concerning the secret spy, Mr. Crenna. He went to ask a public document about a public company in a public place, nothing else. There is no other evidence which would lead us to believe that he has inquired into the private life of anyone. These are the facts as far as the first person involved is concerned, and I do not think that I am exaggerating. In all the answers which were given to the questions asked and in all the facts that you have before you, I ask you to indicate what element could lead us to believe that the private life of an individual has been subjected to an investigation.

The second person involved, a second secret agent, to use the words of the Opposition, is a certain Mr. Cadieux. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Cadieux is not a secret agent! He is a student, and he obtained a certain amount of money to do some public research as a summer job. He did not operate from a secret place and in an underhanded manner to make a covert inquiry as a secret agent into the private life of the Leader of the Opposition. He is merely a student who, as summer employment, did some research work on a public company, Iron Ore, and on the situation in Schefferville, since this had been used by the Leader of the Opposition. He conducted this research from the University of Ottawa library.

Those are the only facts before us. It is quite ridiculous, Mr. Speaker, for the Hon. Member for Yukon to get all excited and give the same pat retorts to the clear, specific and simple answers which were given by the Deputy Prime Minister and which correspond with the facts.

I do not think that either Mr. Crenna or Mr. Cadieux are secret agents. They are two individuals who were acting quite legitimately in carrying out their legitimate and normal duties and who operated in public, seeking public information on a public company, period. Nothing in the facts before us, Mr. Speaker, would lead us to suspect that someone could have investigated the private life of a Member of Parliament.

Mr. Speaker, the one and only thing to do to settle the complaint made in this House on behalf of the Hon. Member for Central Nova is to refer to a precedent. Curiously enough, this precedent concerns a complaint made by the predecessor of the Leader of the Opposition, the former Member for Central Nova, Mr. MacKay.

[English]

It is a coincidence, perhaps, that twice in a row we are facing the same Tory tactic, a frivolous attempt to waste the time of the House. In 1977, the former Hon. Member for Central Nova raised a question of privilege. He seemed to be obfuscated and it was found he was totally wrong and that the facts were contrary to his allegation.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that in 1977 the Tory tactic was to allege that Members of Parliament were being subjected to surveillance by mail tampering, wiretapping and bugging of offices. They brought forward only two so-called "solid" cases. In the mail tampering case, the matter referred to a weird "postcard" which turned out to be an unstamped, incorrectly addressed, plasticized computer card which the postmaster, having read the message, referred to the RCMP. In the bugging case, Mr. MacKay, the former Member of Parliament for Central Nova, the predecessor of the Leader of the Opposition and now his senior adviser, hired a Toronto detective to check his office. The detective claimed to have discovered a listening device in the office and, as a result of Mr. MacKay's complaint, the Speaker called in the police. The police found that the device was phony and that it had been planted by the detective. The detective was prosecuted, convicted and fined, as well as being deprived of his licence.

That is the previous case which was brought to the attention of the House by the adviser to the Leader of the Opposition, the former Hon. Member for Central Nova.

Today we have the complaint regarding the new Hon. Member for Central Nova, which is, in my view, almost as frivolous. What we have witnessed today is a tactic to try to build up a crisis in the House. I do not know why. Perhaps the Tories do not like the anniversary of their defeat four years ago. Certainly, however, their attempt was totally destroyed by the very clear, simple and brilliant answers given by the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) today to each of their questions.

There are absolutely no facts in this case which would allow us to believe that there might have been an inquiry into the private life of any Hon. Member. On the contrary, the facts are very clear and very simple. One employee in a political office was doing his job, seeking public documents from a public bureau, from a public commission, dealing with a public company, the Iron Ore Company of Canada. The student was working during the summer from the library of the University of Ottawa to find out what had happened in Schefferville and dealing with facts with respect to the Iron Ore Company.

All this is public, the gathering of press clippings, the gathering of facts in relation to a public company. There is nothing which should allow you, Mr. Speaker, to suspect that there might have been a private inquiry into the private life of any Hon. Member of the House. I suggest that this attempt today has been undermined very seriously by the Deputy Prime Minister in his very straight answers which were based on the very simple facts. This attempt should not be encouraged. I believe you should set aside this frivolous so-called question of privilege.

I should like to refer you, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, to Beauchesne's Fifth Edition, the usual reference, Citation 19, which is very clear. It indicates to a Speaker that when Members disagree on facts, this cannot be the basis of a question of privilege. What we are witnessing here is the Opposition Members pretending that there are facts indicating to you, Mr. Speaker, that there has been an inquiry by secret agents into the private life of the Leader of the Opposition or of any other Hon. Member. That is not the case. This was firmly denied by the Deputy Prime Minister.

Moreover, to the intelligent question posed by the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent), the Deputy Prime Minister was very straightforward and gave a very clear, unequivocal answer. The Deputy Prime Minister was asked if there was an inquiry going on with respect to any private Hon. Member of the House, and he replied, no. I believe his word should be taken and this should close the matter.

It is a shame that the Opposition is insisting at this time on trying to ride a dead horse and waste the time of the House, when in fact there was nothing wrong in this whole dossier. It was merely two individuals doing their jobs, doing them well, in a very open way, and dealing merely with public facts, public documents, public commissions and a public company.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans).

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, I listened—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Chair would like to call the attention of the House to the House order which will mean that at four o'clock we will be dealing with budget matters.

Mr. Nielsen: On that point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The Chair has recognized the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain on a point of order.

• (1550)

Mr. Nielsen: It was on the remarks of the Chair, Mr. Speaker, just very briefly.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) is deferring on the matter of the four o'clock House order.

Mr. Nielsen: That is right. I just want to say that there would be a question as to whether or not it is a House order. We have no intention of carrying this question on beyond four o'clock because we want to hear the Budget. But the matter is far too important not to carry on tomorrow at three o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair in no way wishes to interfere with the rights of Hon. Members to make further representations. There is ample precedent, the case of the Hon. Member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper) being the most recent one.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the exchanges that took place in Question Period, as well as to the presentation by the House Leader for the Official Opposition and the response of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard). I, too, read this morning's paper. I read the story a number of times, quite carefully, and there is no doubt in my mind that the story raised more questions than it answered, which was perhaps unfortunate. You may have noted that the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) raised some questions which that story failed to answer. I listened to the House Leader for the Official Opposition with great care and I must say his presentation was long and, honestly, quite difficult to follow in some instances. It was very involved and it raised a number of questions which may well have been related to the ultimate question of privilege claimed, but they were questions which, I think it is fair to say, we dealt with during the course of the last two or three weeks.

For example, Mr. Speaker, there was the incident of the letter referred to by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) which ultimately turned out not to exist. We supported the Official Opposition's contention that that letter ought to have been tabled, and we were appalled to find the letter and the Minister's comments concerning what was alleged to have been said by the present Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Mulroney) were unsupported.

The House Leader of the Official Opposition raised another matter of great concern. He indicated that there were incidents where Members of Parliament were being threatened over statements they may have made regarding matters which are clearly a public concern. They were being threatened with exposure of information of a personal nature in an effort to intimidate them into stopping their legitimate public criticism. I should like to go into that matter in a little more detail later. He then went on to speak of the matter of the Special Recovery Fund, which has been the topic of some considerable debate in the House over the course of the last few days, and the whole question of the Liberal Government's use of public funds for what, at least on the surface, has been indicated to have been patronage purposes.

Other than the fact that they are of interest and tend to cast the Government in a bad light, quite justifiably so, I am not too sure how those matters relate to the question now before us, which is as follows. There are two related matters, but they are separate. Did the Government improperly use public funds to research and obtain information of a private nature about Members of Parliament? That question has to be addressed in some detail in order to determine facts. Did the Government, using funds available to it for the exercise of its public responsibility, allocate those funds so as to seek information, private or public, which could be used to discredit or undermine the effectiveness of a Member of Parliament or, as raised by my Leader, of Members of Parliament. I think that is a separate question to be dealt with in a moment.

The second question is: If they used those public funds to get that information, was that information to be used or intended to be used to intimidate a Member of Parliament? I think the House Leader for the Opposition used those exact words. In addition to that, was it to be used to deny the Member, or attempt to deny the Member, the undoubted right of freedom of speech?

I think those are difficult questions to answer, Mr. Speaker. The story as it appears in the paper today, although it carries considerable innuendo, produces very little evidence to show that that is the case. However, having said that, it is not unreasonable to draw the conclusion that that may well have been the case. I think it would have been easier for us to come to a conclusion about that had the House Leader for the Official Opposition dealt specifically with that matter rather than with the other matters.

As I see it, the question you have to deal with is twofold, Mr. Speaker. The first question is the one I raised: Can the Government, using all the powers of the Treasury—

Mr. Nielsen: State.

Mr. Deans: —using all the powers of the state, as my colleague says, but using all the financial powers of the Treasury, can the Government go out and investigate at whatever cost, in whatever way it desires, the private involvement of Members of Parliament, whether it be in business or otherwise? Is that a breach of privilege? It is quite clear on the face of it that the Office of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) certainly did go out and did attempt to seek information. The question now before you is whether that was a simple research operation, or was it in fact intended to intimidate and deny the Leader of the Official Opposition the opportunity to exercise his responsibilities as the law requires?

It being four o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I would prefer to continue with this matter tomorrow.

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance) moved:

That this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the Government.

He said: My budget today is dedicated to building a strong and growing economy—an economy that will generate lasting, meaningful jobs for all Canadians who want to work, an economy that will provide the economic opportunity and security all Canadians seek.

My budget puts into action the program for growth, opportunity, security and partnership outlined in the Speech form the Throne.

We find ourselves in a markedly improved international and domestic environment. World economic recovery is taking hold. The threats to the financial system have been contained through the close co-operation of governments, the international institutions and the world banking community. Protectionist pressures worldwide remain a potential threat. In this area, as on the financial front, my colleagues and I are working actively with other governments to promote a more stable and more predictable international environment.

On the domestic front the record is impressive by any standard. In the June 1982 budget, my predecessor established the 6 and 5 Program to reduce significantly the inflation that was destroying our economy. That goal has been met. In my April budget, my goal was to secure the recovery. That goal has also been met. Growth has been stronger, inflation lower, and our employment higher than forecast last April. When we compare our economic recovery to that of other countries, Canada is faring better than most. Our economy, growing steadily and surely, is expected to be mong the leaders in the industrial nations this year.

These are solid achievements. Yet none of us can be satisfied when more than 1.4 million Canadians—our children, our relatives, our friends and neighbours—want to find jobs and cannot.

[Translation]

BUDGET STRATEGY

My budget is aimed at creating jobs through partnership. The private sector must be the main creator of jobs. But the government can help—by providing assistance where desirable, by lightening the burden of administration where feasible and by leading directly where necessary. Ultimately, the confidence of Canadians—consumers, savers and investors—and the creative energy and entrepreneurship that flow from this confidence, will shape our future.

In my consultations with Canadians in all walks of life and in all regions, I have been encouraged by the sense of realism they bring to our economic and human challenges. There has been a renewal of confidence throughout the country—confidence in our economic potential and confidence in our ability to achieve that potential. At the same time, we increasingly recognize that our future prospects depend, fundamentally, on a strong, co-operative and responsible partnership among Canadians and between Canadians and their governments.

[English]

Today I shall propose new initiatives to strengthen this partnership. Although I shall refer to these initiatives in detail later on, let me indicate the general thrust of some of them.

The accomplishments of the 6 & 5 Program are a remarkable example of what Canadians can do when we all work together. Thanks to the success achieved, we shall, in 1984, be able to maintain our commitment to wage and price restraint but with a more flexible approach.

To secure the jobs we need, we must become more efficient, more productive, and more aggressive in world markets. I shall announce significant measures to improve our productivity and competitiveness, and our ability to export.

The principal generators of jobs in this country are the hundreds of thousands of small and medium-sized businesses.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: I am glad the Conservatives are at long last recognizing this. I shall take steps to ease their administrative burdens by simplifying the tax system. Increasing the economic security of Canadians will strengthen confidence and help boost growth and job creation. I shall propose innovative measures to increase the security of homeowners and I shall announce comprehensive measures to reform the Canadian pension system, including assistance to those in greatest need.

• (1610)

This budget is fiscally responsible. It is designed to provide leadership in moving beyond economic recovery to economic expansion. It will lead us toward growth in incomes and jobs. Most important, it does so by public support to private initiative.

Private initiative depends on confidence. Confidence in turn is fostered by consistency and continuity in government policy.

My objective as Minister of Finance has been and remains straightforward: to keep the economy growing, so that Canadians who want to work can find productive and meaningful jobs. My policies have been consistently directed towards this end.

Securing growth and jobs depends on our success in four basic areas: reducing and controlling inflation; increases investment; reducing the government's deficit and improving our competitiveness and productivity. I want now to report the progress we have made on inflation, investment and the deficit, and our prospects for the coming years. I shall return later to competitiveness and productivity in more detail.

[Translation]

CONTAINING INFLATION

Canadians can be proud of our collective achievement in bringing inflation down from almost 12 per cent in June 1982 to 4.5 per cent at the end of last year.

The government's 6 and 5 Program has contributed substantially to this this achievement. Restraint in federal wages and prices has helped to lead inflation down. Canadians were challenged to support the federal government's leadership in their own wage and price decisions. They have responded positively and enthusiastically. Inflation, after three years in double-digits, averaged 5.8 per cent in 1983, the lowest annual rate in a decade.

The 6 and 5 Program has been supported by responsible fiscal and monetary policies. These policies will continue to be directed at facilitating real growth, while resisting inflationary pressures.

The 6 and 5 Program, however, will begin to phase out at the end of June.

Over the course of the last few months, I have benefited from consultations with labour and business groups, with other associations, with Members of Parliament, and with my provincial counterparts. Canadians recognize that the program has been instrumental in moving from a 12-per-cent world of recession to a 5-per-cent world of recovery. They have urged the federal government to maintain strong leadership in the continuing battle to contain inflation. Most cautioned, however, that simply extending the program could create distortions that might do more harm then good.

[English]

I am confident that wage and price decisions in the private sector this year will not contribute to renewed inflationary pressure, and I am therefore not proposing a new guideline for the private sector. As well, effective January 1, 1985, Family Allowance payments, Old Age Security payments, public service pensions, and income tax brackets and deductions will again be adjusted on the basis of actual increases in the cost of living.

I recognize, however, that all levels of government have a fundamental responsibility to continue to exercise discipline in their own wage and price decisions.

The federal government will continue its leadership role. I am today affirming our commitment to continue wage and price restraint.

The existing policy of limiting price increases for goods and services sold by the federal government, Crown corporations and federally regulated industries will be extended for a third year. The price guideline will be reduced from 5 per cent to 4 per cent for this period.

Mandatory wage controls in the public sector will not be extended.

As urged upon us by the public sector unions and many others, the government is prepared to resume collective bargaining when the legislation expires. I want to say clearly that we shall bargain hard. We shall bargain responsibly. We shall bargain fairly. No catch-up payments will be allowed. And we shall observe four major principles in our negotiations.

Federal compensation settlements will contribute to reducing inflation and be fiscally responsible.

They will be based on total compensation comparisons with the private sector, that is, factors such as job security, pensions, hours of work and other benefits will all be considered.

They should not exceed the private sector in compensation for comparable jobs.

They will be designed to ensure that settlements encourage increased productivity and improved performance, and recognize relative job responsibilities.

Should it become apparent in specific cases that arbitration awards in the public sector or wage settlements in our Crown corporations are excessive, when measured against these principles, or that reasonable wage settlements cannot be obtained without lengthy and disruptive strikes damaging to the public interest, then the government will ask Parliament to legislate a wage settlement.

As well, my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Gray), will undertake consultations with labour and other interested groups on proposals to amend the Public Service Staff Relations Act. This Act establishes the framework for collective bargaining in the federal public service. It has not been updated since its introduction in 1967. Both the government and public sector unions will wish to consider changes to modernize it.

[Translation]

For 1984 as a whole, I expect inflation to average about 5 per cent, compared with 5.8 per cent in 1983. The economic projections I shall table with this budget suggest that further reductions in inflation will be made through the mid-1980s. The policies I have just announced will ensure that federal wage and price decisions contribute to this outcome. I expect other levels of government and the private sector to continue to do their part.

INCREASING INVESTMENT

New jobs will come from the expansion of business and industry throughout Canada, to meet the needs of Canadians and customers abroad. This expansion will require new investment.

Public investment, particularly by the federal government, will give a strong boost to the recovery over the coming year. Led by the Special Recovery Projects, our capital expenditures will increase by more than 25 per cent over the course of 1984.

Business investment declined by about 9 per cent in 1983, which is a smaller decline than I had forecast last April. Over the past year, however, significant progress has been made in restoring the financial health of the business sector. The strength of the recovery, lower inflation and interest rates, and higher productivity all helped to bring about a strong rebound in business profits. It must be stressed however that profits are still below historical levels, but they are on their way back. This growth in profits, together with much stronger stock markets and the tax incentives to assist private investment that I introduced in my April budget, have helped businesses to make considerable progress in restoring the strength of their balance sheets. These positive developments are beginning to pay off in stronger investment programs.

Equipment investment picked up in the second half of last year, and I expect it to grow strongly this year, increasing by about 7 per cent over its 1983 level. Stable interest rates and rising consumer demand should encourage business to replace and expand its stock of machinery and equipment. Plant construction should begin to grow again in the second half of this year. In 1984, I expect total business investment to grow by 2¼ per cent. Beginning in 1985, and continuing through the medium term, business investment is projected to be a major source of economic growth in Canada.

• (1620)

[English]

REDUCING THE DEFICIT

As business investment increases, the government's financial requirements must be reduced.

In April, I estimated that the government's deficit for the 1983-84 fiscal year would be $31.3 billion. My current estimates for revenues and expenditures show only slight changes from those I presented to Parliament last April.

The changes to projected revenues and expenditures will result in a deficit for the current fiscal year of about $31.5 billion. Government financial requirements will total about $27 billion.

The deficit has provided considerable support to the welfare of individual Canadians and to the promotion of economic activity through the difficult period of the recession and the first year of recovery. Current financial requirements have been financed without pushing up interest rates as a result of strong savings and weak business investment. But government deficits must be reduced as investment recovers and the economy expands.

I remain committed to bringing the federal deficit down in a way that does not damage our economic prospects. The fiscal strategy I set out last April has proved itself to be the right course of action.

In the coming fiscal year, taking into account the impact of the measures proposed in this budget, the deficit will fall by almost $2 billion to $29.6 billion. The government's financial requirements will be $25.6 billion.

In the medium term, the deficit will continue to fall, consistent with the strategy set out last April, from over 8 per cent of gross national product this year to about 4.7 per cent by 1987-88. Financial requirements will fall even faster. They will drop from 6.9 per cent of gross national product this year to 3.4 per cent by 1987-88.

[Translation]

SECURING GROWTH AND JOBS

Creating employment for Canadians wanting to work is a prime national objective. The progress we are making in reducing inflation, increasing competitiveness, restoring investment and reducing the deficit is showing up in growth and jobs.

The first year of economic recovery has been stronger than I forecast last April. We have achieved about 3 per cent real growth in 1983, rather than the 2.3 per cent I predicted. Employment also grew more rapidly than expected. About 400,000 jobs were created during 1983.

The government is making a major contribution to ease the pain and hardship of unemployment, and to speed up the creation of new jobs.

In my April budget, I announced a $4.8 billion Special Recovery Program to create jobs by accelerating productive investment. Half of this money is available to the private sector, to support private investment. The remaining $2.4 billion is being spent to upgrade public facilities in key sectors of our economy and in all regions. Under the Special Recovery Capital Projects Program, work is now under way on more than 200 projects to improve our basic research capability, our harbours and wharves, our transport system, our agricultural facilities and our tourist attractions. More than $1 billion will be spent on these projects in 1984-85. These facilities will contribute to growth across our country, provide support to private investment and create jobs for many thousands of Canadians.

In addition to the Special Recovery Program, the government has already committed over $2.3 billion in the coming year to provide direct employment and training opportunities to almost 550,000 Canadians. This includes the additional $400 million announced in the Speech from the Throne last December.

[English]

Creating jobs for Canada's youth is a priority. The strength and vitality of our nation's future depend on our young people. It would be nothing less than a national tragedy if they do not have the opportunity to realize their potential. The Speech from the Throne established a Youth Opportunity Fund of over $1 billion to help young Canadians acquire new skills and find meaningful jobs in the private, voluntary and public sectors. The Prime Minister has also announced the appointment of a Minister of State for Youth to oversee the co-ordination of programs assisting young Canadians. I am announcing today that the Youth Opportunity Fund will be increased by a further $150 million, thus bringing the Youth Opportunity Fund to about $1.3 billion this year.

In the coming fiscal year, the government's commitment to Special Recovery Capital Projects and to direct employment support will exceed $3.5 billion. This is about $525 million more than in the current fiscal year.

[Translation]

But we must all recognize that there are limits to what government alone can do. The jobs Canadians seek—good jobs and permanent jobs—must come from a healthy and growing economy, led by a strong and vigorous private sector.

I expect real growth in 1984 to be about 5 per cent compared with 3 per cent in 1983. Continued strong employment growth, of about 3.5 per cent, will increase the total personal income of Canadians. I am forecasting that total personal income, after inflation and taxes, will increase in 1984, after declining for the past two years. Consumer expenditure is expected to grow steadily in 1984, supported by this increase in personal income and a modest decline in the personal savings rate.

The improvement in the housing market last year will be maintained with an average annual level of new housing starts of about 170,000 units. Government capital expenditures, including the Special Recovery Capital Projects, will provide an important source of growth. Most importantly, I expect business investment to provide increasing support throughout the year, thereby providing the key building block to a sustained medium-term recovery.

Over the medium term, I expect real growth to continue, averaging almost 4 per cent a year from 1985 to 1988. Employment increases will continue to be strong. I am projecting that almost 1.6 million new jobs will be created over the five-year period from 1984 to 1988. At the same time, however, the labour force will also grow significantly, particularly in 1984 as increasing employment opportunities lead many Canadians to return to the job market. For this reason, we may not see a dramatic reduction in the unemployment rate this year. However, the unemployment rate should steadily decline and fall to about 7.5 per cent by 1988.

• (1630)

[English]

These forecasts are not goals. Our experience last year showed that by working together we could do better than the forecasts. Our objective should be to do so once again. the measures I am about to announce will help to achieve this outcome.

PARTNERSHIP FOR COMPETITIVENESS AND PRODUCTIVITY

I now turn to the competitiveness and productivity of the Canadian economy.

Becoming more competitive is a critical challenge for us all. It is a challenge we must meet if we are to create new economic opportunities and new jobs.

We are making progress. In the past year, moderating costs and strong productivity growth have helped us maintain our competitive position in world markets. Our exports grew by more than 5 per cent last year, increasing our share of the world market.

In order to keep Canada growing we must better equip ourselves to compete with our trading partners, both at home and abroad. That means we must cut our costs and be more productive. We must be world class. Laterly the government is committed to strengthening the world trading system. We can grow and prosper only by raising our own standards, not by self-defeating attempts to cut ourselves off from the rest of the world.

Three weeks ago the Government announced that business and labour representatives had agreed on the mandate and structure for the Canadian Labour Market and Productivity Centre. The federal government has committed about $27 million towards its operation over the next four years. The establishment of this Centre is a welcome result of what I regard as one of the most important of the many initiatives in the budget of April 1983: the effort to develop a new national partnership of labour, management, and governments to meet the tough competitive challenges of the 80s and provide the jobs Canadians need. Such a partnership cannot be legislated; it must be based on a strong sense of shared economic interests.

I wish to thank the labour and business representatives who worked together to make the Centre a reality. I am confident that it will soon make a valuable contribution to increasing productivity and employment.

In order to help ensure that our economy remains efficient and productive, my colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, will soon introduce amendments to the Combines Investigation Act. By modernizing competition policy, the government will assist in the promotion of efficiency and growth. An effective competition policy allows for efficient producers to be successful and for the fair treatment of large firms, small firms and consumers alike. The proposed amendments will help Canadian companies meet foreign competition domestically and challenge foreign companies for markets abroad.

Today I am announcing new measures to assist Canadian workers and managers to build a more productive and competitive economy.

[Translation]

EMPLOYEE PROFIT-PARTICIPATION PLAN

The key to our success is productivity. Investment in modern equipment is critical. So is education, training, and research into new techniques of operation. But equally important is "putting it all together", and putting it all together comes down to individual Canadians co-operating in the workplace to make a better product at a lower cost.

Innovative managers are recognizing this. Traditional management techniques are adapting to changing attitudes and rising expectations of workers. Workers today want to be informed about their company's goals and performance. They want to understand why, as well as how, things should be done. They want to participate in the decisions that affect their work environment and the security of their jobs. And they want their own contribution to the success of their company to be recognized and rewarded. Responding to these legitimate ambitions can provide substantial benefits for management and workers alike.

[English]

The government believes improved labour-management co-operation in the work place is fundamental to economic growth.

I am therefore proposing today to encourage this process with tax assistance for a new Employee Profit-Participation Plan.

The government will provide a tax credit of 10 per cent of the profits shared under the Plan. Sixty per cent of the tax credit will go to individual workers; forty per cent will go to the employer.

The Employee Profit-Participation Plan is designed to complement the collective bargaining process, not replace it. Experience has shown that to succeed, profit-sharing cannot be a substitute for competitive wages.

Any company wishing to establish a plan must form a labour-management committee. The details of the Plan will have to be agreed upon by both workers and management.

I shall table a paper with this budget providing details of how the Plan will work. I want to proceed with legislation that will allow such plans to begin in the 1985 taxation year. I therefore intend to consult without delay provincial governments and representatives of the business and labour communities to seek their views and co-operation.

I also intend to broaden the tax assistance available to employee stock option plans. Employee stock options are important in compensating dynamic and entrepreneurial employees. They provide such employees with incentives directly related to their ability to increase the productivity, competitiveness, and growth of their company.

AID-TRADE FUND

Public support can do much to enhance the role which our private sector can play in international development.

In my April budget, I stressed the importance of exports to promote recovery and expansion. I established a Special Recovery Export Financing Fund of $180 million to enable the Export Development Corporation to provide greater assistance to exporters.

The developing countries offer many export opportunities for our private sector. However, many of these countries are experiencing unusually serious balance of payments problems which are impeding their development efforts and thus their capacity to import. Their decisions to undertake investments and capital projects often hinge on the availability of external financing on concessional terms. To respond to these needs, for our own benefit as well as theirs, we shall require closer co-ordination of our development assistance and our export financing policies.

● (1640)

[English]

In the Speech from the Throne, the government reaffirmed its commitment to devote 0.5 per cent of GNP to official development assistance by the mid-1980s and 0.7 per cent by the end of the decade. This commitment will require an expansion of Canada's traditional development assistance programs; it will also require new policies and new delivery channels.

In this regard, I am announcing that the government will allocate up to one-half of the increase in Canadian official development assistance, as we move towards the target of 0.7 per cent of GNP, to create a special fund in support of an expanded role for Canadian firms in developing countries. By 1990, as much as $1.3 billion could be allocated to the fund to provide financing for projects which have high priority in recipient countries' development plans, for which Canadian firms are competitive and for which development assistance financing is required.

The government will develop guidelines for the use of this fund in consultation with the business community. The object will be to help Canadian firms to provide additional goods and services in support of Third World development and to increase the Canadian share of procurement in multilateral development projects. It will also be the government's intention to enhance industrial co-operation between Canada and developing countries.

SIMPLIFYING TAXES FOR SMALL BUSINESSES

I now want to deal with the issue of simplifying the tax treatment of small business. An important part of the government's responsibility to the private sector is to keep the rules of the game simple and clear. Far too much talent, money, and productive effort is being misspent on keeping complicated records, filling out difficult forms, and trying to understand increasingly complex legislation. The Minister of State for Small Business and I have received numerous representations about the complexity of small business taxation. With the advice of small business organizations and tax practitioners, I have devoted considerable effort to simplifying the tax system.

Tax simplification can free valuable resources for the critical tasks of running a business and making it grow. I recognize that the tax system must inevitably be complex to some degree in order to deal fairly with the wide variety of circumstances that characterize a complex economy. But I am determined to simplify it where possible. I propose to take a significant step tonight, but I recognize that more remains to be done. I intend to continue my efforts in this regard.

[English]

Canadian small businesses are the main source of entrepreneurship, risk-taking, and job creation. It is, therefore, an appropriate area to begin tax simplification. Streamlining their tax regime can be as important as the considerable financial support that the government already provides.

I shall table a paper with this budget containing proposals for a major simplification of the income tax regime for small businesses. The original purpose of the cumulative deduction account was to limit the low tax rate for small business to companies having less than $1 million of cumulative business income. However, it meant that all small business corporations had to keep track of this account regardless of their size. The cumulative deduction account is a prime source of legislative and administrative headaches. I propose to eliminate it. This will reduce paperwork and record-keeping for almost 300,000 small Canadian companies.

The administrative burden on small businesses will be eased further by eliminating the distinction between active business income and non-qualifying business income, and by simplifying the legislation dealing with specified investment businesses, personal service businesses, and corporate partnerships.

These proposals will cut the small business tax legislation by two-thirds, shorten and simplify the tax form, and lighten the burden of record-keeping. The measures will also provide more tax savings for growing small and medium-sized businesses. In the first full year of operation, federal taxes for Canadian controlled private corporations will be reduced by $150 million.

In my consultations on tax simplification, I heard many Canadians say that the rapid pace of change in the tax system in recent years was itself a cause of complexity. Accordingly, I want to allow time for interested parties to comment on these measures. The paper I shall table contains detailed proposals and draft legislation. I hope to receive comments by April 15 and to introduce legislation shortly thereafter. The measures will take effect following enactment by Parliament.

IMPROVING THE FAIRNESS OF TAX ADMINISTRATION

Canada's tax system is based on the principles of self-assessment and voluntary compliance. Because of the complexity of our tax laws, however, taxpayers often experience difficulties in completing their returns. It is becoming increasingly difficult for them to be sure they are complying with the law, and also to be sure they are claiming all the tax relief to which they are entitled.

Demands have increased for Revenue Canada to provide information, assistance in the preparation of returns, advance rulings, and other similar services to taxpayers.

The Minister of National Revenue has appointed an independent expert to undertake a thorough review of the administration of the Income Tax Act. The purpose is to find out what steps need to be taken to make Revenue Canada's service more responsive to the public without detracting from fulfillment of its responsibilities. But some legislative action can be taken immediately.

In response to representations by my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, I propose a number of immediate changes in the law that, taken together, should contribute significantly in relieving the administrative burden on taxpayers and improving the fairness of tax administration.

The quarterly tax payments are a serious burden to many senior citizens. Therefore, I am increasing the existing $400 annual tax threshold below which individuals are exempted from having to pay quarterly tax instalments. The new threshold will be $1,000 and will be extended to corporations. In addition, where interest on late or deficient tax instalments is less than $25, it will not be assessed. These new thresholds will mean that tax instalment obligations, and the associated burden of paperwork, are eliminated for about 350,000 senior citizens and over 50,000 corporations, most of them small business and family farm corporations.

• (1650)

I propose a package of legislative initiatives to improve tax administration. A number are designed to facilitate the resolution of taxpayer disputes and appeals.

The period for filing formal objections to tax assessments is being extended from 90 to 180 days. In addition, rather than being required to pay taxes in dispute, taxpayers will be entitled instead to provide adequate security.

More generous provisions will be introduced relating to the awarding of costs on successful appeals to the courts. In particular, the Tax Court of Canada will be allowed to order Revenue Canada to pay up to $1,000 of the costs of a taxpayer's successful appeal.

Further, taxpayers will have a right to a refund of any overpayment of taxes when a court decides in their favour, even if Revenue Canada further appeals the decision. There are additional relieving changes relating to taxpayer elections and waivers.

[Translation]

A number of major administrative initiatives are also proposed for the sales and excise tax. The government will for the first time pay interest on delayed refunds of overpayments of sales and excise tax. Manufacturers will also be permitted to claim a refund of any such taxes paid on bad debts. In addition, a formal assessment and appeal system will be introduced into the Excise Tax Act. The appeal rights of taxpayers will be protected and entrenched in the law.

These and other proposals detailed in the supplementary information address a number of serious concerns relating to tax administration and represent major improvements in the protection of taxpayers' rights and I wish to thank the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Bussières) for his co-operation in this matter.

[English]

SALES TAX CHANGES

I am also announcing today a further change to the sales tax.

The question of whether the manufacturer's sales tax should be shifted to the wholesale level has been discussed for several years. One of the government's original objectives was to eliminate the unwarranted advantage this tax gave foreign producers competing with Canadian manufacturers in our own markets. This was particularly serious in the auto industry.

Last year I appointed a private sector committee to study alternatives. The committee has recommended that the proposed overall shift in tax to the wholesale level not be implemented. Rather, it has suggested that the government introduce modifications to the existing system to deal with specific defects. The government accepts this recommendation.

I propose, however, that the manufacturer's sales tax on highway motor vehicles be shifted to the wholesale level, effective March 1, 1984. At present, the tax on a Japanese or European car can be $100 to $200 lower than on a comparable car made in Canada or the United States. The change I propose will result in a small revenue decrease for the federal government. But it will ensure a uniform application of tax to all makes of vehicle and end the unfair advantage for imported overseas automobiles.

This measure among others will support growth and employment in the Canadian auto industry.

OTHER TAX MEASURES

I am also proposing a number of additional amendments to the Income Tax Act and to the Customs Tariff and Excise Act that will affect Canadians in specific situations. These are described in detail in the supplementary information I shall table with this budget.

One in particular I want to mention relates to the energy sector. While circumstances in the petroleum industry are improving, there is a need for further temporary assistance, particularly for Canadian companies that are typically among the most aggressive in searching for new supplies of oil and gas. Last April, I provided support to these companies by deferring the reintroduction of the incremental oil revenu tax for one year, from June 1, 1983 to June 1, 1984. I will be proposing to defer reintroduction for another year, to June 1, 1985.

I also propose to introduce changes to facilitate the transfer of family farms from one generation to another. These changes are in keeping with the government's commitment to the preservation of the family farm.

There has been some controversy surrounding the possible application of Section 31 of the Income Tax Act to farmers. The court decisions have clearly emphasized that farm losses are not in any way restricted for those farmers whose principal occupation is farming and I want to affirm that this is our policy intention. Those farmers whose principal occupation is farming should have no concern that their losses may be restricted. This includes farmers who have taken jobs to provide an extra source of income, as many farmers do in order to support their farm operation.

There is some question of the application of these rules to part-time or so-called hobby farmers. Many such persons have full-time or other occupations in the city but nevertheless carry on farming activities. Concern has been expressed that changing the loss rules to benefit those persons could have an adverse impact on farm prices and provide an inappropriate incentive for speculation in farm land. Before considering any specific changes to Section 31, I intend to establish a consultative group to assess the impact that changes might have on the agricultural sector.

PARTNERSHIP FOR ECONOMIC SECURITY

In preparing this budget, one of my overriding concerns has been to improve the economic security of individual Canadians.

Through the recession and into the recovery, this government has maintained its commitment to a wide range of programs and policies that provide an essential level of economic support for Canadians: income support programs, health care programs, economic opportunity programs. These programs help build an environment in which economic growth can be better achieved and maintained.

I am proposing today important measures to enhance the economic security and confidence of Canadians.

IMPROVING PENSIONS FOR CANADIANS

First, I will deal with pensions. Pensions are the principal lifeline Canadians have to economic security in their retirement years. There are ways we can strenghthen that lifeline.

We have had a constructive debate in this country for many years about the best way to build better pensions for Canadians. The government issued a Green Paper in December 1982. This paper was the subject of extensive review by the Parliamentary Task Force on Pension Reform, which reported at the end of last year.

Today, I want to propose actions in five important areas of pension reform.

First, too many retired Canadians are now receiving pensions that are insufficient to allow them to live in comfort and dignity. I refer to those single senior citizens who are now receiving the Guaranteed Income Supplement.

This government will never turn its back on those who spent their working lives helping to build this country, and who now need help themselves. In the Throne Speech, the government made a commitment to introduce legislation to increase the GIS for single pensioners. My colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, will soon be introducing legislation to increase the maximum payment to this group of pensioners by $50 a month. The payment will increase by $25 a month on July 1 of this year and another $25 a month on December 1. This raises the guaranteed income for elderly single individuals to more than 60 per cent of the amount paid to couples, as recommended by many business, labour and women's groups.

• (1700)

[English]

When the GIS is combined with the universal old age pension, single pensioners will be assured of a monthly minimum income of $600, or $7,200 a year. About 750,000 single senior citizens, three-quarters of whom are women, will benefit from the increase. The additional government support will amount to $460 million in a full year. This $50 increase is in addition to the $35 which this government introduced on July 1, 1980. As a result of these increases introduced by this Government during the last four years, those elderly Canadians in greatest need will receive next year additional assistance of more than $1 billion over and above what they would have received had we not made the changes we have in the last four years. Provision will also be made to see that persons receiving partial old age pension, most of whom are Canadian immigrants, have Guaranteed Income Supplement benefits sufficient to give them the same minimum income as other pensioners. About 3,000 pensioners will benefit in the coming year. The number will rise to about 25,000 by the end of the 1980s.

We have honoured our commitment to help those in greatest need.

I expect that provincial governments will not take advantage of this significant increase in benefits to senior citizens by reducing their own payments or increasing their charges on them.

Second, I intend to introduce legislation at an early date which will significantly improve minimum standards for all private pension plans under federal jurisdiction. This represents about one million Canadian workers. I shall table a paper providing details of these proposals.

The changes I am proposing will provide protection against inflation for future pensions.

They will assist mobility by ensuring that employees acquire rights to their pension benefits after two years' service instead of ten, and are allowed to take their benefits with them if they move to another job.

The changes will also broaden pension coverage for full-time and part-time workers, many of whom are women.

Indeed, they will also assist women in a number of other ways: first, by requiring pension plans to provide survivor benefits and ensuring that these benefits will not end if an individual remarries; second, by requiring the pension earned to be split between spouses in the case of marriage breakdown; and third, by ensuring that women and men retiring under identical circumstances receive equal pensions.

There will also be new provisions to assure the disclosure of information and to provide for worker representation on pension advisory committees.

Time will be needed for private plans to adjust to this new regime. I am proposing that these measures take effect no later than January 1, 1987. I will seek an earlier implementation date if that is possible. I expect provincial governments to adopt similar measures in their jurisdictions.

Third, with respect to the Canada Pension Plan, my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, will soon be bringing forward several specific amendments to strengthen the CPP and improve the benefits to women that the CPP provides.

These include automatic splitting of pension benefits upon marriage breakdown or when the younger spouse reaches 65, the continuation of survivor benefits on remarriage, and the raising of pensionable earnings to the average industrial wage by January 1987. Agreement of provincial governments to implement these measures will be sought as soon as possible.

A number of more extensive changes in the CPP will be discussed with the provinces beginning this summer. Among them are the introduction of a homemaker's pension in the CPP, improved survivor and disability benefits, the qualifying age for entitlements and the financing of CPP benefits.

Fourth, I propose to introduce a major reform of the income tax system in order to improve tax assistance for retirement saving. I shall table a discussion paper with this budget that sets out details.

It has become clear over time that a number of aspects of the tax treatment of pension savings are unfair and inflexible.

For example, the tax system now provides significantly greater support and flexibility to Canadians building pensions through defined-benefit plans than it does to Canadians building pensions through money-purchase plans such as RRSPs. This inequity penalizes in particular employees of small businesses, farmers, fishermen, professionals and others who are self-employed.

I am proposing changes to put all pension plans on an equal footing for tax purposes, and to allow contribution entitlements to be carried forward from year to year on the basis of total career earnings. As a result, all Canadians will have comparable access to tax assistance. They will be able to save for retirement as their means permit without losing any entitlement to tax assistance. This will recognize that many Canadians, in their early working years, find it difficult to build pensions because they are saving for a home, bearing a heavy burden of family expenses, or investing to build up a business.

The new tax-assistance system will also be indexed by the average industrial wage, to ensure that Canadians are able to build tax-supported pensions that keep up with inflation and with real increases in living standards.

I am also proposing an innovative Registered Pension Account. This will create a tax-assisted individual savings vehicle to which employers and employees can both contribute funds that cannot be withdrawn until retirement. The Registered Pension Account will relieve many small business employers of complex pension administration burdens, as well as allowing employees improved pension portability.

• (1710)

The new system will provide tax assistance for an adequate pension based on total career earnings. To meet this target, Canadians will be allowed to deduct their own contributions, or contributions made for them by their employer, to any registered pension plan, up to a limit of 18 per cent of total career earnings.

In the first stage of the new system, beginning in 1985, the annual dollar limit for money-purchase plans, including RRSPs, will be increased from $5,500 to $10,000. The annual dollar limit will rise to $12,000 in 1986 and $14,000 in 1987. Limits on employee contributions to registered defined-benefit plans will be removed in 1985.

With the second stage in 1988, the new system will become fully operational. In that year the annual dollar limit for contributions to all pension plans taken together will rise to $15,500. The ceiling will thereafter be adjusted annually by changes in the average industrial wage. The fully operational system will allow individuals to carry forward their unused annual deduction entitlements to future years.

Fifth, I am also taking immediate action to assist farmers to build better pensions for retirement. Effective this year, a special provision will be introduced to allow farmers to contribute up to $120,000 of taxable capital gains from the sale of a farm to an RRSP. The amount eligible will be $10,000 for every year they have farmed the land from 1972 to 1983. This provision recognizes the special difficulty farmers have had in providing for their retirement during the years they are building up their farm.

[Translation]

The new system of tax assistance for retirement saving, together with the changes I propose to the Pension Benefits Standards Act, will increase the capacity of Canadians now working to build stronger pensions for their retirement. By so doing they will help to build a strong foundation for personal economic security, while increasing savings that will support investment and growth over the medium term. This shows once again how public support for private initiative can help Canadians to help themselves, and in the process build a stronger future for all of us.

Finally, the government reaffirms its commitment to ensuring that all Canadians have adequate retirement income. It undertakes to monitor closely the reaction of provinces and the private sector to the proposals for pension reform presented in this budget. The government will be ready to discuss with them whatever additional steps may be required, and their nature and timing.

INCREASING SECURITY FOR HOMEOWNERS

Another area which requires attention is the security of homeowners and of prospective homebuyers. I will have three measures to announce.

Mortgage rates have fallen dramatically and have been stable for many months. Lower and stable interest rates, together with growing incomes and government incentive programs, have restored some of the confidence of Canadian homebuyers. In the past few years, however, thousands of homeowners were dealt a serious blow by mortgage interest rates that rose to unprecedented levels. The Canada Mortgage Renewal Program supported more than 20,000 Canadians in financial difficulty when they had to renew their mortgages at very high interest rates. The Canadian Home Ownership Program provided $3,000 grants to more than 260,000 first-time homebuyers. Over the past two years, the government has provided about $800 million to help Canadians own a home.

With the return of lower interest rates, and in response to the assistance provided in my April budget, new housing starts rebounded strongly in 1983. But many Canadians who were forced to renew their nortgages at very high rates in 1981 and 1982 continued to experience financial difficulties even after mortgage rates came down.

I am concerned about those Canadians who are trapped in such difficulties. The government has encouraged the co-operation of major lending institutions in assisting them. I have also considered, with my colleages, the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, what additional steps can be taken to increase flexibility in the mortgage market, provide borrowers with better information and firmer rights, and protect homeowners against extraordinary increases in mortgage rates.

The government is prepared to act in three areas to strenghten borrowers' rights and to increase the fairness and flexibility of the mortgage market in order to improve the security of Canadian homeowners. These proposals are outlined in detail in a document I am tabling with this budget.

[English]

First, the government proposes a Mortgage Rate Protection Program that will provide income security to homeowners facing mortgage renewals at much higher interest rates. All Canadians will be eligible to join the plan. An individual will pay a modest fee when renewing an existing mortgage or taking out a new one. This will protect the homeowner against extraordinary interest rate increases for a further period of years equal to the original term of the mortgage. As a consequence, someone taking out a five-year mortgage and buying coverage under the program will be guaranteed that monthly payments will remain relatively stable for a 10-year period, that is, twice the duration of the first mortgage.

Mortgage Rate Protection will provide an important element of personal security to home owners and those wishing to purchase homes. My colleague, the Minister of Public Works, and I wish to consult with the financial community and housing industry on a number of administrative and technical details related to the operation of this program. These consultations should be concluded over the next month or so. Enabling legislation will be introduced as soon as details are settled. All homeowners entering new mortgage contracts after March 1, 1984 will be eligible to participate in the program.

Second, together with my colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mrs Erola), I will be proposing amendments to the Interest Act. These amendments will require disclosure of interest rate information, and prepayment rights and penalties, so that all borrowers will be able to know, precisely and simply, the terms of their contract. The amendments will also guarantee a right of prepayment for all mortgages and will limit maximum prepayment penalties in a way that is fair to both borrowers and lenders. The government intends to proceed as quickly as possible. I am also asking financial institutions to voluntarily apply the proposed prepayment measures immediately to existing mortgages.

• (1720)

Finally, in order to facilitate the introduction by the private sector of mortgages that run longer than five years, and as Members know, mortgages for longer than five years have practically disappeared from the market, I shall take steps to encourage the development of mortgage-backed securities. Longer-term mortgages can provide substantial security to homeowners by guaranteeing their mortgage costs for a considerable period of time. I am prepared to propose amendments to remove any legislative barriers to the development of mortgage-backed securities, and I intend to consult with mortgage lenders to determine whether additional measures are required to support the development of such instruments by the private sector.

[Translation]

The measures I am proposing to improve the security of homeownership will enable and encourage more Canadians to buy their own homes. This will increase their personal economic security and contribute as well to residential construction, business investment, and growth.

This budget was preceded by an extensive round of consultations with Canadians from all economic sectors and all regions of the country. These consultations are an important step in carrying out the government's commitment in the Speech from the Throne to introduce more permanent mechanisms of economic consultation.

I have found these consultations extremely valuable, and I wish to thank all those who took the time and effort to present their views to me and to my colleagues.

If there was one underlying message that came through time and again, it was the need for a period of stable and consistent economic policies. Now is not the time for a radical change in direction. People also stressed that the budget process should allow major initiatives to be presented in a way that provides for informed public comment and discussion before they are put into effect.

In line with the Green Paper on the Budget Process, issued in April 1982, the government has been steadily opening up the budget making process.

[English]

Extensive consultations have now become a permanent feature of budget making. I welcome this development. Major proposals in my last budget, such as the Indexed Securities Investment Plan and improved tax incentives for research and development, have benefited considerably from the expertise and knowledge that was brought to bear on them in post-budget consultation and comment.

My budget today continues this evolution to a more open process. The government recognizes that consultation cannot and must not be a substitute for action. But proposals, such as those I have put forward today, can be improved and refined to the benefit of all when Canadians are offered a reasonable opportunity to comment on them.

CONCLUSION

I am tabling with this budget Ways and Means motions relating to all the tax and tariff changes I have proposed. I am also tabling all of the budget papers to which I have referred.

These papers on profit sharing, on tax simplification, on the mortgage market, and on pension reform, contain far-reaching proposals for action. These proposals will strengthen the partnership between government and the private sector while they expand economic opportunities and improve personal economic security for Canadians. The Government is eager to proceed with these proposals as quickly as possible. In the coming weeks, my colleagues and I will meet with our partners in labour, business and the provinces to hear their views.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I have brought down a Budget which, I am sure, will help us make the transition from recovery to expansion, by ensuring that more industries, regions and Canadians receive the benefits of economic growth. I am thinking particularly of our young people who need jobs and of those Canadians who are retired or close to retirement and deserve proper recognition for the contributions they have made.

As Canadians, we must share the burden when times are hard, but we must also share the profits when better times come along. Above all, we must do our share to make our economy grow, by working together as true partners. My Budget opens new avenues towards an economic future that will be better and more profitable for all of us.

As businesses regain their profitability, their employees will share more directly and completely in the benefits of their work. Following the substantial simplification of their taxation system, small and medium-sized businesses will be able to use more of their time, more of their talents and more of their money to promote productive growth.

With the proposals contained in this budget, Canadian homeowners and builders will benefit from an improved confidence and a greater stability as well as from a more secure future.

Our young people will benefit from better opportunities to gain secure and satisfying employment through a substantial increase in the material resources which the government will set aside for this purpose this year.

As I have already noted, the Youth Opportunity Fund will receive about $1.3 billion this year.

Finally, senior citizens today and in the future will be able to enjoy a larger part of the property they have acquired through their work thanks to a reform of the pension system. Farmers particularly will benefit from new and innovative measures which will help them to better provide for their retirement years.

[English]

If Canadians are to meet the challenges of the future, we cannot be satisfied with past performance and past habits. These will not sustain us in a fiercely competitive international marketplace. We must become better than the competition—better at producing and marketing goods and services; better at working together for the shared economic interests of all Canadians.

If we measure up to that challenge, then we shall create new opportunities for Canadians to find good, satisfying, permanent jobs. We shall create opportunities for more Canadians to buy a home, to start or expand a small business, and to invest with confidence in our future. In short, we shall create the opportunities for Canadians to build better, more fulfilling lives on a foundation of economic strength.

That is the goal of the program of action I have presented today to lead Canada from recovery to expansion.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I have to be truthful with the Canadian people. I can be no other way. I do not rise here tonight to deceive them by saying that this is indeed a wonderful Budget. There is a little froth on the surface of it to which the Government has been forced. There is some help for those who have suffered from the injustices of the Department of National Revenue, which of course has been caused by the people on this side of the House who pursue that issue. There are some improvements in pensions, largely because of the agitation of a Member on this side, the Hon. Member for Kingston and The Islands (Miss MacDonald) and others.

When you look at the fine print in this Budget, Mr. Speaker, you will discover that all these improvements are going to cost the Government today a net decline in revenue of only $215 million. It is only froth on the surface of this Budget. At the same time last April this Government increased taxes to the Canadian people in the amount of $805 million. It will cost the Canadian people $2.4 billion in the next financial year, and the year after that it will cost $2.9 billion. All of this that sounds so fine today will cost the Government $215 million net while it will bleed the Canadian taxpayers four times that amount. This Government has taken the Canadian ownership charge of $840 million without the authorization of the House. It has been put into general revenues. Otherwise, the debt for this year, which is now $31.5 billion, would have been $840 million more. That is the kind of deception we are used to with this Government.

● (1730)

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, in order to show that I am bilingual, I want to say a few words to the Minister. I am quoting from the great French author Rabelais. His last words are these: "Tirez le rideau, la farce est jouée".

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: It means, bring down the curtain, the farce is over.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: The Canadian people will have endured four years of Liberal Government on February 18. The Government's moral authority to rule any longer has gone. I say, let us go to the people on this Budget.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: What did the Minister say in his Budget of last April ten months ago? Let me quote:

> My dominant concern in preparing this budget has been to help the more than 1.5 million Canadians who want to work but cannot find jobs.

That is what the Minister said ten months ago. How many Canadians are there today out of work who cannot find jobs? There are 1,500,000. That is exactly the same number he was going to help ten months ago.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: We have the greatest deficits in Canada's history and not one more person is working. We have $31.5 billion deficit and there is not one more person working. That is how wonderful deficits work, Mr. Speaker. Do you know that in the next five years, including the financial year that starts at the end of March, the Government will have, it says, $173 billion in deficits. The Government says its financing requirements will be $114.1 billion. Do you know, Mr. Speaker, that the Government will have to borrow all of that because it will have to pay, it says, $109.1 billion in interest on the deficits and the debt it has racked up in the last eight or ten years?

Some Hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Crosbie: There is no future for Canada in this Budget. There is no thrust for economic recovery. There is no thrust for economic growth. It is a down the chute budget. It is a red ink budget.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: The public debt charges this year, what we are paying on the debt the Government has already incurred, are $18.1 million. One of every $3 the Canadian people will pay in taxes this year goes in interest on the debt. Next year the public debt will go to $20.3 billion, the following year, $22.4 billion, the following year, $23.6 billion, and the following year after that, $24.7 billion. That is money just wasted in interest payments. For what, Mr. Speaker? For permanent improvement? No. It is to pay interest on the debt of these spendthrifts, these wastrels opposite us.

Next year the deficit will be $26.9 billion. Do you know, Mr. Speaker, that personal income tax returns will be up 16 per cent this year; corporate tax will be up 25 per cent and the revenue is shown as going up 14 per cent? Everything in this Government goes up except what should go up. The Minister just brought the Budget up. We have had five budgets brought up by this Government.

The public net debt of this country at the end of March will be $150 billion. When the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), who is now off on a trip to Russia, started his regime in Canada we had a net public debt in Canada of $17 billion. It is now $150 billion. No wonder he is ashamed to be here for this Budget.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Any excuse is all right for the Prime Minister to be away when the domestic problems of this country are under consideration. He does not want to hear the shameful record of this country.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McDermid: That gets them going.

Mr. Crosbie: Now most of them hope he never returns.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: There is only one way this nation can have economic recovery, and that is, to have lower interest rates. There is only one way we will get lower interest rates, and that it, if we have a Government that will show it will control its spending and its deficits. That is the only way. We are doomed to a thwarted and aborted recovery with this Budget. It does not show the Government will control its spending or the deficit. The Minister of Finance knows that. He has given that exact advice to Mr. Volcker. Remember when I put the question to him last week, Mr. Speaker? I quoted Mr. Volcker, the U.S. Federal Reserve Board Chairman, who said this:

> High deficits are restraining economic recovery. The federal deficits have kept interest rates high. Pressures from the deficits work to restrain expansion in areas of the economy that are more sensitive to interest rates, such as housing, autos, and long-term business spending.

I asked the Minister whether he agreed with those statements. He got up and he said, "Sure, I was the one who originated them. I said that long before Volcker did". If the Minister believes these statements of Volcker's are true, how can he continue to have budgets that bring in a deficit far greater than the U.S. deficit? The U.S. economy is ten times our size. The U.S. deficit this year, I think is $183 billion. Our is $31.5 billion. In terms of the U.S. economy, that would be a deficit of $310 billion. That is far worse than the U.S. deficit. If these economic principles are true for the United States of America, they are true for Canada. The Government is leading us down the chute because it does not have the guts, the gumption or the courage to tackle the real problems of this country.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: I will not give myself as an authority, Mr. Speaker; I will quote somebody else. I quote him now:

Real interest rates are high and this seems in part a reflection of worries about a possible resurgence of inflation and large fiscal deficits.

"Real interest rates are high". What is it? A reflection of worries about a resurgence of inflation and large deficits. Who said it? The Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development (Mr. Johnston) making a submission to the MacDonald Royal Commission last September 21. How can he stay in a Government that ignores these economic truths and these views?

Mr. Lalonde: I said it, too.

Mr. Crosbie: You are the cause of the real interest rates. You and your Government and your spending over the last four years. You do not want to do anything to overcome it.

Mr. Speaker, let me give another quotation that I have here somewhere in my voluminous notes.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Tousignant: What about the Budget, John?

Mr. Crosbie: If you want me to bring in a budget, go to the electorate tomorrow and they will see that I am put back to bring in the budget.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: The Minister of Finance said this:

Budgets are not instant solutions, but building blocks to success.

Mr. Evans: What do you think?

Mr. Crosbie: This is not a building block to any economic recovery in Canada. We have had six of these documents from this Government since it got back in power four years ago. The first was on April 21, 1980, which was an economic statement. The next was on October 28, 1980. That was when the poor old Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) brought in a Budget on energy and he crushed the energy industry with the help of the then Minister of Energy. The two of them should be taken up for attempted murder.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1740)

Mr. Crosbie: On November 12, 1981, the Deputy Prime Minister reversed himself, swallowed himself and became the Gypsy Rose Lee of Finance Ministers. He threw off all these tax reforms and was left naked as a newt in front of the Canadian people. On January 28, 1982, there was another Budget from the hon. gentleman, and he finished stripping—the G-string went on that one.

On October 27, 1982, there was an economic statement from the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde), and on April 17, 1983, a Budget. This is now No. 7; seven come eleven, they hope, and every one of them different from the last one, every one of them reversing the last. There is no confidence left in the country at all. There is no confidence among those who have money to invest, foreign or domestic. Then comes down the Budget of today, which reveals a situation far worse than anyone could have imagined in their most drunken moments, with a deficit that was not several billions of dollars better, as the rumour had been, but a deficit that was several million worse.

The Minister had a Budget leak last year at a cost to Canadian taxpayers of $200 million. But even adding that on, he has outdone that. His Budget deficit is now going to be $31.5 billion. By the way, in the lock-up we asked about several places in these documents where they are calculating that interest rates will decline. Remember, this is very important, because the biggest spending done by the Government now is on interest payments on our debt. In estimating what they will be, one has to estimate what interest rates will be in the next five years. This group says that they are estimating that they will decline. So we asked them what interest rate they were using. Oh, they could not tell us. We asked, "Why can't you tell us? Don't you have to use some estimate of interest rates?" They said, "Well, we have to ask the Minister about that". I said, "If you are going to ask the Minister to give you permission to tell us what interest rates are used—and probably it was 3 per cent—then we are never going to find out what interest rate assumptions were used". In other words, these figures are entirely fictitious.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: They are what the ordinary person describes as a crock. I hope the Canadian people watching tonight will tune in tomorrow morning; I am back again at eleven o'clock in the morning.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Tomorrow I will show how accurate the Government has been in its projections and estimates over the last four years. It would turn your hair white, Mr. Speaker.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: The Hon. Member for York West (Mr. Fleming) on the Government side of the House on November 29 said this about the Government: "If we stay the way we are, surely we are dead". We are looking at the living dead here today. They have stayed just the way they were. As he said, the Government operates on cynicism, ballyhoo and manipulation, but cynicism, ballyhoo and manipulation will not feed the unemployed.

Do you know, Mr. Speaker, what goes on in this Budget speech? I will show one little piece of deception that is in this Budget speech just to show how it is done. They cannot feed people on deception. I would like to refer to page 7 of the speech. By the way, the Budget speech and the documents were not delivered around. I do not think they have been delivered to our Members yet.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Crosbie: When our Members leave the House, they will be asked by their constituents, the radio and other media, questions about the Budget and the Budget papers. They have not even been allowed to see them yet; they are not even distributed yet. That is a disgraceful piece of news management.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: On page 7 of his speech, the Minister discussed securing growth and securing jobs. He said:

> For this reason, we may not see a dramatic reduction in the unemployment rate this year.

Well, that is a safe prediction. We are going to see a lot of unemployed Liberals if they get their act together and call an election. Then he went on to say:

> However, the unemployment rate should steadily decline and fall to about 7.5 per cent by 1988.

Now the person listening in hears only the words "decline and fall to about 7.5 per cent". He does not notice the "1988". But if he gets, which he will not, the fiscal plan and all the other Budget documents and looks them up, he will find what the Minister really predicts in 1988, five years away unless my mathematics are incorrect.

Here is what is in the document—the unemployment rate for 1983 was 11.9 per cent and for 1984 will be 10.9 per cent on average. That is the year in which we are living now. They also estimate the number of those who will be unemployed—1,401,000 is the Minister's estimate of those who will be unemployed in Canada all during 1984; not 1988, they cannot survive on nothing until 1988. They estimate that 10.1 per cent will be unemployed in 1985; 1,336,000 will be unemployed that year. Then the Minister estimates that 1,238,000 will be unemployed in 1986 and 1,184,000 in 1987, and we are right down to 1,106,000 in 1987-88; not 7.5 per cent which the unsuspecting listener who hears him rush through his speech thinks he is forecasting. He is not forecasting that. He is forecasting leaving them in the dark. The Minister is forecasting leaving all those unemployed in the dark for the next five years. Mr. Speaker, 1,401,000 will remain unemployed this year, not what the Budget speech tries to pretend will happen. I have unlimited time, by the way. That is good news for the other side.

The Minister said, "In my April Budget, my goal was to secure the recovery. That goal has also been met". Do the 1.5 million unemployed out there think that his goals have been met? They do not. They will put him through the goal posts soon.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Do you know, Mr. Speaker, that only 70 per cent of all our industrial capacity is now being utilized? Is that economic recovery? "My goal was to secure the recovery. That goal has also been met". Was 70 per cent utilization of our industrial capacity the Minister's goal? Is that his goal? If so, he should get out. That is not our goal. Our goal is 100 per cent, not 70 per cent.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: On page 2 the Minister said, "This Budget is fiscally responsible." It is the most fiscally irresponsible, pernicious Budget ever brought into the House. How can they criticize President Reagan? President Reagan's deficits are far better than theirs. How can they come into the House and show that over the next five years we will have the kind of deficits they show, with no indication of how they are going to change? The improvements in pensions which we are discussing here today and which we support and the improvements in the GIC will do Canadians no good if in 10 years or 15 years the economy of this country cannot grow, if we are on the downward path, if we are finished as an industrial power, if we do not have the capacity to work hard, if we cannot be more productive and improve our productivity, if we cannot be competitive, if we cannot control the deficit, if we cannot control our sloth, if we cannot control our Government's carelessness, and if we cannot control their insatiable lust to be in power and stay there forever. If we cannot do that, none of those people have any security; it is all going to go.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: That is why we have to get in office. The people and the press ask us outside, "What are you going to do?", "How are you going to control the deficit?" and "What spending are you going to cut?" That is the responsibility of those who wheedled their way in four years ago with deceit, lies and trickery. They have the responsibility of governing. If we get the responsibility of governing, then we will take the responsibility. We are going to do all the hard things that have to be done.

• (1750)

An Hon. Member: Tell us about them.

Mr. Crosbie: You had your 20 years. You brought us to this pass. You have not got the guts of a giblet between the whole lot of you.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: The Minister says on page 3 that he is going to put back indexing, which our former Leader, Mr. Stanfield, suggested in the first place, which they stole and adopted, and which they betrayed several years ago, unnecessarily. They are going to put back the indexing of income tax brackets, deductions and so on, which they should never have removed in the first place because they were not causing inflation. If those things had caused inflation, why are they putting them back again when we still have inflation of 5 per cent and there is a threat of further inflation? Obviously they did not cause inflation in the first place.

The man who slit the throat of the principle of indexation is the Deputy Prime Minister. He is swallowing himself again today as the principle of indexation gets put back in the Budget.

Mr. Evans: Thirty-five minutes and you've said nothing yet.

Mr. Crosbie: We happen to know what you would do. The unknown is far preferable, so don't worry about it. Give the Canadian people a choice between the Government and anyone, a group of phantoms, zombies from outer space, and they will choose.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: What I want Government Members to do is to ask these questions. What has this budget done to address the problem of high interest rates in Canada and to be sure that they will decline in the coming months? What has it done to achieve that? That is the secret to any economic recovery.

What has this Budget done about bringing about lower interest rates and increasing consumer demand? The Canadian ownership charge is still gouging the Canadian consumer four and one-half cents a gallon. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Chrétien) had the audacity, the gall and the skullduggery to announce on November 21 that the Government was going to impose the Canadian ownership charge, although it did not know what it would do with the proceeds. It did not care what it would do with the proceeds, but it would keep collecting them from Canadians. The Deputy Prime Minister said: "Vote Liberal and the price will come down." Prices have gone up a thousandfold since.

What has the Budget done to lower interest rates? What has the Government done to help consumer demand? What has it done to increase business investment? This will not increase business investment. Anyone who has money to invest will stay away from Canada until Canada has a government that is prepared to tackle these problems. I will be elaborating tomorrow. If Members want to know what I would do, I advise them to come along and I will tell them what to do.

The need in this country is for confidence, confidence of ordinary Canadians in their government. How can they have confidence in a government that acts as though it were completely composed of sleaze-bags that spend public funds? Part of the $31.5 billion deficit is to hire investigators to look into the record and the activities of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mulroney) before he became our Leader. Can anyone have confidence in a regime that will stoop that low? Of course not. Can an investor have confidence in a government that sees itself out of control and does not care about spending, but apparently is never going to control its spending, that will impose increased taxes? No. There cannot be confidence in a government like that.

Do you know that the structural deficit is over 50 per cent? We are not in boom times. The Government's own analysis shows that over half of the $31 billion deficit is structural. It will not disappear with an economic recovery, but is anything being done? Can anyone have confidence in a government that will not seize that fact? Of course they cannot and do not.

Can they have confidence in a government that changes its fiscal and economic policies every six months, changes its Finance Ministers, brings in as a last gasp the only man in the Cabinet that has the necessary backbone to be able to slip under the door, a refurbished McCarthyite who attempted to besmirch the escutcheon of our honoured Leader and who met with editorial scorn in every paper of the Dominion, French, English and Ukrainian?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: The need is confidence. The need is for a convincing program, a deficit reduction that will deal with the structural deficit over four or five years. The need is for solicitude for the helpless and the needy who need to have a better future, and that depends on a healthy growing economy. The need is for honesty of purpose and expression. The public is fed up with the whole shebang, because they see a government ripe with dishonesty and they think all politicians are the same.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: We need a restoration of integrity for the governmental process. We need the removal of those whose sense of right and wrong is atrophied by 20 years in power. We need a restoration of the sense of smell to Cabinet Ministers. The mighty must fall and be humbled and the humble must be given their chance. That environment will lead to lower interest rates. It will lead to a resurgence of belief and investment. It will lead to a return of confidence to the consumer and to the investor, more employment and growth. It will lead to a better climate for federal-provincial co-operation. That is what we intend to bring when we take office.

In ending, temporarily, let me say this. Canadians are shocked by the stench of Party favouritism, patronage and corruption that is wafing out across the country from Ottawa. It is worse than the worst excesses of Mr. Duplessis or Mr. Smallwood. They are not in the class of what has been happening here in the last few months.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Malevolent McCarthyism, misuse of public funds, smear tactics, the attempt to find something discreditable about those who are wholly creditable is wholly despicable. No budget nor any set of policies can overcome this atmosphere. There can be no economic recovery for Canada with this atmosphere. Only an election and a new government can set the stage. If you care about the Canadian people, give them a chance and call an election. That is how we will have real economic growth.

In concluding, let me say this: Come my friends, the Canadian people, 'tis not too late to seek a newer world. Push off and sitting well in order smite that Liberal Government and all will be on the way to becoming better.

Mr. Speaker, I move:

That the debate be now adjourned.

I hope, to be here at eleven in the morning. Tune in tomorrow morning.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at eleven o'clock pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 6 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I thank the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), who knows that I will take just one minute to outline the business for the coming days and tell Hon. Members when we will debate the Budget. Today, obviously, will be the first day of debate. The second, third and fourth days of the Budget debate will be Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday of next week. Tomorrow and Monday we will deal with the following Bills: C-18, C-9 and C-10, in that order.

This is the business for the coming days. I thank the Hon. Member for St. John's West for giving me this opportunity.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Wednesday, February 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the Government.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to be repetitious. I hope that anything I say today with reference to the Budget Speech the Minister delivered yesterday will be new and fresh.

I want to start by adverting to the situation with respect to unemployment. Probably the most serious deficiency in the Budget is that it does not provide for any long-term recovery in Canada. That, of course, is because it does not show any way in which we are going to get out of the Government's existing deficit position in the next five years. It does not show any way in which we are going to achieve lower real interest rates or lower interest rates in the next five years. It does not show how the present economic recovery is going to continue successfully.

It is also noticeable because of the apparent inability of the Government to deal with the question of unemployment, the 1,473,000 Canadians who are now unemployed. The document that gives the figures for the fiscal plan is astonishing. When you get behind the figures and the phraseology in his Budget, it shows that the Minister is contemplating that this year there will be 1,401,000 Canadians unemployed on average during the year. In 1984-85 he contemplates 1,336,000 Canadians will remain unemployed. In 1985-86 he is contemplating 1,238,000 Canadians remaining unemployed all year. In 1986-87 there will be 1,184,000 people unemployed, the Minister prophesied. In 1987-88, even then, 1,106,000 Canadians are to remain unemployed if this Government remains in office.

I can only tell you, Mr. Speaker, that we do not intend to contemplate those kinds of unemployment figures for Canada when we assume power whenever this Government calls an election. These figures are not good enough. That is why the Minister's Budget appears on the surface to have something to it; but when one looks underneath, as I said last night, it reminds me of a capelin, a little fish that rolls in on the beaches in Newfoundland having his last jolly spasm on the way. The capelin lies on the beach in Newfoundland in the moonlight for a few days. It looks bright and shiny on the surface but once you give it a poke, you find it is completely rotten inside. That is the trouble with this Budget. It is shiny on the surface but completely deteriorated on the inside. That is the Minister's projection of unemployment for Canadians in the next five years.

We hear the Minister in this House tell us how much better we are doing than the rest of the world, how proud he is of our recovery, and how much better off we are than the United States. The unemployment rate in the United States is now 8 per cent. Do you remember, Mr. Speaker, that in 1968 when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) formed his administration the unemployed rate was 4.8 per cent? There were 360,000 people unemployed. That is a great record. If the Prime Minister stays in power long enough, there will be no Canadians employed. There was 4.5 per cent unemployment when the Prime Minister assumed office in 1968.

Let us look at what it was in March, 1980 when the "terrible Tories" left power. By the way, that was the only year the deficit had been reduced in a number of years. In the eight months we were in power, what was the situation? In March, 1980 the unemployment rate was 7.5 per cent. There were 967,000 people unemployed in the winter of 1980. Four years later there are 1,473,000 Canadians unemployed and we have a government that contemplates some remaining unemployed for the rest of the 1980s. If it is not time for that Government, that tired, dispirited group of montebanks to leave office, then when will the time come? Will anyone be left employed if this Government continues in office? There were 360,000 Canadians unemployed when Mr. Trudeau was elected Prime Minister and today we have 1,473,000 Canadians unemployed.

There is another point I want to make in connection with the Government's figures that have been presented to the House. These are five-year projections. The Government has projected, of course, horrendous deficits, as I mentioned yesterday, totalling $142.1 billion over the next five years. It is a fantastic series of deficits, and there are fantastic increases in spending. Are even those projections accurate?

The Government projects $114 million in interest payments alone and $119 million to be borrowed. Are those figures accurate? As you know, Mr. Speaker, we do not know what interest rate calculations the Government is using. We do know from looking at what the Government says the expenditures will be that the Government is using some peculiar figures. For example, the Government says total outlays this year—expenditures—will be $90.076 billion; the year after they will be $99.3 billion; the following years $108.5 billion; $118.4 billion and $128.3 billion. That is what the Government tells us.

These are the increases in percentage terms: 7.6 per cent this year; in 1985, 5.3 per cent; in 1986, 5.6 per cent and in 1987, 6.0 per cent. That is the percentage increase in expenditures each year.

Then they show that the cost of living in those years will go up. In 1984 the figure is 5.2 per cent; 1985, 5.3 per cent; 1986, 4.8 per cent and in 1987, 4.5 per cent. They show that during the same years the Gross National Product will go up. In 1984 it will go up by 10.3 per cent; 1985, 9.3 per cent; 1986, 9.1 per cent; and 1987, 8.3 per cent.

Let us compare the percentage increases in the Government's expenditures or what it tells us they are going to increase by each year. We see, for example, that in 1985 the Government says its expenditures will go up 5.3 per cent and the cost of living will go up by exactly the same. We know that there is practically no chance whatsoever that these are accurate projections of the expenditure increases. We therefore know that under this regime the deficits will be even more horrendous.

When we see that in 1985 the GNP goes up by 9.3 per cent and Government spending only goes up by 5.3 per cent, we know that there is a large measure of fiction in the figures that the Minister is asking us to believe are estimates.

That brings me to another point, Mr. Speaker. What is the Government's record for the accuracy of what it tells the House and the people of Canada is going to be the situation from year to year? I hope this will not bore hon. gentlemen because it will take a few minutes.

By the way, I have some quotations. In 1969-70 the Prime Minister said on August 13 that we would be on the road to financial disaster if nothing was done to bring spending under control. That was what the Prime Minister said in 1969-70, Mr. Speaker. That year we spent $13.8 billion. That was the total spending of the Government when the poor Prime Minister said we would be on the road to financial disaster if nothing was done to control spending. We had a surplus that year of $493 million and our net debt was $18.1 billion. The Prime Minister was worried about the road to financial disaster then, 14 years ago.

This may be of interest, Mr. Speaker. On May 6, 1972 Mr. John Turner said:

> The bare fact of the matter is that we cannot do everything at once. We simply don't have the resources. There are limits to the scope of fiscal policy. There are limits to stimulus and readjustment.

He had spending of $20.8 billion and the net debt was $18.8 billion. That gentleman may have a resurrection this year if the Prime Minister is not resurrected for the second time. If he does not beat the record set several thousand years ago, then it may be that Mr. Turner will have a resurrection. On November 19, 1974 he said:

> We must do all we can in these circumstances to restrain the growth of government expenditures . . . We have sought and shall continue to seek to cut out public waste, to place limits on the growth of the public service, and to approve only the most essential new programs.

That was the policy of the Government in 1974-75. The total spending was $30.8 billion, the deficit was $1.7 billion and the net debt was $21.1 billion.

The next year, on June 23, 1975, in his Budget address, Mr. Turner said:

> The Government proposes to set an example of restraint in this regard by imposing strict control over its activities and programs.

Have you ever heard such a list of protestations of restraint and control, Mr. Speaker? He spent $36.5 billion, had a deficit of $5.4 billion and a net debt of $22.9 billion. Along came Mr. Donald Macdonald, now the Chairman of a Royal Commission that is pointing out our economic future. On May 25, 1977 he said:

> To achieve our expenditure central objectives, the introduction of new programs must be kept within careful limits, and the resources required for the continued operation of existing programs must be minimized . . . It is appropriate that these record deficits should recede.

That was the pious hope of Mr. Donald Macdonald, now the guiding genius of the Macdonald Royal Commission. He spent $40.3 billion, his deficit was $6.2 billion and the net debt $28.3 billion. He had a Budget the next year as well. On March 31, 1977 he said:

> The restraint of growth in the government's spending has been an integral of our anti-inflation policies. The Government believes that such restraint is as important today as it was at the start of the program.

He had a $45.5 billion expenditure, $10.8 billion deficit and a $34.6 billion net public debt. The Liberals are restraining themselves so much, Mr. Speaker, they are suffering from hernia in the Liberal caucus.

● (1120)

In 1978-79, the new Minister of Finance, the present Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Chrétien), now out on the campaign trail, said on November 16: "There can be no weakening in our determination to keep expenditures under tight control". What did he spend? He spent $49.3 billion. What was his deficit? His deficit was $12.2 billion. What was the net debt at the start of the fiscal year? It was $44.8 billion.

In 1979-80, we have the Prime Minister interested in the game now, nine or 10 years later. He has become alarmed about what he said in 1970. I believe he went on TV. He had a dramatic conversion on the road on one of his trips. He has had more trips than Bob Hope and Bing Crosby put together. That is the most travelled family, Mr. Speaker, since the Love Boat. On January 12, 1980, during the election campaign, the Prime Minister said:

> We will hold the line on government expenditure growth to under the rate of GNP... The deficit will be reduced in a phased and orderly fashion... Any new expenditure programs to meet the evolving needs and requirements of Canadians will be financed by reallocating existing expenditures or by increases in revenues. We will not add to the deficit by adding new programs.

What did Government spend that year? It spent $54.4 billion. The deficit was $11.4 billion, reduced from the previous year. Why? Because the Conservatives had slipped into office for eight months and then slipped out again, and brought the deficit under control. What was the net debt at the start of the year? It was $57.1 billion.

By the way, Mr. Speaker, had I continued on as Minister of Finance, we would not today be looking at 1,473,000 unemployed Canadians. There would be hundreds of thousands fewer.

We can see, Mr. Speaker, that this is a Government fantastically interested in restraint and control of expenditures, one horrified and shocked by deficits and determined to crush the deficit, because that is their rhetoric every year.

In 1980-81, the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) said in one of his great Budgets on October 20, 1980:

> In order to achieve the essential reduction in the deficit, great restraint over expenditures has, therefore, been required.

But not in Cape Breton. The Celtic sphinx was not restraining things down in Cape Breton. He spent $62.8 billion. He had a deficit of $12.6 billion. The net debt was $68.5 billion. He had a deficit of $12.6 billion. The net debt was $68.5 billion.

He brought in another Budget for 1981-82. The November 12 Budget had three themes; restraint, equity and economic renewal. He said:

> For our part, I believe we must reduce our deficit and our borrowing requirements substantially.

What did he do, apart from what he said? He spent $75 billion. He had a deficit of $13.6 billion. The net debt was $81.2 billion. "But he said, "We must reduce our deficit and our borrowing requirements substantially".

Then he brought in another budget on June 28, 1982, in which he said:

> Some say it (the Government) should print more money.

They certainly do, and he is one of the biggest ones.

> Others say it should let the deficit rip.

Oh, it would never do that.

> But that would fail miserably.

Well, if letting the deficit "rip" would fail miserably, why has it let the deficit rip?

> Inflation and unemployment would get worse.

The Minister of Finance knew what was going to happen if they let the deficit rip; inflation and unemployment would get worse. But he let it rip. He did not have a seat left in his pants, it ripped so much.

Mr. Nielsen: "Marc, the ripper".

Mr. Crosbie: Yes; that is "Allan, the ripper".

• (1125)

Then he went on to say interest rates would rise even more. The former Minister of Finance is prophesying exactly what happened. Then he said Canada would price itself out of world markets and recovery would be postponed. That is what the then Minister of Finance said June 28, 1982. He said if we let the deficit rip, inflation and unemployment will get worse, interest rates will rise even more, we will price ourselves out of world markets and recovery will be postponed. What does he do? He lets the deficit rip. Spending was $89.5 billion, the deficit $25.2 billion. The previous year's deficit was $13 billion.

The Deputy Prime Minister was not going to let the deficit rip; he was going to keep her under tight control and she doubled. Doubled! Everything he said would happen that was wrong if he let that happen, happened. Yet the Liberals are continuing to govern. They have been there for years; they are going to brazen it out and cling on for another few months in light of that record.

What about the next year? Why, the next year we had the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) on April 19, 1983 say: "This is a fiscally responsible Budget". Well, this is indeed good news. It is the first fiscally responsible Budget we have seen from this crew. What does he do? He spends $100.2 billion. He has a deficit of $31.3 billion, of which $200 million was caused by his Budget leaking; the only Canadian Minister of Finance ever caught in the act of leaking. The deficit turns out not to be $31.3 billion, it is $31.5 billion. What was the net debt of this country at the start of the year? It was $119.2 billion. What does he now tell us our net debt is going to be at the end of March, 1984? Our net debt is going to be $150.9 billion, some 38.8 per cent of the GNP, the highest it has been as a percentage of the GNP since 1951 or so, which resulted from the war years. The average per capita debt is $6,011, the highest ever in our history. That is where this fiscally responsible Budget, this fiscally responsible Minister—all of those Ministers—are leaving us. Every one of them, every year, has fought the good fight against the deficit.

By the way, Mr. Speaker, the present Minister of Finance is a spritely dancer, as you will see from The Globe and Mail. He is the Jimmy Durante of Canadian Ministers of Finance. Old "Schnozz" himself.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Order, please. I should remind the Hon. Member that displays in the House are not allowed.

Mr. Nielsen: The Minister of Finance should go out, then.

Mr. Crosbie: If there is a request from anyone, Mr. Speaker, I would table this document.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Malone: Table the Minister.

Mr. Crosbie: Actually, Mr. Speaker, I feel brutal having to say these things because I do not like to be critical.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: But this is a Government that can make the most Christian among us feel positively negative. Just let me refer again to the same problem. The previous Minister of Finance is now the Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs, and never has a Minister been able to obscure and obfuscate our external policy such as this Minister has. Luckily the Prime Minister has taken a great interest in foreign affairs so the Deputy Prime Minister is not needed to put his nose into affairs that are more foreign to him than anyone else. On October 28, 1980, that former Minister of Finance promised that over the fiscal period of 1983-84 there would be a steady reduction in the Government's deficit and financial requirements.

Now I am coming to the point of how accurate estimates are. He said only a moderate reduction in the deficit was needed in the next year. Of course, it went up. He said he expected the budgetary deficit to decline from $14.2 billion in 1980 to $13.7 billion in 1981-82, and then more sharply to $12.1 billion in 1982-83, and to $11.8 billion in 1983-84. The Minister was bravely projecting what the deficit was going to be for the next three years. Let us see how successful he and all of those people who work for him in the fortress of Finance were. He forecast the deficit for 1982-83 would be $12.1 billion. In fact, it was $24.6 billion. This Minister asks us to believe that his projections for the next five years, which are horrendous, are accurate when his predecessor's forecast of a deficit for 1982-83 of $12.1 billion was doubled. He forecast the deficit of 1983-84 at $11.8 billion. That is the year ending at the end of March. The Deputy Prime Minister said the deficit would be $11.8 billion. It is $31.5 billion. That is three times, Mr. Speaker. Three eights are twenty-four, three ones are three and three ones are three! I, at least, am careful mathematically. It is almost three times that the Minister estimated it would be. If the same mistakes are being made by this Minister, it leads us to deficits of $70 billion and $75 billion as opposed to $25 billion and $26 billion. If this Minister is as accurate as the other Minister, that is what we are let to. There is no reason to believe that this Minister is any more accurate than the other Minister. They are both "bass ackward".

• (1130)

In his Budget of November 12 the Minister said:

> I believe we must reduce our deficit and our borrowing requirements substantially—even more than I proposed a year ago. This will take pressures off credit markets, ease interest rates and provide room for needy borrowers.

That is when the Government was borrowing $10 billion or $11 billion a year. He wanted to take the pressure off the credit markets, ease interest rates and provide room for needy borrowers. This Minister says we do not need to worry about borrowing $27 billion from the financial markets. He says we do not need to take pressure off the credit markets. This Minister says we do not need to ease interest rates or provide room for needy borrowers because he has been so successful they do not want to borrow. Our economy is so bustling and hustling that no one wants to borrow but the Government. That is the great record of success that this Minister has had.

The Deputy Prime Minister said; "I have set myself the task of cutting back the deficit in the next two fiscal years". I have shown you how successful he was in that task. In his final Budget of June 28, 1982 the Deputy Prime Minister said: "The Government cannot responsibly add to the deficit". That is what he said; but the Government has tripled the deficit. It used to be thought that a Minister of Finance had to be truthful, honest, scrupulous, careful in his statements, careful not to exaggerate and not to frighten the financial markets, rather than people who would say the Government cannot responsibly add to the deficit and then double and triple the deficit. Is it any wonder there is a lack of confidence in the country? Is it any wonder that people from outside Canada do not want to invest in Canada and that Canadians are moving their money out to the U.S. and elsewhere? Zanzibar, Afghanistan or any other country looks better than investing in Canada. We cannot believe a word our Ministers of Finance say.

There can be no confidence in this kind of chicanery and inaccuracy, Mr. Speaker. The Government does not only have budgets, it has economic statements. When the Government wants to pretend matters are not as serious, it has an economic statement. The Minister said the Budget deficit for 1982-83 would be $23.6 billion. That was when the financial year was half over. It was actually $24.6 billion. He put before us the biggest borrowing Bill the Government ever asked the House to grant it, claiming the deficit for the year would be $27.2 billion. The deficit for the year was not $27.2 billion, it was $24.6 billion. In other words, you cannot believe a word these Ministers say, Mr. Speaker. We know what has happened through the 10 or 12 years I have given you the quotations for. That is why this country can only be described as being in a sad state.

A few weeks ago the Minister called for a social contract with the Canadian people. He wants a social contract. The contract the Canadian people want is the contract they now have out on the Government. That is the only contract they want with the Government.

The political process, Mr. Speaker, has been so prostituted for political purposes by the Liberal Party now in power that when you pay taxes today you should get recognition for a deductible contribution to the Liberal Party because the money is not being used for public purposes. Wherever possible, it is being diverted to partisan political purposes such as we have seen in the Prime Minister's Office in recent days.

What is the fastest growing thing in Canada today, Mr. Speaker? It is not worry and fear in the Liberal caucus and it is not projects in Liberal ridings. It is the debt servicing cost of the Government of Canada. Apart from all other concerns with the debt, the average term to maturity of Government debt today has fallen to five and one-quarter years from six and one-half. In other words, all this indebtedness of the Government now has an average term of only five and one-quarter years. The Government has to repay it all within five and one-quarter years. This includes Canada Savings Bonds of $90 billion. About two-thirds of all this debt matures in three years or less. Two-thirds of this tremendous amount of debt matures and has to be refinanced in the next three years. Let that give you pause.

The Auditor General himself has said that these figures are not accurate and do not show properly what the debt is. The Auditor General pointed out that the debt last year was understated by $5.3 billion. Even the fantastic figure shown last year was understated by $5.3 billion because unemployment insurance transactions of $3.28 billion are not shown. The Government has nothing in the books to show the losses of Canadair of over $1 billion and the losses of de Havilland and the like.

Last year the Government did an exercise to show how much of the deficit was structural and how much was cyclical to try to help explain why the debt was so large. Unfortunately, its studies last year and this year show that of the present debt over half is structural. Even with a booming economy we would still have a deficit this year of $18 billion. The more you look at what is happening, the worse it appears.

In his Budget the Minister tries to pretend that we are going to have great growth this year. Other independent agencies such as the Conference Board of Canada, which has a much better record than the Government, predicts 3.3 per cent and .3 per cent for next year.

Mr. Lalonde: Look at the OECD.

Mr. Crosbie: Every time I look at the OECD I see how badly Canada compares to the rest of the OECD and I get depressed. That is why I do not want to look at the OECD.

In February, 1983 Statistics Canada said the value of goods and services declined .2 per cent. On January 31 Statistics Canada said softness of investment plans in Canada contrast with strong gains in the U.S. What is there is this Budget that will make investment plans stronger rather than softer? There is nothing. There is not anything in this Budget that will attract anyone to invest here in Canada. Our industrial capacity which is utilized at the present time I believe is 70 per cent. It is Statistics Canada itself that is giving the lie to what the Minister says, that softness of investment plans in Canada contrast with strong gains in the U.S.

• (1140)

How scrupulous is the Government to assist Canadian consumers and taxpayers? I mentioned the Canadian ownership charge yesterday. The Government has taken that, without the consent or authority of the House, and instead of leaving these funds in a special fund, has put it in general revenue to reduce its deficit. Yet the deficit still becomes $31.5 billion.

What was it the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said on November 22, 1983? I could not find the quote from the Toronto Star last night but he said: "The tax stays but we are still studying what to do with the money". How is that for arrogance? The Government now taxes the Canadian people before it even knows what it wants to do with the money. If that is not the epitome of arrogance. "The tax stays", says the Minister while beating his chest—because he is like a gorilla running across the country—"because I say the tax stays, and to heck with the Canadian consumer. We are still studying what to do with the money". Now we know what he is doing with the money. He is using it just to try to keep the deficit down to $31.5 billion.

While we are looking at the truthfulness of the Government, what did the Deputy Prime Minister say about the Canadian ownership charge when it was imposed on October 28, 1980? At page 11 of that speech he promised the Canadian people that:

> Revenue for the Account will be provided by a Canadian ownership charge imposed on all oil and gas consumption in Canada which will come into operation as the acquisition program progresses and will be set at a level to ensure that the program will be totally self-financing, and in no way affect the government's deficit.

That was the solemn promise made on October 28, 1980, when the Canadian public were taxed one cent per litre on heating oil, gasoline and every product made from a barrel of oil. It is 4.5 cents a gallon; $840 million this year; $960 billion next year and $1 billion that it will take the year after. We were told that the program would be self-financing and in no way affect the Government's deficit. What does the Government do four years later? It reduces the deficit by $800 million or $420 million for this year, I believe, because it has taken $500 million to use for Dome—if Dome ever needs the $500 million, because Dome has taken the Government for far more than $500 million. Now it is used to affect the Government's deficit. Can one believe a word that such a motley crew as this enunciates? Of course one cannot. One hates to have to say it.

Just in passing, as a person who comes from the Atlantic provinces, what a disgraceful belabouring they have been given in the Atlantic provinces in the last three or four years. The Government has dismantled DREE. It did away with DREE in January, 1981 and we will now have what the Government calls ERDAs. It did away with DREE, replaced it with DRIE and we will now have ERDAs, Economic Regional Development Agreements.

The money spent in Newfoundland by DREE has decreased by something like 70 per cent of 80 per cent in the last several years. I understand that the Government will spent $2 billion in ERDAs of which $1.2 billion goes to Quebec and $30 million, for example, to Alberta. That is called equity by the Government; $1.2 billion in Quebec and $30 million in Alberta. I do not know if it will spend anything in Newfoundland.

That is what has happened to the great program to overcome regional disparity. Do Members recall the Prime Minister in 1968 when he was on the diving boards of the country? His great theme was that he was going to overcome regional disparity. This is what has happened to his attempt to overcome regional disparity.

The present Minister of Finance said on September 15: "The top economic priority is the creation of jobs to ease our serious unemployment". Where does that appear in this Budget? What happened to that priority of September 15? On January 23, when he spoke to the Canadian Club in Toronto—memories are so short—he said:

Budgetary policies in 1984 must also respect the need for stability in the economic and fiscal environment. That means holding firm to the fiscal policy track—

He has his fiscal policy track suit on.

—on which the deficit will be restrained and then reduced as the recovery strengthens.

That is what he said to the Canadian Club on January 23 of this year. What has happened to that proposal? What is the point of the Minister making speeches if he will not carry out what he says in those speeches?

The Government said in the 1983 Throne Speech:

A comprehensive program will be presented to encourage economic growth so that more Canadians can own a home, learn a trade, expand a business, participate in the ownership of our resources, and gain a fair share of the abundant benefits this country can provide.

Where is the comprehensive program? This is the Government's Budget for 1984 and there is no such program. I mentioned yesterday that the Minister of Finance's dominant concern last April was to help 1.5 million Canadians who want to work but cannot find jobs. He has done nothing for them. In the Budget of last April the Minister said:

I expect strong growth to continue through 1984 at an average rate of 5.2 per cent. It will also become more broadly based as investment gathers strength.

Neither of those expectations has been fulfilled. The recovery is not broadly based.

I mentioned what Statistics Canada has reported. It said:

The narrowing of sources of growth in domestic demand is also reflected in the regional distribution of economic activity... In fact, Central Canada has accounted for all of the increase in employment since June as net declines have since been registered in Western Canada, notably Alberta and British Columbia.

Where is the broad-based growth that the Minister said would occur just 10 months ago? How does the Budget address the fact that the broad-based recovery promised in April has not occurred? Where can we point to in the Budget to show how the broad-based recovery is going to be achieved?

The special recovery tax imposed last April will cost Canadians $805 million this financial year. It will cost $2.4 billion in 1985-86 and $2.975 billion in 1986-87. The Minister calls it the special recovery tax. He should rename it the special recession tax. There is no recovery. This tax is not going to help it, this special recession tax. Again, Statistics Canada said on January 31:

The economic recovery appeared to lose some of its vitality in the fourth quarter, and it is likely that this slow-down will continue early in 1984. The moderation of growth has been most evident in domestic demand.

Where does the Minister help domestic demand in this Budget? He does not help it at all because he increases taxes and takes four times the revenue he has given back in the various matters he mentioned yesterday. He might help demand if he did away with the Canadian ownership tax. He would help consumer demand if he did away with the 1 per cent increase in the federal sales tax that is coming in October. It is a regressive tax that bears more heavily on lower income people.

The Minister brings in pension changes that favour the wealthy, increasing the RRSP limit as he has. Where in this Budget does he help to increase domestic demand? If anyone on the other side can point to where he does that, then we will pleased to listen.

The increase in sales tax in October will cost Canadians $365 million. That is for this financial year. Of course, it will be a much greater amount next year when it has been in effect for a full year.

• (1150)

What is the main problem or obstacle to continued economic recovery? We can look to the Conference Board or other economic specialists. I would like to quote the Conference Board where it said: "Interest rates, given the rate of inflation, remain high and thus are unable to provide the usual stimulus to economic activity as would be the case in normal cyclical recoveries". What has this Budget done to address that question? Nothing. The Budget papers indicate in two places that the Government expects interest rates to decline, but the Government refuses to tell us what interest rate projections they are using in calculating debt repayment costs for the next five years.

The current Bank of Canada rate is 10 per cent. It is higher than it was last April. Is that a sign that interest rates will go down? The prime rate of the Bank is 11 per cent. Inflation has dropped significantly during that period, but it has not affected interest rates. Why not? It is because no one with money to invest trusts this Government. They know the Government is incapable of operating the economic affairs of the country. They know that if this Government continues in power, we will have renewed inflation and economic disaster. That is why they will not lower their interest rates now. As I said last night, the Budget has done nothing to bring about lower interest rates, to increase consumer demand or business investment, which are the three essentials if we are to have a real economic recovery.

It is a sorry story. By the way, when Liberal Members have a chance to speak in this debate, I hope they will not be tiresome and keep referring to some alleged article in The Globe and Mail of Toronto by "yours truly", unless they are going to look at it more accurately. I was honest enough to say that the Budget of last April contained a proper general approach. That was the right kind of general approach compared with the disasters of his predecessors. The general approach was right, but that general approach has disappeared, and now the Minister has joined his predecessor in the march to inexorable disaster. This Budget guarantees Canadians a dubious and diminishing economic future. He has joined the march. He has arrested nothing, and he no longer moves in a direction that is satisfactory. He now has no chance of bringing economic recovery to Canada.

Of course, we will have other speakers in this debate who will be tackling different phases of the Budget—the question of pension reform, which is important; improvements in the assessment practices of the Department of National Revenue, which we forced the Government to commence and bring about. That is important as well. These things will all be discussed.

In this connection, I want to move the following amendment to the Budget:

> That all the words following the word "That" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:
> "this House regrets the failure of the Government to present measures designed to reduce Canada's budgetary deficit, lower existing high interest rates, reduce crippling high levels of unemployment or to create meaningful pension reform all of which are needed as a result of years of government economic mismanagement and condemns the Government for its continued misuse of public funds and arrogant maladministration which have led to a crisis in public trust and confidence in government".

To top off this record I have given this morning, this résumé of economic mismanagement, wrong estimating, deceit of the public, complete lack of control or fidelity—as though that were not bad enough—there is not anyone in the country with an ounce of impartiality who does not look at Ottawa and see a government which is wallowing in the worst kind of stable politics. I mean "stable" in the sense of a stable in which one keeps animals. They see leading this country a group of people who are prepared to do anything to keep themselves in power. That destroys confidence. The only hope the country has is that before too long there will be an election and we will have an opportunity to give the people of Canada an alternative and to show what we can do with the economic administration of this country. That is the only hope. Even if this group brought into the House a set of perfect policies to fit our economic circumstances, they would be unsuccessful as they cannot work without confidence. And there is no confidence in this Government.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: If this Minister had the confidence which he pretends he now has, surely with four years expiring on February 18 of this week the Government would be going to the electorate. This has been the practice in every democratic country, that the government goes to the electorate in its fourth year. This Government has completed four years.

Mr. Fisher: You did it in four months.

Mr. Crosbie: Yes, and Canadian people suffered terribly because of it. Your term in Parliament will be a short-term one; you will not be back next time. I will miss you.

Mr. Fisher: Come out to my riding and campaign. We love you.

Mr. Crosbie: Mississauga will give you an awful mauling, brother, when the election comes.

Mr. Fisher: Come down and help them out. We love you.

Mr. Crosbie: Only this Government would go over four years in these circumstances and try to hang on after the four-year term. If the Minister thinks that the Canadian people are supportive of what they have done for the last four years—for the last 14—why does he not advise the Prime Minister to settle down here? Is the Prime Minister prepared to spend six weeks in Canada on an election campaign? He could not bear not to be out of the country somewhere during those six weeks. He should try to persuade him to stay here during those six weeks and have an election campaign. Let us put it to the test.

Mr. Lalonde: Where were you in January?

Mr. Fisher: Yes, where were you?

Mr. Crosbie: I paid for my own trip.

Mr. Lalonde: You are paid to be in the House.

Mr. Harquail: When did you get home?

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, in January I was in the Yemen and, believe me, the level or intelligence there is far higher than it is in the government ranks.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: While there I saw someone who reminded me of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Harquail: That is the most intelligent remark you could make.

Mr. Crosbie: We ran into a group of quagga, wild jackasses, such as the one yelling down in the corner.

We ask Government Members who will now pretend to be so proud of this Budget document, indeed, we plead with them, to dissolve the House and go to an election. Let us put this to the test. Let us see what Canadians think. Let us see what the 1.4 million unemployed think. Let us see what they think in Newfoundland which did not have a Cabinet Minister for six months. Its Cabinet Minister was thrown out of Cabinet, humiliated, and then reconstituted and recycled six months later because the person they attempted to appoint in the meantime had a little bother with the tax authorities. Let us see what they think of them down in Newfoundland. Let us see what they think of them in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. Let us see what they think of them in Quebec. The unemployment rate in Quebec has gone down while they are hiring people to scout around to see what they can find on the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mulroney). The only place where they are making a dent in the unemployment rolls is down there—people being hired by the Prime Minister's Office. Let us see what they think of them in Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia. That is what we want. We do not want another year of watching this Government in extremis, crucifying the Canadian people as it attempts to cling to power. I invite Hon. Members opposite, some of them, to allow their pangs of conscience to vote with us so that we can terminate this scurvy lot today or when the vote comes next Tuesday, so we can terminate the Government and put this to the test. Give the Canadian people a break. You have had four years; give them a break. Give them a chance to say whether they regret what they did on February 18, 1980. I am confident what the answer will be.

• (1200)

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harquail: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Under the democratic process, all Hon. Members have a right to raise a point. Since you were not able to discern the question of some of the terminology, the verbiage and the squalor of the previous speaker, and you did not comment on that, I would point out that Erskine May in the British House talks about lunacy. If that is the attitude, perhaps we should consider in this House what Erskine May has brought through the United Kingdom in the British Parliament. It might be an aspect that we could consider for this House when remarks border on lunacy.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): If the Hon. Member is making a suggestion that there were some remarks that were not in conformity with our normal practices, I would like him to identify them. I did not personally hear them. I will refer to the blues. If he has anything he wants to refer to, he might let me know precisely what it was.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to rise today to respond on behalf of the New Democratic Party to the Budget introduced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) yesterday and try to find some way to visualize what kind of a Budget it was. Over the last number of hours we have had responses as different groups indicated their reaction to the Budget.

I want you to imagine for a moment the Minister of Finance in a worn, torn, old suit to which he has sewn brightly coloured and brightly covered sequins. When he walked into the House of Commons yesterday to deliver his speech, the floodlights gave a glimmering appearance to this man on stage. Actually he looked kind of good with his glimmering sequins on his suit. A few hours later, taking advantage of the sunshine of the next day, the real worn and torn fabric of that suit comes through.

So be it with this particular Budget. Last night when people heard the Budget, there were feelings that there were some good aspects to the Budget, that there was something for everyone. When you analyze carefully item by item what was in the Budget, you find that indeed there were some things in that Budget that will make people very happy, particularly a very select and special, elite group in Canadian society.

One document which the Minister of Finance gave out as part of his Budget is entitled: "The Canadian Economy in Recovery". I suspect that most Canadians over the last number of months have not noticed that there has been a recovery in Canada. Most people in my constituency are not aware that there is a recovery under way. They read about it in the newspapers and they hear it from the Minister of Finance. They hear various corporate leaders talking about recovery signs, that things are looking good, that the recovery is under way, perhaps not as much as anticipated by the Government, but very clearly that there is a recovery in place. The average man and woman in this country has not had a recovery in terms of their own lives. I think it is fair to ask, a recovery for whom? Has it been a fair recovery for all Canadians? It has not.

Who were the winners in this Budget? One of the best ways to determine that is to listen a few hours later, after people have had a chance to analyze the Budget, after the smoke has been blown away from all of the hoopla surrounding the Budget. You notice who is cheering today. You notice who the people are who perhaps celebrated last night with champagne because they really appreciated what this Government has done for them.

Unquestionably those in the boardrooms today are happy because more loopholes have been opened by that wonderful tax loophole man, the Minister of Finance. Again the corporate sector has a number of tax grants and concessions coming its way. There is another group of Canadians, the wealthy elite of Canada, who have had a number of loopholes opened for them as well. Whereas a few days ago we had 200 identifiable tax loopholes, we now have a few more added to make the tax system more unfair and, consequently, the recovery more unfair.

Do we hear any cheers this morning from the 1.5 million Canadians out of work? You notice absolute silence in the country coming from the unemployed because in this Budget there is not a single item that will assist those 1.5 million Canadians who are unemployed today to find meaningful work in the months ahead. Do we hear cheers and accolades coming from the poor of Canada? Do we hear cheers coming from the women of Canada? Do we hear cheers coming from the single women of this country, those involved in the fishery or the forest workers of Canada?

If you listen carefully, do you hear cheers coming from the small business sector? For a handful, yes, but the majority of small businesses in this country are not cheering this morning. After hearing the rhetoric of the Minister of Finance and having done their analysis of what is in the Budget for them, they find there is nothing to cheer about.

Aside from the corporate boardrooms today and aside from the cheering upper income earners, the lawyers, doctors, dentists, veterinarians and chiropractors, who are now able to pay income tax at a lower level than they did the night before, who is cheering? As if there were not already enough loopholes in the tax system to cater to the privileged few in society, the Minister of Finance has opened up a new set of loopholes. Where they paid 33⅓ per cent income tax, they now pay 25 per cent. In other words, the Minister of Finance has put thousands and thousands of dollars into the hands of the upper income people, the doctors and lawyers who are involved in incorporating their businesses and are involved in business ventures.

The question must be asked: Who is going to pay for all of these loopholes that have been provided? Who is going to make up the difference? Somebody has to pay the taxes in this country. Somebody has to pay for all the loopholes for the corporations that have been added and for the additional loopholes for the upper income earners of Canada. Did the Minister of Finance do what people across this country have asked him to do, namely rescind the tax increases that he brought in last April that touched every Canadian family? He did not. Therefore, $200 or $300 will be taken from the pockets of every Canadian family to pay for the additional loopholes provided in the Budget last night.

The Minister of Finance says that we helped young people in this country. The young people should be cheering, but do you hear the young people of this country, particularly those who are out of work, cheering today? When you look carefully at this $150 million that the Minister of Finance has provided for youth unemployment, you see it is the same amount as the little Liberal slush fund that we have been talking about for the last few days. When you analyse that and break it down, how much of the unemployed youth are going to be assisted?

• (1210)

Visualize the unemployed youth of Canada, Mr. Speaker, and apply this particular amount of money. It will provide a 12-month job for only 1.5 per cent of all those unemployed today. It is 1.5 per cent for a single year. What about the hundreds and thousands of young people in the next few weeks and months who will be coming on to the job market seeking employment, those coming out of our universities, colleges, technical, trade and secondary schools? That is the assistance this Government has provided for our unemployed youth. It is a pittance. I do not understand how the Minister of Finance has the courage to stand in his place and say as part of his Budget Speech that he and his Government are going to help the young people with this miserly, this miserable, this minute amount of money.

Mr. Lalonde: It is $1.3 billion.

Mr. Riis: Then the Minister of Finance said: "We are going to help the senior citizens of Canada; we are going to increase the contribution to the guaranteed income supplement". A few months ago the Minister of Finance assembled a task force to talk to people across the country to try to understand the needs of senior citizens and to make recommendations to the Government. The task force did that. It said the beginning step this Government should take was to increase the GIS immediately by $100 a month. Did the Minister do that? No, he did not do that. He provided half of that.

Let us break it down. The senior citizens of Canada on GIS will receive an increase on July 1 this year of 75 cents a day. My parents are senior citizens. I phoned them and said: "Great news, Mom and Dad; you are going to get 75 cents a day starting July 1 from the Minister of Finance". They were not particularly pleased. This means that still today as a result of this so-called improvement for the senior citizens of Canada, hundreds and thousands of them will still be living below the poverty line, the poverty line as described by the Government of Canada. Hundreds and thousands of our senior citizens will be in this situation. Is there anything in this Budget for the war vets, those who fought in Dieppe? No. there is not a thing. Is there any increase for our war vets, people we know who are struggling to survive? No, there is nothing.

Mr. Evans: They get the GIS.

Mr. Riis: There are hundreds and thousands of senior citizens living below the poverty line and the Minister of Finance and the Government says it is going to make a significant contribution to pensions. Then, of course, comes the RRSPs. This will be the real saviour for people's pension systems. When you look closely, Mr. Speaker, many Canadians can take advantage of the RRSPs. They can put in $1,000 or $2,000, and many people do. But the Minister of Finance did not assist so much the average Canadian taxpayer. He said: "We are going to lift the ceiling to $15,500 a year". If you have an extra $10,000 or $15,000 in loose cash at the end of the year, you can invest that in a pension plan. Those who will benefit to the maximum from this allowance are those people whose incomes are nearly $90,000 a year. Those are the ones who will be able to take advantage of the maximum benefit, those with nearly $90,000 a year.

I do not think there is any question of the hypocrisy of this Government. It brings in this Budget and, as my Hon. Leader suggests, it gives those people an $8,000 tax benefit. But the Government said it has changed its mind now and it is going to send out a signal to labour across the country. The Government is now going to ask labour to join in a co-operative venture in terms of getting the economy back on track. The Government said it has just given tax breaks to its friends in the corporate sector and tax breaks to upper income Canadians; but it is now going to ask labour to join in the recovery program. As a first gesture, the Government said it is going to restore free collective bargaining to the public sector. That is like putting a gun to somebody's head and saying: "Now we are going to start free collective bargaining". It is a Russian roulette approach to this whole business.

The Government said it is going to bargain collectively with labour, but it also said: "If you do not agree with us, if you do not do exactly what we say, we are going to legislate a settlement". Is that free collective bargaining? Is that the kind of gesture that will encourage labour across Canada to be willing to co-operate fully? Is that the kind of signal that the Government wants to send out to labour, putting a gun to their head in so-called free collective bargaining? This budget fails to provide any real hope for middle and low-income Canadians in the months ahead, those Canadians who have not been part of the so-called recovery program to date.

I have to refer for a moment or two to my Progressive Conservative friends. They have gone on at some length about the deficit. They argue whether the deficit should be $27 billion, $29 billion, $31.5 billion and so on. That is their concern. They say they are very concerned about that. But the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Mulroney) stood in his place the other day and said: "We need to increase defence spending by $300 million". Then the fishery critic said in Vancouver: "We have to help the fishing sector and add another $300 million." In agriculture the Tories say the same thing. The Hon. Member who is the critic for employment suggests that we spend more on job creation. The small business critic says we have to spend more on tax concessions to small business. The industry critic stands up daily in this House and says: "We have to provide more and more tax concessions to the corporate sector to encourage it to invest".

You cannot have it both ways, Mr. Speaker. You cannot have individual Members standing up day after day saying spend millions of more dollars here, hundreds of millions of dollars there and billions more in tax concessions, and then say that we have to reduce the deficit. If they were being honest and truthful to the people and were going to assist those sectors as they say they will, and if they are going to reduce the deficit, do you know, Mr. Speaker, who will suffer as a result of that? Do you know who will have their pensions cut? Do you know who will reduce unemployment insurance and reduce assistance to single parents? The Progressive Conservatives.

Mr. Taylor: Baloney!

Mr. Riis: You cannot have it both ways. You cannot have a reduced deficit and increased spending in virtually every sector. They have to come clean. That is why the Government is being told these days by Progressive Conservatives that they are not going to tell them what they are going to do.

I have to give credit to the Hon. Member who was the previous Minister of Finance in the Conservative Government, the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie). I have to give him credit for being honest with the people of Canada. He stood up and said: "We cannot tell you what we are going to do. We are unable to tell you what our policies are, because if we did, the people of Canada would never vote for us". He is an honest man; he is an honest John.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Riis: I am pleased to share a spot on this side of the aisle with such an honest, straightforward Conservative.

Mr. Crosbie: You were there in 1979. Why did you vote against us?

Mr. Riis: I want to pause here in my comments to supplement the amendment provided by the Hon. Member for St. John's West. I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans):

That the amendment be amended by changing the period at the end of the last sentence to a comma, and by adding immediately thereafter the following words:

"and this House condemns the government for continuing the Liberal-Conservative policies that have produced record mumbers of unemployed, widespread poverty among our elderly, and burdensome taxation for middle and low income Canadians; and this House further condemns the government for failing to introduce in this budget a fair recovery programme that would end unproductive tax concessions to corporations, rescind the $1.4 billion in consumer tax increases announced in the last budget, provide for mechanisms to deal fairly with job displacement resulting from technological change, and increase productive investments in those sectors of the economy which will be the backbone of any future economic prosperity".

Having made the comments I did about my friends in the Conservative Party that they are not prepared to be honest with the people of Canada in terms of their policies, and while we in the New Democratic Party have criticized the Government and the Minister of Finance for not taking the action we felt was required at this time to ensure a fair recovery and have criticized the Conservatives for being vague, I feel obligated to put on the record some of the recommendations we would have put in this Budget. We hope that the Government will consider them in its next budget which it will bring in before another election.

● (1220)

The first thing we would do would be to rescind the increased taxes to consumers. On many occasions we have heard that we need to have a consumer-led recovery; that it is important for Canadians to be able to purchase the homes they need, the appliances they need and the vehicles they require in order to provide stimulus to the manufacturing sector that will enable plants to operate at more than the present 60 per cent or 70 per cent capacity. To that end people must have disposable income to afford these kinds of necessities.

The thing that must not be done, as was done by the Conservative Government during the depression, is to increase taxes. Yet the Minister of Finance is quite prepared to say that taxes on every Canadian household will be increased between $200 and $300 this year, as if that will assist in the recovery program. The first thing this Party would do would be to rescind this tax increase.

In an effort to deal with the deficit, we would then reform the personal income tax system so that everyone would pay their fair share. On many occasions we have pointed out that thousands and thousands of Canadians with incomes of $50,000 per year or $100,000 per year or $500,000 per year do not pay any income tax at all. Then who pays? The 16 million average Canadians who file tax returns each year whose tax is deducted at source pay. They pick up the shortfall and pay more than their fair share. The personal income tax system should be changed so that everyone pays a fair share of the tax burden.

The corporate tax system must also be revamped. In the past year many corporations have made hundreds of millions of dollars in profits. We have nothing against that; we like to see a healthy economy. But if a company is going to make hundreds of millions of dollars in profit, as the Bank of Montreal did last year, then we expect it to pay its fair share of income tax and not, as some firms have been able to do through tax loopholes, avoid paying a single red cent in income tax.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Order, please. I have to interrupt the Hon. Member because his time has expired. Of course, he could continue his remarks with the unanimous consent of the House. It is agreed?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, we would be delighted to agree. I know the Hon. Member is getting into the positive part of his speech and we would like to hear that. I would simply remind him that we have a speaker on this side who would like to talk before lunchtime.

Mr. Riis: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I want to thank my colleagues in the Progressive Conservative Party and the Liberal Party for their positive gesture. I will keep my remarks brief and finish my speech in the next few minutes.

As my Leader has suggested on many occasions, Mr. Speaker, one of the ways to deal with the deficit would be to reconsider some of the $10 billion presently handed out in tax concessions and grants to the corporate sector. I do not think it is unfair to say to the corporate sector that if it expects the taxpayers of Canada to assist it in certain ways through tax concessions or grants, some accountability is required. We are entitled to expect some kind of performance either through research and development initiatives, job creation, job training, or the purchase of new plant and equipment from Canadian suppliers. In other words, tax concessions should be tied to a meaningful contribution to the economy. I cannot imagine that anyone would seriously argue against that. I believe the corporate sector would welcome that initiative.

Mr. Broadbent: Instead of a free lunch.

Mr. Riis: We could do away with the free lunches. We are against the concept of simply giving out grants and expecting nothing in return.

Something that has been overlooked in the Budget and has not been commented upon as yet by the Official Opposition is interest rates. In this Party we feel that we cannot have real, sustained economic recovery with interest rates at their present level and with the potential for volatility that we have seen in the last months and years. It is now appropriate for the Minister of Finance, through the Bank of Canada, to take active, positive steps to reduce the interest rates and maintain them at lower levels. The spread between the inflation rate and the interest rate in this country is greater today than ever before in our history. It is time the difference was reduced and interest rates brought down so that people can afford mortgages and expand their small businesses, their farms, ranches and various economic endeavours. This is the kind of major and bold step that members of the New Democratic Party feel is absolutely necessary for a sustained recovery.

We would also like to expand the job development potential in key sectors of the economy by investing in the infrastructure of those sectors. In simpler terms, the forest industry, for example, is important all across the country. In five out of ten provinces it is a major industry and it is a significant industry in every province, yet it is in dire straits. It is suffering from lack of private and public investment. Is there a better time to invest public sector money in the development of reforestation or the development of salmonid enhancement programs of salmon habitat protection? We do not call this government spending but, rather, serious investment in the economy of Canada.

That is what is required and it must be done next year or within two or three years. We say now is the time to do it because such investment would put hundreds of thousands of Canadians to work immediately in jobs that would bring about a sustained recovery and economic development. In turn, this would generate an increase in tax revenues through corporate and personal income tax for federal coffers. That is the kind of investment we would like to see.

We would like the Government to do some planning. It should sit down with the private sector, with labour and with regional governments to plan what we want to accomplish in the next ten years. It should set out a strategy for the economy and regional strategies that everyone can support and identify with. In that way we could get on with developing the economy. This reeling and wheeling from crisis to crisis, this stumbling about, this ad hockery in terms of economic development, is not good enough. The Budget that was introduced a few hours ago is just one more step in the same direction. There is a lack of vision, a lack of concept or vision about what the country could and should be doing.

This Party feels that the Budget demonstrates that most Canadians have not been heard, Mr. Speaker. Their concerns must be taken into account in these difficult times, their plight must be unveiled and their interest must be represented in the House of Commons.

Today and in subsequent days during this debate the New Democratic Party will represent those voices. The people of Canada have been left out of this document.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1230)

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre Deniger (La Prairie): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I rise on the first day of the debate on the Budget for the 1984-1985 fiscal year. It is a pleasure, Mr. Speaker, because this fiscal year marks the beginning of a period of consolidating what the Government's economic policy has achieved.

Last year, real growth in this country reached 3 per cent, and 400,000 jobs were created. Inflation, that nightmare of developed economies, has at last been wrested to the floor, something not even my colleagues opposite can deny. These results were certainly not a coincidence, although some people are very reluctant to admit this. In fact, the results I just mentioned clearly illustrate the beneficial effects of last year's Budget on this country's economic state of health.

Mr. Speaker, the present Budget has renewed my faith in this Parliamentary institution, since most Members will have heard from their constituents about problems they were experiencing, due to situations which have now been corrected in yesterday's Budget.

Today, I would like to share with my colleagues a number of those achievements which prove that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) has a quality, rare even among ministers, which is to act as well as listen.

I was listening earlier to the former Minister of Finance in the Progressive Conservative Government when he was talking about interest rates. He discussed the matter last night on the news and again this morning on Canada AM, and I would like to remind him of what he said on November 15, 1979, about interest rates, and I quote:

> We do not have high interest rates because this government wants high interest rates. That is not our policy. As politicians we do not want high interest rates. The people do not want high interest rates. Nobody wants high interest rates, so it is not a policy of the government to have high interest rates, it is a condition that the government cannot do anything about at the moment. It is not through choice.

Mr. Speaker, imagine the then Minister of Finance admitting that he was powerless to act! We, however, have taken steps to reduce inflation and bring down interest rates, which dropped more than 50 per cent over the last two years, and I think the Minister of Finance has something to be proud of here.

Mr. Speaker, the Budget the House is being asked to consider today is the end-result of a successful undertaking started ten months ago. The results, as I said, are there. The next step is to consolidate those results and to ensure continuity. However, according to our great Liberal tradition, we cannot stop here. We also must consider those who for a time were unable to benefit from this growth and those who had borne the brunt of the recession. That is why this Budget also tries to consider the normal aspirations of the average citizen, of the man and woman on the street. First of all, the Budget is continuing our efforts to restore the economy's momentum. A striking example among many others, Mr. Speaker, is the decision to defer the Incremental Oil Revenue Tax. Though this would be a source of considerable income for the Government, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) did not hesitate to relinquish that income, for the benefit of the private sector. The message is clear: The Government will never set its own interests above those of the corporations that generate this country's wealth.

To stimulate the economy, we must also stimulate those who participate in that economy. That is the key to success, as far as productivity is concerned. In 1984, investment must no longer be restricted to equipment. It must also cover human resources. That is why the Government intends to help businesses make their employees aware of the realities of economics, by encouraging them to let their employees share in the profits generated by the activity of their economic unit. The subsequent increased co-operation between labour and management will surely enhance the quality and competitive position of Canadian products abroad.

Mr. Speaker, this is not a new concept. In fact, the Minister of State (Youth) (Mrs. Hervieux-Payette) previously tabled in this House a Private Member's Bill which referred to this positive attitude that would help increase productivity and wealth of both employers and employees. Furthermore, we must be efficient to maintain our position on international markets, and in this connection, the decision to create an international Aid-Trade Fund is more than welcome. In fact, this measure will not only help our companies to meet international commitments that are part of our country's policy, but it will also open new markets to competitive businesses. Mr. Speaker, most of us have spoken to businessmen who want to get a start on the international market. The Aid-Trade Fund will help our companies generate profits and generate employment, and in so doing, it will help boost the economic recovery that is now well underway, Mr. Speaker.

These are all important, necessary and even crucial measures, but it is not so easy to visualize how they could improve the lives of ordinary people.

I feel this Budget is dedicated to those nameless thousands who work hard to make this country what it is, a place where it is good to be. Above all else, the Budget has made job creation one of its top priorities. The previous Budget had already set aside nearly $3 billion for employment assistance. The present Budget has increased funding by more than 15 per cent, a total of over $3.5 billion. Youth will not be forgotten, Mr. Speaker. In addition to the $1 billion in the last Budget, there will be an additional $150 million in new funding that will be immediately available to help young Canadians in their future aspirations.

Another facet of the Government's present concern is its desire to resolve the problems of average Canadians in connection with tax measures affecting small and medium-sized businesses. These businesses are a major source of immediate job creation in this country, and clearly this is the first sector where we should start simplifying the tax system and stimulating the economy. From now on, the so-called cumulative deduction account will be eliminated, which will considerably reduce the number of hours spent by small businessmen on paperwork and recordkeeping. Administrative problems will be reduced even more as a result of eliminating the distinction between active business income and non-qualifying business income. In all, small businessmen will have to cope with only one-third of the tax laws, compared to the previous situation, and they will now be able to spend their time on less frustrating and more productive activities.

Mr. Speaker, this is a direct response to the representations I received from the Société pour le progrès de la Rive-Sud, of the South Shore Chamber of Commerce, which had been complaining about paperwork, administrative red tape and endless tax forms. Once again, we are responding to these very genuine complaints in this Budget.

But when it comes to the average Canadian, Mr. Speaker, the budget contains quite a number of social measures whose common objective is to ensure greater financial security for people with fixed incomes. This assistance is intended primarily for those who have laid the foundations of Canada as we know it today. Naturally, I am talking about our elders, people of the golden age. The financial assistance for senior citizens as advocated in this budget will take various forms. First of all, it was imperative that a very special effort be made to help the most underprivileged among the elderly. In Quebec alone, for instance, more than 230,000 people will benefit from an increase in the guaranteed income supplement—$25 more a month beginning July 1 and another $25 beginning December 1. In the riding of La Prairie alone—I am talking about my riding—3,300 residents stand to gain immediately from this very popular measure which, I repeat, is the answer to the legitimate claims of the people of my riding.

An Hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deniger: Those are concrete measures which members of golden age associations in my riding will appreciate indeed, for they will give them peace of mind and the opportunity to pamper themselves now and then, something which they could not even think of until now. We also had to consider a major overhaul of every aspect of the Canada Pension Plan to make it more equitable and guarantee a more promising future for people who will retire in coming years.

Let me deal with another aspect of the proposed pension reform. To come to grips with the serious predicament of older women who live alone, the Government intends to split the pension credits in case of marriage breakdown and to maintain survivor benefits should the recipient remarry. In addition, should death strike, the surviving spouse will be entitled to at least 60 per cent of benefits paid to the deceased. I say again, Mr. Speaker, that the budget meets the real needs of people who have made representations to us as Members of Parliament. The Minister listened to them and took action. A number of measures were needed so people would prepare for retirement, including fair and equitable access to some form of tax relief. Under the new RRSP proposal, Canadians who are self-employed or whose employer does not offer that plan will be entitled to the same fiscal assistance as more privileged Canadians. Thanks to this new proposal, tax deductions will be not only more equitable, but also more generous for all concerned. Who among us, Members of Parliament, have not heard these words from people of 45 or 55: "I find myself with nothing, I have no pension plan, what shall I do?"

• (1240)

Once again, Mr. Speaker, this Budget fulfills a real need among Canadians. What a relief it will be for taxpayers in the future upon filing their income tax returns at the end of April! No more headaches, because the rules of the game will now be simpler. They will also be fairer to those who receive new tax assessments.

All of us in the House are aware of the publicity made about tax audits these last few weeks. Once more, the demands of Opposition Members as well as Government supporters have been met by proposals contained in the Budget brought down by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde). The period for filing objections to tax assessments is being extended from 90 to 180 days after receipt of the assessment. Instead of having to pay the full amount, taxpayers will be able to provide adequate security, which will greatly simplify the administration of the Income Tax Act and satisfy, as I said, very actual and genuine needs of our constituents.

Again with respect to the proposed changes to the tax system, senior citizens needed a simplification of the system. The provisions concerning quarterly tax payments will prevent senior citizens from being penalized for not having assessed their income to the nearest cent.

Mr. Speaker, how many of us here have yet to receive requests dealing with this provision? We have made regular representations about this both in this House and in the caucus. The Minister has listened to us and he has done something.

To summarize, Mr. Speaker, this is the Budget that the people of the constituency of La Prairie expected, the budget that Canadians expected; in other words it is a Budget which tells every ordinary Canadian that the Government holds their concerns and their interests at heart. It is a Budget which strengthens economic recovery, an audacious Budget which does not hesitate to innovate in the social fields in order to provide Canadians with the material safeguards which they need and of which the Members of the Progressive Conservative Party rhetorically claim to be the defenders, even though they have never defended them in actual practice.

Mr. Speaker, it is not enough to speak about tenderness, to use the favorite expression of the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Mulroney). We need action. The best thing in this Budget is that the increase in social expenditures will in no way prevent a decrease in the deficit. This is a Government whose fiscal responsibility will never be questioned, but it is also a Government which will never cause the Canadian people to get into debt to prevent the state from doing so. As for the deficit, let us talk about it, Mr. Speaker. The size of the deficit has been criticized at length. But how can we maintain what has been gained? How can we help those who have been most severely affected by the recession, while injecting funds to create jobs and stimulate the economy, without increasing expenditures? In the worst of the recession, we could not reduce the deficit because that would have aggravated the impact of the recession. And if we cut government expenditures tomorrow, if we increase taxes to a considerable extent, what would that do? It would paralyze our present economy, which is starting to gain momentum and is in the midst of its recovery. And what do our Progressive Conservative friends opposite say? They want to reduce the deficit for a certain group, but they also want a bigger defence budget; they are talking about additional transfer payments to the provinces and they also want more tax relief for business. The Member representing the New Democratic Party pointed out earlier a number of similar contradictions in what the Opposition Members were saying, for instance when they told people in the forest industry that the Budget had to do more for forestry, the people in the fisheries industry that it had to do more for fisheries and people on welfare that benefits had to be increased, and yet they want to reduce the deficit! Mr. Speaker, perhaps this debate on the Budget will at last give Opposition Members a chance to tell the House exactly what they intend to do. The Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) failed to do so earlier, Mr. Speaker. He put on a show and it was a very good one. He is the best showman we ever had in the House. He is good for a laugh a minute! But that is not what government is about. Mr. Speaker, to govern means to decide to help the poor and the needy, those who come to see us, both Opposition Members and Government Members, to talk about real problems. That is what the Budget is about, Mr. Speaker. It is a recovery Budget, a Budget with momentum, that will reassure the Canadian people.

My constituents in the riding of La Prairie are mostly homeowners. Many of them came to see me, and many other Canadians went to see their Members, to complain about mortgages they were unable to pay off in advance because of the penalty involved. I am referring to mortgages they had to put up with for five years because they had renewed them for five years, at very high rates.

Mr. Speaker, these complaints were brought to the attention of the Minister of Finance. He looked into the matter and he took action. I think the real estate sector which provides employment for many Canadians will respond in a positive way to the Government's generosity, which will make mortgage holders heave a sigh of relief and also enable many young people who are looking for a house to purchase their first home.

Mr. Speaker, there is a great deal to say about this Budget. I realize my time has expired. However, I just want to tell the people in the riding of La Prairie who often bother to complete the surveys I send them, that today, they have authentic proof that their complaints and requests and desires have not fallen on deaf ears. The Minister of Finance has brought down a Budget that is humane, a Budget for the average person, for the man in the street, for ordinary people, for the people who elect us as Members of Parliament, both Opposition Members and Government Members.

Mr. Speaker, I have the following message for my colleagues in the Opposition who will be voting on the Budget in a few days. Are you going to vote for the future and endorse this Budget or are you finally going to admit that generosity is confined to one Party and that Party is certainly not the Progressive Conservative Party?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Ten-minute period allowed for questions, answers and comments.

[English]

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, if the Hon. Member wanted a few more minutes we would certainly have no objection. However, if he is finished, I would like to ask a question or two.

• (1250)

Mr. Speaker, I enjoyed the Hon. Member's address and particularly what he said about helping the people who need it the most. I agree with that philosophy. I realize there is a limit to which any Government may go. I am wondering why the Government has left the tremendous void in the present social services program. We have something for the aged, we are doing more for the single pensioners who are below the poverty line, and we have helped some spouses. There are still spouses whose husbands died before the change came who are presently getting nothing and must wait till they are 65. There is a tremendous void, particularly among women between the ages of 50 and 65. That can be broken down as 55 to 65 or 60 to 65. There is a large body of women who are getting absolutely nothing. Some of these women have spent their lives looking after an aged parent, crippled brother or others who needed help. They have saved the Government a tremendous amount of money because they were prepared to stay home. They have no Canada Pension. It is difficult for a woman to compete in the marketplace when she is 50 or 55. Many of them have brought a family into the world. Now their only resource is welfare. Personally I do not think it is any blight on a person to accept welfare, but many people feel that welfare is not really a pension. They feel they are getting something they do not deserve.

Does the Hon. Member feel there is a void here? I am wondering why the Government did not at least start to fill that void so that these women would be able to get something and live somewhat of a dignified life during their last years.

[Translation]

Mr. Deniger: Mr. Speaker, I have fully appreciated the remarks made by my hon. friend opposite. I must say I have enjoyed hearing him speak and ever since I have known him, it was the first time today that I heard him speak like a true Liberal, and not as a Conservative.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest that he is right when he says that the government must provide assistance to those who need it the most, and that is precisely what the government has done in this budget. It is all a matter of degree. A choice had to be made and we have made it. Obviously if money was no object, if we had no deficit and a healthy margin of operation, we would certainly have helped everybody. However, I want to remind my hon. friend that we are going to provide assistance to those who need it most; for instance, we are going to increase the Guaranteed Income Supplement for needy senior citizens, and to help older single women who are destitute. As for those between the ages of 55 and 65, they will have to wait until the next budget.

[English]

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the Hon. Member's presentation. I quite enjoyed what he had to say and found it to be a very thoughtful speech. He may consider my question to be unrelated. If he does, I would understand why he would not want to respond. He mentioned time and again the need for a strong and sustained recovery and outlined a number of initiatives he felt the Government had taken to encourage and ensure that that take place.

Can the Member explain why, at a time when recovery is so dearly sought by us all, the Government would consider 1984 to be a year when there would be a reasonably serious increase in taxation of consumers? I refer specifically to sales tax, gasoline extra charges and the increase in income tax rates which calculate out to about $200 to $300 on average for each Canadian family. Does the Hon. Member have some observation? Some of us have a difficult time understanding how increasing taxes at this time could do anything but hinder a recovery, generally speaking.

[Translation]

Mr. Deniger: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is clearly referring to tax measures which were included in the previous budget and not in this one, because this last budget does not provide for any immediate tax increase.

The Hon. Member is certainly aware that the Government is eager to encourage a strong and sustained recovery such as that we are witnessing now. A period of expansion will provide new revenues, which will make it possible for the Government to invest more in small and medium-size businesses and therefore create more jobs. Consumer spending will in turn increase, which will allow the Government to reduce the deficit, something Hon. Members opposite are anxious to see.

[English]

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I am anxious to get the Hon. Member's views on the housing industry in his riding, in Montreal and generally across Quebec. We have had some very good reactions from Ontario spokesmen. Mr. Henry Stolp of HUDAC has said:

These moves will create additional consumer confidence which is definitely needed before we can have a big improvement in sales.

Bill Dixon from the Canadian Real Estate Association has said that it should stimulate the sale of houses. The Hon. Member comes from a riding where there are a lot of new homes and a lot of people interested in home owner issues. Perhaps he would like to reflect generally on the way this mortgage assistance is going to help his riding.

[Translation]

Mr. Deniger: Mr. Speaker, I am particularly pleased with the measures on mortgages and the incentives to the housing industry.

It is obvious, Mr. Speaker, that in a riding like mine, somewhat like yours, there is a large number of houses built every year and there is enough space to build more. Some are built near Montreal where people go to work. Such measures will provide security to young homeowners who will now be assured that they will not lose their home because of a sudden rise in interest rates such as the one experienced at the end of the 1970s. Such measures will allow the construction of thousands of units in the constituency of La Prairie which has already entered a period of rapid growth. Such a budget, Mr. Speaker, will promote in my riding the creation of a large number of jobs and bring wealth and security to people who need it most.

[English]

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could have the agreement of Members of the House to call it one o'clock?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

MEDICAL CARE

SYSTEM OF FEES PAYABLE TO PHYSICIANS IN NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, public statements by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) concerning the new Canada Health Act have caused confusion among Canadians with respect to the health services plan in their respective provinces. At the centre of the controversy is the term "extra billing". Unfortunately, references to extra billing cast unfair shadows over physicians in some provinces, particularly Nova Scotia.

In the late 1960s, when health care only covered hospital services, the federal Government and the Government of Nova Scotia negotiated the extension of the existing plan to physician services. Quite understandably, the negotiation extended to the physicians who were represented by the Medical Society of Nova Scotia.

With limited resources, Nova Scotia could not afford extension of health care services even with federal assistance. The compromise reached was that physicians agreed to accept 85 per cent of the approved fees for services rendered. Physicians were granted the option of charging the patient for the remainder of the fee.

To characterize this process as extra billing is misleading to the public, and unfair to Nova Scotia physicians. The Medical Society of Nova Scotia must have the opportunity to present their case and their position to the parliamentary committee reviewing the Canada Health Act. The real issue in health services is the quality of patient care. Let us not allow the Minister of National Health and Welfare to confuse this issue with empty rhetoric.

AIR SAFETY

BAN ON SMOKING IN AIRCRAFT ADVOCATED

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Restigouche): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a subject of urgent and pressing necessity. It concerns the Canadian travelling public. While I commend and congratulate the Minister of Transport (Mr. Axworthy) for setting up the Canadian Aviation Safety Board, with the appointment of Lieutenant-General Thorneycroft to be Inspector General of Transportation Safety for Transport Canada, I do not believe that this goes far enough. When we see recent events, such as the fire in a cockpit of an Air Canada flight when a member of the crew lit his briefcase with a cigarette, they focus once again the urgency of having the Minister take a serious view at least at recommending to airlines that employees such as pilots, co-pilots, and other crew, be prohibited from smoking in the cockpits of aircraft.

I recommended to the House that Members support me in this endeavour to protect the travelling public in Canada by having the Minister of Transport seriously consider banning all smoking on aircraft in this country.

BANKS AND BANKING

LACK OF INSURANCE PROTECTION FOR LONG-TERM DEPOSITS

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, it has come to my attention that there was a very serious omission when the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation Act was amended and passed into law on April 27, 1983.

All of us are aware that the amendments, among other things, raised the amount from $20,000 to $60,000 that one could have on deposit in an account that would be insured against the possibility of a bank, or trust company, or other lending institutions in which the funds are deposited, going bankrupt.

However, the guarantee is only for funds on fixed deposit for five years or less. In other words, funds on deposit that are locked in for a period of more than five years are not included and are not protected by the Canada Deposit Insurance Act.

I believe the vast majority of Canadians are unaware of this and think that their funds are perfectly safe and protected if the term of fixed deposit is more than five years. Therefore I call upon the Government either to make this information readily available to Canadians or to change the Canada Deposit Insurance Act so that it applies to all deposits regardless of the number of years such deposits are in place.

THE BUDGET

ATTITUDE OF QUEBEC GOVERNMENT TO SENIOR CITIZENS

Mr. Raymond Savard (Verdun-Saint-Paul): Mr. Speaker, there are in Canada some 750,000 senior citizens, three quarters of whom are women who live at the poverty level. The Minister wanted to help them by providing for a minimum monthly pension of $600, or $7,200 a year. To that end, a Bill will be introduced shortly by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) to provide persons living alone with an increase of $50 a month, in two stages, $25 a month starting July 1st, 1984, and $25 more a month starting December 1st, 1984. This means the extra help paid by this Government will total $460 million on a yearly basis.

The main reason why I rise in this House, Mr. Speaker, is that the Quebec Government does not seem to be greatly concerned with senior citizens, judging from the remarks of its Premier. It is my hope that this increase, so eagerly awaited by senior citizens, particularly those living in retirement centers, will not be pocketed by the Quebec Government, that it will be passed on to those people who built this country and who deserve a healthy, decent standard of living.

PENSIONS

BUDGET MEASURES CONDEMNED

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, the Budget of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) leaves current pensioners out in the cold. One quarter of Canadians over 65 live on incomes below the poverty line. But the Government seems to be content. It has again refused to recognize the eradication of poverty as a priority. The Minister refused to meet with anti-poverty organizations during the pre-Budget consultations and his callousness shows.

Eighty-three cents a day on July 1, and 83 cents a day on December 1, will take a single elderly pensioner in Toronto less than one quarter of the way from the current level of benefits up to the poverty line. It is meagre and unjust. Pensioners need substantial increases now, not next July when the Liberals have their leadership convention, or next fall when an election campaign may be in high gear.

Not only has the Government turned its back on current pensioners, but it has also abandoned future pensioners by refusing to expand the universal Canada-Quebec Pension Plans. Hundreds of Canadians participated in good faith in the deliberations in the Task Force on Pension Reform. But it was just a ruse. The gurus in the Department of Finance already decided that tax subsidized savings which benefit the rich disproportionately should be implemented, and universal coverage should be forgotten.

There is no fairness or equity in the Budget. In fact it does a great disservice to the pensioner, and the government should be totally ashamed of itself.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

LITHUANIA—INDEPENDENCE ANNIVERSARY

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, 66 years ago today, the restoration of the independence of Lithuania was proclaimed. The establishment of Lithuanian independence in 1918 is widely observed by Lithuanians in Canada, the United States, and many European countries.

Lithuania succeeded in re-establishing its independence in 1918, at the end of World War I, but was occupied again in 1940 when Soviet armed forces invaded the independent countries of Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia. The peaceful, western-oriented Baltic nations were crushed by the force of arms of their hostile neighbour. Under the cynical arrangements of the Ribbentrop-Molotov Agreement, the Soviet Union forcibly and ruthlessly incorporated the three Baltic republics into its empire.

Today, the Baltic peoples continue to struggle to attain the freedoms that we enjoy. The Baltic peoples suffer harsh imprisonment, banishment, and persecution for their political and religious beliefs. Brave Lithuanian men and women still seek to exercise their human right to think, speak, and believe as their conscience directs them.

One of the hopes for Lithuania's future lies in the fact that a new generation now stands in the forefront of resistance against the Soviet drive to destroy the Lithuanian nationality.

I urge the Government of Canada to continue not to recognize the forced incorporation of the Baltic States into the Soviet Union. I also take this occasion to pay a warm tribute to the many human rights activists in Lithuania, and the Lithuanian people who are continuing their struggle for freedom and democracy.

OLYMPIC GAMES

TRIBUTE TO TRIPLE MEDAL WINNER, GAÉTAN BOUCHER

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to last week's visit by the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) (Mr. Olivier) to Sarajevo where he made certain statements concerning the structure of the Olympic Games and amateur sport. He took that opportunity to chastise the Canadian Olympic Association officials and their International Olympic Committee pals who have remained aloof in their ivory tower, as the Minister said. Given those circumstances, I sincerely hope the Minister will follow up on those statements here in the House. Naturally, he would have liked to see more Quebecers take active part in those Olympic Games. Mr. Speaker, you will be as happy as I am to learn that our hockey team did very well in the Olympic Games.

Moreover, how could anyone refrain from being enthusiastic about the accomplishment of a Quebecer who became one of the greatest Canadians this morning, and I am referring of course to Gaétan Boucher who has won three olympic medals.

With that in mind, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of all Canadians and all Quebecers who are justifiably proud of that performance, I would like to say quite simply—as you and Hon. Members feel the need to do—Well done, Gaétan!

THE ECONOMY

REQUEST FOR DESIGNATION OF GROWTH ZONES ON NORTH SHORE

Mr. André Maltais (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, this morning, I met with Mr. Angelo Forte, chairman of the Schefferville Employee Reclassification Committee, whom I can now see in the gallery, and we looked at the situation with respect to the reclassification of Schefferville workers. I wanted to ask if it would be proper at this point to re-evaluate the designated zone of Port-Cartier/Sept-Îles/Schefferville in the light of certain new developments. We have learned that, since this zone has lost its designation more people have been laid-off by the Iron Ore company than during the two years when it was designated.

I therefore believe, Mr. Speaker, that to be fair to all the North Shore people, it is important for the Ministers responsible for the designated zones to meet with Mr. Forte and his team and look at what else could be done in addition to the action which has already been taken by the Federal Government and the company, as well as other people.

It is very important, Mr. Speaker, that this meeting be held because the situation is extremely bad on the North Shore. We are having problems in meeting certain departmental officials, which could eliminate the present delays.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that everything that has been done by the Federal Government was done equitably and extraordinary well. Mr. Forte and his team have worked very well, but much remains to be done. The chairman of another group, Mrs. Paradis, would like all the people who have been laid off to be integrated under the same formula and all those involved to be treated fairly. The cases relating to Schefferville, Labrador City, Wabush and Sept-Iles should be re-examined and the people involved should receive at least the same federal assistance as before.

FINANCE

TAX DEDUCTION CEILING FOR DAYCARE COSTS

Mr. Lee Clark (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, it has long been accepted that businesses can write off certain expenses, and generally there is no deduction ceiling on these eligible expenses. That is not the case with daycare costs. Even though the basic minimum daycare deduction has been increased for the 1983 tax year, a ceiling nevertheless remains. Among its many other omissions, yesterday's Budget did not deal with this matter.

There are two fundamental reasons for objecting to the ceiling. First, single parents, who more often than not are single women, are discouraged from entering the work force by prohibitive daycare costs. Even though most provincial Governments provide subsidies for daycare costs, these subsidies are generally small or non-existent for women in the middle-income bracket and, since annual full-time daycare costs far exceed the maximum allowable deduction, many single parents must pay non-deductible daycare costs out of their own pockets. The second argument against the ceiling is based on the more general principle of ensuring equal opportunities for women.

Obviously the burden of paying for children's daycare puts the single working mother at a distinct economic disadvantage. Child care is a necessary expense for single parents entering the work force, so denying them the right to deduct any portion of this legitimate employment expense is highly unfair. Clearly the ceiling on the allowable deduction for daycare expenses should be removed.

HEALTH

REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE FOR CANCER PATIENTS

Mr. Henri Tousignant (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): Mr. Speaker, based on the principle that health care should be made available to all Canadians everywhere in Canada, I wonder about a situation which exists unfortunately much too often and which apparently is not covered by this principle. I am referring to those people who are suffering from cancer and who must travel very long distances to obtain adequate treatments and who, as in the case of children, must be accompanied.

Mr. Speaker, you surely know that such treatments run into thousands of dollars. I have raised this issue with my colleague the Hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mrs. Bégin) who apparently agrees with the principle. I have written to the Quebec health minister and urged him to try and remedy this situation. I suggest that these patients and their close relatives have enough to deal with the severe traumas resulting from their illness without having to depend on the generosity and contributions of charitable individuals or organizations to cover their traveling expenses. I urge, therefore, the Quebec government to pay these costs entirely.

FINANCE

REGISTERED EMPLOYEE PROFIT PARTICIPATION PLAN

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, yesterday's Budget, like that of 1983, stacks the deck against low and middle-income Canadians but gives a very sweet deal to those in upper income brackets. We find a particularly blatant example in the profit-sharing proposals.

Participating employees would be able to claim a 6 per cent tax credit on their share of profits. However, the maximum amount of shared profit which can be used as the basis for the tax credit is 25 per cent of yearly income up to a maximum income of $60,000. This means that a person with a $60,000 income could base his or her tax credit on a maximum of $15,000 shared profit. On the other hand, an employee with a $20,000 income would have to claim his or her tax credit on a maximum of $5,000 shared profit. It follows that the $60,000 employee can claim a maximum tax credit of $900, but the $20,000 employee has a maximum tax credit of $300.

Obviously the theme of the Budget is: the rich get rich, and the poor get taxes. The unfairness of this proposal should be so obvious that the Minister should have been ashamed to suggest it. If the profit-sharing proposal cannot be made fair to all employees, it should be dropped.

INVESTIGATION OF LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION—ACTIVITIES OF OFFICIALS—PRIME MINISTER'S KNOWLEDGE

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. It concerns the daily revelations of the investigations by the Prime Minister's Office into the personal affairs of the Leader of the Opposition as a private individual, the latest being into his private home. I have been associated with the offices of two Conservative Prime Ministers and neither of these gentlemen would have engaged, or ever did engage in such disgraceful tactics—

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: —and neither would the Prime Minister's predecessors, the late Right Hon. Mr. St. Laurent, and the late Right Hon. Mr. Pearson.

My questions to the Acting Prime Minister are: did the Prime Minister know that his principal secretary and others associated with his office were engaged in this kind of nefarious practice, and did the Prime Minister condone those activities?

An Hon. Member: Here he is now.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I was about to say that the Prime Minister was on his way, but he is already here.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I think that under the circumstances I should repeat the question.

Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister having arrived, I will repeat my question. It concerns the daily revelations of the investigation by the Prime Minister's Office into the personal affairs of the Leader of the Opposition as a private citizen, the latest concerning his private home. As I said, I have been associated with the offices of two Conservative Prime Ministers and neither of those gentlemen ever did or ever would have indulged in such disgraceful tactics, and neither would the Prime Minister's predecessors, the late Right Hon. Mr. St. Laurent and the late Right Hon. Mr. Pearson.

An Hon. Member: That bears repeating.

Miss MacDonald: Did the Prime Minister know that his principal secretary and people associated with his Office were engaged in these nefarious practices, and did he condone that operation?

• (1420)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if there had been investigation into personal and private affairs, I think the Hon. Member would be justified in describing them as nefarious practices. I know of no such nefarious practices. I know of no investigation into private affairs. I have begun to read the public record in the last hour, and I have seen the exchange which took place yesterday in the House, and have read some of the clippings. It seems to me it has been established quite clearly by the Deputy Prime Minister that there has been no investigation into private affairs. There has been the use of a clipping service. There has been access made to public records. Everything that has been done has been made public.

I understand that my personal secretary has offered access to the media, which have spent quite a bit of time looking at all of our clipping services and other files. There is nothing personal in them. It is all matters culled from newspapers on the public record.

The Hon. Member suggests there were no such practices in the times of previous Prime Ministers. I understand that there is such a practice occurring in the office of the Leader of the Opposition, that he has a couple of boxes on myself that he will not show to the press. Perhaps the hon. lady should dissociate herself from her present Leader since he is so far below the standards established by the other gentlemen that she mentions.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REQUEST THAT PRIME MINISTER SEEK OFFICIALS' RESIGNATIONS

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am going to tell the Prime Minister that I have files on the Prime Minister.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Miss MacDonald: What the Prime Minister fails to realize is that every time an office of a Cabinet Minister sends out any kind of press release, it goes into a file in the Member's office. What he does not seem to understand is that there is a distinction between the Prime Minister of Canada using the power of the state to search a title of a private individual and that which is put into the files of any Member of Parliament in this House. That is the distinction. The problem is that the Prime Minister and his colleagues have been wallowing around in the sewers for so long that they no longer know the difference between right and wrong.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: Since his return, has the Prime Minister questioned the people on his staff about this betrayal of trust in the highest office of the land, and has he asked for their resignations? If not, will he do so immediately?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. lady asks about a betrayal of trust, and she alleges use of the power of the state. These are serious allegations. They are not founded on fact. They are pure inventions. I have stated quite clearly, and our office has stated quite clearly, that we have a clipping file. The hon. lady herself says she has a file on me personally. I hope she will make that public, except perhaps the personal correspondence that we might have had together.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Where is the betrayal of trust? The hon. lady has done this with public moneys. She has done it with people who are paid by the public purse. The files of the Leader of the Opposition, which he will not show to the press, contrary to ours which we have, are accumulated with what money? Some multinational corporations gave him money to do that? No, Sir, Mr. Speaker. The Leader of the Opposition has a research bureau which receives more than half a million dollars a year. As Party Leader, he receives more than $1 million a year just for his staff. Is this using the power of the state because it is taxpayers' money? If it is, then the accusation stands against both of us; we both stand condemned.

Mr. Deans: Out! Out!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Let them applaud when I say the three of us stand condemned. The Leader of the New Democratic Party, as Party Leader, receives over half a million dollars a year, and the NDP research bureau receives more than a quarter of a million dollars a year.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An Hon. Member: What do you receive?

Mr. Trudeau: They ask what I receive. The two Opposition parties' research bureaux put together receive more than the Liberal caucus research bureau.

More than ten years ago, in order to improve the quality of questioning in this House—

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: —in order to permit the Opposition to do its job and to counter the advantage the Government has because it has the Public Service of Canada working for the Government of Canada—that is the way the system operates—we took the innovative step of funding the research bureaux for the Opposition Leaders' offices. If they have used these moneys to colligate files on myself which are unshowable they are so base in their content, then that is their responsibility, not ours.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REQUEST FOR NAMES OF PERSONS INVOLVED IN OPERATION

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister will sink to any depths.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: What is at issue here is that the Prime Minister and his staff were out to dredge up material that they hoped would discredit the Leader of the Opposition, and their scheme failed. The Minister of Finance is the living proof that their scheme failed.

We now learn that there were ten people involved in this operation, at public expense. Will the Prime Minister say who they were, who authorized them, and will he, in the name of all that is decent, assure this House and the country that the Office of the Prime Minister will no longer be used in this shameful way? If he won't give that assurance, then he should resign.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member wants me to give the assurance that it will not be used again in this way. I cannot give that assurance. It has never been used in this way. We have not looked into private lives. We have a clipping service. That is what we have.

Mr. Crosbie: Searching titles?

Mr. Trudeau: The Hon. Member mentioned searching titles. The Deputy Prime Minister yesterday dealt with that.

An Hon. Member: No, he did not.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Who owns your house?

Mr. Trudeau: The Hon. Member wants to know who owns my house. He just has to read The Gazette and many other papers. They have researched the public records in Canada about my house in Montreal.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): At whose expense?

Mr. Trudeau: At whose expense? At their own expense, of course. That is what happened in the case of the Leader of the Opposition's house. I understand that somebody in my office read in The Gazette, a Montreal paper, that the Leader of the Opposition had bought his house for $1, and that he had sold it back for $1.

An Hon. Member: To whom?

Mr. Trudeau: I do not know.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: The story was in the Montreal Gazette.

An Hon. Member: We want to know how it was done.

Mr. Trudeau: Presumably The Gazette obtained it from the public record. I know that somebody in my office, I think impressed by the Leader of the Opposition when he makes these speeches about "and I know what it is to pay a mortgage"—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: So somebody in my office wanted to know how much he was paying on his mortgage.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: And they went to the public registry.

Mr. Blackburn: How would you know what it is like to pay a mortgage?

Mr. Trudeau: —which the press is doing all the time on my own house in Montreal. So what?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Who sent The Gazette?

Mr. Trudeau: Who sent The Gazette, the Hon. Member for Yellowhead says.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: We have another question here, Mr. Speaker.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: The Hon. Member for Kingston says they have suspicions because of a certain letter which the Minister of Finance talked about. What research bureau permitted the Hon. Member for Yukon to refer to a letter that the president of Iron Ore had received from the then Minister of this Government? Who gave him that?

Mr. Chrétien: Who gave the permission?

Mr. Trudeau: Was it Mr. Mulroney, or was it his research bureau, who looked into the files and found the correspondence, not with the Leader of the Opposition but with the president of Iron Ore, the great administrator of Iron Ore?

Mr. Chrétien: Who closed the mine?

Mr. Trudeau: And who closed the mine?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

DISPATCH OF OFFICIAL TO WASHINGTON

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, keeping a clipping file is one thing, but using the powerful instruments of the state to pry into the lives of private individuals is quite another.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: And the Prime Minister does not distinguish between the role of the research offices of Members of Parliament and his role as the head of the Government and chief adviser to the Crown, and the instruments, the powerful instruments, that he has at his disposal in that capacity.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Has and uses.

Mr. McGrath: What really is involved here, Mr. Speaker, is an abuse of those powers. I want to ask the Prime Minister, if there is nothing wrong with this operation, can he tell the House why it was necessary to send David Crenna to Washington, as was indicated yesterday by the Acting Prime Minister, to obtain from the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission the annual report of the Iron Ore Company of Canada and other information in the public domain, all of which, by the way, is readily available from the Library of Parliament? And I got it this morning.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McGrath: And anything else in the public domain in the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission could have been obtained through the office of our embassy. Why then was it necessary to send Mr. David Crenna to Washington?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): First, I must return to the preamble of the question where the Hon. Member suggests that we use the powerful instruments of the state to compile secret information. Those facts are not right, Mr. Speaker. The powerful instruments of the state do not exist in this particular case. It is the research bureau of the Liberal caucus. It is the exempt staff of the Prime Minister's Office. Just as the Leader of the Opposition has an exempt staff, which has compiled two drawers full of files on myself, in addition to the files which the Member from Kingston has.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Are they using the powerful instruments of the state? No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Crombie: No, you are.

Mr. Trudeau: Let the Hon. Member substantiate his allegations. If it is the exempt staff of the Prime Minister, is this not a distinction between the state and the exempt staff of the Prime Minister? I had this argument with the Leader of the Opposition the other day who seems to believe—and I thought the Hon. Member was more informed—that there is no distinction between the public service, hired under the Public Service Act, which is different from the Prime Minister's Office. The Prime Minister's Office is political by nature, just as the Leader of the Opposition's office is political by nature. I cannot believe the Hon. Member is ignorant. He must be a hypocrite to believe the two are the same. He knows the distinction. You all know the difference over there. I think you are all indulging in hypocrisy.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, when it comes to hypocrisy, the Prime Minister takes second place to no one.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: Obviously, the Prime Minister has not read the code prepared by the late Right Hon. Lester Pearson which set out the responsibilities and the moral responsibilities of the exempt staff of Ministers. There is the distinction—of Ministers, members of the Government.

REQUEST FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, there have been serious allegations made in the press concerning operations of the Office of the Prime Minister. I say to the Prime Minister he has an opportunity to put these allegations to rest by agreeing to a public, independent inquiry.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McGrath: I will say this to you. The Leader of the Opposition is prepared to open every office under his supervision to any such public inquiry.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): That seems like a pretty gratuitous assumption, Mr. Speaker. The Leader of the Opposition is prepared to open everything. Why did he not open it this morning to the press? Why did he not show these files? What kind of an offer is the Hon. Member making when he makes such a statement? He is making a purely rhetorical statement. We have let the press look at our files. Why does his Leader not let the press look at his files? Because the mentality of those people over there is the mentality they have shown before, hiring gumshoes, hiring private detectives, pretending that their telephones are bugged, when in reality they are doing the bugging, and this happened under the leader—

Mr. McGrath: Ask Goyer.

Mr. Epp: Ask the extra-parliamentary group.

Mr. Hees: You are running down.

Mr. Trudeau: I guess you are running down over there because if you can only come up with this kind of invention—

Mr. Hees: That was certainly a killing crack.

Mr. Trudeau: This Party which is constantly using confidential documents received in brown envelopes, reading from confidential documents, that have been obtained illegally—they use illegal documents, and then they blame us for using the public records and newspaper files. What a bunch of hypocrites!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

THE BUDGET

EFFECT ON DIFFERENT INCOME FAMILIES

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In his Budget last night, as well as in the Budget he brought down before, the Minister talked about fairness and recovery. I have an invitation for the Minister. I should like him to come to Oshawa. Would he agree to meet with two families? The first family is a middle-income family which lives in one part of town. As a result of the Minister's last Budget, in the next two years it will experience an increase in taxes of no less than $500.

The other family lives in another part of town. It is headed by a lawyer who earns $90,000 per year. As a result of last night's Budget, because of the changes the Minister introduced he will save $7,500 in taxes.

Will the Minister agree to meet with both families and explain why he had to increase taxes on middle-income Canadians before, in order to provide subsidies for the rich now?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, let me first of all congratulate the Leader of the New Democratic Party for addressing the issue of the Budget, contrary to members of the Official Opposition who seem to ignore the situation of the economy and what should be done about it.

I have to tell the Hon. Member that in my own constituency there is a large number of constituents, some with very low incomes, some with middle incomes, and some with high incomes. I meet with them regularly, as I hope my friend is meeting with his constituents.

I want to draw to the Hon. Member's attention a number of features in the Budget that he seems to ignore. The only increase in expenditure this year, for instance, will go to those most in need. There will be $50 per month going to single people on GIS, the Guaranteed Income Supplement and we will allocate over $1.3 billion to unemployed youth.

The changes that have been made in addition, in terms of profit sharing, will allow low-income workers, middle-income workers and high-income workers to share in the profits of their corporations. The changes that are going to be made to the pension schemes will benefit all workers coming under federal authority and all workers covered by the Canada Pension Plan. They will also ensure that those who are not employees, those who are running or are employed by small businesses who do not have pension plans, those independent operators like farmers, fishermen and professionals, have the same benefits that are available at the present time to those who are working in a plant and who are benefiting under defined benefit plans. The proposal in the Budget is to give equal access to all Canadians to pension benefits in this country. I invite my friend to go back to the Budget.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, just a few minutes ago the Prime Minister referred to hypocrisy. I want to tell the Minister of Finance that when it comes to the sharing of income and the tax policies of the Government, the people of Canada are getting tired of the kind of hypocrisy we just heard from him.

AMOUNT OF BENEFIT INCREASE FOR PENSIONERS

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question follows immediately from what the Minister just said. He said he increased the pension benefits for those who are getting the GIS. The Minister knows that there are 750,000 poor pensioners in Canada. He is giving them a $1.66 per day increase. Considering this, and in terms of the private pension change available primarily to the rich, why did he provide a benefit scheme that would give the rich $20 and something per day, compared to $1.66 per day for the poor? Why is it that the poor get so little and the rich so much? Is the rich vote worth 20 times the amount that a poor vote is worth?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like to remind my friend that what we are doing in support of the senior citizens is the implementation of recommendations coming from all kinds of groups interested in social services and in welfare, as well as other organizations, that is, ensuring that those who are single recipients of Old Age Security and the Guaranteed Income Supplement will receive 60 per cent of the amount of money available to couples. In effect, as the Hon. Member knows, what we propose is going to bring these people over 60 per cent of what is available to couples. This is going to take effect immediately.

As far as the other measures are concerned, as I have indicated to the Hon. Member, what we are proposing under the Tax Assistance Plan for pension reform is to make access to the pension scheme equivalent, whether you are an independent professional, farmer, businessman, or whether you happen to work for a firm. That access is given equally to all, and that is fair between people in similar situations.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, once again the Minister talked about fairness. He talked about it last night, and he talked about it before. He goes on about recovery and fairness.

TAX LOOPHOLES AVAILABLE TO RICH

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, considering that even after this Budget people at the poverty level will continue to pay taxes, and that after this Budget pensioners will continue to pay taxes, why is it that we have a tax system so riddled with more than 200 loopholes that a man or a woman earning $200,000 can get away without paying one penny in tax? When are we going to have a fair kind of recovery in which all Canadians share the benefit?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I want to—

[English]

Mr. Broadbent: Oh, you switched to French.

Mr. Lalonde: What have you got against French? I thought French was the official language of this country as well as English. What have you got against French?

[Translation]

—I will speak French when I feel like it!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: I know the Hon. Member and I am aware of his interest in and dedication for bilingualism. I should like to think that it was just his angry reaction on the spur of the moment. I will answer the question.

Now then, with respect to the question raised by the Hon. Member, I would like to remind him that Canadian pensioners benefit from a plan which compares favourably with that of any other industrialized country—more generous in fact than those of most industrialized countries.

In addition, the tax benefits granted to the elderly are considerably higher than those of people under 65. The Hon. Member is aware of that as well. Of course, some pensioners do pay income tax, but that is because they earn a fairly good income. Similarly, people under 65 who declare good incomes have to pay taxes.

Concerning the specific cases to which the Hon. Member might want to refer, they have been mentioned in previous question periods. He knows the tax regulations, people have to pay taxes on the income they earn, in accordance with well known regulations of the Income Tax Act which has been adopted by Parliament.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE CHAIRMAN OF REPUBLIC OF KOREA NATIONAL ASSEMBLY

Mr. Speaker: May I call the attention of the House to the presence in the Speaker's Gallery of the Hon. Du-wan Pong, Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, National Assembly of the Republic of Korea.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE

AUTHOR OF REQUEST FOR TITLE SEARCH OF OPPOSITION LEADER'S RESIDENCE

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Prime Minister. He will know that an employee of his Office—the Office which, without question, is the most powerful in the land, because a call from the Office is a call from the head of the Government, with all that entails—he knows that an official of his Office, Mr. Crenna, has been quoted as saying that the request was made for a title search of the residence of the now Leader of the Opposition. Is the Prime Minister denying that a request was made? If he is not, will he tell us who made that request?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know who in name made that request. I would be prepared to say without any hesitation that, if Mr. Crenna made the search, it was probably requested by someone in my Office who was his superior, if not by one of his colleagues. So there is no denying that the request would have issued from my Office, if Mr. Crenna made—I believe the Hon. Member for Yellowhead is talking of the research at the Security Commission—

• (1450)

An Hon. Member: No, the mortgage.

Mr. Chrétien: The mortgage.

Mr. Trudeau: Then, so far as I know it is not Mr. Crenna who made that research. But someone in my office, I am informed, asked someone involved in real estate in Montreal to look at the public record to see if the story in The Gazette was correct, that Mr. Mulroney had bought his house for $1. And I am told that I am incorrect in saying that he had sold it back for the same amount. I am sorry—

Mr. Chrétien: $500,000.

Mr. Trudeau: —if I misled the House. It was unintentional. So what, Mr. Speaker? There was a verification on the public record as to whether the story in The Gazette was correct.

I wish the Leader of the Opposition, and all his supporters, would also make verification before they make the kind of unfounded allegations which very often they cull from the press. I mean, that is the story of the past two days. They took allegations out of the press which were patently incorrect and false, and they repeated them in this House without verifying whether they were true or not.

Apparently my Office has more conscience than the members of the Opposition. It verifies the public records before repeating nonsense.

CONTENTS OF FILE

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Yellowhead): Well, Mr. Speaker, we are getting somewhere.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): The Prime Minister has now confirmed that his Office requested verification of that information, that it received verification of that information. Presumably there is a record of that verification. Will the Prime Minister tell us if the record of that verification was in the Mulroney file which is being kept at public expense in the Prime Minister's Office? If not, why is it not there? And what else was removed from the Mulroney file before it was opened to the press?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the second part of the question devours the first. The Hon. Member presumes that something has been removed from the file. I do not even know if it was in the file, Mr. Speaker. We do know there was a story in The Gazette that somebody in my office had verified whether it was true or not. So presumably all that is in the file is a Gazette story, probably with a handwritten note, "This is correct. We verified it." I don't know, Mr. Speaker. I am certainly not interested in these files.

Mr. Coates: Why do you have them?

Mr. Jarvis: Somebody thinks you are interested.

An Hon. Member: Somebody is interested in it.

Mr. Trudeau: Well, someone over there obviously is very interested in knowing what we know about what is on the public record. It seems to me that the whole Iron Ore question has not been put forward by this Party. It has been part of the public record put forward by the Leader of the Opposition who gives himself great, great credit as to being a very able administrator—and he shows Iron Ore as the proof of that—and a man who knows how it is to carry a heavy mortgage, when he only paid a dollar for his house. These are public matters and it is incorrect, particularly for the former Prime Minister, to allege somehow that, because I am Prime Minister I am not also Leader of the Liberal Party, and that as Leader of the Liberal Party I do not have a political partisan function to perform. Once again, the Leader of the Opposition had exempt staff. I remember answering in front of a parliamentary committee that he had more people—

Some Hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Trudeau: —on his exempt staff than I did.

An Hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Crosbie: The ramblings of a wreck. Order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Trudeau: What were they doing, Mr. Speaker? Were they putting things in files and then removing them surreptiously so that the press would not see them? Do we go around making this kind of accusation—

Mr. Crosbie: Order.

Mr. Jarvis: Check with your Minister of Finance.

Mr. Trudeau: —about the former Prime Minister? What about his own files? Did he destroy—why did he destroy files when he became Leader of the Opposition?

PROCEDURE FOLLOWED IN APPOINTING FORMER MINISTER TO CABINET

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Having asked him questions about an investigation carried out by a public official of the highest office in the land, at public expense, into a matter that, if carried out at all, should have been carried out by the Party; having asked him a question about a public investigation which we believe was most improper for him to carry out, let me ask the Prime Minister of Canada why there was not similar interest shown in carrying out an investigation into the background of the Member of Parliament for Burin-St. George's before he was named to the Cabinet of Canada for 10 days?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the Hon. Member for Yellowhead has just spilled the beans. He equates a public record in a registry office in Montreal with private tax information which is held private under the income tax laws of Canada. He is now suggesting that we should have had some of our exempt staff look into the files of the tax office of Canada. This is something I suppose he would have done.

An Hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Trudeau: And maybe he did that with his Ministers before naming them. I did not. I presumed they were honest people. That presumption is not—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: With your record, that is hard to believe.

Mr. Trudeau: —that presumption is not destroyed because exempt members of my staff, who are hired as Liberals to perform a partisan function—not a function of the state, but a partisan function—let us not be hypocrites, Mr. Speaker. The Leader of the Opposition is also Leader of the Tory Party. The Leader of the Government is also Leader of the Liberal Party. They perform partisan functions as well; both offices do. But looking into the tax files of any private Member is something we would not do, but something which I guess the Hon. Member for Yellowhead would do, if I can judge his question.

Some Hon. Members: More.

AMATEUR SPORT

REQUEST FOR ERECTION OF INFRASTRUCTURES IN STE-FOY, P.Q.

Mr. Dennis Dawson (Louis-Hébert): Mr. Speaker, I can see that the Hon. Members are rather excited today. My questions will be somewhat more gracious than the previous ones, Mr. Speaker. They are for the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport (Mr. Olivier). The Minister is probably aware that Gaétan Boucher won his third medal this morning, a gold medal in speedskating, in addition to the other two he won this week. Will the Minister consider the request made by the Fédération de patinage de vitesse du Québec, which has seven members on the Canadian speedskating team? Will he consider the request of the Federation to give the City of Sainte-Foy an artificial speedskating ring so that the Canadian speedskating team will not have to go abroad, namely in Europe or Lake Placid, to train?

Mr. Speaker, it is extremely important that we should encourage the recipients of gold medals which were won at an extremely reduced cost. It would be encouraging if, in 1988, we could have not only Gaétan Boucher, but other competitors named Daigle, Grenier, Thibault and Pichette—

Hon. Jacques Olivier (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity, on behalf of the Canadian Government and all Canadians, to congragulate Mr. Gaétan Boucher who has become the first Canadian amateur athlete to win three medals at the Winter Olympics. Gaétan Boucher becomes the first Canadian amateur to win two gold medals in the same Winter Olympics.

In reply to the Hon. Member's question, I can say that the Canadian Government and my Department are considering the possibility, first, of building an Olympic speed skating oval in Calgary at a cost of $35 million, and also of building facilities in Eastern Canada so that Eastern Canadians can practice this form of sport.

In closing, I should also point out that Mr. Gaétan Boucher will receive the Order of Canada on April 11 for his achievements and the honour his achievements are giving Canada throughout the world.

THE ECONOMY

LEVEL OF UNEMPLOYMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance of the Schickelgruber government.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An Hon. Member: Oh, there he is; there is John.

Mr. Crosbie: That is what happened to the Reichstag in 1933.

In the Budget of April 19, 1983, he said:

—my dominant concern in preparing this Budget has been to help the more than one and a half million Canadians who want to work but cannot find jobs.

Ten months later the number of unemployed is 1,473,000 and the Minister forecasts it will be over 1,400,000 this year and next, and it will be over 1,100,000 in 1988. What has happened to his dominant concern to help Canadians find jobs? When is he going to act to carry out that magnificent statement of April, 1983?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the problem with the Hon. Member and with the Conservative Party is that they have never gone past 1983. We are in 1984, in case the Hon. Member did not realize it. We had a Budget yesterday which came out with a number of measures aimed at helping the economy and Canadians in a lot of areas, whether they are senior citizens, young people, workers, farmers, small businesses, or home owners. I invite my friend to look at it.

As far as the figures he has quoted are concerned, I have to remind him that last year we created 400,000 jobs. The job creation forecasts for 1984 compare very favourably with any other industrial country. As I indicated, we are going to create close to 1.6 million new jobs over the next five years. Obviously we are not going to be able to eliminate unemployment during that period for the very simple reason that we have the fastest growing labour force of any industrial country. My friend knows that, too.

We are going to create jobs as fast as can be done without creating impossible situations in terms of the general performance of the economy. We are very concerned about the situation; we are allocating public funds to a degree and at a level well over what has ever been allocated in this country by any Government to fight unemployment. But we are also counting on the activities of the private sector to come in and be the main engine of growth. This what we expect in the coming year.

Mr. Crosbie: A short supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: With all due respect to the Hon. Member, it is past the hour and there is a Budget debate ensuing. This appears to involve matters anticipated in the Budget debate. The Chair would like to call on the Hon. Member for—

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary? Is there anything more important than unemployment, Mr. Speaker? This is of some urgency.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair recognized the Hon. Member when it was already past three o'clock, and the Chair—

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, a short supplementary.

Some Hon. Members: Sit down!

Mr. Crosbie: Well, Mr. Speaker, we know it is 1984 when we have Big Brother over there answering. Heil Schickelgruber!

Mr. Trudeau: The Reichstag was burned down by guys like you.

Mr. Crosbie: What about unemployment? You are a disgrace to your office.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) on a matter of privilege.

Mr. Crosbie: We are not permitted to ask you questions. You are afraid of your unemployment record.

Mr. Trudeau: Stand up.

Mr. Ouellet: What a joker.

Mr. Crosbie: From Russia with love.

Mr. Trudeau: If you are concerned about unemployment, why did they spend half an hour asking questions about clippings?

Mr. Crosbie: Supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Some Hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, I—

Mr. Speaker: The Chair has indicated grave concern about anticipating a Budget debate according to the rules of the House. The Chair at this point has recognized the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain on a matter of privilege.

PRIVILEGE

MR. NIELSEN—REPORTED INVESTIGATION OF LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I do regret the fact that so much time was taken early in Question Period which has denied other Members a chance to raise legitimate questions.

As you know, I was making some comments yesterday with regard to the question of privilege raised by the House Leader for the Official Opposition and responded to by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard). I can see there is very little interest in the matter given that most of the Members are paying attention to other than what is taking place. I listened with interest to the exchanges between the Hon. Member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), the Hon. Member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) today and I must say the whole thing sickens me. It sickens me to the point that I cannot be bothered talking about it; make your own decision.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair may have misinterepreted—

Mr. McKinnon: He is sick.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member was recognized to add to a question of privilege. Is the Hon. Member directing a criticism at the Chair or is it—

Mr. Nielsen: He is just informing the Chair he is sick.

Mr. McKenzie: We knew that.

Mr. Speaker: Are there any other Hon. Members seeking to intervene at this point?

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I wish to intervene with respect to the question of privilege raised by the Opposition House Leader yesterday. I had expected to hear, for a moment at least, some views from the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain.

Mr. Deans: What is the point?

Mr. Crombie: I do not want to go over the ground covered by my House Leader, but I want to add a dimension which I think is important to the matter you have to deal with. It arises from the debate yesterday in Question Period, and I might add, now that I have heard the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) speak on the matter, that the thoughts I have for you as you make your decision are perhaps more in order than I even thought myself.

It seems to me that the root of our difficulty, not only on the matter specifically before you but those which have arisen in the last number of months, Mr. Speaker, relates to our understanding of what the Prime Minister's Office is, what it does, its relationships with Government and with us. I heard the Deputy Prime Minister the other day, Mr. Speaker, simply say there was no basic difference between public funds in a Member's office or in the office of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mulroney), and public funds being used in the Prime Minister's Office. That suggestion is sustained in an article in The Globe and Mail today where the principal secretary to the Prime Minister again tries to draw an analogy by saying that the Leader of the Opposition has public funds for research, as does every Member, as well as the PMO.

When I heard the Prime Minister himself say that he saw his "exempt staff" as not being governed by the same rules of conduct as members of the Public Service, I say to you that I hope I will have your attention on this matter because I have not heard anything which has quite so disturbed me in a long, long time. The Prime Minister is absolutely wrong. The danger of his assumption is quite stunning. The Prime Minister's Office stands in an entirely different constitutional position from that of a Member's office or the office of the Leader of the Opposition, indeed almost any other office you can think of.

In 1979 an excellent book was written called The Super Bureaucrats. That book is an exposition of the central agencies of Government. Central to that was its discussion of the Prime Minister's Office. This is the shortest definition you will find of what the Prime Minister's Office does. I commend it to you, Mr. Speaker, because it is very important. It states that the Prime Minister's Office is to serve the Prime Minister in the exercise of his power, in the pursuit of his duties, and in the discharge of his responsibilities as head of Government and as head of the administration.

That is the job of the Prime Minister's Office. It advises the Prime Minister as head of the Government and head of the administration. That is the qualitative, fundamentally important difference, Mr. Speaker, between the Prime Minister's Office and the Leader of the Opposition's office, or indeed any other research office. The fundamental difference is that when the Prime Minister's Office speaks, asks a question, writes a letter, asks people to investigate or telephones, the Prime Minister's Office is speaking with the authority and power of the Government and the state.

Today the Prime Minister said something which I never thought I would hear in the House. He said that when the exempt staff in his office operates they are not part of the Government and controlled by the mode of conduct required for all public servants. If there was any doubt about the power of the Prime Minister's Office, it has surely increased in the past 15 years. We have centralized more and more power in the office of the Prime Minister. That is why there has been grave concern.

When the Prime Minister spoke about research of a political nature, he totally confused the role of his Party with his job as head of the Government. It gives me concern, Mr. Speaker, and should give you concern when you make your decision.

I would like to quote from an article about a topic which was recently debated in a city in this country. It reads as follows:

> The growth of central agencies (notably the Prime Minister's office . . .) has had a dramatic effect on the role of the Liberal Party in Government. The development of powerful resources around the leader has meant that many functions that are "political"—and political in a partisan sense—have devolved to publicly-paid officials. Much of what might otherwise have been the party's role has been subsumed . . . by the developments.
> In light of this, it has become progressively easier for the party to slip into the role of simply an election machine, cranked up every four years, but largely dormant and ineffective in inter-election periods. Even in elections, much of the planning and related activity that one might expect to see reside in the realm of the party has become centered in government or parliamentary institutions, reliant on government or parliamentary resources.

I did not make that up, Mr. Speaker. That is from a discussion paper on the reform of the Liberal Party. That is a report from the Committee for Reform of the Liberal Party in Canada. It is under the auspices of the president of the Liberal Party.

There is danger in confusing the activities of those who work in the Prime Minister's Office with those who work in the Leader of the Official Opposition's office or members' offices. It is a matter which is important to us and also to the Liberal Party; at least, their own people who want to reform them say so. It has occupied the minds of people in other countries. How do you control the power of the Prime Minister's Office in relation to the privileges of the House and the privileges of the Members in it? The question is what power the Government, the Prime Minister and the Prime Minister's Office have to reach into the House and intimidate its Members. That is the issue. That is why the question of privilege is no frivolous one.

The oldest battle in the history of Parliament has always been how to control the power of the Government and the power of the state. It is as old as Parliament itself. Mr. Speaker, the rights and privileges which you administer for us and your own rights and privileges as Speaker come as a result of the need 400 years ago in England for the Parliament of that day to make sure that the Crown, the state and the government of the day could not reach in and intimidate either the House or its members. In response to the questions of privilege raised in the 1540s when the King commanded that the Speaker do such and so, the Speaker said: "Eyes I have and ears I have only that Parliament will give me".

Mr. Evans: The King is a Member of Parliament.

Mr. Crombie: Mr. Speaker, the Member across the aisle—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Order.

Mr. Blenkarn: Get in your seat.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Hon. Member for Rosedale has the floor.

Mr. Crombie: Mr. Speaker, there was an intervention by the Member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans). He indicated that the Prime Minister was acting as a Member of Parliament. We are not talking about the role of the Prime Minister as a Member of Parliament, but about the role of the Prime Minister's Office as a function of government.

Mr. Fisher: Your office does not do anything, David?

Mr. Crombie: It is the power of the state to intimidate the House and its Members that we are talking about. That kind of executive power—

Mr. Fisher: You are only using your office for the same thing. You are doing the same thing all the time.

Mr. Crombie: Mr. Speaker, could I have order, please? I would like order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: It has been a difficult enough day. I appeal to Hon. Members for order. The Hon. Member for Rosedale has the floor.

Mr. Crombie: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I do not need any instructions from Members opposite who do not understand how this House is supposed to function. The Member for Mississauga North (Mr. Fisher) knows no better than to shout at other people. He makes no contribution of his own.

The matter we are talking about has not only been important here but has been important in other countries. The control of executive state power has grown immeasurably in most countries. In democratic countries the way in which we have done that is to make sure we can contain that power. In the 1970s in the United States that same kind of executive power had internal revenue investigating files of members of Congress and opponents of the government.

A few weeks ago in the House the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) made allegations that through the Prime Minister's Office, through people who are supposed to be public servants, he obtained information alleging certain actions by the Leader of the Opposition. That, Mr. Speaker, is why we worry. We have to nip it in the bud. Any government which thinks that the Prime Minister's Office is a function of politics rather than of political Party, and is not a function of serving the head of government, is a government that you cannot trust with power. That is why Parliament and its privileges has always been the shore against the water that came from those who wished to abuse power.

The second way we contain it, Mr. Speaker, is through the privileges of individual Members. I have been in public life for almost 15 years. I have held positions of power to make decisions affecting other people. I am well aware of the kinds of blandishments, intimidations, threats and muffled threats that come to people in a decision-making process. It is easy to be intimidated. It takes courage not to be intimidated by those who would distort the exercise of responsibilities. That is why it needs something else. The privileges of the House and of each Member of the House are the one factor that allows Members to withstand the pressures from those who would intimidate them. Privileges and rights of Members are not some esoteric, above the ground or misunderstood reality. They are the essential requirement for carrying out our public responsibility.

If Members are going to be intimidated by the government of the day through the use of files to which only the Prime Minister's Office has access and not other research houses, that becomes the small trickle that grows into a flood and we can no longer depend on Members to carry out their responsibilities.

The day that privileges of the Members of the House and the privileges of the House generally are usurped by the assumption that the Prime Minister's Office is concerned more with politics than with government is the day when your rights, Mr. Speaker, and my rights, and therefore the rights of the people of this country, are in jeopardy.

It is not only through the rights of Parliament and the rights of individual Members that we protect the freedom of this institution and can defend it from the abuse of power by government through the Prime Minister's Office. It is also done through morality. All of the rules of the House, the philosophy that sustains them and all of the freedoms that we enjoy are rooted in a common understanding of how one conducts politics. There is a moral basis to politics. That is why all members of the staff of Ministers and the Prime Minister's Office have the same code of conduct. The Prime Minister indicated otherwise today.

I want to give the following quote because it came from a great Liberal Prime Minister. After the scandals of the 1960s, Prime Minister Pearson was concerned about the conduct of the Prime Minister's Office and the conduct of Minister's offices. He said that it is essential to establish a code of conduct applicable to today and went on to say:

> It is by no means sufficient for a person in the office of a Minister—or in any other position of responsibility in the public service—to act within the law. That goes without saying. Much more is required. There is an obligation not simply to observe the law but to act in a manner so scrupulous that it will bear the closest public scrutiny. The conduct of public business must be beyond question in terms of moral standards, objectivity and equality of treatment.

I note that at the beginning he said "all staff members". When we read Hansard tomorrow we will see that the Prime Minister of this day does not understand the fundamental point that his staff in the Prime Minister's Office, exempt or otherwise, must carry out the same degree and level of moral conduct that everyone else is expected to carry out. That was the essence of Watergate. The essence of Watergate was not the break-in; it was the abuse of executive power. That was the point.

This abuse of power can only be contained by a code of moral conduct. That is why Lester Pearson made that statement in the mid-1960s. It is time that the Government read it again.

I relied heavily on the Liberal discussion paper prepared by those who want to reform the Liberal Party and on a Liberal past that at least understood that there was a moral basis to politics. I did so because at the root of the question of privilege for you to consider today, Mr. Speaker, is the question whether the Prime Minister's Office, with the power it has, is required to act within a moral code so that it does not impinge upon the rights and privileges of the House and its Members.

Interestingly enough, there is no dispute about the facts because it is clear from yesterday's Hansard that the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) indicated there was no question of the facts. What was in question was the interpretation. You may want to check Hansard, Mr. Speaker, but that is what I read.

I am saying that my interpretation is that, on the basis of those facts, the principal secretary to the Prime Minister and those who work in the Prime Minister's Office did not act in a way that would "bear the closest public scrutiny".

Finally, let me say that when we deal with this matter it is my judgment and that of the reform group in the Liberal Party, the judgment of Lester Pearson and the judgment of any honest, thinking person, that the actions of the Prime Minister's Office give us the suspicion—and do not forget that intimidation works best by suspicion—that they are a threat to the rights and privileges of the House, of its Members and have certainly taken us down a long, dark road to any further understanding by the Government of the moral basis of politics.

Mr. Douglas Fisher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to you that what we have just heard is not a question of privilege but a matter of debate. That is my first point.

My second point is that it is rather biased and strangely worded debate from a man who has been practising exactly what he has accused the Liberal Party of doing. Let me point out that the Member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) is the political leader in his Party for Metro Toronto. It is an informal post that was given to him in trust by his Party and does not really have any bearing on his formal duties as a Member of Parliament. But you know, Mr. Speaker, and so do I, that in the course of that duty he will at least be tempted, if he does not actually do so, to use the resources and the funds of his office here in Ottawa and in his constituency to carry out these duties. Those are at least the temptations.

He is rising in the House to tell us that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) should not succumb to such temptations; that the Prime Minister should not act as a politician, as a Member of Parliament. He is arguing that the Prime Minister may be given a political staff but should not use it for that purpose. Yet the Member for Rosedale acts like a politician, as does every other Member in the House.

I must say that the Member for Rosedale should pay less attention to my riding and more attention to his riding. He would then be able to get some of the grants he has been complaining about.

Today the Member for Rosedale raised a red herring as an opportunity to invent stories and present misinterpretations about the activities of the Liberal Party. As the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) pointed out yesterday, what is wrong with preparing a file of newspaper clippings? It is not a covert action. He invited members of the Press Gallery and Members of the Opposition to look at it. He made it very open. Are we to say that Members on other side have not done the same about us? That is a normal political activity. We want to know where we all stand on various public issues, so we go and do some research. A public issue is any issue which we are ready to bring into this arena ourselves, if others do not force it on us.

● (1530)

As was pointed out today in Question Period, the Hon. Member for Central Nova (Mr. Mulroney) has himself raised many of these issues, so there is no abuse of political power; there is simply research to see whether the things he said hold water. That is normal politics. That is what we do in this arena.

When the Hon. Member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) rises and spends long minutes in the House using a question of privilege simply to score those sorts of partisan points, I think that is an abuse. I think that is a waste of Members' time. The people who want to speak on important issues like the Budget are throttled. It is a kind of Tory closure. They do not want to let us get on to the real issues of the day and they are going to waste time in the House.

I say first that the issues raised by the Hon. Member for Rosedale are issues which apply to him and to every other Member in the House. They are partisan. They are the use of our offices as partisan politicians, and that is what the public thinks we should do. The public does not object when we use our own offices and our own role to reinforce what we are, namely partisan politicians. Second, the public knows that there is nothing wrong with politicians investigating the claims which we make ourselves, as the Hon. Member for Central Nova has done. Third, I personally object to the use which the Hon. Member for Rosedale has made of a question of privilege simply to take a matter of debate, drag it out and waste the time of ordinary Members when we have a list of people who want to speak on the Budget.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to enter into the debate on this point of privilege because I think it is fundamental and has a very significant impact upon the democratic principles of our country.

At page 49 of Beauchesne's Fifth Edition, Citation 157 reads:

> The Leader of the Opposition and some of his principal colleagues form a group, each member of which is given a particular range of activities on which it is his task to direct criticism of the Government's policy and administration.

Clearly that is the role or the responsibility of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mulroney). It is one which comes to us from a long parliamentary tradition, a tradition that must be respected. Anything which would attempt in any way to undermine that role is an abuse of privilege and an abuse of the House.

At page 143 of Erskine May's Twentieth Edition, it reads:

> It may be stated generally that any act or omission which obstructs or impedes either House of Parliament in the performance of its functions, or which obstructs or impedes any Member or officer of such House in the discharge of his duty, or which has a tendency, directly or indirectly, to produce such results may be treated as a contempt even though there is no precedent of the offence—

Clearly this action taken by the office of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was designed to impact directly upon the performance of the Leader of the Opposition in this Chamber. I suggest that type of action is a clear breach of privilege.

I would like to quote from an article which appeared in today's edition of The Globe and Mail. In part it reads:

> Mr. Crenna also confirmed yesterday that the Opwatch operation, which he co-ordinated, has involved up to about ten Government officials in and outside the PMO since it began last summer.

Further the article reads:

> The PMO also put out requests to have Government officials with special expertise in the area of political research seconded to the PMO to work on the Mulroney file.

The significance of that is that we have public servants attached to performing political functions, which is clearly a breach of their purposes.

The question that is outstanding is just what was to be done with this information. Obviously it was not simply information gathered for no purpose, but it was to be used in the House to affect the performance of the Leader of the Opposition. We just have to look back at the recent actions of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) to see the significance of that type of action.

Mr. Cadieux, in yesterday's edition of The Globe and Mail, indicated that this material they were collecting was going to be fired at the Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons.

Page 158 of Erskine May's Twentieth Edition makes the indirect attempt to influence a Member as much a breach of privilege as the direct attempt when it indicates the following, under the headline "Acts Tending Indirectly to Obstruct Members in the Discharge of Their Duty":

> Conduct not amounting to a direct attempt to influence a Member in the discharge of his duties, but having a tendency to impair his independence in the future performance of his duty, will also be treated as a breach of privilege.

This action on the part of the Prime Minister's Office was in fact designed to impede the Leader of the Opposition in his duties in the House. Only the most naive of Canadians would not believe that to be true.

At page 22 of Beauchesne's Fifth Edition, under "Influencing Members", it reads:

> It is generally accepted that any threat to a Member, attempting to influence his vote or his actions as a Member, is a breach of privilege.

It is very clear that these actions were designed to be a threat to the Leader of the Opposition, and therefore were clearly a breach of his privileges.

On October 17, 1973, as reported on page 6942 of Hansard, we find that David Lewis, MP, rose on a point of privilege regarding the bugging of an NDP caucus meeting. The Speaker found that to be a prima facie case of privilege. The point here is that it is important that the privacy of the NDP caucus be protected; the same must apply to the privacy of the Leader of the Opposition.

On Tuesday, September 4, 1973, as reported on page 6179 of Hansard, we find that the Hon. Member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) rose on a point of privilege regarding the RCMP making inquiries at her office. She specifically noted in her arguments the need to protect the privacy of Members of Parliament. Again the Speaker ruled that she had a prima facie case of privilege.

What we have here is clearly an attempt by the Government to undermine the performance of the Leader of the Opposition in the House. Second, we have the partisan involvement of Government officials. Mr. Mitchell Sharp, a well-known past Member of the House, had some comments about the use of the Public Service and this type of attitude. He said:

> I believe that there is a responsibility upon politicians and those public servants now at the top to ensure that the ideals of disinterested, non-partisan public service are upheld and maintained.

This action was clearly meant to have an influence upon the performance of the duties of the Leader of the Opposition in the House. Clearly, as is evident from quotations from Beauchesne and Erskine May, those types of actions are nothing more than a breach of privilege. I encourage the Speaker to find here a prima facie case of privilege so that the House can act and go on to investigate the seriousness of these allegations.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I would like to intervene for just a short time on this matter. The Hon. Member opposite who just spoke indicated that the role—and I think he quoted from Beauchesne's but I did not get the citation—of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mulroney) was to criticize policy put forward by the Government. That, to me, makes imminent sense. That is precisely what the Leader of the Opposition, the shadow cabinet ministers and members of the Opposition are meant to do. What could not be found in that citation of Beauchesne was that that criticism of policy should involve the compiling of records and information on individual Cabinet Ministers for the express purpose of undermining the ability of Cabinet Ministers to conduct their functions or for carrying out a campaign in the House of personal persecution of individual Cabinet Ministers with information which has been gleaned through brown envelopes, secret memoranda and any other sources of information that the Opposition can collect. That seems to be the kind of thing the Opposition is trying to accuse the Office of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) of doing. It is something which we have witnessed in the House for years by members of the Opposition, and they do not find that to be a matter of immorality. It is clear that that has been done by members of the Opposition.

• (1540)

I would like to quote the Right Hon. Member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark) when he was Leader of the Government in 1979. He appeared before the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee. This can be found at page 9:22 of the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee for November 15, 1979. It is a discussion between the members of that committee and the right hon. gentleman. The passage I wish to read is one where the Hon. Member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin), now Deputy Speaker, was questioning the Right Hon. Member. I quote:

MR. CORBIN: —I could go so far as to say that the Prime Minister's Office has a partisan political perspective, since it is difficult to separate partisan feelings from politics.

MR. CLARK (YELLOWHEAD): It is difficult to do so now, it has been difficult to do so in the past and it will continue to be a hard thing to do.

MR. CORBIN: You therefore intend to uphold the usual practices which have thus far been followed with respect to your Cabinet and the political role played by a number of people in your office?

MR. CLARK (YELLOWHEAD): Yes, since that is an essential part of the political role of a Prime Minister under our system. I am both Prime Minister and head of the Party, as was my predecessor and as are all Prime Ministers.

MR. CORBIN: Does your Party have separate offices here in Ottawa?

MR. CLARK (YELLOWHEAD): Yes.

MR. CORBIN: Do you have an office at your Party headquarters?

MR. CLARK (YELLOWHEAD): No, I do not.

MR. CORBIN: This means that you take care of partisan political matters in the actual office of the Prime Minister, here on the Hill or in the Langevin Building.

MR. CLARK (YELLOWHEAD): Yes, just as I did when I was Leader of the Opposition. I assume the present Leader of the Opposition does the same thing.

The Prime Minister's Office, according to the words of the former Prime Minister, carries out partisan political activities by members of the exempt staff of the Prime Minister in the Prime Minister's Office in the Langevin Block and here on Parliament Hill. Those are precisely the words that were uttered today by the current Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) with regard to his exempt staff.

Mr. Crombie: Still wrong.

Mr. Evans: The Hon. Member says "still wrong". He is condemning the Right Hon. Member for Yellowhead who stood today in righteous indignation and condemned the Prime Minister for doing precisely what he says he was doing in 1979.

I know that offices of Members of Parliament on this Hill, the staff of Members of Parliament on this Hill, watch the newspapers daily, cut articles out of newspapers that have to do with other Members of Parliament, positions they have taken, statements they have made, and keep these on file. They do investigative research, I can say quite frankly and openly, on the past history of other Members of Parliament.

I have been the subject of such an investigation by Members of the Opposition. That is past history, a period before I was a Member of Parliament. That information was not available from newspaper clippings. It was not available from the public record in the Library of Parliament. It was obtained somewhere else. That has gone on in offices of Opposition Members of Parliament.

The Hon. Member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper) quoted from Erskine May and from Mr. Sharp about the role of public servants. The fundamental confusion that he is making is the same fundamental confusion that was made by the Leader of the Opposition the other day. There is a fundamental difference between people who are under the Public Service Employment Act, who are permanent full-time public servants, and members of the exempt staff of Ministers and members of the staff of Members of Parliament. They are not public servants as defined by the Hon. Member in his citations from Beauchesne's, Erskine May and his quotes from former Ministers of this place. It is absolutely true and absolutely essential that the public service, as defined by the Public Service Employment Act, be impartial, that it serve the Government of the day and that it be apolitical. That is not the same thing. Indeed, that is why the staff we are talking about here today is called the exempt staff. They are partisan. They are hired on a partisan basis.

I know for sure that the Leader of the Opposition would not hire a Liberal or a Member of the NDP in his office. He hires Tories—partisan hiring practices. That is why they are exempt staff. They are supposed to do partisan things. That is why they cannot be public servants. The Public Service Employment Act expressly forbids that kind of behaviour.

We are talking here about the exempt staff. I do not draw a distinction, as the Hon. Member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) did, between the Office of the Prime Minister and the Office of the Leader of the Opposition because, under our parliamentary system, the Leader of the Opposition is the Prime Minister in waiting. If the Hon. Member for Rosedale is saying that it is all right for the Office of the Leader of the Opposition to be partisan and collect political and background information on Members of this side when he is Leader of the Opposition, but that that somehow will stop if he ever becomes Prime Minister, then the Hon. Member is dreaming in technicolour.

The Right Hon. Member for Yellowhead, by his own admission in front of the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee, has absolutely confirmed that his practices as Leader of the Opposition were precisely the same as his practice as Prime Minister. The quotes are here in the report of the committee. I have put them on record. The words of the Right Hon. Member for Yellowhead speak for themselves.

There is no question of privilege involved here. There was no intimidation involved here. There was a collection of documents from the public record to determine where it was that the Leader of the Opposition stood on issues, just as those kinds of documents and that kind of information is collected by the Opposition on Ministers, and certainly the Prime Minister, as he indicated in Question Period earlier today. It is a specious question of privilege that is being raised here. I agree with my colleague, the Hon. Member for Mississauga North (Mr. Fisher) that this has been done today to waste the time of the House so that we could not get on with other matters such as dealing with budgetary issues.

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I listened with some interest to what the Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) had to say because there is one area here that neither he nor any other Member on that side of the House has dared to deal with. The question comes up as a result of what has taken place and what has been revealed in the last few days. It is a question that perhaps the Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre does not understand. It is a question of morality. That is exactly what is involved here.

I want to say, as a person who worked in the Office of a former Prime Minister, that we knew what the rules and regulations were. We knew what it was that staff were able to do. We knew the code of behaviour and ethics that were expected. That is something which the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), his staff and the people who sit behind him, have lost sight of. That is the difference.

Yesterday there was an interesting response to a question from a member of the press. An official in the Prime Minister's Office, David Crenna, said:

● (1550)

I don't know what you consider legitimate PMO behaviour.

That, Mr. Speaker, is really at the heart of all of this. Those people do not know and do not understand what is legitimate behaviour in the Prime Minister's Office. The Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) does not understand what legitimate behaviour is any more; the Prime Minister does not understand that there is such a thing as legitimate behaviour—the things that people can straightforwardly question about and information that can be gathered. But that does not include going into the private personal lives of individuals in this country.

Mr. Evans: You have done it to me.

Miss MacDonald: As you have done. That is exactly what is at stake here, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair has done very little indeed, with all due respect to the Hon. Member.

Miss MacDonald: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. When I said "you", I made a mistake. I meant through you, Mr. Speaker, to the Members on the Liberal benches. I do apologize to you, Sir.

I also want to mention that there is a very real difference between the kinds of materials which I as an individual Member of Parliament have in files being sent around by Cabinet Ministers, stacks of material, and the matter we are discussing. I sometimes wish the stacks were a lot less. It is the paper burden, overburden. But it is there in files. People also write to us. You would be surprised how many people write to me about the Prime Minister. What they have to say about him is not very flattering.

Mr. Fisher: People write to me about you.

Miss MacDonald: Indeed they may. The Hon. Member for Mississauga North (Mr. Fisher) says they may write about me. I agree. That happens to be what people want to do. I do not argue that. That is a very different thing from having that kind of material in a file and going out and making an underhanded search for material that people in the Prime Minister's Office thought they could find in the files in Washington or files about a house in Montreal so they could discredit the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mulroney). That is exactly what they were doing, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Evans: Where was the covert action? What is covert about that?

Miss MacDonald: The question is, why were they out looking for this information? How much more do they have which is hidden somewhere? Not just about the Leader of the Opposition, but about anybody whom they may happen to think they want to get. That is really what this is all about and what the question of privilege is about. There is not a single Member in the House of Commons who has dared to stand and raise a question about the operations of this Government. There is not a single Member now who is outside the thrust of the kinds of operations we have seen emanating from the Prime Minister's Office in the last number of weeks and months, not one. That is what you have to judge, Sir. How far is this kind of operation allowed to go? How far is the abuse of the Prime Minister's Office allowed to extend?

Mr. Fisher: As far as the Library? Tell us about the libraries, Flora.

Miss MacDonald: Let me tell you. Why was Mr. Cadieux told by people in the Prime Minister's Office not to go to the Library of Parliament, where he could have found that information? Because they did not want people within this purview to know that that individual was associated with the Prime Minister's Office. Why this underhanded approach to what was going on?

Mr. Nickerson: It is an underhanded government.

Miss MacDonald: Where are the explanations? That is at the heart of this question of privilege. As long as that sort of operation is able to continue, there is absolutely no guarantee for any Member of Parliament in this House who opposes the Government, or for any individual citizen across the land who is critical of the operations of this Government, that his or her rights and his other personal lives will not be investigated and will not be exposed for nefarious reasons by this Government. It is so bankrupt, Sir, that it will stoop to anything to try to hold on. Every day it digs its grave deeper.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair would like to state that it has heard fairly extensive argument at this point. The matter of privilege is a narrow one that has to be decided by the Chair. The Chair would like to proceed to other business of the House.

PRAIRIE GRAIN ADVANCE PAYMENTS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-218, an Act to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act (spouses).

Some Hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, Section 7(3.2) of this Act discriminates against a productive farm woman who is legally married to a productive farm man. A farm woman who owns land and who has a permit book from the Canadian Wheat Board may, if she is single or living common law, receive prairie grain advance payments provided she has the grain in her bins to cover same. A farm woman in exactly the same category but who is married to a farmer who also has a permit book from the Canadian Wheat Board is denied advance payments. In all cases the bill is paid when the grain is taken to an elevator. This Bill will remove this discrimination against married women in this group. Our legislation should not encourage common law arrangements by granting benefits to a common law spouse which is denied to a legally married spouse when all other factors are the same.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Is there a Source Development Fund administered by Supply and Services Canada and, if so, since April 1, 1981, what amount was spent on (a) product innovation (b) increasing Canadian content (c) front-end development costs?

Mr. Paul-André Massé (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): The Source Development Fund was established in 1981 to help finance incremental costs on government contracts related to the establishment or maintenance of Canadian sources of supply.

(a), (b) and (c) The SDF can assume certain front-end development, product innovation, and increased Canadian content costs. These cost categories are not mutually exclusive since, for example, assisting a firm with front-end or product development also contributes to a higher level of Canadian content. $18 million has been expended from the SDF to date and these moneys are expected to yield $324 million in increased sales, $180 million in exports and the creation of almost 2,900 person years of employment in Canada over the next 10 years.

NUCLEAR NON-PROLIFERATION POLICY

Question No. 402—Mr. Howie:

Does the Government require any country receiving nuclear material from Canada to guarantee that it will not be processed, enriched or otherwise altered in form or content without the prior approval of Canada?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): In our bilateral nuclear co-operation agreements with our nuclear partners, agreements that are required by Canada's 1974 policy, there are provisions that nuclear material transferred from one party to the other shall be enriched beyond 20 per cent U235 or reprocessed only as agreed in writing between the parties. Thus, there is a requirement that any country receiving nuclear material from Canada seek the prior approval of Canada before reprocessing or enriching beyond 20 per cent U235 all Canadian origin nuclear material.

PARTICIPATION IN EXPO 84 IN NEW ORLEANS

Question No. 491—Mr. Howie:

Did the Government allocate any amount for Canadian participation in Expo 84 in New Orleans and, if so, what amount?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, the Government has allocated $5.5 million for Canadian participation at Expo 84 in New Orleans.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The questions enumerated by the Parliamentary Secretary have been answered.

Mr. Evans: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the Government, and the amendment of Mr. Crosbie (page 1445) and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Riis (page 1448).

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Mr. Speaker, budget speeches and Throne Speeches are opportunities for government to reset the course and the direction in which we are travelling. Many of us have felt for some time that we are on the wrong course, travelling in the wrong direction, down a slippery road, and that there is no return.

We have seen the results of philosophical and academic tinkering with our economy. Our national debt has climbed to unacceptable levels. As my colleague, the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), pointed out, the interest burden that the average Canadian will pay will be with us for many years. In fact, the Government will have to go to the same money market that the private sector has to tap and that will make things more difficult for private sector financing.

We have seen inflation and recession, and we have seen crippling interest rates ruin hundreds of thousands of business enterprises and shatter the hopes and dreams of millions of Canadians.

I always approach the period leading up to budget day with anticipation. It is a chance for change, a chance to redress, a chance to restructure. So it was with this Budget. I saw opportunities for the Government to make some changes that could attempt to solve the difficulties facing the 1.5 million unemployed in the country. All those hopes and anticipations were tempered somewhat with information we received from Statistics Canada on January 31 which showed that the recovery appeared to lose some of its vitality in the fourth quarter and that this slowdown would continue early in 1984. The Conference Board of Canada forecast that there were worrisome signs that the recovery may not be as robust as might be expected. The gross domestic product fell by .2 per cent in November and the final demand actually fell by .2 per cent in the third quarter.

From comments reported in newspapers and speeches made by business leaders and others, we see that consumer confidence seems to have fallen in the last quarter. In fact, the survey of the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion, released in December, shows a further reduction in the levels of capital investment by larger firms for 1984.

I read with great interest of the wide consultation the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) had with the business community in the past several months. The Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, the Canadian Organization of Small Business Inc. and numerous other business and commercial associations presented briefs and had conversations with the Minister of Finance and his officials.

I know it is easy to look at the headlines in the financial papers and see that this corporation and that corporation posted record profits. But that is not common throughout industry in general, Mr. Speaker. The business community faces many difficulties. While interest rates have modified to some extent, bank rates are still 6.5 percentage points above the level of inflation. When you compare that to where they were prior to the recession, you find that at that time the prime rate was 3.4 per cent above the level of inflation. While inflation has subsided, the spread between inflation and the prime rate has increased. In fact, when we look at real interest rates we see they are double what they really should be. Many of our financial institutions are very liquid. They have lots of money to lend, but that money is not going to commercial operations. In fact, commercial loans are down substantially.

The real competition for that money is in the residential mortgage field. I think we are all thankful for that. Residential mortgage rates dropped dramatically in the past year. There is no evidence of any increase in commercial loans as far as we can see at this time. There is a reason for this condition, Mr. Speaker. Most of our small and medium-sized businesses are debt financed today, rather than equity financed. They are reluctant to take on any additional long-term debt because of the disastrous interest rate experience they had during the recession. Many companies barely survived.

I know that those who are familiar with the balance sheets and financial statements of business will appreciate that when you look at the balance sheets of these companies you find that they are in a very precarious state. Most companies stripped their earned surplus accounts in order to stay alive during the recession. Many have eaten into their capital accounts and are operating today with very reduced working capital. I believe that is an accurate assessment of the large number of small and medium-sized businesses in the country. That is why commercial loans are down, Mr. Speaker. They are in a delicate condition. They are afraid that if there is a slight bump up in the interest rates, a lot of those companies which survived the recession will not survive a second round. They are hanging on by their fingernails hoping that interest rates will continue to subside. That is one of the things they were looking for and I was looking for in the Budget.

If small and medium-sized businesses are to survive and invigorate themselves and put most of the 1.5 million unemployed to work—the Minister of Finance has said again and again that he is looking to the private sector to help reduce unemployment—that cannot be done if companies have weak balance sheets. It cannot be done if they do not have a working capital with which to go forward, and it cannot be done if there is the slightest chance that interest rates will rise and that the very precarious recovery they have survived is any way in doubt. With the depleted capital account and reduced working capital and debt financing, firms just cannot pick up the slack and hire the unemployed people that the Minister expects.

While the initiatives taken for small business in the Budget will be welcome when they are in place, the structural problem will remain and will discourage the expansion we need to take up the unemployment challenge.

I am most discouraged that the Minister did not move in the matter of capital cost allowance. I think that was a major mistake. I know that the Canadian Manufacturers' Association lobbied very hard for this, and I know from comments I have had from business people across the country that they were all looking for some redress in this matter. The fact that it was not done is of great concern to many people. Those who do not understand how a capital cost allowance works will not understand how badly it has hurt the cash flow of most of the businesses that utilize it. The decision not to redress the capital cost allowance has damaged the cash flow of thousands of businesses. It is the main deterrent to capital investment and is hobbling the expansion of industry.

In the Budget the Minister recognized the importance of productivity and noted the high cost of new productive machinery. Our industries must modernize and they require new productive machinery in order to be competitive in world markets. It is frustrating that although the problem was recognized, nothing really was done. Indeed, the forecast for unemployment shows that it will stay in the double digits for the foreseeable future.

An examination of the Budget documents reveals that the Government's forecast of productivity is that it will decline in the next few years. Everyone knows that we are almost at the bottom of the list on the productivity scale of the OECD.

The other thing that we noticed in the Budget was that there was no plan to reduce the deficit beyond the pious words of the Minister. Those of us who have been here a few years have all heard the Minister stand in his place and say that the deficit is going to go down and that, indeed, the Estimates will be tabled in another couple of weeks. Those Estimates may in fact show that government spending is off, but those are the Main Estimates. As we go down the road, we receive Supplementary Estimates (A), (B), (C) and (D), and by the end of this fiscal year, I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that our spending will probably be as high or higher than it is right now. Therefore, I get the feeling from the performance of the Minister that he sort of casts himself in the role of a Minister of Finance holding back the hordes of irresponsible spenders who would spend untold billions in order to buy favour from the electorate.

We have seen in the House recently some rather sleazy tactics used by an arrogant Government which is trying to raise its profile with the voting public. And I made reference to those special projects which were apparently privy to Liberal Members of Parliament but not to all Hon. Members of Parliament.

I must say, Sir, that I was dismayed and angered by the officials in the Department of Finance who attended the lock-up preceding the Budget address to answer questions which arose as a result of our examination of the Budget document. I will not name the individuals. I would not do that. We agreed not to do that. However, I found, Sir, when they were asked tough, precise questions, they sidestepped them by saying, "Well, that is a policy matter and you will have to discuss that with the Minister". When asked for an explanation of some of the numbers we had just seen in the documents, they waffled on those answers as well. In fact, I asked them how much it would cost to repair and put the capital cost allowance provision back to what it was before it was cut in the previous Finance Minister's Budget. The official just put his hand up in the air and pulled down a figure of $1.2 billion. For months I had asked the former Minister of Finance to supply me with that figure. I did not even receive an acknowledgement of my letters. It was always going to come when I spoke to him, but it never did. When I pursued, with the official of the Department of Finance, the question of where he got that $1.2 billion, what was the back-up data for that, could he verify it in some way, he finally admitted it was just a guess on his part and he had no real date to back it up at all.

I find that quite a disgusting performance under the circumstances. I had the feeling that those officials were there just to slough us off and not really to answer questions at all but just to give us whatever answer they thought we would accept. They knew that we had to leave at a specified time, so it was just an exercise of the clock as far as they were concerned.

The Budget announced a variety of new studies, consultations, and promises of action down the road, and we quite agree with some of them. we think the intitiatives as far as pensions are concerned are good. I wish they could come forward faster than has been promised. However, I believe they are quite good. I was not too impressed with the $50 a month extra which is going to come to senior citizens in two stages, although I know those senior citizens will be glad of it. One can look at that amount in different ways. I heard someone say it was the equivalent of $1 a week. Someone said it was the equivalent of two doughnuts and a coffee. It is not very generous, but I believe, when it is added to the other moneys which those senior citizens receive, it will help some people who really need some assistance.

The Budget announced that we were going to have some assistance for home owners. I would like to spend the last moments of my time in this debate to talk on that particular subject because I did press the matter very hard in the House with the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mrs. Erola) and others. I must say that I welcome what is being done, but I do not feel that the real problem has really been addressed. The Hon. Member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen) and other Hon. Members in the House have pursued that problem very vigorously. We are thankful for what has been done. I am sure that many home owners will be thankful as well. However, there are approximately 750,000 Canadians who are trapped with high interest rate mortgages. That problem has not been addressed in this Budget. Some of those individuals—I know because I have had correspondence with them—have had the ability to renegotiate those mortgages. Some of the mortgage companies have bent the rules and helped them. However, I hope that the Minister, in his negotiations with the mortgage companies, will insist that they address the matter of the individuals who are trapped in those high interest rate mortgages. He should insist, before he gives any concessions whatsoever to them, that this matter be addressed. I believe what was done to many Canadians was disgusting and degrading. I was angered when I saw some of the mortgage documents which were put forth by these companies where, in the mortgage renewal, they wiped aside the actions of the Parliament of Canada and the actions of a provincial legislature, by causing people to waive their rights under the Interest Act of Canada, under the Mortgage Act of Ontario, and under the Mortgage Act of Manitoba. I thought that was a disgusting display of corporate and monetary power.

I hope that when the Minister deals with the mortgage companies, he will say, "Never again are you guys going to act like this and hold people to ransom." Never again should corporate power be used to set aside the decisions of the elected Members of this Parliament or the elected members of a legislature. That was a disgusting display of power and they got away with it. I hope the Minister will take these words to heart and will deal with these companies, and deal with them severely, because there is no way we should give them anything until they agree that they will never take that course of action again.

I say this in particular because in discussing the matter with the officials at the briefing yesterday, I asked them in particular what they meant in their comments about amendments to the Interest Act. One of them told me that the proposal is that the Government is going to amend the Interest Act to remove Section 10 which allows an individual who has had a mortgage for five years to renegotiate that mortgage on the payment of three months' interest. The officials claim that this is the reason why we have short-term mortgages, this is the reason why we do not have 10-year mortgages. I do not know what world they are living in. All they have to do is to travel across the border and see what happened in the United States which has had the same provision for years. There are still 25-year and 30-year mortgages there, and that country still has that provision.

I disagree that we should remove this right from the mortgagors. However, if we are going to remove it, then there has to be a quid pro quo as far as the mortgage companies are concerned. I hope, Sir, that never again will we see in this country the raw corporate power displayed by some of the mortgage and trust companies whereby they ravaged and gutted mortgagors in this country and caused them to lose their homes.

I commend the Government for the action it is taking. However, I believe it should be stronger. But this is a first step and perhaps when the legislation is introduced, we will have an opportunity to speak to it and perhaps we can improve it.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I have a very short comment. The Hon. Member, as usual, has made some strong and careful representations on behalf of people like mortgage holders, and I congratulate him for that. I do not want to take away from that. I would just like to add a single point in correction of something the Hon. Member said. He referred to the Opposition and critics' lock-up yesterday afternoon. I would remind the Hon. Member of two things. First, when he went in there and the public officials arrived, they talked to him under the assumption of confidence. They did not talk to him under the assumption that they would be quoted here in the House of Commons. Just the little trick of not mentioning the individual's name does not quite overcome that. Second, he has drawn the inference that the same officials were political creatures. I would like to correct him. We were dealing with impartial public servants, not people from the Liberal Party or from the Government but impartial public servants who do have to draw a line in their responsibilities between the things they do as public servants and the things he would like to know as an Opposition critic. They have to draw that line and leave it up to the Minister to decide whether to reveal certain information. That is their duty. They have no choice in the matter. The Hon. Member has risen today and left the impression, first, that he was being manipulated for political reasons and, second, that these people are not impartial. I would like to make it clear that both of those points are not correct. Not only that, but I think he damages the general spirit of co-operation by revealing these sorts of things, true or false, from the lock-up, when it is supposed to be confidential.

● (1620)

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, if the Hon. Member will read the record he will find that he is quite wrong. I did not mention the word "political" or "political decisions" or make reference to that in any way, shape or form. I did not mention the officials' names; that was part of the confidence that we agreed to. I did not specifically quote directly things that they had said. I said, Mr. Speaker, I was disappointed in the quality of the information they supplied to us, and that they did not answer questions directly. They pulled figures out of the air and they generally sloughed off hard questions that were put to them. I think that is a fair comment. This is not the first lock-up I have been in, there have been several over the years, and in the past we have had more direct and hard information from the people of the Department of Finance than we had yesterday. I was most disappointed and I was drawing a comparison between previous years and this particular year. I say again that I was disappointed in the quality of information that they passed on to us. They may as well not have been there as far as I was concerned. I do not think anyone who was there really got very much out of it at all.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the Government, and the amendment of Mr. Crosbie (page 1445) and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Riis (page 1448).

Hon. David Smith (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I would like at the outset to thank the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) for presenting this House yesterday with what I believe to be a very optimistic Budget. I call it an optimistic Budget because, first of all, of its evaluation of the Canadian spirit. I call it an optimistic Budget because of the open consultative process that took place in its development, and because it reaffirms the role of this Government in helping those who need help the most. I would also like to thank the Minister of Finance for asking me to be one of the first speakers in this debate. I think he has done that because, quite frankly, my responsibilities as Minister for Small Business are made easier because of this Budget. This Budget, Mr. Speaker, is a good Budget for small business. It recognizes the vital role played by the small business sector in the economic recovery taking place throughout this country.

Small business, Mr. Speaker, is really the lifeblood of the Canadian economy. There are 750,000 small businesses in Canada. They make up 97 per cent of the business firms in this country. They represent 30 per cent of the business sector of the Gross National Product. They represent 42 per cent of the private sector jobs in this country. The people of Canada who own and run small businesses believe in this country. They believe in the economic future of this country because they have invested in it. They believe in the free enterprise system. They believe in initiative, the work ethic, in taking risk, and they believe in enjoying the rewards of hard work. Those are the people who make up the small business sector of this country, and this Government believes in them. Our confidence in that small business sector is well placed because at the moment they are creating about two thirds of the new jobs being created in this country. One of the major objectives of the Minister of Finance's Budget was to create jobs through partnership with the private sector.

I submit that this Budget represents a balanced Budget, balanced in the sense that it represents sound economic planning on the one hand and is socially responsible on the other hand. That is understandable because that is the philosophy of this Government. This is a Government which believes in the free enterprise system and also believes in social justice within it.

Before going into some of the areas which I think benefit the small business sector, I would like to state that, contrary to what some cynics may think, this is not an election Budget, not a Budget based on opinion polls, not an attempt to score political points against an Opposition which is bereft of any ideas of its own. It is a balanced Budget, a reflective Budget, a thoughtful Budget and a responsible Budget. It represents sound economics with a social conscience.

How does that philosophy contrast with the philosophy of the Conservative Party? We look at their critic, the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie). What did he say? He said, "You have to be tough, mean, nasty and do all kinds of unpleasant things. That is why I am not going to outline what these things would be now". Do you believe it? He actually said that. We all know that he believes it, but that he would actually say it is a bit unthinkable. He went on to say that a Conservative Budget at this time would scare Canadians. That is what the official critic for the Conservative Party said. Well, Mr. Speaker, this Government is not out to scare Canadians. It is out to build confidence in the economic recovery we have seen taking place in this country. That is the difference between us and the Official Opposition. Listen to the Hon. Member's words: "You have to be tough, mean and nasty". Well, there is no doubt in my mind that if they were ever in office they would be tough, mean and nasty. They were before, and God help Canadians if they are in there again because that is exactly what they can expect.

Before reviewing some of the provisions of this Budget that I think are of particular benefit to the small business sector, I would like to say a word about the process. The basic theme this Budget process represents is consultation with the private sector, consultation with all elements of the small business sector, business organizations and numerous submissions from private individuals. These submissions have been reviewed, considered by officials and the Minister of Finance, and in some cases they have been accepted. One of the issues on which the Government has received many representations in recent years, and in recent months in particular, has to do with the whole question of the complexity of the tax system. A complex tax system can be time consuming and expensive to deal with. The Minister of Finance responded to that concern. There are specific changes to the tax system which simplify it. I will not go into all the proposals, such as the elimination of the accumulative deduction account, but in addition we have a very thorough paper which has been released called Simplifying Taxes for Small Business which will permit the maximum amount of discussion and consultation with all elements of the Canadian business community. I think it is possible that some fine-tuning may occur and some further changes may take place as a result of that consultative process.

• (1630)

The Canadian Tax Foundation and L'Association Québécoise de Planification Fiscale et Succéssorale played important roles in consultations. They organized a couple of symposiums and conducted an ongoing dialogue with officials of the Minister of Finance. On the whole question of the specific changes with regard to tax simplification, over two-thirds of the amount of legislation relating to the tax rules for small business have been eliminated. That is real progress, Mr. Speaker, which everyone in the House should be pleased with and quite proud of.

The purpose of the further discussions is really twofold. It is, first of all, to solicit non-expert input and to assure a continuity to these changes so that taxpayers themselves can live with them. It is also to allow the Government through this process to discuss these proposals in greater depth before they are implemented. As I said, it is possible that some further changes may take place as a result of those consultations.

There are other general Budget changes which dramatically benefit the small business sector. This Budget is great for small business. These changes include the easing of the tax installment payments. There are 50,000 small businesses and family farm corporations in the country which will benefit from that change. There are the auto standby charge, the administrative improvements in the sales tax, the longer appeal period for tax appeals, the provisions which permit the awarding of costs for legal fees in successful tax litigation cases and still more benefits, and the opportunity for many small businesses in the country which want to take advantage of Third World business opportunities to receive assistance from the $1.3 billion aid trade fund. Another aspect of the Budget which benefits the small business sector is the continuation of the fight against inflation, and the 4 per cent price guideline ceiling.

There are other areas of interest in the Budget which relate to my Cabinet duties. I would like to say a word about tourism. This Budget is good for tourism. The Budget reaffirms the Government's commitment to the Special Recovery Capital Projects Program. More than $1 billion is being spent on these projects. A number of them do relate to the tourist industry and improvements to the tourist industry in the country. A large proportion of businesses in the tourist industry are small businesses. What is good for small business is good for tourism. In the recent Throne Speech, the Government clearly recognized this and announced that a tourism strategy was being developed and would be introduced before too long. The Government recently announced some television campaigns, one to encourage Canadians to vacation in this country, and another one, which will be starting in a couple of months, to encourage Americans to visit Canada. The tourism industry will also be enhanced by these various programs. We also have access in the tourism industry to the new Industrial Regional Development Program which is operated by our Department.

An exciting area of the Budget, Mr. Speaker, is the proposal to encourage employees to participate actively in the economic recovery of the country through stock options and profit sharing. The rationale of this proposal is quite sound. First of all, it provides an incentive for greater productivity. In other words, it gives both management and labour an incentive to increase productivity and profits. It will also improve employer and employee relationships and go a long way to encouraging an entrepreneurial attitude among Canadians.

In my opening remarks I mentioned that this Budget represents a balance. It is balanced, on the one hand, by sound economic planning and, on the other hand, by a commitment to our social responsibilities. The latter is evidenced by the improvements to pensions and the raising of the Guaranteed Income Supplement payments. Both of these policies reaffirm the Government's traditional commitment to living up to our social responsibility.

Another provision which relates to the question of pension security, and is of great interest to the small business sector, has to do with the lifting of the ceilings on the RRSPs. This is very important to many small businessmen who are not part of big pension schemes that are often available to people in large companies or in the public sector. These ceilings have been lifted to $10,000 in 1985 and they will be rising to $15,500 in 1988. This is clearly something from which small business will benefit considerably.

I would like to make a few comments about the improvements to the Government's policies with regard to pensions. Proposed improvements include the splitting of pension benefits upon marriage breakdown, the continuation of survivor benefits on remarriage, and the ensuring of equal pensions for men and women retiring under the same circumstances. I understand that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) will be introducing the appropriate amendments shortly after consultations with the provinces.

Another topic which I welcome is the discussion of a homemaker's pension. It is a priority of the Government that women receive adequate retirement income. These measures will be one way of ensuring that. The proposed changes to improved RRSPs will also greatly increase the flexibility and access to tax assistance for small business persons saving for retirement.

Complementing this focus on women in the home are studies done by the small business secretariat on women's role in the labour force. While the trend of women entering the business world is a relatively recent one, small businesses owned and operated by women are quite large employers, especially of other women. I recently saw statistics which suggested that about 30 per cent of the small businesses in the country are controlled by women, a lot of them in the retail trade. About two-thirds of the women surveyed by the secretariat felt that female business owners do not face problems which are any different from businesses in general. Women wish to be treated as equal members of the business community, and equality of treatment is something which I can assure you is my goal and the goal of the Government.

I am optimistic, Mr. Speaker, that the Finance Minister's emphasis on small business will have the desired spin-off effect and stimulate the overall economy. When you talk of small business, you are talking about all kinds of different enterprise. You are talking about small manufacturers and processors and the construction sub-trades. Of course, the whole home construction industry will greatly benefit from the Mortgage Rate Protection Program which was introduced. We are also talking about tourism operators. There are lots of small hotel operators and restaurateurs who certainly will find many of these provisions relating to small business of great benefit to them. I am optimistic that the great Canadian resource, which we call small business, is receiving the encouragement appropriate to its role in the economy.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to reiterate what I perceive to be the three major themes of the new Budget of the Minister of Finance. They are, first of all, a Budget process which is based on a consultative process with all the sectors of the community, and in particular the private sector, big business, small business and everyone in the business community. Second, there is a thrust to increase productivity and our ability to compete. Third, there is the recognition of the small business sector as the main source of entrepreneurship, risk-taking and job creation. I might also add, Mr. Speaker, that I, other Ministers, and particularly the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. MacLaren), will be continuing an ongoing process of consultation with the business sector, including the small business sector, to further the goals of this Budget.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the Minister of Finance for presenting what I consider to be a sound, responsible, upbeat Budget. It is an optimistic Budget which represents sound economic planning on the one hand with a social conscience on the other hand. It includes programs and initiatives that display in the finest way the role that the Government can play in supporting the economic recovery that we see under way throughout Canada at this time. I might say that I would also like to thank the Minister of Finance for the opportunity to participate in this debate at its outset.

• (1640)

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the speech of the Minister of State for Small Business Mr. Smith in which he pointed out the virtues of small business. I think he indicated accurately that a great deal of the job creation that we hope will occur in this country in the next few years will in fact come from that small business sector. Perhaps it would be even more accurate to say that all of the new jobs created in Canada in the next decade will come through the medium and small business sector.

Mr. John Bullock is President of perhaps the largest small business organization in Canada and the most effective lobbyist on the important issues of the small business community. He is someone who has gained respect from the Minister and the respect of the small business community in general because of his grasp of the reality of that particular sector. How does the Minister interpret a comment Mr. Bullock made last night in his response to the Budget when he indicated that this Budget will not result in any new job creation in the small business sector? He indicated that he was pleased with a number of housekeeping changes that had been made for which the small business community had been lobbying for a number of years. The Minister went to some length to explain what some of these improvements were.

In terms of job creation, the most powerful small business lobby in Canada has stated that the Budget will result in no new jobs being created in the small business sector. How does the Minister respond to that comment?

Mr. Smith: Mr. Speaker, sometimes I agree with Mr. Bullock and sometimes I do not. Mr. Bullock made a number of comments last night, not all of which were recorded. Some of them were supportive of the measures in the Budget and some were not.

I happen to have a different opinion. I believe the Budget is responsible. By making it easier for the small business community to operate in a number of ways, it will inevitably result in jobs being created.

If one looks at the reaction to the Budget by business leaders as a whole, it is quite positive. As a matter of fact, there are a number of officials in Mr. Bullock's organization, the Federation of Independent Business, who commented on the Budget. If I might use a word that is sometimes used by the other side of the House, if one looks at the totality of their comments, on balance they are quite positive and supportive.

Mr. Riis: Would the Minister comment on the $1,000 that the Government will now refund to a small business that successfully appeals a tax decision as a way of compensating the cost? He knows that the average cost incurred by a small business in this country when it appeals a tax decision averages between $2,000 and $4,000. Why would the Government not refund the legitimate costs of small businesses when the small businesses in these cases have been proven to be honest and straightforward but it was the Government that had erred? Rather than the $1,000, why not reimburse what we know is a more realistic cost?

Mr. Smith: Mr. Speaker, there are many things we would like to do that I suppose would be popular, but we must look at all these matters from the perspective of the Government's ability to afford them. I suggest that changing the rules to permit the courts to award costs of up to $1,000 is a good start. I think it is one that should be applauded and welcomed.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister with respect to small business. In the area that I represent, the Federal Business Development Bank has taken on the name among all the small businesses in that community of the "Federal Business Destruction Bank".

There are some extremely serious problems with respect to small business getting involved in recovery. The bank has refused to refinance loans which would bring them down from interest rates that are as high as 21 per cent. It is only talking about bringing refinancing down to 14 per cent or 16 per cent, and it is only willing to do so by imposing a substantial penalty, even though it is prepared to add it on to the interest rate. This is causing some extremely serious problems for small businesses in the area that I represent, and I assume right across the country.

There is a group of small businessmen in that community who are forming a committee to become involved in a fight against the Federal Business Development Bank. Can the Minister tell me and others what action he will take to make that Federal Business Development Bank more responsive to the needs of small businesses over a period of time in order to help them back on the road to recovery? Is he prepared to fight for the same results that the Minister of Finance talked about in aiding home owners to refinance? What will he do about the Government's bank that is harming business so badly?

Mr. Smith: Mr. Speaker, I think the bank is doing exactly that. There are 85 branches of the bank throughout Canada. To a large extent they represent a lender of last resort.

However, the bank is still dealing with public funds and must do so in a responsible manner. It cannot give out loans on the basis of political considerations. It has to give them on the basis of banking considerations.

No one is forced to take a loan from the Federal Business Development Bank. When someone takes a loan from any bank, it is a contract. At the time the bank issues those funds, it must secure those funds and it does so at a certain interest rate. It seems to me to be an unreasonable request to the bank to say that it would then have to suffer the loss for refinancing.

I might say that the FBDB had losses in the last fiscal year of approximately $80 million. I do not think anyone could suggest for one second that the FBDB has not been taking its part of the responsibility in providing financing to a number of firms that are unable to go anywhere else in the country. That does not mean that we just abandon all banking principles and give money away.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, first I would like to congratulate the Hon. Member on his elevation to the Cabinet. I have felt for some time that the federal Department of Tourism has not had a sufficiently high profile. Tourism is a tremendous industry in this country and many people do not realize its importance.

Does the Hon. Minister have any funds with which he can help build unique attractions that will bring people to the country? These funds could be given either on a loan or a grant basis. I am not talking about ordinary projects but about something that is unique in the country. Is there such a federal fund for that and, if not, what is the primary function of the federal Department of Tourism?

Mr. Smith: Mr. Speaker, the primary function of Tourism Canada is to encourage tourism in this country. Of course, we do not try to favour one area of the country over another. We encourage Canadians to vacation in Canada and try to give equal coverage to all areas of the country that represent tourist destinations.

We also do a lot of advertising outside of Canada. In April we will launch a major television campaign in the northern tier of the United States, aimed at encouraging tourists to this country.

I welcome the Hon. Member's interest in tourism. I might say that the Industrial Regional Development Program, which is administered by the Minister for Regional Industrial Expansion (Mr. Lumley), does provide some assistance to the establishment of what may be tourist related proposals. If the Hon. Member wants me to provide him with more information or to set up a meeting with interested parties who have some ideas, I would be happy to do that with the appropriate officials.

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the new young Cabinet Minister. It concerns small business. It is a question about a group of people whom I consider to be some of the most important small business people we have, those in the business of food production. I am aware that the Government has made some provision in the area of capital gains, but I consider its efforts to be rather insignificant.

• (1650)

Bearing in mind that valuation day was established in 1971, how can this Government or any government continue to take the view that in fact it has the legitimate right to calculate gain as gain when in fact it takes inflation from 1971 to whenever the calculation is made and calls it gain? Any child in grade five knows that the Government is really causing double taxation and therefore putting small business persons, be they farmers or otherwise, into a very difficult and unfair situation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The question having been put, the House may agree to allow the Hon. Minister to respond.

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think the question is essentially rhetorical in nature and more in the form of debate. I take it as a representation. However, the one point with which I would disagree is that I do not happen to think that a provision which allows a farmer to put $120,000 into an RRSP on the sale of his farm is insignificant. I do not think most average Canadians would think it is insignificant. It is a very thoughtful and positive response to what has been a legitimate problem. Certainly it is a move in the right direction and a responsible one.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Would it be possible to seek unanimous consent of the House to extend the questioning for a period which the Chair might deem appropriate, since there is much interest in the Minister's answers? Is it possible to seek the consent of the House to extend this question period slightly?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Of course the Chair abides by the rules. I will put that question to the House. Is it agreed?

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. Regrettably, as the Hon. Member knows, there is no way of turning this off once it gets turned on. We have a list of people who would like to speak. Although I know the Minister would like to answer some more questions, I cannot give that consent.

Mr. Mayer: Just another ten minutes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: As there is not unanimous consent, the House will now proceed with debate.

Mr. Manly: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I ask the House to seek unanimous consent for ten further minutes in which to ask questions.

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, I would just like to note that the Government Member is quite correct that once we get them turned on, we cannot get them turned off. I want to support the Hon. Member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands (Mr. Manly) in his very reasonable request for a further ten minutes. Government Members should not have any fear of that reasonable request.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, on the surface of it, it appears to be a reasonable request. However, I would suggest to Hon. Members that if they really are sincere about this sort of thing, they would be well advised to tell their colleagues, the Hon. Member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) and the Hon. Member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), not to waste so much time right after Question Period with specious questions of privilege. I think we need to get on with the list of speakers. I have several people on my side who would like to speak, if they do not.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I gather there is not unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fisher: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

[Translation]

Debate. The Hon. Member for Joliette.

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I certainly had no objection to allowing ten minutes more. I realize that a number of Members would have liked to put some pertinent questions to the Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism). Well, Standing Orders are Standing Orders!

Mr. Speaker, I have some comments on the Budget. In fact, this morning, in the newspapers, the Budget was hardly as popular as the news that Gaétan Boucher won this major international event. You will understand that Canadians were very interested in this major win and were more excited about a Canadian winning than about the Budget, considering the bill we got yesterday from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde). Mr. Speaker, I was listening earlier to the Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism) and I do not doubt his good faith and his plans to increase co-operation with the private sector. He was expressing his Government's faith in the private sector in this respect. Even the provinces, perhaps! However, Mr. Speaker, I am astounded that the Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism) should fail to realize that the Minister of Finance, who produced this pile of information, measures and proposals in the House yesterday, has been behaving for at least ten years with incredible arrogance. Considering his forecasts for the energy and financial sectors, I would say not only arrogance but also unprecedented incompetence. And now they are talking about restoring a climate of confidence! I wonder they even dare to talk about restoring a climate of confidence, when over the last eighteen months, and I am positive about this and I have the polls to prove it, Mr. Speaker, this Government has lost the confidence of the general public. Just over 30 per cent, on average, over the last 18 months! This proves Canadians no longer have confidence in this Government. Of course this Government will always say it won a majority in 1980, but during the last eighteen months, the Government knows it lost the confidence of the general public, and it is trying to act as though it had the public's support, and the Minister of Finance is talking with a kind of optimism that reeks of hypocrisy, since he knows perfectly well he no longer has the confidence of the general public and will be unable to restore that confidence with the Budget he brought down yesterday afternoon. Mr. Speaker, for your information, just to prove to what extent the Minister of Finance has lost the confidence of the general public, there are certain people in the business world who told me as a joke: Listen here, La Salle, when you form the Government in a few months, remember to give the Minister of Finance the post he would like to have, which is President of the Canada Post Corporation. Then he could read the mail of all Canadians without any problems. Mr. Speaker, you see the kind of joke the credibility of the Minister of Finance has become, a credibility that has hit its lowest level. Mr. Speaker, it is clear that in this Budget, some measures are more significant than others. There is some good news, since the Government finally decided to increase benefits for the elderly and single persons, so they can meet their financial obligations. Well, Mr. Speaker, on this side of the House we have realized for a long time that this need existed. The Government seems to be willing to do something about it. Considering the measures the Government proposed yesterday, and unless I am mistaken there are only one or two that could be put into effect before January 1, 1985. Mr. Speaker, as you and I are aware, the likelihood that there will be a general election before January 1, 1985 is considerable. So, in his hypocrisy, the Prime Minister goes on and gives us a scenario he will probably not be responsible for putting into effect. Mr. Speaker, I suppose there is also reason to rejoice that they finally realized what a problem the Revenue Canada tax forms were for small and medium-sized businesses. It seems the Government has finally decided to change and improve the tax forms for small and medium-sized businesses, but I hope nobody will assume, Mr. Speaker, that this is going to create thousands of jobs. It will help small and medium-sized businesses in that the forms will be easier to understand and much easier to complete. So, of course, we are pleased with this change.

There is also a reference to assistance to farmers. It is perfectly obvious, Mr. Speaker, that before even considering legislation that would help farmers give up for and benefit from a pension, they would first have to start making money and have some kind of security. Perhaps they should have considered appropriate measures for stimulating recovery in the agricultural sector. The survival of agriculture is a very important issue, and it is one the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) has failed to address. It is therefore clear that the Budget's proposals with respect to farmers are quite inadequate, and it is also clear that the Minister has decided against considering a single aspect of a major problem today, which is financing. Many farmers are still faced with the exorbitant mortgage rates that prevailed a few years ago, and unemployment is also a problem. I see no specific measures in the Budget aimed at helping those farmers—and every Member of this House is aware of the situation—at saving them from bankruptcy and giving them the security they need to improve their circumstances, and at improving the state of the agricultural sector in this country.

Mr. Speaker, the Budget also proposes to provide some kind of insurance for mortgage rates. Details are not available yet, and the Minister indicated that program criteria will be announced within a month. There is indeed a pressing need, Mr. Speaker, for a measure of security and stability, and the Minister of Finance was not saying anything new when he mentioned this in the Budget yesterday. For many years and many months we have been urging the Government to take action in this particular area and to strengthen the construction industry, which is a vital part of our economy.

And then, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance spoke very eloquently about helping unemployed young people. The new Minister of State for Youth did admit recently that young Canadians are driven to despair, that we are in the process of wasting a whole generation, and she said that quite simply as she was assuming her new responsibilities as Minister. Well now, Mr. Speaker, for the past 15 years this Government was supposed to look after youth, it was supposed to create jobs, something which would have given those young people a much brighter outlook on life than the one they have now.

It would seem that the Government has just realized that between 400,000 and 500,000 young Canadians are now seeking employment and going through a desperate crisis, so the Minister, of course, starts throwing millions of dollars at the problem, $150 million more! But, Mr. Speaker, suppose all that money is spent or earmarked for programs such as we had before, programs which at best would mean jobs for 15 to 20 per cent of young people for periods ranging from 20 to 26 weeks. Perhaps the lucky ones will indeed work for 52 weeks. But at the end of the programs those young people will have to draw unemployment insurance benefits, just as they have been doing now for the past four or five years. Let us be honest, Mr. Speaker, those programs are practically just another name for social welfare. Young people are hired to work on projects which hopefully are worthwhile—but not necessarily so, as you know—and then they go back to unemployment insurance. How can such an attitude on the part of the Government build up the confidence of Canadians? How can the country possibly get back on the road to prosperity with temporary programs offering temporary employment? And the Minister proudly claims that the Canadian Government created 400,000 new jobs last year. Never did he say how many of those jobs were temporary. Thousands of those 400,000 jobs lasted for 20 or 26 weeks, then it was the unemployment line again. A good many people do not even figure in the statistics because they have no jobs and their unemployment benefits are exhausted. The answer to that, of course, is provincial social welfare. How easy it is to fool young people by telling them that we now have a Minister of State for Youth who will look after them. It would seem that there was no need for that over the past 15 years, but now we do have a Department of Youth and we will solve the problem which has been there all along. No way, Mr. Speaker! Young people are not that stupid! They should not be likened to children who have no idea about the responsibilities of Government. This budget fails to meet the aspirations of young Canadians and will do nothing to create jobs.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to underline the fact that the Minister admitted recently that he had been unable to spend the millions of dollars set aside to create jobs in his 1983 budget and that there still remained between $300 million and $400 million to be spent. Naturally, he has to reallocate this money in his new Budget. However, how can he explain the fact that, with respect to the exercise in co-operation or co-ordination with the provinces which he so often mentions, the Government has not yet succeeded in coming to the necessary agreement, not even with my own Province of Quebec? Mr. Speaker, you are aware of the incredible number of jobs lost in Quebec, and I am also aware of the fact that no agreement has been reached yet, and that the necessary efforts have not been made to fulfill the needs of the 1,250 Quebec municipalities which are hoping that an agreement will be signed by the federal and the Quebec Governments. According to my information, and it comes from a good source, this question has now been before the Cabinet for the past few weeks. Yet, the Ministers are themselves from Quebec and there are also well over six dozens of Members of Parliament. All these ministers from Quebec have not seen fit to settle this matter once and for all so that municipal projects which would generate employment may go ahead.

Mr. Speaker, there is one point on which the Minister of Finance is not saying the whole truth, not to say that he is lying to the House. He is not saying the whole truth when he talks about his efforts to create jobs. An agreement could have been signed many months ago; this would have satisfied the municipalities and prevented the Quebec Government from threatening municipalities with penalties because the federal Government wanted to give them grants directly. Co-ordination, co-operation and true respect for federalism imply the respect of provincial jurisdictions. What the Minister of Finance is not saying is that he does not believe in this concept and that the Government does not want to believe in it either, Mr. Speaker! During this Budget debate, I urge the Minister of Finance to realize the importance of signing this agreement on behalf of the 1,250 municipalities which are waiting and hoping that the federal Government will finally set aside its partisan motives and accept to sign an agreement with Quebec, so that these municipalities may receive the federal funds to which they are entitled. The Liberal Members from Quebec, and I as a Conservative Member from Quebec, would applaud such an agreement and we would be able to tell the people of Quebec that the taxes that they pay to Ottawa are being redistributed fairly.

On this issue, Mr. Speaker, I must say that the Government has shown a lack of good faith and has not done what was necessary to come to an agreement on a matter as urgent and as important as this one for Quebec. Of course, the Government would rather do what it has been doing these last few months. It would rather use these $250 million allocated to Quebec for something else and launch various projects without providing sufficient information to the Opposition! Mr. Speaker, such a method comes close to corruption. It is unacceptable! The Government would have done better to sign an agreement with Quebec. Of course, the Liberal Members from Quebec were embarrassed when they heard the mayors of certain municipalities and people in Quebec tell them: "Why is it that we cannot benefit from the amounts allocated by the federal Government?" This is why this Government has decided to implement a program which allowed them to allocate certain amounts to Quebec for projects which were most often submitted by party supporters, and at the same time to increase their popularity in Quebec! Indeed, in Quebec like elsewhere in the country, this Government is running short of popular support.

Mr. Speaker, these are some of the comments that we must make in this House.

I pray and urge the Quebec Liberal ministers and caucus members to conclude this agreement without delay; should they refuse next Tuesday—I know they have to deal with this issue at their next Cabinet meeting—there are a number of Quebec Liberal members who are quite unhappy about this absence of agreement, and my information comes from very reliable sources, Mr. Speaker.

Also, the Minister of Finance referred to the coherent stability of his economic policies! How can he expect the business community to take him seriously when he does not seriously raise in his budget the possibility of increasing the amounts allocated to research and development. Mr. Speaker, businessmen and ordinary citizens in Canada are aware that high technology is the key to streamlining our industry, increasing our productivity, reshaping our industry to protect our traditional jobs and create new ones. No increase in the funds allocated to research and development, Mr. Speaker! This is quite revealing! This should be the essential element of any economic policy. How can the Government expect to convince Canadians to devote more money to advanced research, something we need if we want to plan rationally our development on the basis of our needs.

That the Minister of Finance should present this document without first of all using research as the foundation and providing funds for advanced technology is unthinkable. We are well aware that our industries could benefit from export markets if they had the advanced technology they need. In addition, more research could enable union members to understand better the importance of productivity if they want their industry to compete on world markets. Witholding the funds needed for increased research and development is tantamount to ruling out the economic recovery, however urgent it may be.

We talk about better co-operation with the private sector. The Minister of Finance lost all credibility when as Minister of Energy he fought fiercely against the private sector and yet today he is making a desperate appeal to businessmen begging them to take part in that economic recovery. With a rare sense of optimism, he is now referring to economic growth. Mr. Speaker, we are aware of the present conditions. We know that the economic recession was quite painful and I do not agree with the Minister of Finance that we are now on the road to recovery. The Minister cannot obtain the co-operation of the private sector as a result of his recent beahaviour. Mr. Speaker, I heard a while ago and I am now coming to the end of my comments, I heard the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce suggest that a Conservative budget would frighten Canadians. I can tell him right now that thousands of Canadians are asking for a general election to condemn, and rightly so, a government which has so badly failed in all areas.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): A ten-minute period is allowed for questions and comments. The Hon. Member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly).

• (1710)

[English]

Mr. Skelly: I have a comment on the previous Member's speech. I know how reluctant his Party is to put forward any position on any subject affecting Canadians. On the question of small business, the Budget contained a statement that competition legislation is going to be introduced. Why is the Conservative Party opposed to legislation that would protect small businesses from the predatory activities of large businesses? I will give just one example so he can develop it further. The multinational oil companies, the foreign-owned conglomerates, friends of the Conservative Party, have targeted and conducted some fairly serious activities against small independent oil companies in Canada which are providing competition, a choice for Canadians and, holding prices in line—

Mr. Malone: Have the guts to lay the charge.

Mr. Skelly: Yet what we have is a Party which has gone on record as opposing the kind of legislation that would protect small businesses. Could the Hon. Member explain why this Party is against small business from the point of view of competition legislation?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): The Hon. Member for Joliette (Mr. LaSalle). Order, please. Could we hear what the Hon. Member has to say in reply?

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I heard someone make a reference to the horse's ass. Would the Chair accept the comment that the horse's ass in this Parliament is the Conservative Party because it has failed to put forward positions to protect small business?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order, please. I am sure the Hon. Member realizes this is not the type of language that should be used in this House.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I suggest the Hon. Member who put the question was absolutely wrong in implying we were not ready to help small and medium businesses. We would give them the same advantages as to all other Canadian businesses. And while small and medium businessmen will appreciate the improved income tax forms, I think this is a good thing but it is not enough. There are tax measures in favour of small and medium businesses we already supported, but what is needed to assist them is finding new markets, conducting better market research abroad, and providing services to increase productivity. For a long time, we have relied on official, theoretical studies done by consultants. I feel the time has come to provide small and medium businesses with in-depth studies to increase their productivity, and competitiveness and lessen their dependence on government grants for survival.

Briefly, we would help the small and medium business sector by showing them how to catch their own fish instead of giving them any.

So much for research. As I said, research subsidies are inadequate. There is no reference to that in the budget, but with additional subsidies, invaluable services could be afforded to the small and medium business sector. We do not want our small and medium businesses run by the State. We want to help them identify markets through the provision of services and even foreign market research. And this is not aimed at multinational corporations only. We are committed to a kind of regional development involving an increasing number of small and medium businesses, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, although the Hon. Member did not deal with the question which involves the protection of small business in the country, I would like to raise another question. On the matter of the multinational friends of the Conservative Party, I would refer the Hon. Member to his Leader's own speeches in which he said that the Conservative Party will facilitate the entry into Canada of foreign companies and foreign investment. Let me use another example to show where his Party is right off track with small business. Into this country have come a number of waste disposal companies, welcomed in with the foreign investment crowd. What they have done is driven the small Canadian companies out of business with their practices.

Mr. Malone: Name one.

Mr. Skelly: I will. There is no competition legislation that is effective in Canada to protect Canadian small businesses from the deep pockets and the predatory practices of those foreign companies. Greater Vancouver is riddled with this problem. People are crying for assistance. The Conservative Party is quite willing to see those small Canadian businesses go down the drain as a result of the unfortunate practices of the foreign-owned corporations in the country. What is that Party prepared to do to control foreign investment so that small Canadian businesses are not driven out?

• (1720)

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, let me say in all humility that I have never claimed to be able to answer all questions that are put to me in this House. Contrary, to others, I know my limits, thank God!

However, when the Hon. Member implies that the Progressive Conservative Party is against small and medium size businesses, I regret to tell him, with all due respect, that it is obviously incorrect. We want to protect them. We want to give them every opportunity to survive. Of course, my colleague and myself do not share the same philosophy. I would never want to support businesses which are unprofitable for all practical purposes. However, I want our party and the government, any government, to provide such businesses every possible opportunity to survive and expand, and our party completely agrees with that. That is our position. I would add that if we succeed in providing these opportunities to our small and medium size businesses, to Canadian businesses, we will have greatly reduced the impact of foreign products. Because we must be competitive. And I don't want to hear about locking us up into full-scale protectionism. We must keep some ties with the outside world. On the other hand, I admit and I realize that it is important as well to provide a minimum of protection for Canadian trade, but within reasonable limits. The question is to determine what is reasonable and unreasonable.

[English]

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I always find it amusing to hear the socialist from Powell River talk about competition. Nationalism and competition do not go together.

I have a question for the Hon. Member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle). I enjoyed what he said about research and development. It reminded me of an excellent engineer, the Dean of Engineering at the University of Alberta, Dr. Bob Hardy. When I was with the Department of Highways in Alberta, he suggested that if we spent 1 per cent of our budget on research, it would bring back tremendous dividends. We adopted his suggestion and over a ten-year period found that we not only got better value for every dollar but also had better structures and better public works. I agree with what the Hon. Member said about research and development.

Are there areas in his particular riding where research and development might bring in more jobs or give better value for every public dollar spent? That is also important.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Indeed, Mr. Speaker, each and every region of Canada would stand to gain a lot more than is the case now if we were getting a better value for our dollars by investing more in research and development. In my riding—and this goes for any riding in Canada—it is obvious that we have to spend more money on research and development, because that will eventually enable us to carry out projects which meet the specific needs of the region.

[English]

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, it is always a pleasure for me to join in the debate on the Budget. After a good deal of examination of the documents yesterday when I was privileged to attend the lock-up with Hon. Members from both sides of the House, I became quite enthused about the policies it set out.

We all realize that the federal deficit is very large and is constraining the Government's ability to move. There was no room for the Government to expand expenditures in a major way. Neither was there the option of greatly reducing the deficit at this time because of the fragility of the recovery and the need to move into an expansion phase that would ensure that we do not damage the recovery that is under way and which promises to increase employment and put Canada back on the rails again.

I was very interested to hear the Minister's speech and to hear about these programs. I will deal with them later. I was also interested to know how the Opposition would attack the Budget. It contained measures for small business, for pension reform, a program for mortgage insurance, programs that made sense, tax simplification for small business—all of those made sense and were done with consultation and with the provision for further consultation. It seemed to me that it was going to be difficult for the Opposition to attack these measures.

When the Opposition finance critic entered the debate last night and again this morning, we did not hear any discussion of the substance of the provisions in the Budget. For 90 minutes the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) talked about one thing—the deficit. He talked about the deficit from every angle that the mind could imagine. It was the subject of a 90-minute discourse by the Hon. Member for St. John's West. There was nothing in his speech about the provisions of the Budget or on the factors which gave rise to the deficit; there was simply a diatribe about all the ills that would befall Canada if the deficit were not dealt with.

There was nothing about what the Conservative Party would do if it were in power or would have done had it been in power during the same period. We should recall—and the Hon. Member for St. John's West raised this in his speech because he knew that we would raise it—that last year when he spoke about the April Budget of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde), he was asked what he would do in the circumstances that faced the country then. His response at that time, which he admitted this morning, was that the Minister had taken a responsible position, that it was the right Budget for the time and that basically he would do the same thing. That is what he said last April. What dramatic changes have occurred since then? Last night the Minister of Finance brought forward an extremely responsible Budget, given the conditions that face the country.

In the last year and a half we have been in the midst of a major world recession. This recession hit every industrialized country in the world and hit the less developed countries the hardest. It was the worst world-wide recession since the 1930s. That is the reason for the deficit that we face now. That is the logic of it.

The question then arises, if the deficit is far beyond what a Conservative government would have allowed, how would it have achieved that? I expected to hear the Hon. Member for St. John's West deal with that issue. For example, would the Conservatives have cut unemployment insurance benefits? Would they have cut pensions like Old Age Security, the Guaranteed Income Supplement and the Canada Pension Plan? Would they have cut other social expenditures?

I remember that when we brought in the six and five program, the Opposition did not support us. They claimed that it was unfair to make the cuts or impose the restraints, yet now they tell us that they would have reduced the deficit dramatically.

That does not wash, Mr. Speaker. Would they have cut defence expenditures? Would they have cut economic development expenditures during a recession when industry was on its knees and needed the assistance the federal Government could provide? Would that Party have cut job creation? I know it did in 1979 when it came to power. But during the middle of a recession when jobs were being lost by the thousands, would that Party have cut federal assistance for job creation? I do not think so, Mr. Speaker. Faced with the reality of power, of being the managers in a time of serious economic recession, I do not believe that any responsible Party would have made those kinds of moves, which would have led to a much larger deficit than the one we are seeing right now. I certainly hope no Party in this Canadian federal scene would have done that.

• (1730)

However, the question does come up as to what that Party would have done differently, and what would it do that is different from what we are doing? I believe the people of Canada are starting to ask that question more and more. They are not very happy with the answer which keeps coming back because, Mr. Speaker, of what we are hearing. The Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) told us last year that if he were faced with the same situation as the Minister of Finance, he would do basically the same thing. Yet here in the House he says, "We would reduce that deficit." That was all he talked about during his whole criticism—ninety minutes on the deficit.

What about the future? The Hon. Member for St. John's West has told us a great deal. First, a few months ago he was asked what the Conservative Party would do. He said in essence, "If I told you, we would never be elected". In other words, if the Conservatives told the people of Canada what they would do, they would never be elected. And, Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for St. John's West did it again last night. I quote the following from the Ottawa Citizen of February 16:

> Mulroney said the $31.5-billion deficit indicates the Liberal government is on the verge of bankruptcy and what Canadians really need is a new government.
> However, Tory finance critic John Crosbie conceded that the government action needed to slash the deficit would scare most Canadians.

The article goes on to say:

> "You have to be mean, nasty and do all sorts of unpleasant things," Crosbie said outside the Commons when asked what a Conservative government would do. "That's why I'm not going to outline what they would be now."

In other words, the Tories have a little plan. I mentioned in this House before that these Tories have a little list. They admit to a list of 3,500 names of individuals in the bureaucracy whom they are going to sack, so to speak, and I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that that list is probably a lot longer. Not only do they have a little list, they have a little plan, and that little plan, to quote the Hon. Member for St. John's West, would be, "mean, nasty and do all sorts of unpleasant things". That is the little plan, Mr. Speaker. I believe all we have to do is to go through the expenditures put forward in the Budget, the expenditure envelopes, and we would find out what that little plan entails. We have heard a few things which the Opposition Members said they would do. They would increase defence spending. They would increase transfers to the provinces for medicare. They would reduce taxes, which would reduce revenues, of course.

If one looks through the economic envelopes, Mr. Speaker, what are the Government's expenditures? Next year, $11.2 billion will be expended by this federal Government for economic development; $4 billion for energy development, new energy resources; $2 billion for legal affairs and justice in the country; $4.2 billion for servicing of roads and harbours and all of the things which come under the rubric of service to Government, buildings, national monuments, national parks, all these things which are the responsibility of the federal Government in the form of infrastructure. There will be $192 million for Parliament. If you eliminated Parliament, it would not get you very much. On defence, $8.7 billion, will be expended. External Affairs and aid, $2.7 billion. Would there be a cut in external affairs and aid? Fiscal arrangements, $5.9 billion, that is equalization. I do not believe a Conservative Government would cut equalization to the provinces, but perhaps it would. Public debt charges, $20.4 billion. All of those areas, Mr. Speaker, could possibly be reduced by a government which was intending to be "mean, nasty and do all sorts of unpleasant things". The big one, however, in here, Mr. Speaker, is Social Affairs, $39.7 billion. I have the little thought in my mind, Mr. Speaker, and other Hon. Members are beginning to come to the same conclusion, that that is where the little plan is to be found, in the social affairs envelope. If the deficit is going to be reduced, social affairs is what that Party would go after. We proved, Mr. Speaker, during the recession, and we are proving in the Budget which came down, that that is not something which this Government will do. This Government will fight against reducing the money for social affairs.

We have heard a great deal about the deficit. I quote from the Montreal Gazette of February 16 where the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mulroney) is quoted as saying:

> "There's nothing in this budget that deals with the fundamentals, namely an overwhelming deficit that is going to inhibit economic recovery," Mulroney told reports.
> The Tory leader said there was "a degree of profligancy in government spending that is without precedent in any western industrialized nation."

Those are direct quotes from the Leader of the Opposition last night. Let us take a good look at this deficit, Mr. Speaker, a good hard look, because the fear is being put into the minds and hearts of Canadians that this deficit is going to destroy the nation, that it is going to bring us down. If we take the deficit in perspective, it seems to me, and I believe to most Canadians, that there used to be a time—and I suppose I show my age by remembering that time—when you could buy an automobile for $2,500. In fact, if I go back to my very early years, I can remember the days when you could buy an automobile for about $1,200. Today it costs $12,000. A person who bought a $1,200 car perhaps had to borrow $800. A person who buys a $12,000 car today might have to borrow $10,000 or $11,000. That is a huge increase in the notion of debt. However, at the same time incomes have gone up, Mr. Speaker. People can afford to service a larger debt. It seems to me that the notion of income, how rich we are, should have some bearing on how much debt we can afford to carry.

Let us look at the net public debt—that is the figure of which the Hon. Member for St. John's West was talking—as it relates to total personal income, the income of all Canadians in the country. In the 1983-84 period when we hit the worst of the recession, that ratio was 45.1 per cent. In other words, net public debt was 45 per cent of total personal income. That is the entire debt, not the deficit. The deficit is what you run up in one year. The debt is the cumulative total of all the previous deficits in history. That is a big number, 45 per cent, because in the period from 1971 to 1982, the ratio ranged between 19 per cent and 33 per cent, basically. Now it is up to 45 per cent, and that is because of the big recession and the run-up of the current years' deficit and the effect it has had.

Let us go back historically, Mr. Speaker. This is supposed to be, according to the Leader of the Opposition, the worst situation which has ever existed. In 1946-47, the net public debt as a percentage of personal income was 132 per cent. In other words, the debt was a third larger than the total personal income. We should look through the period of time which we could call the Conservative halcyon days. I am talking about the time of the Diefenbaker Government, the period from 1957 to 1963. Let us look at the net public debt as a percentage of personal income during these halcyon days of conservatism when wealth and jobs were being created. We all agree the country was booming. We all agree the 1960s was a boom period for Canada. What were those figures? Remember, Mr. Speaker, that this year it is 45 per cent. Well, I'll be darned. In 1957-58 the ratio was 48.7 per cent; in 1958-59 it was 49.5 per cent; then 48.6 per cent, 47.2 per cent, 49.1 per cent, 47.3 per cent, and 47.8 per cent. This was all during the Diefenbaker period, the halcyon days of the Conservatives. The ratio of net public debt to personal income was higher during that entire period than it is right now when we are coming out of the worst recession the western world has known in the last 50 years. Those were the halcyon days. We were making great strides in personal income. But what happened to the debt, Mr. Speaker? Amazing, is it not? All during the 1960s the net public debt as a percentage of personal income was higher for every year than it is right now. The Hon. Member for St. John's West rails at the Government: "Oh, my gosh, we are going down the sewer". Well, we did not go down the sewer in the 1960s. The country did quite nicely.

I suggest the reason this net debt position is where it is right now is that this Government took the action necessary to protect Canadians during the worst recession we have seen in 50 years. Can you imagine what would have happened to Canadians, what it would have been like in this country over the last year and a half, or what it would be like right now if we had not taken the action we have? There would be chaos in the streets, Mr. Speaker. This Government supported the social programs it put in place over the years, and we continue to do so in this Budget.

We are now making structural changes to those programs to improve pensions, improve the environment for small business, because we believe that is where the jobs will be created in the future. We are making it easier for people to form and run small businesses and be successful. That will generate the jobs, Mr. Speaker, and this Budget moved very strongly in that direction. It is going to reduce the tax statutes applying to small business by two thirds. If you have three inches of tax statutes now, you are going to wind up, with these measures in place, with one inch.

Mr. Mayer: I will believe it when I see it.

Mr. Evans: I think we should probably get down to the point where they are a quarter of an inch. I and some of my colleagues on both sides will continue to work together to see if we cannot get it down to a quarter of an inch from three inches. That would certainly be a boon. The Minister of Finance has moved dramatically in that direction.

Let us look at another set of figures. The Leader of the Opposition has said that there is a degree of profligacy in Government spending without precedent in any western industrialized nation. What would that be, Mr. Speaker? Let us say federal expenditures as a percentage of the GNP are now 9.2 per cent.

May I have unanimous consent to have one more minute to complete my remarks, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Is there unanimous consent for the Hon. Member to extend his remarks?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Evans: I would like to thank my colleagues, Mr. Speaker. I was saying that federal expenditures as a percentage of the GNP now are 9.2 per cent. In 1979, the year of the Conservative Government, the ratio was 13.8 per cent, or about 33 per cent higher than it is now. My gosh, if we go back to those halcyon Diefenbaker years, it was 10.1 per cent, 11.7 per cent, 9.3 per cent, 10 per cent. Higher than it is now, Mr. Speaker. It seems to me we had better take a look at facts before we start crying wolf, because there is a lot of information which has not been portrayed correctly by the Hon. Member for St. John's West. I certainly hope that in future speeches on this Budget those facts will have some impact on the kind of commentary we hear relating to this Budget.

I tell you, Mr. Speaker, the Budget is a responsible one given the conditions we face. It makes great strides in terribly important areas. I am proud to stand up on this side of the House and support that Budget to the hilt.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the Hon. Member's eloquent words and how pleased he is with the Budget. I have two questions. He made many comments regarding the real job creation to occur in Canada. In the next number of years that will obviously come from the small and medium-sized business sector. Governments are not going to be creatings jobs, and I do not think that anyone believes the corporate sector will be creating the jobs. So we are moving from the megaproject approach down to the microproject approach in job creation.

I read some of the quoted remarks of Mr. Bulloch, President of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, who had some observations on the Budget last night. He agreed there were many positive steps of a housekeeping nature for small business in the Budget. However, he said the Budget itself will not result in any new real job creation in the small business sector. In other words, the Budget is not going to encourage small business to expand and create jobs. There seems to be some opposition to what the Hon. Member was saying. Would the Hon. Member not consider it to be advantageous for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) to have rescinded the personal tax increases Canadians are going to experience this year as a result of the April Budget? These amount to something in the neighbourhood of $1.4 billion for this particular year. In a recovery which will be consumer led, or where consumers will play a major role, would it not have been useful to rescind that tax increase?

Mr. Evans: No, Mr. Speaker, it would not have been. If you want consumption, the best place to get 100 per cent consumption is exactly where we got it: we increased the GIS. They are the people in greatest need. They do not save any of it, they spend it all. That is hundreds of millions of dollars being put in the hands of people who are going to spend it. That was where it should have been put, and that is where we put it.

As to Mr. Bulloch, I have great respect for him. I do not think there are many people who understand the small business environment better than he does. However, I suggest that by removing the cumulative deduction account, businesses will now be encouraged to expand. They have been afraid to do so because once they go beyond the $1 million limit, they are no longer a small business and the tax implications are horrendous. Therefore, we are removing the CDA and saying, $200,000 a year without limit. Businesses will feel unshackled. They are going to be free to expand, and I think they will.

The other thing this Budget did, and I think commentators across the land have been saying this, is to provide a sense of stability. The Minister of Finance did not make dramatic changes. He put in measures that were structural in nature and made the kind of changes which people are going to appreciate in the area of pensions, mortgages, and small business taxation. It came out as a Budget which maintains the sense of stability and purposefulness which the Government has put forward in the past. That is going to increase business confidence and, with the restraint measure, it will keep Government price increases down to the 4 per cent level. That reinforces the sense that we are going to get inflation under control. Those are the kinds of things we have to do if the confidence is going to be there for the real interest rate to start to squeeze down. When people no longer believe that inflation is going to take off again, interest rates will begin to come down closer to the inflation rate. That is what we need to do. That is built on stability, confidence and sound budgetary management, which is exactly what the Minister brought forward here last night.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I enjoyed the comments of my colleagues. He pointed out the constructive role that government spending can play in softening the effects of economic slowdowns and recessions, particularly the effects that government spending can have on low income people. He also pointed out the Conservative policy to be "nasty, mean-minded and tough". I would like to quote something from the Toronto Star of February 12 which goes one step further than that. Joseph Schlesinger, an impartial man who is a foreign correspondent for the CBC, has written the following:

> Canada and the United States have both been going through tough times the past three years with high unemployment, increasing poverty and strained budgets.
> But there is a major difference in how the two countries have dealt with the victims of the hard times.
>
> Call it the Compassion Difference. But they try—

That is the Government of Canada:

> —with job creation and income supplement programs. In the United States, the federal government is led by people who are not only cutting back on such help—they're actually denying the existence of some of the problems.

Edwin Meese, one of the President's closest political advisers, said:

> —people go to soup kitchens because the food is free and that's easier than paying for it.

That is the Conservative mentality. In the House we have heard the Tory policy about being mean-minded and tough. That is what they are talking about. The Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) said in the House that the Americans have handled the deficit properly. That is what he means. He has this cynical idea about poor people. The difference is the compassion difference. I would like to hear the Hon. Member's theories on that.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to expound—

Mr. Kempling: What a bunch of claptrap.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, there was a movie called Sargeant Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band years ago.

Mr. Mayer: You really asked him a tough question.

Mr. Evans: In that movie there was a group called the Blue Meanies. There are the Blue Meanies of today sitting right across from us. Let me quote again the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie). He said:

> You have to be mean, nasty and do all sorts of unpleasant things.

That is the head Blue Meanie from St. John's West speaking. He said:

> That's why I am not going to outline what they would do now.

You would never vote for us if we did. Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member talks about the cuts in the United States and the cuts here. The Leader of the Opposition said he would cut everywhere and under every circumstance. That is another Blue Meanie speaking. He would cut consultants, outside lawyers and accountants, advertising, public service, compensation, waste, unproductive subsidies, travel, indexed pensions, fringe benefits, capital construction programs, capital overruns and so on. The Blue Meanies speak and the people are listening. That will tell the story over the next few months, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, my question is quite simple. It would have to be in order to get an answer from the other side. What am I now supposed to tell the more than 100,000 people who no longer qualify for unemployment insurance benefits and do not qualify for welfare payments because they have a spouse working who earns just enough to keep them from qualifying? What do I tell those people is in this Budget that will be of some assistance to them on Monday next? What can I suggest they should do in order to meet their mortgage commmitments and find a job in an area in Hamilton where 50 per cent of construction workers and 20 per cent of steel workers are out of work? We have had six plants close down in the last 14 months. There is a negative job growth. In other words, there are fewer jobs being created than there are people looking for them. What can I say to them? I have raised this question with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) and with the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Roberts). Although no doubt they both bleed quite honestly for those individuals, there is no one offering them any kind of assistance or help. What do I tell them about this Budget, given that the Government is able to find 190 million tax dollars to give to the oil companies? The Government is willing to forgo hundreds of millions of tax dollars in RRSP investments to those who already have enough. The Government is prepared to reduce the tax burden on lawyers, doctors and accountants. There is not one single item in the Budget that I can find which addresses their immediate needs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order. The posing of this question happens to come just at the end of the question period.

Mr. Deans: I will ask it again tomorrow.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): It is not the fault of the Hon. Member. If we had unanimous consent, the Parliamentary Secretary could answer.

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member can tell them that over the next year the federal Government is going to spend $3.5 billion on Special Recovery Capital Projects. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Axworthy) has started the most impressive rebuilding of the western transportation system in the history of the country. That is going to increase the demand for steel, rails and equipment that are bought in central Canada and made in Hamilton. In addition to that, the Government has put in an incentive program for profit sharing and job creation in small business. All the job-creation programs which the Government put in place over the last years are in full swing now. The special recovery projects are in full swing now. They will be generating jobs. There is hope for those people with whom we all suffer. There is hope. The Government is putting in place policies which are going to do the absolute maximum that can be done in the situation which we face as a nation.

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Speaker, I have a couple of minutes. I will make a few comments and call it six o'clock, if I may. The Hon. Member talks about the fantastic initiatives of the Minister of Transport. They should take the Minister of Transport, put him in a caboose and send him across the Prairies on a train. He would learn something about the railroad business. I say that because he was part of the Cabinet committee that allowed the dismantling of VIA Rail. At the time they said they were going to save $100 million. The Hon. Members opposite are making pious Alice in Wonderland comments and statements. I have never heard such a bunch of nonsense in my life. In 1981-82, VIA Rail cost $540 million. The Minister of Transport was going to save $100 million. That meant that the deficit should have gone down with regard to VIA. This year it costs $825 million. He cut off the revenue base and kept the cost structure the same. That is the fantastic initiative that the Minister of Transport is presiding over. They are all mad hatters. I get so excited that I cannot even talk. On February 1, 1983, they talked about 375,000 jobs that this rail initiative would create in western Canada. That was from the former Minister of Transport.

• (1800)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order.

Mr. Mayer: May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, since it is six o'clock?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 45 deemed to have been moved.

HOUSING—RESIDENTIAL REHABILITATION ASSISTANCE PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR EXPANSION. (B) DISTRIBUTION OF FUNDING

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, on February 10 I raised a question with the Minister of Public Works (Mr. LeBlanc) concerning RRAP, the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program. At the time I pointed out that this was a good program but limited to designated communities and neighbourhoods, which meant that many Canadian people were unable to take advantage of it.

Let me summarize some of the values of the RRAP program. First, it meets a real need for up-grading homes. It helps people, many of them on fixed incomes, to fix their places of residence. This is also available for rental units.

Second, it has an immediate and direct impact upon employment. The RRAP program is labour intensive.

Third, there are direct spin-offs to local communities. When people fix up their homes they are purchasing building materials and supplies at local stores. The RRAP program gets money to people who need to repair their homes and it creates jobs. However, as I said, the major problem with it is that it has never been adequately funded.

There are hundreds of communities and neighbourhoods across Canada that are left out of this program. There are three communities in my riding that have never been designated. Many of these people live close to rural areas where their neighbours have access to the RRAP program. They can see some of their neighbours across the road who have access to RRAP, only to find out when they apply that they are not eligible. Many of them live in older homes that are badly in need of renovation. Pensioners who live on fixed incomes see their neighbours across the road who are able to take advantage of the program. They make inquiries only to find that they are ineligible because their community has never been designated. The unfairness of this should disturb us all.

In the case of one municipality, I have been writing to the Minister and CMHC since 1980 in an attempt to get some action to have that community designated as being eligible for the RRAP program. In April, 1981, I was assured that the community of North Cowichan was on the priority list but the new funds had to be allocated. However, in December, 1982, during which time the economy of North Cowichan had declined considerably and the need was even greater, the Minister wrote that the communities of North Cowichan, Duncan and Ladysmith were not considered priority areas.

In the correspondence I have received from the Minister about this issue, he continuously refers to the shortage of funds and budgetary restraints as the reason why these areas have not been designated.

One of the many disappointments of yesterday's Budget was that it did not expand this program which is acknowledged on all sides of the House to be a good one. It is a good program that would put money into the hands of home owners who would, in turn, pass it on to trades people and local business. It is the kind of pump primer we on this side of the House have been saying our economy needs. However, the Minister and the Government answer that budgetary restraints make it impossible to expand this program.

In yesterday's Budget, we saw how some of these budgetary restraints are applied to some other sectors of the economy. For example, oil companies received a gift of an extra $190 million from the suspension of the incremental oil revenue tax until June 1, 1985. We heard the Minister of Finance talk about doubling and tripling the tax exempt ceilings on RRSPs. This is a proposal that will directly benefit the well-to-do. As we all know, low and middle income people are unable to put aside the present $5,500 maximum tax exemption for an RRSP for a year, let alone the $10,000 limit for 1985 or the $15,000 limit for 1988. This increase in RRSP tax exemptions is a tax break for the well-do-do which will amount to $675 million in the next few years.

It is not as though we need to have more money put into savings. We have seen massive bail-outs for large corporations. In the last two weeks we have heard of a $150 million Liberal slush fund. If the Government forgot about this business of using public money to curry favour with special constituencies and concentrated on getting Canadians the best value for their money, perhaps our economy would not be in such a mess.

Communities across Canada have been waiting for RRAP designation for years. They have been standing at the end of a long line which never seems to move. I call upon the Government to take some action to expand this program and to put money into it so that we can fix up our homes, create employment and get the economy moving again.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I should like to answer the questions raised by the Hon. Member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands (Mr. Manly) on February 10, 1984 concerning the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program, RRAP for short.

As the Hon. Member pointed out, RRAP has been an outstanding success. Since it was launched in 1974, some 262,000 housing units have been rehabilitated throughout Canada. In the past two years, the Federal Government has allocated $359 million to finance the program, including $309 million subject to repayment. Thanks to that assistance, approximately 89,000 units have been rehabilitated. Twice in 1983, additional funds were set aside for RRAP. For instance, the April budget earmarked $40 million for that program over a two-year period. An additional amount of $40 million was allocated in October so that the program would continue uninterrupted until the end of the year. Those measures are a clear indication of the Federal Government's commitment to maintain the quality of existing housing units. We will continue to support the program in 1984 because it has been widely accepted by Canadians and we want as many people as possible to benefit from it.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out that many regions in this country have already been designated as eligible for RRAP. Although the Federal Government acknowledges that the Program is not offered in all regions, except in the case of handicapped persons, one of the Program's objectives is to promote upgrading of communities and consequently, the Program concentrates on areas where housing conditions are poor. Eligibility for the Program has had to be restricted because of high demand and a limited budget.

As the Minister indicated in his answer in the House, it would be unfair to make the Program's application universal without increasing funding, since people who already applied some time ago might be deprived of assistance under the Program.

I appreciate the Hon. Member's interest in RRAP and his support for the Program. Federal housing programs are constantly being reassessed in order to improve them. RRAP is being reviewed, and special consideration is being given to the feasibility of extending eligibility to Canadians in all regions.

NATIONAL REVENUE—DENIAL OF DEDUCTION FOR LEG BRACES. (B) REQUEST FOR BROADER DEFINITION OF "DISABILITY"

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Mr. Speaker, on January 16 I put a question to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Bussières) regarding a constituent of mine, Mr. David Bourne, who, as I said in the question, has felt the sting of the Income Tax Act in that he is being denied a deduction for expenses related to the cost of leg braces and is being told by National Revenue officials that he should use a wheelchair. I have protested to the Minister about this. I have asked him to review the statute and the regulations to see whether or not some adjustment could be made. There was a case before the tax court of a Mr. Michael Overdyk who has a disability similar to that of Mr. Bourne. The Tax Review Board ruled in favour of Mr. Oberdyk. I asked the Minister to look into this to see whether this could be a precedent applied to other people in the same condition.

● (1810)

The difficulty is this. My constituent is a young man. He is able to get around with leg braces and crutches. He is able to take employment. In fact, he was working for BP Petroleum which eventually became PetroCan. With braces and crutches, he was able to walk and get around his office. He is mobile in a car. He can go for a walk, walk his dog and so forth. If he goes into a wheelchair, there is a psychological problem that I will explain in a moment. In a wheelchair, he would have great difficulty in securing employment and carrying out the normal functions of life.

Many small employers have their offices on the second floor of buildings and in many cases there is no elevator. The doorways may not be wide enough and the washrooms may not be able to accommodate a wheelchair. The man is mobile, but the psychological impact of going into a wheelchair would be disastrous.

I personally know this because I was crippled with polio. For four years as a boy I used braces and crutches. I was pulled around on a wagon by my friends. I know how these braces have to be made and adjusted every year, sometimes twice a year. I was growing. I know when I fell down how they would hurt. I was bruised and skinned from the damned things. I was one of the lucky ones who was able to recover.

I know what this man is going through. He desperately wants to maintain the use of these leg braces, which cost more than a wheelchair. Every year he has to have them adjusted and renewed. This man wants to retain the use of them as long as he possibly can. He is part of the whole like everybody else in the office. He can get around, get out in case of fire and drive his car. He is just like everyone else, except he is a little slower. If you put him in a wheelchair, he will feel restricted.

I ask the Minister to look into the matter on humanitarian grounds. I have written to him about it, raised the matter in the House and have spoken to him privately. I cannot understand why the department does not move.

There is a similar case in Hamilton. Professor Nagler who teaches at Waterloo University has cerebral palsy. He can drive a car, dress himself and do many of the everyday functions, but he cannot hold a pen or pencil in his hand and he cannot operate a typewriter. In order to perform his function as a teacher in a university he has to hire a secretary. The university does not provide that service for him. In order to perform any teaching function he has to hire a secretary to whom he dictates his notes. In that way he carries out his function as a teacher. He is a useful, intelligent individual. I cannot understand why the Income Tax Act cannot be amended to accommodate these people.

In my supplementary question to the Minister I asked why the Government did not accept the recommendation made by the special committee of this House. The committee's resolution No. 46 would cover cases like David Bourne and Professor Nagler. If the Government accepted that recommendation these people would be accommodated and looked after. It is deplorable that the Government cannot move to look after these people, and let them be part of the mainstream of society.

Mr. Garnet M. Bloomfield (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, before proceeding to give an answer, I have to remind the Hon. Member that I may not give any information with regard to the affairs of a particular taxpayer, including the taxpayer of which the original question made mention. I can deal with the generalities of the subject only. Also, although the Hon. Member in his original question referred to a denial of a deduction for leg braces, it is evident from his reference to a certain case that he really meant the denial of the disability deduction.

● (1815)

The law here is quite precise. The Hon. Member may not like the law and think it should read differently, but, if that is the case, his quarrel should not be with the department which is required to administer the law as it is. The law says, in the context that concerns us here, that the disability deduction is available to a person who is:

—throughout a 12-month period ending in the year, necessarily confined for a substantial period of time each day . . . to a bed or wheel chair—

The law, therefore, defines disability in terms of confinement to a bed or wheel chair, and that is the law to be administered.

In the Overdyk case, which is public knowledge the Tax Review Board, now the Tax Court, dealt with a particular set of facts. I may say that other cases where the facts are the same would be dealt with by the department according to the decision in the Overdyk case.

NATIONAL REVENUE—REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO VANCOUVER OFFICE PRACTICES. (B) JOB DESCRIPTION REFERENCE TO WORK QUOTAS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): I am pleased to rise this evening to pursue a question I asked in this House earlier this week concerning the imposition of quotas on Revenue Canada taxation offices, particularly in the Vancouver regional office of Revenue Canada Taxation.

Since I first raised this issue of quotas and the deletion of reference to quotas in the Vancouver office early last week, I have been flooded with telephone calls and correspondence from constituents, in Burnaby in particular, but also from people throughout the mainland, expressing their concern about the effects this kind of imposition of quotas has on the manner in which Revenue Canada goes about its business.

I should emphasize that certainly no one objects to performance standards, that is, to standards that reasonably attempt to set out criteria that must be met by employees of Revenue Canada in pursuing their responsibilities. Similarly, no one takes objection to the suggestion that those taxpayers who are able to pay their tax and are deliberately avoiding payment of taxation should, in fact, be vigorously pursued. But in these difficult economic times surely it is not reasonable that Revenue Canada's authorities—the taxation authorities—should be cracking down, if you will, on the victims of this Government's economic policies; at a time when there are far too many people out of work and at a time when small businesses are really under the impact of this Government's economic policies. Surely Revenue Canada should not be operating under a system that forces staff to adhere to what amounts to quotas.

In making these comments I am not seeking to punish those who are the staff members of Revenue Canada. I think it is important the public be aware that these policies are policies which are developed by the Government, by senior staff members in national headquarters, by management, and in many instances the staff are simply administering these policies.

For example, it was not employees of the taxation component Department who made the decision to store all taxpayer files in Canada in seven central locations. It was not decided by employees of the Department that there should be quotas. Similarly, it was not employees who decided that taxpayer phone calls to Revenue Canada offices should be limited to three minutes each.

But for the director of the Vancouver office of Revenue Canada Taxation to deny the existence of quotas flies in the face of all of the evidence. In fact, senior staff in the Vancouver office of Revenue Canada Taxation went to such lengths to deny the evidence of quotas that they literally took a bottle of typewriter white-out fluid and blanked out all references to quotas on documents within the Vancouver office. There were a few documents they were not able to white-out. One was the actual job description for a PM3, Collections Unit Head.

That job description, which is in effect throughout Canada, states that one of the requirements of this particular individual is to:

—observing fluctuations in workload and production and establishing work quotas for each function—

How on earth can the Minister continue to deny the existence of quotas in Revenue Canada taxation offices when the very job description for a unit head in a Revenue Canada taxation office clearly states that one of the obligations is to ensure that these quotas are met. We are getting some sort of doublethink or doublespeak. When the Minister continues to deny the existence of these quotas. We are not talking about the auditing function, we are talking about collections.

• (1820)

The implications of these quotas for taxpayers are clear. Far too many taxpayers are being unduly harassed. Their wages are being garnisheed in order that a staff member in question might meet a quota. Liens are being slapped on property, and telephone calls are being cut short. In essence, the high standard of service, which I am sure employees would like to be in a position to deliver to taxpayers, is suffering.

I should like to state very clearly that I believe that those of my constituents in Burnaby, who in many instances have been unduly harassed as a result of the policy of imposition of quotas, demand first of all a recognition of the existence of these quotas and, second and more important, an end to quotas.

Surely employees of Revenue Canada can go about their responsibilities in a manner that does not involve meeting a specific number of accounts per given period of time. Surely it is unacceptable that senior staff of the Vancouver office of Taxation Canada should deliberately set out to destroy evidence of quotas. That kind of conduct is unacceptable in the Public Service. The Regional Director of Taxation Canada must accept the responsibility for that totally inappropriate conduct.

There must be a full, independent inquiry into what led to his initial denial and subsequent cover-up of the existence of these quotas.

Mr. Garnet M. Bloomfield (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Bussières) has answeered again and again in this House the allegations about auditors' quotas. He has done so with what I can only term exemplary patience. I will, therefore, not bother to cover the same ground.

The Hon. Member is talking about forms used in one office of the Department which refer to the expected or actual production of collection officers, not auditors. The Minister has never said that production standards are not set in the Department. In fact, a primary aim of the Department is to make the best, most efficient use of all its resources, material and human. It has a system of allocating these resources between functions and between offices in a way that is intended to optimize productivity. Expected production in each type of operation is highly important in this allocation process.

The Member should be aware that even the Auditor General has approved the approach of setting performance indicators for employees in the Government and that this is just a good management practice.

The Hon. Member has come into possession, by whatever means, of an internal operating document of the district office concerned. Through some local confusion of a junior supervisor that document was changed. The Hon. Member seems to find something sinister here that escapes me. Surely anyone wishing to "cover up" something, with any improper intent—the Hon. Member used the words "cover up the evidence" in his original question—would not be so naive and literal as to use one of the patented white liquid correction fluids. To be very simpleminded about it, as the Hon. Member may not know but should, the fluid leaves a white smear that makes the correction glaringly obvious. There are many ways to change a record when you have something to hide, but this must be the worst of all ways.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

At 6.25 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S.O. 21

[English]

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

COVERAGE OF BRITISH COLUMBIA WOLF HUNT PROTEST

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take this opportunity to bring to the attention of the House a matter causing most serious concern to many of my constituents and other Canadians living in northern Canada.

We in the North pity those who, for whatever reason, must live and work in the concrete jungles of the South. We even have a degree of compassion and understanding for those who, from time to time, defy their herd instinct to venture out in pursuit of the preservation of the balance of nature in the rest of Canada, their understanding of which comes from Farley Mowatt's storybooks.

Therefore, my concern is more over the treatment by the CBC of the events which occur when the cry goes out to save the seals or, more recently, to save the wolves. CBC French and English networks, in anticipation of a possible protest against the wolf hunt in northern British Columbia, arrived, ten persons strong, in Fort Nelson, well ahead of the five-person protest group, obviously not to report on the event but to stage it.

My constituents in Fort Nelson and Fort St. John are being used to manipulate public opinion against a government sponsored program to save other wildlife and domestic farm animals from an over abundant wolf population. Money appears to be no object. The reporters have no difficulty chartering helicopters and other aircraft to dramatize every move of the protesters.

Surely the Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox) will have to review the CBC's mandate, in view of the practice to engage in advocacy reporting of such events, to assure that both the national interest—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member, but his time has expired.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

MEETINGS OF COMMITTEE OF PARLIAMENTARIANS, SCIENTISTS AND ENGINEERS

Mr. Stanley Hudecki (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the Committee of Parliamentarians, Scientists and Engineers, under the acronym COPSE, was set up in order to facilitate the interaction of parliamentarians with the scientific and engineering community. It has organized noon-hour information lunches on the second Tuesday of each month on issues of interest to scientists and parliamentarians. This mixed audience is spared as much as possible the "difficult to understand" technical jargon. Outstanding workers in the scientific field are invited speakers.

There are only a handful of parliamentarians who have a background in science, yet we live in an unprecedented age of information and technical change which, in a span of one generation, will have a revolutionary effect on Canadian society. Members of Parliament have an opportunity to make themselves aware of advances in science, medicine and technology which are changing the lifestyles, work habits and economic relationships of all Canadians. It is the task of Parliament to prepare the climate for such a change.

Until such time as a parliamentary standing committee on science and technology comes about, the monthly meetings of COPSE provide extremely worth-while forums for Members of Parliament to become knowledgeable on issues affecting the lives of all their constituents. I am concerned that so few Members of Parliament are supporting the COPSE initiative to help this nation assert itself in the age of technology and information.

INVESTIGATION OF LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, we have seen and read a great many revelations in the last few days concerning an operation in the Office of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) designed to collect personal information on the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mulroney), with the sole intention of seeking to discredit him. Unlike any other office in the country, the Prime Minister's Office has unlimited power to secure information.

We now learn about an official in the Prime Minister's Office being instructed to go to different government Departments to ask for and obtain confidential information, personal and private, about the Leader of the Opposition. No Member of Parliament can or should have access to the confidential files of Departments of Government; no research office of other Parties can make that demand. What they have access to is in the public domain. What the Prime Minister's Office has access to is in the confidential domain. That is the difference.

We have seen the nature of that confidential material being raised by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) as a threat against the Leader of the Opposition. There has been no denial by the Prime Minister, or his key officials, that those activities were taking place. Neither is there any indication that they have been terminated.

What we are seeing in this concentrated effort to discredit the Leader of the Opposition is a betrayal of the function of the Prime Minister's Office, and it should cease immediately.

NATIONAL PARKS

PROVISION OF WATER SUPPLY FOR DAUPHIN, MAN.

Mr. Laverne Lewycky (Dauphin-Swan River): Mr. Speaker, attempts by the Town of Dauphin to obtain a long-term lease for the use of Lake Edwards in Riding Mountain National Park as a backup water supply source so far have proved fruitless. Negotiations between the Town of Dauphin and Parks Canada officials have been deadlocked since 1979.

Historically the Town of Dauphin has used Lake Edwards in Riding Mountain National Park as a water supply source long before a national park was established in the Riding Mountains.

Parks Canada wants to force the town to abandon the lake if it cannot document its current and projected need for the water from the lake, to its satisfaction. The problem has reached the stage where park officials have been restricting town maintenance crews' access to the dykes for repair work. This is a pressing problem which has dragged on far too long. I call upon the Minister to act personally to resolve this problem and guarantee Dauphin's future water supply.

PENSIONS

BUDGET PROPOSALS TO INCREASE BENEFITS

Mr. David Berger (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring to the attention of Members in the House provisions in the Budget designed to increase pension benefits for thousands of Canadians and recent immigrants. As the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) explained, the $50 a month increase in GIS this year will help those pensioners who need help the most, namely, single pensioners and one-pensioner couples. About 750,000 pensioners, three quarters of whom are women, will benefit.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I am particularly pleased with the provisions concerning immigrants.

[English]

Immigrant pensioners whose monthly pension benefits are below the monthly minimum payable to single pensioners will benefit tremendously. The immigrant pensioner who, as of 1977 has been receiving, or will receive partial OAS due to residency requirements, may now qualify for additional assistance. For example, if an immigrant pensioner qualifies only for half of the monthly OAS, he or she may now qualify for additional GIS support to bring them to the same acceptable minimum monthly pension given to all Canadians. The Budget increases the minimum single monthly pension to $600. This is a positive measure, Mr. Speaker, and we trust that some Members of this House will not forget to remind their constituents of such an important initiative.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LEVEL OF YOUTH UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, the worst of the Finance Minister's Budget concerns the unemployed. They will continue to be with us in virtually the same numbers through this year, 10.9 per cent, and on through next year 10.1 per cent, as well as today's jobless level of 11.2 per cent, and that, Mr. Speaker, is not the worst of it.

What about the unemployed youth of today? What do they have to look forward to in the near future from this Budget? What is $150 million going to do? It has become obvious that the new Minister of State for Youth (Mrs. Hervieux-Payette) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) have given up on creating jobs for our young people.

It hurts me deeply when I see that these young people feel that they are doomed to be a lost generation with no prospect of any kind of job. It is time they voted for change, and it is time the Government gave them a chance to do so.

POLITICAL PARTIES

POSITION OF PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVE PARTY ON UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I want to bring to your attention two instances of hypocrisy, a word that was used a lot in the House yesterday. I just heard the Hon. Member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling) talk about the Conservatives being concerned about the unemployed and about youth.

Mr. Crosbie: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Waddell: Listen to what the finance critic has been saying—the ex-Minister of Finance and the possible future Minister of Finance. He is still talking about—

Mr. Stevens: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Waddell: They are pretty cocksure. He is talking about them having a mean Budget and doing mean and nasty things. I challenge the Members, the Canadian people, and the Members who are clapping, to catch Global TV News tonight where the present finance critic gives the real nature of the Conservative Party when he says once again, "If we told you what we would do we would never get elected." There is their real policy, and it is hypocrisy, Mr. Speaker.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

BUDGET PROPOSALS AND FORECASTS

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister, who is probably out searching titles, and in the absence of the Minister of Finance, I want to ask a question of the Acting Prime Minister. In the Budget brought down two days ago, at page 1 the Minister of Finance said, and I quote:

—my goal was to secure the recovery.

That was the goal of his April Budget.

That goal has also been met.

With 1,473,000 Canadians unemployed, with the unemployment rate this year projected to be 10.9 per cent, with Canadian industry operating at only 70 per cent of capacity, with the prime rate at 11 per cent; with inflation re-igniting, with non-residential construction projected to decline 2.7 per cent this year and residential construction to decline 1.3 per cent, with the Minister of Finance forecasting real average wages will not rise one cent or one iota, how can the Government pretend the recovery is secured? Who does it think it is fooling? How is the recovery now secured in light of those facts and projections?

Mr. Stevens: Here is the Acting Prime Minister.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the problem with the Hon. Member's question is the old one of whether the bottle is half full or half empty. Of course there is a lot of work yet to be done. If the Hon. Member opposite does not recognize that, he is incapable of understanding the present state of our economy. The fact is we have achieved a substantial degree of economic recovery over the past 12 to 14 months.

An Hon. Member: For whom?

Mr. MacLaren: Interest rates have declined significantly. The job creation rate has increased.

Mr. Riis: In Liberal ridings, yes.

Mr. MacLaren: We have created some 400,000 additional jobs in our economy in the last 14 months.

Mr. Heap: Five hundred thousand jobs lost.

Mr. MacLaren: We have seen inflation drop substantially over the past year. We have seen the CPI decrease from something over 12 per cent to something in the neighbourhood of 5 per cent. That trend is continuing.

The purpose of last April's Budget was to put in place, both in the public and private sectors, policies which would stimulate that economic recovery. The purpose of this Budget, which carries on the trend set in motion by the April Budget, is to set the stage for real economic growth in our economy. The Hon. Member knows that. It is obvious to us all.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, the Budget speech did not say, "There is a lot of work yet to be done." It said, "My goal was to secure the recovery. That goal has been met." There is a vast difference. One is a complete distortion. The Minister of Finance did not say there was a lot of work yet to be done.

RATE OF INFLATION

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister who, I know, is very much interested in what happens to the Canadian people. In the Budget speech on Wednesday the Minister of Finance said, and I quote:

For 1984 as a whole, I expect inflation to average about 5 per cent—

Two days later Statistics Canada revealed a cost of living increase from January, 1983, to January, 1984, of 5.3 per cent, up from 4.5 per cent the previous month—the second month in a row it has gone up. If we remove food and energy from the index, the underlying rate of inflation has gone up for the first time in many months, which is a very serious indication. If we took the seasonally adjusted figure, the increase for this year, if it continued over the whole year, would be 9.6 per cent. How can the Prime Minister's Government expect its projections and estimates to be taken seriously when, just two days after the Budget comes down, the inflation forecast is shown to be erroneous? How can he expect interest rates to come down when inflation is already on the way up, and a Budget was brought in which does nothing to overcome it?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member must realize that this was an anticipated event. The increase in the price of food was predicted more than three or four weeks ago when frost hit foodstuffs in the United States, particularly the fruits and vegetables. We believe this is an anticipated and probably temporary phenomenon.

• (1120)

Mr. Crosbie: Electoral frost is going to strike your Government whenever the election comes.

LEVEL OF UNEMPLOYMENT

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, there are 1,473,000 unemployed today. When the Prime Minister came to office in 1968 the number was 360,000; when he came back in March of 1980 it was 967,000; if he continues much longer there will be no one in Canada employed. When is the Prime Minister going to have a Budget brought in which will affect the unemployed? Does he realize his Minister has projected that there will be over 1,400,000 unemployed all this year on average, and even in 1988 there will be 1,100,000? When will the Prime Minister do something to retrieve the losses we have had under his administration?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member just has to look at the record of last year when something like 350,000 new jobs were created. That was because the Minister had a very thoughtful Budget last April, and we believe this Budget will have the same effect of creating jobs on a steady and permanent basis.

INTEREST RATES—DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE PROJECTIONS

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of State for Finance. He knows interest rates have a major impact on inflation. He knows the service charges on our national debt are up. He knows that StatsCanada reports the inflation rate is up to 5.3 per cent seasonally adjusted, and the seasonally adjusted month to month inflation rate is the highest since June of 1983. Even when the fruit, vegetable and energy factors which the Prime Minister speaks of are removed, there is a rise in the underlying inflation rate, the first since February of 1982. These new facts contradict the Budget rhetoric.

Will the Minister tell us what rate of interest the Department of Finance used in projecting debt charge calculations? Will he tell us if interest rates are to remain stable, if they are to go up or down, in light of these new facts StatsCanada has given us?

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, as I understood it, the Member asks three different questions. Regarding the CPI, and excluding food and energy, which he has done, and rightly so, the all-item CPI did not increase during the month of January. It declined by .2 per cent. Regarding his query about the interest rate basis we used in our calculations, we do not make that public. I think the Hon. Member is aware of that. When borrowing on the money market the Government does not wish to indicate to the market what it anticipates interest rates will be. That is a question better settled by the market itself. The forecasts are based on assumptions which are not made public. The third point has been dealt with quite adequately in the speech by the Minister of Finance when he says he does not expect interest rates to increase during the course of 1984.

SIZE OF GOVERNMENT DEBT CHARGES

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, we are all too well aware of the Minister of Finance's rhetoric. We had enough of it in his Budget address the other day and in interviews since. He infers that recovery is on the way; the external cost of funds to corporations is expected to decline; continued stability is at hand; six and five has worked; inflation is under control.

Mr. Rossi: Hear, hear! More!

Mr. Huntington: And that progress on lower interest rates is encouraging. These are all quotations from his rhetoric. If this rhetoric is to be believed, Mr. Speaker, why have projected debt charges in the ten months since the last Budget increased by over $1 billion? Why will he not tell us? Why the silence on the interest rate used by the Department of Finance for its February, 1984, projections? The people of Canada are entitled to know that figure.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the Member opposite must be aware that interest rates in Canada have fallen substantially during the past 14 to 16 months. In June, 1982, for example, the bank rate was over 16.5 per cent. Today it is 10 per cent, and has remained unchanged for some time.

• (1125)

Mr. Huntington: Answer the question. What rate did you use?

Mr. MacLaren: I indicated to the Hon. Member that it is not the practice of the Government, either when his Party was in power, or this Party, to indicate such interest rates. I do not believe the Hon. Member would wish us to anticipate the reactions of markets to a number of diverse factors which affect interest rates. We need to make some assumptions for planning purposes, but it is not the policy of the Government, or any Government in office in Canada, to issue such statistics.

FINANCE

BUDGET BUSINESS TAX PROPOSALS

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Yesterday I asked the Minister of Finance certain questions about the unfairness of the Budget as it affects pensioners and middle and low income Canadians. He replied with disarming candour, saying that is how the tax system works. Well, the Liberal tax system, I guess.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister questions about unfairness again today as it affects a certain bonanza that is being given to large corporations. As a result of the new Budget, Eaton's and Bata, which are hardly corner stores, are now going to qualify as small businesses. They will be able to be taxed at the small business tax rate of 15 per cent. As a result of tax increases imposed by the Minister of Finance's last Budget, average families will have to pay about $500 more per family. Is it the Government's idea of fairness that the $500 increase for the ordinary Canadian should make up for the thousands of dollars which are going to be lost to the tax system from companies like Bata and Eaton's?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe the Hon. Member is misconstruing the provision in the Budget regarding small business. The proposition is quite simple. It is to simplify the whole tax structure and not have artificial categories about small and larger businesses. The principle of taxing larger businesses at a different rate is maintained in the Budget. Eaton's obviously does not qualify as a small business. The first couple of hundred thousand dollars of its business are perhaps considered as small for simplification of tax purposes. However, everything above that is taxed at a different rate. The Hon. Member is miscontruing the meaning of the Budget. He would do well to reread the section.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I think the Prime Minister would do well to reread the Budget as well. He will find out what I have said is true.

TAX PROPOSALS AFFECTING PROFESSIONALS

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I would like to move on to another aspect of the unfairness as it pertains to the possibilities open to professional people such as doctors and lawyers. The Budget provision is that doctors, lawyers, and other professional people who may be earning $80,000 to $90,000 a year, can now re-establish themselves as companies. Does the Prime Minister consider it fair that professionals and other upper income people who are paying an effective tax rate of 50 per cent now because their income is in the $80,000 to $90,000 category, should be able to have their taxes reduced to about 15 per cent, which is the level an ordinary worker has to pay who has not open to himself the same privilege of reconstituting himself as a company? Is this the kind of fairness the Government believes in, that there should be a special hand-out in terms of redistribution of income to richer Canadians instead of moving toward justice for middle and low income Canadians?

• (1130)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance is proposing a way of treating professionals and other such people which has been used in the past, and to which he is returning now. We had another system for a period of time. I do not recall the Leader of the NDP having supported it in any vocal way.

I do recall when the former Minister of Finance, the present Secretary of State for External Affairs, had a budget in November, 1981, which was deliberately attempting to close what the Hon. Member has called loopholes, that he was not suported by that Leader of the NDP, nor by his colleagues. It is quite typical of the NDP that they will not support any progressive reform by the Government. They will merely continue to attack everything indiscriminately.

Mr. Broadbent: It is quite typical of the political style of the Prime Minister to shift in a sleazy way from a difficult question that he was supposed to answer, and provide irrelevant and misleading information. This Party supported the provisions in that Budget which would remove the loopholes that go to upper income Canadians. We opposed the other provisions that gave other benefits to people who did not deserve to get them. That should be clear.

TAX PROPOSAL AFFECTING LAWYERS

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I would like the Prime Minister to answer the question. Considering that we now have in our land more than 4 million Canadians living in poverty, that pensioners must pay tax on their income, and that unemployed men and women must pay tax on their unemployment insurance cheques, is it the Prime Minister's notion of fairness that we should reintroduce another kind of loophole in our tax system that would permit a lawyer who makes $80,000 a year to pay taxes at only 15 per cent? What hypocrisy! What injustice!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member says that he supported that 1981 Budget. I recall that he voted against it.

NATIONAL REVENUE

EXISTENCE OF QUOTA SYSTEM

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. He will recall that on several occasions over the course of the past several weeks he has specifically denied the existence of quotas for auditors in his Department. He has even gone so far as to issue a directive to every district office to say that quotas are to be stopped.

Yet this week The Globe and Mail has turned up documentary evidence to prove that, notwithstanding the direct assurances given by the Minister, quotas are still in place in a number of district offices in his Department. Did his officials disobey a direct order from the Minister, or was he party to this pretty piece of deceit?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I have asked the Hon. Member several times to consider the question of establishing standards for effectiveness and efficiency within the Department, how those standards are established and how they are applied. The Hon. Member has obstinately refused to consider this matter—I would say he has a mental block.

I would urge him to read some comments by his hon. colleague, who said that yes, performance indicators are necessary and yes, we must have efficiency and productivity at the departmental level, and that is the whole point of the performance indicator objectives we have, which are applied according to the nature of the various operations that take place within the Department. As long as the Hon. Member refuses to acknowledge that, as many of his colleagues have been urging, there must be efficiency within the Department, as long as he refuses to consider the basic problem of managing a department in terms of efficiency and productivity, he will never understand what departmental management is about.

[English]

SUDBURY OFFICE AUDITORS

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, the basic problem here is not efficiency. The basic problem is truth and whether the Minister can be believed when he tells the House of Commons that there are no quotas within his Department. These documents from Sudbury demonstrate that auditors there are having quotas put on them of $350 per hour. Does the Minister deny that and, if not, why did he make the statement to the House of Commons that quotas have been stopped? Can we believe a word that the Minister says to us?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I think the Hon. Member has completely missed the point. He refuses to consider the fundamental issue, since he knows he will have to admit he is wrong and does not know anything about managing a department, and he knows he will have to accept the concept proposed by his Party, a concept accepted long ago by this Government, that each department needs effective management of human resources and that effective management of those resources must be adapted to the functions of each department. As long as the Hon. Member continues to let himself be blinded by partisan considerations, he will never understand what this issue is about.

[English]

"HIT" AUDITS

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of National Revenue. Is he aware of the term "hit" audits and, if so, are auditors rated in accordance with the percentage of "hit" audits collected in relation to the amount assessed? Is he aware that these are in addition to the quotas set for the auditors?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is following the same line of thought as his colleague who, unfortunately, does not quite understand departmental management. He ought to know that, with respect to audits, the management policy is to obtain the best possible performance from our auditors. The management policy does leave room for flexibility since it takes into consideration the need for results as well as fairness and respect for the rights of taxpayers in auditing practices.

[English]

PERSONNEL ASSESSMENT RECORDS

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Mr. Speaker, if the Minister is so adamant that quotas are not being set for auditors, will he inform the House today why personnel assessment records are being adjusted and put back in the files, that every auditor's personnel file is being checked and changed without the employee's prior knowledge? Will he explain that to the House of Commons, if in fact there are no quotas being set for these people?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I would urge the Hon. Member to attend the sittings of the standing committees of the House which will be examining the estimates of the Department over the next few weeks.

If need be, we will give him detailed explanations on the manner in which the various personnel assessment records are reviewed within the Department. He will also have an opportunity to find out for himself why we have such assessment records and how we treat them. That should make him understand each factor used to establish those assessment records.

JUSTICE AND LEGAL AFFAIRS

NEGOTIATION OF LEGAL AID FUNDING WITH BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice and it concerns legal aid in British Columbia. No doubt the Minister is aware that the Government of British Columbia has cut back legal aid, is charging user fees, and proposes to bring in legislation that will overturn a decision of its own Court of Appeal. Will the Minister confirm that his Department is presently negotiating an agreement with the Government of British Columbia with respect to federal funds for legal aid? Is he prepared to say that he is in favour of adequate and full legal aid, and against this kind of cutback in British Columbia?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I am certainly prepared to agree with the Hon. Member that the fullest system of legal aid possible in every Province is the most desirable one. I think the Hon. Member will know that the normal pattern of these agreements is that there are, in return for federal funds, certain commitments which the Provinces make. Of course, they are obligated to fulfil those commitments.

It is true that we are negotiating a new agreement now. I can assure the Hon. Member that I am not looking at a form of agreement that would deprive the people of British Columbia of the kind of protections that they have had in the past as far as the federal conditions are concerned. However, there are, of course, many aspects to every legal aid system which are purely under provincial control and over which we would not have any right to exercise restraint.

We will do our best to negotiate the best kind of agreement with British Columbia. I think there still will be a problem to which British Columbians will want to address themselves, in light of the type of comments that the Attorney General of that province has been making recently, comments with which I do not agree at all.

• (1140)

CURTAILMENT OF SERVICE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, the Minister feels that way, and I share his comment. But if he feels we should have the fullest system of legal aid possible in British Columbia, then I want to ask the Minister why, in medicare, is the federal Government prepared to act and prepared to stop Provinces from user fees and so on? Why does the Minister not do the same thing with legal aid in British Columbia and not give money to the Province of British Columbia if it is going to act this way with respect to legal aid?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I hardly need to explain to the Hon. Member all the differences between the two kinds of systems. We do not have medical care in Canada as an analogy with health care. The kind of recovery that lawyers get is a different proportion from that which doctors get, and so on. There are enormous numbers of differences between the two plans. We are making a general offer to all of the Provinces, not just to British Columbia, to renegotiate the legal aid agreements. I hope to be able to report to the House in due course on agreements that we are able to reach.

LABOUR RELATIONS

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—TREATMENT OF REDUNDANT WORKERS

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. Is the Minister prepared to use his good offices to bring companies, such as CPR, into the twentieth century with regard to its labour relations as they relate to technological change? For instance, three constituents of mine who have worked for the CPR for an average of 38 years, and whose jobs are becoming redundant as a result of technological change, are being offered the choice of uprooting their families and moving to another location, thus throwing three younger workers out of work, or forgoing their pensions for seven years. Is the Minister willing to take some action in this kind of case?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, at the request of the Hon. Member I will look into the matter and I will have some of my officials review the situation. If representation has to be made directly to the corporation, I will gladly do so.

INDUSTRY

CANADIAN COMPETITIVE POSITION RATING

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An Hon. Member: Go easy on him, George.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, as the prestigious European Management Forum based in Geneva, using figures supplied by the OECD, the United Nations, and the International Monetary Fund, reports that Canada's international rating in industrial competitiveness fell from fifth place in 1981 to eleventh place in 1983, and as this serious drop in competitiveness had a very real effect on creating the high unemployment we are experiencing today, can the Prime Minister advise the House just what steps his Government intends to take to correct this very serious situation?

Mr. Nielsen: Call an election.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is asking questions about industrial ratings. I think if that same prestigious body took a look at ratings it would find the Hon. Member is not doing any better than the industrial ratings.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, Oh!

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, that is the kind of answer in which the Prime Minister indulges these days, in that he obviously does not care one whit what happens to Canada's industrial competitiveness or productivity, both of which contribute to the very serious unemployment that has taken place during the time when this country has, unfortunately, had to subdue itself to his leadership as Prime Minister.

PRIME MINISTER'S POSITION

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, as a supplementary let me ask the Prime Minister, as he will be leading his Party in the next election, does he not think it is about time he started taking seriously these very important matters about unemployment, and the job situation that affects about 1.4 million Canadians today.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I think Jean Chrétien just fainted.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the Hon. Member were to participate at all in the Budget debate, and if he had read the Budget documents, he would realize that these preoccupations are front and centre in the Minister of Finance's Budget, except the Hon. Member seems to be more interested in reading Geneva documents, once again reading them but not understanding them, because when he refers to industrial rating, of course he specifically omits all the jobs created by our very vast resource basis.

Mr. Hees: Temporary jobs only. You know it, and I know it.

Mr. Trudeau: He does not seem to realize that our vast resource basis is a source of great job creation. The Hon. Member shocks me when he talks about temporary jobs. Our resources, Mr. Speaker, are not temporary. It is the Hon. Member's understanding of events which is temporary and feeble.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

IMPACT OF CRUISE MISSILE TESTING ON COMMUNITIES IN ALBERTA

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. He will remember that on a recent visit to northeastern Alberta in discussions with people at Grand Centre he indicated at the request of people in the area that he would send a team of information officers throughout northeastern Alberta to outline the effect the Cruise missile testing would have on those people. The Minister will also know that teams went out on two or three-day notices. My phone has been ringing off the wall.

People want to know how the Cruise testing is going to affect them. They asked the Minister to send out the teams. The teams have gone out with only two days' notice which prevented many people who wanted the information from attending meetings. Is the Minister going to get those teams out there in a proper way, with proper notice?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the teams went out. Notice was given very widely in the area. As a matter of interest the meetings were very, very well attended. There was a considerable amount of exchange between those who were at the meetings and the briefers. As a result of the interest there were considerable exchanges that gave rise to additional publicity and that publicity, of course, has increased the level of interest in the region. If there are needs for additional briefings or a need for additional information, I will be pleased to co-operate with the hon. gentleman in providing that information to his constituents.

NOTIFICATION OF MEETINGS

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Defence. I want to make it clear to the Minister that the people who are requesting the information have not yet made up their minds whether they are for or against the Cruise testing. They want to know how it is going to affect their lives. The people in Peace River were given three days' notice before their meeting was called, which virtually prevented everyone in the rural part of that area from attending the meeting. The people in High Prairie were given two days' notice. The people in Slave Lake did not even have a meeting. The people in Athabasca did not have a meeting. The Minister made a commitment that he would inform the people when the Cruise testing was going to take place. That has not been done. Will the Minister resolve this problem?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the position that I have taken in this matter is to try to provide as much information as possible. That is why I undertook to provide briefings in the hon. gentleman's region, and in any area where those briefings were requested. Our purpose is to provide information. If there is a need for additional information, we will be pleased to provide it. As I said originally, I will be pleased to co-operate with the hon. gentleman in providing that information.

EMPLOYMENT

REQUEST THAT LIST OF PROJECTS FUNDED IN ONTARIO BE TABLED

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, maybe I will put my question to the Prime Minister. I see he has moved a bit to the right. Perhaps he can go back toward the centre and take the question.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nystrom: He has now found his seat, Mr. Speaker. I am sure the Prime Minister knows that many accusations have been made about the allocation of money for job creation under the Employment Creation and Grants and Contributions Program. In the interests of clearing up the confusion, can the Prime Minister now confirm that a list of projects under this program in Ontario has been completed? The list, I am told, is now under lock and key in a vault in Toronto. Could he confirm that? And in the interests of clearing up this issue, can the Prime Minister table this list in the House today?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, no, I cannot confirm it because I have not heard of any lock-up of lists in Toronto or elsewhere. I do know from having spoken to the Minister of Employment and Immigration yesterday that he is compiling all the documents which will permit him to give the Opposition all the information it wants on the various job-creation schemes that he has created under the funds allocated to him by the Budget.

● (1150)

ALLOCATION OF FUNDS TO CONSTITUENCIES

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, because of the very diligent workers in the PMO, perhaps the Prime Minister can confirm that the list that is now compiled in Toronto shows that $25 million was allocated to the Ontario region. Can he also confirm that fully 91 per cent of that money went to ridings represented by Liberal Members of Parliament?

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Pork; pork.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is asking a question based on the results that he assumes will come from the documents that the Minister will table and make public. I do not know the results of them. If the Hon. Member has been snooping and has a lock and key, why does he not get the information himself and make it public? I do not have it. I am waiting for the Minister to make it public.

PENITENTIARIES

INMATE POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION PROGRAM FEE

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. It deals with another form of deterrent fee which he has imposed on behalf of the Government with regard to post-secondary education in our penitentiaries. The Minister will know that, as opposed to 52 per cent of inmates who are returned to prison after serving their terms, of those who have been involved in the post-secondary education process, only 14 per cent return to prison. What is the rationale for imposing this kind of deterrent fee to discourage inmates from participating in post-secondary education?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as the Hon. Member knows, I am committed to post-secondary education in our penitentiaries. In fact the night before last I presented BA's to the first three Francophones ever to graduate from university while incarcerated in federal penitentiaries, and I am very proud of that. At the same time, unlike primary education and secondary education, university education is not available free of charge to citizens who have not committed crimes and are not in penitentiaries. They pay. They appreciate and benefit from university programs. They are willing to do so even under the circumstances of having to pay for it. I do not see any reason why inmates, who receive money from the Correctional Service of Canada while they are behind bars, should not pay a small part of that, as do people on the street, in order to offset the cost of their education.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: It is obvious from the answer of the Solicitor General that he has given up on the rehabilitative function of our penitentiary system, that all he is concerned with is dollars and cents from the very small amount which inmates receive.

NATIONAL SECURITY

SECURITY CLEARANCE ASSESSMENTS—CLASSIFICATION OF DOCUMENTS

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister. With respect to the whole question of security assessments the Minister has written to his colleagues in Cabinet requesting that they substantially reduce the requirements for the RCMP to carry out security assessments. You will know that the Chairman of the Canadian Human Rights Commission was very critical about the extent of security assessments carried out by the Government. What percentage does the Minister think is superfluous in terms of the security assessment work done by the federal Government? Second, is he doing anything with respect to reclassification of documents and responsibilities, which is the source of all the difficulty in this area?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General of Canada): As the Hon. Member indicated, Mr. Speaker, I have indeed asked each of my colleagues to look over the number of security classifications that their officials are requiring for promotions and hiring of individuals. I intend to follow up on that. To give now some estimate of the kind of results I hope to achieve is premature. I think we can make progress in reducing the amount of security clearance requirements in the Government.

In reply to the second question, the Hon. Member is right, the basic problem is that too many documents are being marked classified. My Ministry is working in co-operation with three other Departments of Government to develop tighter criteria for classification. It is a program I have described in public before. It is complicated. It will make very fundamental changes to a governmental process that, I suppose, has been in effect for centuries. I look forward to being able to make progress with that. I have not yet been able to complete my approval of the general approach that will be taken to classifications.

However, there is one very major reform that I have brought forward, and that is the proposal to reorganize the security service of the RCMP as a separate security intelligence agency, and to provide in the same legislation a right of appeal so that any individual who considers himself falsely identified as a security threat will be able to request a review of that. That is tremendous progress because it will be a check on excessive classifications and excessive requirements of security clearance. If the Hon. Member seriously wants that type of reform, I urge him to support progress of this legislation, because this legislation is a concrete way of reducing the amount of security clearance that the Government now requires.

NATIONAL REVENUE

DEPARTMENT'S USE OF THIRD PARTY DEMANDS

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue. I would like to ask him about third party demands. I can appreciate that there will be occasions when a Government will want to make a third party demand on an individual's bank account. I have not done a national survey, but based on some banks in my constituency there has been a tremendous increase in the amount of third party demands since as recently as October or November of a year ago. Has there been a request from the Minister's office, or the Minister himself, to increase greatly the number of third party demands, and if so, why?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): No, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

RESCINDING OF THIRD PARTY DEMANDS

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I compliment the Minister for giving an answer to the question. Bearing in mind that there is this extraordinary increase in third party demands, bearing in mind that the Minister just stated that he has not ordered more third party demands, and noting the tremendous difficulty it places on individual citizens, why is it that in the vast majority of cases those third party demands are rescinded by his Department, in other words, nullified, within 24 to 48 hours, when there was not cause in the first place? Can the Minister justify that extent of the abuse of the system when it is actually cancelled a few days later, especially in areas like mine with small towns where word ripples through the community and can destroy the reputation of an individual for a lifetime? Will he not decrease the number of third party demands on citizens?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I think there is an explanation which the Hon. Member will understand quite easily about cases where third party demands must be withdrawn after a few days. I am aware of several cases where, immediately following third party demand, the taxpayer, who knew that he owed a certain amount, immediately paid off the amount of taxes due to the Department of Revenue. The Hon. Member shakes his head, but this is definitely what we have found.

However, I would like to point out to the Hon. Member that such action, which is extremely harsh, is taken only in cases where through his own fault, the taxpayer has not entered into any agreement with the Department of Revenue as to his plans for paying the taxes owed by him. It is the responsibility of the taxpayer to call on the district office, explain his financial situation and indicate how he plans to pay his tax debt. If he defaults on this responsibility, he is subject to the harsh provisions contained in the Act.

However, I would like to take this opportunity to remind Hon. Members that we are doing everything possible to find a common ground for negotiating an agreement or an arrangement with the taxpayers, taking into account the nature of their indebtedness as well as their financial situation and their ability to pay.

ALLEGED INVESTIGATION OF MPS' PRIVATE AFFAIRS

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Earlier in the House today, Mr. Prime Minister, there was an unsubstantiated allegation by a member that officials in your office have directed officials of other Departments of the Government of Canada, or employees of the Government of Canada, to search into the private affairs of Members of this House. Will the Prime Minister please comment on such an allegation?

• (1200)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the Hon. Member for permitting me to answer an allegation which has been made outside the House, apparently, but which has not been asked directly of me. I am happy to deny categorically that any such operation has taken place.

I would add that there is one circumstance under which members of the PMO did canvass all Ministers' offices for information concerning an allegation made by the Leader of the Opposition when he stated, I believe on September 19, that he had received from an unnamed Minister of the Government a letter congratulating him on his handling of the closing down of Iron Ore in Schefferville. Since the Leader of the Opposition had bragged about such a letter, we did canvass all Ministers to see if they were the author of such a letter, and the answer of course was given by the Hon. Member for Yukon a short while later when he showed the letter to the House of Commons, and it appeared it had been written by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. That is the occasion when we did canvass all Minister's offices. There is no other such occasion. For you, Flora.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

PENSION ELIGIBILITY CRITERIA FOR WIDOWS OF OFFICERS KILLED ON DUTY

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. As he knows, on a number of occasions I have urged the Minister to broaden the criteria for eligibility for pensions of widows and families of RCMP officers killed while on duty. The Minister ordered a study last fall which clearly demonstrated the inadequacy of existing pension plans and showed that the criteria were deficient.

What action does the Solicitor General intend to take to implement the strong recommendation of that study that we treat RCMP officers and their families with equity and fairness, and implement long overdue changes to their pension plan which would broaden the criteria and enable families to receive pensions in the event that an RCMP officer is killed in the line of duty, not just a violent death?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Hon. Member has forgotten it, but in the last four years I have been Solicitor General I have introduced a substantial improvement in the pensions available for widows and children of RCMP officers slain while on duty, if the risk which resulted in their death was one of those special risks which they face when they go to work every day that other public servants and other members of the public do not face. I have told the Hon. Member that the criteria are broad, so that they will not only cover cases where they are victims of foul play or are killed by criminals in the course of escaping from crimes, but will reflect that when they go to work—and prison guards are eligible for the same benefits—they face special risks which the rest of us do not face. When those risks result in their death, society should recognize that. That is the basis of the policy, and that is the reason why widows and orphans whose fathers and husbands die in those special circumstances receive enhanced pension benefits.

PETITIONS

MR. ALTHOUSE—CALL FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF AGRICULTURAL RESERVE

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition from residents of the Province of Ontario who wish to present a grievance. They humbly sheweth that the Pickering-Seaton area and the Pickering airport site were established as a unit through expropriation for an airport which was never built. Since this site could be used as a permanent Pickering agricultural reserve, they call upon the federal Government to negotiate the establishment of a permanent agricultural reserve on the Pickering lands to serve as a model of farm land preservation and to produce food for the nearby urban market.

MR. COSGROVE—PENALTIES FOR DRUNK DRIVING

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, I would like to present a petition also signed by residents of the Province of Ontario. It draws attention to the problems caused by drinking and driving. It is the second one I have lodged with the House. The petitioners respectfully urge Parliament to pass legislation which will increase the penalties for those found guilty of drinking and driving.

IMMIGRATION ACT, 1976

AMENDMENT RESPECTING REFUGEE STATUS

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-219, an Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976 (determination of refugee status).

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this Bill is to alter the Immigration Act so that everyone within Canada who is claiming refugee status will have the right to an oral hearing before the Refugee Status Advisory Committee. This will not only give more accurate opportunity for judgment by the Committee, but it will remove hardship from applicants and save a great deal of staff time. Generally everyone should benefit.

BRITISH COLUMBIA INDIAN CUT-OFF LANDS SETTLEMENT ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (for Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) moved that Bill C-18, an Act to provide for the settlement of claims by Indian bands in British Columbia relating to certain lands cut off from their reserves, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Mr. André Maltais (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to address the House on second reading of Bill C-18, an Act to provide for the settlement of claims by Indian bands in British Columbia relating to certain lands cut off from their reserves.

Mr. Speaker, this Bill concerns the settlement of a particular kind of land claims made by Indian bands in British Columbia. They are referred to as the cut-off lands claims.

Members from British Columbia will recall that twenty-two Indian bands in that province have for a long time been seeking to obtain the right to compensation for lands cut off from their reserves, without their consent, in 1920.

The primary objective of this Bill is to give the Indian bands concerned the power to enter into agreements with the Government of Canada and the Government of British Columbia in order to settle these claims. Mr. Speaker, this legislation will confirm existing agreements and give them force of law. It will also authorize the Governor in Council to enter into future agreements.

Mr. Speaker, I feel this Bill deserves to be approved by all Members of this House, and I wish to give my reasons for asking the House to support this legislation.

First of all, there are pressing reasons for bringing this Bill to your attention at this time. In fact, when an agreement was signed nearly two years ago by the federal Government, the Government of British Columbia and the Penticton Band, it was understood that the necessary federal legislation would have to be passed by March 6, 1984. If that condition is not met, the Government of British Columbia will no longer be bound to give the band its share of financial compensation and transfer of land to the band will be delayed. However, the Government of British Columbia, pending adoption of federal legislation, has agreed to give back to the band nearly 5,000 hectares of reserve land and to pay the band $1.2 million. Mr. Speaker, that is why this Bill is now a priority. The Bill should have been submitted earlier for second reading, but when the draft legislation was tabled in the House last June, a number of bands asked for changes. Since everyone agreed on the nature of the amendments, the Bill was redrafted. The cut-off lands episode explains why the Indians doubted the good faith of the two governments concerned and the rationale of their policies and methods. Before and after British Columbia entered Confederation in 1871, some Crown land had been set aside for the Indian bands. From the outset, the federal Government and the government of the new province had differences of opinion regarding the size of the reserves. The province maintained that federal plans for establishing large reserves would adversely affect the establishment of new settlers and their activities. According to the province, the area taken up by mountains and forests would greatly reduce the amount of land suitable for settlement. To resolve this question, in 1912 the federal Government appointed Mr. J. A. McKenna as Special Commissioner, who was to meet a number of times with Sir Richard McBride, the Premier of British Columbia, and the result of these meetings was what became known as the McKenna-McBride Agreement.

Mr. Speaker, this Agreement provided for the creation of a Royal Commission of Inquiry. The Commission consisted of five members, and its mandate was to settle the reserve question by means of significant changes:

1. To cut off from the reserves any land that did not really meet a specific need, with the consent of the Indians;

2. To add lands to reserves that were too small;

3. To create new Indian reserves as appropriate.

According to the Agreement, Mr. Speaker, the cut-off lands would be sold and the proceeds shared equally between both governments. The federal Government's share was to be used for the benefit of the bands concerned. The Commission held hearings throughout British Columbia.

Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may be allowed to read part of a speech made in June 1913 by the Chairman of the Commission to Indians on the Capilano Reserve:

> If a reserve includes a portion of land that is in excess of the actual needs of the Indians living on the reserve, the Commission will determine the portion of land to be cut off. However, said portion may be withdrawn only with the consent of the Indians concerned.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is clear there was an obligation to consult members of the bands concerned before cutting off a single portion of land from the reserves. Because of these guarantees, which were repeated and put in writing many times, the band chiefs were co-operative and well disposed in their discussions with the Commission.

At a meeting of the Metlakatla Band in 1915, the Chief stated as follows:

> We want the Indian reserve of Metlakatla to enjoy a measure of security. We do not agree with the young people who want lands to be cut off from our reserve. However, we do not, for the time being, wish to speak out publicly against this plan. We leave it to you to decide what is best for us, and we want to protect our reserve.

Mr. Speaker, the McKenna-McBride Commission submitted its report three years later, in 1916. However, immediately after the report was published, the British Columbia Legislative Assembly adopted the Indian Affairs Settlement Act, and in 1920, the Parliament of Canada passed the British Columbia Indian Lands Settlement Act. This Act, however, eliminated the need to obtain the consent of the bands.

That is what has caused discontent among the Indians of British Columbia for over 60 years. Mr. Speaker, the twenty-two bands concerned consider this a violation of the McKenna-McBride Agreement, since the lands were, in fact, cut off without their consent.

Since that time, their chiefs have never ceased to urge both governments to settle their claims and give back the lands. Finally, in 1969, although technically not responsible, the federal Government agreed to negotiate a settlement. Federal and provincial authorities started discussions, and in 1977, the two governments started tripartite negotiations with a committee representing the twenty-two bands.

At the beginning of 1981, Mr. Speaker, the committee decided it was unable to pursue negotiations for the time being. At this point, the individual bands, on the basis of general principles previously agreed to, started to negotiate directly with both levels of government. Among other things, it was agreed that where feasible, the lands originally cut off would be returned to the bands. The land claims cover over 12,000 hectares, but about 10 per cent of the cut-off lands will not be given back to the Indians.

The federal Government will pay compensation for lands that are now the property of a third party. The Province is already offering compensation for cut-off lands it wishes to keep for public use, as well as compensation for damages caused over the years on cut-off lands that are to be returned to the Indians.

Mr. Speaker, Hon. Members will probably be interested to hear some details of the agreements concluded to date with six of the bands, to improve their understanding of this Bill.

• (1220)

First, more than 4,900 hectares of land will be returned to the Penticton Band, the first one to reach a settlement. The Band will also receive about $13 million from the Government of Canada and $1.2 million from British Columbia.

The Osoyoos Band will receive $634,000 from the Government of Canada and nearly $360,000 from the Government of British Columbia. In addition, about 70 hectares of land will be returned to the Clinton Band, which will also receive $10,000 from the Province of British Columbia and $140,000 from the Government of Canada.

The Westbank Band will recover 22 hectares of land plus $7 million paid by the Government of Canada and about $1 million from the Government of British Columbia.

The Squamish Band will receive over 45 hectares of land, almost $1 million from the Canadian Government and more than one-half million dollars from British Columbia.

Finally, the Okanagan Band will receive 27 hectares of land, plus $1.4 million from the Government of Canada and $32,000 from British Columbia. This settlement has yet to be ratified by the Band.

Mr. Speaker, behind these figures there is a depth of feeling that cannot be quantified. At a signing ceremony attended by the Band Chiefs of the Westbank, Okanagan and Squamish bands, and the Attorney General of British Columbia, this is what Chief Mathias of the Squamish Band said, and I quote:

> Now our people can once more walk the 115 acres of the Capilano Squamish reserve and face the sun with pride. This is a historic event.

Chief Mathias went on:

> The struggle is almost over, and it warms my heart to see the Attorney General of British Columbia and the Minister of Indian Affairs of Canada signing an agreement with us on the matter of the cut-off lands.

Mr. Speaker, at this point I would like to emphasize the important role played by British Columbia. Without the good will and co-operation of this Province, the problem would never have been resolved.

Mr. Speaker, the Province has provided millions of dollars, but also and more important, it has provided for the transfer of 12,000 hectares of land which can now be returned to the descendants of the original population, once this legislation is passed. Agreements signed up to now have shown once again that the Government of British Columbia and the Government of Canada can work together to serve the native peoples of this Province. The work done by British Columbia is invaluable, and there will be further meetings with the Attorney General of the Province to sign other land claims settlements.

Among all the parties concerned, the band chiefs have had the most important role to play. Through patience, perseverance and determination, they have now been able to recover their lands.

I would like to say a few words about the urgent aspect of this Bill and the negotiations that followed the tabling of the draft legislation last June. In the course of negotiations between Canada, British Columbia and the Penticton Band, we all agreed to include a provision stipulating that special federal and provincial legislation would become effective within two years after the agreement was approved by the Band by means of a referendum. Mr. Speaker, the Penticton Band approved the agreement by referendum on March 6, 1982, and the Legislative Assembly of the Province of British Columbia passed a Bill in July of that year concerning the cut-off Indian lands. The agreement concluded with the Penticton Band, and with many others, contains a provision that funds payable to the Band by the Province are to be held in trust for two years.

Mr. Speaker, I must point out that if the federal legislation is not enacted between now and March 6, 1984—within 15 days—the $1 million held in trust for the Penticton Band and the $200,000 in interests on that money will go to the province. As you recall, Mr. Speaker, I said earlier that more than 12,000 hectares of land will be returned to the 22 bands. Those lands cannot be returned to the province before this Bill is passed, which goes to show how urgent the adoption of this measure has become, Mr. Speaker.

Proposed legislation dealing with those agreements was tabled in the House on June 14, 1983. That decision was taken because a number of bands had made it clear that they would not sign any agreement nor even continue the negotiations before seeing a copy of the draft legislation. When the proposed legislation was tabled, some bands began to wonder whether the Bill might not have something to do with all sorts of claims. Such was not the purpose of the Bill which had been drafted so as to allow only for the settlement of claims concerning cut-off lands. We negotiated with the band spokesmen to allay their fears. The bands were particularly worried about an expression contained in the proposed legislation. It had to do with the status of reserve lands between 1871 and 1938 and read as follows:

> —that the Province of British Columbia had designated for the use and benefit of Indians—

After lengthy consultations, Mr. Speaker, the expression was changed and now reads as follows:

> —set aside for the use and benefit of Indians—

But the Indians had other worries, Mr. Speaker. Among others, one of their concerns was that the law might be interpreted to apply to lands other than cut-off lands. To meet that objection, we added a seventh clause, as follows:

> Nothing in this Act affects any claims asserted by a band or the council of the band other than claims in respect of cut-off lands.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to tell the Hon. Member that, following these amendments, we received last December a letter from the Union of British Columbia Indian Chiefs informing us that all the bands but one had withdrawn their objections to this draft. We are now negotiating with the band still objecting to the draft and we hope to reach an agreement in the near future.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that we now have a better proposal which has been accepted by all the parties involved, namely the Province of British Columbia, the Government of Canada, and more importantly, the bands and native associations.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation must be passed without delay because, as I have already mentioned, these agreements include a provision for prescription after two years. In the case of the Penticton Band, this two-year period will end this coming March 6. If the legislation is not passed at that time, the band will loose $1 million plus $200,000 in interests and will not recover its lands. The same applies to the other agreements which have been signed. We are getting close to the end of the prescription period, Mr. Speaker, and these bands are running the risk of losing similar amounts.

Their impatience is therefore quite understandable and legitimate.

As I was saying, a few days ago, we received a letter from the Union of British Columbia Indian Chiefs urging us to pass the legislation before the second anniversary of the Penticton agreement. The Chiefs believe that if this legislation is not passed, it will cause prejudice to the bands and the spirit of the negotiations will not be respected. I must add that this Bill, which allows us to make good some of the inequities which still affect 10,000 registered Indians who are also our fellow-citizens, deserves to be supported by everyone. In this way, those who live on these lands will be able to continue to work on building a better future.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to close by quoting comments made recently by Chief Murray Alexis at a signing ceremony. He said the following:

> What I can already foresee is that relations will improve between our communities. Whatever our racial origins, whether we are of the first founding nations or of the newcomers, we may be able today to begin everything afresh and build this country together.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, for the welfare of the Indians of British Columbia, I ask that Bill C-18 be passed quickly so that finally justice may come to the native peoples of British Columbia.

[English]

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Mr. Speaker, this is the first opportunity I have had as official spokesman for—

Some Hon. Members: Questions.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order. According to the Standing Orders there is no question period after the first three speakers on second reading. The first three speakers are allowed 40 minutes and the Parliamentary Secretary has not used all his time, but that does not mean there can be questions. There will be questions after the first three speakers.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I will try to start again. This is the first opportunity I have had to address the House as official spokesman for Her Majesty's loyal opposition on matters concerning the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It is a pleasure for me to take part in the debate on Bill C-18, an Act to provide for the settlement of claims by Indian bands in British Columbia relating to certain lands cut off from their reserves.

Our Party supports this Bill, Mr. Speaker. We understand the urgency and we will not delay it unduly. As a matter of fact, our Party will assure that it receives all three readings and passage some time today. However, I am extremely disappointed that the Bill has been brought in so late and that the Parliamentary Secretary made it sound as though the Opposition was holding up the Bill. Nothing is further from the truth. The Government controls the timetable of the House. This Bill was just recently introduced to the House, and it is somewhat typical of the actions of this Government to bring Bills in at the last moment thus causing great unsettlement among the Indian bands who are going to derive some monetary benefits from these settlements. It could have been introduced and passed much earlier.

I might add that the Minister sees fit not to be here today, Mr. Speaker. He wrote me a letter explaining that he had other commitments. My concern is that the commitment is to the Liberal Party of the Northwest Territories, not to the 22 Indian bands of British Columbia affected by this very important legislation. I am very disappointed that he is fulfilling a political commitment to the Liberal Association of the Northwest Territories rather than fulfilling his parliamentary responsibility to be here to discuss this very important Bill.

I might say also that the briefing notes I received from the Department were all in Imperial measure, describing the lands as acreage. I noticed the Parliamentary Secretary went to metric. It will be very interesting to find out what standard they are using over there in the Ministry. This Government is so hep on the metric system, and the Parliamentary Secretary used it today, yet all the briefing notes refer to acreage. Therefore the House will pardon me if I discuss acreage today. I think most of us understand that a little better in any event.

We are talking today about cut-off lands. We are not talking about original land claims, the comprehensive or specific claims presently being discussed throughout the country. We are talking about lands taken either by government survey, federal Orders in Council or just encroachment on Indian reserve lands which have been set up since around the 1860s. These lands were taken without consultation and without the permission of the Indian bands affected. There are 22 bands involved and, as the Parliamentary Secretary explained, 16 are being negotiated at the present time, five have been settled and one is under review. Although I should not speak for my friends to the left, both geographically and philosophically, I think it is fair to say that all three Parties want to correct the injustice committed here and restore to the native people in British Columbia that which is rightfully theirs. There is no question that the land belongs to the bands and that compensation must be made.

On January 29, Mr. Speaker, I had a very enjoyable visit to the Penticton band reserve. I had the pleasure of accompanying the Member of Parliament for that area, the Hon. Member for Okanagan-Similkameen (Mr. King), to Penticton. I met with Chief Steward Phillip, Louise Eneas and Emory Gabriel. Because of my specific involvement with that particular band and the importance of this Bill to them, I would just like to relate my experience there in late January. They have coming to them from the British Columbia Government some $1 million, together with some $200,000 in interest which has built up over the past two years while the money was held in trust. They have also received in federal compensation some $13 million. They will realize a little over $14.6 million in compensation, together with 12,211 acres. Part of the 14,207 acres cut off is now the Penticton airport as well as a housing development.

This band, Mr. Speaker, has a beautiful reserve high in the hills overlooking Penticton in the Okanagan Valley. Under the leadership of Chief Stewart Phillip, they have wisely invested the moneys received to date. They just erected on their reserve 40 brand-new homes which members of the band will be paying for but which, of course, will be built with the help of the interest from the invested moneys. These homes are magnificent, some 1,000 or 1,100 square feet in area. The band is investing and spending the money in a responsible way and I gather they are very pleased with what has transpired. They were, naturally, very concerned that this Bill would not get through the House in time for them to receive the money the British Columbia Government holds for them. Of course, as I stated earlier today, we will allay those fears as we pass this legislation through the House in all three stages.

There are a number of matters which have not been solved as yet and negotiations are ongoing. I urge the federal Government to accelerate the tripartite negotiations which are going on. I realize that the British Columbia Government is involved as well. I have taken the liberty of speaking to the attorney general from British Columbia on this subject. He is anxious to carry out the negotiations, to ensure that this Bill is passed and the lands and moneys come to the Indians.

I would like to discuss the importance of Indian relations today in Canada. We are at a crossroads. I would be very concerned if the Government persisted in bringing in legislation, whether pertaining to self-government, compensation for comprehensive claims or whatever, and came running into the House with a sense of urgency with every Bill it might bring foward having to do with Indian affairs. The constitutional talks are going on right now. The Government has been using a ploy which I think is very unfair and which I would like to deny at this time. The Government is warning the aboriginal people of the country that if the Progressive Conservative Party gets elected as the Government of Canada the Indians will be in far worse shape than they are now because we will ignore their affairs. Nothing is further from the truth. I categorically deny that today. My colleagues and my Leader categorically deny that. Our interest is in our aboriginal people, as I hope everybody in the House is interested in our aboriginal people. Our interest is to do what is absolutely the best for them and, in consultation with them, arrive at solutions that make good sense and are in favour of the aboriginal people of this country.

I would urge Members from the Government side of the House not to spread these fears throughout the aboriginal community because that is very unfair. The aboriginal people will become pawns in a political game which is completely uncalled for. The non-partisanship should be very strong when dealing with our aboriginal people. I caution the Government against taking a tactic like that, which they have been doing and which I have had drawn to my attention from many quarters, including The Fifth Estate. I would ask the Parliamentary Secretary to take the message to the Government that this Party supports aboriginal rights and the aboriginal people and will continue the process of carrying out what is best for them.

The constitutional talks which are going on right now are dragging a little bit. I attended all of them and found them interesting but rather frustrating. The federal Government is not in fact expressing a position but sitting back and listening to everyone else. This is a bit of a disappointment. I am hopeful that within the next couple of weeks at the First Ministers' conference regarding aboriginal rights on March 8 and 9 there will be something forthcoming that all the parties involved in the debate can sink their teeth into to begin a meaningful dialogue. I underline the word meaningful. This will be to the betterment of the aboriginal people.

I say to the Parliamentary Secretary, through you, Mr. Speaker, that her Marjesty's Loyal Opposition supports this Bill. We will assure that it gets through the three readings today. I was somewhat surprised that the Parliamentary Secretary did not take the opportunity to refer the Bill to the Committee of the Whole today as opposed to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development. However, I may have missed it and we may come across that a little later on in debate.

Many Members of Her Majesty's Official Opposition will be speaking on this Bill today because it concerns them and they do have interest in it. In no way, shape or form is that to be interpreted as holding this Bill up because we will proceed with it today.

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on this very important Bill. It is an important Bill for the Indian people of British Columbia and for all British Columbians. I would first like to extend my congratulations to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) for the Bill and for the progress it symbolizes in correcting some long-standing injustice. It is not often I have an opportunity to congratulate the Minister and I am very glad to be able to give credit where credit is due.

Progress in land claim settlements across Canada has been painfully slow. This is especially true in British Columbia. It is much slower than I want to see. Presumably it is slower than what the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development would like to see, and certainly it is much slower than the Indian people would like to see. This Bill and the agreements which have led to it indicate some progress. I believe that the Minister deserves some credit for this. I believe that credit should also be given to the Government of British Columbia for finally making some progress on this one aspect of specific land claims.

Bill C-18 approves agreements involving the federal Government, the provincial Government of British Columbia and certain Indian bands in British Columbia which have had reserve lands taken from them as a result of the McKenna-McBride Commission, which held hearings between 1913 and 1916. Where agreements with the bands for compensation or return of lands have not yet been reached, the Bill provides for approval by the Governor in Council. Basically, Mr. Speaker, this Bill allows the federal Government to pay funds which have been negotiated with the Indian bands as part of the federal share of compensation.

It is important to note that the cut-off lands issue is separate from the related but larger issue of aboriginal land claims in British Columbia. It is time the Government of British Columbia recognized the validity of these claims and entered into serious negotiations. In this connection I would like to emphasize the importance of Clause 7 which was an important addition to the draft legislation tabled last June. Clause 7 provides:

> Nothing in this Act affects any claims asserted by a band or the council of the band other than claims in respect of cut-off lands.

There were many Indian bands which were rather fearful of the agreements and earlier legislation which did not have this kind of clause. They were afraid that entering into an agreement of the cut-off lands would prejudice their case as far as the larger aboriginal claims which most of the Indian bands in British Columbia are asserting at the present time. Cut-off lands refer to those lands which had once been reserves and were cut off by various government actions. It is important to note that the McKenna-McBride Commission cut-offs were not the first and not the last of such cut-offs. They were the most blatant sign of high-handed government action that ignored the basic rights and wishes of the Indian people. It was also a very blatant indication of collusion between the provincial government and the federal Government at that time.

The history of Indian reserves in British Columbia has not been a happy one. At the beginning, the Indian people had all of the land. Aboriginal title in British Columbia is still something that they assert to the total area. They had well defined territories and there were clear divisions among the different Indian nations of British Columbia.

• (1250)

Settlement began on Vancouver Island under the auspices of the Hudson's Bay Company and the chief factor, Sir James Douglas. He later became Governor of the Crown colony of Vancouver Island, the sister colony of British Columbia, and finally the united colony of British Columbia. He negotiated some treaties with some of the Indian peoples around Victoria and Nanaimo. These treaties implicitly recognized the rights of Indian people to their land and they were, in a sense, negotiations for the use of resources to which the Indian people had valid claim.

Later, as governor of both Vancouver Island and British Columbia and then of the united colony, Governor Douglas ordered that reserves be set aside in accordance with the wishes of the Indian people themselves. That is, that the size of these reserves was not to be dictated by government but rather that the needs of the Indian people were to be met. These reserves were not to be reduced either by encroachment of settlers or by legislative action. In retrospect, Governor Douglas had a fairly generous policy.

However, in 1865, after the era of Governor Douglas had ended, Joseph Trutch became the new commissioner of lands and later became lieutenant-governor. Under his leadership a much different policy was adopted. The British Columbia Government refused to recognize aboriginal title and it reduced the size of the reserves that had been set up by Governor Douglas and which he said should not be encroached upon. It prohibited Indian people from buying land outside the reserve and discriminated against Indian people in the development or use of Crown land.

All of this was in spite of vigorous protests on the part of Indian people. Indian people in British Columbia have fought vigorously against government and non-governmental attempts to take away their rights. This is true of Indian people right across Canada. While the Indian movement is not simply something that has grown up in the last 10 or 15 years, the significance of the last few years has been the new sense of unity that is growing. It is still a fragile unity but Indian people have always tried to assert their rights.

Between 1876 and 1910 there was a federal-provincial Indian reserve commission. The job of that commission was to review the size of the reserves, some of which had been cut back by Mr. Trutch, and to establish new reserves in areas where they had not been set up. Sometimes reserves were enlarged and sometimes they were diminished.

The consultation that was supposed to take place with Indian bands was often very haphazard. After the commission had established new reserves, the very reactionary governments that existed in British Columbia at that time did not always recognize or approve these new reserves. This meant that the Indian people, even after they had a commission that recommended an enlarged reserve, could not always get the concurrence of the provincial government. There were continual hassles between the federal and provincial governments about the size of the reserve and the generosity of reserves.

Generally speaking, the reserves in British Columbia are only a fraction of the size of reserves in other parts of Canada.

Finally, an agreement was reached between the federal representative, Mr. McKenna, and the provincial premier, Sir Richard McBride, on September 24, 1912. They established a commission which was to tour throughout British Columbia and meet with Indian bands. According to Section 2 of the agreement that was reached on September 24, 1912, the commission had power to adjust the acreage of Indian reserves in British Columbia in the following manner:

(a) At such places as the Commissioners are satisfied that more land is included in any particular Reserve as now defined than is reasonably required for the use of the Indians of that tribe or locality, the Reserve shall, with the consent of the Indians, as required by the Indian Act, be reduced to such acreage as the Commissioners think reasonably sufficient for the purposes of such Indians.

(b) At any place at which the Commissioners shall determine that an insufficient quantity of land has been set aside for the use of Indians of that locality, the Commissioners shall fix the quantity that ought to be added for the use of such Indians. And they may set aside land for any Band of Indians for whom land has not already been reserved.

It is important to note in those terms of reference that any land that was to be reduced had to have the consent of the Indian people and that this was in accordance with the Indian Act itself.

As the commission travelled throughout British Columbia, the Indian people were assured that no action would be taken without their consent. But this assurance meant absolutely nothing. Some 36,000 acres were taken from 22 Bands absolutely without their consent and indeed over their strong and vigorous protests.

In 1920 the federal Government ratified this action by passing The British Columbia Indian Lands Settlement Act. Since Section 3 of that Act is instructive for our purposes this afternoon, I would like to read it:

For the purpose of adjusting, readjusting or confirming the reductions or cutoffs from reserves in accordance with the recommendations of the Royal Commission, the Governor in Council may order such reductions or cutoffs to be effected without surrenders of the same by the Indians, notwithstanding any provisions of the Indian Act to the contrary—

This is important when we get to Clause 4 of Bill C-18. Clause 4 reads:

4. Negotiations toward an agreement described in subsection 3(1), whether or not those negotiations result in such an agreement, do not constitute an admission by Her Majesty in right of Canada of the existence of any legal obligation of Her Majesty in right of Canada toward the band in question.

In other words, it was all done very legally. The Indian people were robbed of their lands by an Act that was passed by Parliament. That is legal as far as Bill C-18 is concerned and I suppose as far as the law of Canada is concerned, but it is not moral or just. Indian people have never accepted it. It has left a legacy of distrust so that when any of us, whether on the Liberal side or the Opposition side, speak to Indian people about legislation that might protect their rights, they are very rightly skeptical. The Indian Act contains many restrictions that have hampered their development over the years but also has built-in protection so that their lands could not be surrendered without their consent. The Indian people have seen how much that protection has meant once Parliament decided to take away that right. The 1920 Act simply removed their right to vote on a surrender of lands and took it from them.

In addition to the official cut-offs following the McKenna-McBride Commission, the Ditchburn-Clark Commission was to review the recommendations of McKenna-McBride. Again, the Indian people were robbed of additional lands and resources.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order. I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member but we have reached one o'clock. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Might we seek the unanimous consent of the House to refer the Bill, when second reading is concluded, to the Committee of the Whole instead of to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development?

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, this is the first chance I have had to congratulate you on your appointment as Acting Speaker. There have been consultations between the various Parties. I welcome the co-operation of the Hon. Member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid). It would be our disposition to have this Bill go to Committee of the Whole House and then be read a third time later this day.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Is there unanimous consent to proceed directly to a Committee of the Whole?

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Perhaps the Chair could have something in writing as to exactly what the House wants to do. I can then give the Hon. Member the floor once again.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I was seeking the unanimous consent of the House once second reading is over—there are still some speakers—for the Bill to go to a Committee of the Whole today and then have third reading, as opposed to what was stated initially this morning, namely, that the Bill go to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I am seeking unanimous consent, which the Minister has given and I believe my colleague from the New Democratic Party will give it as well.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Is there unanimous consent for the proposal made by the Hon. Member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid)?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

● (1410)

Mr. Manly: Mr. Speaker, at one o'clock I was referring to the McKenna-McBride Commission which had the job of reviewing the findings of the Ditchburn-Clark Commission. I pointed out that in additional cases Indian people had land taken away from them. In addition to St. Mary's No. 1, the McKenna-McBride Commission allotted 1,280 acres to be designated as Indian Reverve No. 1A. Ditchburn-Clark nullified this and the reserve was never confirmed.

With regard to the Kitimat Indian Band, the McBride Commission ordered a ten-acre reserve cut-off. Ditchburn-Clark amended this by recommending that it be considered a "disallowed application", not a cut-off. That means that the Kitimat people are not eligible under the terms of this Bill or the federal-provincial agreement to have a claim for the cut-offs. In addition, we have the situation of the Lower Kootenay Band. It had a temporary reserve granted, which was kind of a funny status, before the McKenna-McBride Commission appeared.

I referred earlier to Section 2(b) of the terms of reference of the McKenna-McBride Commission which had the power to recommend enlargement of reserves. They did this. They issued an interim report No. 80 recommending additional lands. The final report of the McKenna-McBride Commission completely ignored this and in fact cut off 2,370 acres from the Lower Kootenay Band, leaving it with only 365 acres.

The Lower Kootenay Band at present is accusing the McKenna-McBride Commission of a form of fraud. They have submitted a specific claim which does not come under the terms of the cut-off lands legislation. Nevertheless, we can get some idea of the way in which some of the commissioners operated not in the interest of the Indian people. I quote from page 28 of the Lower Columbia submission:

> On May 13, 1915 Royal Commissioner D. M. MacDowell wrote to Guy Lowenberg in Creston "P.S. Confidentially I can tell you that in dealing with the Creston Reserves we have not neglected your reclamation interests, and no doubt when you are ready to begin work you will be able to ascertain this through the Prov. Govt."

The Ditchburn-Clark Commission continued the process of whittling away at Indian reserves. The final transfer of Indian reserves to the federal Government in trust was not completed until 1938 when Order in Council 1036 was passed. Even that Order in Council reserved to the provincial government the power to expropriate up to one-twentieth of the land of any Indian reserves for highways, pipelines, utility lines, railroads or what have you, without compensation. The McKenna-McBride cut-offs have to be seen in the context of a long history of stealing Indian land by the Governments of Canada and British Columbia.

The movement toward the settlement of the McKenna-McBride cut-offs began in 1969 when the federal Government agreed to negotiate. In 1975 the British Columbia Government under Premier Dave Barrett agreed to negotiate. I am pleased that it was an NDP Government in Canada that finally began the process, but it has to be acknowledged that even that government did not come easily to this position.

I remember a large demonstration in the early summer of 1975 where Indian people were presenting their case to the NDP Government. I remember people going to the NDP convention that year and making a very strong case. They made the case to the rank and file membership of the New Democratic Party and they adopted convention policy that eventually led to the Government's change of policy. That is a heartening example of democracy at work. The Indian people recognize that there is a great deal of goodwill out there if they can only be heard and have their case made.

I want to make a few remarks about the principles of settlement. The money for this settlement comes out of the public purse. There are situations where land was taken from Indian bands and sold to private interests, yet the money for the settlement comes from the public purse. There is no displacement of individual residents. This is important. It indicates that the Government has acted in their interests as well as in the interests of the Indian people in this settlement. It is an important principle to remember when we consider other settlements, especially those relating to offshore rights of fisheries that are involved in some of the aboriginal claims presently accepted for negotiation in British Columbia.

We want to see full justice for the Indian people. It has to be paid for by all the people of Canada rather than just narrow segments. That refers specifically to the fact that an increased Indian participation in the fishery should not be solely at the expense of other British Columbia fishermen. The money involved in this settlement is not an overgenerous sum when you consider the loss of land involved.

I want to emphasize that this money has to be in addition to other moneys that would normally go to Indian bands in British Columbia. There are very disturbing indications that as the Government moves toward what it calls Indian self-government and gives Indian bands greater control, it is cutting off some other very important services. For example, the Urban Native Society of Vancouver has been involved in training urban Indian people in Vancouver over the last 20 years. The funding it received from the federal Government is being cut off.

This shucking off of responsibility and claiming that the bands have the authority to act is not good enough. Conditions have to be improved on the reserves so that people are not squeezed out of them and into the crowded downtown cores of our cities. In the meantime, we have to continue providing some help for those who do go to our cities. Consider a report by the Vancouver Native Peace Liaison Committee which estimates there are some 6,000 native Indian people in Vancouver. The federal Government is doing nothing to help them.

The agreements which have been reached with Indian bands are not perfect. There are assertions in the agreements of provincial title without a recognition of aboriginal title. This is offensive to the Indian people. The present provincial government is playing a very negative role in reaching settlements in the larger aboriginal claims.

Before we get too self-congratulatory on what we have been able to achieve in the cut-off claims, perhaps we should place this once again in the larger context of aboriginal claims. I will conclude by quoting a statement by Mr. Charles Wesley, a band spokesman for the Kispaiox people, when he appeared before the McKenna-McBride Commission in April, 1915. He said, and I quote:

● (1420)

I wish to tell you that this reserve that you have just spoken about is something that we don't wish for, for this reason; We don't want a reserve. This country originally belonged to our ancestors . . . and it is only quite recently that the Government sent men out here to measure this land immediately around us, and we were not notified of it when they did it; then the Provincial Government came in and sold the remaining land immediately around us. All the old camps up the Kispaiox river, where we used to gather our salmon, and our hunting camps, and where we used to pick berries, and what we most strenuously object to is that you insist upon us having this reserve. You have measured all these reserves and you say that that is yours—

We asked that the land which the Provincial Government had sold be returned or given back to us. The Bible is placed between us that we all act true—you gentlemen to speak the truth, the Interpreter to speak the truth, and I will speak the truth. We see it written . . . that the word of God is that a man is not to move another man's landmark. The land marked off for our ancestors was from mountain to mountain, and this is what the Government has picked up into small pieces. This is where our inheritances came from and where they were handed down from generation to generation, but now these have all been sold; therefore we ask that these be returned.

I am glad the Government has been able to negotiate with some of the bands for cut-off lands settlements and that the Government of British Columbia has participated in it. I welcome this Bill. I hope similar satisfactory agreements will be reached with other bands. I also urge upon the federal Government, and especially upon the provincial government, to get on with the act of negotiating and settling the larger and more basic aboriginal claims which Indian people have submitted and which, in the opinion of our Party, are very just.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I want to take a few brief moments to add some comments to this debate. We on this side of the House have been very instrumental and active in helping to facilitate the discussions which are culminating here today, namely, the ratification by Parliament of the understanding reached among the Province of British Columbia, the Government of Canada and the Indian people affected by the B.C. cut-off lands question.

Some of my colleagues have already participated in this matter. Those who follow will talk about the history of this long outstanding question. The Province of British Columbia was never very satisfied with the conditions attached to the agreement to join Confederation, particularly with regard to Indian lands. If one researches the debates and the discussions in British Columbia from the time B.C. joined Confederation until the McKenna-McBride Commission was appointed, one will find that the debates with regard to this question were always acrimonious and bitter. Many people felt that the Indians were treated too generously and that the reserves, the land set aside for them, were in the way of development in the B.C. region. Of course, today all of us have a much more enlightened view about that, and it is today that we are attempting to redress some of the injustices of the past—the deliberate deceptions which we have perpetrated upon our Indian brothers and sisters, the injury of contracts into which we have entered with them, and the treaties and conventions which exist between us.

Basically the settlement is designed either to restore land affected by the cut-off provisions or, in cases where land has been alienated to the point where it can no longer be returned to Indian people, to have the two senior governments enter into an agreement and arrive at a formula whereby they would be compensated for that land either by an exchange or cash payments.

I would like to refer to one example of a particular cut-off question. It concerns the Penticton Band and an agreement which is one of the three or four that are fully negotiated. The reserve area involved was about 14,000 acres. The area alienated was 12,000 acres. There is a federal contribution of $13,217,000 and a provincial contribution of $1 million to this particular band. It is one of the larger ones, if not the largest. Not all of them are that significant, but this example gives an idea of how significant and serious the injustices have been which we have perpetrated upon the Indians of British Columbia in the past.

Of course, one has to understand that the situation in British Columbia is a unique one. There are treaties in B.C. Treaty No. 8 comes in from the east and takes in most, if not all, of the area east of the Rocky Mountains. The rest of the province is not covered by treaties, except for smaller ones in the lower mainland area. The remainder of the province has not been settled and treaties have not been negotiated. Some Indian people in the province claim that no settlements have ever been made, that no arrangements have ever been made, that indeed they have never selected any land and that all the land is up for negotiation.

Therefore we are pleased that it was possible to bring the three actors in this drama together and to arrive at an agreement, inadequate as it will obviously be, which will certainly put that question behind us. I am particularly pleased. I join with the Hon. Member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands (Mr. Manly) in the assertion that, while this will put the cut-off land question behind us, it is certainly not to be seen as a solution to the larger, outstanding question of comprehensive claims and some specific claims which have yet to be settled in the province. I would prefer, as I always have, to have this long outstanding question dealt with in a very expeditious manner and as much as possible with the legitimate concerns, rights and aspirations of the Indian people in mind.

We are at a very critical time in our history as far as Indian people are concerned. We are at a crossroads. Much has happened over the last three or four years particularly, some of it brought on by the decision that we should have an entrenched Constitution and that we should patriate it. Of course, the question as to how our Indian people would be respected and recognized in the constitution had to be decided.

The decision could not be made before the actual patriation and entrenchment took place.

Therefore, the partners in the scheme, the provincial and federal governments, decided that a series of constitutional conferences should be held designed to resolve this particular problem. One such conference will be held next month. It will be the second in a series of these conferences. Indian people are very much engaged in the process of deciding themselves just what kind of role they should be playing in the future of our Confederation.

● (1430)

If one studies history and the proclamations, treaties, contracts and conventions that have existed since 1763 when the first one was signed, one cannot help but be sympathetic to the view of some Indians and their leaders in the country. They still hold that, considering the past, an effective way will never be found to permit them to join society in a participatory way that would help them regain their self-respect and allow them to pursue their legitimate aspirations for themselves and future generations. Those Indian leaders say to their brothers and sisters that the answer to their problem would be self-government outside the framework of confederation and the existing institutions in the country.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, with seven colleagues I participated in a two-year study of Indian self-government. We came to the conclusion, which I should like to think is supported by the majority of Indian people in the country, that a partial answer to redressing some of the past injustices would be to encourage them to join Canada as full citizens and in a way that would permit them to establish a distinct form of self-government which could be brought into the framework of Confederation. I will spend whatever time I have to work on this objective.

The committee of which I was a member and the report of which I was co-author suggest a way to bring about a kind of self-government structure which could function within the framework of Confederation. It would permit Indian people to begin the long, tedious process of recapturing their past, recovering their self-respect, rebuilding their economy and recapturing the soul they lost when the land was taken from them, and to build their culture. It can easily be seen that this would require a form of self-government that would exceed the powers of municipal governments and in some cases even the powers of provincial governments. It would mean that the Indian people would take charge and accept the responsibility that goes along with managing one's own affairs, planning the future of one's children and assuming control of one's life. The rest of us would have to make the necessary accommodations to make that possible.

The Bill is a small step in the long, tedious process in this long journey which we must all take together to remove the incredible shame that hangs over all Canadian society for the treatment of our Indian people over the last 300 years. This is not a perfect solution, but for those that are affected by the cut-off land question it would redress the injustice that was particularly associated with the work of the McKenna-McBride Commission and the collusion of the provincial and federal governments at that time.

I am proud to be associated with passage of the Bill and since we want it to pass all stages today I will end my remarks at this point.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Questions or comments? Debate.

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have a few moments to put on record some of the problems that passage of Bill C-18 will leave with a good portion of my constituency. Let me preface my remarks by saying that I realize how long and hard these negotiations have been and what an hour this is for an injustice perpetrated in our history to be corrected.

In the riding of Capilano we have a very wealthy, very powerful, very skilled Indian band. Its leaders are as skilled in the art of politics as any group of people in the country. They are a source of pride to those of us who live around the Squamish Band reserve. They own properties through First Narrows on the north of Burrard Inlet all the way through to Lonsdale. They own very valuable real estate and are an extremely wealthy band, not only at present but potentially in the future.

The City of North Vancouver has no problem with the return of the cut-off land. I have spoken to the mayor and the council of the City of North Vancouver and they are happy that this is proceeding. The Corporation of the District of North Vancouver really has no problem other than the fact that we built our sewage plant on Indian cut-off lands and the District of North Vancouver, the Municipality of West Vancouver and the City of North Vancouver are subject to a whole new cost and arrangement for sewage flow. From correspondence I have had with the Corporation of the District of North Vancouver, I believe that the Greater Vancouver regional district and these municipalities have arranged something in the order of $70,000 initial lease rental on that plant. The surrounding municipalities and the Indian band and properties are very closely integrated in terms of service, bus, water, electricity, road access, building permits and all by-laws. There is now an interface that could cause some concern and anxiety to the municipalities.

The municipality in the riding of Capilano that has cause for anxiety as a result of the cut-off land settlement is the Municipality of West Vancouver. In that municipality 25.9 acres, that is the parcel titled Lot 5521, make up soccer fields, a pitch and putt golf course, the beach, the playground—it really makes up a regional park that serves the Greater Vancouver district. The Municipality of West Vancouver has spent much money and talent over the years in developing this park. In addition, there is a wildlife refuge and some very attractive ponds.

This complete recreation area, this open expanse, when classified or appraised and assessed as park land, comes out at a value of $3 million and, when classified and assessed for highest and best use in terms of high-rise development, comes out with a value of forty-odd million dollars. That kind of price differential has caused an element of friction between the Municipality of West Vancouver and the Indian band.

I can agree with the chiefs of the Indian bands—and I compliment them on their skills—when they say that they want the land returned, that they need to have it in their hands because it was taken from them by fraud. They want it in order to have the leverage to deal properly and more favourably with the Municipality of West Vancouver. Bill C-18 leaves a good part of the riding of Capilano with the prospect of a major set of negotiations in the future.

I want to see if, in my duties as a Member of Parliament, I can reduce the tensions of that interface as we come into the next few years. For instance, the municipality has a no sign bylaw. On the Indian lands, which surround the entrance to the Lions Gate bridge, one can imagine the value of neon signs, billboards and so on. So this kind of interface with the municipalities is a potential source of trouble. As well the municipalities provide the access, the services, much of the water and everything else for the Indian band, and it is because of this leverage, this teeter-totter of new bargaining position which the Squamish Indian Band has picked up, that we are going to have a most interesting period, particularly for those politicians who serve the Municipality of West Vancouver.

I will not relate the history, nor the justice which is being done in the passage of Bill C-18, Mr. Speaker. I believe the speakers on behalf of the Government and the critics from the Progressive Conservative Party and New Democratic Party have covered that aspect of the Bill. I am going to hold my few remarks to some of the problems and make a plea to both the Indian band in Capilano and the Municipality of West Vancouver to enter into high-level negotiations with the spirit of co-operation, rather than have a long, lengthy period of confrontation which will create tensions and unnecessary anxieties in the future.

Something else which complicates that situation in Capilano, Mr. Speaker, is the fact that back in 1972 an upstart candidate came along and decided to run against the Fisheries Minister of the Liberal Government. That Fisheries Minister had something like a majority of 28,800. Anyone who would consider running against that very talented, very well educated Rhodes scholar who served the Liberal Party, had to be nuts and had to be defeated. I did a pretty good job of cutting his majority down. My goodness, Mr. Speaker, what a cost the people of Canada have paid ever since.

During the 1972 election the Government was throwing money around as only Liberals can.

An Hon. Member: As they do now.

Mr. Huntington: The year 1972 was the shade of things to come because this Minister of Fisheries decided that he would move all the West Coast environmental and fisheries offices into a location on the waterfront in First Narrows on the Indian reserve. And we have been paying an annual adjusted cost rental on that vacant property—which still has the same bullrushes and swamp grass it had in 1972—of $6.7 million to the Indian band for that political promise of the then Minister of Fisheries. We have been living with this for a long time, Mr. Speaker. About two or three years ago, the solicitor for the Indian band approached its Member of Parliament and asked if he would assist in having the federal Government co-ordinate all the potential public works projects for final development on that land which we have been paying so dearly for. We started into very quiet negotiations. I agreed automatically to keep it out of the political realm and see what would come to pass. Well, some three years have passed. A couple of Senators took the project over, I was no longer consulted and so nothing has happened. We do hear rumours that the fisheries station at Caulfield, which is also in my riding, is about to receive a magnificent permanent dwelling. The Department of Fisheries out there has a bricks and mortar complex, you must remember, Mr. Speaker, not protection of the species or the environment.

I suggest that instead of building that plant at Caulfield, it should be built on the very expensive land we have leased for the next 60 or 70 years. That is what the original agreement stated and the Indians are not going to accept anything less unless there are some major tradeoffs which would give them great advantage. Those Indians signed a lease with the federal Government which said that the Department of Fisheries and the Department of the Environment will locate structures on that land. The Indians agreed to this lease not just for the money, but because they saw it as an opportunity to attract other activities of a high standard and order to that centre so that the whole value of their surrounding lands would be enhanced.

We are very proud of the political and business acumen of the Indian leaders in my riding. They can outsmart us "honkies", or whatever one wants to call us, any time of the day. They have the time and patience which we do not. Money has been poured into the riding. Yet I feel the provincial government, in negotiating with the federal Government and with the Indian band, has really let the municipality and the residents of West Vancouver down because it did not consider the park land, the golf course and that whole recreational area. They are encumbered lands and those lands have now been returned to the Indian band. I suppose the Indians correctly and rightfully feel that the surrounding municipalities and residents have really been keeping the Indian lands as open space protection. We in West Vancouver do not know whether we are going to lose this beautiful park area, whether it is going to be covered with high-rise development or what.

I want to make a plea to these constituents and to the Indians, through the opportunity of this debate, to forget some of the things which have happened in the past. I believe officers of the municipality have been extremely rude and hard with Indian negotiators. I believe perhaps we in the outside municipality lack the negotiating skills which the Indian leaders have. Perhaps we can improve our approach to these negotiations. If we do not do this willingly, I believe we are going to be forced to do so just through the economic axe, which we have a tendency to understand. I would like to see the Indian band and the Municipality of West Vancouver find the right vehicle in which to tie all these things together, such as the Department of the Environment lease on the Indian lands. Instead of building a permanent fisheries research establishment at Caulfield, perhaps that should be considered as one of the tradeoffs. Perhaps a compromise has to be made in terms of high-rise development on Lot 5521 vis-à-vis some of it remaining open for parks. Certainly, the Indians must benefit from that openness and the beauty of that setting.

We are debating second reading of Bill C-18 today. This Bill is something we are all pleased to have happen. However, I must say that it does leave at least one of the ridings in Canada with some very major problems ahead of it. I would hope that a new spirit of negotiation can be started which will resolve with a minimum of disturbance and tension some of the problems left.

I cannot help but say I object most strenuously to Bills coming in at the last minute and being passed in this House through all stages on a Friday afternoon. I believe it is travesty of the purpose and function of this House and Members of Parliament. I want to remind you, Sir, that the same thing happened with Bill C-169. It passed all stages on a Friday afternoon and we trampled on some essential rights and freedoms. Each and every one of us in this House should be ashamed of doing so. We have not corrected that travesty because we got lazy, we got impatient, we had a deadline set on a Bill just as we have a deadline on this Bill. I have transcripts of meetings and negotiations between the municipalities and the provincial government going way back into last year, saying this Bill would be passed last fall. Yet here we are with a deadline of March 6 for this Bill and we are rushing through the speeches.

● (1450)

As a Member of Parliament I object most strenuously to that, and on behalf of my constituents I want to take this opportunity to apologize, because it was only this morning that I learned about this Bill coming forward today. That is probably my fault, I should have known about it yesterday. I also apologize for what I have done to the rights of free people in allowing Bill C-169 to pass through in a similar manner.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Questions and comments? Debate.

Mr. Vince Dantzer (Okanagan North): Mr. Speaker, like the Members before me, I am very happy to have the opportunity to speak on Bill C-18. This is the first time a Bill has come before this House which affords me an opportunity to tell this House about some of the Indian bands in my constituency. The Bill affects one band directly and presents me with what I think is a golden opportunity. It speaks of lands in the Okanagan Valley, so I can tell the House what these lands are, where they are, what they are like, what the temperature is there, and how much of a loss they were to the Indian bands. Some Members, and I hope that you are not one of them, Mr. Speaker, have not yet had the opportunity to visit the Okanagan Valley. I wish that everyone here, hopefully very soon, will have that opportunity. In the meantime I would like to give you an overall view of what is involved in these lands.

As I hope you know, the Okanagan is some 300 miles from the centre of "Lotus land", as some people call Vancouver.

Mr. Huntington: So is the Okanagan.

Mr. Dantzer: That is God's country. It is also 300 miles from the City of Calgary, so it is in the very enviable position of being right at the centre of everything that is important in western Canada.

As you may well know, the lake starts at the American border and goes up some 70 miles to where it ends in the lands of the Okanagan Indian Band. Midway is the City of Kelowna, at the south end is the City of Penticton, and at the very north end is the City of Vernon. That lake is one of the most pristine and beautiful lakes in all of Canada. Many of these cut-off lands were taken directly next to the lake so they were very valuable indeed.

The climate in the Okanagan, as I hope everyone knows, is one of the most beautiful in the world. We have four distinct seasons: a gentle winter, nice spring, hot and dry summer, and a nice long fall. These conditions are ideal for growing the many crops we do. In fact, starting from the border up to Vernon and beyond is probably one of the best fruit-producing areas in all of Canada. We grow many crops there, many vegetables, and we also do a great deal of lumbering. These are the kinds of activities the Indian bands located in my constituency are involved in, and they do them exceedingly well.

We have industry there, non-polluting industries, and oddly enough manufacturing is a very high income producer in the Okanagan even though that area is now rather depressed.

Speaking of Okanagan Lake, I would be somewhat remiss if I failed to mention another very important aspect of that lake and to add perhaps a little light relief to this dry debate today. I suppose many of you have heard of the Loch Ness monster. I hope you have all heard of the friendly monster in the Okanagan.

Mr. Huntington: Ogopogo.

Mr. Dantzer: Right you are, Ogopogo. I want to invite you, Mr. Speaker, and all Members of this House to visit the Okanagan next summer, to fish, frolic and have fun, and while you are there to try and make $1 million by finding, identifying and securing Ogopogo. Recently the Kelowna Chamber of Commerce, in conjunction with a contract with Lloyds of London, offered $1 million to anyone who identifies—

Mr. Manly: A point of order, Mr. Speaker. We are debating a very serious Bill affecting the Indian people of British Columbia. I do not think we need to hear a chamber of commerce announcement for the Okanagan, which is the second most beautiful part of British Columbia.

Mr. McDermid: Sit down, Manly. No one interrupted you.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Guilbault): Order. The point is well taken. Having lectured us very ably on the geography of his area, the Hon. Member would be well advised to try and bring his remarks more in line with the subject.

Mr. Dantzer: Mr. Speaker, I submit my remarks were in relation to the subject. I was talking about Ogopogo which brings tourists to the town, and it is a benefit to the Indians who live on the band reserve near and on the shores of that lake.

Mr. Huntington: They are all businessmen.

Mr. Dantzer: They are all very good businessmen. In my constituency, Mr. Speaker, we have two Indian bands, one being the Spallunchеen Band. That band has some 320 members, its chief is Wayne Christian and the band manager is Graham Go. There are three reserves for this band: Salmon River reserve, the Enderby reserve and the Sicamous reserve. The band is primarily occupied with forestry, including logging, and agriculture, farming and livestock. It might be of interest to know that that band has built some 26 new homes on reserves over the past three years.

The band most closely connected with Bill C-18 is, of course, the Okanagan Indian Band. Its chief is Murray Alexis, and the Parliamentary Secretary in his closing remarks quoted Murray Alexis at the time he signed contracts approving of this particular Bill. There are five reserves in this band: the Okanagan Indian reserve where about 600 members of the band live. Since there are only 875 members in total, this is by far the largest reserve and it sits right at the top of Okanagan Lake. There is Otter Lake reserve, the Harris Lake reserve, the Priest Valley reserve and the Duke Lake Indian reserve which is near the town of Winfield. These reserves were established at the time of the Indian settlements at the turn of the century, especially at the north end of the lakes where rivers and creeks provided the only means of transportation.

The Okanagan Indian Band is known for its independence of spirit. These Indians know and value their land. They have established many industries and farm communities. They have established good orchards, small market gardens and are highly responsible and independent. We in the Okanagan are very proud and pleased that they are part of our community. One of the great statesmen of that period was Chief Nichola, an Indian chief renowned throughout British Columbia for his wisdom and his skills in agriculture. In recognition of his leadership, he lies buried in honour at the head of Okanagan Lake. Some 35 new homes were placed in that band last year. By and large I would say they are a model for Indian bands throughout British Columbia.

• (1500)

I am very pleased to have an opportunity to speak to Bill C-18. We in the Okanagan do not have the conflict which the Member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) is faced with in his community. I am very happy with that. I can see he does have some difficulties. I am sure if they in that community use the wisdom and prudence which the Member has displayed on many occasions in the House they will resolve their problems very adequately. The Okanagan Indian Band is one of the 22 Indian bands whose original reserves were reduced in size without Indian consent. Much of that has been detailed in the House this afternoon.

I will describe the events in the Okanagan. As a result of the McKenna-McBride Commission of 1916 an area comprising 51.82 hectares of land was cut away from Long Lake Indian Reserve No. 5. The House might like to know that Long Lake is not now the Okanagan Lake, although that is what it should be. It is now called Lake Kalamalka, the lake of many colours. We do not dump any sewage into Kalamalka Lake that I am aware of. I live on the lake and I drink the water as it comes from the lake, as does everyone else around the lake, and we are all very healthy. We have very pristine, potable water in the Okanagan. It is probably one of the few places in the world where there is such pure water.

That was very valuable land which the Okanagan Indian Band lost. In 1983 the Government of Canada finally agreed to pay compensation of $1.4 million to the band for lands cut off which are no longer available to be returned. Subject to ratification by the band, the Province of British Columbia will return some 27.4 hectares of land and will pay $32,500 in full compensation of that claim.

We have been asked by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) to pass this Bill speedily in order to enable the federal Government to meet its responsibility, and in order that the provincial Government meet its responsibility and act under the agreement. I would not normally pay much attention to the Minister's request that we hurry this Bill through. I received a letter from Chief Murray Alexis written June 23, 1983. It reads in part as follows:

> We have reviewed the proposed legislation and have consulted our legal advisor to determine if the proposed legislation should be of concern to us. The Council has been advised that the legislation is in order and that it would be in the Band's best interest if it were passed without delay.

He goes on to say:

> The Okanagan Band Council has been advised that the above-noted legislation will be considered and possibly passed by Parliament prior to the 30th of June, 1983.
> To that end, we would request you to urge your fellow Members of Parliament to consider and pass this legislation prior to the recess of Parliament on the 30th of June.

As the previous speaker pointed out, it has taken a whole year for that legislation finally to come before this House, to be rushed through on a Friday afternoon. In this letter they are telling the bands that they could have done it a year ago. We are going to put this legislation through. I certainly agree with the comments of the previous speaker, the Member for Capilano. I hope that this kind of very important legislation will not be proceeded with in this manner in the future.

I think and hope that Bill C-18, will mark the beginning of the long process of curing and healing of the relationship between our native Indians and the rest of the country. It is very clear that in the case of the cut-off lands these lands were taken without the consent of the Indians. The cut-offs were taken in clear abrogation of explicit promises to British Columbian Indians not to reduce reserves without the consent of the bands concerned. The bands were denied the principle of equity which is normally associated with the taking of lands by Government. There is normally full compensation in cases where it is necessary to proceed by expropriation. The unbelievable extent to which promises were explicitly breached and principles of equity wilfully violated by the Government accords to these land claims a unique character which should have ensured a more expeditious solution in the past. I hope we can arrive more quickly at the solution to the other land claims which the aboriginals throughout the country now claim. I am sure that, with the right kind of attitude, particularly that expressed by the Member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper), we will.

Before I close, Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote from the report of the Special Committee on Indian Self-Government in Canada. It is a very good report and I would recommend it to all those in Canada who are interested. The report says in part:

> The view of history held today by most non-Indian Canadians and the perspective held by most Indian people are almost mirror images. Indian people consider the "discoverers" and "explorers", in whose memory monuments are erected and postage stamps issued, to have been intruders in a land already well known to the nations that inhabited it. Indian people know their nations to have been productive, cultured, spiritual, intelligent civilizations comparable to those in Europe at the time of first contact. But they are portrayed instead as savages and pagans, unknowing of religion and needing instruction in simple tasks. Because only a one-sided, negative portrayal has been widely disseminated, non-Indian Canadians are poorly prepared to understand the perspective held by Indian people and to comprehend the background behind the distressing and unacceptable situation of Indian people in Canada today. This ofen leads to confrontation.

To that I say amen, and I hope that in the future we can better understand the problems we face in order to solve them more equitably.

Mr. Manly: Mr. Speaker, I have a very brief comment. I agree with the Hon. Member who just spoke about the lateness of the date and the shortness of the debate. I regret both of those factors with regard to Bill C-18. However, I think it should be pointed out that while the legislation tabled in June 1983 was acceptable to some bands, and obviously to one of the bands in his riding, it was completely unacceptable to some of the other bands that were affected. I am not sure what the official position of the Conservative Party at that time was, but in our Party we indicated to the Minister that we were not prepared to deal with that Bill as quickly as he wished at that time. We wanted some changes made in the legislation. I am pleased to say that in Bill C-18 we have those changes. There are changes in the wording of the definition of cut-off lands and also the addition of Clause 7, which makes the Bill much more acceptable to those bands which felt it was unacceptable before.

Mr. Dantzer: Mr. Speaker, the Conservative Party agreed that there should be further negotiations. But those are very simple amendments. It would take about a month to work those out, not a whole year. That is what we are complaining about.

• (1510)

Mr. Lorne McCuish (Prince George-Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, as a postscript to the comments on the business of the House let me say that the Government has decided to throw in Bill C-18, an Act to provide for the settlement of claims by Indian bands in British Columbia relating to certain lands cut off from their reserves. I give credit to the Parliamentary Secretary for his fair and reasonable introduction to this Bill, but at the same time I must express my dismay and abhorrence at the fact that the Minister, who has delayed this Bill for so long and has so irritated the Indian people in British Columbia, has seen fit on this particular day to be on a political junket and subjected to the adulation of his supporters—both of them—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Order. I must call the Hon. Member's attention to the fact that he is not supposed to make reference to the presence or absence of any other Hon. Member.

Mr. McCuish: Mr. Speaker, as I mentioned, this Bill has had a long and bitter history. The negotiations that led to this tripartite agreement have their roots back in the nineteenth century. British Columbia entered Confederation in 1871. The federal Government inherited the responsibility for the Indians and Indian lands. It is at this time that the federal-provincial disputes over Indian affairs arose.

The 13th article of the Terms of Union provided that:

> (1) The charge of the Indians and the trusteeship and management of the lands reserved for their use and benefit shall be assumed by the Dominion Government.
>
> (2) A policy as liberal as that hitherto pursued by the B.C. Government shall be continued by the Dominion Government after the Union.
>
> (3) To carry out such policy, tracts of land of such extent as it has hitherto been the practice of the B.C. Government to appropriate—
>
> —for Indians—
> —shall from time to time be conveyed by the local government to the Dominion Government in trust for the use and benefit of the Indians.

That was in 1871, and there has been a dispute for the last 111 years.

An important argument in this dispute was the difference between the two Governments about the basis of allotting acreage on reserves. The federal Government proposed 80 acres be allotted to each family. The province claimed that 10 acres per family was enough, and kept I. W. Powell from allotting acreage and surveying any additional reserves. It is important to realize the importance of that particular formula because our forefathers were dealing in acreage at a time when we know that the Indian people were involved in agrology, fishing and living off the land. Land has increased in value ten thousand-fold since that time.

The point I am making is that if we let this fact elude us, we will continue to delay legitimate Indian claims. At the time of the settlement, the increase in the value of the land would be a direct and additional heavy burden on the taxpayers of Canada. That is why it is a shame that the federal Government and the provincial Government in British Columbia have delayed settlement of these particular claims.

I referred to I. W. Powell. Mr. Powell said at the time of the first negotiations that, "If there has not been an Indian war, it is not because there has been no injustice to the Indians but because the Indians have not been sufficiently united". As my colleague and friend from Capilano has stated, there is indeed unity among the Indian bands in British Columbia at the present time. As he also said, they have both the time and the moxie to outclass us in negotiations. It is time that we respected that ability, that sincerity and that right which they do indeed have in these particular claims.

The impasse between the federal and provincial Governments continued through the late 1900s and into this century. In 1911, this dispute reached a head. Essentially, British Columbia never wanted to give the federal Government jurisdication over Indian lands. In 1911 there was an attempt to resolve the dispute by referring it to the Supreme Court of Canada. But at that juncture the Province of British Columbia backed down. The province in its own right then passed legislation giving itself the authority to "grant, convey, quit claim, sell or dispose of . . . on such terms as may be deemed advisable . . . the interest of the province . . . reversionary or otherwise . . . in any Indian reserve or any portion thereof". The unitateral attitude behind that legislation is a problem.

The province's law was a direct challenge to the federal Government and indeed to the Indian people. The result of these negotiations was the McKenna-McBridge Agreement in 1912. The history of that agreement has been well covered during this brief debate. Although I have researched it, I need not go through it again at this time.

According to the agreement which the commission had reached, legal title to the cut-off lands remained with the province, with the requirement that the province turn over to the bands 50 per cent of the proceeds realized from the sale or other disposition of the lands.

Obviously the bands involved felt that there was a breach of the McKenna-McBride Agreement because lands were cut off without their consent by reason of the provincial legislation. The grievance of the Indians over cut-off lands has persisted throughout the years. Both levels of Government were pressed for retribution for the cut-off lands.

In 1969 the federal Government agreed to negotiate a settlement of the grievance. Successive federal Ministers of Indian Affairs have publicly supported the need to redress Indian bands for cut-off lands. Negotiations between the two Governments and a committee representing the bands began in 1977.

Today we are dealing with a long-standing claim by 22 Indian bands in British Columbia that had 33,400 acres of land taken from 34 reserves some 60 years old without their consent. It is for this reason that we are here today finally to receive this Bill for second and third reading and final passage. I am pleased to have had this opportunity to speak to Bill C-18. It is a good thing that we will shortly see the passage of this legislation, for without it the provincial Government will not be obliged to transfer lands or money to any of the 22 cut-off bands.

● (1520)

Mr. Manly: Mr. Speaker, I was interested in the comments of the official critic, the Hon. Member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid) who said that Indians had nothing to fear from a Conservative Government, that the Conservatives would continue to respect their rights, and so on. But listening to the Hon. Member today, I wonder whether he still subscribes to the views he expressed in a letter he wrote almost a year ago on February 18, 1983 to Mr. Charles Wood, President of the Indian Association of Alberta. At that time the Hon. Member for Prince George-Bulkley Valley (Mr. McCuish) wrote:

> I consider the Indians as one race among many which comprise the populace of Canada, Mr. Wood, and the White Paper concept referred to on pages 3 and 4 of your letter, calling for "termination of Indian Status and Rights" with the transition from Indian reserves to provincial municipalities would be the courageous and proper action for the Federal Government to take.

Does the Hon. Member still subscribe to those views?

Mr. McCuish: Mr. Speaker, I still subscribe to those views, even more so. That does not detract at all from the position I take with respect to the cut-off claims. Those were agreements that were made but are not legislation. I respect them. I respect any agreement that has been made and agreed to among parties of three levels.

As far as my attitude toward the treatment of Indians is concerned and the basic philosophy of how we should treat this horrendous problem, it has not changed one bit. what we are doing now is a perfect demonstration of what happens in a purely socialist state when we put people in a reserve and say "Stay there and we will make you happy with food, water and clothing." That is what the Member has been advocating. I am saying, let us make Canadians out of Indians and we will have a proper country here.

Mr. Manly: Mr. Speaker, I have a short supplementary question. I disagree completely with the Hon. Member's interpretation of socialism. I presume that he would disagree with the views expressed by the Hon. Member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) in an August 16, 1979 letter to Mr. Noel Starblanket, President of the National Indian Brotherhood. The Hon. Member wrote:

> I certainly do not subscribe to your proposition that the Government of Canada should pay compensation to the Indian people for past wrongs.

I presume the Hon. Member would want to disagree with the Hon. Member for Mississauga South.

Mr. McCuish: The Hon. Member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) has his views, I have mine, and my good friend on my far, far left has his. I respect those views. I will argue them, I will debate them, but I do not wish to be associated with his philosophy or that of the Hon. Member for Mississauga South.

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, being aware of the agreement among the Parties this afternoon that we will refer this matter, not to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development but, rather, to Committee of the Whole, and the further agreement that we will dispose of report stage and third reading this afternoon, I will try to make my remarks as brief as possible.

I want to reiterate the official position enunciated here this afternoon by the Conservative spokesman, the Hon. Member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid), that we on this side of the House will support this Bill. The issue goes back many, many years to the turn of the century. I think the first reference to it in the Bill before us is something that happened in 1912. We are pleased that, after a period of some 70 years, apparently justice is now to be done. Not only do we support this, but it was at the initiative of our spokesman that we agreed to use the process I first described this afternoon of dealing with this Bill in one day. I hope the Senate will deal with it equally expeditiously and that we can have this Bill passed into law and receive Royal Assent before the March 6 deadline.

You might like to contrast the position taken by the Progressive Conservative Party, Mr. Speaker, with that taken by the Liberal Party on this matter. The Liberal Party has been dragging its feet on this issue year after year after year. You only have to look at some of the notes that have been provided to us by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Maltais) to see the lack of progress that has been made on this issue year after year after year. Where, Sir, is the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro)? It is very seldom this Minister presents legislation before the House of Commons. We know this is something he should be doing. Time and time again the House of Commons as a whole has urged him to bring in amendments to the Indian Act, but so far he has refused to do so. And when one of the few Bills his Department manages to bring forward is to be debated, the Minister apparently finds more important things to do elsewhere. This afternoon it is very evident what importance the Minister attaches to this type of legislation when he refuses to attend the House of Commons.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Order, please. I hate to interrupt the Hon. Member but I have already told the House that Members are not supposed to make reference to the presence or the absence in the House of an Hon. Member. The Hon. Member went around the subject in a certain fashion and I allowed his remark. I think, however, that he should stick to the rules of the House and try to wrap up his comments so that he does not have an objection from the Chair.

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am not in any way quarrelling with what I think you put as a suggestion or indicated that Members were not supposed to comment on absences or presences. That has never been my understanding with respect to a Minister in whose name a Bill stands. In the 12 years I have been here, with all respect, a reference to the presence or absence of a Minister in whose name a Bill is debated on second reading has not only been commonly done but, I think, regularly done. I do not think you have made a ruling on this matter—

Mr. Cullen: Civility.

Mr. Jarvis: My hon. friend from Sarnia says "civility". But that Hon. Member when he was a Minister was always present in the House when his legislation was here. If we are going to talk about hypocrisy—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Order, please. I think the point has been well made. Nevertheless, the rules are quite clear. Hon. Members are not supposed to make reference to the presence or absence of other Hon. Members.

Mr. Mazankowski: With Ministers you can.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): I think enough has been said to establish the point. I think we should leave it at that. The Hon. Member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson).

Mr. Nickerson: Mr. Speaker, whether your contribution be a ruling or a suggestion—

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): The Hon. Parliamentary Secretary rises on a point of order.

Mr. Maltais: Mr. Speaker, I merely wish to say that if the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) is absent from the House today, it is because he is in the Yukon attending a meeting with Indian organization representatives to prepare for the Constitutional Conference scheduled for the 8th, 9th and 10th of March. That is why he is not here now.

[English]

Mr. Nickerson: Mr. Speaker, I will take your advice and not refer to any Ministers who may or may not be present in the House this afternoon. I will refer to one Minister who, at the present time, happens to be going to my riding, there to talk to a Liberal partisan organization.

Mr. Huntington: While his Bill is in the House.

Mr. Nickerson: It is Ministers like this, who put partisan concerns before public concerns and before the concerns of their Department and the special interest that their Department has in certain groups of Canadians, who bring the entire Liberal Government into disrepute, Sir. However, in this case you might think I am worried about this unnamed Minister travelling around my riding on partisan business, but I am not worried. My constituents know that when an important Bill such as this one comes up in the House, at least their Member of Parliament is here in Ottawa performing his public duty. When that certain unnamed Minister travels around the North, if anything it does me and the Party I represent more good than harm. Every time he goes there, I count among my constituents slightly fewer Liberals. There are not that many to start with, but every time he has been there, there are one or two fewer when he leaves. If he stayed there for a whole week, I would venture to guess that you would not find a single living, breathing Liberal in the whole Northwest Territories.

Another Liberal trick that we see introduced into the House again this afternoon, and it has been done many times, is to wait until a deadline approaches. In this case there is a deadline of March 6. If this Bill is not passed into law by March 6, then certain obligations regarding moneys that have been undertaken by the Government of British Columbia expire.

The Government had all kinds of time to bring in this Bill previously. It could have brought it in just after the Speech from the Throne. What did it do? It waited until February 17, when it knows that Parliament is going to recess on February 24, seven days hence, and insists that the Bill be gone through in a matter of two or three days. It also knows that the House is cluttered with business arising out of the non-budget brought down by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde).

Mr. Epp: And he wants the spy Bill.

Mr. Nickerson: He wants the spy Bill.

Mr. Kaplan: We know what respect you have for deadlines.

Mr. Nickerson: There is very little parliamentary time with which to deal with this Bill. It is despicable to use this trick and this tactic in order to get Bills through, putting pressure on the Opposition so that in all probability they cannot give this matter the real attention it deserves.

When we look at the Bill, we find out that the intention behind it is to put into effect agreements, some of which have been negotiated, signed, sealed and delivered, and other agreements which may be negotiated in the future. Where are these agreements? If that is the main part of the Bill, surely the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development should be able to provide us with copies of this agreement, but he has made no offer to do that. Parliament is being asked to approve agreements, some of which have not yet been negotiated, sight unseen. We are quite prepared to accept the fact that some of these agreements are still in the process of negotiation, but we would like to see—

[Translation]

Mr. Maltais: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Hon. Member has just stated that he does not know which agreements have not been ratified by the parties. I should like to remind him that I clearly indicated in my statement this morning all the points which have been negotiated, as well as the amounts of money and sizes of land involved.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): That is not a point of order.

[English]

Mr. Nickerson: You are quite right, Mr. Speaker, that is hardly a point of order. After long experience in dealing with Members opposite, we have found that we are not able to take their word when they say something. They tell us not to worry about an agreement, that they will tell us what is in it. That is not the way I like to go about these matters. I would like to have the agreement in black and white, signed, sealed and delivered, examine the signatures on it, especially if it was signed by the Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox), so that I can make sure that the signature that appears on the face of it is genuine. Quite frankly, I am not prepared to take the unsubstantiated word of Hon. Members opposite. It would have been of considerable help if at least one of these agreements, and I presume they are all after the same fashion, had been made available to us so that we could see exactly what the agreement said.

I want to go through the Bill quickly and deal with the principles contained in it. When I heard that a Bill of this nature was coming forward, I thought the intent of the Bill must be to give authority to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to enter into these agreements. When you read through the Bill, you find that is not the case. Apparently the Minister already has authority to enter into agreements of this nature. The parties who do not have that authority and to whom it must be given by Parliament are the bands and the band councils.

It is the intention of Clause 3 of the Bill to give to a band council the authority to enter into these agreements. This is indicative of several problems that are faced by bands and band councils throughout Canada. Under the Indian Act, they do not have authority to enter into legally binding agreements. This prohibition frequently delays considerably the needed developments on reserves that have been set aside. The inability to enter into legally binding contracts such as mortgages makes it very difficult for such developments to take place.

I can well understand the frustration that band councils must feel when they have good deals going, when they want to take advantage of the land on the reserves or other resources such as lumber contained thereon, and they find themselves prevented from entering into mortgages and similar types of arrangements with which to raise the necessary funds. Under the Indian Act they are denied that authority, which comes as a matter of course to practically any other body corporate in Canada. What we are doing with this Bill is giving that needed authority.

Clause 4 of the Bill denies any legal obligation on the part of Canada with respect to lands about which they enter into negotiations. That presumably is a standard type of clause in these agreements or in legislation of this type. Clause 5 of the Bill deals with the retroactive—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Order. Once again I have to draw the Hon. Member's attention to the fact that on second reading reference should not be made to a clause in the Bill. We are discussing the principle of the Bill.

Mr. Nickerson: The principle contained in the Bill to be found in Clause 5 deals with retroactivity. Yet another principle is contained in Clause 6 of the Bill. The third, fourth or fifth important principle contained in the Bill gives authority to the Governor in Council to finalize future agreements. Parliament is once again delegating to the Governor in Council authority to sign deals on behalf of Parliament. Again these are to be "sight unseen" agreements. In this instance we only have the word of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development that these agreements will not contain anything offensive to Parliament or which we did not intend when passing this legislation.

• (1540)

I was pleased to hear the presentation of the Hon. Member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands (Mr. Manly) on another principle of the Bill, the one contained in the last clause. This removes some of the fears of the beneficiaries under these agreements in British Columbia with respect to extinguishing claims to lands other than the so-called cut-off lands. This principle in the Bill makes it quite clear that other lands to which people lay claim will not be affected by the passage of Bill C-18.

I will conclude my remarks because this matter is to be referred to Committee of the Whole. All in all, I am pleased that we will be able to bring into effect this afternoon at least partial settlement of some of the outstanding specific claims. The record of the present Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is appalling. He has been in office for some four years and has failed to make any progress. There has not been one comprehensive claim dealt with in finality in those four years, although I have a press clipping in my files which quotes the Minister a week or so after he came into office as saying that he would have these matters wrapped up in about six months. He has been in office four years and not one comprehensive claim has been dealt with in finality. With the exception of the Fort Nelson agreement with which we dealt a couple of years ago, this is only the second group of specific claims that have been addressed. Progress has been extremely slow and very agonizing, but at least we see a little more progress with Bill C-18.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): There is a ten-minute period for questions, answers and comments. No one is seeking the floor for questions. Is anyone seeking it for debate?

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time and, by unanimous consent, the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Herbert in the chair.

On Clause 2—Definitions

Mr. Nickerson: Mr. Chairman, on page 2 of the Bill, Clause 2 refers to certain of the cut-off lands which are not to be included. These lands are the so-called Railway Belt and the so-called Peace River Block. Would the Parliamentary Secretary be kind enough to explain to us what and where are the Railway Belt and the Peace River Block? Would he also explain why they have been excluded from Bill C-18?

[Translation]

Mr. Maltais: Mr. Speaker, these details were worked out at the time of the negotiations and they appear in the reports which are in the Department's possession. This bill does not contain all the elements which were negotiated; but we are ready to table any time the agreements which have been negotiated as well as the specifications pertaining to this particular agreement.

[English]

Mr. Nickerson: Mr. Chairman, the Parliamentary Secretary did not tell us where the Railway Belt is or where the Peace River Block is. Perhaps he could at least tell us the rough geographical location of these lands, if he knows.

[Translation]

Mr. Maltais: I could provide the House with the exact particulars on that, but the Peace River Block which is described here is directly connected to the area which was described with the Indian reserves concerned.

[English]

Mr. Huntington: Mr. Chairman, in his remarks in second reading the Parliamentary Secretary mentioned the difficulty they were having in acquiring all the agreements. He mentioned that there was still one agreement which they failed to negotiate. Is this the particular agreement which they failed to negotiate? If it is, perhaps he could nod; if it is not, perhaps he could tell us which one is outstanding.

[Translation]

Mr. Maltais: Mr. Speaker, what is involved is an agreement with a group of Indians in Westbank, who are asking for additions to the Canadian Government's offer for as long as the various agreements are not signed, because monetary and land area details still have to be finalized. It is strictly a matter of the amount of money and the number of acres required by the Westbank group.

[English]

Mr. Huntington: Mr. Chairman, could the Parliamentary Secretary tell us in what province that particular band is located?

[Translation]

Mr. Maltais: In British Columbia, Mr. Speaker. In British Columbia.

[English]

Mr. Huntington: Could I ask the Parliamentary Secretary whether there were funds involved and whether those funds expire on March 6 as a result of their not being part of the agreements pertaining to this Bill?

[Translation]

Mr. Maltais: Mr. Speaker, at the moment there is no funds involved, directly, in the issue. It is simply a matter of reaching a formulation that is agreeable to both groups. These Indians are asking for certain sums of money and a certain land area, but there is no complete agreement on that. This is why, for the time being, one band still has not completed the agreement.

Clause agreed to.

On Clause 3—Agreements re cut-off lands settlements

[English]

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Chairman, I would like to direct a question to the Parliamentary Secretary. There are 22 agreements which are either completed, being negotiated or under review. The one under review is the one in the Okanagan. Could he explain why it is under review and where it stands at the present time?

[Translation]

Mr. Maltais: In Okanagan, Mr. Speaker, this is quite true, as the Hon. Member stated. The agreement is practically finalized. There are still monetary matters to be settled. It is a matter of money, and last week we were on the verge of a settlement.

[English]

Mr. McDermid: I am referring particularly to the Okanagan agreement. It appears that everything has been agreed to except the band vote, and it appears in my briefing notes in any event that that is what is under review. The Parliamentary Secretary said that it was money and lands, but my briefing notes from the Department indicate that it is the band vote. Does the Parliamentary Secretary know anything about that? Could he expand on that?

[Translation]

Mr. Maltais: Mr. Speaker, among the twenty-two agreements concluded with the bands, there are a number of agreements in principle, and the Department still has a number of agreements in principle that have been completed for certain bands.

It is true that for some bands there is still a matter of vote 10 or vote 15 or something like that; it is strictly a matter of how things will work once the settlement has been finalized.

● (1550)

[English]

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Chairman, did the Parliamentary Secretary know which one I am referring to? Is it a problem with the band vote, a problem with money or a problem with land? This is the only one that is labelled "under review" in the briefing notes from the Ministry. Five have been settled, one is under review and I gather the other 16 are at various stages of negotiation, and I shall ask about them later. What exactly is under review with this particular agreement with the Okanagan Band?

[Translation]

Mr. Maltais: Mr. Speaker, in the notes I have here, it says it is a matter of land and not money, as far as the vote is concerned.

[English]

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Chairman, the other matter I want to bring up is that of the 22 negotiations on the cut-off claims that are going on at the present time. Apparently one band has not seen fit to support the other 21 bands, that is, the Seton Lake Band. Could the Parliamentary Secretary indicate what their concern is or if it has been eliminated?

[Translation]

Mr. Maltais: Mr. Speaker, departmental officials who are working on this file have informed me it is now only a matter of finding out whether there are enough people to vote on the agreement. In other words, the matter is under review because of the number of people required to vote on the agreement.

[English]

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Chairman, the Parliamentary Secretary did not answer the question about the Seton Lake problem. I wonder if he could refer to it. I think his answer referred to the Okanagan Band and the vote under review. Seton Lake is the band that has problems with the Bill. I wonder what the problem is and why the band does not agree with the Bill, or has that disagreement been resolved to the satisfaction of the band?

[Translation]

Mr. Maltais: If the question is put like that, Mr. Speaker, the answer is very simple. It is a matter of the percentage of votes in favour of the agreement that is to be concluded.

[English]

Mr. Huntington: Mr. Speaker, I should like to have one thing clarified, although the problem may be with the translation. In answer to my first question, the Parliamentary Secretary told me that in the case of the one band that did not have an agreement, a money problem was not mentioned in the file, yet in answer to my colleague, the Hon. Member for Brampton-Georgetown, he said the problem was money and lands. Could he clear the matter up for me?

[Translation]

Mr. Maltais: Mr. Speaker, I said that most of the agreements to be negotiated with the twenty-two bands have been settled. However, the case to which the Hon. Member referred earlier was still under review last week, and it was not a matter of money or land in that instance but a matter of percentage of votes. The question put earlier was: In the case of the West Bank Band—the Indians I was referring to—was there still a land or money issue to be resolved? Actually, I think that at this very moment, a settlement has been reached. Last week, we were about to finalize two final agreements, and I think these have now been settled.

[English]

Mr. Huntington: Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, the file on an agreement still to be settled that carries money and land is Westbank. Is that correct?

[Translation]

Mr. Maltais: Yes, that is right.

To avoid any misunderstanding, I will ask my advisors to help me complete the answers so as to make quite sure that there is no misinterpretation of questions and answers.

[English]

Mr. Nickerson: Mr. Chairman, I should like to know whether the ratification process for these agreements used at the band level was a standard procedure? Was it a simple majority of the band council vote; was the matter voted upon by the membership at large; was it a two-thirds majority that was needed to ratify the agreements, or what process of ratification was adopted?

[Translation]

Mr. Maltais: Quite simply, Mr. Chairman, as I said earlier it is a question of a majority vote among band members aged 18 or more. It is a technical question, a question of internal procedure within the band. I think it is quite clear and the reserves have to cope with this kind of dilemma now and again, that is at what age is one eligible to vote and what are the internal procedures of the band council itself. Everything is being sorted out.

Clause 3 agreed to.

Clauses 4 to 7 inclusive agreed to.

Mr. Maltais: Mr. Chairman, I would like to set the record straight about the question of Westbank. The Okanagan Band as well as the issue of lands and money have been settled. There again it is strictly a matter of the internal percentage of votes. It is exactly the same thing. I want to make things clear: if the Westbank or Okanagan Indians are not involved, the issue of lands and money is settled, and it is a matter of percentage of votes.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

AGRICULTURE

ADVISABILITY OF REMOVING FEDERAL SALES TAX ON FUELS USED FOR FOOD PRODUCTION

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of reducing the cost burden on Canadian farmers by removing the 9 per cent federal sales tax on diesel fuel and gasoline used for the production of food.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I genuinely apppreciate the opportunity to present this motion at this time because I feel it is very timely. It is timely because it comes on the heels of the Budget, which was introduced this week, which really provides no relief whatsoever for the agricultural community and specifically the individual farmer who has been faced with some very difficult problems. The Budget fails to address any of the problems which are facing individual farmers in the agricultural community as a whole, and it even goes beyond that and fails to acknowledge that there are serious problems.

I feel this motion is timely also in that this debate happens to take place roughly on the fourth anniversary of the Liberal Party's return to power. We all know what the platform of the Liberal Party was during the course of that election campaign. It was basically a platform based on deceit, subterfuge and quite frankly, a hidden agenda. While the members of the Liberal Party talked about a "made in Canada" energy price, they certainly did not spell it out in any detail. They misled the Canadian public into believing that energy prices would be lower than those proposed by the Progressive Conservative Party.

Farmers are now contemplating their planting. They are seriously considering what they are going to seed and how much. Given the fact that the commodity prices are low, input costs are high, and there is no relief in the Budget, it is a time when farmers are seriously looking at their future in terms of what sort of production patterns they can contemplate. I believe, for those three reasons, it is a very timely subject.

I would like to reiterate once again, Mr. Speaker, that the farmers of Canada are in very serious financial difficulty. This measure would provide some relief. It would serve to alleviate their problems somewhat—not much, but somewhat. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) in his Budget speech talked about the need for confidence, hope and optimism, and the need to increase productivity and our competitive position. I listened very intently to those words, Mr. Speaker, but there is really nothing in this Budget which relates to improving the confidence, hope and optimism of the agricultural community of Canada. Therefore, I believe this motion should be given very serious consideration.

Let us just look briefly over the last four years to see what has happened in the agricultural community. In the last four years there have been close to 2,000 farm bankruptcies. That is a huge number, and all the bankruptcies or farm failures are not recorded. That figure of 2,000 bankruptcies does not clearly identify those who have voluntarily gone out of business or those who have gone into receivership and are not a statistic. There were 488 farmers who declared bankruptcy in the year 1983. That is almost 400 per cent more farm bankruptcies than occurred in 1979. Roughly 125 bankruptcies were registered in 1979. In 1983 there were 488. For example, in western Canada, there was a doubling of the figure for 1982. Why has this occurred? Primarily, Mr. Speaker, it has happened for reasons beyond the individual farmer's control. It is not because farmers have not been productive. It is not because they have not been good managers. It is basically because of developments which are quite clearly beyond their control, such as low commodity prices and high input costs, and it is largely as a result of the policies of the Government.

There are two very important elements to that component, Mr. Speaker. The first is the interest rate policy of the Government, and the second is the energy pricing policy. There is no explanation for this Government's current energy pricing policy. It really constitutes the largest revenue grab by a federal Government in the history of this country, and it is a revenue grab which has been carried out on the backs of the food producers. We know, in terms of our food component in this society, we still have one of the lowest food components of any industrialized nation in the world. I do not believe the farmer should be further hampered and strapped with this additional cost simply to feed the coffers of the federal Government.

We all remember the campaign of 1980 and the Liberal promise to keep energy prices low. The Liberals did not say how low, but they certainly did not tell the Canadian people that the prices were going to rise to the heights at which they are today. Let me review what has happened over the four-year period. I phoned the Gulf dealer in the Town of Two Hills, Alberta, earlier this afternoon. I asked him to compare the prices of farm fuel today with prices which were in effect four years ago today. In February, 1980, gasoline used for farm production purposes cost 72.96 cents per gallon. At the same time, diesel fuel cost 65.68 cents a gallon. Today, in February, 1984, the price of gasoline used on the farm for food production purposes is $1.45 per gallon. That includes a 32-cent provincial tax reduction which occurred in 1982. Therefore, if the provincial tax had remained in effect, as it was in 1980, it would have added another 32 cents and would have brought the price up to $1.77 per gallon. In the case of diesel fuel, the price today is $1.37. Here again that includes a 32-cent provincial tax reduction which took place in 1982. So even taking that into consideration, there is a doubling of the fuel prices in that four-year period. We all know what the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) said on January 31, 1980, in Alvinston, Ontario. He said this:

> Farmers and consumers will get a break from the federal Liberal agriculture policy—
> Farmer costs of production will be held in check and as a result so will consumer prices—
> Fuels used in farm production will be exempt from any excise tax and a special price structure established.

Basically, Mr. Speaker, we are asking this Government and particularly the Minister of Agriculture, to fulfil at least part of that promise he made back in January 1980. Failure to do so would be an outright betrayal. The removal of the 9 per cent sales tax on diesel fuel and gasoline used for the production of food would reduce the price of fuel by roughly 17 cents or 18 cents. It is a rather interesting figure. I could say that if you included the removal of the Canadian ownership charge—which has fulfilled its obligation—of 4.5 cents a gallon, we could have a saving of 22.5 cents a gallon for the producer. That would help. The federal tax component on farm fuels is roughly 30 per cent to 40 per cent of the pump price. For every gallon of gas or fuel sold, about 62 cents go into the federal Government coffers. This is costing Canadian farmers roughly $275 million a year. In 1981, farmers spent $1.2 billion for energy. In addition, they spent $600 million to $700 million for fertilizer, including an energy tax component of probably 10 per cent. If you look at fuel taxes alone, they constitute 20 per cent of all energy costs. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I say this is not an unreasonable proposition.

• (1610)

Prairie farmers paid an average of $5,100 in direct energy costs in 1981. This contributes immensely to farm input costs and the cost-price squeeze. We note that farm input costs have tripled since 1971. Since the beginning of 1980 they have gone up by 35 per cent. In the meantime, the selling price of the farmers' products is basically at the same level. If you use the price deflator, you will find commodity prices below the level of 1972-73.

The price of grain, Mr. Speaker, is a good example of what I have been saying. The producer price at the ports of Thunder Bay or Vancouver in the 1979-80 crop year was $196.43 per metric tonne. Today, including the final payment for 1982-83, the net realized price was $192.34. I should not say "the net realized price". That was the net price at the point of departure. Therefore, grain prices have fallen over the last four years. There really is not much control over that because in order to sell our grain abroad we must be competitive. However, we have a Government which has imposed horrendous taxes on the backs of the producer. This year it increased freight rates. My proposal would at least lessen some of this impact. I urge the Government to seriously consider this because it is important for the farmers of Canada to have some faith and confidence, some degree of optimism.

I could go on and give you all sorts of figures on net income, Mr. Speaker. As recorded by Statistics Canada, farmers are making about 50 per cent of what they made in 1975. That is hardly cause for joy or optimism. Other countries support their producers to a greater extent than Canada. Fuel prices in other countries are much lower. U.S. fuel prices are roughtly 20 per cent to 25 per cent below the prices Canadian farmers are paying. The ten-year average support paid to farmers per metric tonne was $6.35 for wheat in Canada, $11.41 in the United States and $19.96 in the EEC. For barley producers in Canada, assistance was largely in the form of the cheap freight rate, the Crowsnest Pass freight rate which has now gone down the tube. Canadian producers were supported to the tune of $6.32 per ton, U.S. producers received $7.57, and the EEC it was $32.80 per ton. That gives you an idea of what competing countries do for their producers. We call upon this Government to recognize that and take some steps to ensure that we do our part to ensure Canadian producers are indeed competitive. Agriculture is and will continue in the foreseeable future to be a major component of Canada's economy.

I noted from The Globe and Mail that last year alone, Mr. Speaker, the farm program in the U.S. cost the federal Treasury some $28 billion. They are supporting their farmers, but Canada is not supporting its farmers commensurate with producers in other countries. When you consider the importance of agriculture, you realize it makes up about 40 per cent of the nation's economy. While roughly 5 per cent of the population is directly involved in the production of food, the agri-food system employs about 18 per cent of the Canadian work force. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, there are many reasons for the Government to look at this motion very seriously. I think it is a reasonable proposal, and it would provide a demonstration of faith, hope and optimism, perhaps even some confidence in the farmers.

I have had some discussions earlier with the Parliamentary Secretary and there seems to be some consensus over there that this is a measure worthy of consideration. I think this motion would provide an excellent vehicle for looking at the whole area of farm input costs and the difficulties farmers are facing.

If it is agreeable, Mr. Speaker, I would be prepared to amend the motion to include the words:

That the subject matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs for consideration.

My friend, the Hon. Member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) would second the motion, and if it meets with the approval of the House I would be prepared to submit that amendment for your consideration.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): I would like to have a copy of the motion if I may, but let me make an observation. My first impression is that the wording of the original motion is such that an amendment in the form suggested by the Hon. Member would not be acceptable. The motion is that in the opinion of this House the Government should consider the advisability of—under those circumstances I think it is up to the House to make a decision as to whether or not this matter should be passed. I do not find that there can be in this instance a reference, as is suggested by the Hon. Member, of the subject matter to committee. That is an observation on my part and perhaps the Hon. Member would like to comment before I render a ruling.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if instead of amending it as described, we said that, "In the opinion of this House the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs should consider the advisability". Would that then circumvent the problem you have described?

• (1620)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): The problem the Chair has is that the motion is that the Government should consider the advisability. The suggestion now is that we are eliminating consideration by the Government and are talking about consideration by a committee. This is the problem the Chair has with the amendment.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, naturally I would be delighted, as a minimum, to have the matter considered by the standing committee. I know that the House can do many things by unanimous consent. If the wording that has been advanced by the Parliamentary Secretary would fulfill the spirit of allowing this measure to go to the Standing Committee for consideration, I would certainly want to be the first to endorse and echo my support for that. I think it is a matter worthy of consideration. Being a bit of a horse trader from way back, I suspect half a loaf is better than no loaf at all. It is quite obvious that we would not get anything with the precise wording of the present motion. I want to go on record as supporting the modified wording that the Parliamentary Secretary has advanced.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Do I have the unanimous consent of the House to accept the withdrawal of the motion which is presently under discussion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Does the House unanimously agree to the substitution of the motion as proposed by the Hon. Member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski)?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): The motion under consideration is the motion proposed by the Hon. Member for Vegreville.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I would like to spend a few minutes supporting the motion proposed by the Hon. Member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski). I think it would be of considerable assistance to the farmers of Canada. I would like to speak on behalf of the Saskatchewan agricultural community which finds the present energy costs much too high in terms of producing food. I will be very brief because the Hon. Member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) wants to say a few words as well. We would also like to get this through the appropriate committee and subsequent stages.

The Hon. Member for Vegreville has outlined to the House a number of reasons why energy costs are becoming a real burden for farmers today. The price of wheat has not gone up in the last three or four years and farm input costs have skyrocketed. Interest rates have been very high for the farming community. Also the Crow rate has been abolished. The price of moving grain is going up by 500 per cent over the next nine years. Because of those things, there will have to be some support for the farmers.

I remember very well when, in the 1980 election campaign, as I am sure my friendly farmer friend from the Toronto airport riding recalls, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) made a promise to the farmers. He said that if he was re-elected he would change evaluation day for capital gains on farms from December 31, 1971 to 1974 or 1976, which would take care of some of the inflationary problems. That was a campaign promise. We received some other capital gains changes on Wednesday, but the Government did not change evaluation day. I want to remind the Parliamentary Secretary of that since I know he is concerned about the farming population.

Mr. Fisher: Picky people.

Mr. Nystrom: In terms of the precise motion before us today, I would like to put on the record figures showing where the energy dollar goes when people buy gasoline or diesel fuel for a tractor, car or truck. The figures I will use are October figures from a service station in Regina for leaded regular gasoline. The prices keep fluctuating and we had a different set of figures from the Hon. Member for Vegreville. These figures are for a litre of gasoline which in October cost 40.2 cents in Regina, Saskatchewan. The federal share was 11.03 cents. That is made up of five or six items. The sales tax on this litre of gasoline was 2.89 cents. That is something we would like to see removed to help the farmers. There was an excise tax of 1.5 cents. The excise tax can be rebated to the farmers for farm fuel. This is useful to a number of farmers in my constituency, particularly smaller operators. More and more farmers are switching to diesel and as there is no excise tax on diesel the farm rebate on the excise tax is of no assistance.

The third thing the federal Government gets is the Canadian ownership charge which is charged on all gasoline. That works out to .72 cents a litre. The fourth thing is the wellhead royalty. That is 3.55 cents. The petroleum compensation charge is 2.37 cents. The total moneys going to the federal Government on a 40 cent litre of gasoline was 11.03 cents.

In my province the provincial government also gets a share. The provincial government collects a royalty of 5.8 cents on each litre. We do not have any sales tax or other taxes above the 5.8 cents. The industry gets the lion's share. It gets 23.37 cents a litre in Saskatchewan. The industry's share is broken down in the following way. The ordinary retail dealer in Regina gets 3.27 cents. The refining, transportation and marketing of the crude oil amounts to another 10.26 cents. The transportation is .49 cents and the wellhead share is 9.35 cents.

That is the way a litre of gasoline is broken down. The federal Government takes about 11 cents, the province takes about 6 cents, and the industry takes about 23 cents. The total is around 40 cents. I think it would be useful if we were to accept the ideas expressed here by the Hon. Member for Vegreville and many other Members of the House to take off the federal share in order to stimulate the agricultural economy.

I would like to remind Hon. Members that the industry in the country basic to a healthy economy is the agricultural industry. If farming is going well, things will go very well in Montreal for my friend who sits across the way. If farming is going well, jobs will be created in the small business sector and the service industries. Farmers will buy tractors from Brantford. They will buy all kinds of combines and fertilizers. I think it is better for everyone. There is a tremendous spin-off effect from dollars spent in agriculture.

Mr. Mazankowski: They might even buy the odd Belarus.

Mr. Nystrom: Did the Member for Vegreville say he wants to buy a—

Mr. Mazankowski: I said they might even buy the odd Belarus.

Mr. Nystrom: I see. The farmers spend an awful lot of money on energy, Mr. Speaker. I have here the statistics issued by Agriculture Canada in 1983 entitled, "Selected agricultural statistics, Canada and The Provinces". It shows the numbers of dollars spent by farmers in 1981. The total expenditure on energy in Canada was $1.217 billion. That takes into account gasoline, diesel fuel, liquefied petroleum gas, natural gas, fuel oil and electricity. Those are the total energy costs. Two items make up the lion's share of that amount. Gasoline amounts to around $450 million, and diesel fuel amounts to around $460 million of what farmers spent in 1981 in terms of energy costs.

• (1630)

[Translation]

And it is exactly the same thing for all provinces, Mr. Speaker. But in Saskatchewan, in early October, they spent about $326 million on energy two years ago. They spent $290 million in Alberta, $258 million in Ontario—practically the same amount—and $123 million in the Province of Quebec.

[English]

You can see that there are tremendous costs to the farmer. The suggestion being made today by the Member for Vegreville will go a considerable distance toward making things a little bit easier for the farmers of this land. I urge the House to agree to the motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): For clarity, the Chair would like to read the motion proposed by the Hon. Member. Mr. Mazankowski, seconded by Mr. Huntington, moves:

That in the opinion of this House the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs consider the advisability of reducing the cost burden on Canadian farmers by removing the 9 per cent sales tax on diesel fuel and gasoline used for the production of food.

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I will not be too long. This is a very important motion and a very welcome motion. Because I have been in the manufacturing and food business I can say that every dollar of the direct cost in production or manufacturing, by the time it goes through processing, handling, distribution, on to the retail shelf and into the cash register, it becomes $5. If the Government really means what it continues to say about improving our national productivity and about productivity being the answer for tomorrow and the return to a respectable place in the industrial world, then we must consider motions like this very seriously.

Therefore, I compliment the Member for Vegreville for bringing this motion forward and I thank the Members on the Government side for allowing the amendment to be moved.

I would also like to point out the troubles that we are experiencing on both the Atlantic and Pacific coasts with our fishing industry and the cost problems we have there vis-à-vis other fishing nations. In light of the fact that we have to reduce costs and at the same time improve quality in packing and delivery of these food resources, I would like to move another amendment. It reads:

That on line 3 of the motion, after the word "farmers", we add the words "and fishermen".

Mr. Douglas Fisher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to support the proposal that we are hearing today. I believe it should go to committee for detailed study. I am glad that it was improved by the Hon. Member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington).

I must say that the Member for Vegreville describes himself as an old horse trader and says that he likes to wheel and deal. We are seeing his talents here today. I suppose if he is an old horse trader he knows how to patch up an old nag and try to get it to look look good for the market. In this case, no matter how much he tries to patch it up, the Tory energy policy is so lame, so weak and so sick that not even a persuasive and charming old trader like him can make it look like a young filly. We have seen him make some energetic efforts today in an attempt to take us on on the Government side about some of our energy ideas. I categorize that as trying to take an old nag and turn it into a young filly.

Let us examine some of his remarkable efforts here. He reminded us of the prices that people are paying at the pump in his riding in Alberta and compared them with the prices that were being paid back in those dark but thankfully brief days when the Tories were in power. He forgot to mention that the Tories had a schedule of increases that were going to inch energy prices up after 1979.

Mr. Mazankowski: Never double.

Mr. Fisher: Things were not going to stay static. In fact, there were going to be big leaps. All of us in the House, as well as the Canadian people, remember that the Tory energy policy expressed in 1979 indicated that prices by now would be at least 85 per cent of the world level. They were then going to add 18 cents a gallon on top of that.

Mr. Mazankowski: That is not right, and you know it.

Mr. Fisher: Furthermore, they were going to change the schedule so that the big increases came right at the beginning and the lower increases came at the end. We would have already paid those big increases by this time. Let us compare that with what the present Minister of Finance did with his national energy policy when he was Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. He said that they should not go that high at all, and they do not go anywhere near that 85 per cent ceiling. Moreover, he said that those prices should include most of the charges that our hon. friend wanted to add on. Finally, the price increases were going to rise relatively smoothly. They were not going to take a big leap at the beginning and taper off at the end.

All of that resulted in people of my riding in Mississauga and, equally important, people in his riding of Vegreville paying less over the last four years for their energy than they ever would have paid under that Tory regime. Under that persuasive, charming but very expensive Tory regime, they would have paid far more if the Tories had followed through with those ideas in 1979 instead of acting in a compassionate way as we have done since 1980.

I would just like to point out this bête noire that Members on that side refer to all the time, namely, the Canadian ownership charge. What a terrible thing it is. First it is terrible, of course, because of the word "Canadian". Second, it is even more terrible because of the reference to ownership. Third, it costs people 4 cents a litre, by my calculation, opposed to the 18 cent surcharge that those on the other side were going to slap on.

I realize that it is not comfortable to defend a tax. I know that it never leaves the incumbent comfortable to be required to levy a tax, but I will say that I feel a lot better asking people to pay 4 cents so as ultimately to own something rather than paying 18 cents that will just go to the border and be shovelled out to a bunch of foreigners who happen to own the company at that time. I like keeping it inside Canada. That is why we have a Canadian ownership charge rather than an 18 cent a gallon foreign ownership charge.

Mr. Huntington: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Ouellet: You cannot take it.

Mr. Huntington: I can take it but I do not think the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary wants to leave such distortion on the record. He is talking about a 4.5 cent per litre ownership charge. He can apply whatever tag to that he wants but I wish to point out that it is very improper to talk about a 4.5 cent ownership charge and relate it to the 18 cent a gallon charge that was in the Crosbie Budget. The 18 cent a gallon charged today under the present Government is 88 cents.

Mr. Waddell: I have a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

• (1640)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): The first point of order was not a point of order. If the Hon. Member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) has another point of order, I will listen.

Mr. Waddell: Would the Hon. Member who is speaking permit me to ask a question, Mr. Speaker? It will be a very short one.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I would love to have the Hon. Member ask me a question, but if he can do it at the end, we will have more than 20 minutes left over.

I appreciate the fact that you have told the gentleman from Capilano that his point was not in order, Mr. Speaker. It was not in order in any way, shape or form under anybody's rules, mathematics or arithmetic.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fisher: I think the Canadian consumer, including the Canadian farmer, knows that 18 cents a gallon is more expensive than 4 cents a gallon.

Mr. Huntington: Not 88 cents.

Mr. Fisher: It will be a long time before the Tories can patch up that 14-cent difference and make it look like that young filly that we were talking about a few moments ago.

Mr. Mazankowski: You are talking like an old stallion.

Mr. Fisher: I would like to refer to the way the Tory Party, in its gentleness and politeness, said that we were a crummy Government. You will notice, Mr. Speaker, that they said we were crummy, but the Hon. Member for Vegreville did not say what he was going to do to be so much better.

Mr. Mazankowski: You have a proposal right there.

Mr. Fisher: We heard some references to 1979. We knew what the Tories were going to do in 1979. He did not need to remind us that in 1979 those ideas were pitched out.

Mr. Mazankowski: They would like to have them again.

Mr. Fisher: But we heard about 1979. But he did not tell us about what the Tory Party was going to do in 1984. He did not tell us that. His good friend from St. John's West has already told us what they are going to do. Let me quote what he said to the citizens of Canada—

Mr. Huntington: You are talking about a Member who is absent.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think there are some limitations with which a person can debate the motion at hand. If he wants me to outline the Tory energy policy, I will be prepared to do that. But obviously I cannot do so within the context of the motion we are now debating. I would hope the Hon. Member would consider that when he throws that challenge across the floor.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): I think in that circumstance maybe the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fisher) should restrict himself to the motion under discussion.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, relevance is always my guiding principle here. I appreciate being brought back to the mark by the Hon. Member for Vegreville. I want to assure him that he raised this topic first. I am only trying to balance the debate so future students of our discussion will know how we feel.

I would like to refer you, Mr. Speaker, to the Ottawa Citizen of February 16. The following is reported to have been said: "You have to be mean, nasty and do all sorts of unpleasant things. That's why I'm not going to outline what they would be now."

That was not a Liberal speaking because we are neither mean, nasty nor unpleasant. It was not an NDPer because they are not those things either. Those words come from the leading finance critic of the Tory Party, and that is what the Tory energy policy is going to be. People know that instinctively. People know that in their bones. People had that same experience in those few dark months of 1979 when the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) was the Minister of Finance. He wants to return and plunge the country back into that same valley of despair.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fisher: I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the country is not going to buy it any more than it will buy this lame idea we have here today.

An Hon. Member: That is sour grapes.

Mr. Fisher: I do not want to preempt anything, but I am told by one of the Members of the NDP that if we watch Global television tonight we will hear the Hon. Member for St. John's West saying exactly the same thing again. That is the Tory energy policy for farmers, for small town people, for big city people, for suburban people, for young people and for old people. The policy is straightforward. You have to be mean, nasty and do all sorts of unpleasant things.

That is quite a policy, Mr. Speaker. What a refreshing thing to hear from a Conservative, who is prepared to state what lies deepest in his heart—mean, nasty and unpleasant. However, despite those drawbacks, I am prepared to join with the Hon. Member for Vegreville to discuss this issue in the Finance Committee. I think it bears some merit. I congratulate him for bringing this matter forward. I will ask him now in public to cast off his Tory shackles and to let his otherwise generous spirit reign. If we come into the Finance Committee with this kind of idea, we clearly want to do things for food producers generally.

The first problem we are going to run into when we do this was typified by the amendment moved by the Hon. Member for Capilano. All of us were thinking about farmers in our own narrow way, but the Hon. Member for Capilano, quite rightly, broadened our scope to fishermen. But what about food processors and I ask this seriously? What about the people who work in warehouses and in the stores? They also have a role to play in the food chain.

Mr. Huntington: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I would like to point out that food processors for years have enjoyed federal tax exemption.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): That is not a point of order. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Fisher: It may not be a point of order, Mr. Speaker, but it is a fact which badly needs to be said. I appreciate hearing it from the Hon. Member. I am trying to illustrate the issue that on all tax exemptions we get everybody trying to cut in. Hon. Members all know this. They know the difficulty that arises out of a generous move which is later exploited by other people. We know, for example in my area, that there are lots of people who would love to call themselves farmers in order to get the benefits provided in the tax system for real farmers. The consequence is a complicated anti-avoidance section in the Income Tax Act. I am not sure that anybody will be able to come up with a better answer, although I look forward with interest to the results of the consultative committee announced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) in his budget. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, if that committee sets up wide open tax avoidance opportunities, many non-farmers will try to take advantage. Equally, a lot of non-farmers will want to be called farmers if we show people how to cut the price of gas. We all know that. It is common sense. The committee will have to grapple with that problem. If the committee wants to have its report taken seriously, we will have to come up with a responsible answer to that question.

The second thing we will have to come up with, and it is alluded to by the capable Member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans), is how we are going to administer this. Do we go back to the purple gas system? If we are dealing with diesel fuel, we cannot do that.

Mr. Mazankowski: The machinery is in place now.

Mr. Fisher: What are we going to do then? How are we going to administer it? How do we find out where the gas is sold and who buys it? All of this is complicated because the taxes apply at the very lowest level in the refining chain. They are not applied at the gas station. They are applied way down in the gasoline system—

Mr. Huntington: The machinery is in place.

Mr. Fisher: —and the fuel system—way at the beginning of the pipeline, as it were. Therefore, the tax will flow right through everything, including a lot of mark-ups, and we will have to figure out how to separate it out for the sake of the farmer.

Mr. Mazankowski: The mechanism is in place with the excise tax.

Mr. Fisher: It is not impossible, but it will be a problem for us to look at. I hear some suggestions, and obviously there are some good ideas in play and the committee can look at them.

Third, I want to point out that the costs are not as high as has been described here. My notes from the Finance Department tell me that if diesel fuel costs 35 cents a litre without any provincial road tax, then the federal sales tax is approximately 3 cents of that 35 cents. I understand that farmers can get 1.5 cents back on gasoline. There may be a system there that we can follow with diesel fuel as well. But if you can claim 1.5 cents back on a litre of gasoline, it shows the low impact this tax is having at that level. I would think the committee will have to ask: If we are going to require paper work both from the farmer and the private sector generally and from the Government, would it be worth it to set up this kind of routine? Those are serious questions that the committee is used to handling.

• (1650)

Finally, it is important to look at what has been done for farmers in the past week. We heard a misleading reference from the Hon. Member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) about the capital gains tax. It is clear in the farming community and in this House that farmers received a big bonus through the tax system in the recent Budget. We provided ways in that Budget for farmers to shelter up to $120,000 in capital gains by placing that in their RRSPs. They will not avoid the tax permanently, but clearly they can defer it for significant periods of time. They can spread out their income and claim it back at much lower rates of tax.

That is a far more flexible way to deal with the problem of capital gains than moving the valuation day would have been. This is a far superior kind of response. As one example, we do not get through our economy a variety of different valuation days. We get one valuation day continuing to be applied to everybody and a special measure that really helps farmers. Second, incorporated farmers will benefit from the new small business tax simplification measures. Third, farmers generally will benefit from the flexibility on the pension plans was proposed by the Minister of Finance.

Those are big improvements which members of the farming community from coast to coast recognize and are beginning to applaud. Wednesday's Budget went a long way to accommodating the concerns of farmers. I hope we can go a little way in the Finance Committee on this equally important measure. I hope the Hon. Member for Vegreville will come to committee and lend us his charm and insight, as he always does in the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): For clarification before we proceed further, the Chair would like to advise the House that since the Hon. Member for Vegreville could not second the amendment as he proposed the original motion, the amendment has been seconded by the Hon. Member for Scarborough East (Mr. Gilchrist).

Mr. Nickerson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. When the original motion was introduced, it dealt with relief from taxation on fuel products for farmers. The motion was amended to include fishermen. I presume it would be the wish of this House that all primary food producers be included within the scope of the motion. One group seems to have been excluded, those who hunt. They are of particular importance in my constituency. When the matter gets to committee, I hope that also will be taken into consideration.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fisher) made reference to horse traders. I know he is a literary man. Perhaps I could paraphrase Dr. Samuel Johnson by saying that a white horse and a Liberal are very similar: the first one is difficult to keep clean and the second one is difficult to keep honest. His speech on the Canadian ownership charge was something to behold. The Canadian ownership charge of four cents a gallon is a terrible charge, not because it is Canadian, ownership or a charge, but because it is there for no reason. It is there for the taking over of oil companies. The question I would have put to the Hon. Member if I had time is, which oil companies are they going to take over? This is not irrelevant, it is right on point. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) said that we are not going to take over any more oil companies at the moment. The Government is collecting up to $800 million a year on a tax under false pretences. The Canadian ownership is a fraud, nothing more, nothing less.

If the Hon. Member wanted to attack the Conservative Party, he could have mentioned that the Conservative oil price was based on world price. That was the problem the Clark Government had. They were being whipsawed between the Premier of Ontario and the Premier of Alberta when trying to set an energy price. They opted for the world price. They moved toward it very rapidly and lost the election. I suspect the Hon. Member is here today because of that policy. He should have talked about the Liberal price being a blended price, which was not the world price but with all of these taxes it is becoming the world price.

I support this motion going to committee. I am an urban Member, although there are many retired farmers from Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta in my riding. Also, our people feel instinctively that the Canadian farmer needs the best help we can give.

Last week I was at a nomination meeting in the Peace River district. I had conversations with our candidate, Elroy Diemert, and with Grant Notley, the Leader of our provincial Party, who is also the provincial Leader of the Opposition and some farmers there. I talked to the farmers. It became clear that they too were being whipsawed between the increase in the Crow rate, which the Hon. Member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) talked about, and some of the other increased costs such as this tax. Even a dumb urban Scot like me could get it through his thick head that this is a problem for the farmers. This is a good motion. It should go to committee.

This Government is prepared to advance all kinds of assistance to the oil companies in the form of PIP grants, $8 billion over the next four years is earmarked for PIP grants. The Budget gives further breaks to oil companies.

[Translation]

There are numerous grants for the major oil companies. There is also some assistance for large corporations and banks, but nothing for farmers.

[English]

This is a start. If we can tackle something that really affects the farmers who are being hurt by the increase in the Crow rate and because their energy costs are going up, and from what the Members from Alberta and Saskatchewan have been saying today, they are being hurt with the price they are getting for their produce, then this should go to committee.

I will conclude by saying that, when the Hon. Member said we should take the old nag and turn it into a young filly, I did not realize that he supported the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) running again for the Liberal leadership.

Mr. Fisher: Any time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): The amendment is carried.

Motion (Mr. Mazankowski) agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): The question is on the motion, as amended. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion as amended?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion as amended agreed to.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): Order, please. It being five o'clock, this House stands adjourned until Monday morning at eleven o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

CANADIAN SECURITY INTELLIGENCE SERVICE ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

The House resumed from Monday, February 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. Kaplan that Bill C-9, an Act to establish the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, to enact an Act respecting enforcement in relation to certain security and related offences and to amend certain Acts in consequence thereof or in relation thereto, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to have an opportunity to speak against Bill C-9. It is quite a bad Bill although admittedly it is not as bad as Bill C-157 which went before it. Rather, it looks as if Bill C-157 was made as bad as possible in order to make Bill C-9 look good.

Bill C-9 does three things. First of all, it threatens Canadians who dissent from the Government, Canadians who support change in Canada and Canadians who support peace and justice in the world. All are threatened with practically uncontrolled mail opening and government action to infiltrate and disrupt their organizations by secret operatives. The Bill also authorizes the Canadian Security Intelligence Service to become secretly obligated to unnamed foreign governments. As a counterpart of that, it excludes elected Members of Parliament and, for that matter, non-elected members of the Senate, from reviewing its work in any thorough way. It even excludes the appointed review committee from reviewing Cabinet documents.

• (1110)

The background of this Bill is very important. It was pointed out just a few years ago by a person who has done more to defend the liberty of Canadians than the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan)—I refer to Jean-Claude Parrot, the head of the postal workers' union—that in Canada we seem to have two kinds of laws. When the postal workers go out on legal strike, the Government passes a law to make the strike illegal. When the RCMP open letters illegally, the Government passes a law to make it legal.

This is what this Bill is all about, Mr. Speaker. In the past it was the unions which were attacked, unions being second-class citizens. Union members are the only ones who can be sent to jail for not working. Professional people are now being attacked. In the 1960s the approach of the Government was more soft sell. It tried to fund the dissenters in order to take over dissent. By the end of the 1960s the professional people who dissented felt, in the words of George Grant, a well-known conservative philosopher, that dissent had become bureaucratized, that the dissenters had been co-opted. Around 1970, with the burning down of the Praxis Building in Toronto, tougher tactics began to emerge, not only the burning of the Praxis Building but burning a barn, defaming left leaders, forging documents, and all kinds of notorious, dirty tricks. There was some success achieved, I suppose, in the disruption of dissent and criticism during the 1970s by those means. Those tactics were not used, so far as can be determined, against espionage or sabotage. They were used against what might have vaguely been defined as subversion. But no criminal charges were laid in connection with incidents which would be commonly understood to be criminal activities engaged in by the police.

Following public outcry and considerable condemnation from the McDonald Commission, there were many crimes by the RCMP documented. There was no prosecution for these crimes outside the Province of Quebec. There has been no identified disciplinary action. We are told some people have been disciplined. We do not know whether they were disciplined for the crimes they committed or disciplined for helping to expose the crimes. There has been no undertaking that those crimes would cease. In fact, the effect of Bill C-157 and its "child" tends not to make those crimes punishable but to illegalize or intimidate dissent and criticism.

The Government proceeded as follows: after the report of the McDonald Commission of 1981, it delayed for two years and would take no action on any of the recommendations. On the question of prosecution it made sure it delayed until the statute of limitations rescued it. The Government then put forward Bill C-157, an amazingly bad Bill which brought unanimity from coast to coast among the provincial attorneys general in condemning the Bill. That was a remarkable achievement, Mr. Speaker.

The Bill was then diverted to the Senate for hearings where it was felt it would get more sympathetic treatment than in Parliament since there is no third party opposition in the Senate. The Senate committee under Senator Pitfield made certain recommendations which were not as strong as the recommendations of the McDonald Commission and tended to mask and hide the McDonald Commission recommendations from public attention.

The Government now, after this delay, has asked us to move suddenly on this Bill. It was even introduced on a Friday with less than one day's notice. The Friday before a Minister and his assistant whined about the fact that we were debating fisheries on a Friday—an important subject—although it was the Government which gave only one day's notice that it would be an Opposition Day. The Government then tried to slide Bill C-9 through about 10 days ago, on a Friday, hoping that it would move right through to committee without any serious debate on second reading.

The faults of this Bill, Mr. Speaker, are, first of all, that intrusion threatens Canadian dissenters with very vague language. The Bill refers to "any action directed toward or intended ultimately to lead to the destruction or overthrow". That allows any policeman or any civilian-type investigator the scope to be able to say: "I think I need to investigate that fellow. Some day he might be doing something which would tend to lead to the overthrow of the government".

• (1115)

By contrast, Mr. Speaker, the United States, which has much more serious experience with real espionage and terrorism, introduced new guidelines a year ago in which domestic security and terrorism investigation may be initiated "when the facts or circumstances reasonably indicate that two or more persons are engaged in an enterprise for the purpose of furthering political or social goals wholly or in part through activities that involve force or violence and a violation of the criminal laws of the United States". There must be much more specific evidence before they are allowed to proceed with that kind of an investigation. They must be able to show the magnitude of the threatened harm, the likelihood that it will occur, the immediacy of the threat—not some ultimate, "some day, maybe" action; it must be something immediate.

What is strikingly absent from this proposed Bill is that they must show that danger to privacy and free expression are sufficient to warrant an investigation. The Canadian law is much weaker in protecting Canadians. In spite of the recommendations of the McDonald Commission, or even of the friendly Pitfield committee, Bill C-9 excludes any mention of the duty of the secret service to convince the judge that the investigation is really needed. That is to say, that the damage to privacy is outweighed by the possible immediate damage if the investigation is not carried forward. That was asked for by both commissions and notably excluded in the Solicitor General's Bill.

Secondly, Mr. Speaker, intrusions such as mail opening with no more control that in the past, infiltration and disruption, threaten Canadians who are advocating social change at home or peace and international justice. For example, people who criticized the World Bank loan to South Africa could be caught in this kind of a coil. On the other hand, people who support the African National Congress would likewise be caught. Or even people who support the World Bank loan to South Africa, considering that country is engaged in violating international law by using that money to finance its war against Namibia, could be caught by this vague wording.

Canadians who support the FDR-FMLN resistance to the fascist government in El Salvador could be caught under this law. Likewise, Canadians who support D'Aubisson, the architect of mass violence and the probable architect of the murder of an archbishop, could be caught under this law. Supporters of the dictator Pinochet could be caught, or opponents as well. The law is meaningless. In the case of Chile, it would even catch the Roman Catholic church. Supporters of Baby Doc Duvalier in Haiti, that is to say, people carrying on CIDA projects, could be caught under this law. People carrying on CIDA projects in Honduras could be suspected of supporting a country which is a military base for the United States to invade and intimidate neighbouring nations in Central America.

By the way, aliens are given slightly more rights under this proposed law but not substantially more. However this part is not in keeping with the statement of the former Minister of Immigration who said that a mark of a civilized country is how it treats the poorest of its people. He suggests an equal test is how a civilized country treats those who are not its citizens and find themselves in desperate circumstances. These are, for example, refugee claimants, immigrants who have been declared inadmissible for reasons that cannot be told and illegal immigrants who are struggling to meet the Minister's supposed requirements for admission. It is against this background that I find the section on security provisions against aliens completely unsatisfactory.

• (1120)

I now come to the matter of infiltrators, "agents provocateurs". They have been used plentifully in the past. It is a practice which everyone agrees is unfair and immoral, especially being used by the government of a country against its own citizens who are not even accused of committing a crime. The Keable Commission recommended that this should be done only after a warrant had been issued by a judge. The Pitfield Commission downgraded the idea to guidelines rather than warrants, suggesting something similar to the FBI guidelines in the United States. In fact, it really ought to be necessary and recognized in law that anyone who wishes to carry on this kind of infiltration and disruption should show cause to a judge to justify the warrant and the invasion of privacy. In fact the Solicitor General has ignored the Keable Commission and the Pitfield committee and been completely silent on the matter of ending this practice of infiltration and disruption. We can expect the practices of the 1960s and 1970s with their dirty tricks to continue because the Solicitor General will not oppose them. He had this chance but he will not.

Goodness knows what trouble we may get into if we start digging into the slush fund administered by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Roberts). We may find ourselves up against the Solicitor General for challenging a government program.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Security Intelligence Service will not be subject to review by Parliament. The McDonald Commission required a parliamentary committee chosen by the Party Leaders with a right to see all evidence. The Pitfield committee suggested a Security Intelligence Review Committee appointed by the Government with a right to see all evidence and material, rather than a committee of Parliament. The Solicitor General has cut that down to the bone. There will be an appointed committee reflecting government views after consultation with the opposition. This means nothing. They will not be able to see the Cabinet documents that are vital to the operation and are in possession of the service.

Yet this same service can make contracts with unnamed foreign governments or unnamed departments of foreign governments and keep them secret from the Canadian people. Why is this? Has the FBI some dirty work that it wants the Canadian Security Intelligence Service to do, perhaps to help it combat the terrible threat of the American Indians?

The U.S. has more experience in terrorism than Canada. It nevertheless leaves investigation of U.S. citizens suspected of subversion to the FBI. There is oversight of that operation by the Senate and Congress. In Canada our Solicitor General wants to treat Canadians as though we are aliens in our own land, with a civilian force—which is essentially a police force—which will be more answerable to unnamed foreign governments than it will be to the Canadian people through their elected representatives.

• (1125)

The Government ought to withdraw this Bill and bring back a bill which is more in keeping with the recommendations of the McDonald Commission.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great care to the remarks of the Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap). I certainly found them helpful in explaining why he is strongly opposed to this Bill.

Would he elaborate on one point which he made during the course of his remarks with respect to the vagueness of the mandate which is proposed for the new security service? He referred to the fact that under the provisions of this legislation, groups within Canada who seek to support agencies or individuals in other countries seeking to put an end to oppressive and dictatorial governments may themselves come under surveillance. Could he elaborate on that particular provision of the legislation?

Mr. Heap: Mr. Speaker, I think it would be useful to draw attention to certain wording in the proposed legislation. A threat to the security of Canada is considered to include, among other things, activities within or relating to Canada directed toward, or in support of, the threat or use of acts of violence against persons or property for the purpose of achieving a political objective within Canada or a foreign state. In other words, anyone in Canada supporting someone in a foreign state who is pursuing a political objective with the use of acts of violence may be considered a threat. As I mentioned, the government of South Africa carries out violence against the black people within its borders and in neighbouring states. Therefore, anyone who supports the government of South Africa comes under this category of a threat to the security of Canada. I would think that there are many businessmen, bankers and government servants, for that matter, who come under that category.

Of course, it may be argued that the government will not prosecute those people but only those who are supporting the black people, if they support them by any activity within Canada. In that case the application of the law would be rankly biased and would be completely inconsistent with the actual wording of the law. That is one strong example of the falsity of the wording of this law. It is completely inapplicable to those situations in which Canadians are already engaged.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, Clause 17 of the legislation is one provision that I think should be drawn to the attention of the House and those who are following this debate. Perhaps the Member for Spadina might elaborate on this clause which he referred to in the course of his remarks.

According to the provisions of Clause 17(b), the new security service may, following the approval of the Solicitor General and consultations with the Secretary of State for External Affairs:

> —enter into an arrangement or otherwise co-operate with the government of a foreign state or an institution thereof or an international organization of states or an institution thereof.

According to this section, as I read it, it would be possible for the new civilian security service to pass on information which it obtains through the use of intrusive techniques. For example, this includes information which it obtains under Clause 16 of this legislation. That information may have nothing whatsoever to do with national security but could be information that would assist Canada in the conduct of its international affairs. It could be information gained from spying on a student group or group of foreign academics who are visiting Canada through opening their mail. In turn, that information could be passed on to an unnamed intelligence agency in a foreign country.

The present Solicitor General has taken the position that he will refuse to tell Canadians the names of the agencies that he is transferring this information to. We have a security agency which is using intrusive techniques to obtain information and pass it on to agencies of other governments, some of which the Solicitor General says are not even acknowledged in their own countries. One can only speculate on what kind of banana republic we are co-operating with when it does not even acknowledge the existence of its own security service. Conceivably those agencies can use that information against relatives or friends of the individuals within Canada. Would the Hon. Member elaborate on his concerns about this particular provision which he referred to in his speech?

● (1130)

Mr. Heap: Mr. Speaker, I would like to add two points to the very good points made by the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson). It has already been a long-standing matter of experience that the RCMP passes information to the FBI and that we really have no control of what sort of information is passed. Over the years Canadians who have wanted to enter the United States have been stopped from time to time. There was an incident of a Member of the Order of Canada, a Mrs. Macpherson, who was stopped from entering the United States, perhaps because she was going to a peace rally in New York. This is the kind of intrusion into non-security matters in which the RCMP is engaged and about which it has apparently passed information to the FBI.

Second, there was the disreputable business a few years ago of the kidnapping in Canada of the American Indian leader, Leonard Pelletier, who was returned to the United States in violation of the spirit of the extradition law. In other words, Canadian police officers collaborated with the FBI in a way that violated Canada's security and, incidentally, violated the rights of North America's first people. This is the kind of thing that has been going on and which is now going to be legalized. It will be impossible to criticize it effectively, let alone to bring it to court, if the Solicitor General has his way.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Herbert): If there are no further questions, I will recognize the Hon. Member for Okanagan North (Mr. Dantzer) for debate.

Mr. Vince Dantzer (Okanagan North): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak this morning on Bill C-9. I would urge every Member of this House and all Canadians to recognize that this Bill is of the utmost importance to this country. Many Bills which pass through this House affect our pockets but this Bill affects our liberty. It will continue to affect our liberty as individual Canadians and it will affect our personal lives. In that sense I think we should all be aware of how important it is, when this Bill gets to committee, that each and every Canadian who has an interest be heard. Make no mistake about it, it is very important legislation.
